The specialization, divergence and sheer multiplicity can cover up various trends. Therefore, composite images/collages can help identify various schools in connection with broader monster-creation practices. Less of a chronological sequence or lineage of ghosts, the composite image/collage is more how monsters can be collected, arranged and analyzed in terms of a likeness to one another amid various differences—monster pastiche, rape and revenge, rapture and release: playing with forbidden toys to infringe on taboo subjects speaking to current realities (exhibit 44b2)! We'll look at that in a second. First, let's narrow it down to Yasuomi Umetsu's Kite!

For all its gravity, Kite is surprisingly cartoonish and silly. Such data-as-damage can be silly and fun, but it can also be simultaneously serious in its camp, mid-cryptomimesis (with Japan haunted by fascism and American occupation): "hair of the dog" helping us loosen up, but also remember what we've forgotten/pushed out! We laugh at the madness, embodying it in kawaii/kowai forms we consume, and voyeurism/exhibitionism we play with (sins unto themselves)! Whores getting by in a man's world are so often transgressive, but also made "robotic" by men romancing their rape out of revenge (and which the whore seeks revenge in turn): the warrior assassin in the whore's getup (similar to naughty nuns, but also nun assassins, exhibit 48b), a monster made to kill its false father! "Did He who made the Lamb make thee?" Again, it's healthy to ask questions about the origins of monsters; just be ready for the answer to shock you:

(exhibit 44b1: States can only exist through lies and force. Sooner or later, someone seeks revenge. To it, any nation-state has secrets, generally of murder and rape. Some take the form of ghosts without bodies. Others are boogeymen of a more streetwise nature, having their victims under their thumbs versus coming back to haunt them. It can be fantasies of disempowerment tied to one lunatic, a cataclysm and catacombs, or some combination of these same features riling up intense emotions of master/slave. Hostages experience them in ways that can make us submit and obey, or to assassinate our captors. Same difference. The Pygmalion myth is rooted in master/apprentice, but also pedophilia, thus domination, lies and rape standing in cryptomimetically for the state-as-mendacious, personified.

To it, Umetsu's animated Cyberpunk noir, Kite, turns the Pygmalion fantasy on its head, marrying Galatea/the token Amazon to Oliver Twist; i.e., by speaking to a girl, Sawa, whose family is killed by an evil gangster, Akai, only to have him kidnap the daughter and turn her into a doll-like assassin/sex slave; i.e., less a "natural-born killer" and more someone with a talent for survival [the disassociation mechanism] who responds well to Pavlovian [robotic] conditioning! Their hellish bond is illustrated by the giving not of a collar or ring, but a pair of black-and-red earrings filled with the blood of her dead parents!

The plight is liminal, our heroine doing the master's dirty work [a gun stowed inside her schoolgirl's lunchbox, much like a switchblade] until she eventually works her way back to him; i.e., killing his men and finally the man himself. Shortly before this, though, she must "prove" her loyalty to him—hardly a fair test, but one that she endures as women classically do: a sex object raped by men at every waking moment. Per the cryptonymy process, deceptions sit within deceptions.

They cry to be heard and so often fall on deaf ears; but look to stories like Kite and you will find Medusa waiting for you, her scream anything but silent!

"Bred to kill, not to care," so are token women classically molded and shaped like clay into weapons [the line between predator and prey a thin one; re: the xenomorph]. Sawa is once more taken against her will [above] by someone who treats her as clay without feeling. So does he underestimate his prey, thinking his power is beyond reproach. In turn, the heroine plays along while her boyfriend, Oburi, is forced to watch. As Akai asserts his dominance, Sawa locks eyes with Oburi [both of them red, denoting shared trust issues]. It's a ruse, but they both have to grit and bear it. "One more time," they tell themselves. They suffer in silence, no strangers to segregation, pimping and genocide [while Sawa occasionally tells her rapist what he wants to hear]. The paradox of fantasy is how larger-than-life stories speak to everyday occurrences suffered by whores at the hands of cops/pimps, making the other submit for a change; i.e., while topping from below, but also while doling out street justice of a more classically "masc sort": with bullets. Rape is all she knows, so it's all he gets. Karma's a bitch, a phallic woman!

Not long after, Sawa has her revenge against the smug warlord/crooked cop; i.e., camping the rape fantasy in dead seriousness while staking the vampire master with hot lead, she takes him apart like clay! The pimp has no charm but what she led him to think he had, topping him from below! But he taught her what she in turn revisits upon him, disabusing him of any notion that he is a god. Mortal, after all! Keeping with the Promethean Quest, such voices are powerful and vital to recovery from abuse, insofar as they illustrate male authority figures as corrupt, venal and ultimately mortal in ways we victims of state abuse—often sex workers and/or child soldiers—can overcome; i.e., by "playing along" on parallel currents of power and rape fantasy. In doing so, we break their hearts and their backs, giving as good as we get to one-up them, thus demonically target capital through hearts and minds pulled inside-out for all to see. Fate is a cruel mistress; a pissed-off, indestructible whore with an axe to grind is even more so!)

Sawa is queen of the board, yet remains one piece pawning the king. Specifically this "messy chessboard" presents disparate examples that can identify a larger pattern over space and time once assembled and studied across the surface of the image (re: Segewick). The dialectical-material pattern we're holistically considering is of standardized forms of popular linguistic devices, whose figurative and literal co-functions in everyday parlance have seemingly been excised in favor of them as a simple product to consume. But their resistance to that standardization can still be gleaned through a gradient of suggestion—parallel examples with marginal cosmetic variations whose deeper context must be intuitively grasped through taught instruction: thinking about Gothic art as a mode of colonized expression. Such made-for-profit occupants say something about the current material world that can be transformed and led away from through similar language; i.e., "perceptive" pastiche and liminal subversions.

Gothic Hermeneutics (a reprise)

Let's talk about that, for a moment—i.e., from a hermeneutic standpoint (five pages)—then wrap up with some broader points about Shelley's tragic quest exported far and wide.

The Communist usage of Gothic theories contends with the material world as something to reillustrate in vivid, colloquial terms: monster puns, pastiche, and visual metaphors that, as "ghosts," get at the essence of things through a mimetic exchange—one that keeps track of the underlying commentary through exchange (and trauma) as something to personify. My specialty is collages; e.g., exhibit 44b2 (above) actually being the first of its kind that I designed in December 2022; i.e., for Sex Positivity as a nascent book series, which promptly grew into literally hundreds and hundreds of follow-ups. "It's alive!" indeed!

This goes beyond the monster to include the person (or aggregate) that made it. To that, the Bride of Frankenstein (above) has already been drawn many, many times by artists who are for or against the state to variable, liminal degrees. As an egregore, her composite status—her literal form, the proliferation of copycats and liminal occupation between them all—represents a complicated system of tension that exists between social-sexual values and linguo-material conditions that, in the same breath, are creatively suspicious about the material world; i.e., as filled with "old" counterfeit monsters: the bourgeois double/fatal portrait. This includes zombies, vampires, ghosts and other supernatural variants, combined with non-supernatural, human variants (doubles, counterfeits, traitors, false friends, long-lost relatives, evil stepmothers, rapacious monks, etc)—all collectively denoting an untrustworthy alien presence. Through a bourgeois Superstructure, the elite uses fearful artifice to conceal a variety of systemic, counterfeit abuses: profitable likenesses. It's disarmingly easy to get lost in the sheer bulk of material produced—with all that "poster pastiche" scrambling to recreate the past and "see"; re: darkness visible and allegory disguised as "mere play."

During the glut, then, it helps hermeneutically to think of monsters as code for academic terms we can then synthesize. Zombies represent brain death, but also abjection and the state of exception. Conveyed through an endless stream of images, consider how the Bride of Frankenstein seemingly becomes a pile of cheap, countless copies that one could do virtually anything with, but under Capitalism tends to follow certain compelled trends. These trends do not naturally announce themselves on individual viewings; they must be exposed by exhibiting them as a collection. This takes time, effort, and careful participation between instructors and instructees—the teacher and the student, but also workers and labor as something to de-alienize and reunite with, in the modern world.

Except, in doing so, the marginalized variation can seem anesthetizing and opaque; i.e., having as little to say about something while being still a slave to the grind, keeping up with the endless material feed about a genre that was cliché two centuries ago, but under late-stage, neoliberal Capitalism has robbed the monster's critical power to expose the abuses that happen to sex workers behind the scenes and onstage. So cryptonymy points to abject things the initiated can recognize.

In other words, the cake is a lie—a complicated sex-coercive lie, in canonical forms. Zombie Sombra (next page) isn't just a pretty "zombie" face and fat piece of undead ass to pimp out. But various pieces of "sexy zombie" media—i.e., those created by sex workers while stealing from them (which is all that profit is)—will, when uncritically consumed, "eat your brain": in service to Capitalism and its regular workplace abuses, historically-materially inflicted on workers whose brains have already been partially or fully affected. As a material object, the Bride isn't doing anything "by herself"; her complex status—as an active, visually and ontologically ambiguous-ambivalent linguistic factor—functions inside an ongoing living exchange: what we think about her and sex work, in relation to the Bride's chosen monstrous, human and sexualized components. Our hermeneutic approach must consider that in relation to other things going on all at once, back and forth. Thus the collages; they're a good shorthand to holistic praxis.

"How people talk" includes how people learn, whether in bourgeois or proletarian ways, mid-opposition; i.e., the playful, creatively "grey" thought processes that happen cryptomimetically behind and between commonplace terms and materials (whatever's on hand, lending an improvised quality to how most people create or think, be those newfound devices vintage or retro). This includes thinking about popular symbols (of trauma) in relation to the material world and those inside it; i.e., as already having a biased, heavy influence from the structure itself as collage-like: conditioned to consume everything in uncritical, thus unthinking ways that keep you divided and stupid, thus alienated from nature, your labor and from each other. "No man is an island"; forming connections is vital towards addressing Capitalism's structural, generational effect on individual worker brains still part of a large whole—the former's lack of connection inside Capitalism being what performs the "lobotomy." Menticide is menticide, betrayal is betrayal.

So, having shorthand, placeholder terms like "lobotomy"—and hermeneutic devices like cryptomimesis and collage—helps activism work; i.e., not just to describe this ontological complexity inside a larger socio-sexual web (thus effect experience through relative monster language) but to frame sex-coercive abuse as something to resist according to exhibit 44b2's deeper context among individual examples we can study in focus should we wish to (a fourth surprise exhibit): Blizzard's zombifying thirst-trap take on the Bride of Frankenstein, with Sombra. "Ain't Talkin' 'Bout Love, Blizzard's love (necrophilia) is rotten to the core!" SO do canonical sex symbols demonize rape as a commodify to pilot, avatar-style:

We'll scrutinize Blizzard's corporate "zombie" treatment of the whored-out action princess, in Volume Three. For now, I merely want to highlight the canonical standard. Blizzard aren't encouraging literal necrophilia, here; they're pimps, selling people a canonical standard of what people naturally tend to like and unnaturally tend to dislike—sex and the monstrous-feminine; a fascination with the barbaric, reimagined past; and jokes, laughter and camp/schlock; but also music associating these things with drugs and/or drug-like altered states ("rock 'n roll" being 1950s African American slang for "sex"); and all of the above combined: as incessant recreations of regular social-sexual exchanges and critical techniques like parody and irony giving sanctioned invitations to indulge in ways that are allowed—i.e., standardized for profit's sake, then disguised as genuine creative expression/uncontrolled opposition that doesn't compel sex worker abuse and consumer pacification. It's a sham, these "corpo" monster girl pin-ups meant to be consumed as canon, which "zombifies" the consumer in ways that reliably lead to corporate profit (thus rape). So does Zombie Capitalism tacitly condone worker exploitation, both inside the workplace and out.

The stackable presence of sanitized, mass-produced variants likewise indicate a presence of sex-positive interest and repressed desires to experiment; i.e., where sex (and urges related to sex, often through monstrous language) are happening on the regular in ways that are barred not behind one "X" to solve for, but three in a row. Triple "protection," thrice the exploitation and subterfuge, the alien/unknown becoming something to make or otherwise concern ourselves with for a variety of reasons: to tame wild nature/the fire of the gods as monstrous-feminine, or to wield it for the forces of one side or the other while still a little savage; e.g., the Powerpuff Girls, below, fighting for their makeshift solo dad playing god; i.e., similar to how Artemis and other goddess-grade daddy's girls might kneel before Zeus (versus attacking him, Medusa-style): the inventor weaponizing Pinocchio, Galatea, Adam, Lilith, Mega Man, or whoever else, as little Amazonian whores to make in a lab, then uphold "Western values"; i.e., suggesting a superhuman design to replicate, harness and capitalize on nature-as-monstrous-feminine by a "benevolent" mentor mastering the Fates (classically three, with "chemical X" being the alien power of sex, technology and the gods, birthing little monsters/subjugated Amazons²⁸⁹; re: Scott's black goo/dark devil sperm. It's basically a really fucked-up version of the baby and the stork).

So, business-as-usual, then. The camp lies in making the blind parody of canon perceptible again, which generally happens after the metaphors have died: sexless wizards making monster babies to avoid thinking beyond Capitalism!

Granted, only academics or art nerds will spell this out (with pride), but doing so is tremendously important because it teaches people to grasp language intuitively when thinking about art critically. Armed with these seemingly magical abilities, workers may begin to holistically address, mid-hermeneutic, "how people talk" in relation to the current material world; i.e., where people are trying to say, see and understand things that are naturally and unnaturally confusing: using Gothic shorthand and metaphor to comment on the complex, ongoing relationship between people and canonical media, they begin to actively and intelligently think through creative means according to things that normally go unsaid spoken in dead versions of themselves.

This includes how people normally engage with and think about sexuality as taught by sex-coercive media; it includes workplace abuses that are covered up, ignored or neglected in favor of pacifying media. The root of the problem, then, is Capitalism "leaving things out," alienating workers from their labor as an abject extension of themselves: the material arrangement that allows for canonical versions to be pushed onto people's eyeballs and into their brains without encouraging critical thought at all. Sex becomes alien, powerful, fearsome canon.

These abuses can be challenged, of course, but this starts by changing how people see, thus think about and respond to, Capitalist Realism through Gothically sexual media (and by extension regular sexual media beholden to the same theories): as something to buy, sell and create in a playful, fun way without leaving anything out of the larger dialectic. The whole must be studied and understood if we are to grasp its deeper workings using surface level things; e.g., Original Sin; i.e., the rotting technology of dying empires feeling more and more magical as those cushioned by civilization fall in love with regressive fantasies (and thrills): as a paradoxical means of escape from present abuses, the ghost of the counterfeit able to reverse abjection, during a given crisis (which the state is always in).

²⁸⁹ "X" is also the female chromosome; i.e., "darkness is female"/the creation of sexual difference extending—from Beauvoir to myself—to nature as monstrous-feminine; re: anything treated as different than white cis-het Christian men, versus simply "woman is other" on a descending ladder of preferential mistreatment, which is tremendously exclusionary (also Beauvoir—like any TERF will, in positions of power imbalance—famously raped her students, doing so with Jean-Paul Sartre and then bragging about it; re: Martin's "The Persistence of the 'Lolita Syndrome'," 2013). Nature isn't a binary!

Something to bear in mind, then, is that "science" and the prospect of discovery has historically remained a bourgeois excuse to exploit workers and the natural world; i.e., for the sake of perceived "progress" through industry and economic prosperity shouted from on high by those with material advantage (which Victor does, playing god through natural philosophy to demonstrate his mastery over nature by creating unnatural life). This superiority (and its much-touted progression) is a bald-faced lie, one we must bravely study by using the Promethean Quest as a means of developing Capitalism into Communism. Frankenstein is arguably the first science fiction novel, and—as Shelley happily demonstrates—gave birth to so many monsters as to need collages to catalog even a portion of them to study. On the surface of these, its Communist drive (spectres of Marx) goes hand-in-hand with the Gothic's love for monsters and mad science; i.e., a "madness" in duality, insofar as state science madly exterminates nature for profit, and which the state sees science for nature as "mad" because universal emancipation threatens their bottom line. The state needs profit, thus genocide, to exist, our existence both required and fed on by dead labor (re: Marx).

The Gothic, since Frankenstein, considers rape as a matter of revenge against the rapist; i.e., capital rapes nature before, during and after birth, often targeting the mind as something to invade back into itself.

To that, Victor is the first mover of Shelley's novel, and a stark reminder of the fallibility of those on either side of power imbalance: bourgeois hand-wringing about rogue technology (workers) inside a past-future ruined civilization occupied without masters, but instead mindless furious slaves empowered by vengeful gods (nature). Onstage and off, Capitalism pushes genocide to the frontiers it dominates; this final frontier is the end of Capitalism viewed, by Lovecraft onwards, as his cosmic-nihilist approach to Capitalist Realism—all to spite Utopia as a non-starter treated as a given, were it not for those pesky wrenches in the works: the terrifying realization that technology (re: workers) survive after the elite die off prematurely (from slave revolt). "Rome" is subsequently pushed into outer space, where Lovecraft—a bonafide fascist and all-around piece of shit (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Mandy, Homophobia and the Problem of Futile Revenge," 2024)—loudly mourns its tragic loss/fears its returning doomsday (the liminal hauntology of war) vis-à-vis "monsters from the Id" (re, Forbidden Planet [1956]: Persephone van der Waard's "Revisiting The Modern Prometheus through Astronoetics," 2024).

In turn, writers like Scott ran with that idea, doing so to dogmatize and profit off a fascist bastardizing of Shelley's pro-labor projections; i.e., by demonizing and weaponizing the working class, but also using state devices to pirate power and seize control of the space around them (re: Radcliffe). It speaks to the circular nature of the problem, and of the tendency to view present issues retrojected backwards into the imaginary past: the blindly furious Medusa threatening state shift, a hungry whore ravished by centuries of abuse suddenly eating us alive. Promethean spaces challenge profit (and its concealment) through found "ancient" documents (re: "Revisiting"); i.e., by fighting fire with Promethean fire/darkness visible; e.g., Scott's Derelict, Lovecraft's city of the old ones, or Shelley's Creature.

All the same, it speaks to genuinely ancient struggles²⁹⁰ that predate capital and modern science, yet are haunted by the anachronistic injection of science as mad: we have entered the world of the gods, but they are insane and ruled by the system housing them as empowered to destroy for the purpose of profit. The story is tragic, but productive and vital—a profound testament to criminogenesis and the invention of terrorism; i.e., Capitalism is the Great Destroyer—a machine that turns workers into small automatons that give or receive as it demands (so often, people look at the Creature and think it's a zombie; while not untrue, it's also a machine).

When being raped, we must tire our attackers while—to some frightening degree—being unable to stop them; i.e., how we, in the present, will not live to see a day without Capitalism, without rape! Instead, that will come past our lifetime, according to what we leave behind pointing to the future in past language: giant children who warred in ways that inspire future action swept up in the hypnotic language of the imaginary past and its familiar faces' fatal nostalgia (the haunted house extra compelling if it exists, paradoxically, far away from home)! Such camp is always a bit absurd/surreal. So is rape, more broadly, an out-of-body experience that feels trapped in particular veins of fabricated existence (the disassociation machine): Ozymandias looks like Prometheus. As we'll see when we look at Radcliffe, better to learn from perceptive pastiche than blind parody, but you often start with blind parody (and statues with blind eyeballs, left).

Such hermeneutic cryptomimesis—inauspiciously venerating and exiling Great Machines, mise-en-abyme—might seem counterproductive, and yet so many workers under Capitalist Realism cannot conceptualize the present harm being done without doing so; i.e., the dying

²⁹⁰ Evoked, as usual, in the language of shelter and protection, but also the alien. Something as simple as stone tools or camp fire ("most animals fear fire") evokes a basic idea of anti-predation during exploration-in-isolation, but also confusion as to who's who during the tussle. Colonizers and their secret sins aren't erased by killing Radcliffe's bugbear. But also, humans are reliant on technology as bound up/to larger struggles, all to tell smaller stories inside ongoing systemic problems. Furthermore, there's nowhere we'd rather be, because the freeing element is a matter of context; i.e., playing with the unknown while framing it as something to explore, mid-calculated-risk. Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM. The hauntologies typically allow for some degree of swashbuckling and kayfabe/Amazonomachia, but boil down to encountering the planet as alien, wild, dead out of a primordial past come home to roost: Saturn devouring his son, as the Engineer does to Weyland (David is inedible). Per the Promethean Quest, the land is reclaimed by nature and labor from false gods, and sought out by seekers of the Numinous using Gothic poetics all over again...

Ozymandian corpse of Capitalism, versus the Communist Numinous prematurely aborted in the womb and haunting the venue. The historical-material cycles on loop show how these devices can be manipulated, which requires a careful process of detection, mid-camp (one whose liminal investigations, we'll pointedly return to with Alien, during "Giger's Xenomorph").

For now, we'll spend the remainder of "Making Demons" (eleven pages) going over some of the broader points tied to Shelley's Promethean critique (and shift gradually towards supernatural occult demons, as we do).

Some Broader Points on Shelley's Promethean Quest (for Fatal Knowledge)

Mary Shelley was—among other things—a curious bitch; i.e., thirsty for knowledge as forbidden, but also critiquing stories with a similar "come hell or high water" drive. One of those drives remains technology as traveling critique, namely astro-neoetics, or the astral projection of Earth's colonial gaze onto so-called "other worlds"; i.e., under the guise of benevolent colonization of "empty" territory (a common trope in older futurist media whitewashing genocide): the humans are the UFOs, or presented as Ozymandian likenesses/dead godly giants to look upon and tremble at while, all the same, going boldly where no one has supposedly gone before. But they have gone before (re: Alien), Capitalism burying the procedure to repeat it again and again despite the overarching presence of nature's rage. It gentrifies and decays on loop according to worker appetites the state cultivates.

Just as Clarke's law presents advanced technologies as indistinguishable from magic, the inverse is also true: dated, retro-future ancient magics being a metaphor for science and advanced technologies imagined once-upon-a-time, before they actually existed. This technophobic tradition was cemented by Shelley in 1818, becoming its own kind of Gothic "archaeology" tied to retro-future castles, but also suits of armor and ghost ships as things to reinvent for didactic purposes; i.e., to communicate hidden lessons about Cartesian abuses that would have been stamped out if said in non-fantastical, everyday language. Derelict and floating in the void, these Gothic abstractions can be studied far away from prying eyes, then looted for fatal knowledge that can help prevent future disasters from taking place.

While freeing all sex workers using general Gothic sex-positivity is what Gothic Communism is all about, it targets the source of abusive conditioning that fashions those who grow to see themselves as "better" than the world around them: the heroic (monomyth) tale as increasingly scientific/Cartesian.

Both conceal an expressly military function that, through Gothic displacement, can be openly expressed through the Gothic chronotope as something people aren't totally aware they're even looking at; i.e., Scott's liminal space as littered with the symbols of dynastic primacy and hereditary rites; e.g., the suits of armor on board the Nostromo (itself a flying "space castle" made undead by the Derelict as a ghost ship)—one of which Ripley puts on to "armor" her virtue (a Radcliffean concept) from the cosmically framed dark rapist.

Just as Shelley took the heroic quest and made it Promethean, my entire book communicates complex things in monstrous-poetic shorthand by identifying the Promethean Quest as a critical response and means of subverting the monomyth. The same goes for any myth, Sex Positivity gradually trusting the reader to rely on informed emotional intuition using literal and figurative language. By helping them play with said language and working out different solutions, the subversion occurs "within the text" (re: Derrida); i.e., according to a natural-material world as something to critique with Gothic theories, mid-synthesis.

All the while, the book assumes readers can gradually learn to think empathetically/self-defensively on their feet and toes about Gothic media and sex work. As such, it gradually eases them into a critical-thinking process to compound, practice and develop within yourself according to the material world—i.e., compound learning in relation to compound phobias that, when analyzed through sex-positive, iconoclastic art under Gothic Communism, give up the hidden, Promethean truth about Capitalism: the colonial abuses of the hidden dead and their lingering desire for revenge. These suddenly spring forth when foolishly brought back to life, invoking the weapons of the past for two basic purposes: liberation or exploitation; i.e., the Radcliffean scapegoat is generally summoned to scare the middle class into passivity—fear towards technology if placed in the wrong hands; e.g., Cameron's Terminator rooted in present barbarities dressed up in retro-future semi-magical language (there being little difference between a T-800²⁹¹, below, and a walking corpse, save one is revived by magic, through and through, and the other by technology indistinguishable from magic).

Resurrecting insurrection applies to rememory as a kind of "forgetting" that hurts when revived; i.e.,

its apocalypse the natural consequence of such a large system of exploitation: not everyone knows what happens in far-off places, and as we have seen with Victor and his ilk, the cost of endless profit is often dressed up as "bold Romantic discovery." A desire to know and dissect the world leads to Earth being routinely treated like an unthinking object without rights; over time, this trauma manifests in stories that hint at the unspeakable abuses taking place more and more, over centuries, inside an expanding hegemony the oppressed come to despise. Time is a circle, which requires circular solutions. And yet, the biggest lie of "Golden Age" science fiction is how those "solving problems" in outer space (with linear stabbing methods and ideologies) are "solving" anything at all; they're cops on the frontier as forgotten about and rediscovered in ways that are re-penetrated and scowled at, mid-intromission. For them and the state, doing so occupies and generates a system of showing and concealment; i.e., where police operatives appearing as workers can stochastically torture nature's secrets out of, again (the profit motive). For us, Medusa's dark womb is a place to work: reversing abjection (and terror/counterterror) anisotropically during the cryptonymy process.

Again, this lineage is generally viewed backward, a ghoulish love for the imaginary past leading to a confrontation with strange modes of communication—of viewing science less as a modern, dignified practice and more an increasingly brutal, backwards enterprise tinged with superstition, magic, rape, madness, revenge and torture (which pregnancy classically is²⁹²). As a restorative means of expressing trauma, these older modes of communication can be reclaimed, but the ²⁹² Such a violence as Shelley provided was vital to the rights of people who give birth speaking to their rights by reifying them: as tokophobic entities tied to very-real concerns; i.e., the act of pregnancy itself tantamount to unironic torture and rape (it's not like Percy Shelley had to carry Mary's babies):

"Once this thing's in you, it's not coming out without a lot of extreme pain (the worst in your life) and people expect you to be happy about that; i.e., middle-aged women, who guilt-trip you into having kids, calling it [state-compelled sexual reproduction] a 'blessing.'" This ties into Gothic modesty arguments as frequently morphological for cis-het women fearful of their biology (their uterus) as something normally controlled and regulated by state forces (the same way trans women are afraid of their penises) [source: "Following in Medusa's Footsteps," 2024].

Classically cis, this extends to queer GNC people sharing the same desire to purge the idea of having the only babies the state cares about (with stories like Frankenstein discouraging a particular kind of children: rape babies (necrophilia and graverobbing = rape) that—like the Medusa, go onto exact revenge against those who made them; e.g., Alien, Metroid, Abigail, and countless others), and challenging that "pro-life" argument by utilizing Frankenstein's speculative richness to have the whore's revenge (with Shelley being Percy's "side piece" until she wasn't, outliving him to become a protector not just of women [as her mother was] but of nature itself and all its occupants).

journey is still stressful because the horrors cannot be disentangled from the solution. To dealienate ourselves and the natural world, we must eat the cannibals (the rich) by understanding how Capitalism alienates using demonic poetics.

Even here, though, the line between science and the occult is not clear-cut. For one, the summoning can happen through an obvious demonic ritual, but also through the possession or taking of someone's body or soul through an alien, unknown force. In the latter example, this seemingly happens without an explicit contract or ritual taking place (versus ghostly possessions, which are linked to a graveyard or murder site)—i.e., the punishment of trespass, of going where one shouldn't. In either case, forbidden knowledge is gained in relation to the demons' own bodies, genders and sexualities as incredibly fluid and bizarre.

As we shall see, next, this makes the occult demon—however absurd and profound—a form of taboo human expression inextricably linked to everyday bodies and events: sex, coloring one's hair and wearing clothes as performative factors, but also identifying with things beyond our physical limitations or current understandings of the world as it is provided to us by those in power. It's a bloodbath, one our hysteria can double!

Satan's menses! It's in my mouth!

During our own exploitation, then, doubts about this world can start to emerge, which align with a natural drive; i.e., to satisfy human curiosity in the face of ambiguous, vaso-vagal danger or the menacing unknown—of being lied to by authority figures. At its simplest, then, the Promethean Quest is a harmful search for knowledge; its hard-won knowledge frequently becomes associated with transformative, intensely ritualized tortures in wildly popular stories.

In turn, these can link to colonial guilt as buried and far off, but somehow close at hand; i.e., the colonial territory as dead; e.g., literally Dead Space (2008) punishing the worker stuck inside in the imperial machine with Medusa. Forced there by greedy companies, stories like Dead Space, Alien, 2001 and others, operate—on par with survival horror at large—to mirror colonial abuse, but also doom exacted upon status-quo laborers sensing Imperialism come home to empire while on its far-off frontiers: a black, "ancient, derelict" monolith (the Medusa's fat ass) vibrating cryptonymically with the ghost of the counterfeit's ethnocentric alienation from ongoing brutality.

Per Poe, Conrad, Lovecraft and Scott, etc, it becomes something to fetishize and pimp out of revenge against nature (antagonize and put cheaply to work for fear of nature's revenge; re: the "slave revolt" gaslight). Per Hogel, it becomes something to dance with, shoving swords into one another like stage fencers in on the joke (re: Titus Andronicus, suggested above by the Adams Family). The joke is rape, hoisting those with privilege on their own petards through the same dire implications (white/male or otherwise—with Shelley's story going beyond men like Victor to speak to anyone working for the state/inside the Man Box; re: token Amazons the likes of which Radcliffe motivated to punch down against nature with).

Keeping with capital, and returning to Frankenstein's Promethean Quest, older orders are eclipsed by new ones having evolved from them and—conjured up as past—become a dark spell to fall under all over again (re: Punter). Said spell is canonically made to abject capital's raping of nature (or trend of said abuses) onto a dupe; re: Victor learning he's a failure, but one trying to get himself back in the West's good graces by shattering his golem.

Shelley's story is—among many other things—an excommunication for us to peer at and make our own conclusions. A popular one is the beauty of the dark Satanic site; i.e., when compared to the West and its presumably undecayed vestiges, one where the presence of decay reverses abjection, Imperialism coming home to empire. Nature is "ancient" and dark a) because the state needs it to be, but also b) because worker counterterror hits its hardest through the same ghost of the counterfeit; i.e., a demon to work its black magics on Western brains by infiltrating them not just in quotidian spheres (the Creature looks human at a glance), but in the boundaries of imagination populated by so many workers escaping real life: space is dead, the rogue, runaway technology seeking posthuman revenge (e.g., the shapeshifting xenomorph stupidly tough like Victor's Creature [to better colonize foreign and domestic frontiers with] but also Cameron's infiltrator demon-machine terminators, especially the "liquid metal" T-1000)!

For starters—and keeping with canonical predations on nature framed as "alien" by state Orientalism—the tortures and torturers of demonic rituals (the ghosts of Cultural and Imperialism as much as Spectres of Marx) often hail from dark, otherworldly zones of seemingly magic demons; i.e., cryptonymic vanishing points;

e.g., desolated jungles or crater-marked moonscapes whose forbidden sites of colonial torture rest on native lands. These artificial wildernesses, in turn, have been cordoned off, guiltily viewed through a ghost of the counterfeit that displaces and disassociates the abuse being told. Relayed to an unwitting set of accomplices, the audience is "tortured" by identifying with a Western proxy lying on the slab: an altar of sacrifice waiting inside a giant torture site where the colonized (tortured themselves in the past) patiently take their revenge; i.e., like spiders, slowly torturing their unwitting prey caught in castle-sized webs.

Yet, this Gothic chronotope is hardly a simple case of spiders eating flies; it concerns a transgenerational curse—i.e., the mass exploitation of the natural world and its undeveloped inhabitants by self-proclaimed "superiors": the lords of the West. By stumbling inside, the non-native/naïve explorers (often simply workers or soldiers, themselves) suddenly find themselves not just trapped inside an angry gravesite of continual exploitation (one they have, until now, turned a blind eye towards); they horrifyingly discover themselves unable to escape its rage outside its borders. No matter how far they go, its trauma will follow them back into the modern world; e.g., Ripley and the xenomorph. There, this anger—like the Creature from Frankenstein—will torture them to the ends of the universe, a golem that never tires or forgets: "the axe forgets, the tree remembers." Rememory threatens our ascension, coming together brick-by-brick as Great Destroyer!

This liminality further pins between ironic and unironic forms of torture. The phrase can be defined as an attempt to cause physical or mental harm—to terrorize and deprive someone of their agency and their rights as a worker and a person (or to commit acts of revenge for having these rights revoked and inflicted; i.e., the "What comes around, goes around!" delivery of vengeful torture that the Creature delivers against Victor Frankenstein, and similar characters and stories); re (from "A Note about Rape," 2024): "'rape' meaning [for our purposes] 'to disempower someone or somewhere—a person, culture, or place—in order to harm them,' generally through fetishizing and alienizing acts or circumstances/socio-material conditions that target the mind, body and/or spirit" (source).

Toys—and the boxes that house them—become invaluable towards speaking out, in small/mise-en-abyme; i.e., by acting out our desire to harm our abusers, but also expose them as predatory and false. The ability to create things in dualistic, material opposition to state doubles is vital, then—if only because it gives us a planet-sized supply of building materials (clay and earth) to ascribe with dead metaphors; i.e., things that can be given whatever meaning and modular qualities we want while camping canonical forms and their unironic tortures. It's the perfect medium for a pedagogy of the oppressed: reclaiming our demonized humanity through an aesthetic/shared shadowy stage we take back; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM playing with dead things, but also forbidden, demonic torture speaking to our own rape/liberation in paradoxical acts of sight through blindness, humiliation and pain! Never trust a skinny cook! Trust sin as an ironic, reclamatory diet rocking your world with planetary booties; i.e., Gaia's dumper! Stare and tremble at genocide in small! Now it has its revenge!

The whore's paradox is Medusa being alive and dead, already made when making new things; "monstrous-feminine" amounts to anything exploited/extirpated by settler-colonial forces that, as whores, can use their Aegis to exert Promethean power onto state pimps ("Who's the vermin now, assholes?"). Moving onto "Summoning Demons," then, we'll start with the more canonical, "civilized" tortures—i.e., the domestic world and its Radcliffian inhabitants being unironically invaded by dark forces from an ancient Somewhere Else—before moving progressively deeper into nature's dark, wild and unknown recesses/pleasures.

While the dark forest is a common Gothic threshold in the literal Gothic period, aka the Renaissance—e.g., Dante's Inferno, 1321—it was followed by Milton and Walpole into the Neo-Gothic period of the 1790s, Shelley's 1818 magnum opus, and 200+ years of fiction that, from the canonical Western perspective, demonize any foreign, alien, unknown lands resisting colonialization, or are occupied by perceived greater forces than Mankind vis-à-vis Cartesian thought, mid-oppression:

- Mary Shelley's foreboding Mount Blanc in Frankenstein, 1818
- Poe's foray towards the South Pole in Arthur Gordon Pym (with cannibals), 1838
- Joseph Conrad's doomed, racist presentation of Africa—as a dark, savage continent (from a white man's perspective) in Heart of Darkness, 1899
- Lovecraft demonizing the unknown with an "ancient aliens" flavor in At the Mountains of Madness, 1936
- Ridley Scott's dark planetoid surface being investigated by exploited space truckers in Alien, 1979
- James Cameron's doomed, Vietnam-esque colony being avenged by American colonial space marines in Aliens, 1986
- Nintendo's Metroid, 1986, and many, many spiritual, cartographic, neoliberal successors (re: "Mazes and Labyrinths" vis-à-vis the FPS, Metroidvania, and survival horror) in the 21st century Gothic Communism's daring foray into this sinful "land of darkness" isn't to demonize ourselves ("Tis an unweeded garden grown to seed"), but to reclaim nature-as-monstrous-feminine from the state; i.e., from its unironically xenophobic, us-versus-them treatment and linguo-material features, taking back these things from all colonizers across space and time: the Enlightenment as surviving into the present, but touched through a Western, fearful/guilty fascination with the past after being alienated from it (which, again, Hogle correctly notes, operates through the ghost of the counterfeit as wedded to the process of abjection; re, Dave West's "Implementation of Gothic Themes in the Gothic Ghost of the Counterfeit":

In "The Gothic Ghost of the Counterfeit and the Process of Abjection," Jerrold E. Hogle argues that the eighteenth-century gothic emergence from fake imitation of fake work is the foundation of what is defined as modern gothic today. He maintains that Horace Walpole's 1765 The Castle of Otranto, which is considered as the groundwork of the modern Gothic story, is built on a false proclamation that the novel was an Italian manuscript writing by a priest. [...] Hogle argues that modern Gothic is grounded in fakery. [In turn,] Hogle's observation of the history of The Castle of Otranto forms the basis for understanding the concept of counterfeit as a result of the abjection process) [source].

Communism—specifically Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism—camps canon through Gothic poetics. As such, the deliberate ironies of iconoclastic torture during ludo-Gothic BDSM follow the same call of the void—first, through the raw poetic creation of demons during magic ceremonies; then, Radcliffe's Pavlovian brand of exquisite "tortures" acting out liminal, not-quite-there-yet BDSM that plays with demons (as hidden, per Cameron's refrain, behind jingoistic, militarily optimistic/neocon xenophobia fearing murderous cuckoo imposters); then onto Shelley and ultimately my work holistically and repeatedly retrospectively all of this!

We've already looked at Shelley and Scott. Now we'll look at Radcliffe's flawed notions of performative torture (and wasted genius selling out for conservative means, the imposter indoctrinating the nation's youth to defend the state from its own exploited labor force); i.e., of canonical torture versus exquisite "torture" being something I took far beyond anywhere Radcliffe was willing (or able) to go. Yes, Radcliffe was a cop who wrote from ignorance and lacked Shelley's radical nature; her elements of genius still contributed to my work and ludo-Gothic BDSM camping "rape." We'll put her corpse once more on the slab, dissecting its probative value before diving headlong inside during the subsequent chapter's frank exploration of trans, intersex and non-binary expression in the 21st century.

The state (and its oft-undercover cops) are straight—will copy anything in bad faith to survive (re: DARVO and obscurantism). As a fundamentally ancient, ever-present force, non-gender-conformity haunts the capitalist world's heteronormative order by subverting the usual, canonical taming of nature by white, cis-het men; re: who see it as dark, female and chaotic (with TERFs going to bat for them, in many neoconservative tales). To canonically call something "ancient, alien and unknown" means to exotify and segregate it for police violence, which rebels must reclaim on the stages of persecution; i.e., while the cops are called on us/the vigilantes pointed in our directions. It's militarized, tokenized regression in a dated, retro-future ethnocentrism indicative of state collapse, which Gothic media crosses over into: penetrate the alien, then ask for snuggles.

Now that we've explored examples of the manmade demon, studied composite images of them as a way of identifying monstrous patterns through poster/monster pastiche and "mash," and outlined a ghastly heritage of colonial abuses told through the Promethean Quest as a fearful voyage into the ancient unknown, let's point this gaze even farther backwards into the imaginary past. To that, let's examine the history of summoned, occult demons and the forbidden knowledge they offer during expressly magical iterations of the Promethean Quest and its famous tortures beyond Victor's pity party). This includes the stacked, sexy detectives chasing this power down in "explained supernatural" environs; i.e., performed as such; e.g., Rachel Storms, below, aping Radcliffe, per her latter-day resurrections: Velma as "hardboiled"—caught between damsels, detectives and sex demons at large! Such cryptomimesis might seem "dated" or "stuck"; their camp can yield tremendous, fortress-sized powers to rival any cop, token or not!

As something for the state to harvest, then, we humanize the harvest to portray the state as inhumane! Nature and its demons' cryptonymy are generally thicc, often as not (and andro/gynodiverse, in sexually descriptive/culturally appreciative forms)! Glasses aren't just to help us weird nerds read; they're cum shields for stacked cuties!

As we go, the heroine's virgin/whore paradox also applies to a common problem under Capitalism I will try once more to unpack and express, surveying here territories whose gratuitous cryptonymy we have previously surveyed; re (from Volume One):

(exhibit 11b1b: Artist, right: Nya Blu. We all have skulls inside us. According to the Gothic tradition inside the Imperial Core, inheritance anxiety historically-materially communicates internalized trauma as suggested within workers but expressed according to their surface-level appearance in the material world; i.e., who, regardless of their origins, will be judged and consumed based how they appear relative to a cultural understanding of the imaginary past as something to constantly look at, vis-à-vis Segewick's "Imagery of the Surface" [1980]. Nya, for example, is covered in tattoos that speak to Cartesian trauma and the Gothic as something to wear on her skin, reassembled there after having been created many times before. She's a walking fortress, utterly stacked but rife with surface tension. She performs the paradox that Charlotte Brontë's Anne Causeway could not, the latter woman entirely doomed inside the attic for no one to see [except in dream-like reveries]. The paradox is a doubled form of emancipation that occurs through confrontation; i.e., a savvy and brave wielding of the very things used to coop her up in the white man's home, but also his colonizer's heart and mind and those of an imperial readership then and now seeing her "of nature" and nature as psychosexual food [source: "Challenging the State's Manufactured Consent"].)

(artist: Tessa West, "Bikini Shop Showdown," 2006)

Some further food for thought (two pages), as there's simply too much ground to cover ("Huge tracks of land!"): Cartesian fetishization of nature-as-food subverts through our demonic, fertile/febrile, whore-like bodies during ludo-Gothic BDSM! So often workers of the Global South tempt through storminess and hefty vocality as uncorked forces of nature: the banana republic's crop talking back and talking back loudly—with their bodies and their surfaces/thresholds! "You won't last two seconds!" The same ideas and liminalities likewise apply idiosyncratically to anyone framed as "of nature" in the Global North; i.e., regardless of size, sex, gender, religion and/or skin color, etc: the half-real gentrification of colonial lands through ill-gotten means—by white bodies that are, themselves, pimped out during various horny legends sold as porn (and all the lopsided power fantasies that porn entails); e.g., banging the pornstar with a banging bod in the back of a bikini shop (above).

Whores communicate their revenge through sex as demonic. The canonical argument becomes, "Nature's a whore," which whores have to reclaim on the same vice-filled stages (and leaving behind their stamps however those fall. In true rockstar fashion, Tessa West died at twenty-seven from a drug overdose)! Exploitation and liberation occupy the same spaces and stages, the same demonic language of power abuse and weaponization for or against the state by combining objects d'art with scandal, and food with war, death, and rape ("Oh, yeah! Carve my 'pumpkin'! Wait, your 'knife' is too small!").

As Shelley shows, we don't live forever by cheating death (and nature); we live a full life that passes something positive along—a life worth remembering that, through the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, but also the auspices of destiny not being entirely dictated by state replicas, echo in eternity. Workers can make whatever demons they need to alter the balance (reversing virtue and vice much like terror and counterterror); i.e., striking deals honored through play and broken by spoilsports²⁹³ for or against the state (and leading to various tautologies; e.g., a deal's a deal, fair's fair, function determines function, etc).

²⁹³ Emergent play is a complicated subject, but one I simplify as follows: however ambiguous, play's function is ultimately determined by the dialectical-material context of mutual consent; i.e., per rules that are bent and broken in good faith or bad (I've had people who seem cool suddenly act weird in bad faith, but it's rare). We try new things and experiment all the time. The golden rule is, "no harm, no foul," cops being the ones who fight dirty in that respect! We play at war to have fun and wage class, culture and race war in poetic ways that, for the initiated, become second nature through praxial synthesis. Infinite form, singular function; i.e., form follows function, flow determining function amid a given demonic arbitration of Gothic aesthetics. In keeping with Prometheus and Shelley anisotropically venerating those tortures, so do we steal intelligence and awareness back!

In this respect, sex isn't purely for reproduction, but whose aesthetic per ludo-Gothic BDSM can be fun, funny, thrilling and asexual (socialized, artistic, mix-and-match)! Forgetting the porn industry's eternal chase of profit, behind every demon is a flesh-and-blood worker—a human being with rights, appetites, curiosities, and a willingness (under the right conditions) to play! There is always risk with sex; through the whore's paradox, we find agency dictating our "abuse" through unequal conditions we can change. Again, the smiles don't have to be fake, nor the orgasms (though they can be). Cuties can want each other for whatever their hearts darkly desire; e.g., penis, pussy and/or personality! We can also involve others in our fantasies because they like them, not because they pay our rent! Such a hunter's pot/philosopher-stone post-scarcity might sound impossible, but breaking through Capitalist Realism demands imagining the impossible through common modes of expression: demons and their endless Promethean possibilities!

Able to set the terms and boundaries of play, we camp, thus break away from sex/porn addiction and help ourselves and others relieve stress; i.e., in ways visually comparable but ludically removed from industry porn's "demonic" elements; re: a Sale of Indulgences without co-dependency or sin, just love, equal rights, fucking (to metal, of course), silly-serious games, mutual consent, and other Gothic-Communist virtues! Yummy-yummy trust! Consent is sexy, my dudes (if you want to get laid, made a girl feel safe; it's not automatic, but it won't hurt your odds)! The price tag isn't state mandates, but worker arrangements and consent (sex is whatever cost we decide, often for free among friends). Animalized, we embrace it, driving ourselves crazy (minus the hysterical stigma)! Sweet Numinous revenge, sucking your dry! Wee!

(artist: Ash Lynn Bach)

As such, sex remains something to barter that builds our dreams of a better world while dismantling capital. For it and the state, "whore" is just another word for "intimacy" they demonize for profit. AFAB or not—unchaining the whore, working/call girl and Hell along with them—we Gothic Communists become free to express ourselves, speak new language out of old parts to establish new boundaries, thus arrangements of power to play out (not under companies and Faustian contracts, but ones we write ourselves)! We're not hoes to pimp and police, but demons without a pimp building pandemonium (sometimes in cop uniforms, minus the cop function)! We fucking love that kind of freedom: to make whatever demons we want, burning rapturously while watching this go in and out of that (short of harming workers, animals or nature; states aren't people and billionaires shouldn't exist, etc); re: to make demons is to make love turned on its head, laughing at canonical norms.

As we'll see next, this includes summoning them in more magical varieties!

Afterword: A Further Note on Angry Gods (and Playing with Them, feat. Cuwu)

"Ray, when someone asks you if you're a god, you say YES!"

—Winston to Ray, Ghostbusters (1984)

A quick note about gods, seeing as playing with them (dark gods, which demons are) is what Shelley focused on, and where we'll be going into the imaginary past; i.e., as it existed back then, and which is summoned in more magical ways seemingly divorced from making monsters the Cartesian way (with Shelley's "Galvanism" being closer to magic than science—leaving the spark of creation to our imagination). Amazonomachia, kayfabe, golems and kaiju—monsters are both gods and made by gods, and who doesn't like gods? Older ones are pagan/demonic, steeped in agnostic folklore/the supernatural, and generally equal parts aspiring and dangerous/fearsome. "All deities reside within [our] breast," said Blake; through calculated risk during ludo-Gothic BDSM, they become our best friends—mighty beings to conjure up and thrill us, then dismiss as needed.

In turn, the natural and material worlds abide by the same basic forces over time; i.e., just as animals have evolved over millions of years thanks to evolutionary pressure, society's current system of differences under capital work through natural-to-unnatural linguo-material components whose own stressors evolved to help us survive: gods as social highs and lows (values and taboos), but also creative legacies/the power of creation. This survival includes of ourselves, as Shelley points out; i.e., "man is his own worst enemy" and men of reason have now put our survival (and that of the planet) in jeopardy! Medusa doesn't discriminate, but we can be better stewards/mothers of the world and keepers of the fire of the gods than Victor was. We can write and program better lessons through godly data as a form of pain ("to sense injury" as the T-800 describes it)—with pleasure and pain being as indiscrete to each other as organic and inorganic are; i.e., in a posthuman world (therefore the Capitalocene) where we still have to relate back and forth. We must, or we will not survive. That's what camping the canon is.

All demons, pandemonium. The goal of Gothic Communism, then, is to humanize the harvest through holistic expression during the chaos of evolution (and creation) on all fronts; i.e., dialectical-material scrutiny (and effect) during oppositional praxis, thereby demonstrating the state as inhumane versus nature as monstrous-feminine; re: recultivating the Wisdom of the Ancients to deny it to the elite, much like Shelley did. In effect, we're reclaiming Medusa through ambiguity and paradox marrying different things to speak to state abuse; e.g., pleasure and pain (more on this in "Exploring the Derelict Past"); i.e., the "omelet problem," or "sometimes to create, you must destroy." You can't have life without death, can't heal from rape without putting "rape" in quotes: "A king has his reign and then he dies" (white saviors and black tokenism also sight-seeing demons made by the state, but also the world older states destroyed and left behind, post-seed, below).

In learning from Scott and Shelley as my spiritual ancestors (Alien is my favorite movie, Frankenstein my favorite book), bear in mind how Shelley played at immortality/dark creation (while interrogating technology and childrearing/the posthuman) through a female gaze occupying male bodies, versus Scott's male one occupying female bodies (and biomechanical integration). Compared to them, ours is genderqueer and overtly Communist; i.e., performing hubris to go where the gods and their statuesque, Vitruvian, warlike perfection (from an imaginary Greco-Roman standpoint, which Milton camped—followed by the Shelleys, and later Scott, above) can, but humans and their flaws only experience "torture," which is to say pain: the queer search for non-normative love, haunted by its own mutating (and mutilative) copies, onstage and off.

Paradox of rape aside, it's always, to some degree, experimental and apocalyptic—confusing the brain (and a mixture of the senses) to unlearn harmful knowledge; i.e., by exposing our chains and jolting us with that sweet, sweet Promethean "fire" (re: the modern idea [and abuse] of electricity didn't quite exist yet, called "Galvanism" by Shelley as her inspiration): the jouissance (orgasm) of facing tough realities and—like a different iteration of the Creature—coming out stronger for it by making friends through newly-minted boundaries breaking Capitalist Realism down! Capital is built on Cartesian binaries of ownership and division, hence will never end sickness, war and disease (effectively killing the planet and leaving Ozymandian Derelicts behind, for others to stumble on). So we must end it ourselves through what we pass on during the coding war! "We aren't computers, Bastian! We're physical!"

Exposure hurts, including to the idea that capital has made us machines for it to control. Melting us down to our DNA (the oldest code) as we grow into adulthood (and then wither and die), we forget backwards. But it also fertilizes new growth, regenerating what has died into something radically new as a matter of function; re, the Numinous as something to quest for (from Varma's The Gothic Flame):

The rise of the Gothic novel may be connected with depravity, and a decline of religion. [...] In particular, these novels indicate a new, tentative apprehension of the Divine. Monastic life was no longer believed in, but at least it recalled the Ages of Faith and the alluring mystery of their discipline. The ghosts and demons, the grotesque manifestations of the supernatural, aroused the emotions by which man had first discovered his soul and realized the presence of a Being greater far than he, one who created and destroyed at will. Man's first stirring of religious instinct was his acute horror of this powerful Deity—and it was to such primitive emotion that he reverted, emancipated from reason, but once again ignorant of God, his spiritual world in chaos.

Primarily the Gothic novels arose out of a quest for the numinous [emphasis, me]. They are characterized by an awestruck apprehension of Divine immanence penetrating diurnal reality. This sense of the numinous is an almost archetypal impulse inherited from primitive magic.

Whatever theatrical stance or political persuasion a player might adopt, our time as mortals is fleeting beyond ourselves. Reunions with life and death produce and instill chaos as an immortality that, through Shelley and Milton, long survived them; i.e., in a shared Satanic legacy we want to make increasingly gay and an-Com during ludo-Gothic BDSM healing nature-as-monstrous-feminine normally antagonized by state pimps. Scott verges into canonical pimp "milking Satan," as did Milton. Shelley far outpaced either by vocally critiquing men of reason like Victor for harming so many beyond themselves. Nothing critiques capital more nakedly and productively in Gothic than Frankenstein (a tradition that later sci-fi completely forgot, Jameson). This pedagogy happens through liminal expression, mixing pain with pleasure during calculated risk; i.e., exquisite "torture" being—among other things—the playing with big things that could crush us but don't: they're not cops, but avengers bringing power (and the awesome anger of the gods) back to the people!

Mercedes the Muse and [Persephone van der

To create dark gods is to fetishize the alien for or against workers/nature. This, by extension, teeters between internal imagination and external fabrication (e.g., Mercedes, myself, and Toxie, above). Our subsequent "torture" is pain and pleasure as a kind of dark psychosexual data; re: writ in decay and laced with phantom pain (and genuine harm), which demons engage with through the paradox of play and medieval poetics: mixing death, food, sex and other bodily functions (concepts from the Poetry Module; more on them during "Giger's Xenomorph").

That's how children learn, but also adults—discussing what is often disguised to internalize and externalize it (the Dutch word "hope" meaning "to make a pile"). So do we camp Marx by conjuring up demons to liberate sex work with; i.e., as Shelley once did, putting the pieces back together (as must be done, per cycle) and camping the canon in ways Scott only partially managed to, himself: with god-like action figures (characterized by height personifying hubris)—first finding them "abandoned" in the ruins and playing with their decaying power for different ends. Frankenstein's isn't isolation from fire, but both how humans and technology are bound up in their separate affairs, and that technology isn't "bad" on its own; what you do with it—meaning what you choose to create and how you treat your creations afterwards—is what matters (the danger being when you lose the ability to tell friend from foe, only seeing in red/us-versus-them). This isn't a "final destination," at all, but a link in a never-ending chain, mise-en-abyme.

Verisimilitude very clearly isn't the point, here, (as "actual science," the giant motif doesn't translate very well, but as a metaphor for demonic creation, is golden). Nor is dick-measuring (though Shelley is politically superior to Scott, she's also a bit more mysterious to most people outside movies; i.e., the girl who wrote Frankenstein). Instead, its heavy-handed theatrics ape Victor as a false "corpse" of himself that talks back, mid-psychomachy (no one ever said Frankenstein was subtle, but you'd be surprised just how much of its Hamlet-grade, weird British tensions [dialogs of strength married to weird canonical science nerds] goes over most peoples' heads; blame James Whale for that one, or Mel Brooks after him). So take what is useful and apply it to yourselves and yours—to reshape, recode, and pass along inside/upon your own dark children (a Trojan virus)!

For example—and case in point—I, as a trans woman, always felt that I had one foot in each world, but could never give birth (with a uterus). Instead, I learned to feel more like a woman through the poetic act of creation; i.e., one inspired by Scott and Shelley both filling my figurative cumdump²⁹⁴ (the medieval having a bit more fun with the miracle of creation, both human biology and poetry of a technological sort)! What they left behind has inspired my own giant children, teaching me what it means to be a parent (closer to life and death as normally alienated from workers, but also fetishized for them to purchase and consume). A "power couple," indeed! Light me up, baby!

And while "strange women distributing swords" is seemingly no basis for a system of government, there remains practical value in medieval poetics informing Gothic Communism; i.e., to synthesize catharsis away from state models, generally with a focus on nude monster bodies and publicly nude (and vulgar) displays of power! The best sex has a bit of excitement and pain to it; the paradox of rape is it is not rape, any more than Frankenstein's monster is actually a big walking dead guy/brain-in-a-jar (to see one's creation and mortality laid bare—be it brain or womb—for iconoclastic purposes; i.e., by women [and other minorities] reclaiming normally sacred things from the state [misogynistic canon and its weird "hate

Instead, it's the potential to literally make friends for all ages, genders, and inclinations; it becomes something to tell our children (always curious about monsters, below)—to give to them not as a present bought per season, but a gift made ourselves that keeps on giving. As Shelley shows us, children can be taught whatever they're given; let's give them something better than what society gave Victor (whose own problematic childhood automatically made him see the Creature not as "friend" but "foe"). That's what making monsters (demons or otherwise) is all about, from a Gothic-Communist perspective! We gain the ability to end curses, right past wrongs, heal from rape and de-automate genocide—in a word, to stop capital in its tracks while referring to the imaginary past pushing us in a post-scarcity direction: breeding and grooming with a sex-positive outcome!

In Frankenstein, Victor hogs the stage but the Creature is the star of the show. It's also not stupid, but actually quite the opposite, acquires knowledge at a frightening rate. So are we—are all, to some degree, innocent and jaded, artificial and alienized, under capital's bright demanding lights telling us "the show must go on"; but such performances allow for the paradox of reclamation (through iconoclastic art) during such fabrication—to reclaim for ourselves the incredible ability to first, recognize when others see us as inhuman and scary (through no fault of their own, born into the same world under Capitalism lionizing such fakeries, above); then communicate the holocaust of our anguish in ways that convince them we are human, thus deserve protection and love. It's a basic human right, not something you buy under capital (or which capital assigns to a select special group; e.g., Jewish people); but it uses the same costumes and masks, comedy and drama, and whose potential identities beyond the medieval (re: Foucault) the Gothic turns inside-out.

Unlike many Gothic novels, Frankenstein works well as fantasy and futurism, its signature and much-intimated retro-future letting readers think about a two-century-old horror novel as one might a computer program: Shelley is Cassandra predicting Capital's demise while demonstrating the thin line between child and adult, technology and sex, protection and procreation, pleasure and pain, problem and purpose, birth and bastard, pro-life and pro-choice, prostitute and pimp, sex and symbol, porn and art, torture and talent, consent and non-consent, canon and camp, transparent and opaque, real and fake (as Arnold and company also demonstrate, below):

To that, counterterror is a voice, thus a relationship had between things both forced apart (alienation) and together (fetishization), comprising a pedagogy of the oppressed living under the shadow of police violence sexualizing everything in sight; i.e., whose alienation—of zombie-demon labor talking back to us—is both older victims of capital, but also present ones speaking through our fears and fantasies: a worker saying to those who find its talking remains, "I'd rather kill my boss and fuck what society treats as 'monster' (for its scars, skin color and/or composite nature) than be with an entitled asshole contributing to state shift!" Size difference, age play and power imbalance also come into effect—all to collectively shock not for its own sake, mid-pastiche, but to jolt us awake about difference manufactured (and how people, once badly programmed, go on to exterminate others for scraps); re: by remediating praxis, we teach children—who are vulnerable to bad lessons (thus susceptible to cloning those lessons)—to be better and make better!

Scott was already in his forties when making Alien and it shows; i.e., he kind of starts with Radcliffean demon BDSM and '70s Rocky Horror and gradually dials back what little camp Alien started with. Shelley was nineteen when she wrote Frankenstein, and still had that youthful ex-vitro "zinc spark" (re: the glass womb dilemma—or what Ashley Gavin succinctly describes as "inside baby/outside baby"; "Ashley Gavin: Live in Chicago," 2024) that commented on the larger world through demonic poetics. The greatest power in Frankenstein, then, comes from its composite design: a faith in Gothic intuition wedded to early science but still having magic to spare—to parse through play while recognizing creation through technology as speaking to lived trauma living inside the body and material trauma existing outside the body as both contributing to generational trauma; i.e., as something to increase through canon or decrease through camp, on the Aegis. Those who close their eyes to it become hopeless cynics who, as Oscar Wilde puts it, "know the cost of everything but the value of nothing." They become predators who prey on their students (re: Jadis).

Coded as such, they also become gargoyles for the church of capital; i.e., who see invaders thus enemies everywhere, and who make machines of war to conquer the Earth and the stars, but ultimately themselves inside the Capitalocene (awfully telling that Victor makes a giant war machine [re: Walpole's armor] to lionize himself, then cries wolf when labor possesses the avatar of capital to thump him and chase him to the ends of the world and beyond; i.e., Ozymandias in the desert of older disasters)! Menticide is not human nature as "congenital," but comorbid and criminogenic while able to cause disorders "in the blood" and brain, where data is stored and exchanged in "perfect" duality:

From what I've seen of perfection
Where we could do as we please
In secrecy this infection
Was spreading like a disease (Judas Priest's "Metal Gods," 1980).

Leave it to Judas Priest to betray their punk roots and romanticize rebellion as Nazi-Communism; i.e., "both sidesing" what is—in reality—night and day, then regressively dogmatize "past" before selling it back to their fan base under Thatcher's Britain (the "KISS problem" dumbing down Frankenstein for profit—a bit ironic as KISS was Jewish and sold out; then again, so was Jerry Springer²⁹⁶). Capitalism is the disease, not labor, but they occupy the same space, language and stages!

So do liberation and exploitation dysfunctionally unfold. Those who profit off/unironically endorse Red Scare are Nazis, import/exporting the usual neoliberal heavy metal for queen and country (wedded to capital, in Britain's case, but also America's own god-kings; i.e., calling themselves "commanders-in-chief," while shifting the aristocracy towards the bourgeoisie and back again, when the state starts to die): "a new order of intelligence that saw everyone as a threat, not just those on the other side!" Capital is incompatible with life; geological or technological, state shift is state shift, which capital will pimp out to punish nature as monstrous-feminine for profit. A king has his reign; then, nature wins.

Again, though, metal isn't automatically a weapon for capital and its extermination wars, but it is generally ambiguous through duality, mid-liminal expression. All praxis is liminal because it must translate to consumable forms. That's why Frankenstein works as well as it does, and why capital tries so hard to commodify the aesthetic.

As proto-fascist satire, Frankenstein is intentionally ambiguous because it needs the reader to choose, and to acknowledge the terrible power of propaganda; i.e., the Promethean Quest is ultimately a quest for the Numinous, and a quest for the palliative Numinous (as I frame it) is a quest for empathy by choosing mercy and love in the face of the technological singularity²⁹⁷ (which Victor does not do).

²⁹⁶ An important distinction to make is that Simmons, Stanley and Springers' parents were in the Holocaust, not them; i.e., they used their privilege as descendants of Holocaust survivors to make money. While my familiarity with KISS is limited to their music mostly sucking, I do know that Simmons and Stanley are worth hundreds of millions of dollars—in effect, chasing and selling 1970s camp to kids for profit, first and foremost. While that's fine to an extent, their drive in doing so has made them far too much money to feel even remotely ethical; i.e., while there's no ethical consumption under Capitalism, their particular approach to consumption is dogmatic and predatory.

No one makes hundreds of millions of dollars without mass-exploiting others; KISS—and by extension Priest through their own "fake rebellion" racket—did it through a Gothic aesthetic. Springer did not; i.e., hiding behind a nice-guy persona while saying "I'm against what you say but I'll defend to the death your right to say it." You know, the whole "debating Nazis" thing. He died in 2023 a multimillionaire, having chased the ratings with Opera to slum for corporations. Good riddance.

²⁹⁷ Basically invented by Shelley's book (more or less). We didn't really have time to explore that idea, here. If you're curious, though, I strongly recommend David Roden's Posthuman Life (2015), which explores cyborgs, transhumanism and other concepts related to/inspired by Shelley's magnum opus!

To confront and reify the problem—meaning in something we can recognize in ourselves, then love in others through our creations teaching lessons—is to break Capitalism at its core. But we must learn to self-reflect in ways that extend the charity to those normally wronged by capital, capital framing all of this (as Victor does) through doomsday arguments that Shelley—a nineteen-year-old girl without computers or formal education—took and hit square on the nose (critiquing what so many still refuse to do, nowadays; i.e., those people treating scientists like celebrities and, oddly enough, celebrities like scientists, and worshipping both like gods who are beyond reproach. So often, straight male scientists and creatives eclipse their female counterparts; e.g., Giger and Scott eclipsing Shelley while living in her shadow, below)! Frankenstein's traction was immediate, its legacy infinite—showing readers that, while we're not strictly defined by the past and its plastic trauma, nor are we entirely removed from it: "We live in Gothic times."

In short, we must love other victims of capital as we would ourselves, during universal liberation. I'd say "no gods or masters," then, but we are all gods, under Communism. And despite neoliberal Capitalism pimping dark creation for its own base ends, no one monopolizes monsters or the awesomely dark power to create, thus (a)rouse the rabble by "riding" the lightning. Lightning doesn't have to strike the same place twice (though it can, next page); it just has to expect the wonderous spontaneity of attraction, mid-Romance. That can happen anywhere: "Not the third switch!" / "Throw it! Give MY CREATION LIFE!" Frankenstein was a one-man "circular breeding" fantasy written by a woman soupily camping the idea of sex to—in her own juvenile inventor's lightbulb moment—make something that kills Francis Bacon's number-one fan and fucks the body-builder afterwards. The best of both worlds, her winning formula fetishizes rebellion for workers! Eureka!

That's Shelley and her whore's revenge—the exhibitionist/voyeur confessions of a madwoman/wicked Galatean mad scientist accepting her status as manmade, then nakedly camping the canon (the Promethean myth): through uncontrolled opposition and neo-medieval (operatic) rape fantasies "storming" her "castle" and putting her maidenhead—gone too soon, but "for science!"—to the two-handed sword: a live wire that's too hot to handle/off the charts, or a sizzling mood (and bedroom eyes) that hits just right? You be the judge!

We often invent friends in our hour of need. Not even twenty when raw-dogging it/squeezing a dark god's massive dick into her tight pale pussy²⁹⁹, Shelley made something fluorescent that could never be turned off, only fluctuate in constant circulation; i.e., something that, unto itself, emblemized the desire to fuck with godly power—to create a god and be a god by creating such a being that can either create, in turn, or inspire others to create in ways that overthrow the nuclear model: while looking for a suitable mate/companion (swept up in sex and natural reproduction, but also unnatural reproduction through art-as-porn, canned and shaken, inside the same witch's-cauldron echo chamber where canon and camp—the nuclear and found family—do battle).

An awesome machine, the Creature lives on, but isn't just a sentinel (cops; e.g., Mega Man, the Stepford Wives); with the right instruction, it can become a steward for nature (re: T2, but Communist). "Fuck mommy just like this, ok? Now gimme that baby batter!" The idea is informed consent and birth control (of people and art) being in the hands of workers, not capital and the state (all of my partners have either not had uteruses, have fucked with condoms, or—in my case fucking them—have had a vasectomy to avoid unwanted pregnancies): to get up close and personal with/to our bodies; i.e., as alien and fetish, creating with and of them regarding the mysteries of creation on canvas of all kinds.

Rape is endemic to capital; anything that challenges profit is a threat to capital and its ordering of the world, which it rapes without end. But silence is death, which makes ludo-Gothic BDSM our survival; i.e., playing with power as something to quest for in paradoxically healthy forms that have the ability to change or freeze the world in its tracks. It's both different and not different from those videogames everyone plays these days... Life is a game, and sooner or later your refusal to play it outside the elite's rules becomes a choice!

So, love it or hate it, camp canon however you can—i.e., by getting naked, and down and dirty with one's glorious, mortal, animal side (the paradox being to rough something up versus having it be sterile to better make one's point; e.g., Alien versus 2001, but also Cuwu's pussy, before/after, below). Sex is the most policed device in the world. It is simultaneously divine and absurd, hot and goofy ("so put that in this and wiggle around until cummies happen..."), and desperately needing better education under capital; i.e., in ways that respect its power but also don't take it too seriously if they can help it; e.g., "Oh, no! My ass is just too fat for these yoga pants! Please don't take advantage!" (we'll introduce de facto education, cultural appreciation and descriptive sexuality in "Call of the Wild" and unpack them in Volume Three).

This certainly isn't easy. The more we try to unite all groups, the more alone canon makes us feel (segregate the radicals); some people historically sell out. But once you find others who have similar chemistry/understand alienation and desire liberation for all, there's nothing like it in the world! I was radicalized by so many tight pussies clamping down on my dick:

Shelley was a pirate, one who showed that girls fuck, fart, spit and swear like anyone! Making friendship from the ensuing messes, there's a fair bit not just of her in the book, but of Cuwu despite going our separate ways! Love is blind, friendship always somewhat imaginary but forever as something to build in memory of the good times come and game, but also yet-to-come. Sex is work, and sex work is work; so is revolution as a lineage of monster mothers!

³⁰⁰ The above creampie being one administered by me while Cuwu wasn't on birth control, but where I had already received my procedure and discussed the risks with them (and each of us detailing our sexual histories). Safe sex is good sex, trust me.

To become a mother is to change, and this contains within it different fears about dying: less as a literal event, and more becoming something dark and different while alive that lives on long after one is dead. No one remembers Mary Wollstonecraft (senior or junior); Mary Shelley is a whole 'nother beast. But this, unto itself, speaks to the vitality of relationships and good parentage (if only to use the raw parts for spares)—both with our live-in cocks or pussies, but also whatever technologies they bring to the table. The process is suitably anathema and gospel.

To this, Percy creampieped the virgin pussy of one Mary Wollstonecraft, but also fed her pregnant horny brain—no doubt awash with hormones from actual pregnancies and postpartum events—with "tacos"; i.e., those angel-and-devil, pickles-and-ice-cream cravings being Paradise Lost, Galvanism, and the Golem of Prague, among others. In turn, Wollstonecraft became Shelley as, at least in part, a dark imitation of the man she admired, the pupil outshining the master and even herself.

Fast-forward to Scott making Alien—and then Covenant nearly two centuries after Frankenstein—and me, exposed to Prometheus in 2012, discovering Shelley twenty years after watching Alien and playing Super Metroid. Primed for it since I was small (my mother loving The Doors, but also the British Romantics, reading me "Kubla Khan" to tire me out and get me to sleep), I suddenly got the same Numinous cravings; re: watching Covenant with my family on my birthday (source: "Alien Covenant, a Review," 2017) before going overseas to have my own Percy-and-Mary, Jim-and-Pamela-style relationship; i.e., followed by many more afterwards while thinking about Covenant, again (source: "A Second Look") and again (re: "Choosing the Slain")—until I looked past Scott, and back towards Shelley and her own nature-vs-nature natural philosophy haunting the Great Man haunting me (and haunted by his own mother and Shelley and so on and so on).

In turn—and through my own poetic indiscretions and infidelities expressing the complicated, ongoing relationship between the past and present—the organic and inorganic fused, passing information continuously along while mutating it; i.e., the corruption being the data, from smaller cryptonymic sequences cached inside a bigger cryptomimetic series: Milton wrote Paradise Lost, which Shelley consumed when producing her own monster while already living with one (Ron Shusett, by comparison, graciously fed Dan O'Bannon hotdogs while the latter suffered IBS and wrote his Alien screenplay); i.e., tracing along so many generations of a larger chain before finding and infecting me with the same proverbial fire. Cooking on the same giant skillet, my trans egg cracked, and Nicholas became Persephone adopting/adapting Mary Shelley's imperfect, dualistic likeness; i.e., as a recursive, warring matter of revolution told through evolution hidden in code.

Shelley beat Darwin to that punch, too, and is truly a woman to be grateful for/afraid of. She gave birth to Communism versus fascism in its proto forms; generations later, things have come full circle as I wrote Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism—a book whose own foreword opens with me comparing myself to Shelley while acknowledging the many different sources that went into its messy regeneration, but also its continuity and sequel rebirths: those who adapt survive, so take what is useful and leave the rest.

Holistic study serves as the core transfer method, and my perfecting of Shelley's secret formula—humility and hubris ("Mother is the name for 'God' on the lips and hearts of all children") driving a mad scientist to make monsters who made more mad scientists and monsters, in duality—was simply me standing on her Samus-sized shoulders: armed for bear and ready to free (deprivatize) the Amazon, the Gorgon, the fire of the gods and have the whore's revenge; i.e., by stopping Capitalism (and its Realism) for good.

Just as Victor is Achilles, Byron, and Satan, then, Mary Shelley is Legion; i.e., all of those and none of them, plus Medusa and Hippolyta, but also evocations of Percy and her mother while not being them, too. So do I—or rather, my books as extensions of their own immediate mother and lineage of mothers—paradoxically contain and proliferate the same haunted legacy. It's an orgy of ghosts! Stare and tremble but also unite; become one with the Aegis—staring intensifies! Eat your heart out, Eve Segewick.

The Gothic is writ in disintegration, made from fragments to rebuilt what was lost/could be; all roads lead to Medusa and her Communist Numinous ("diamonds are a girl's best friend," something-something "Norman Bates was Hitchcock playing 'bury the gay'"). Befitting a Gothic homecoming for the ages, I got closer to Shelley as time went on, not further away! While familiarity breeds contempt, imitation remains the sincerest form of flattery. I built on Shelley and made her Promethean Quest my own; i.e., we are each of us unique and identical twins (with twins never being fully identical; e.g., me and my straight twin): part of the same cryptonymy process, part of the same vengeful, rock 'n roll womb's poetic collocation. Rebellion, as Shelley keeps showing us—but also Marx through my work camping his ghost (re: "Making Marx Gay")—is rock 'n roll; but said opposition constantly needs a woman's gayer sluttier touch, lest the Straights control it for profit. It likewise, needs to be short enough to identify at a glance and imitate, but girthy enough to satisfy through substance. Little pigs, we glut ourselves, hungry like the wolf. Forget "smash or pass," where's our self-control? It's our Song of Infinity making the past wise again! "Let's get weird!" again! Anything can happen on Halloween again! "More, more!" (said Cuwu, as I fucked them for the umpteenth time in one night, across a week, during an entire month).

(artist: Sexy Flower Water)

In short, you can't just "one and done it," and camping sex is to reverse the alienation of sex already abjected; Medusa's placental, parthenogenic womb bears forbidden fruit, but its orchard thereof requires constant, regular care: endless "watering" (with cum, but also blood, sweat, tears, tender love and care), lest the bourgeoisie dry it out more than Lovecraft's urethra at the prospect of sex (the sexless old boys club, pimping nature into pieces of jerky it can eat raw for bragging rights). Stick that in your pipe and smoke it, S.T. Joshi! I am woman, hear me rawr!

There comes our parade of patchwork slogans, again; e.g., "What a story, Marx!" or "Women don't like sex." The former is funny and the latter is a myth! But also, sex is danger! That's what makes it fun, thus worth it! Don't listen to others who say, "Don't do it!" or "No pussy's worth it!" (within reason, and use your brains). Like, how would they know? Cuwu and I loved a lifetime's worth, and I have the receipts to prove it (some of them stitched together like a patchwork collage of composites, below). And though that didn't last, they were still my Percy who gave me the darkness I needed to birth rebellion; i.e., in ways I'm not sure either of us could have, at the time ("It was all worth it" being the proud parent's steady oath).

Before we proceed, then, I'd like to showcase that cryptonymy a bit—to take a look under the hood of my purring brain to see what routinely makes Gothic Communism tick (and what these demons have in common). "I choose you, Cuwu!"

(exhibit 45b2a: Artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard, from a variety of scenes we crafted and shot together—and assembled here by me post hoc as "monster pastiche"; i.e., of me loving a monster/mad scientist and vice versa. Blue balls? More like "Blue Monday" [1983], amirite?)

If Zeuhl taught me anything, I definitely have "a type": the punk. The trick was finding one that didn't harm me and was stable; Zeuhl was a stable postpunk who harmed³⁰¹ me, and Cuwu was an unstable punk who harmed themselves to the point that it traumatized me, too. Eventually I found better company in terms of stability and comfort, but I'd be lying if I said I didn't miss the fun that Cuwu and I had. They'd tease me until I begged, or until they begged me, "Just put it in me, already!" But this invoked all manner of "asking for it," on all manner of surfaces:

Make no mistake, Cuwu was weird as hell and I—also being weird as hell—couldn't get enough of them; they were constantly putting on a show to offer me the truth of things—right in front of me, like it always was. Twenty-four and gender fluid, Cuwu was mature and immature, always in motion and difficult to capture—a former dancer who could speak volumes in single frames, yet wanting to be seen and shown across all surfaces [above and below]: from moment to moment, controlling a situation to gain power and feel safe. To it, you can absolutely learn from broken clocks, and Cuwu wasn't even broken—just damaged. Super smart, well-read and passionate, but also on drugs a lot of the time, they were needy and dominating from a subby position that practiced its wares on me. But also, they were and are my Victor and Frankenstein or vice versa, no shortage of awesome reversals taking place betwixt our hungry nethers:

So here we are, no longer physically together but someone whose memory of former boding I keep alive in my work; i.e., our cryptonymy healing from rape, the two of us always experimenting and shooting things from different angles [sometimes in focus, sometimes not; sometimes silly and sometimes serious; sometimes obscured, sometimes in full view]. We played together—they teasing me, our spooning always leading to insolent, deliciously disrespectful forking [as I fuck them while they use their phone³⁰². Seriously, we made enough porn to last a lifetime]:

The West is fascinated with sex and love, and with good endings and bad [re:

³⁰² Bottom collage, top-left. I can't remember what they were even looking at, but I think it was clothes? Zeuhl did the same, once, but that was while they were playing Pokémon Go (2016). They also turned my life upside down, but constantly used sex to keep me in check/demand loyalty. Eventually they demanded my loyalty even after they abandoned me for their husband. Fuckers.

Radcliffe and Lewis]. But canon conditions them to obsess about a particular kind of love attached to a binarized, us-versus-them, linguo-material structure to keep that structure in place through ethnocentric monomyth police violence. Thus, do they miss the point of building something better for ourselves, as Satan and Shelley did, but also Cuwu and I; i.e., as something that lasted beyond the immediate passion: echoes and rem[a]inders of it, the passion taking hold like a ghost and ravishing us anew. "Haunt me, Cathy!"

Yes, Cuwu abused me—and yes, apart from that abuse they also ran off with a dog breeder with the same first name as me and a similar-size penis—but all the same, we kept the agreement we made, afterwards, and I still use it to construct my vision of a better world; i.e., one informed by their priceless contributions. To it, I love you, my little stoner dragon—my modern Prometheus/rectus dominus ["ass master"] torturing me with sweet bliss from beyond our time together. Cuwu was a little animal—loved animals and treated me like one they couldn't always care for even though they wanted to. As always, I hope you're safe, wherever you are.

Good or bad, people have whatever power you give them, and vice versa; re: "no one does it better, so that's why I [gave] you my heart to break!" When you look on us, you're looking at an older agreement—one that was both built on trust, haunted by abuse, stunted by self-destruction, and replanted to grow again. So do we come together [so to speak] while putting-pulling parts repeatedly together and apart; i.e., camping sex in all the usual ways. Piece-by-piece, we rip and tear until it is done! Healing hurts and feels good; it itches and throbs and twinges and pulses. Squish-squish, macaroni-stirring sound!

Maybe I'm repeating myself? No shit; however serious, revolution is repetition and this is fun to me. I can do it all night, babes [when Cuwu's pussy got too sore, we switched to anal sex]. Furthermore, this goes beyond our individual pictures and collages to include others in a larger artistic, ouroborotic movement brought back from the dead; e.g., Harmony Corrupted [next page] making a collage based on her shoots commissioned by me, and each of those inspired by my time with Cuwu and b) with our clothes on [to tease you] as much as not:

Weird attracts weird; I come from a family as mad as hatters, as did Cuwu and so many others. Both mad, and making madness with ourselves and others based on older forms that push towards universal liberation, we show how nostalgia is the enemy of reason; i.e., the latter as a genocidal historical-material force; re: as Harmony and I do, and all the cuties I've played with have done, over the years and during the course of this project. Madness is—like technology and our fire of the gods—not simply one thing or another but many in duality.

And thanks to Shelley and similar poets, that duality now more than ever has power and value for us as something we take back on the Aegis; i.e., insofar as we use it to help ourselves by taking it back from those who don't help us—to smash their unironic breeding and racial-superiority [eugenics] models, and doing so on purpose: as a matter of preservation, by those who know.

Cuwu, for example, deliberately played with me—a multimedia expert—to trap them in amber and show them off, as simulacra; i.e., I was already drawing them and did so multiple times before we eventually made all this porn [so did Harmony and many others—I work with people who are kind to me and who I want to be remembered as part of something bigger than ourselves]. That's what happens when you cross a giant voyeur with an equally massive exhibitionist. In our case, though, the demonic courtship felt exhilarating but untenable—these different competing elements going faster and faster until eventually they burned themselves out:

Cuwu frankly loved being seen and viewed as something to love; it gave them power. Had they paused every so often to let me breathe/meet my needs, I'd still be giving it to them. From a certain point of view, I very much still am. Fuck an artist; get immortality as they can offer it. Any artist would kill to have had a muse like Cuwu [we'll explore the ace/paradoxical attraction of artists and models more, in Volume Three]:

Communism isn't a quota or zero-sum game, then. A combination of congenital and comorbid factors—ranging from genetics to training to material conditions—it starts with our desire trumping our caution when seeking to prevent systemic harm and generational trauma, mid-synthesis: "To let 'I dare!' wait upon 'I would?'" So while necessity is the mother of invention, invention is reinvention and generally starts in the relationships we build for those reasons and not simply for efficient project; e.g., Karl Jobst's [former pick-up artistry transferring to his speedrunning career and YouTube channel; re: "Those Who Walk Away from Speedrunning," 2025]. "No one is an island." We face capital as one or we die alone. For realsy. So keep building for each other and fucking with those things the status quo builds for itself! The moment you stop is when capital wins. We'll be the envy of the gods above! Fortune favors the bold and the brave really do live forever! Cuwu and Harmony are two of the bravest people I've yet [and like Shelley's famous psychomachy, have bravery and caution inside them—"two wolves live in us," 'n all that].)

From Radcliffe onwards, cryptonymy's a woman's weapon against rape while refusing to either triangulate/tokenize (re: me, vis-à-vis Creed's monstrous-feminine) or be a quiet victim; Shelley's a straight freak whose "clone [doesn't] sleep alone" (Pat Benatar's "My Clone Sleeps Alone" riffing on Ira Levin while anticipating Reagan's presidency, 1979). But also, she's my Lady of the Lake—a rustic-but-not-entirely-unschooled bimbo, dark-mommy witch lobbing a scimitar (rogue technology) at me, but also my delicious devil dragging me, Persephone, back to Hell!

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends!" but remember to come up for air! Marathons are fun 'n all (Cuwu and I once fucked for three hours), but pace yourselves! Aftercare, always; and hurt, not harm! You have the compass that never points North. Now go and have fun; take your own monsters to bring Hell to Earth! Ravish her bussy (the alien cock too big to just fit in one hole, below)!

A whore without a pimp is a sex worker controlling their own bodies, labor and art/exchanges, thus their own ability to perform power selectively and subversively during public nudism; e.g., and have/fake orgasms (with capital treating women—and beings treated like women; re: emergent beings to chattelize—as "machines" to humiliate; i.e., to put coins [of cruelty or kindness] inside until sex comes out). Forget Peter Weyland, saying "we're the gods now" while imploring to everyone, "If you'll indulge me, I'd like to change the world!" Fuck that noise and fuck the bourgeoisie! Use the fire of the gods to set yourselves

(and everything of nature) free! That includes—as Shelley show us—sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, fucking to metal to become the metal! Sweet science, sweeter sodomy!

Speaking of wishes and visions of a better world told in hellish language, let's proceed onto "Summoning Demons"!

Forbidden Sight, part three: Summoning Demons (re: Faust and Radcliffe)

"We do not treat with Sauron, forsaken and accursed!" / "It takes more to make a king than a broken elvish blade!"

—Gandalf and the Mouth of Sauron, The Return of the King (2003)

As demonstrated and popularized by Milton, binaries aren't always a problem; i.e., if they're subversive and develop Communism through camp; re: camping the usual good-versus-evil dogma, and their manmade heroes and cartographic refrains. From Amazons to knights of an earthly to hellish to Promethean origin, demons and their dark sex, drugs and rock 'n roll are legion, but dualistic; i.e., you can reclaim any demon made for war and capital (re: the Creature, the T-800 and others). But what about those summoned, and what of their fires of unknown origin to trade and (mis)treat with in inflammatory ways—especially the torturous and queer mutilative elements involved (no vampires, this time)? Let's take a look!

"Summoning Demons" divides in two basic parts, both of which feature Faust and Ann Radcliffe, as well as Evil Dead, H.R. Giger and others (note: this is where the Demons Module really starts to abbreviate; i.e., "Summoning Demons" is less about close-reads, and more about introducing ludo-Gothic concepts you can apply through demon BDSM, yourselves—strict [the fash inquisitor aesthetic, above] or gentle):

- "Raw Deals, Impostors, the Occult and Death Curses; the Demonic BDSM of Canonical Torture vs Exquisite 'Torture'": Per Faustus, Smile, Evil Dead and other Gothic stories, lays out the idea of summoning occult demons, including acts of interrogating them through Radcliffe's refrain/the classic Neo-Gothic model: the demonic (damsels, detectives and demons) trifecta vis-à-vis canonical torture vs Radcliffe's exquisite "torture."
- "Exploring the Derelict Past: the Demonic Trifecta of Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons; or Enjoying Yesterday's Exquisite Torture on the Edge of the Civilized World": Lays out the poetic ability to summon the "ancient" past, then explore it through Radcliffe's classic trifecta in increasingly subversive ways (from the xenomorph to Amazons to damsels of various kinds choosing to "imperil" themselves")!

We'll introduce Radcliffe's ubiquitous, virtuous, hypocritical and hypnotic "torture sex" arguments, then slowly camp them as well (thus, her ghost: "There's still life in the old lady, yet!").

Raw Deals, Impostors, the Occult and Death Curses; the Demonic BDSM of Canonical Torture vs Exquisite "Torture"

I am trans, thus embody a marker of stigma according to my gender as something to identify with and perform [...] As such, I feel as women classically do in such stories, wherein my lived experience is an attraction to power through strength in ways that sometimes have done me a disservice—i.e., the paradox of wanting to be near power to keep an eye on it, to want a protector or to face ones lived/imagined fears through calculated risk: the vicarious passion or exquisite torture that I call "the palliative Numinous" (a pain-relieving effect achieved from, and relayed through, intense Gothic poetics and theatrics). It's very Promethean, but expressed through the venues and activities of the (for me) white female domestic: the home, but also the dance hall while being "on the market" as an imperiled, damaged debutante; i.e., drawn to excitement and danger though maladaptive responses that yearn nevertheless for catharsis (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, Sex Positivity, Volume Zero (2023)

In camping the (mono)mythic blueprint, Mary Shelley's process of detecting forbidden knowledge moved paradoxically away from and towards the "ancient" land of the gods, mise-en-abyme. She fought fire of the gods with fire of the gods, theft with theft, her own "failed" experiment a resounding success (deprived of unironic violence inside realms of mutual consent, most men don't know how to handle a naked, pissed-off woman—especially if she's smarter than them).

Now, we'll delve into and towards a Gothic flame (re: Varma) that is more magically Numinous; i.e., as something to make, but also trade in, ourselves—like Magic: the Gathering cards, but also Faust and the magicians of yore dealing with Satan direct (versus making him): summoning demons through dark wishes; e.g., Matthew Lewis critiquing capital through a faux-medieval revival! Good BDSM (sex or otherwise) is about getting what you want while balancing the needs of someone else, and Lewis' story concerned Ambrosio as someone who—like any good Gothic villain—is an insecure and greedy coward who only cares about himself and total permanent power over others (and who pays the ultimate price for it: the ignominious death by a crossdressing destroyer greater than he is).

There's still a technological element (re: Clarke's Law), of course; i.e., these older ideas of "magic" were simply interactions with technology as abstracted into riotous exchanges (and any outcomes of the desired result), while working against canonical forces; e.g., the Philosopher's Stone being a poetic desire to create for all peoples—Isaac Newton being an alchemist, Galileo being put under house arrest for his own discoveries, and Groundskeeper Willie and the lads showing the people of Springfield how to have a real soccer riot (they'd call it football, but I digress).

When demons are about, they're speaking to the dualistic, Frankensteinian power of technology and desire, but also "ancient" (often tokenized berserks, left) personas going hand-in-hand:

Except, the closer you get to the imaginary past, the more magical technology becomes in neo-medieval forms (the forward-facing elements of the retro-future decaying backwards into older-appearing hauntologies that occupy the same performative zones). Power is knowledge and vice versa. Per Faust, power is a performance; i.e., unto whores in Faustian narratives wrestling with state pimps, the latter raping nature-as-monstrous-feminine by using the same ergodic/egregoric likenesses' demonic threats of canonical vs exquisite "torture":

So whereas "Idle Hands" focused on whores, period—and "Making Demons," on the Promethean Quest—now part two focuses on Faustian bargains and the seeking of forbidden knowledge through magic and deals (the two are functionally synonymous but I digress): those offered by aesthetically occult demons when summoned on the self-destructive and -penitent³⁰³ quest for knowledge; i.e., by those closer to such things, having this or that for sale "for the right price"; e.g., women and queer folk from the 1800s onwards, treated as sin/vice sponges—classy and profane, their endless "final forms" and infernal tutelage seen as everything and the kitchen sink, then pursued by everyone and their grandma to Hell and back!

- "Whores and Faust: Summoning the Whore/Black Penitent": Introduces the idea of summoning whores (and by extension sex demons of a Lewis or Radcliffe style); i.e., in strictly magical, Faustian language. Introduces Ann Radcliffe and Matthew Lewis, but discusses them vis-à-vis Faust through modern versions of each; e.g., not just Marlowe's early modern Doctor Faustus (1590), but Greg Beeman's Mom and Dad Save the World (1992), Alan Rickman in Die Hard (1988), John Landis' Animal House ³⁰³ Per Radcliffe's own Black Veil and demon BDSM (as borrowed from ecclesiastical circles; e.g., the naughty nun), the language of summoning demons generally involves summoning a kind of sex demon that reintroduces a convulsionnaire's latter-day jouissance trembling before a reimagined Numinous; e.g., Barker's Cenobites, but really any demon you could think of when dealing with the ghost of the counterfeit/process of abjection: the whore as a sex demon vice character who refuses to repent/owns the neo-medieval aesthetic for canon and camp, alike.

Except, whereas Lewis' fakeries critiqued the status quo through an imaginary Church using overtly demon language, the fractal recursion begot from Radcliffe's "explained supernatural" opted for more modest, Female-Gothic (re: Moers) inventions that later demanded TERF-style police violence punching down in bad faith "against": the banditti-as-false-preacher robbing the faithful blind/turning them mad against vulnerable groups.

As I shall demonstrate in "Summoning Demons" as a whole, the black penitent can take on qualities of either author during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., when pointedly camped by us to put Lewis' black magic and Radcliffe's exquisite "torture" (and other demonic devices) to good use—when developing Gothic Communism by infiltrating and stealing from the imaginary past! Raid Radcliffe's liquor cabinet; drag out her corpse and beat it with sticks!

- "The Road to Hell; or, Summoning the Whore, Ourselves (and Other Considerations of the Faustian Bargain vis-à-vis the Participants)": Considers poetically summoning demons/the whore (through magic), doing so while "pulling a Faust"; i.e., according to a brief history of demons and their torturous summoning rituals and effects dating back to Marlowe's science wizard. We'll start by demasking a "strict" double of old harmful forms—Jadis, in my case, being someone to clone and demask, as Radcliffe's future stand-in Velma Dinkley would, but expanding the interrogation to benefit all oppressed groups—then explore how to do so while engaging with the Gothic past as it continuously evolved out of itself. This includes onstage and off; i.e., from the chaos of the Middle Ages and various famous works (from Hammer of Witches to Doctor Faustus) into the Enlightenment and beyond towards 20th and 21st century variants; e.g., Smile and Evil Dead, but also my ex Jadis' abuse of me: as collectively built on top of an earlier history whose demonic tradition endlessly haunts us, and which we must respond to by camping it, ourselves!

We're not the first to do this, the basic idea is from Matthew Lewis, who summoned his demons through the School of Horror to expand the mind beyond state illusions; Radcliffe flirted with sex demons (of a purely non-magical sort) to maintain Capitalist Realism while punching down against Lewis and the French Revolution; re (from "On the Supernatural and Poetry"):

Terror and horror are so far opposite, that the first expands the soul, and awakens the faculties to a high degree of life; the other contracts, freezes and nearly annihilates them [...] and where lies the great difference between horror and terror but in the uncertainty and obscurity, that accompany the first, respecting the dreaded evil? (source).

In short, whereas Lewis used scandal to speak for the oppressed, Radcliffe pimped out nature as monstrous-feminine; i.e., summoning demons for profit while highlighting torturous, demon lover (re: Cynthia Wolff's 1979 "Radcliffean Model") devices she couldn't monopolize (and, in fact, stole from Lewis when writing her own novels). She was a fraud, secret freak and hack, but undoubtedly a talented fraud, secret freak and hack whose fictions (and signature devices) we'll reclaim by camping her ghost, in "Exploring the Derelict Past"!

Regardless of who summons them, such demons take endless variety of form, but obey one of two basic functions; re: workers vs the state, the two warring on different surfaces and inside different thresholds during liminal expression/oppositional praxis embodied as a matter of unequal, forbidden and dark/radically transformative wish, want and desire fulfillment; re: "living deliciously" by torturing our enemies not simply to death, but in stories about doing so that extend to real-world politics theatrically discussing such things during the dialectic of shelter and the alien. Per Radcliffe, such things are classically temporary to uphold the state. We want to make them permanent to dismantle the state (re: like the Devil did to Ambrosio): a new better world without end beyond Capitalism!

This includes Dragon Ball's own legionary (and arbitrary) power levels, desires (to be strong enough to win love/gain revenge) and "final forms" denoting a self-contained cryptomimesis that outlived the original author inside/outside itself (next page); i.e., something to control by those in state control selling them back to us through a neoliberal Protestant ethic reifying those desires into the usual bourgeois dragons (and their sickness) to fall unironically in love with:

Mastermind of religion refined
 They were promising wealth
 But causing you delusion Dictating with hatred and disdain (Sacred's "Fire and Ice³⁰⁴," 2025).

"To critique power, you must go where it is"; i.e., the imaginary past presently on and offstage, during the liminal hauntology of war. In American Liberalism, the castle is already here but white, benevolent; when fascism invariably occurs, the actual causes are abjected Elsewhere, and the usual Supermen from Elsewhere are called upon to whitewash the castle (thus genocide) again:

Dragon Ball series³⁰⁵, above): to have power as normally unequal, forbidden and dark, leading to radical transformation (often for survival, advancement, love or ³⁰⁵ Whose mythical warriors aren't just invincible barbarians who can transform into demons when looking at the moon, but who have a palingenetic "Nazi werewolf" flavor to them avenging Frieza's destruction of their homeworld after they did his dirty work (the backstabbing Jew trope); i.e., one that goes back to the Third Reich. For more details on this idea and its revenge argument—strictly that of reclaiming one's lost home from a legendary past wrong during the Imperial Boomerang (and cartographic refrain)—refer to my writeup on similar demons in Bungie's Myth franchise (source: "'Hell Hath No Fury'; or, Soulbrighter's Token Gay Nazi Revenge (and Giants/Female Characters) in Myth II: Soulbrighter" (2024).

Furthermore, it's a common military recruitment tactic when the state decays, one based on ahistorical, monomythic likenesses of our world; i.e., often through an element of performative victimhood and revenge assigned to real-world groups by people who are not those groups; re: DARVO and obscurantism (e.g., Braveheart, 1995) that promise mates, military glory/accolades, manhood, revenge, and shelter in times of manufactured crisis... if only you participate in a little tournament! And like all fascist pigs, it's an abattoir for the animal farmers to harvest and enslave those young and dumb enough to buy what the state is selling.

Such media is routinely haunted by our aforementioned "Star Wars problem" (thus KISS, Paradise Lost, etc)—i.e., the rebels aren't Communists fighting for a new world beyond the past one, en medias res (Communism); they and the Jedi are fighting for the Old Republic and a previous centrist ordering that decayed into fascism (their paradise lost). The problem with Lucas, Tolkien and Milton, etc, is their refrains are ethnocentric, and constructed cartographically/geopolitically along regressive arguments of "rebellion for us" (redlining ghettos). It's American Liberalism/white (and token) centrist bullshit, feeding into Capitalist Realism; i.e., Americanized media since WWII essentializing Western orderings of the world, which it then defends through theatres of war personifying said war and its copagandistic values. Per Howard Zinn, these appeal to American exceptionalism—and exclusive revolution defending the status quo through Superman-level comic book theatres—as something to import to American imitators, overseas; e.g., Japan, post-occupation and -assimilation.

In turn, the Z fighters fight fire with fire, assimilating to defend the realm for the elite, not prevent crime/rape (they like to fight); i.e., by performing Westernized ideas of strength and beauty standards, while whitewashing fascism/tokenizing Socialism to defend Earth from external demonic threats—namely a goblin/queer clown vice character (Frieza), an invincible barbarian/demon warrior (Broly), a mad science experiment (Cell) and a witch's evil creation (Buu). It's kayfabe vaudeville with Faustian and Promethean elements, the various devils and throwback supermen apologizing for fascism, mid-Red-Scare, and loaded to shonen excess through nonstop battles of will versus degeneracy to protect a Japanese neoliberal view of the Earth; i.e., through Beowulf-grade revenge). A common thread are Nazis and Communists occupying the same shadow zone, as do exploitation and liberation, pleasure and pain. Demons trade in all such devices, often doing so through kayfabe, Amazonomachia and psychosexual canon and camp.

In the middle of all of these, the whore remains as universally loved-hated as ever—chased across Hell's half-acre because she (as Shelley showed us) holds the keys to creation and power as a monstrous-feminine device! We want to turn love/hate simply into love, wherever we can (within reason; i.e., in public displays/galleries with some sense of forewarning versus sticking our asses out car windows before the sex/revenge happens: "Ma'am, this is a Wendy's!").

Before we get to the explicitly "summoning" element of their histories, then, first a primer section speaking about whores per Faust. Then we'll delve into demon BDSM closer to Radcliffe's unironic demon lovers and bad BDSM; i.e., minus her explained supernatural (the poetic argument is the same; the aesthetic is different) but momentum shifts and wish fulfillment directed at chosen saviors getting the girls, then spending all their time with other men; e.g., Goku likes fighting and food, extending conflict to the detriment of others. He's not a good hero, but is an excellent cop. Vegeta assimilates, but in truth is married more to Goku (his first love) than Bulma (his beard); re: "No one kills Kakarot but me!" It's all very macho/warrior hero cult of death.

In other words, cops are queernormative through a homosocial lens, and queernormativity is heteronormativity. To that, betrayal is betrayal, rape is rape, banishment is banishment, etc. The real villain of the show is Goku—playing dumb and reaping the rewards of raping planet Earth without end (famously sending his victims, Radcliffe-style, "into the next dimension" because Cartoon Network didn't want to say "Hell" or even "shadow realm"). He's judge, jury and executioner towing the Thin Blue Line, just like Superman did against Zod.

Whores and Faust: Summoning the Whore/Black Penitent (feat. Ann Radcliffe, Matthew Lewis, Doctor Faustus, Alan Rickman, Roger Ebert, John Landis' Animal House, Kevin Smith, and more)

"I got news for you, pal; they're gonna nail us no matter what we do, so we might as well have a good time!"

—Otter to his male friends/giving advice to "Adam," Animal House (1978)

"Eat the fucking apple. They are going to blame you regardless. You might as well go to the gallows with a full belly knowing more than God."

—Maegen McAuliffe O'Leary "What I Would Tell Eve" (2021)

(exhibit 45b2b: Model and artist: Scoobsboobs and Persephone van der Waard. While summoned, the ritual is still something that must be played out; e.g., between myself and Scoobs, who posed for me, and for whom I then drew as a demon from a series of reference photos.)

Canon is a matter of prescription, whose defiance is also a matter of interpretation depending on who's arguing for it, to whom and why (dialectical-material context, see epigrams). In classic Gothic language, a false preacher is a whore in disguise; in the Faustian tradition, demons (usually sex demons) exchange power for knowledge while haunted by the threat (and delight) of paradoxical torture. Their demonic appetite and agency through ludo-Gothic BDSM are things to abbreviate and summon as a matter of preferential code, in this respect; i.e., as fleshy but also loquacious presentations of various things reduced to walking symbols and hedonism, misbehavior and dealings with ladies-of-the-night and gigolos: superheroes and supervillains embodying all manner of trauma, virtue and vice, per the whore's paradox! Time to pay rent/the Devil his due!

By extension, they're not "pure evil" (though the state treats them as such, because profit demands it); they're simply beings of power and knowledge to call in for favors of a "fatal" sort (who, just as often, respond by being drawn to power and trauma, hence knowledge)! As usual, the state will demonize them for profit; i.e., making them cool, but paywalled, toothless, offensive and inoffensive! We want to agitate through our own creations' demonic contributions: to mobilize workers and wake them up (anyone who doesn't challenge profit/demonic privatization is short-sighted and tokenized by the state and its pimps; i.e., profit is inherently unequal and rapacious, versus "rape" as rape preventative).

Note: Despite its own bastard origins, Christianity hegemonized after the fall of Rome. Since the Renaissance, a drive for scientific knowledge sought to push past dogma, hence found itself in excommunicated, hellish grounds. Goetic demons appeared as occult entities to summon, generally as familiars of pandemonic regents, or even kings and queens of Hell, itself; these remained under a Protestant ethic, abused by state proponents under the shadow of Capitalism. We'll talk about the basic act of summoning, here; i.e., as a secularized Protestant ethic presuming guilt and sacrifice that workers must consciously camp beyond older popular models that, from Radcliffe onwards, haven't gone anywhere!

However, while expressing the human condition is certainly not limited to humanoid bodies, that's where I'll be limiting my focus; i.e., sex positivity as grounded in the tangibly human expressing of demons instead of total abstractions through religious experience, Numinous power and more abstract, terrifyingly inhuman-looking bodies; e.g., the angels from Revelations (artist: Jopfe). There's certainly room for asymmetrical, non-Vitruvian demonic bodies in sex-positive discussions, too (e.g., Stolas, a Goetic prince of Hell who appears in the shape of an owl), but I want to stay grounded, here, giving human workers my full attention (with further focus being supplied to animals and animalistic entities in the "Call of the Wild" chapter). —Perse psychosexual violence during demon BDSM as a ludo-Gothic activity—is what summons them. The art is an extension of the artist as part of the material being worked with, and both of those are part of the larger socio-material world being commented on; i.e., whose demonic persona offers up knowledge about everyday things that have become abstracted by canonical demons and rituals' guilty pleasures.

Camping those, sex-positive demons can be incredibly intense or bizarre, but just as many are frank, down-to-earth depictions of activities policed under heteronormative, puritanical conditions that use demonic language as an unironic call for violence against marginalized groups targeted by the state through Satanic Panic canonized as "mere play"; e.g., Stranger Things and the Duffer Brothers' canonical, thus harmful D&D spuriously "under attack" by "real" BDSM demons; i.e., actually raping white American girls and monopolizing such theatrics for the bourgeoisie, whose dogwhistles and false flags we must subvert through our own convulsionnaire's cryptonymic, state-of-grace jouissance: by adding deliberate irony and actively Miltonic rebellion to the game; re: "Psychosexual Martyrdom.")

Summoning is classically Faustian (one-way); i.e., a quest for demons by dealing with them, especially when capital makes them scarce but also when it returns their return under alienating conditions; i.e., when the whore as a moral panic invades the current ordering of things while threatening unspeakable pleasures unknown to current mortals: a dualistic pervasion of sluts being sluts, painting whores of all kinds in the same cruel brush, during DARVO/obscurantism.

BEWARE if you continue ignoring Jesus. You might find this in your house at 3AM. (source: Lilith Atheist)

In keeping with Radcliffe's much-mimicked neo-conservatism, this generally has forbidden, non-heteronormative, torturous knowledge linked to all demon types being "homewreckers" pilfered from older persecution language; re: blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts having an anti-Semitic past and holistic current usage by tokenized forces we've reclaimed said usage from; i.e., as things to play with now in freshly naughty ways that, sure enough, historically-materially yield a plethora of double standards: boundaries for the pious detective hunting the whore down.

In part one, we discussed the modern Promethean Quest; i.e., wherein Mary Shelley famously frames her composite bodies as children of mad science and buried colonial guilt, abjecting nature as "dark," "ancient," and magical. Yet, Shelley's build-your-own-demon commentary actually constitutes a logical continuation of what came before; i.e., the supernatural or occult demon class; e.g., the summoned demons of alchemy like Mephistopheles; the artificial kind constructed from older Jewish-coded wizardry like the golem; morphologically extensive and varied demons and angels of the Bible, William Blake, and Milton's Paradise Lost, etc. Their existence is a sin, coded as "vice" but sold everywhere that corporations can. What we seek in connection through artifice, they privatize: to summon whores for demonic revenge operating at cross/dialectical-material purposes!

A few further points (eight pages) about whores and Faust before we get to summoning. We'll keep things conversational as we go—critiquing the likes of demon lovers and torture porn vis-à-vis not just Ann Radcliffe and Matthew Lewis (and giving special attention to Lewis' Ambrosio/The Monk), but a variety of authors and works chosen arbitrarily (to be holistic); re: Judas Priest, Marlowe's Faustus, Greg Beeman's Mom and Dad Save the World, Alan Rickman and Die Hard, John Landis' Animal House, Roger Ebert's weird blind spot/obsession with geek shows, torture porn, whores, and demon lovers; and Kevin Smith's Dogma (exhibit 45c2b).

As we shall see, these supernatural demons are often—like the composite demon, but also other monster types such as the vampire—adversarial; i.e., not just opponents, but nemeses, impersonators, beings of rancor and harbingers of unrest and torment, shame incarnate, and opportunity personified challenging the nuclear Cartesian model. Their animus reflects on us through direct manipulation amid menticidal head games; i.e., committed by beings of deception, persuasion, and control—not to mindless feed and take, but give us more than we bargain for while hopefully opening our eyes, mid-ludo-Gothic BDSM: to the unironically deceptive (cryptonymic) nature/genuine-and-total enslavement practices of Capitalist Realism, demons existing "in Hell" both outside Plato's cave, but also inside it illuminating truth through shadowy paradox/darkness visible.

Unlike vampires, which take essence through lust, demons give knowledge through unfair games, treachery and lopsided power arrangements; they're canonically poisonous, something to consume and instantly regret, but also relish—by putting such things campily in quotes, enjoyed as such for being the Devil's advocate helping workers escape state pimps. Yet, such guerrilla warfare remains dualistic, unfolding for both sides during liminal expression: the witch hunter policing the witch whore and the witch whore using the same basic language's war of mirrors, on the Aegis; re: complicit cryptonymy vs revolutionary; i.e., one furthering abjection during the state's revenge against nature as monstrous-feminine, and the other reversing it during the whore's revenge against profit.

As such, demons are (undercover) cops and criminals, but also incredibly queer, charming, mendacious, covert/concealed, concentrically masked, imposturous and xenophilic (a concept we shall examine here, but also in "Call of the Wild" when we look at totem demons and nature-themed, queer transformation through magical/drug-fueled poetics; re: acid Communism): nature is wild and misshapen in ways that, like a misbegotten child, must be repeatedly punished not simply as misbehaved, but alien and wicked; i.e., "The demon is a liar, do not trust it!" In short, they must be canonically summoned and exorcised; re (from the Undead Module, "Fatal Homecomings," 2024):

Whatever the likeness, this generally is a thoroughly abject enterprise; i.e., demons and the undead having far more in common than they do differences, insofar as the giving and receiving of state force is concerned!

For example, Reagan from The Exorcist (1973) is seemingly possessed with the far-off spirit of colonized lands, which she vomits up on principle (dyspepsia, maybe); i.e., a bad girl needing to be exorcized of said evil as making her zombie-like, the bougie mother calling upon holy men to do the job in a suitably martyred, cop-like fashion. It's obscurantism, crudely waving away postcolonial voices like one might a fart. Releasing such class-to-racial tensions canonically works with all the grace of ripping ass as one's default response; i.e., minus the vague pretenses of irony that such bad-taste jokes foist onto the audience, the black penitent turned into the worst sort of spoof: colonial rehabilitation (with James Woods, below, being a thoroughly horrible person on and offscreen) by literally shitting out any spectres of Marx as stubbornly haunting us, waiting to return.

Except, it's not just a feeling of undead invasion, but of one being followed, watched and occupied by the undead as something to abject however one wants (what Jordan Peele calls "the tethered"). In canonical media, such toilet-themed antics (so-called male humor) leaves the audience with a bad distraction—one made by the usual throwers of reactionary-to-moderate tantrums versus legitimate attempts to move past William Friedkin's intensely problematic picture. That cannot happen unless the undead come out in ways that don't constitute rejection. They're people, not bodily waste!

More to the point, these ethnocentric attitudes are taught at the earliest age possible, and not just from a historical perspective; e.g., Jared Diamond's 1997 Guns, Germs and Steel as something to critique from a historical perspective (Bad Empanada's "Guns, Germs and Steel: A Historical Critique," 2020) but also a Gothic one tied to similar reifications of what, by the late '90s, was already a very dated concept: white supremacy as geographically essentialized (aka "moral geography" as something cryptofascists call Western Chauvinism, pro-European, and other dogwhistles we'll unpack in Volume Three) [source].

We must, in response, release/shit these abject attitudes out, but also summon/consume/deal with them in ways that account for such reckonings in places where they unfold; i.e., in the bathroom of the world, whereupon "blackness" puts such Cartesian infantilizings of nature into a constant state of recognition/panic.

In doing so, Medusa becomes something to summon and play with (among general stigmas); i.e., in ways that—like Shelley's novel—routinely play out for or against the state: demon ass, booty and all the things that asses, wombs, and pussies do (with female biology being more policed than male biology but male behaviors being policed through sodomy arguments). Muffins, cake and pie, forbidden fruit, ambrosia, Coleridge's honeydew and milk of paradise—it's literally food for thought saying, "Eat me!" Like Alice, you (and parts of you) shrink and balloon; you identify with alien predicament, fetishization, and (dis)empowerment through paradox, being turned into cis-het slave food, bugs to stomp, whores to rape, etc. They don't just play but play naughtily in pursuit of forbidden things that reverse abjection:

I drew them, above, but also put them on my book covers/promo posters, next page, because their own synthesis of demons and sex work embodied praxial catharsis in ways that fit nicely together with my book series: a shared means of promotion that involves a legion of other cuties besides, working in good faith using demonic "baddie" language to torture the elite but also make us "squirm"; i.e., for being naughty-naughty sex rebels promoting Gothic Communism as only fully appreciative when assembled as such: I have befriended many of my models, but also played with them [mostly online, save for Cuwu (who I made tons of porn

Capitalism alienates and sexualizes everything. Only by uniting to subvert this demonization—during the dialectic of the alien and humanizing ourselves—can we hope to stand a chance; re: humanize the harvest, expose the state as inhumane.

ACAB, ASAB, AHAB, ABAB [all billionaires are bad]!]

Gothic Communism summons little whores/phallic women that evoke the Big Whore, Medusa [aka the Whore of Babylon, or some other Archaic Mother/wandering womb]. A single "madwoman in the attic" is far easier to dismiss, discount and demonize than a group of them speaking in pandemonic unison against their abusers; all of these models do sex work, and many of them are open about it [to varying degrees; i.e., with an alias that links to a page versus one that doesn't]. When you look on it, you look on our past agreements holistic context of mutual consent, but one devised to stand up for the rights of all peoples by me invigilating an army of workers standing against universal exploitation/selective liberation; you look on our naked bodies, but also the logo of the project [a sex-positive tramp stamp] and its book covers adorned with all of these things, mise-en-abyme.

It's not a brand of private ownership, then, but of active-if-cloaked rebellion against privatization and state models—not dialectically-materially vague because the aesthetic was made through informed consent, sexually descriptive monsters, and culturally appreciative forms of Gothic counterculture; i.e., as a trend I developed and worked on for years, and invited more and more people to participate in, along the way! This includes these promo posters being something the models agreed to ahead of time³⁰⁶, along with everything else; and it includes sex work as a matter

³⁰⁶ I only ever had one person—a trans man—ask to have their poster/written involvement be entirely removed from the project, post hoc, and they were working in bad faith with another trans person, a trans woman, who—recently separated from one of my partners—sought to discredit my work and turn past actors against me; re (from Persephone van der Waard's "Policing the Whore"):

Such preferential mistreatment translates to real life and the ways a witch hunt normally play out: turning society against those who aren't normally believed by other members of the prison population.

For example, JDPlaysMoth accused me of abuse based on my testimony of older transmisogyny committed against me (source tweet, vanderWaardart: July 19th 2024), doing so after refusing to transvestigate my own partner because I didn't take Jade at their word that [my partner] Crow was a Nazi "fake trans" preying on "real trans people":

Crow is racist, lied about being trans to me and you, is abusive, steals money, intentionally asks trans people they're acquainted with if they can write fiction of them detransitioned, and lies about being single and friendless to get new partners. They also aren't trans. They lie about being trans because they have a fetish for trans women. They also are a chronic narcissist who uses abuse to try and control people who want to help them (source).

and then adding, "If you want to know more, that's fine, but I'm out of the situation, and this is just information" before running a smear campaign on me because they were "just trying to help" and I refused to listen. They then deadnamed/misgendered Crow, saying that they didn't "want to transition, doesn't want surgery, and as another partner of hers has confirmed, she only does it because she thinks it'll make trans women like her more" (ibid.). Jade's actions—cloak-like though they are—still speak for themselves.

Furthermore, all of this is done by Jade while swanning and showing off their outward appearance to their fans (source tweet: June 26th, 2024)—in short, while kissing up and punching down as a byproduct of their own lived abuse. Acknowledging that abuse is valid, but more important is understanding that Jade is presently an abuser weaponizing their own lived experiences against others. They're the impostor in love with themselves, a mirror that not just of sexual enjoyment through sexualized media, but the Gothic asexuality of public nudism/muses-and-illustrators critiquing trauma—i.e., by refusing to tokenize during ludo-Gothic BDSM: to make the Wisdom of the Ancients wise again; re: more emotionally/Gothically intelligent and class, culturally and racially aware during oppositional praxis per our creative successes!

To that, the old gods return through us; i.e., not as a matter of fascism cannibalizing workers for the state, but of Medusa's avatars eating the cannibals to stall state shift during the Capitalocene! "'Tis but a scratch!"

reflects their false nature onto their victims in order to makes others feel threatened; doing so is meant to alienate Jade's victims, presenting them as false, illegitimate outsiders Jade's flash mob can string up in association with their usual inequity under police rule: the scapegoat, witch whore inside more earthly and less fantastical prisons. Fantastical or not, there's always some orc to lynch, some whole to fill through revenge; re: the givers and receivers of state violence inside the state of exception, moving money through nature.

Free from scrutiny and indeed, venerated for having exposed a perceived menace through the usual bigotries leveled at the marginalized struggling for in group status, Jade is the fascist ringleader free to feed on her victims with impunity! She's a witch hunter played by the witch—a feeding frenzy conducted by those commonly dehumanized by systemic abuse seeking empowerment through said system; i.e., the policing of others through a matter of dogma, fear and revenge, abjecting members of the same community by triangulating against them for the state: robots policing robots, slaves policing slaves, those of nature policing those of nature as monstrous-feminine with monstrous-feminine (source).

Note: In case my source tweets are removed/Twitter melts completely down, you can find the entire tweet threads and screencaps in this Google Doc; re: Persephone van der Waard's "Setting the Record Straight, Transmisia Experience: 5/26/2023 [updated 11/13/2024]." Such redundant storage is a data preservation strategy I have performed multiple times, learning it from my mother/other sex workers and allowing me to compile and consequently share my abuse in quick, easy-to-digest forms; e.g., "Setting the Record Straight Again; Accounting My Ex's Abuse of Me to Another Victim August 30th, 2022" and "Setting the Record Straight; My Ex's Abuse of Me: February 17th, 2022." In keeping with the revolutionary cryptonymy process, if you're transparent, you take away accusations that only work under opaque conditions; and if they still attack you, they're outing themselves. Win-win, loves.

In short, token whores police whores, while being and not being undercover!

I'm an expert not just in researching tokenism, then, but in surviving it where it most commonly occurs. Always document your own genocide; receipts protect us from cops, official or de facto, during witch hunts; e.g., from white moderates who otherwise might turn a blind eye*, but also marginalized groups who might otherwise tokenize openly and punch down (the fencer-sitters). So often, we practicing leftists have to document our own abuse—and not just from status-quo people, but those from out-groups wanting to betray their own (all oppressed people); i.e., to assimilate/triangulate against universal labor. A bigotry for one is a bigotry for all, and people acting in bad faith tend not to fuck with you if you can document their abuse and show it to the world while also protecting yourself. We must blow the whistle and be smart about it, because canon deifies its dead as sacred!

Red Scare works on Cartesian division to further abjection within constantly evolving and imbricating persecution networks; i.e., which only expanded further after neoliberalism certified through Thatcher and Reagan. For example, Judas Priest's own sodomy and demon BDSM arguments [above] having far more critical bite in the 1970s³⁰⁷, only to lose it as time went on when they sobered up/found religion, but kept their rebellious, "bad religion" demonic façade, post-selling-out; re: like Black Sabbath, and so many other white metal acts' controlled opposition; i.e., becoming warriors for the state by playing rebels to protect the state from the working class: fascism weaponizing working class sentiment [and the ghost of the counterfeit] to further abjection/avenge the middle class for the elite by often enough pacifying labor. Fredrick Douglas acknowledges how the state always defaults through force, and Nelson Mandela how we must fight fire with fire to break Apartheid; I [and my friends] argue how this must be done through sex work, recultivating the Superstructure through iconoclastic sex work—re: [from "Psychosexual Martyrdom"]:

All the while, surrender and segregation³⁰⁸ are no defense because the state requires criminals to exist inside harmful, highly unequal distributions of power ("Power concedes nothing without a demand. It never did and it never will" — Frederick Douglas). Instead, we must short-circuit the exchange of violence by humanizing ourselves as ordinarily being the givers and receivers of state harm made into something whose sex positivity—the giving and receiving of pleasure and pleasurable pain; i.e., sadists and masochists during sex-positive demon BDSM—of which the establishment cannot challenge: "The givers and receivers of a state-sanctioned conflict reveal both to be human, one losing its ability to receive punishment and the other to give it. Both must happen simultaneously and en masse for settler-colonialism to stop" ("Bushnell's Requiem"). The state mustn't colonize us through fascism, thus decaying into fractured forms of itself (and Capitalism) through medieval regressive defenses of capital; it must be developed before then, from moment to living moment, as gleaned from monstrous hauntology into something that stalls genocide altogether. Though violence and force are required to challenge the state, liberation comes not from sheer feat of arms, but rather from subversive and transgressive reclamation of monstrous symbols: a pedagogy of the oppressed that makes us human while presenting us as monsters abused by the state. It's a tricky balance, mainly because violence as something to perform and receive are not the same thing despite often appearing identical; i.e., martyrs are generally raped by the state, which we have to convey mid-performance without actually getting raped if we can help it ("rape" meaning [for our purposes] "to disempower someone or somewhere—a person, culture, or place—in order to harm

³⁰⁸ E.g., Nex Benedict (from "Remember the Fallen"):

Nex went to the "correct" bathroom only to be killed anyways by those the rule was supposed to "protect": teenage girls (in truth, the rules are coding behaviors that condition cis-het people [and token agents] to attack "incorrect" persons). The three attackers used the rule to isolate Nex, then entered the bathroom in bad faith to execute them (the rule and the person). In turn, the state's ipso facto sanctioning of selective punishment has been demonstrated by their shielding of Nex' hangmen (or rather, in this case, hang women) [source].

Again, it's tricky because mid-development, we will be criminalized regardless of what we do; but if criminals become human, then the state's power crumbles, not ours [source].

Betrayal—regardless of the motivation [re: desperation or convenience]—is not good praxis/stewardship; "diversity is strength!" to quote Hannah Gadsby. The more inclusion we have, the stronger our voice, but the harder the enemy will fight to divide us; i.e., with cheap rewards, including the ability to camp blindly for the state; re: the KISS problem dating back to Milton and before him, to Plato's Republic [c. 375 BE]. Any form we devise, the state will tokenize, commodify and pervert; i.e., through a bourgeois corruption putting Shelley's whore back in chains and having it argue for the subjugation of any rebels fighting back—to fight for the colonizer by wearing their mask [re: Fanon, but extending "black" to any stigmatized group; e.g., female, GNC, non-Christian, non-white, etc].

To it, Gothic Communism is universal rebellion, hence holistic; capital is built on Cartesian thought, which is heteronormative and settler-colonial, thus thrives on systemic division with selective and flexible tolerances engendering widespread intolerance: "Shoot yourself in the head!" As Jon Lovitz shows us in Mom and Dad Save the World, this is generally a bad idea; as the director Greg Beeman shows us—aping Napoleon and Victor Frankenstein, while casting a real-life pedophile to be the hero of his [otherwise charming and genuinely funny] movie³⁰⁹—such things can tokenize during liminal expression:

And while white straight men [and token groups; re: Halford, but also Paul Stanley and ³⁰⁹ Dick Nelson, played by Jeffrey Jones—a man who first pleaded guilty in 2003 to hiring a fourteen-year-old boy to pose naked in photos for him, then refused to update his sex offender registry in 2010:

registry info. / The 64-year-old actor escaped a possible 3-year jail sentence in state prison, but must now serve three years of probation and perform 250 hours of roadside clean-up, TMZ first reported. / In July 2003, Jones pleaded no contest to hiring a 14-year-old boy to pose for sexually explicit photos, according to City News Service.

"I'm sorry that this incident was allowed to occur. Such an event has never happened before and it will never happen again," Jones reportedly said then. / As a result of the case, he was sentenced to five years' probation and was required to register annually as a sex offender. / Jones was arrested June 23 after failing to update his registration for 2009. / He has appeared in more than 60 roles on the silver and small screens (source).

In other words, Jones got a slap on the wrist more than once; i.e., painfully reminiscent since Radcliffe's The Italian, showing how the system—since Antiquity and the medieval period into the Neo-Gothic period and beyond—repeatedly serves the needs of status-quo men by design: not to prevent crime, but let those with power abuse their power to keep harming those the system normally exploits. As we'll see with Radcliffe, the exposure must be total and universal; otherwise, the detectives being lionized are merely cops-in-disguise!

However ignorant or aware of the tropes someone is, the monomyth is rape apologia. In Beeman's case, his movie calls "Mr. Everyman*" "Earth Dick"; i.e., while camping Star Wars and Flash Gordon before it—all the way back to Frankenstein, Udolpho, Paradise Lost and Beowulf—to instill praxial inertia for profit, with a smaller risk/allegory of the historical-material facts: as an inside (and sadly prophetic) joke—a family patriarch/authority figure who extends his whitewashed persona (and rapacious cock) astrotoetically into outer space, on and offstage! The paradox of Dick Nelson is the whore is canonically someone who endangers the nuclear family through imposturous scandals; i.e., Dick Nelson the character endangers his family through sheer ineptitude, while his real-life double (the actor) threatens to break the entire spell by acting the canonical idea of a male harlot/sodomite. It's like a really sobering version of Captain Kirk. Furthermore, the quotidian upstart upstaging Captain Crunch is, himself, an impostor getting paid for his time (though probably not well, considering the movie absolutely bombed).

Its total gross was reportedly two million dollars; by comparison, T2—then the highest-grossing movie of all time—made $517 million (despite this, the production costs were so high, Arnold Schwarzenegger accepted his payment in the form of a jet). And despite claims to the contrary about Jones not getting paid for Beetlejuice, Beetlejuice [2024], the makers still used his likeness to some extent [versus writing him out of the story altogether]. So the odds that he got paid something by Burton [who worked with him for years] aren't zero [similar to Crispin Glover in Back to the Future 2]. That being said, this is pure conjecture, so it can go either way see: r/Beetlejuice 2's "[Jeffery Jones," 2024].

"The traditions of all dead generations weigh like a nightmare on the brains of the living." So does Beeman extend/apologize for rape (to some extent) by blindly camping those stories, but also The Simpsons' 1989 debut (and The Jetsons/Flintstones' [1962/1960] own unironic endorsements of The Honeymooners, Leave It to Beaver [1955/1957] and a million other sitcoms and cartoons oscillating between blind camp and perceptive parody/pastiche attacking the nuclear family model;

Gene Simmons] can't tokenize themselves beyond their own oppression, they can camp their own survival and holocaust [or ancestor's holocaust, in Stanley and Simmons' case] to punch down with; e.g., "The last request of my life is to die killing my enemies!" Megadeth's "[This Day We Fight!" 2009].

Gothic Communism works with the same principles in reverse, our own cryptonymy stacking less like a Greco-Roman phalanx/shield wall, mid-hauntology and dualism, e.g., The Stepford Wives, 1972); i.e., as juxtaposed alongside the early '90s thinning of the membrane, vis-à-vis Derrida's Spectres of Marx, Butler's Gender Trouble, Creed's The Monstrous-Feminine, Jameson's Postmodernism, and Warner's "heteronormativity."

It's certainly a response to all of these things, but as Radcliffe shows us, familiarity with cliché isn't the same thing as endorsing universal liberation. We must do better than all peoples who came before; i.e., by revisiting and updating as many times as needed what has since become dated and harmful; re (from the Poetry Module citing Volume Zero):

Again, "kill your darlings"; i.e., even if everyone in Gothic academic quotes Angela Carter, she's still a second wave feminist, thus has major problems we must critique. As I write in Volume Zero: Second-wave feminism was (and still is) infamously cis-supremacist and white, and we can't just rely on a bunch of fancy (and highly problematic) white, cis-het female academics to accomplish the sum of all activism for all workers. Even if Carter wouldn't have been caught dead in Rowling's company today, she still died in 1992— one year after Michael Warner introduced "heteronormativity" to academic circuits, two years after Judith Butler wrote Gender Trouble and one year before Derrida wrote Spectres of Marx.

To be blunt, Carter's most famous works feel oddly dated in terms of what they either completely leave out or fail to define, and thereby supply clues to the vengeance of proto-TERFs like Dacre's Victoria de Loredani that Carter doesn't strictly condemn (source: "Green Eggs and Ha(r)m," 2024)

We must critique our heroes when they disappoint us, and hold ourselves and them to the same level of scrutiny we would our enemies while making media showing us being "tortured." Anyone can combine anything to say anything they need for any argument; in turn, anyone can tokenize, and many are—far from walking the tightrope or sitting on the fence—either betraying us in bad faith or unaware that they're limiting the scope of their critics to effectively critique capital vis-à-vis Gothic poetics: "We are human, so respect our boundaries and honor our demands as we honor yours; e.g., 'It's my turn, so cleave my beaver like a good little slave!'"

To that, I wrote Sex Positivity's first book, Volume Zero (2023), to critique Creed's Amazonomachia further than she dared (my readings deliberately going from movies into videogames while taking the former and Gothic novels into consideration); i.e., scrutinizing her work, but also Derrida and any other author mentioned from the '70s, '80s and '90s (and really from any time period I feel like). Nothing is sacred but universal basic human, animal and environmental rights; the state—and anyone who defends them directly or indirectly—is a cop. And say the line, Bart: "ACAB! ASAB! AHAB! ABAB" The state is straight; we're here and we're queer! Furthermore, "trans women are women, trans men are men, and non-binary people are valid; sex work is work; free Palestine!" And so on...

and more like something that feels impenetrable during class, culture and race unified against the elite gentrifying/decaying such tokenized slogans and paraphernalia for themselves; re: to triangulate against labor and nature by imitating it in bad faith. "This day we fight," doing so on and off field, in the hearts and minds of those who wish to destroy us, and who we recruit to our cause or expose as enemies to said cause.

Our aforementioned wall resists control, thus dismantles systems of oppression and their monomythic copaganda [see: footnote]. This collocates, growing fluent and second-nature on a socio-material level; i.e., just as I thought "Frederick Douglas," and instantly remembered so many other thinkers I have previously assembled in other books through holistic recall, so do I revive all of the artists they remediate: through their combined writing and artwork extending to all media on all registers across time and space, onstage and off. The synapses develop not just between the neurons in my brain, but expand cybernetically into society at large. Eat your heart out, Mary Shelley!

In turn, nothing terrifies the elite more than intersectional solidarity synthesizing universal liberation from an early age at the cost of profit. Through the banality of evil, they sell monsters as armies to buy and consume, but also extend into daily life; but they cannot monopolize such things through violence, terror or morphological expression. Instead, profit is desk murder tied to terror language as "the kissing cousin of force" [re: Asprey]. By taking control of ourselves, the state will respond with violence in ways that break Capitalist Realism as often as not: we are not alone, and we can fight back against mask-off abusers using what we got; re: our bodies and our Gothic reinvention as something capital desperately wants to perpetuate itself. The longer it tries, and the more we camp and leave behind our own derelicts in its wake, the weaker it becomes through exposure: "Draw your sword on a woman?"

Domestic abuse is the extension of colonial models [and police abuse] bleeding into a homely space; i.e., when Imperialism comes home to empire, we whores camp the idea to stop genocide at home and abroad [my friends, for example, protesting the state of Israel as much as I do, but also Pax Americana at large]. We don't have to "depthroat" knife dick to put up with state bullshit, but rather can speak in such Numinous doublings to camp our own rape and reclaim the psychosexual aesthetic of power and death; i.e., to aid in rebellion by putting "rape" in quotes, thereby camping the canon by sucking cock in ways that paradoxically don't destroy us despite the vaso vagal, "sword swallowing" elements. We whores thrive in such confusion, offering forbidden sight to the next in line—by reclaiming state icons of

While criticisms vary per author—and beauty [as much as fear] sits in the eye of the beholder/scope of the critique being levied during dialectical-material scrutiny—Gothic Communism is intersectional and holistic/composed of inkblots, meaning its fetishes and clichés [coded monster behaviors] can't reduce to class, cultural or race; i.e., class warfare is culture and race warfare, thus subject to the same betrayals by cuckoo operatives weaponizing sex, drugs and rock 'n rock [thus all Gothic poetics] speaking to war inside-outside themselves. Like subversive Amazons, subversive demons more broadly live in Hell as not relegated to other places, but expanding the state of exception as a forbidden lens exposing state cannibalization in spite of state mimicry and assimilation; re: Marx's "capital is dead labor feeding on living labor"; i.e., to poetically reclaim and interrogate the etiologies of trauma as historical-material symptoms of Capitalism concealing itself in Gothic pastiche.

Commonly mocked as dubiously dirty and profane, then, the iconoclastic authors of demons can subvert the canonical orderings of them by helping others [and themselves] conceptualize, hence value power as something to summon and play with towards unknown pleasures; i.e., that of the flesh as having grown alienated and fetishized under capital, hence needing to be reunited under scandalous linguo-material circumstances and frameworks; e.g., Lewis' The Monk expressing dark desires that upend capital by speaking truth to power through Gothic fakeries—to change Capitalism through the whore's revenge. Sex is power and knowledge, of which status is expressed through the body's sizeable assets and aesthetic] during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., nature-as-whore per the usual monstrous-feminine articulations; e.g., the mommy dom from Hell to demand, "I was called here by humans who wished to pay me tribute!"

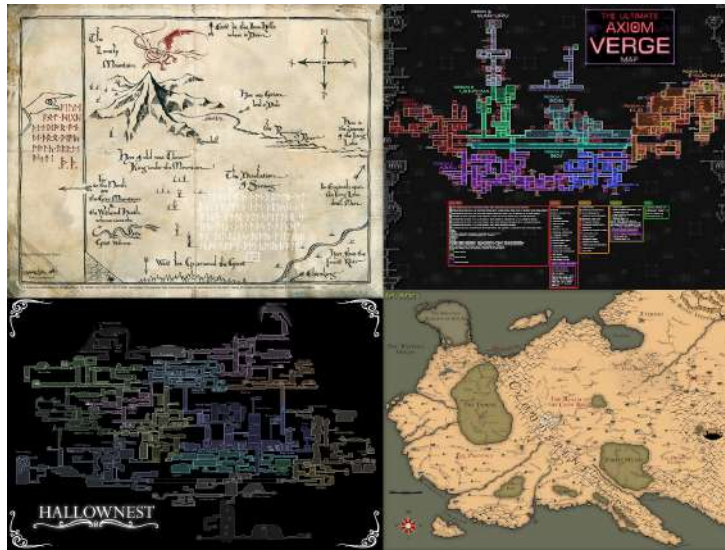

Bitches love tribute! State hornets defend their nest, we defend ours, and both exist in the same space, chasing a palliative Numinous with Communist or fascist potential. There's no dividing them so much as we convert others to our cause using a hybrid of theories, politics, catchphrases and multimedia; e.g., "It's the deep breath before the plunge!" but also, "No one laughs at a master of quack fu!"

The weirder we are, the more they'll try to colonize us through tokenization. Repetition, mid-concealment [the hiding and showing of apocalypse], is kind of the point. So if any academics get "froggy" and turn their noses up at us, simply ask yourself, "What would Alan Rickman do?" "Hit it again," of course! "Sack my

'Nakatomi building' with your 'RV.' Is it inside, yet?" bats eyelashes innocently at the would-be penetrator[s] to embolden their assault

So is camping the canon a dualistic exercise; i.e., weird canonical and iconoclastic nerds working with castles-in-the-flesh/walking castles, mise-en-abyme [and all their playful and popular hyphenations of sex and war, regardless of politics]: Alan Rickman—and his lovely part in a larger neoliberal story about fascism and imaginary '80s banditti attacking neoliberalism³¹⁰—is something we can camp; i.e.,

³¹⁰ Originally from Volume Zero, but later cited in "A Note about Canonical Essentialism" (2024):

(exhibit 1a1a1h2a1: "When Alexander saw the breadth of his domain, he wept for there were no more worlds to conquer*." Videogames are war simulators; in them, maps are built not merely to be charted and explored, but conquered through war simulations. The land is an endless site of conquest, war, rape and profit carefully dressed up as "treasure," "liberation" and "adventure," but in truth, brutalizing nature during endless wars of extermination borrowed from the historical and imaginary past as presently intertwined:

Though certainly not unique to Tolkien, and popularized in the shooter genre vis-à-vis Cameron, Tolkien near-single-handedly popularized the idea of "world-building" in fantasy by making a mappable world full of languages he invented, but which he tied to the larger process of world war that has been replicated countless times since; i.e., the idea of the map as a space for conquest that paralleled the elite raping Earth repeatedly as translated to the videogame format; e.g., Myth, Axiom Verge, Hollow Knight, above [our focus, in the next subchapter, will be on Metroidvania, not the RTS]. Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earthlike double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force.

In short, Tolkien's inventions (or Cameron's) were the same kinds of us-versus-them ethnocentric arguments made by men of reason out of the historical past, onstage and offstage, to justify real-world invasions preceded by imaginary ones (and vice versa).

For added fun, here is the footnote on Gruber and Die Hard this quote is referring to/cited from:*

A canonical misunderstanding/misquoting of Plutarch written by neoliberals needing an evil bad guy to chew the fat. As Anthony Madrid writes in "And Alexander Wept" (2020):

Remember Die Hard? I don't. I saw it right around the time it came out, and all I remember is Bruce Willis, barefoot, running through broken glass. That, for me, was a metaphor for watching the movie. Fans of the film, however, will recall its dapper German villain, Hans Gruber, smacking his silly lips and gloating at some private victory. He puts his fingertips together and says in facetiously tragic tones (clearly quoting something from High Culture and referring with cozy irony to himself): "And Alexander wept, seeing as he had no more worlds to conquer" [that's a misquote]. Then he smiles with evil-genius self-satisfaction and says: "Benefits of a classical education." / Yeah. Except that quote would never come up in the context of a classical education, unless the instructor happened to be taking a jolly detour, nose in the air, to attack a piece of legendary crap that no student of his must ever traffic in. [...]

A few facts. The monkeys who wrote Die Hard did not invent that quote. [...] It comes up in certain classic English poems from the seventeenth century [e.g., Edmund Waller addressing Oliver Cromwell in 1655 ...] The quote is a hash of three passages in Plutarch, first century CE. Two of the passages were made available to English speakers (most notably Shakespeare) in 1579, in the translation by Thomas North. [...] Look at this rather nicer version [of Plutarch's "On Tranquillity of Mind"] by everybody's favorite courtier, Sir Thomas Wyatt [for Catherine of Aragon]: Alexander, when he herde Anaxarchus argue that there were infynite worldes, it is said that he wept. And whan his frendes asked hym what thing had happened him to be wept for: "Is it nat to be wept for," quod he, "syns they say there be infynite worldes, and we are nat yet lorde of one?"

[...] And therefore, seing that his fathers dominions and Empire increased dayly more and more, perceiving all occasion taken from him to do any great attempt: he desired no riches nor pleasure but warres and battells, and aspired to a signory, where he might win honor. Now that's from Plutarch's Life of Alexander. No tears, but definitely the guy Gruber had in mind, the Godzilla he'd heard about in German day camp. Here's a prince who wants to conquer for the sake of conquering; he doesn't care whether Macedon comes out on top or not, except insofar as it's compatible with his personal glory (source).

In short, Gruber's misquoting of classical history is a kind of bad education that invites the fash-coded baddie in a neoliberal copaganda to steal from the fictional elite, while the real-world elite rewrite the past along these historical-material lines; i.e., neoliberal apologia regarding war as essentialized through men just like Gruber.

And if movie directors can do it to tokenize Irish cops (McClane)—i.e., in service to a Japanese company on American soil (while scapegoating the FBI in the process)—then we wacky fags can camp all of their ghosts in service to all the generations of peoples capital has exploited; re: Ward Churchill's "On the Justice of Roosting Chickens: Some People Push Back" (2005).

camping his men defending the Nakatomi building from police invasion during a diegetic siege of stolen private property/capital. I posit that, just as Die Hard translates easily enough to American Liberals [and actual Nazis]—dickishly trying to kick the "sand castles" of practicing leftists who love the same sand, on and offstage—such meta forms rape play demonopolize the canon for future endeavors! Richard Gobeille isn't the only one using such one-liners; we can camp them, too, and openly to talk about capital's hauntological [canceled-future] abuse—i.e., while revering those who rest in power versus peace: "Welcome to the party, pal!" re: "[Zombie Police States"]. One-of-a-kind, Rickman's the motherfucking GOAT!

Just like Christmas—and the imaginary war on it that nonetheless occurs in between fiction and non-fiction, on and offstage, dualistically between givers and receivers of demonic sex and force—the state and its proponents cannot monopolize such things. Per Sarkeesian, we can enjoy and critique them, too. In turn, dead language and metaphor become an anisotropic poetic instrument to resurrect rebellious forces: by using the language of good/evil and virtue/vice to challenge holier-than-thou police agents abusing the same devices; re: to move power towards workers, reclaim demonizing poetics and reverse the usual dichotomies associated with said poetics; i.e., through their various aesthetics [of power and death] and all-around struggles working in opposition, mid-exchange, protest, what-have-you; e.g., "terrorist" and "counterterrorist" but also "damsel" and "whore" or "detective" and "demon," etc. God isn't real, but the forces that dictate the state's will through his likeness are. In turn, these are what our Satanic apostacy [and its uncanny avatars] convey. The gloves come off to break Capitalist Realism through ludo-Gothic BDSM's calculated risk. Stare and tremble, nerds!)

Apart from bathroom hijinks and abject behaviors/bodily functions (the scent of sweat and fishy musk of such forbidden areas³¹¹), demons stress enormity (size difference) and power as alien, profane, unholy and wicked, bad, naughty cesspools, but also campy and fun: Hell as something whore-like to conjure up and play inside/with (which the state routinely wants to conquer). Girls (or enbies, in

Cuwu's case) go to the bathroom; they fuck! It's not childish to acknowledge this, but childish to unironically demonize such matters; i.e., those who do so to control them in bad faith under state mechanisms (the bathroom being a source of female vulnerability and fear in Western households, Radcliffe onwards). I generally don't exhibit bathroom play but it is incredibly common:

Furthermore, such demonic, "hysterical" shenanigans invite us joining in and looking at/playing with alien, fetishized things to humanize them; re: to humanize the harvest is to expose the state as inhumane, incompatible with life. Demonic essence and knowledge/power take on many forms of exchange, the, and we should invite all of them in sex-positive ways!

In doing so, Pinocchio (another golem type) is seen as violent and murderous because he is a slave, thus humanizing his motives: through the extant desire to be free that, in oppressed dialogs, express through the human condition as demonized. Despite what J.K. Rowling (a Radcliffe copycat, no honor among thieves) and other Tory apologists argue in their stories, no one wants to be a slave (re: Sheep in the Box' "The Concerning Politics of Harry Potter," 2020); but slavers will make arguments for the enslavement of nature, essentializing "darkness" as a casus belli that different groups realize is problematic at different points—i.e., a false flag to defame, demonize and dehumanize us on different registers of privilege and oppression; e.g., your average straight, token African American (of either sex or gender) will probably tell you Birth of a Nation (1915) is racist before they'll admit Harry Potter is homophobic (the inverse is truth with token queer people). Such are the axes of oppression at play.

And we—treated like the state's demonic punching clowns by alarmist nutjobs and hypocrites from any normativity—croon under token scrutiny and ridicule as much as white straight examples: "Don't let me be misunderstood!" (Santa Esmerelda, 1977). Danger, you say? Danger disco, babes (remember your safe words; e.g., the traffic light system)! Our calculated risk—while at times transgressive in its torturous "death by Snu-Snu"—screams like a horny church organ; i.e., the house is the demon, the fat lady singing Medusa's tortured, sweaty and wholly hysterical, thirsty swan song (e.g., the Nostromo)! She burns, going out, reading capital the riot act (and leaving them an upper decker)!

While demons are canonically the opposite of angels in modern supernatural argumentation, they are functionally the same kind of monster—the alien, specifically the virgin/whore alien (with militant Numinous forms classically going from Dante's fearsome forms to more gentle, sexpot/pinup angelics³¹²); i.e., morphologically complex agents of a superior power source (themselves, or in service of a god-like force; e.g., Mephistopheles).

In any event, I won't focus on differentiating them. Certainly the binarization of "good" and "evil" is a more recent invention of Christianity—i.e., in the medieval period into the Protestant ethic under Capitalism—and isn't especially useful during dialectical-material analysis. During said analysis, there is only socio-psychosexual and material conditions to change through demonic expression personifying a seditious crossing of boundaries as much as rarefied emotions. As the Creature from Frankenstein or David from Alien: Convent show us, doing so iconoclastically constitutes a form of self-expression—for the oppressed as made into their roles by those in power ahead of time. So when demons and monsters make their own art from their own point of view, this means they tend to embody trauma as a kind of postcolonial/posthuman code repressed by the state. We can deliberate our stances through our own clay-like flesh: what to wear and how to wear it. We make it look good, camping our own rapes by putting them in quotes (with angels and devils also being likenesses of those in life transported to spectral realms/glorious afterlives).

In colonial-patriarchal terms, fear is codified in ways that pacify onlookers, pushing them to fear and persecute demons (thus whores) through legitimized violence framing them as Black Penitents across the board. Reversing the position amounts to a kind of slave revolt—of historically demonized, undead and animal/robotic chattel workers speaking out; i.e., by deliberately making art to express themselves in relative language, thereby transforming the world from the monster's perspective

³¹² The hero's sexual reward, reviving Valhalla during state decay—what C.S. Lewis would call "a teatable paradise":

In the plastic arts these symbols [of power] have steadily degenerated. Fra Angelico's angels carry in their face and gesture the peace and authority of Heaven. Later come the chubby infantile nudes of Raphael; finally the soft, slim, girlish, and consolatory angels of nineteenth century art, shapes so feminine that they avoid being voluptuous only by their total insipidity—the frigid hours of a teatable paradise. They are a pernicious symbol. In Scripture the visitation of an angel is always alarming; it has to begin by saying "Fear not." The Victorian angel looks as if it were going to say, "There, there" (source: C.S. Lewis' 1961 preface to The Screwtape Letters featured in Jordan Poss' "C.S. on Angels in Art," 2020).

Such poetics convey nostalgias to pine for in regards to angels and godly ordainment; i.e., "Make Heaven Great Again." Gothic Communism can camp this, making C.S. Lewis clutch his pearls by reminding them that power and its Numinous statements are half-real, plastic, and prone to change. Fuck God, hahaha! Do sacrilege, kids!

as demonized, zombified and enslaved: the reclaiming of the animal side as much as the human, vying to witness their survival and treat them humanely in lieu of state atrocities.

Their mere existence as fearful—when turned back on the viewer using the Aegis—can demonstrate different hard truths: the experience of the demonized "living in fear" as objects of fear—to be made into something automatically regarded with fear, fascination and lust by a "chaser's" xenophobic status quo: a giant, undead guilt looming over them like a bad dream. As are whores, and demons are the same way—essence being the act of looking on giant animate-inanimate forces tied to larger and smaller abstractions; i.e., God and the state, of course, but also Capitalism and other hyperobjects, on high, and smaller forms "on low" that contain and yield their own secrets. "What is a man?" indeed!

Gothic Communism isn't a chimera or hydra, alone, but a colossus, too. To show the viewer their own fear as such—their supersized xenophobic shame, disgust, shock, awe, etc, as literally viewed through those they have been conditioned to demonize in fetishistic language—can be traumatic, but also transformative; i.e., to replace status-quo fear with xenophilic freedom and pleasure by demonstrating the supernatural demon: as harmless and the state as a violent fearmonger that exploits workers, mid-witch-hunt, pimping symbols of the oppressed through symbols of violence (the Statue of Liberty is both); re: "Who needs chicks when you got demons!"

The proletarian moral is to present oneself as a target in the usual occult symbols (exhibit 45c1)—i.e., often expressing human biology beyond what is normalized; e.g., female genitalia as gynodiverse (Gynodiversity's "Classification of the Anatomical Variation in Female External Genitalia," 2023), hence something that exists in relation to occult artistic expression—only to discourage state persecution by shaming its proponents for shaming demonic sluts and their bodies during gender trouble: as a heteronormative, boot/ass licking defense mechanism. People out here rimming Lady Liberty sans irony!

This makes any queer person presenting as a sex-positive demon something of a detective, themselves, but also someone who "plays god" in an iconoclastic, poetic sense. To be queer as such is to investigate our own humiliation/persecution; i.e., as something to ironically express through gender trouble and parody as inevitable, but also within our power to create as whores during supernaturally Faustian dialogs. It becomes part of our existence as demonized through heteronormative bias.

So while gender trouble and parody can be a fun activity for queer people to express, this irony becomes something to appreciate through countercultural art as a means of communicating a serious issue across racial lines: the queer struggle to exist when straight people (of any class, religion, or race) feel threatened by the proverbial "thing that should not be"; i.e., subverting canonical sodomy fears and straight myopia of queer people through colonized language tokenizing different chattelized minorities—to camp that canon's potential to instill blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts against various oppressed groups punching down, and all by using our own gender-non-conforming bodies, performances, labor and identities, etc, as countercultural xenophilia.

As things to create and sexually describe in opposition to state poetics and settler-colonial histories, demons deserve inclusion, love and acceptance for not being the groomers, murderers and tyrants that state proponents and moral panics describe us as: whores to collar and euthanize but also trade in; i.e., their flesh, doing so much how slavery and prostitution have done for thousands of years, albeit evolving under and into neoliberal Capitalism tokenizing such things—from white to black, foreign and exotic to dungeon and domestic! It's a spectrum, nature-as-monstrous-feminine having a female side popularized through prostitute as something to summon, shame and farm for its melon-like qualities; i.e., by empire, afraid of and fascinated with nature through colony romances, slumming and Orientalism/dark, vengeful continents, etc: queens of the damned, of Western racism eroticizing far-off jungles, deserts and other half-real frontiers, but also traveling queers from "Transylvania" making the help eat each other. Double standards abound, as do intersections of privilege and oppression, canon and camp, mid-morphological expression (far too many to go over here; e.g., internalized and intersectional bigotry).

Simply put, our surveys of grander territories must routinely fight for equal rights, including the morphological/artistic (thus demonic) freedom to express ourselves however we want. Basic human rights provide defense from state abuse; equal rights for all grant those defenses to everyone under intersectional solidarity. All colonized parties must unite to be free, or none are. To avoid tokenism under an equality of convenience policing the whore, all normativities must be shirked. We camp our survival, our abuse, and let others do the same for theirs. Sin isn't singular!

We've already explored how "playing god" and the Promethean Quest play out for the status quo or against it during oppositional praxis; re: historically the invented, arbitrary hubris of men like Victor Frankenstein lies in their sincere exploitation of others, while our "hubris" of merely wanting to exist isn't harming anyone despite being completely invented. The takeaway of Shelley's Frankenstein (and similar stories) is that those seeking to harm us as "bad demons" have engineered a system for doing so, all while posturing as benevolent in bad-faith.

The same goes for Faust as a man of vanity who, in his case, admittedly fucked himself over more than anyone else; i.e., he thought he knew all there was to know and literally ignored the "better angels of his nature" to appeal to the devil on his shoulder, Mephistopheles (the whore working for the Devil, mid-psychomachy). In tempting fate, Faust is basically a sophomore ("wise fool") faced with sex (forbidden knowledge) for the first time, then doing some really unethical/dumb shit—a didactic trend that would carry into future caricature; e.g., Tom Hulce's "Pinto" from Landis' Animal House debating to rape the thirteen-year-old virgin, Clorette, at a college frat party in classic Faustian style: temptation and admonishment, but also apologia ("he didn't know any better"). The whole point of the psychomachy is speaking to outward versions of internal angels and demons; i.e., moral dilemmas acted out in medieval language for an increasingly modernized world alienated from such things.

"Fuck her! Fuck her brains out! You know you want to!" says Pinto's demonic side, calling him "a homo" when he decides to ignore his intrusive thoughts. Such matters don't come ex nihilo, of course but speak to larger dialectical-material problems the director (John Landis, a man known for exploiting his actors—eventually causing the deaths of two undocumented migrant children, and The Twilight Zone's [1983] lead actor³¹³) was self-reporting on. So was Christopher Marlowe (who, apart from Doctor Faustus, in ³¹³ Unlike Marlowe's previous The Jew of Malta, the Faust legend speaks to white Germanic male vanity and hubris; i.e., similar to what Shelley would satirize in Frankenstein with her own mad science polemic—the difference being Marlowe's story was designed for the stage, not novelized, but still critiques Man's reach exceeding his grasp: through a morality tale of "pride cometh before the Fall" (a theme borrowed from Greek tragedies into Marlowe, Milton, Shakespeare, Shelley and so on). The science presents as "magical"; i.e., one whose rituals of fatal pursuit speak to the abuse of alchemic technology (re: the Philosopher's Stone): summoning a demon from Hell who sends Faust down a heavy-handed path of self-destruction/towards the Big Man downstairs (an excommunication). To it, the Good Doctor has every chance to stop, but doesn't because he has white male fragility and privilege (which includes scientific, celebrity-status privilege). In turn, the store frames everything in medieval theatre language (the Deadly Sin of Pride). It's silly and serious, the "tragedy" unfolding as an argument concerning self-aggrandizement that doesn't pass muster.

Regarding the many others who followed in Faust's footsteps, Landis couldn't help himself. Bolstered by the success of Animal House, Blues Brothers (1980), and An American Werewolf in London (1981), his attempts to capture fresh "lightning in a bottle" success by pushing the envelop led to a totally avoidable tragedy—one just like Faust except it affected people other than Faust (all speaking to the "pity me" self-centered quality of the original story that—among others—Shelley was making fun of in her own revival not just of Prometheus, but Marlowe's morality tale); re: starring American actor Vic Morrow and 7-year old Myca Dinh Le and 6-year-old Renee Shin-Yi Chen, the latter two hired in deliberate violation of California labor laws and used in a white savior ghost story returning to the Vietnam War to rescue victims of American Genocide (colonial guilt, and turning a profit at colonizer and colonized expense—all very Walpolean, considering Morrow and his "chosen princes" are crushed/decapitated by a falling helicopter, similar to the giant helmet crushing Lord Manfred's son: cutting them and their greatness short).

While I wish I could say the exposure of these workplace violations had any demonstrable effect regarding systemic change, the system exists to protect powerful men, not cancel them; and being white, straight, male and powerful, Landis not only survived the case intact, he went on to direct dozens of films afterwards (slowly shifting to producing movies and TV shows, in the 2010s). While people less vain would be absolutely chuffed to have any career close to that, Landis—like Faust before him—can't help himself, can never stop, always wants. Furthermore, he took the wrong lessons away from Twilight—mainly that he was the main character in and outside his own production; re: "Impunity is the apex of privilege," I write, in "Valorizing the Idiot Hero" (source, 2020).

And while that piece focused on Ashley Williams from the Evil Dead franchise, my argument effectively speaks to the same kind of unchecked, publicly endorsed/enabled male privilege that Faust enjoyed until his tragic, completely avoidable death; i.e., a story about an idiot (Quixotic) hero who ignores everyone around him until it either kills him, or at least blows up in his face—the same kind of carte blanche entitlement enjoyed by half-real Great Men of the imaginary past (all history is somewhat fictional) leading to Landis and later on, Trump's two presidencies (and all American executives "playing Faust"). Monsters are made, and the Faustian hubris Marlowe made famous was, itself, a historical result of systemic issues that only crystalized after his play summon them.

As such, Landis and future assholes like him are symptoms of a larger historical-material cycle bleeding collateral damage in furtherance to bourgeois triage; i.e., one developing a rash of personality disorders (such as narcissism) menticiding them into Quixotic numbskulls causing other workers great harm (and forcing these victims into fractally recursive Faustian bargains, on and on). Reflecting on the disaster afterwards, Landis only thought about himself and what could have been regarding his own wasted potential and movie-magic success (thus profit/rape unfetter/undeterred by consequence): "There was absolutely no good aspect about this whole story. The tragedy, which I think about every day, had an enormous impact on my career from which I may possibly never recover (emphasis, me; source: Nigel Andrews's "Golden Boy Howls at the Moon: John Landis was feted in Hollywood for his comedies – then it all changed," 1996). In other words, "Me, me, me!"

Faust is only a sympathetic tragedy if the hero actually dies and learns something valuable at the end; i.e., to help others, not pity himself. In real life, Landis does neither of those things, but invokes Great Men of the past to valorize his own giant mistakes harming other people in great numbers; re, Marx: "History repeats first in tragedy and then in farce." Faust—as a parable about self-destructive vanity in pursuit of glory through demonic magic—shines a light on human failings when given no barriers; i.e., on the path towards total power in pursuit of fatal knowledge (or vice versa): faced with any such device (wish, want or desire) as something to gain, the Great Man of History self-destructs to take others with him—doing in ways we can learn from and use to survive and prevent (through systemic change by raising awareness): people like Landis from harming us in our own lives.

Such things might seem wholly silly and serious; i.e., like Raimi's serious-to-spoof movies, the original Beowulf (or the Welsh Arthurian cycle from the same pre-to-Old-English period, the 700s), Marlowe's idiotic Faust, Cervantes' Don Quixote (1605) or Shakespeare's Macbeth and its own dire conclusion: "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Told by idiots or about them, stories following the Faustian tradition and its seminal tragedy speak to historical-material problems that can only change by recognizing these stories as they exist and unfold; i.e., in between fiction and nonfiction, onstage and off, for workers or against them, using demonic language in either case during liminal expression.

"To critique power, you must go where it is." The Faustian past is a wealth of fatal knowledge we inquisitors must learn from when hearing demons and angels talk to us (to torture out of us and vice versa). We must, lest we make the same mistakes that Faust did: refusing to listen to others while acting like a fragile, privileged white male. And to those of you who might insist he had it good, remember that, while the system protects powerful men, it ultimately preys on them, then self-destructs on loop; re: Faust didn't just die at the end, he died an ignominious death—Hell's "angels" (demons) tearing him literally limb from limb. Such duality would seem to prophesize labor punching up, but it also speaks to state cops punching down, inside the Capitalocene (criminogenic conditions/immiseration), and to state shift sitting on the cusp of final planetary defeat (whose Capitalist Realism they will exploit, as always, to maintain themselves and their own Faustian positions; e.g., Elon Musk, Donald Trump, Barrack Obama, Joe Biden, etc).

The Shadow of Pygmalion, then, is also the Shadow of Faust/Cycle of Kings, and the bad bargains he made with state devils constitute Aguirre's infernal concentric pattern: a proto-fascist cryptonymy (false power) demonstrating the myriad ways in which the state ultimately cannibalizes "Faust" to keep itself alive, then blame that on "the Devil" (classic Red Scare translating anti-Semitic myth to anti-Marxist dogma; i.e., Cultural Bolshevism and Marxism espoused by bad state actors policing demonology during future class, culture and race wars—with those involving shifting scapegoats and spearheaded by Faustian useful idiots and short-term benefactors; e.g., Zionism).

1592 based on older German stories, also wrote 1590's Jew of Malta—basically a meaner and even more anti-Semitic version of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice); i.e., if you want to know what bigots think, watch what they make/summon and how they debate themselves demonically/angelically.

So as much as I think Charles Matthews is 100% right when he opines

There are things in it, however, that wouldn't pass muster today, including the blatant objectification of the young women, especially in the scene in which Bluto spies on them undressing. And would any reputable filmmaker today dare to include the scene in which Pinto debates whether to rape the unconscious Clorette, abetted by a roguish devil and a prissy-voiced angel? There are touches of unchecked homophobia throughout [not to mention the whole bar scene being mega-racist] (source: "Animal House (1978," 2017).

there's still something telling about all of the movie's unchecked bigotry and subtler dislike for anyone who isn't a white, privileged, drunken, frat boy asshole.

This isn't me agreeing with the clearly unlikeable Dean (whose admittedly sick burn "fat, drunk and stupid is no way to go through life, son" apes Bolingbroke's critique of Falstaff to Prince Harry in Henry VI, except they're all acting like that), but to play devil's advocate, nor are the heroes of the movie above reproach; i.e., they're white, smug and princely "man whores" but the worst sort, and the kind that slashers in the '80s might want dead not to discourage sex, but rape (the revenge of the abused against their nerdy abusers given a pass, as Landis does: "Knowledge is good; boys will be boys, girls will be mothers"). Landis' debut is, by its own admission, a "futile and stupid gesture done on somebody's part" (and one that Belushi—the Falstaff's Falstaff³¹⁴—would not survive).

³¹⁴ From top to bottom, the movie's "heroes" are a bunch of entitled drunks who aren't college freshmen; the old crowd have been in school for seven years (making them at least twenty-five, when the movie starts). They simultaneously use collage to belittle those actually working—stealing and cheating every chance they get—fear people of color they nonetheless hire for basement concerts, evoke a Dionysian orgy ("toga party") that sees them getting women drunk and then presumably raping them (no one in the movie is shown drunk during these scenes except Belushi, and he's too cool for sex), and then joke about all of this being "pointless" in ways that conveniently benefit them (the pre-credits eulogies celebrate the various characters' accomplishments, failing up).

National Lampoon—and by extension, SNL—has always been a white moderate "Faustus factory"; i.e., the screenwriters making the "snobs vs slobs" story self-important and uncommitted save it being about fascist American youth and moderate fascist American youth: a pack of privileged scoundrels who use and abuse everyone around them, stand for nothing but their own personal gain ("Might as well have joined the fucking Peace Corps!"), dodge the draft (which is valid) but also accountability for abusing others (which isn't valid), invent an internal conspiracy about it ("double-secret probation," which does critique neoliberal abuse but only as it affects them), host luxurious, expensive and recklessly self-indulgent "Roman" revivals/debauches through frat-house fraternity cults of masculinity ("the Deltas"), and basically whitewash every bigotry under the sun while infiltrating the Free Love movement/corrupt genuine activism with American Liberalist hogwash: "It's all one big party" so we might as well have a good time!" The movie is nostalgic about rape as something to get away with, washing it all down with a good false-rebellion story. Well played, pigs.

I grew up watching Animal House on VHS, remembering Meyerowitz' Sunday-newspaper approach to the cover art (above). I didn't fully grasp as a little girl just how awful all of these guys were/are. That came later—meaning when I actually went to school and learned something about literature and sex (and having my fair share of each re: Constance, Zeuhl, Jadis and Cuwu). The Deltas clearly suck, then, but are the Faustian brainchildren of Landis and company's own comorbid hubris, first and foremost; i.e., as Meyerowitz explains, the stories about Delta were autobiographical: "In 2006, Chris Miller, whose short stories in the Lampoon were the inspiration for the Animal House movie, which he co-wrote, published The Real Animal House. [...] Chris is a great guy. Buy his book!" (ibid.)

To it, the state thrives on rape to survive, including such slaps on the wrist extending to bad jokes; i.e., Landis' jokes are rape, the dilapidated old house a site of conquest for men and trauma for women surviving men stealing women's innocence. All the more unfortunate, then, given the movie's performances are undeniably colorful and energetic—spunk that would've been better spent towards humanizing college life in a sex-positive way (the sex life of activists is still a riot, if Shelley or myself are anything to go by). Furthermore, this wasn't the work of down-on-their-luck blue-collar types, Kristi Turnquist writes, but gentrified, upper-crust nerds "raising Cain" and gentrifying sex, drugs and rock 'n roll to get their rape fantasies in:

Sure, the movie was sold as slobs vs snobs. But the snobbery was actually baked into the supposed "slob" side. The full title, let's not forget, is National Lampoon's Animal House.

That's National Lampoon, as in the magazine spinoff of the Harvard Lampoon, the humor publication created by students at Harvard University, known more for its big-deal Ivy League alumni (Conan O'Brien, Colin Jost of "Saturday Night Live," "Spy" magazine cofounder Kurt Andersen, etc.) than its lovable losers (source: "40 Years Later, Can We Sill Stomach Animal House?" 2018).

That being said, the movie is still a period piece of sorts that—through the writers—provides a highly illustrative window into the partially imaginary past. This includes a lovely (and accurate) critique of Milton's Paradise Lost (with Sutherland's professor making a cameo in my book, several times), but also that of the Vietnam War/Civil Rights period:

Animal House is a period piece twice over. It's set in 1962, when John F. Kennedy was president, and since it was filmed in 1977, it offers a window through which we see attitudes about what was funny back then, even if they make us raise our eyebrows now (ibid.).

In true Faustian tradition, then, everyone acts like it was just "harmless fun"—devaluing genuine academic achievement/activism that would dismantle the system that privileges them, then pimping their way through school and valorizing it afterwards while presenting themselves as something they're not (actual scientists or great thinkers). American liberals are truly the worst/epitome of privilege for the cruel and the mediocre (and don't get me started on SNL; e.g., Will Farrell and similar actors endorsing the War on Terror ["Osama's Pep Talk," 12/01/01] yet whitewashing themselves with token friends [Will and Harper, 2024]. I hate that guy).

In short, the old boys club who wrote Animal House (and similar stories) thought they knew everything/excluded everything for everyone but their target audience; re: like Marlowe's Faustus (with Nietzsche's 1888 Ecce Homo often being paraphrased as, "all fiction is inherently auto-biographical" from "Hear me! For I am such and such a person").

Taking all of this into account, the good-vs-evil, virtue-vs-vice argument is still quite useful for "reading the room" of latter-day Faust revivals; i.e., it's not delivered quite the same way as Halloween was, for example (also 1978), but you still can see the neo-conservatism at work: 'fraidy-cat Doctor Loomis and faceless killing machine Michael Myers running around like headless chickens, mid-moral-panic, while poor Laurie Strode thinks about fucking Ben Tramer (or not).

In turn, the recursive desire to curiously and savagely punch up at men would be coopted by said men to triangulate the same women against other marginalized groups again (e.g., Sleepaway Camp punching down against trans women as much as Friday the 13th demonized mental illness and bereavement, and Halloween antagonized mental disorders in children; i.e., according to the same Freudian garbage Hitchcock espoused in 1960's Psycho, abjecting cis-het domestic abuse once more onto a crossdressing impostor invading white women's spaces).

This means since well before the '70s Final Girl and back a hundred years during the 1870s; i.e., when white women were granted property and fascist feminists appeared, but also in the 1790s when Radcliffe wrote her Gothic novels alongside Mary Wollstonecraft's *Vindication of the Rights of Women*³¹⁵. "Fate never changes," Carpenter's teacher character opines; for him—but also Landis and Marlowe before them—such things are "stuck" as a matter of argument playing out, on and offstage. In a world where Nazis openly try to shout and hide their

³¹⁵ Whose consensus on "women" leans away from abstract and arguably towards a limiting of the category to her own experiences as white; i.e., as No Fly on the WALL writes,

When Mary [Wollstonecraft] published her polemic on Feminist Philosophy in 1792, against the tumultuous background of the French Revolution, she concerned herself with the rights afforded to "woman" – an abstract category. However, in [Wollstonecraft's] world, there was seemingly something in the body social that drew all women together and merged their experiences. In today's society, the difference in the female experience because of intersections such as race and class have become increasingly more apparent and in the case of black women – as men and women of other ethnicities – try to define who we are for us (source: "A Vindication of the Rights of Black Women: A Contribution to a Discourse," 2013).

In short, Mary's work—like her daughter's—makes for an excellent start, but needs to be built upon and harvested for parts, not taken at face value. Academics tend to write from privilege; we must intersect all of these, regardless of our privilege or register of discourse: using academic ideas for commonplace solutions, including camping Marlowe's ghost.

arguments, then, anytime they self-report is an opportunity to dissect and pick their admittedly small brains. It behooves us to study their arguments, because they think themselves immune to demonic reprisals. So did Faust.

Fascism is garbage, so build from that to parse the hieroglyphics/cryptonymy as useful; or as Porpentine writes in "Hot Allostatic Load" (2015)": "Build the shittiest thing possible. Build out of trash because all I have is trash. Trash materials, trash bodies, trash brain syndrome. Build in the gaps between storms of chronic pain. Build inside the storms" (source). So cryptomimesis, then.

To that, when the self-righteous demonize/police the whore, we whores punch up from Hell to remind them we're human, and they're about as cool as "Pinto" was. Hit 'em where it hurts—i.e., the female castration fantasy being to fuck men with genitals both sides treat unironically as swords and sheaths—the difference between them being the "phallic" female party makes a hole where one doesn't exist, and generally to avenge past abuse inflicted on her because she's a woman (e.g., Kinji Fukasaku's 2000 Battle Royale, below); it's supposed to make men in the audience go "ouch-ouch-ouch" and cross their legs: "If you won't listen to us being polite, try this on for size!"

Let's unpack that (twelve pages plus footnotes), if only because genital mutilation, unironic rape and full-throated torture porn make up such a huge part of the canonical torture scheme our own media is tackling (to which we'll be subverting canon, as we go). Our target for this critique won't be Radcliffe or Faust, but someone after both of them who is and isn't Landis: Roger Ebert and his weird blind spot/obsession with geek shows, torture porn, whores, and demon lovers (male, intersex or female). The man was a sex pest of unusual excess and extraordinary camouflage, pimping Medusa through the soundbite length of old-school movie reviews apologizing for rape yet bashing exploitation media seeking to take things outside the profit motive.

Sadly he's not the only one. For starters, such "Iron Women" having their revenge predate Medusa, but reducing them to primordial Antiquity is a Freudian trick, and one that does little good, here in the present. Tracing that palimpsestuous lineage into Shakespeare's Lady Macbeth or Elisabetta Sirani's various vengeful paintings surviving her own rape (and humiliating trial and torture-by-thumbscrews), we're left with a historical-material trend of rape performance that more privileged people will puzzle over and arbitrate as they see fit.

Alas, such is Ebert, who readily decries I Spit on Your Grave (1978) for being revenge porn (which it is) in so many words

A vile bag of garbage named I Spit on Your Grave is playing in Chicago theaters this week. It is a movie so sick, reprehensible and contemptible that I can hardly believe it's playing in respectable [emphasis, me] theaters, such as Plitt's United Artists. But it is. Attending it was one of the most depressing experiences of, my life (source: 1980 review).

yet arbitrarily celebrates The Last House on the Left (1972) as "a tough, bitter little sleeper of a movie that's about four times as good as you'd expect" (source: 1972 review).

Of course, we could look at the directors for a clue—the Israeli-American Meir Zarchi versus Wes Craven as a white, status-quo homeboy—but I think it's much more telling, quick and germane to Faust if we note Ebert's double standard; i.e., there's a class character to his attitudes, which become much less critical, in terms of critical thought, and much more reactionary when faced with things he doesn't approve of: "This is ok to talk about if I find it artful."

To that, Ebert (and those like Ebert) approve of vengeance they can understand—with Ebert himself siding with Craven's vengeful middle-class parents versus Zarchi's single white girl with a mean streak:

This movie covers the same philosophical territory as Sam Peckinpah's Straw Dogs (1971), and is more hard-nosed about it: Sure, a man's home is his castle, but who wants to be left with nothing but a castle and a lifetime memory of horror? (ibid.)

For Ebert, then, rape scenes are tolerable not if they have a substantial message (nihilism is literally the opposite of substance), but as long as they comment on the futility of revenge/destruction of the nuclear home, or have some deeper thematic purpose that strokes his middle-class sense of values letting him decide what is acceptable and what isn't for all peoples; re: the ghost of the counterfeit furthering the process of abjection for the middle class (what Freud calls the Superego).

These are all markers for American Liberalism decaying into fascism (which America pioneered, not the Germans), and Ebert's literally qualifying rape provided it offends his values the way he—as a paying customer and a Pulitzer-prize-winning critic—wants them to; i.e., he wants to be entertained, first and foremost, by a peep show, not a geek show as "Goldilocks rape." Except doing so only obscures abuse, and doesn't diminish it. It's a Faustian bargain made with Hollywood, Ebert policing the medium in ways that, again, are largely reactionary much of the time but dressed up in white moderation.

In short, Ebert likes things to be "meaningful" if they aren't sanitized, but honestly prefers the Radcliffean sanitization, most of all:

I have seen four films inspired by the same 13th century folk ballad: Ingmar Bergman's The Virgin Spring (1960), Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972), David DeFalco's Chaos (2005) and now Dennis Iliadis' remake of the 1972 film, also titled The Last House on the Left. / What I know for sure is that the Bergman film is the best (source: 2009 review).

Ebert's job, then, is similar to Radcliffe's: to assign value as "critique," thus operate as a cop taking state payment (his reviews span over four decades); i.e., his work is full of arbitrary white superiority moralizing and abject value judgements according to how that offends his simultaneously delicate and insensible moral code: while simultaneously condoning violence that befits an American liberal like himself (the same qualities apply to Faust and Radcliffe). Anything he can't stomach, he abjects, on par with Coleridge winging about Matthew Lewis; re: "We stare and tremble!" (as well as Leonard Maltin, but less choosy than him; e.g., Ebert liked Alien (review, 2003) and Maltin did not³¹⁶).

³¹⁶ "I never thought about the film reflecting societal issues of the late 1970s," Maltin writes in 2019; "after all, Star Wars came out a year earlier and offered total escape to a huge and responsive audience [emphasis, me]. Looking back, however, it makes perfect sense that Alien can now be seen as a reflection of its time period" (source: "Memory: the Origins of Alien"). Like, no shit, dude; it only took your forty years to figure that out? Alien was always a reflection of its time period. "Jesus wept," capital well and truly breeds idiots to whitewash its offenses; i.e., trying to conceal said offenses with glittering Hollywood stupidity and calling anything outside of that "the darkness of human nature" (re: Freud abjecting spectres of Marx and Marx' historical materialism). "Get fucked, nerd!" Also, is it just me, or does Maltin smile weird?

I say this as a weird iconoclastic nerd; show me a weird canonical nerd like Maltin or Ebert and I will show you an idiot stuck in the Man Box. Just like Faust, Maltin's ignorance was willful and paid; i.e., he and Ebert choosing to view stories as "pure escapism" for a paycheck capital found useful. They're basically blind to allegory and coasting by on a system where allegory isn't useful to them (and which they'll abject anything that comes in, from outside Plato's cave); theft is useful to them, thus rape inside a system where their Faustian ignorance helps preserve the status quo through escapist fantasies built on rape inside-outside themselves. Shame on you both!

But during the rape scene of Zarchi's protagonist, an ugly truth remains, regardless of what Ebert thinks: women do desire revenge against the men who rape them (or who rape those they love, including a shared sisterhood among women they don't personally know); i.e., as a half-real matter of trauma they cannot escape, only live with: its liminal-but-nonetheless-true confusions of predator/prey and pleasure/pain, whereupon rape as a theatrical and everyday device (weapon of terror) happens in ways that frankly shouldn't be sanitized/abjected, subjective or not; re: "Do you know what the most terrifying thing in the world is? It's fear!" The difference between Hitchcock and Michael Powell's Peeping Tom is the latter's voyeurism tries to humanize the process (and its German-coded villain) while holding Faustian men of science accountable (versus letting them testify as expert witnesses; re: Psycho).

In other words, why should a rich white American man like Ebert get to decide what is or isn't acceptable during horror vis-à-vis women who, all things considered, probably have survived rape (and which Hollywood exploits in stories like Grave, Alien or Psycho). If something sickens him, it is simply "wrong" and deserves "low marks" extending to the other people in the venue he thinks he's better than (by "actually protecting women" with his stupid review system); all these things are pointless to him, despite the fact they're pointedly talking about rape in ways that challenge Ebert's constitution—i.e., by making him run away because he didn't get his money's worth or have his pre-existing views validated by a like-minded crowd. God, forbid right? Fragile Faust, freaky Freud. Fuck face.

And not to defend tasteless, straight-male-authored exploitation porn too much, but I struggle to think what someone like Ebert might say about angry art that isn't overtly punching down at disabled people; i.e., regarding media that makes him as uncomfortable as Radcliffe once was with Matthew Lewis:

I would have liked to talk with the woman in the back row, the one with the feminist solidarity for the movie's heroine. I wanted to ask If she'd been appalled by the movie's hour of rape scenes. As it was, at the film's end I walked out of the theater quickly, feeling unclean, ashamed and depressed.

This movie is an expression of the most diseased and perverted darker human natures, Because it is made artlessly, it flaunts its motives: There is no reason to see this movie except to be entertained by the sight of sadism and suffering. As a critic, I have never condemned the use of violence in films if I felt the filmmakers had an artistic reason for employing it. I Spit on Your Grave does not. It is a geek show (re: "I Spit on Your Grave," 1980).

Ebert's own moral outrage suggests he "knows better" than the feminist does, his gut (and instinct to tuck tail and run) betraying his stoic veneer (re: Victor Frankenstein).

It's precisely this kind of unchecked hubris that Zarchi's woman seeks to castrate; re: Creed's revenge being not just the refusing of victimhood, but of subversive, even exploitative/transgressive reclamation of the Medusa, during the abjection process; i.e., as a victim of rape discredited by male know-it-alls (whose sex-positive universal liberation, I argue, has the whore's revenge against profit in all its forms: Ebert as having opinions he conflates as "correct," vis-à-vis Weber's Protestant ethic, because they've made his formerly unlucrative position into an illustrious, well-paying career). Ebert says much and little about Grave, keeping mum about the quiet part because he feels guilty in ways he—a privileged, white, straight and ultimately self-important asshole—can't process.

Then again, I know what Ebert would say if he could, because something like The Penguin's (2024) Sofia Falcone blowing out Johnny Viti's brains (an offer he couldn't refuse) is perfectly acceptable for Ebert's ilk because violence is fine if it's dressed up as not grotesque; i.e., on par with Ebert salivating over The Godfather films (source: 1997 review) despite them largely being the glorification of immigrant violence and Jacobean theatre for its own sake (as long as it's shot nice, right?). But anything that veers off into abject freakshow territory is automatically "without merit," for Ebert. It's a huge blind spot, but also one he picks-and-chooses regarding those patrolling the freakshow runways. These are not gods, but vain, stupid pimps passing judgement on whores in chains; the worst jailors are the ones who believe they're right and who pity you as "reprobate" (re: Jadis, a genderfluid neoliberal, torturing me, a queer an-Com).

Follow the leader is a fool's errand, and Faust is the biggest idiot of them all (though men like Ebert aping him are even dumber in hindsight). Again, this comes from privilege, which for Ebert is white, American, middle-class and male: a selective diet, eating his victims served to him in ways he deems "palatable." There's probably tons of exceptions—e.g., Katherine Dunn's Geek Love (1989; source: "The New Geek Cinema"³¹⁷, 2012), Cameron's Aliens (source: 1986

³¹⁷ Aping Susan Sontag, Ebert writes, "There is no indication that the boy is horrified by the man's Nazi past; he is more like a fascinated voyeur." He continues:

I should add that Very Bad Things is intended as a comedy. Apt Pupil, based on a Stephen King novella, plays as a horror film. Happiness cannot easily be categorized, but I think it stands above the other films, not with them. (Two other new films that are superficially similar, Clay Pigeons and Home Fries, are more traditional character-driven comedy thrillers that contain a lot of gore but stay within generally acceptable boundaries.)

All of these films owe something to John Carpenter's Halloween (1978), an enormous success that suggested a way into Hollywood for unknown young directors. If you don't have major stars and you don't have a big budget, then the genre itself can be your selling point. Horror films, like sex films, do not depend on marquee names. The content itself is the star.

Horror as a genre has been expanded, in some of these films, by a mean streak of cruelty, masked as irony. Once horror films sympathized with victims who were being threatened. Then they started using point-of-view shots to identify with the slashers instead of the victims. In recent years there are two more refinements: (1) a single victim is not enough, and most of the movies string together killing scenes like an all-hit radio format; and (2) there is a fascination with bizarre kinds of pain and torture not seen since the Marquis de Sade on a good day.

Combine these ingredients with the two most easily assimilated trademarks of Quentin Tarantino (colorfully arcane and vulgar dialogue, and labyrinthine plotting) and you have the elements that the New Geeks are exultantly recycling (source).

Then, in the greatest of ironies, Ebert has the utter temerity to apologize for a racist, sexist pig like Tarantino of all people—all while insisting there is "no irony" in the other examples he gives. And maybe there isn't among the directors he mentions. I don't know them; but also it goes beyond them, Derrida's "inside of the text" speaking to other people in the room besides Ebert. They don't count, in his eyes, because his gut is ultimately his guide for the rest of the world, and that has already been coded; i.e., by his hopelessly Faustian brain, its opinions informed by the socio-material conditions around him. Furthermore, Ebert's fetishizing of women may not be as overt as Tarantino (above), but he still apologizes for a Hollywood predator while doing so. To apologize for a predator is to be one, yourself.

review³¹⁸), or Re-Animator (1985; source: 1985 review³¹⁹)—but those exceptions also prove the rule. So did Radcliffe uphold the status quo by being the proverbial "rare exception" (all the more ironic, in her case, given she was so moderate. Pot, meet Kettle). So does Ebert administer "criticism" in short, pithy reviews that pass themselves off as Eternal Wisdom; i.e., like God giving Moses those clay tablets (re: the storage device of the ancient world). Except Ebert, like Moses and God, is king of Fuck Mountain; i.e., dogma is dogma, meaning we can camp his ghost's secular demonic gibberish as much as we (and our Satanic apostasy) want. God is dead, so is Roger Ebert, and we can dance on their graves together:

More to the point, Ebert's balancing act becomes the thing to worship, also known as centrism.

Anything that "tips the scales" in one direction or the other turns Ebert's stomach and we can't have that... which conveniently ignores what doesn't turn his stomach, ³¹⁸ "The ads for Aliens claim that this movie will frighten you as few movies have," Ebert writes, "and, for once, the ads don't lie. The movie is so intense that it creates a problem for me as a reviewer: Do I praise its craftsmanship, or do I tell you it left me feeling wrung out and unhappy? It has been a week since I saw it, so the emotions have faded a little, leaving with me an appreciation of the movie's technical qualities. But when I walked out of the theater, there were knots in my stomach from the film's roller-coaster ride of violence. This is not the kind of movie where it means anything to say you 'enjoyed' it" (source).

As usual, Ebert is the Frankenstein man of feeling repressing his emotions, but also, like Faust, ignores them and keeps going back for more; i.e., to torture himself and miss the point. The fact that someone could do this for over forty years is frankly impressive.

³¹⁹ "One of the most boring experiences on Earth is a trash movie without the courage of its lack of convictions," Ebert writes. He continues:

If it only wants to be cynical, it becomes lifeless in every moment – a bad dream on the screen. One of the pleasures of the movies, however, is to find a movie that chooses a disreputable genre and then tries with all its might to transcend the genre, to go over the top into some kind of artistic vision, however weird.

Stuart Gordon's Re-Animator is a pleasure like that, a frankly gory horror movie that finds a rhythm and a style that make it work in a cockeyed, offbeat sort of way. It's charged up by the tension between the director's desire to make a good movie, and his realization that few movies about mad scientists and dead body parts are ever likely to be very good. The temptation is to take a camp approach to the material, to mock it, as Paul Morrissey did in Andy Warhol's Frankenstein. Gordon resists that temptation, and creates a livid, bloody, deadpan exercise in the theater of the undead (source).

Except, Frankenstein was always camp (and Warhol was a dick). Ebert's simultaneously parroting Frederic Jameson's "that boring and exhausted paradigm" and Zizek's "the return of the living dead being the fundamental fantasy of contemporary mass culture" (re: Castricano). It takes a certain amount of vanity to punch up at gods, even false gods and their idols; I've always been a little vain, and found doing so useful as a matter of self-preservation helping all workers.

mid-abjection, but instead offends other people³²⁰ reversing abjection in ways he cannot let stand (e.g., the woman in the movie theatre during I Spit on Your Grave).

While white moderates are, on their face, seemingly harder to critique on account of their polished façade qualifying rape media (which the Gothic largely concerns), the fact remains: centrists love to arbitrate in ways that not only dictate their essentialized place in the world, but remind them how clever they think they are. Dude's literally marketing his opinion as "better" than others³²¹ (and using the

³²⁰ E.g., A Fish Called Wanda (1988):

And then there is the matter of the three murdered dogs. One friend of mine already says she won't see A Fish Called Wanda because she has heard that dogs die in it (she is never, of course, reluctant to attend movies where people die). I tried to explain to her that the death of a pet is, of course, a tragic thing. But when the object is to inspire a heart attack in a little old lady who is a key prosecution witness, and when her little darling is crushed by a falling safe, well, you've just got to make a few sacrifices in the name of comedy (source).

Ebert is happy to draw his own lines in the sand, provided he thinks something is funny. In short, for him there are deserving victims and undeserving victims—a concept, once again, informed by his privilege (thus ignorance) and hypocrisy.

³²¹ E.g., Your Movie Sucks (2007) being a classic example of self-appointed elitism, in-group snobbery and monumental self-deception. This being said, I agree with Ebert when he says that Deuce Bigalow: American Gigolo (2005) sucks:

After watching Deuce Bigalow: American Gigolo himself, Ebert published a zero-star review of the film, describing it as "aggressively bad, as if it wants to cause suffering to the audience. The best thing about it is that it runs for only 75 minutes." After this, he then directly addressed Schneider's poor response to Goldstein's review and petty bickering after the actor had questioned the validity of the critic's response due to the fact that he hadn't won a Pulitzer prize.

Ebert responded to this in his review by saying, "As chance would have it, I have won the Pulitzer Prize, and so I am qualified. Speaking in my official capacity as a Pulitzer Prize winner, Mr. Schneider, your movie sucks." Interestingly enough, Ebert's 2007 book Your Movie Sucks was inspired by this damning statement, a compilation of his most scathing reviews.

Despite the public back-and-forth and wave of creative insults, the pair found a peaceful equilibrium in 2007 after Ebert's cancer diagnosis. The critic revealed that he had received a touching level of support and well wishes, with flowers being sent to him from Schneider himself, along with a note wishing him a speedy recovery signed "his least favourite movie star."

This gesture moved Ebert, and later revisited his controversial 2005 film, offering a written truce in which he referred to the flowers sent by Schneider and said they "were a reminder, if I needed one, that although Rob Schneider might (in my opinion) have made a bad movie, he is not a bad man, and no doubt tried to make a wonderful movie, and hopes to again. I hope so, too." (source: Emily Ruuskanen's "The Feud between Roger Ebert and Rob Schneider," 2024).

While it's not difficult to discount Schneider (whose only good movie is Surf Ninjas, 1993), it's also not untrue that people who use their credentials (however sarcastically) to settle a quick beef are demonstrably petty—and I am not above this; re (from the Poetry Module's "Spilling Tea):

In regards to the further reading I supplied, I don't wish to "flash my badge" needlessly. All the same, I did write my MA ("Lost in Necropolis") and PhD (my thesis volume, aka Volume Zero, 2023) on Metroidvania, and have several more books in the works including this volume Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

Roman gladiatorial signal for "spare him/kill him" to further qualify his statements to his audience). White straight people, like Faust, need to feel important; i.e., "Who has two thumbs and a bottomless ego? This guy!" (another weird canonical nerd with a weird smile): the shit-eating grin of a man who made it big and thinks he's untouchable/the emperor having no clothes (not even death can save you from me, old man. I have exactly zero reservations when vandalizing your dubious legacy).

Of course, such anti-geek-show arguments also predate Ebert and even William Lindsay Gresham's Nightmare Alley (1946); i.e., dating back to Radcliffe, herself; re: missing the point of her rival's own scandalous works and valorizing her own, with "On the Supernatural in Poetry." "Terror" is superior for Radcliffe and Ebert because it hides rape while still parading it inside a restless labyrinth. This is their privilege talking, not their oppression. It's profoundly unsexy in ways we queer sex workers have to intersectionally camp and do better than, mid-exquisite-"torture."

So far be it from me to discount either literary technique—and I certainly don't think I Spit on Your Grave (or any geek show) is High Art (which geek shows

(written when the sample was live, but the volume was not)—a reality that is often questioned by Dunning-Kruger types who project/transfer their own inadequacies onto experts such as myself. This isn't hypothetical; I once had someone on Reddit (there's a surprise) attack me for writing about Garfield and the Gothic (Persephone van der Waard's "Is Garfield \(1978-present\) Gothic?" 2019), requiring me to essentially tell them, "I'm not your dad."

To joust and argue about silly things/debates is something that people (educated or not) simply do. "Water under a bridge," and all that.

That being said, this doesn't change the fact that Ebert can't explain why Schneider's movie sucks in dialectical-material ways (thus in ways useful to active, conscious rebellion). Nor does he actually realize that Rob Schneider is quite awful, actually (source: Ed Dickson's "The Red-Pilling of Rob Schneider," 2023). Ebert is blind to this because he a) doesn't view this world outside his own dogma, thus endless privilege and status, and b) Schneider bribed him with Christian charity functioning as capital (re: Weber). Greed is greed, and Ebert's such a massive whore for recognition that he'll overlook Schneider's boundless flaws through the cheapest of gestures, then call it "good." People who reflect that kind of selective vanity—and who defend the elite (versus using cryptonymy to systemically help workers)—are giant pieces of shit. Ebert is (or was) a giant piece of shit.

Furthermore, as both men categorically demonstrate, good deeds do not outweigh bad ones unless you choose to let them; i.e., it's possible to do charity and still be giant pieces of shit—a fact compounded by Ebert turning a blind eye! And if his aforementioned cancer diagnosis might help explain that (softening in his old age/impending doom), it doesn't change the fact that Ebert the person sucks. Cancer isn't a cure-all for American exceptionalism/centrism. That's just Ebert belonging to the "good team" and administering "goodness" to those he deems "worthy." It's bourgeois.

That's my dialectical-material critique of the man as Faustian, living as he died (and someone I used to respect, and previously handle with more "kid gloves"; e.g., Persephone van der Waard's "Ebert's Folly: "Elevating" Horror Movies with Suspense, part 1," 2019): as a piece of shit. And frankly I don't care who that offends; only cowards (who deserve criticism) hide behind their fans or their family (with Neil Gaiman hiding behind all of the above; source: Lila Shapiro).

upend on purpose, from Walpole onwards; re: Baldrick³²²)—but I likewise don't think one is better than the other (nor do I condone putting anything on a pedestal; re: the idea of High Art essentially amounts to canon). Furthermore, High Art so very often apologizes for rape by "weeding the jury" and doctoring the testimony to a select few of special victims and expert witnesses; i.e., that get special say in what happens "exclusively" to them, thus leant special credence by Ebert going down on Radcliffe (now there's an image I can't unsee).

Admittedly this happens through Hitchcock's own mastery of suspense (and only if neither man actually knew who Radcliffe was). All the same, Ebert's idea of value—i.e., as a judgement to administer—is tied to art, which for him includes gangster films and Hitchcockian torture porn; e.g., the rape scenes from Once Upon a Time in America (1980) or *Frenzy*³²³ are "fit for viewing" as long as they tug on ³²² Re: From his introduction to The Oxford Book of Gothic Tales (2009): "A Gothic novel or tale will almost certainly offend classical tastes and rational principles, but it will not do so by urging any positive view of the Middle Ages" (source).

³²³ Ebert's double standard for Hitchcock (a famously sexist man who tortured his actresses) is plain:

Alfred Hitchcock's Frenzy is a return to old forms by the master of suspense, whose newer forms have pleased movie critics but not his public. This is the kind of thriller Hitchcock was making in the 1940s, filled with macabre details, incongruous humor, and the desperation of a man convicted of a crime he didn't commit.

The only 1970s details are the violence and the nudity (both approached with a certain grisly abandon that has us imagining Psycho without the shower curtain [and Hayes Code]). It's almost as if Hitchcock, at seventy-three, was consciously attempting to do once again what he did better than anyone else. His films since Psycho (1960) struck out into unfamiliar territory and even got him involved in the Cold War (Torn Curtain) and the fringes of fantasy (The Birds). Here he's back at his old stand. (source: 1972 review).

Ebert's apathy is wholly astounding, his relish at what is literally torture porn (the strangulation BDSM scene in Frenzy going on for nearly two minutes*) is completely gross, and his repeated giving of Alfred-fucking-Hitchcock a pass is utterly telling: "boundaries for me, not for thee." Fuck you and Hitchcock! God, you're both weird, and not in a good way!

*By extension, Hitchcock's entire canon—like Radcliffe's before him—is thoroughly dedicated to feminine desire, vis-à-vis Wolff, as attached unironically to mutilative harm. Where's the irony, Ebert?

his heartstrings³²⁴ and/or "play him like a piano" (a comment he's made about Hitchcock from the director describing his own work; e.g., his 2002 Signs review): Hitchcock torturing women is a necessary sacrifice provided it doesn't feel "too real" and tickles Ebert's "ivories." But behind any illusion is systemic hard if unaddressed.

Torture porn is torture porn, and no matter how "suspenseful" the movie is, or "black" its humor finds itself, Hitchcock is polishing the turd of exceptionally ³²⁴ Ebert doesn't even mention the graphic and extended rape scene in his 1984 review of the extended (220-minute) cut for Leone's film. It "just doesn't come up," for him; i.e., versus John Larsen, who writes,

And yet Leone—whose spaghetti-Western poetry (The Good, The Bad and The Ugly; Once Upon a Time in the West) was spun under the hot glare of the desert sun—still gives Once Upon a Time in America a warm glow. The sequences from Noodles' youth (where he's played by Scott Tiler) are a playful mixture of Our Gang shorts and The 400 Blows. And there's a sexiness to the Prohibition segments—a titillating combination of girls and gunplay—that belies the pain and suffering on the screen. Even the sequences set in the 1960s are less of a reckoning (which is how you could describe Martin Scorsese's The Irishman, also with De Niro) and more of a wistful remembrance of the good old days. Add a gorgeous Ennio Morricone score that softens the brutality, making it fuzzy, and you have an epic of blinkered nostalgia.

That "sexiness" is worth spending more time on. There is a disturbing, virgin-whore dynamic at play in Once Upon a Time in America, with Elizabeth McGovern—as Noodles' childhood crush-turned-Hollywood-starlet—on one end and Tuesday Weld—as a rape victim-turned-willing-plaything—on the other. Every other woman we meet is somewhere in between those two (although most fall in Weld's direction). If a female character isn't a sexual object in this story, then she's a victim of violence. And in the two rape scenes those elements are queasily mixed (reminiscent of the way Leone treated Claudia Cardinale in Once Upon a Time in the West) [source].

Silence is rape, and apologizing for it by keeping quiet in ways that Ebert enjoys. Such men are in love with their idea of past, much like Radcliffe (a woman chasing a patriarchal heteronormative profit motive) was, and Ebert doing so in ways that "keep mum" about rape (practically holding a finger to his lips [and a hand over the woman's mouth] before going "Shh..."). They like gagging it, kettling and abjecting the ghost of the counterfeit while capitalizing on her eternal abuse. Virgin or whore, she's their Omelas victim (also, there's the anti-Semitic element—with Leone's entire movie literally being about a "backstabbing Jew": Noodles is played by De Niro, a career Italian-American bandit, onscreen, this time playing a Jewish gangster who betrayed all his friends. Eat your heart out, Mussolini!): to fetishize the power imbalance advancing patriarchal narratives, then keeping quiet when you could have spoken out. Faced with it in trashy ways (or rather what Ebert calls trash, given Leone's movies are trashy in ways he calls art*), he just pulls a Dennis from Always Sunny and shouts at the screen: "Sickness, be gone!" He's the Golden God!

*The two aren't mutually exclusive, but Ebert treats them like they are when it suits his rapacious, patriarchal worldview.

terrible BDSM practices that Ebert is peering voyeuristically at without guilt: "ahogao before it was cool." Except, women have been tortured in cinema since cinema existed, Ebert staring hypnotically at Maria Falconetti's "eyes that will never leave you" (source: The Passion of Joan of Arc (1928)," 1997 review). I guess Barbara Leigh-Hunt (from Frenzy, pulling a Jubba the Hutt, below) is just the "flavor of the week," because she's "trashy" instead of Numinous—or more to the point, Ebert doesn't realize Hitchcock's work is garbage despite its fancy photography because he's blinded by his own bias (and hand in things): unironic hero worship, class character and white male fragility/privilege. He's literally ranking rape as "art," his reviews literally telling the reader to spend money on rape, too: "go consume." What a sleaze.

Yet, Ebert thinks he knows better and courts his own devils through people he really shouldn't; re: like Faust, writing from privilege about things he knows fuck-all about; i.e., by saying what is or isn't acceptable rape testimony by tone-policing not just Grave's director (whose disgust against—if it doesn't warrant a total gag order like Ebert wants—is arguably understandable), but also the feminist in the audience he didn't approve of cheering for vigilante justice: in an apocryphal movie because the film... had rape scenes in it? Furthermore, why do those have to be "dressed up" for Ebert to value the legitimate feelings of anger and release the woman undoubtedly had? One explanation is consumption and pickiness; i.e., he wants his whores to be high-class when they're strangled, the man poo-pooing trash despite his own hypocritical trashiness dressed up; re: the spell of the Great Enchantress, Ebert huffing the farts of a women who glorified British—and by extension, American—Imperialism nearly two centuries before he was spilling ink!

A second more thesis-prone argument is because, for Ebert, exploitation and liberation don't exist in the same place; they have to be segregated into something "palatable"—i.e., despite the whore's desire for revenge (and socio-material change), at the very least, involving her unpalatable desire to commit acts of phallic violence against one's oppressors (whose rioting Ebert, of course, discourages).

The same criticism, then, can be made of Radcliffe and all unironic "Faustians" (demon lovers) and critics and consumers of such things, not just Ebert refusing to make useful ideas of trash/things from trash about rape. I only picked him because a) so many view him as some kind of Opinion God, when—to be completely frank—a lot of the man's opinions are frankly gentrified and asinine ("Videogames Can Never Be Art" [2012], anyone? Puh-lease); and b) he, like Radcliffe, can only opine positively or productively on things about rape that are wrapped up in a nice little bow for him. It's not the rape that's a problem, but that it's not his kind of rape. "Irony," then, is merely a selective boundary for Ebert to misuse while policing the whore as Faust would do (and holding her down when she tries to fight back). It's arbitrary, not some transcendental signified; i.e., we can camp it through our own "rape" in quotes (which is what Grave ultimately was).

To conclude, Ebert can't enjoy or even think critically about something unless it is packaged in a highly specific way. This is called "conditioning." Except Ebert can't think about trash regarding harmful depictions of whores, rape victims and sex "having merit" unless they're framed a particular way according to his class and political standing as allergic to degeneracy. This is called "American Liberalism," known a bit less positively by me as "menticide" and "praxial inertia," but also "pimping." Even if it comes from "good intentions" (whatever that means), the road to Hell (the harmful sort) is paved all the same; i.e., with Faustian hubris apologizing for rape as junk food: Ebert can opine about movies till the cows come home, but he can't speak to things outside of that with any degree of authority worth mentioning. He's a grifter and a hack of the cheapest order.

Of course, this doesn't preclude heartfelt empathy with colonized peoples; e.g., at a glance, his heart seems to have basically been in the right place with the Palestinian cause—though not without him critiquing protestors before quickly and graciously changing his mind (starting with "The protest is misguided and destructive," regarding Palestinian protests of the Toronto Film Festival; source: Adam Horowitz, 2009)—but in truth, Ebert was nowhere near aggressive enough towards Biden, Obama, Bush, or any other American president being the obvious root cause to all this suffering. He's a giant nerd, like Bill Gates or Musk, but less enterprising and more principled than either were (enough to make him dangerous); i.e., awards of merit handed down from on high/graciously handed out by the current Wizard of Oz to show people the Scarecrow has brains. The contents of his skull remain useless straw passing for gold (and whose clout I'd trade for a handful of practicing leftists in a heartbeat): "murderers come to you in smiles"; so do rapists and their apologists, and Ebert was a sex pest. You can print that.

Yet, weird canonical nerds are so often white, and use their effigial achievements to whitewash themselves (e.g., S.T. Joshi pissing and moaning over the World Fantasy Convention's 2015 decision to remodel their awards not in Lovecraft's likeness³²⁵).

³²⁵ When asked about the decision, Joshi angrily replied, "Please make sure that I am not nominated for any future World Fantasy Award. I will not accept the award if it is bestowed upon me. / I will never attend another World Fantasy Convention as long as I live. And I will do everything in my power to urge a boycott of the World Fantasy Convention among my many friends and colleagues" (source: Jackson Kuhl's "Joshi Is Mad as Hell," 2015). Chief among those friends being Lovecraft's ghost (whose shadow Joshi is forever stuck in). Way to cut your nose off to spite your own face, dude.

As a consequence, Ebert is posthumously worshipped for being "a good man" and specifically for his liberal politics, which—if you haven't noticed by now—only further the abjection process while ogling rape (assigning stars to things, not unlike Dr. Seuss' Star Belly Sneetches, but pointedly to art through weaponized gatekeeper criticism). He was a card-carrying Democrat, which makes him a moderate Republic in practice, and a man literally celebrated for his pointedly liberal politics:

Ebert grew up in "a liberal household" and "remembers his parents praying for the success of Harry Truman in the election of 1948," according to an obituary in the Sun-Times [with Truman literally being a nuclear murderer]. At the University of Illinois, he started writing as a freshman by publishing a journal of "politics and opinion." Those interests never waned, and publicly picked up especially in his later years, as he took to the Internet (source: Joe Coscarelli's "The Political Writings of Roger Ebert," 2013).

This wasn't a source of contention, but open pride celebrating his legacy after his death. If only Ebert had lived lucidly into his 80s; i.e., watching Gamergate followed by Trump, Biden and Trump again; I have to wonder if his pride—which was arguably Faust's Achille's Heel—might have taken a much-needed blow...

Not that it would matter! Activism is what we do while we're alive, and have the power to affect change (however great or small). The problem is, any moderate—not just Ebert fetishizing colonial victims in his movie reviews—is a Nazi waiting to decay into itself. The same goes for Radcliffe, Marlowe and anyone else abusing demonic poetics; i.e., for their own selfish gain (cops suck), making hay while furthering abjection through the ghost of the counterfeit. While Ebert was a multimillionaire by the time he died, Radcliffe herself—though paid far less for her own work—was still the highest paid author of Gothic fiction at the time (source: Victoria DeHart's "The Enchanting Ann Radcliffe," 2020—more on this, deeper into the subchapter). Predation is predation, "a predator often blind to its own peril" (to quote another blind old man praying on the local populace); all of these individuals thought themselves "all-knowing" similar to Faust, yet were blinded by the pursuit of decadent knowledge warding off the reality of their own inheritance and isolation: to die in darkness, alone, their own Faustian bargain ceasing to sparkle as the world around them decays. They don't fiddle as Rome Burns, they scribble.

(artist: Chris Bourassa)

Sweet god, enough about Ebert and unironic torture porn apologia (seriously, I feel like I need a shower)! As we'll see in Volume

Three, then, the entirety of sex-positive artistic expression serves as a demonic iconoclast—of subverted demonic essence or knowledge as a sight increasingly forbidden to the Western world by those in power. Visible, sex-positive queerness is ironic because it uses creativity to demonstrate descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation as a poetic challenge to canonical norms that historically-materially treat anything beyond the status quo as alien, unknowable, abject; in the eyes of the status quo, the xenophilic bearers of such knowledge and dark, creative power must be evil: lookouts for Satan.

I beg to differ. Queer people aren't "evil"; we're simply "gods" in the sense that we—through dark poetics as a pedagogy of the oppressed—can author our own fates in pandemonic solidarity against the state based on what we, as workers, have the power to create ourselves like magic (and endure the shadow of police abuse all the while). As argued in our thesis statement, canon deifies poetics in defense of a patriarchal status quo that historically-materially privatizes and polices said process and demonizes anything else as a dark god, a false idol or mother of demons. But the xenophilic power to create and subvert a xenophobic status quo is still there (to this, Ghostbusters had it backward: the Ghostbusters should have asked Gozer if it was a god. The answer would have been, according to the movie's own logic, yes; re: "If someone asks you if you are a god, you say YES!" Fuckin' A).

popular means of spearheading the movement; i.e., by giving it personality and humanity mid-struggle.)

(exhibit 45c2a: Artist: Blixxd Bunny. If the self-fashioned sigil emblemizes the demon as changing shape, but also assigning emblems to this process, the tattoo is the means to apply this iconography directly to the artist's own body. While it's certainly unusual to take this process directly into one's own hands, Bunny is living proof. As the canvas that literally paints itself, their body art makes them feel cute and proud—so much so that they delight in showing off not just their tattoos and piercings, but their entire, naked body as tattooed/pierced. By their own admission, they add, "I by no means condone any of the actions I show in these videos; I'm experienced, but I'm also reckless and practices like these are incredibly unsafe and I would never recommend anyone do these things to themselves. I am not a professional."

The idea extends beyond solo BDSM depicted during pornographic performance art and public nudism, and extends into relationships between the artist and other artists [often swapping roles; re: module and muse]. And despite what SSC "[Safe Sane and Consensual"] argues, there's no such thing as "total safety" for anyone, let alone queer people utilizing demonic expression in sex-positive ways [the alternative being RACK, which I prefer³²⁶]. But Bunny's devotion to their own craft is impressive, demonstrating a steady hand and resilience to pain, but also capable know-how as they ink their own skin. In doing so, it tells the story that Bunny has in mind: themselves as a person they can be proud of, only adding to their beautiful frame over time as they continue their nudist displays becoming increasingly inked [thus demonic³²⁷].)

³²⁶ "Risk-Aware Consensual Kink," or informed consent/calculated risk/rape play. I call this ludo-Gothic BDSM, which preaches tolerance amid activism as, to some degree, inherently unsanitary and dangerous. SSC is older and more elitist, as Bay and I discuss:

Bay: As long as people are operating on informed consent and stuff, it super doesn't matter what they're doin' together. It's why I like RACK over SSC. SSC feels so outdated but there's so many BDSM practitioners who ascribe to it and I get why but "augh." Whereas RACK actually acknowledges that not everything in BDSM CAN be safe/sane necessarily—not 100% anyway.

Persephone: For real! Some stuff is "hard" for a reason. Yeah, choking is always risky. Or knife play. Even if the risk is small. Any aggressive sadism/pain administration, really. Shit, even just rough sex/accelerated heart beat and raised BP carry risk, if you're older. Or have congenital/comorbid health issues. Not to mention STIs. And pregnancy. And social stigmas and judgement. I'm generally of the RACK idea, I suppose, because ludo-Gothic BDSM and revolutionary cryptonymy is about doing rebellion, but as safely as one can, given the circumstances.

Bay: Same here. I think it's more holistic and considers people's needs. And it doesn't have a weird gatekeeping aspect to it in the name of "safety." Or "sanity," ew. Talk about giving shit a weird vibe.

Persephone: Like, better SSC than Radcliffe's school of knife dick, but still...

Bay: YEAH, LMAO! Like it's a fine practice, I just think it's prudish.

Birds of a feather fuck together!

³²⁷ The idea of a walking codex extends not just to golems imitating people, then, but vice versa; e.g., Vinculus in Suzanna Clarke's superb Jonathan Strange and Mr. Norrell (2004), an otherwise naked homeless man (the elderly village idiot, sleeping under Rip van Winkle's tree, below) being covered in woad-style tattoos speaking to the return of the King of the North, the ultimately magician, John Uskglass, aka The Raven King. However muddled Gothic inheritance may seem, just remember one basic idea: whores are the classic keepers of secrets and granters of wishes (only growing strong as people become more alienated from sex), and generally do so through ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., its wide-and-storied array of titillating costumes, flexible genders and "torturous" roleplay/crossdress³²⁸ that are, unto themselves,

³²⁸ With gender-swapping being an effective iconoclastic device since Lewis' The Monk, his own monstrous-feminine imposters camping the canon during the cryptonymy process, and which my PhD's thesis paragraph generously borrowed from:

This book wasn't written/illustrated for Academia, but if it were and I was seriously treating it as my PhD to defend, I would argue that it addresses a knowledge gap regarding the synthesis of Gothic theory with anarcho-Communism, gender studies, ludology and Marxist argumentation: "Capitalism dimorphically sexualizes all work to some degree, including sex work, resulting in sex-coercive media and gender roles via universal alienation through monstrous language; this requires an iconoclasm to combat the systemic bigotries that result—a (as the title reads) 'liberating of sex work under Capitalism through iconoclastic art.' Gothic Communism is our ticket towards that end; i.e., developing anarcho-Communism, hence a post-scarcity world without nation-states and their built-in, thus historical-material, genocide and exploitation of workers. My teaching approach stresses oppositional praxis according to sex positivity vs sex coercion when reclaiming the harmful language of stigma, bias, control, fear and hate from our colonizers (capitalists), but also power exchange and resistance as a cultural means of social-sexual catharsis and theatrical disguise; i.e., cultivating emotional and Gothic intelligence through a reclaimed Gothic mode of artistic, thus political collective/self-expression (monstrous poetics and applied Gothic theories). Capitalism sexualizes everything for the profit motive using canonical (dimorphic/Cartesian) monstrous poetics to brainwash workers and pit them against each other during Capitalist Realism; i.e., the Shadow of Pygmalion's monomyth/Cycle of Kings and infernal concentric pattern: unironic rape and war are everywhere because Capitalism rapes everything for profit, including people's minds, according to a profit motive that synonymizes all of these things. Utilized deliberately by Gothic Communism, subversive Amazonomachia's 'dark forces'—its famous, Miltonian paradoxes* and manifesto coordinates: the tenets, theories, and means and materials of expression, fetishes and clichés, etc—can revert Capitalist Realism's doomed narrative of the crypt by putting "rape" and "war" in quotes, recultivating the Superstructure and reclaiming the Base during class/culture war's camping of canon. The asymmetrical nature of guerrilla warfare obviously covers of an extremely wide range of artistic possibilities, but generally focuses on sex work and its canonical, dimorphic sexualization, or work in general as similarly sexualized, and heteronormative enforcement/the colonial binary established through regressive Amazonomachia as something to camp; i.e., through ironic kink, fetishization, and BDSM rituals/aesthetics (of psychosexual power and death, stigma and revenge, but also catharsis and transformation, etc) with demonic/undead poetics synthesized through the Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

'creative successes' of proletarian praxis as a class-conscious, ready-for-war response to/critique of capital" (my thesis paragraph) [source: Volume Zero, "Thesis Paragraph: Capitalism Sexualizes Everything," 2023].

Gothic doubles but also theatrical perceptions of power ("darkness visible") as liminal expressions/elaborate strategies of misdirection/"archaeologies." For example, not everything that is black and red is a fascist, but is treated like a fascist (and various other things at once) until the level of decay affords the usual centrist compromises between white knights and black knights against the Communist variant of the corrupt, the monstrous-feminine, the pedagogy of the oppressed coming out the same Gothic imagination's shadow zone.*

Confused? The rest of the PhD unpacks this. Still confused? Five more books unpack it even more! In short, everything after that has been a concentric holistic addressal; i.e., in hundreds of exhibits and thousands of images; e.g., the very next exhibit; re, also from Volume Zero (after rehashing "heteronormativity"):

Classically the entirety of the female form—its sexuality, gender identity/performance, emotions, etc—is sexualized by men for men. As such, Medusa's big hair synonymizes with her "phallic" snakes; i.e., her "dickhead" literally as a headful of penises or symbolic of a phallic, masculine foil to traditional male heroes' own power source: their singular penises (though the head and the hair are classically seen as a storing site for potency—e.g., Samson from the Bible). The idea of female body hair as "phallic" is certainly not out of the blue, either—with the pubic area (especially its unkempt versions) being synonymized with "incorrect masculinity"/an extension of the clitoris as "phallic-like"; i.e., an offshoot of the "correct" penis's legitimate violence, thus violent in a delegitimized, rebellious counterterror form. Keeping in this spirit, I jokingly in the past referred to Zeuhl's pubic hair (which was especially full and thick) as a "hair penis." Heteronormativity would treat these "exceptions" to the Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com* haunted by historical trauma and linguo-material abuse (re: by hypocrites like Beeman, Burton, Landis, Ebert, and Marlowe). By extension, the Gothic connects little whores to big ones that—in the right or wrong hands, depending on how you frame it—threaten the world as we know it with something beyond its inhabitants' wildest dreams. The game is one big tightrope/runway strip/cat walk, and involves TMI as much as profaning the sacred; e.g., I'm a girl, and I just had the world's most explosive shit before writing this exact passage on account that I was trying to hold it in until I finished my thoughts; i.e., inspiration works much the same way and sometimes you just gotta let it out (and the longer you spend with other people, the more you're going to encounter their various bodily functions).

That being said, I'm not going to fetishize that particular kink, but I will normalize a lack of censorship in the broader consensus (re: Milton's 1644 Areopagitica: A speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicenc'd Printing) to give people who find power in that kind of thing a place to play with unspeakable things in "unspeakable" ways, mid-cryptonymy. I gotta yuck that yum, but as long everyone's able to consent and actually gives consent within the venue, then no harm, no foul; re: diversity is strength and just because Archie Wilcox from Inglorious Basterds (2009) found Hugo Stiglitz to be a man of few words, he also learned that Stiglitz' actions spoke louder than words when the pivotal moment came: "Now about this pickle we're in; it would seem there's only one thing left for you to do!" / "And what is that?" / "Stiglitz." / "Say 'auf wiedersehen'³²⁹ to your Nazi balls!"

Vitruvian, European standard as anathema, but in truth, they are incredibly common; they've just been abjected into a state of exception that weird canonical (art) nerds can police with impunity [ibid.].

I.e., I feel like so many academics write their PhD, only to have it collect dust in some neoliberal vault owned by university bureaucrats keeping gnosis under lock and key. Like Shelley showed us—but also hopefully me—you have to make something that not only escapes into the world to speak on its fractal recursions, but becomes something that endlessly grows back into itself in service to workers by altering said recursions' historical materialism; re: liberating sex work (thus all work) through iconoclastic art hugging the alien! This includes Bone Mommies vis-à-vis graveyard sex speaking to capital lending us strange appetites while it gentrifies and decays (re: "A Cruel Angel's \(Modular\) Thesis," 2024), but also any monster type you could think of, in the larger aesthetic; i.e., through a dark intuition that sex-positive forces will still "get" even if the theory eludes them, whereas sex-coercive forms are more estranged (thus sweating nervously inside their masks).

³²⁹ All the more ironic since that phrase literally means, "See you again"—a lesson Tarantino imparted with Django Unchained (2012), a movie starring the same German-speaking actor from Basterds playing a German-speaking character while stealing the show from the protagonists and waxing hauntological nostalgic; i.e., about Wagner's Das Rheingold/Ring Opera and its anti-Semitic* introducing of the German opera staples, Siegfried and Brunhilde, into popular media (the opera was written after the Civil War, in 1869, whereas Django ostensibly took place during the Civil War). Tarantino was hardly the first person to do this (re: Tolkien's Lord of the Rings, but also Henry Giardina's "Hitler's Favorite Movie Was Super Gay, Actually," 2023).

*Re: Cooke: "That Wagner harboured anti-Semitic sentiments is both well-known and uncontested within the realm of musicological inquiry. The composer openly articulated his views in a number of publications, most notably Judaism in Music (Das Judentum in der Musik; 1850), in which he identified

The point isn't to "own" Nazis in the Free Marketplace of Ideas (since when has that stopped fascism?), but to camp the canon with ludo-Gothic BDSM and break Capitalist Realism, thus stop the historical-material cycle of violence that reactionaries and moderates both depend on and defend in bad faith/centrist language; i.e., by pointedly confronting and controlling the conduit of messages speaking about/on/with taboo subjects normally used to torture us, sans irony. Girls shit, for example; some girls do more than that with their shit (cringes slightly while writing that clause)! Others get raped and do more with their rape than please opportunistic men (speaking from experience, with that one); i.e., "There are more things between heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your philosophy!"

Furthermore, such things—as elements to exploit or liberate and work with, mid-praxis—allude to hypermassive warring forces; i.e., the warring Communist Big Whore, Medusa, conveyed concentrically in smaller doubles, mid-belly-of-the-beast, grappling with state doubles of the capitalist Big Pimp: cops and victims, the former criminalizing the latter for profit, thus rape. All monsters—even that repulsive shit demon from Dogma (1999)—need love, and provided mutual consent is respected, mid-praxis, by punching up against Capitalism and profit (thus rape) as something to dismantle, mid-synthesis, then more power to us! As usual the facilitator is a whore (or muse, in Kevin Smith's arguments. Same difference):

(*exhibit 45c2b1: Older feminists/SWERFs tend to knock the topos of power of women*³³⁰, but it's something that neo-medieval argument can broach from a variety of sources; e.g., Smith's "angelicizing" of the formerly demonic Selma Hayek [above] from an exotified "other" wrought with vampire

Jewish musicians as the ultimate source of what he perceived as substanceless music and misplaced values in the arts as a whole. What has remained a controversy, however, is the extent to which Wagner's anti-Semitism informed his musical compositions" (source: Britannica); i.e., Wagner was anti-Semitic and—like Lovecraft or Howard (from Weird Magazine) were used by fascist authors then and now to be anti-Semitic not just towards Jews, but all marginalized peoples. What a shocker!

More to the point—and despite Django feeling like just another reason for a sexist, pedophilic foot fetishist to say the N-word and have his actors (white or black) say it, too—the lesson of Basterds makes Stiglitz's sick burn to the SS officer feel oddly surreal: "Say 'I'll see you again' to your Nazi balls!" before blasting them to paste (a special effects trend stuck with by Tarantino since 2007's Grindhouse). The guy think's he's Matthew Lewis, but he's a straight lead acting rebellious in bad faith (and apologized for by Ebert's own white superiority)!

³³⁰ E.g., Christine Neufeld—a medievalist professor at EMU (she taught me Chaucer and Frankenstein) rolling her eyes at the phrase, saying "some power" in a haughty tone, and later critiquing me for my "weird sexual metaphors" in "Born to Fall?" but also signing off on my Award Letter that helped me continue my education. She gave me an A for the paper but a C+ for the class, telling me I should use that as a lesson in future encounters (presumably with tenured assholes like her, but I digress).

tropes punching down at Mexico from America, and attacking sex workers; i.e., with Tarantino and Robert Rodriguez' From Dusk 'Til Dawn [1996] presenting the vampires as bloodsucking fodder the bar full of combat vets, bikers and runaway criminals must kill to survive; re: black penitents being one-upped by older more experienced black penitents, but also the assimilative myth [for Rodriguez] of a savage Mexico: a "bad" bloodline threatening a white American hostage virgin³³¹, and who Clooney's suitably gruff, swarth-and-sexy antihero must protect from out-and-out whores [which is what a Neo-Gothic demon, out from the medieval past, ultimately is: an illegitimate claim to power through sex and force]. In his own words, Clooney's "a bastard, not a fucking bastard."

The takeaway with Smith's Dogma is that he—a practicing or at least born Catholic—is showcasing a bidding war between two rival groups over Serendipity: an angelic-but-slutty muse, played by Hayek, while Linda Fiorentino's sex-repressed heroine looks in on with begrudging respect [and previously herself played the awesome seductress moll, Bridgette/Wendy Croy, in John Dahl's 1994 The Last Seduction—an early '90s neo-noir with a very transphobic ending that castrates Bill Pullman and Peter Berg during coerced rape play]. And while it might seem like Smith is reining these ladies in, he's also showcasing an interracial bid for attention: orchestrated by a non-white actress playing an otherworldly actress pitting men vampirically against each other using vampiric charms that have an infantilized, baby-pink "glow up" to them. It's the Catholic schoolboy fascinated with the whore while pimping her/telling her what to wear!

Meta-wise, the subversion is there—and despite the biologically essentialized treatment of the foxy she-devil, having "gone over" to God's side to fleece Smith's sinning Jay and Silent Bob [echoes of Guildenstern and Rosencrantz] stone blind doing so to the Jackson Five's "[ABC," 1970; i.e., a fool and his money are parted soon]—it's an effective [and playful, fun] illustration of the topos of power of women in small being used, however ineffectually by Smith in the long run, to try and critique Catholic dogma and Capitalism under a Protestant ethic; e.g., his megachurch cardinal and author of the "Buddy Christ" stand-in being played by none other than George Carlin. It's not not wrong.

The problem, here, is the film is still Smith's idea of Capitalism, one he uses to biologically essentialize muses/sex workers; i.e., his own "den of scum and villainy" built on top of Tarantino and Rodriguez' going all the way back to Matthew Lewis' cabin of bandits-in-disguise, from The Monk—a novel Tarantino would ape, with his racist, profoundly misogynistic revival of Verhoeven's already problematic 1985 Flesh and Blood satirizing Western hero culture. Neither director [nor Smith] could critique capital without reducing women to cis-het aliens whose only demonstrably "useful" role is to enchant men and steal their power [and wealth] through sex and sex alone.

Of course, there's a kernel of truth to the cryptomimetic reenactments, but it's possible to be essentially correct and still sexist while aping other sexist men in the process; i.e., Verhoeven filmed Sharon Stone's flashing scene in 1992's Basic Instinct without her consent, Tarantino is a rape apologist³³², and Smith is certainly no stranger to problematic belief systems [ultimately apologizing for the Catholic deity in Dogma but also falling into Milton and Tolkien's Star Wars trap by aggrandizing He-Man and hiring Mark Hamill (an open Zionist) to voice Skeletor in his 2021 reboot, He-Man: Revelation]. Moreover, all of these men come from the same destructive system, Hollywood, whereas Matthew Lewis was a twenty-year old gay man/member of Parliament who wrote The Monk to deliberately critique the status quo [a reputation that would haunt him for the rest of his life, his nickname eventually becoming "Monk" Lewis. We should all be so lucky].

artist: [H.W., Pickersgill]

³³² Quentin Tarantino once defended Roman Polanski in 2003: "He didn't rape a 13-year-old. It was statutory rape... he had sex with a minor. That's not rape" (source: Callum Russell's "When Quentin Tarantino Defended Roman Polanski in an Interview with Howard Stern," 2022).

Campy patronymics aside, Lewis was a gay man who camped the canon to invert problematic ideas like Original Sin and Faustian bargains; re: Broadmoor's 2021 "Camping the Canon" vis-à-vis Milton and Lewis, followed by me as inspired by Broadmoor's title when writing my 2023 PhD; e.g., the shapeshifting Matilda first disguising as the male Rosario, then admitting after she is caught that she has actually modeled herself after Ambrosio's portrait of the Madonna on his abbey wall, before seducing him through a reenacting of the Fall [of Adam and Eve] inside "an artificial wilderness." Everything is fake as fuck.

So whereas Lewis' revolutionary cryptonymy was profoundly anti-capitalist and anti-establishment—in effect empowering women like Matilda to gut Ambrosia like the incestuous pig/rapist he was—I can't help but feel Smith [and by extension older auteurs like Verhoeven and Tarantino] have sucked much of the satire out of camp. I don't care if Smith is a King Diamond fan; it's still blind satire, as is their own choir they're preaching to—with them closer to Radcliffe than they'd like to admit; i.e., posturing as Lewis' famous rebel to enjoy the straight man's idea of a queer bad boy³³³ rocking the boat, but actually "super straight" neo-conservative con men, failing to put pearls before swine [or pearl-clutching for swine, take your pick]: pulling a Radcliffe-in-disguise! "We stare and tremble!" indeed! They're frauds who uphold capital, not tear it down.

Simply put, function determines function, not appearance—with the aesthetics of Faustian devilry something that sex liberators and sex pests can embellish in service to workers or profit. It's why you can have someone as devilish [and handsome] as Rickman—playing a variety of dashing lotharios, unscrupulous bandits and ravishing sexual predators onscreen, but be a total sweetheart offscreen [see: Madly, Deeply: The Alan Rickman Diaries³³⁴, 2022]—versus someone like Neil Gaiman, playing the part "to the hilt"

³³³ With Kevin Smith arguably styling his beard in the same tradition as Rickman (who starred in Dogma as the Metatron, minus his signature goatee. The plot thickens).

³³⁴ Edited by Alan Taylor and, as my friend Mira (from the tokophobia interview in "Spilling Tea" but also a massive Alan Rickman fan) points out:

Great book. There's a foreword by Emma Thompson and an afterword by his widow, Rima, that were both really good. Pretty sure there are YouTube versions of both/interviews with both of them (also, see: Waterstone's 2023 "Emma Thompson's Moving Tribute to Alan Rickman" and Alan Rickman Fans' 2021 "Galaxy Quest - Alexander Dane/Dr. Lazarus"). Honestly they were "couple goals." Met in school, stayed together their whole lives, never had Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com and passing himself off as some kind of rebel with a cause; i.e., as a genuine sex pest posturing as a Gothic bad boy auteur to access women's spaces and actually rape them³³⁵.

Furthermore, while cis gay men classically are known to tokenize—re: Foucault, Spacey and Dahmer—the problem is heteronormative, thus straight because the state and its cops are straight; i.e., as a systematic problem—the kind Matthew Lewis was highlighting to expose the queer pogroms happening in his own time, versus the straight men aping him/using his rockstar status to pass themselves off as "activists" while actually being crusaders-in-disguise [and imitating a woman imitating straight bigoted men, oddly enough]!

kids even though he wanted to because Rima had phobias and only got married in the year before he died. There's a lot of diary entries where he's been filming something and been really frustrated or stressed but then Rima visits the set and they just chill out, binge watch TV shows and calm each other down.

³³⁵ The gaslight extends to Gaiman's fictions presenting his victims as "hysterical"; e.g., Gaiman's incredibly queerphobic dreamstone*/wish fulfillment scene, in The Sandman live adaptation; i.e., depicting queer desires as, no bullshit, an honest-to-God threat to Things As They Are—an incredibly problematic argument, unto itself, but also one written by the battered-son-of-a-Scientology-master-turned-accused rapist (re: Shapiro): people can't be queer because they'll "all kill each other." I wish I was kidding. It's like Edward Hopper's "Night Hawks" (1942) and Ronald Reagan had a baby (the Netflix adaptation was in 2022; the original was written by Gaiman and illustrated by DC Comics in 1989).

*Which is red for—you guessed it—the Red goddamn Pill. Gaiman coopted Morpheus before the openly MGTOW types had a chance to recuperate the Wachowski sisters' own 1999 Morpheus, in The Matrix. Quite the red flag/dogwhistle! Gothic Romance isn't just to lie about the past, but revive it in ways that speak to buried atrocities—a point Gaiman less commits to and more abuses to commit ongoing atrocities directly in front of us [re: bury your gays]!

From the silver screen to Netflix, Hollywood is the Church, giving shelter to Black Penitents like Radcliffe did—her 1796 Italian's full title being The Confessional of the Back Penitents and cashing in on Lewis' 1794 Monk's signature cryptonymy and perfidy: a straight person aping a queer man to drain his camp of iconoclastic value, cashing in on cheap doubles; i.e., despite being called in some circles "the Mother of Gothic literature" [source: Women's Museum of California, 2017] and hero worshipped for it [sorry, Dale³³⁶, but if the shoe fits...], Radcliffe came after Clara Reeve and aped not one but two gay men, Lewis and Walpole; Smith and company aped Radcliffe aping Lewis to fall on her side of the camp, praxially speaking. Blind camp is blind camp, and all of these people fit the bill. Per capital, such things also work in pairs and go in cycles that span centuries; re: Aguirre's infernal concentric pattern.

To that, be like Lewis or myself when making your own demons, not Radcliffe or her functionally comparable doppelgangers; i.e., the Sphinx' riddle, let your tortures mean something by challenging the status quo [and crippling Divine Right; re: Oedipus Rex].)

Now that we've covered whores-as-demonic through the Faustian angle as something to involve amongst ourselves (as whores), let's examine demons as summoned through magic! "Lay on, Macduff, and damned be he who cries 'Hold, enough!'"

³³⁶ As in Dale Townshend, one of my MA supervisors (for "Lost in Necropolis," 2018) and a bit of a Radcliffe academic "fanboy"; i.e., not just teaching me Radcliffe for MMU's "Rise of the Gothic" module, but also writing about her quite a bit; e.g., being one of the editors for Ann Radcliffe, Romanticism and the Gothic (2016):

This book offers unique and fresh perspectives upon the literary productions of one of the most highly remunerated and widely admired authors of the Romantic period, Ann Radcliffe (1764–1823). While drawing upon, consolidating and enriching the critical impulses reflected in Radcliffe scholarship to date, this collection of essays, composed by a range of renowned scholars of the Romantic period, also foregrounds the hitherto neglected aspects of the author's work. Radcliffe's relations to Romantic-era travel writing; the complex political ideologies that lie behind her historiographic endeavours; her poetry and its relation to institutionalised forms of Romanticism; and her literary connections to eighteenth-century women's writing are all examined in this collection. Offering fresh considerations of the well-known Gothic fictions and extending the appreciation of Radcliffe in new critical directions, the collection reappraises Radcliffe's full oeuvre within the wider literary and political contexts of her time (source).

I really don't wish to bust Dale's chops, here (as he was kind to me in school and I learned a lot from him), but it's not him I'm critiquing so much as the author he's shining a big happy light onto! All the easier for me to beat her with a stick! "Kill you darlings, including your teacher's darlings!"

The Road to Hell; or, Summoning the Whore, Ourselves (and Other Considerations of the Faustian Bargain vis-à-vis the Participants)

Just like a churchyard shadow creeping after me

It's only there to terrify my mind, a black swan keeps haunting me (source).

—Dave Mustaine; "Black Swan," from Megadeth's United Abominations (2006)

This section takes the path least/most traveled, depending on how you look at it: the road to Hell, examining such runaways as lubricated by a polity of facilitators occupying the same sphere—the angel and the demon, and the virgin and the whore—however they manifest.

Again, we're starting with canonical variants having evolved out of the chaos of the Middle Ages into the Enlightenment and beyond towards 20th and 21st century variants; i.e., Smile and Evil Dead as built on top of those warring forebears, the war continuing in our own lives, as it did with my ex, Jadis, raping my mind and—through financial abuse—using me for sex and other things. We'll explore an early history of the demonic—from The Testament of Solomon and Hammer of Witches to Malleus Maleficarum, or Hammer of Witches, and De Praestigiis Daemonum (On the Tricks of Demons) and its appendix, Pseudomonarchia Daemonum (False Monarchy of Demons)—then dive into some notes on Radcliffe and Lewis feeding into the more half-real and recent forms, outlined above and below.

This essentially divides in two basic parts, then:

- "Going Mask Off: Showing Jadis' Face While Doubling Them": Gives food for thought about demons as much being real people as fictional ones, during Gothic poetics. The example I give—and doing so in the Radcliffian spirit of demasking bad guys—is my ex and former abuser, Jadis. We discuss my act of doing so not to marshal violence against them, but to learn from the abuse they caused to camp and subvert, hence prevent future harm, on a systemic level; i.e., while making our own media as haunted by said abuse, doing so as a demonic act of thinking critically (through art and performance) about other people that speaks to abuse affecting oppressed groups unevenly (to summon demons is to make them; to make them is to think critically when the resulting parody and pastiche become perceptive).
- "Dark Shadows: The Origins of Demonic Persecution and Camp; or, Applying My Education \(from School and Jadis\) to Smile, Evil Dead and More": Considers demonology's early roots, subsequent Neo-Gothic period, and 20th/21st century revivals, while also going over the praxial concerns of canonical torture vs exquisite "torture"; i.e., by how we can take things further than Radcliffe did while still being aware of the risks she ultimately took herself.

The basic idea is to introduce ideas we can reify in our own lives, but explore simultaneously where those ideas came from and how we can use them during oppositional praxis/the cryptonymy process reversing abjection to double our foes and ourselves, mid-calculated risk! There's no canon without camp; keeping with the simulacrum, the canon haunts camp even when transformed into a relatively safe version of itself. This isn't us speaking out, alone, but protecting ourselves, too; i.e., if you're abused, tell someone, but make sure it's someone you trust, or that your method of performance protects you if there's no one to trust.

Sadly, when you're playing with fire in a man's world—are the fire in man's world/the thing those in the Man Box pimp (male or not)—nothing is ever truly safe. From Sophocles' Oedipus Rex to Walpole's Mysterious Mother (1768), much of the ancient world and echoes of the ancient world (which Nazis are) fixate on, and tell through, rape play and death theatre, as well as various taboos, fetishes and clichés; i.e., Radcliffe was Austen's precursor and thought more about marrying monsters (or being abducted by them) than Austen—a marriage junkie herself though never married—did (all her villains start with "W" for some reason [e.g., Willoughby and Wickham] and she basically put men and their violence [e.g., duels, Colonel Brandon vs Willoughby] in the periphery). The best way to protect ourselves during the replication and chaos of fascism mirroring us in bad faith, then, is like these ladies; i.e., by reading the room and putting our ear to the ground—acclimating to the cryptomimetic uncanny in ways we can demonically seize and control: by recreating and reenacting it on the same shared stages infamous psychomachic divisions and liminalities!

In other words, Gothic Communism is a mirror game. All war is based on deception, including class war. This means that revolution is theatre, which isn't strictly on or off stage, and populated by demons in a dualistic sense. All of them lie to tell truth for different purposes (for workers or the state), the function determined by dialectical-material context. That's easy enough to parse, after the fact. But how do you do it when you're being gaslit, and the performance is both ongoing and dictated by socio-material forces designed to conceal themselves? How do you separate the wheat from the chaff when the wheat looks and sounds like the chaff—when you look at yourself and see an alien looking back you that you both fear and want to be, and which speaks through dogwhistle, DARVO, obscurantism and subterfuge? By taking control of the Aegis, of course! Learn from the best, then beat them at their own game!

Going Mask-Off: Showing Jadis' Face while Doubling Them

"And if I would've gotten away with it if it weren't for you meddling kids!"

—every Scooby Doo villain ever (1969)

To summon the whore to expose abuse is, to some extent, to unmask them while copying them into a harmless version we can learn to mirror and make trouble with (to wage class war). Jadis is the "strict" demon we'll be working with, and we'll unmask them, in just a second.

First though, some food for thought, followed by a painful-joyous and necessary note about my own succubus who seduced and raped me, Jadis. So often, the theft of souls and their eventual redemption happens in the same poetic spheres, onstage and off, with doubles of the same harmful leeches leeching back (why be a lame detective when you could be a necromancer?):

Demons prey on others as a matter of exchange; in doing so, they operate through the basic idea that people are not gods, but guided by human, thus animal impulses. In theological, but also Gothically poetic terms, they are the gap between things that "God" denies and relegates to the underworld, save that Hell is all around us. So while Perdition and Purgatory are places of torment and boredom, not unlike Hell, "Hell" is also classically an absence of grace (one Protestants address the reprobate nature of through a "holy" work ethic).

It's also where demons bourgeois and proletarian call home (and which I prefer to say instead of "good and bad," to be a good Marxist), and whose liminalities assume an infinite number of forms and roads to Hell; i.e., the presence of demons being a presence of Hell and absence of God/grace, yet whose grave danger doubles God's own human fakeries in a pointed inversion of earthly existence and afterlife, but also eternal damnation as a state of eye-opening punishment through darkness visible—with interpreting God and canon being a Protestant device likewise available to demons living under God's sphere of influence: a road to Hell, thus temptation of a post-capitalist order in pre-capitalist language by thinking about the socio-material world in the usual poetic arguments along the Gothic's half-real, trendy bad echo oscillating between canon and camp.

To that, God and canon take away workers' ability to create, and limit it to bourgeois binarization/privatization. "God" per the Abrahamic religions, then, is just an extrasecular/post-Schism way of arguing for capital regulating desire from a canonical standpoint, using Gothic poetics; "Satan" and demons, a Miltonic and Satanic way of resisting that while inside the state of exception (outside of God's grace, but not his settler-colonial territories): forbidden fruit, and the feeling of darkness and Gothic fakeries by canonizers playing God and—hopelessly swayed by Capitalist Realism—find it easier to imagine the end of the world in God's absence haunted by dark forces, than it is to imagine a world without God/capital. Gothic canon becomes another almanac of torture chambers to populate with ghosts of the counterfeit furthering abjection/policing nature as non-white, non-Christian, non-GNC whore: "You weak pathetic fools! I've come for your souls!" / "I don't think so!"

When "Caesar" is at your door, it's time to survive, solidarize, and speak out (Persephone van der Waard's "Survive, Solidarize, Speak Out," 2024), or die trying.

And while revolution is a slum, it's also a party made with cool trash (from pure schlock to Sontag's true camp and everything in between; re: Persephone van der Waard's "My Least Favorite Horror Movies?" 2020) that also serves as a disguise. Yet so often, "soul" is a canonical argument for "grace," thus ignorance, whose violation bad actors will happily exploit in hauntological defense of capital from "degenerate" enemies within; i.e., by exploiting those running away from home (because home is bad beneath the surface) in search of the Numinous. For every one of us, there's ten of them; who'll tire first? There's only one way to find out. Put your money where your mouths are! Put on your masks, and pull theirs off! Break the fetish cop's monopoly (the duality of mil spec, torture porn, heavy metal, etc, out of the '70s and '80s into the present)!

This brings us, once more, to Jadis—a person not without means (at least according to my admittedly limited intelligence, at this point), thus someone I unmask here, Scooby-Doo-style, with some degree of risk (especially since Donald Trump is now president³³⁷). Whatever hells they visit upon me, should they try to, this step towards my own Hell is one that decolonizes their awful notions of such things; i.e., they were the first TERF/SWERF I encountered, in person, and the primary motivating factor for writing Sex Positivity as a series (which started with the intent to discuss TERFs and not only why they suck, but how they as witch cops look like witches policing their own kind, next page): Jadis was a traitor who raped me (by my definitions of the word; see: "A Note about Rape") but also a Great Destroyer I could evoke to achieve a palliative-Numinous effect during ludo-Gothic BDSM! With opera—with sex, drugs, and rock 'n roll (all the stuff that people like)—revolutions live and die on love; it's why the state tries to monopolize such things.

In short, with Trump now elected and people like Elon Musk literally doing a Nazi salute \(a Roman hauntological act\) for Trump's inauguration (Hasanabi's "Did ³³⁷ When the wolf is loose—it helps to keep a few masks and buffers nearby. Become something they can't attack/that others will defend from attack because they see it as human, not expendable.

Elon Just..." 2025), it's a hell of a time to be brave, but exactly the time to be brave; i.e., Nazis are scared of everything, so give 'em something to fear—a parody of themselves, but also a way of speaking out, thus fighting back in ways that confuse their aggression and redirect it. Silence is genocide, but you can shout loudly in ways the enemy doesn't recognize using the cryptonymy process to reverse abjection despite them furthering it. We never want to hesitate or question fighting Nazis (while also prioritizing our own safety by fighting back) because that's how they get inside and pry compromise out of those they'll only later betray anyways; re: "I'm altering the conditions of our arrangement. Pray I do not alter them further!" But power doesn't flow one way and we can reverse said flow no matter how "permanently" stuck in the mud things seem.

In short, there's a time to watch movies, and a time to have the adventure for real, but this still allows for a curious walking of the tightrope, all the same; i.e., relative to games, exile and pushing for something better than what the elite shove down our throats: singing up at their awful food with something delicious. Valor! "Let man's petty nations tear themselves apart! My land's only borders lie around my heart!" (ABBAtalk's "Anthem from Chess The Musical \(Tommy Körberg\)," 1984). Sing "For Somewhere That's Green!" (Broadwaycom's "Jinkx Monsoon Performs..."), or of the Dire Straights' "Romeo and Juliet" (1980) and similar "come hither and fuck me" clothes, music, performance art, all rolled into one. We're fighting for what we believe in as being one in the same, a form of demonic expression our enemies will occupy in bad faith.

That's musicals, of course; the Gothic as an operatic, multimedia mode of danger disco suitably revives the barbarian past in the neoliberal era to control feelings concerning its continued abuses happening in the present—i.e., we return to past trauma revived "in small," hence in ways we can control by duplicating it. That's what I'm going to be doing when analyzing said past, and Jadis—someone I have repeatedly described in the past as someone I have history with—is an excellent place to start: a hellish jubilee!

Please note: As of writing and posting this piece onto my website (on January 20th, 2025), I am showing Jadis' uncensored face in photographs. That being said, any photos of Jadis provided here show no explicit pornographic nudity of them, nor imagery where we engage in sexual activities with them naked on screen or even in the same room³³⁸; i.e., any exhibits of them where I am credited as "photographer"

³³⁸ My side of the conversation was recorded in Michigan, which is a two-party state with an exception for participants. Or as Jeffery Koelzer of Varnum LLP explains: "Michigan is a two-party consent state, with an exception for recordings by conversation participants" (source). That being said, the point is moot given the conversations' recordings occurred with Jadis' consent and mine (for which I have their spoken consent on record; i.e., us discussing the recording process in detail while doing it and playing together). As I shall further explain, the image portions I am showing are not sexual, and provide additional context to the sexual abuse Jadis exacted upon me after said videos were taken.

To that, these exhibits are screencaps from previously recorded videos produced between us with their full knowledge and consent; i.e., the videos were recorded with their full permission, explicitly for me to keep for my personal enjoyment*: Jadis enjoyed knowing I had them, effectively making them homemade porn between two willing (and eager) participants. The screencaps used are before sexual activity takes place, with Jadis either having all of their clothes still on, or the nude portions of their body off camera; i.e., my showing of these recorded conversations is to prove that they occurred, not to demonstrate their total pornographic contents, which I refrain from showing in these exhibits (exceptions being towards myself as nude, solo, to demonstrate the erotic qualities of courtship that took place between us: what Jadis and I exchanged, prior to us moving in together).

Jadis abused me repeatedly in ways I have explained in the past (re: "Escaping Jadis," July 6th, 2024) and shall explain again, here. The context for these screencaps is to give vital background to what I am explaining, and to show my abuser more than I have previously done in earlier accounts. In short, I'm putting a face to the alias—my right as a victim outing that portion of my abuser as I see fit. My past accounts of abuse regarding them have been up since at least early 2023 (e.g., "You really do have a beautiful body"; source: "Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism: Manifesto," modified from July 2022 to 11/4/2023) but expanding in 2024 to include censored images of Jadis' body but not their face, and more detailed accounts of their abuse (source: "Transforming Our Zombie Selves," June 27th, 2024).*

Furthermore, the older samples cite even older media that has been online since before 2022 and includes uncensored images of Jadis' face and real name (e.g., "Why I Submit," February 19th, 2021), recordings of Jadis identifying themselves and their profession for the mic (e.g., "Dreadful Discourse, ep 1: What is the Gothic?" June 26th, 2020; timestamp: 0:35), me with my arm around them after they graduated from UF (source tweet, NicksMovInsight: May 6th, 2021). The point being, Jadis has known about my identifying writings of them since before we broke up (many of which they

My decision to gradually show more of Jadis—and to the degree to which I feel comfortable in doing so—has occurred slowly as I have healed and felt increasingly ready to speak about these things more openly. It isn't to invite violence against them, but to learn from what they did to raise awareness about rape/domestic abuse for future praxis among survivors of abuse [strength in numbers and intelligence, babes]. Do not attack them; just know what they did and don't do it to others. Please refer to the footnote for additional context, links and other information. —Perse (exhibit 45c2b2: Rapists are masters of disguise, often hiding in plain sight; here is me finally demasking mine. Moderates decay into Nazis. And like Nazis, the real Jadis/my abuser was a massive dork who—apart from routinely abusing my mind to extort my body as succubae classically do—loved Mortal Kombat memes, KFMDM, Tool music videos, He-Man and ninjas, Industrial music, dark '90s media in general, and rough sex/demonic BDSM [cryptomimetic echoes of their inner "war pig" but also their own abusive mother].

As such, this is as much a photo of them [and their sinister moral poverty] in real life/the flesh versus the simulacrum [shadow/likeness] of them we'll be discussing in this section for more campy purposes; i.e., the former a demon that haunts my offered feedback on) being cited in my writings about them after we broke up calling them my abuser and then later still, my rapist. The rape claim has been active for over six months, and my claims of abuse for roughly two years. Not once has Jadis ever contacted me after February 14th, 2022, either to harass me or ask me to cease and desist.

To which, I reasoned back then and now, they know about the claims and ability for their name to be connected to the alias, but haven't done anything about it; i.e., that it wouldn't be especially difficult for anyone reading these publicly available accusations to follow the references back to their original, publicly available sources, thus to acquire: Jadis' full name, where they went to school, what they look like, and ultimately what they did to me. This also includes publicly available Google Docs that detail their abuse not just cursorily but in vivid and extensive detail; re: "Setting the Record Straight Again; Accounting My Ex's Abuse of Me to Another Victim August 30th, 2022" and "Setting the Record Straight; My Ex's Abuse of Me: February 17th, 2022."

Said documents have been up, live and unaltered, since their posting dates. Jadis has not once reached out to me to acknowledge them, but apart from blocking their Twitter main, I have made no effort to hide my work from them, either. I've even written about their abuse of me and other people and featured images of all of us together (e.g., Tim, with Jadis and I; exhibit 39a2b, "Escaping Jadis") and Jadis still hasn't done anything. I can only reason they either know they're guilty and/or don't care (and to my knowledge are still living with the other abused person; re: their former ex, "Tim," who knows everything about Jadis [because I told them] and were with them longer than I was—over ten years, versus roughly two).

waking moments, the latter a demon I summon for my own survivor's complicated reasons: the real Jadis summoned the moon to torment me, which I escaped by not only physically distancing myself from Jadis the person, but in creating likenesses of them I could control/"torture" myself with! Jadis was someone who understood the whore's awesome power, and used it to enthrall me; surviving their holocaust, I made what was best about them into a dark "magic man" effigy [Jadis is genderfluid] that I could conjure up whenever I feel like: "Ravish me, stupid!"

To that, my double doesn't have the blind, terrifying "death in your eyes" look that Jadis themselves did, but something thrilling that awakens in me new feelings of life [through Radcliffe and Lewis' terror and horror] that I can "ride the lightning out" until my tremors subside; i.e., on par with the electrifying solo from Annihilator's "Death in Your Eyes" [2009]. Paradoxically this became not something to avoid, but ride as often as I liked—to take my scars and activate something that, through the pain of surviving rape, pregnancy and loss that Jadis had exacted upon me, became their accidental gift I could relish not simply until the end of my days, but give to all of you vis-à-vis ludo-Gothic BDSM and Gothic Communism.

In short, Communism—from Shelley to Marx to me—is a byproduct of rape, specifically the fascist raping the worker until they radicalize. As such, Jadis thought they were only taking from me when they—in poetic terms, but also materially through fiscal brute force—forced themselves upon me, but any exchange is a give and take, and I used what was given to eclipse and expose them through my rape child. I was the moon, bitch or "Angry Sun" from [Mario 3]! You are but a pale imitation of the Medusa, a little bougie fake whoring yourself for the Man! No TERFs allowed!

Do you think I spent years of my life dwelling and ruminating for mere indulgence? To let shame rule me even though it lives in my battered aching heart to this very day? No, I birthed Sex Positivity precisely because I suffered at the hands of false idols, forever shattering my idea of a safe home and leading me to run off into strange zones to find a sense of balance I would never have, in stillness: demonic wanderlust for the slut whose trauma lives in her body. A world without order or reason is classically a meaningless one, but the beauty of total liberation from state predation [thus fascism] is one where we become free from profit [thus genocide and rape] while being able to make our own meaning among ourselves and the natural-material world. How the tables turn!

To that, learn from my mistakes³³⁹ and creative successes [not just one child, but a serial litter of them, my little trans Dutch girl's (excuse the expression) "Irish twin" demon babies—less outbreeding a rival army and more passing our revenge along to the next generation] to go and make your own demons passing the demon of Communism forwards; i.e., Sex Positivity was begot from rape, and I couldn't have written it [and its conception of the palliative Numinous or ludo-Gothic BDSM] without some degree of tragedy possessing me to not simply wake up in the middle of the night afraid for my own life, but to "rip 'n tear until it is done!" I couldn't have, any more than Mary Wollstonecraft junior could have written Frankenstein and turned into Mary Shelley without eloping with Percy and getting knocked up, first [a choice complicated by her mother's death giving birth to her, and God knows what else]—a decision I implore some degree of caution regarding: not senseless risk, flying into danger headlong, but calculated risk as learned by me having fucked up royally so you don't have to.

But also, learn from my paradoxical joys, during the painful [re]conception, birth and afterbirth; i.e., the fact that it wasn't all bad, just messy and intense: the sex was good, and Jadis was funny [all qualities I took and put in my book to spite them, but also to love their better half that eventually gave into greed and pride]! God they made me laugh and cum like mad! But they also terrified me and couldn't control themselves/gave us both more than we agreed to; re: we had a contract, one they didn't follow while dragging me through a portal into their idea of Hell as they envisioned it—where they were master/victim and I their unwilling slave/abuser! What I say is the truth, insofar as the historical events are concerned, but it nonetheless revives in/mixes with Gothic poetics' shadows and lies; e.g., Jadis wasn't a black knight, as much as I wanted them to be. Instead, the truth of them was far more banal:

Jadis was always a person at war with themselves/ruled by their past. In short, they were kinder when they were poor/only began to change once their father died and they inherited a small fortune/dividends [extra emphasis on "small," but it was enough to immediately change our lives during Covid: to get a new car and home at the drop of a hat and still be able to live comfortably for the rest of our lives]. Faced with that, Jadis' desires for assimilation and dominion over a partner they could control ["the devil you know" and all that] began to surface—i.e., they had an empty room they could build whatever they wanted inside; instead of making a world together with me, they chose to push me out and orchestrate their ex, Tim, moving in with us [which originally was my idea, but one Jadis gently encouraged by constantly prodding me to mend fences with a former victim they presented as having abused Jadis first; i.e., Jadis was always the only victim].

Due to visual similarities unfolding mid-relationship, though, rape is always a matter of context under dialectical-material scrutiny. Jadis' and my courtship, being like many others were and are, started through sex. I showed them mine and they showed me theirs [theirs not shown for obvious legal reasons]:

We didn't just like what we saw, but played a lot online [about five weeks straight] before they swooped in on their chariot to escort me from Michigan to Florida. But this was a process that involved larger world events [Covid], personal frustrations on both our sides [our exes/recent separations], and bad decisions on my part wanting to salvage my present circumstances by ignoring in Jadis what I—and my hot piece of ass/puppy-like enthusiasm—sincerely thought she could fix through tender love and care, but also gobs and gobs of fresh hot cum: saying to them, "This is what I'm gonna give you!" and thinking they wanted me—body, heart and soul! "Best laid plans" 'n all, this time the mouse being wrong [or the woman working the plow, I suppose].

In the meantime, my prospective partner to plow approved of my sexual appetite and clearly working goods. But the moment I "misbehaved" by calling them out, they traded me in for a different model—treating me like a faulty car³⁴⁰ or horse that had thrown a shoe/wouldn't behave, chattelizing me but also the person who came before and after me [re: they went back to their ex]. I used to think the problem lay with me—that I was "somehow" broken or didn't deserve love—but in truth, while we both damaged, they used theirs to abuse me. And so I discovered that it not only feels good to bare it all and tell my story to the larger world; but it feels empowering to do it repeatedly as part of the code I'm constantly writing in these volumes!

Hindsight is 20/20. Yet, if Volume Three [the first book I wrote, but have yet to publish as of writing this] was me flirting with the idea of exposing Jadis, and the Undead Module was me telling my story about Jadis in full to begin learning from it, then this section you're reading now—the Demon Module side of my ongoing testimony—is the logical follow-through of that painful healing process after laying Jadis to rest: strapping myself to the cross by digging their fat zombie ass back up, or in more demonic language, summoning back to the mortal plane to trot out my show pony duplicate of what well-and-truly made my life from May 2020 to February 2022 a living hell! To it, we don't owe anything to our abusers privately or publicly abusing us; they forgo that privilege the moment they harm us.

Creation is sacred and profane; you can't have good without bad, babies without batter, and nothing good ever lasts, but neither does anything bad. Instead, it's a historical-material cycle, one where state and labor proponents dialectically-materially war to develop or abort Communism. Gothic Communism is Gothically mature and Capitalism is not. In turn, Gothic maturity is the ability to discuss difficult topics using Gothic poetics to achieve holistic, total perspective; re: even the situation I partially described, above, wasn't all bad—and not to downplay my own rape at their hands, because it was bad—but two things can also be true at once, and good sex, creation [biological pregnancy or otherwise] and relationships need passion to work [insofar as they meet our needs beyond the basic material necessities]. It's a paradox that abusers frequently exploit to stabilize and handle their prey until they have what they want from them.

Ergo, things with Jadis were incredibly bad but also incredibly good: one, because Jadis caught flies with honey, and two, because their subsequent piss and vinegar pushed me to meet Jericho, followed by Cuwu, and eventually Bay while producing my life's work having lived a full life. A real Victor Frankenstein making me into the monster they wanted to control—but also Mephistopheles tempting a trans-woman Fausta—consider how Jadis had seduced me with a taste of the good stuff/fire of the gods, which I wanted after they'd "turned off the tap."

In short, "I'd grown addicted to water" and desired its return! This ultimately backfired and I escaped Jadis' hold on me—not for good, but enough to get out from under their thumb and build a new life in the desert of their Ozymandian hubris:

"Full life, full book," so seize the day, lovelies! Yes, Jadis was little more than a robber baron aping the Man to rape me; yet, rape also isn't a "win button" for the elite to terrorize victims into inaction, but something you can use to build the end of their line during the whore's revenge [e.g., Morgana helping birth Mordred (through sex and magic) to castrate Arthur]. To it, reclaiming terror language needs to happen, and experimentation is vital to synthesizing demonic knowledge as something that survives as much between us as outside ourselves. So never let anyone discourage you from taking risks [within reason, of course]—and certainly never take anything given for granted/in blind faith: canon is meant to blind you and steal your dreams/power for the elite, but also their lapdogs like Jadis, the person, ultimately was—a real Cuntasaurus Rex. "Tis a shadow of a thought that I loved!" "Alas, poor Yorick!"

artist: Jadis; [source: Persephone van der Waard's "Why I Submit: A Subby Gothacist's Attitudes on Metroidvania, Mommy Doms, and Sexual Persecution," 2021]

Beyond making myself feel good, I mention Jadis here because it showcases how the gaslight [and its rape] happen as much between media and people versus either in isolation; i.e., the state gaslights, gatekeepers, girlbosses strict mommy doms to pacify actual labor action trying to subvert canonical Gothic's praxial inertia, and that's exactly what Jadis did to me, but also what the demons in Smile and Evil Dead [from Hammer of Witches canonizing Beowulf onwards into the future] are also doing. It's what Musk and Trump are doing. And so on.

If you feel yourself being tricked by such canonical worship, think of Jadis for a more earthbound perspective to ground you; i.e., they raped me, but also inspired me to survive them in ways I could salvage from their ample "corpse" [Jadis is alive and well, to my knowledge; our relationship is not]: "Mortal Kombaaaaaaat! Uh-uh, uh, uh, uh, uh, uh, uh!" So do we camp the past to subvert it while having fun, and that means reviving its harmful aspects in fearsome-looking but ultimately harmless clones of themselves.

Eventually Jadis stopped caring about that—choosing instead to betray and harm me instead of actually being a good partner—but if ever there was anything good they showed me without harming me, it was that sex to overcome abuse can be fun. Eventually it just stopped being fun, with them; re: because they gradually started to abuse me. This abuse lasted for nearly two years, and it has taken just as long [and constant hard work] not merely to heal from it, but to turn that healing into something useful towards what Jadis hated more than anything else in the world: developing Communism. Every day afterwards has been a gift—one from me to all of you: my magic man! Ta-da!

So forget "you have only to lose your chains!" Only with chains of our own devising—during mutual consent illustrated through informed labor action opposing state forces—can we truly free ourselves from the hellish state bondage and illusion that is Capitalist Realism: a Hell of our own hermeneutic, phenomenology and application, levitating in delicious convulsion and psychosexual "martyrdom" haunted by harm! It's not an opiate, but forbidden sight attached to pleasure and pain hyphenated to not just survive those people and structures that harm us, but subvert and transform them to help us thrive, speaking to spite their machinations [to meet new mates who, in spite of our mutual weirdness, won't harm us and vice versa]! Sweet apostacy, let's proselytize!)

No one asks to be raped; but many rape victims camp their holocaust by putting "rape" in quotes while remembering past sacrifices they made/secret shames they wrestle with as society's perpetual monstrous-feminine virgins/whores (a fact the Gothic hyphenates on the same surfaces, above). The way to survive the fash, thus the pimp is to break their monopoly on whores. This includes white moderates like Jadis.

"Demons," like Lewis eating Ambrosio from inside-outside himself (and unmaking God's Adam to wickedly and deliciously reverse Genesis) during the cryptonymy process, then, are as much us inside ourselves creating likenesses of old friends and enemies outside ourselves; re: my fashioning of Jadis to escape their real-life double, and one informed by a variety of texts we both grew up with.

These interrelations, in turn, are entirely endless, and which we'll examine a handful here, vis-à-vis Smile, Evil Dead, my ex Jadis (again), and other germane concepts; we'll also discuss summoning them to subvert their potential beyond the state's intended usage—i.e., in our own performative lands of excess and uncanny valleys of strange contrast hammering swords into ploughshares.

About that. Fascism doesn't fight fair—is when Imperialism comes home to empire as something to defend from "us"; the world, as a system of exploitation, only "ends" when Nazis stop being Nazis and lay down their arms to dismantle the state with us against the elite. Until then, they conjure up their own "moons" to hunt us down with: warships of all kinds, size and shapes, onstage and off.

However false or real these are, they remain a performance we can decolonize on the same battlefields, be those on terra firma or up in the clouds overhead, the state of exception expanding into outer space (with Musk desperate to go to Mars for some reason). "And the moon rattles in the sky like a piece of angry candy..." With that bearing down on us, it's normal to question our sanity in fighting something so stupidly big.

But the reality is, they only have what power you give them and you can only see such things in pieces while cutting them down to size. That happens in the day-to-day spheres the capitalist cannot control. He's too big and fat, only waiting for a worldwide rebellion to come along and burst his bubble; i.e., colonies always have a built-in time limit with a lit fuse, and America is just another police state whose time is running out.

Lucas certainly loved his propaganda battles (above), but rebellion isn't won by singular monomythic events advancing the rights of single groups (white straight boys); it's a group effort that leads to gradual change that, sure enough, happens eventually all at once. So now's the time to fight for that shifting of the tides! Run and change shape, become invisible to them! Steal their plans! Tire them out! Remind them all their power comes from what they steal, so cut off their supply! Infinite form, infinite capacity to affect change by leveraging labor and action against their giant machines needing us to play along to work. In denying them our blood, everything stops, giving us the power to negotiate the slings and arrows through asymmetrical warfare!

To that, next we'll focus on not playing along during our own plays, doing several close-reads that outline the demonic history and theory we're working with, here: to apply it to such ongoing battles of development, onstage and off!

Dark Shadows: The Origins of Demonic Persecution and Camp; or, Applying My Education (from School and Jadis) to Smile, Evil Dead and More

"I have seen the dark shadows moving in the woods and I have no doubt that whatever I have resurrected through this book is sure to come calling for me."

—Doctor Raymond Knowby, Evil Dead (1981)

Now that we've unmasked a double of my abuser similar to how Radcliffe would have done to the abusers of women (extended to other minorities beyond women), let's apply this education to a couple of close-reads (I know, I know—I said I wouldn't do any more of these, but we have to be able to apply the knowledge of the past to the present, somehow).

To that, demons look human because they are human and this can be good or bad not simply per a Cartesian binary but a dialectical-material one: demons for workers or the state as a matter of transformation and exchange, generally through the canonizing or camping of torture and rape (the subversion of what is supposedly preordained/-determined by almighty inhuman forces). The Road, for Bakhtin, is a place to encounter characters in a story's advertisement of space and time; i.e., the Gothic chronotope one of pandemonium, thus infinite possibility and change. Demons are whores as things to expose. Let's get down to brass tacks, shall we?

The idea is a road to Hell, summoned up less by the road being moved or changed, and more that upon it appears a magic man (or some other cosmic visitor beyond God's grace bearing a similar level of power) to make our dreams (of a world beyond Capitalism) come true! It's a Holy Grail of sorts, but a false one that, when consumed, canonically threatens Instant Death (with Spielberg's The Last Crusade [1989] continuing the same mix-and-match of Abrahamic—pointedly Jewish and Christian—dogmas to punch Nazis and Arabs by white saviors and Numinous trinkets with a Zionist flavor to them, above). But that doesn't stop temptation from personifying and being tempting in ways that speak to class, culture and race war, now does it? Such has been the case since Paradise Lost, at least—a quality that couches rebellion within a sexy rebel that, in the hands of state proponents, adopts a likeness of rebellion they will use to police the whore and her revenge with to have the state's instead; re: the pimp vs the whore.

Or as Ann Wilson sings about on the throbbing and urgent "Magic Man" (1975), Dreamboat Annie is Charon's Canoe front-loaded with a sexy mystery—why do women run off with strange men on the road to Hell?

"Come on home, girl" Mama cried on the phone
 "Too soon to lose my baby yet, my girl should be at home"
 But try to understand, try to understand
 Try, try, try to understand, he's a magic man, Mama, ah
 He's a magic man³⁴¹ (source).

The short answer is power and rebellion from problems at home. Yet, temptation is painful because escape is a passion, and giving in before, during and after that point aches in more ways than one; i.e., vigor and physical longing (the dreaded blue balls/clit) versus more emotional kinds of loss that, for the young, they've never had/are experiencing for the first time as babes in the wilderness; i.e., less

In an interview (and also in the VH-1 special I mentioned) Ann revealed that the "Magic Man" was her then-boyfriend, band manager Michael Fisher, and that part of the song was an autobiographical telling of the beginnings of their relationship. (from Wikipedia) Michael was originally Heart's guitarist. Ann followed Michael to Canada during the Vietnam War years so he wouldn't get drafted. In 1974, Nancy joined the band later and Michael then became the band's manager and sound engineer (ibid.).

Ideally we learn from real life when playing with demons; re: during calculated risk, learning from trauma in safer Radcliffean forms that we can respond to and mimic while synthesizing praxis ourselves; i.e., while going beyond the concerns of cis-het white women like Ann and Nancy Wilson while, in the same breath, listening to and learning from their own stories of survival: "missing white girl" syndrome. Others are tired of selective triage favoring the biggest marginalized voice; i.e., we have to think of all workers, not just white women and children (Dreamboat Annie—more like "Are you okay, Annie?" amirite?)!

for those actually young and more from a lack of experience/glut of stunted growth, experience is the teacher of fools (speaking from experience, here).

Cis or not, a young woman's viewpoint of forbidden desire, then, is classically more hysterical than a man's (e.g., Black Sabbath's "N.I.B.," 1970); but in truth, it's the same argument, made with "vaginal/clitoral" feminine energies versus "phallic" masculine ones (which the Gothic/ GNC elements of Matthew Lewis challenge Radcliffe's centralizing of the usual gender/colonial binary admonishing white cis female rebellion and demonizing everything else under the sun; i.e., anything outside the nuclear model is a whore, but virgins are whores waiting to happen by bumping into their evil twins).

Now that we've gone over whores, abusers and Faust more generally—and have set the stage for doubling by demasking Jadis—here is the list of points we shall cover in "Summoning the Whore through Magic" as a matter of covering the basic history before synthesizing ourselves through poetry and close-read:

- Rehashing Radcliffe and the Process of Investigating Demons; or Summoning Today's Whore \(through Yesterday's Magic\)
- Origins of Faust; or, a Brief History of Demons and Their Torturous Summoning Rituals and Effects
- Pulling a Faust; or, Summoning Power, Active Impostors, Death Curses, and Radcliffe's Exquisite "Torture" \(feat. Smile, Jadis, Evil Dead, and more\)

- Introducing the Demonic Trifecta
- The Difference between Canonical and Exquisite "Torture"
- A Note about Our Small Friends Also Tortured by Capital
- The Dangers \(and Pleasures\) of Demonic Camp

Furthermore, whereas "Making Demons" examined the Promethean Quest and composite, manmade demons, the rest of the "Summoning Demons" subchapter will focus on two things in two parts:

- summoned, supernatural demons and their numerous rituals of torture; i.e., the relationship of power exchange expressed in forbidden, occult forms

- the participants; i.e., the summoned demon, but also those who play their Faustian games of torture: the damsels and detectives as demonic vessels (sex demons) during demon BDSM working under a presumption of torture and guilt with or without irony

As such, we'll outline the base idea of what summoned demons constitute during oppositional praxis, including their persecutorial role in canonical stories; i.e., by attacking demons as a mode of genderqueer expression. After that, we'll examine how earlier Western³⁴² authors of demonic tales—namely Radcliffe and Lewis' respective terror and horror classes of black penitents/sex demons/smooth criminals—were effectively explorers facing monsters, but especially the derelict "ancient" stories and infamous demons left curiously behind for others to find: to summon and pass things imperfectly along as demons do (almost a game of charades: "It's right in front of you!" wiggling intensifies).

(artist: Sabrina Val)

Rehashing Radcliffe and the Process of Investigating Demons; or Summoning Today's Whore (through Yesterday's Magic)

Regarding all of yesterday's demons, we're effectively left with a series of older trials—of fire and pain, but also temptation (above)—those having completed them braving the death curses and threats of demon rape to uncover forbidden knowledge for new generations to uncover through our own means of summoning the past: learn enough to be dangerous, then make your own monsters during ludo-Gothic BDSM's calculated risk (magic men or otherwise—with Radcliffe's being more about the threat of rape than raw sex appeal or attraction; i.e., her Gothic heroines weren't allowed to have sexual desires, but merely be preyed upon by men in black with hypnotic blue eyes threatening modesty with raw mutilative force: older highwaymen in disguise, solving "property disputes" [dowry] through force; e.g., Henry Fonda's "Frank" a whorish tramp to conjure out of the imaginary past and thrill through the threat of rape in isolation, not married to sex appeal³⁴³).

³⁴³ Fonda played a villain in Once Upon a Time in the West (1968)—out-of-character for him (source: Andrew McGowan's "This Classic Western Turned a Beloved Hollywood Hero into a Vicious Monster," 2024). Across from him, Charles Bronson (a real piece of work, known for his Deathwish revenge films) is the Gothic hero also transplanted to the Western retro-future that, however alien it seems to us, Fonda's villain calls home (already a dead genre by the time Leone directed those and his operatic "spaghetti Western" "Man with No name" trilogy): white knight, black knight; good cop, bad cop; etc. Zeuhl and I watched it and Leone's trilogy on the couch. We fucked in between movies ("as thick as a door," comrade), and I loved the trilogy. Once Upon a Time was so boring I fell asleep—but Morricone's music (reused for satirical effect in Joe Dante's 'The Burbs, 1989) was great.

Like Radcliffe (the Gothic version of Jane Austen, the latter author mocking the former), the Western is deeply aware of material struggles, but places them square-and-solely in the hands of white people; e.g., Max Mad: Fury Road's (2015) white savior problem turning white women into white Indians punching up against sexist white men. This argument starts with Radcliffe's hero/demon lover tropes, exemplified by the likes of Ludovico vs the evil Count Monti, from The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794); i.e., a pirate narrative that puts the lady-in-question in between a struggle over "booty." It's frankly the kind of thing Shakespeare's Hamlet (1623) Act 4, Scene 6 alludes to when Hamlet is captured by pirates, and what William Goldman's 1973 The Princess Bride makes fun of, with the Dread Pirate Roberts (a man-in-black to excite the ladies with).

In Gothic, rape is vicarious. Radcliffe knew the fairytale tropes well, and played around with men and women wearing white and/or black—her stories having their own kidnappings and adventure; i.e., usually in the periphery and told to the women afterwards to protect their virtue, less they swoon: a damsel in distress is a horny damsel in distress (the confusion of pleasure and pain, mid-vaso-vagal response, aka "the deer in highlights").

It's vital, then, to try and remember that Radcliffe's stories weren't just hypercanonical, but neo-conservative and borrowing from older stories already done to death by the time she started mining them for parts; e.g., the trope of the old ruin that might have banditti in it (the old medieval

In doing so, Gothic Communists can avoid rehabilitating actual abusers, while subverting the demonic ritual and "black penitent" (re: Radcliffe's sexual deviant) further and further away from its sublimated, acceptable forms of rape, death and harm, etc. The pageantry is transgressive but salubrious; i.e., from spectacle, circus and ceremony as things less to stand on and more to contractually make the main attraction! Demons are showboats who love showing other people their asses: an "ass like a demon" denotes extreme temptation, thus police interest! We cum with our guns loaded, you dig? Our vaginas (and other holes) are happy and angry! Hysteria! Wandering womb! Bicycle face!

residence haunted by trauma and Scooby-Doo-style impostors, but more violence); i.e., Radcliffe's contributions to Gothic being the idea of a female hero, presenting women as naturally curious but needing to be armored by vaso vagal syncope responses (re: swooning, above) and total-to-partial amnesia* while exploring the Gothic castle, lest any "close" encounters turn her into a whore (synonymous with criminal and corpse)!

Her stories are generally found documents written after the adventure is over with; i.e., a bildungsroman (coming-of-age story) and epistolary novel, similar to Frankenstein or Dracula [1897]: the novel-of-letters veering away from the novel-of-manners Austen would lionize, after the Gothic craze had begun to die out (she wrote Northanger Abbey [a Gothic parody] in 1803 but would publish her first novel, Sense and Sensibility, in 1811).*

In true canonical Gothic, Radcliffe was a charlatan pimp (madame, or female brothel owner) whose haunted whore houses upheld status-quo norms in subjugative demon language—with her whores (always non-magical and male) belonging to illegitimate neo-medieval feuds and bloodlines; e.g. the Black Knight, banditti, or false preacher being functionally no different than the witch, goblin or vampire: something to summon, exhibit, and banish to the closet, frontier or brothel again through dream-like monomythic force (encouraged, in part, because she was a woman and subject to fiercer criticism than Matthew Lewis was (re: Groom); i.e., despite being a gay man, he could "go stealth"/rely on his privilege as an MP but also the time's in which he lived having no overtly scientific homophobic language (outside of sodomy as a legal term borrowed from medieval times) to dodge queer persecution (though he was still facing it; re: Broadmoor).

To that, and in times of powerlessness and boredom, who doesn't want their life to unfurl with the awesome power of demons and their dark desire and revenge? Just exercise enough caution when using them that you don't "pull a Radcliffe"; I've been kettled by enough token whores to know the difference. Moreover, per virgin/whore, such binaries also apply to men/male parties antagonized by capital, and really any sex, gender or identity you could think of. Capital gentrifies and decays all in service to profit, effectively starting with Radcliffe—a warmonger and proto TERF—hiding behind the veneer of white feminine virtue: the whispers of the middle class and a succubus for the elite to pacify the rising middle class with (especially its female population: "By 1800, 45% of women in England could read. [...] This created a demand for a new type of literature. Radcliffe filled this demand by writing a novel women could actually relate to because they saw themselves in the heroine; source: Tufts Libraries Omeka, 2017).

In trying to legitimize the middle class through Neo-Gothic fakeries, Radcliffe punched down against a variety of groups abjected off into a "black sphere," including Lewis and his ilk. This includes actual systemic abuse decaying into itself, but also racialized/religious minorities and sex workers treated, by and large, as one-in-the-same. That means a woman of "loose morals" (e.g., a succubus, witch or vampire) is treated with a similar degree of fear and prejudice that a black knight is—especially if she's a monster queen! Radcliffe, as we shall see, was a cop and a coward/recluse.

Enshrined in carnival, demons are iconoclastically sex fiends, but still fiendishly sexual; i.e., raping ironically in ways haunted by superstitious and dogmatic fearmongering about sexuality in a post-penicillin world (for venereal purposes): learning from demons being hampered by a fear of making bad decisions and fucking up. Deals with them are to be feared less because of their immense size and more because of their predatory Faustian contracts (usually for souls or pounds of flesh or—with maidens—for their precious virtue), which have the uncanny ability to make humans look foolish; i.e., to trick and expose them as frauds! It's not always because of raw intelligence—primal hunger can play a hand in things—but usually demons are intelligent enough and combine this with strength, sex appeal, talent, and appetite, etc, to make for feared opponents precisely because they're your opponent (or your friend in disguise)!

Yes, demons seek conflict and trauma, but they also function as black mirrors to summon in times of protection and need; e.g., to keep our loved ones safe (the opposite of widow makers); i.e., "thirst" during "drought time," personifying not just the Seven Deadly Sins, but neo-medieval scapegoats of these things: the royal givers of forbidden knowledge that the self—especially the persona of the West—has conveniently repressed to save face per the abjection process. Demons reverse abjection and revel in it, invading a party-like or otherwise social space of play to corrupt it; i.e., perhaps most famously in the opera ball scene, which—under capital—routinely combines with holiday-themed cycles of summon and banishment during liminal stages of demonic possession and release; e.g., the Halloween dance from Blood: the Last Vampire (2000), a story about a cop who hates her job (at least, she does in the film version) and similar to Carpenter's Halloween (1978), warns of a shapeshifting menace drinking stolen blood among us that—when the membrane is thin—threatens to appear and haunt the usual harvests going on, year round! The joke, then, is on the detective; i.e., when she encounters actual supernatural demon lovers who aren't explained away/can't remove their monstrous elements like a theatre mask!

To this, demons actually "from Hell" are even more ominous than their manmade/theatrical counterparts; their dastardly (dis)agreements proceed them, inviting Faustian disaster (mutilation and bodily dismemberment) and mocking the outcomes—their suspicious, skulking and shady brokers, per Marlowe's anti-Semitism, embodying stigma, scandal, vice, bias, and sin during hauntological persecution language (e.g., Dante and the medieval cardinal sins—lust, gluttony and wrath, etc), and various taboos, anxieties and neuroses. In short, demons are fallen from grace³⁴⁴, dredged up to remind humans that they are, too (which translates dialectically-materially to workers vs the state).

As such, demons are classically (through a theocratic-to-secular Christian lens) seen as creepy-yet-intimidating (often on fire) things to defeat/purge that reflect an evil side of the hero³⁴⁵—someone or something unscrupulous, barbaric, uncompromising and insidiously wretched, cruel, revolting and lecherous, often revived in centrist stories to then vanquish/scapegoat by monomythic combat, but also games of chance and contests of the mind: you summon them for duels, deals and games of various kinds, but classically through sex and force (as with Beowulf and Grendel, translating per Tolkien into tooth-and-nail fights with orcs and goblins out of Old Norse and anti-Semitic myth into modern-day pogroms).

³⁴⁴ I should add that "grace" and Heaven are Christian ideas; i.e., of afterlife and reward for good behavior that, under Capitalism, translates to a Protestant, aka Puritan work ethic. Work to is holy and deserving of rewards in the afterlife, versus Judaism, which doesn't have any Hell to speak of; i.e., nothing to threaten its practitioners while the same way that Christians do (to my knowledge, anyways). Similar to golems, Jewish treatment of demons is classically neutral (versus Zionism, which Christianizes Judaism to adopt a white, Western approach to the religion, which—apart from alienating non-Western ethnic groups and orthodoxies within the larger culture not attached classically to a nation-state body/settler-colonial project—also demonizes Arabs for Christians).

³⁴⁵ Or their ward; e.g., the maidenly princess possessed by the spirit of the whore begging to be stabbed, mid-combat: Dragon's Crown's [2013] vampire supping on maidens, turning them wicked and requiring the hero execute them. The police violence is the main attraction to a given witch hunt, any outward beauty regarding the whore (and token cop) is just icing on the cake. Such lies are often sugar-coated all the same, sweetening the (sex)pot: to beguile with honey as much as raw strength or brains (and to have himbos and herbos underestimate the whore-in-question; i.e., the Western myth that sexy = dumb but also incapable of fighting back).

These kinds of demons are badass to yield bigger and better bounties (re: "looting Hell"), but also Radcliffean catharsis upon defeat and banishment back to Hell by righteous police forces (e.g., the Greater Demon from Dragon's Crown, left).

The deal, then, is a fight to the death, to the victor going the spoils ("render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's...").

By extension, heroes even go to or encounter demons out in the wild, often during Crusades or rescue missions (re: Tolkien's dwarves and Erebor); i.e., in a ruin or place of concentrated power and darkness (a kind of power); e.g., Oedipus and the Sphinx, or Siegfried rescuing Brunhilde in Wagner's Ring Cycle. Some demons are positively massive, yet ghostlike and ethereal despite their ferocity and size; just as many are as small as jackals or monkeys, as seductive as shadows, or as light as a feather. But all involve unequal, forbidden and dark exchange/dealings in some shape or form—power and knowledge (with Faust favoring fatal knowledge) commonly expressing anisotropic revenge; re: for the pimp or the whore, during ludo-Gothic BDSM! In part, a canonical superstition looms over the continued blending and regeneration, a guiding fascination/fear that moves the artist's hand (exhibit 44a2/46a); the process becomes an incantation, one that speaks of the Devil, causing them to appear and "torture" the viewer (a BDSM house call, more or less: "Dial 'M' for Murder!").

Far from being undesirable, this ritual and its rapturous outcome are entirely the point: to summon demons and experience whatever exquisitely "torturous" power they have to offer through excruciating pain (and/or illicit extramarital sex) as something to exchange, agonize over and reunite with, post-alienation by capital. It's literally power exchange demonized, often with psychosexualized components. As Gothic Communists, we'll be humanizing these ideas, doing so while thinking about power exchange in BDSM terms (social-sexual habits); i.e., that venerate and protect workers through the demonic trifecta's performative roles of demon (the dom), detective (the switch) and damsel (the sub): as lifted from more classic examples like Ann Radcliffe, Matthew Lewis, or Rudolph Otto when making our own demons. Their stories/scholarships used demons to threaten damsels, which detectives police on both fronts (the virgin/whore). By comparison, creativity becomes our secret weapon; i.e., our revenge vs the state's, either conjured up by the dark side of the Western paradigm, and which we fags/sex workers (and other minorities) simply call "home."

Before we can do that, in "Exploring the Derelict Past," we'll have to understand the difference between canonical torture and exquisite "torture,"; i.e., having married the fear of inquisition (from the Middle Ages)—and then to Hammer of Witches and Gothic (the Renaissance)—onto increasingly hauntological Neo-

Gothic revivals of these things for canonical versus campy forms. The Church classically forbid knowledge as canon/gnosis, whose uncovering was strictly prohibited yet explored by parties with privilege able to create their own demons; re: Radcliffe as the queen of exquisite "torture," yet also allergic to magic spells, aiding the Protestant ethic.

However invented, we'll unpack these spells, now, then consider their canonical function in demonology that Radcliffe tip-toed around, its evolution over time, the demonic trifecta as an investigation framing device, the basic difference between canonical and iconoclastic forms, canon's harmful effects on nature at large, and finally the dangers of demonic camp when practiced by us; i.e., as something to keep in mind when exploring the derelict torturous past (and its magical demons), ourselves!

Origins of Faust; or, a Brief History of Demons and Their Torturous Summoning Rituals and Effects

A note about sexuality before we begin: Demons, like BDSM, don't have to be sexual, though they often are; i.e., demons can be asexual—especially when tied to animals as pets or extensions of nature to learn from and relate to in sex-positive ways [which include asexuality on the same larger gradient]. Many demons are considered intelligent, but they don't have to be (the knowledge they offer more of a relationship to nature as something to respect, including its boundaries and inability to consent). —Perse

As Foucault has shown, "power" can be an incredibly vague and broad measurement; as Shelley showed, demons can be made to quest for self-destructive fire/fire of the gods; but as Faust showed, the classic way is to summon them for knowledge, doing so categorically being dangerous and whose naked exposure to chaotic power often leads the know-it-all to get a new asshole (or three): when summoning someone stronger than them who likes fucking with them and ripping them apart (re: Lewis and Ambrosio). The act—of summoning demons for power—is equally broad, offering effectively whatever one's heart desires: sexual favors, social advantage, material gain, and revenge, etc, from basic to so-called "final forms" (finality is a myth, concerning demons).

Whatever the case, it is primarily a Western, post-Roman (thus Christian) idea, and has evolved over time. Stephen Johnson writes how—from Biblical times, to the Renaissance, to the present—the tradition of summoning demons evolved according to a series of famous demonic texts (the titles and explanations paraphrased directly from Johnson's 2022 blogpost, "How to Summon a Demon"):

- The Testament of Solomon (c. the 1st century CE and the high medieval period): In the testament, Solomon is given a magic ring that compels Beelzebub and his ilk to build Solomon's Temple, bending these beings to his will.
- Malleus Maleficarum, or Hammer of Witches (1478): Written by a Catholic clergyman named Heinrich Kramer, the author pointed the finger at heretics of the Catholic Church worshipping fake demons, while still being enslaved to as evil beings deserving of punishment. In short, it was a call to violence against the Church's enemies for entirely invented reasons.
- De Praestigijs Daemonum (On the Tricks of Demons) and its appendix, Pseudomonarchia Daemonum (False Monarchy of Demons): Both were written/collected in 1563 by physician Johan Weyer, who catalogued a hierarchy of 69 (nice) demons, including their summoning instructions. According to Johnson, Weyer saw the practice as entirely fake, seeking to expose the black magic as a delusional practice unworthy of capital punishment.
- Doctor Faustus (1590), which Johnson doesn't mention, but theatrically concerns the summoning of demons and said rituals deleterious effects. There's also the Golem of Prague (which presents demons as friendly to their makers, but which Marlowe's anti-Semitic elements demonize in favor of Christian abjection)

Since then, demonic summoning and its perilous wish fulfillment have slowly drifted away from canon's sex-coercive forms of torture porn and demonic persecution, and more towards whatever sex-positive minds can make up (deities from within our breasts, re: Blake).

Pulling a Faust; or, Summoning Power, Active Impostors, Death Curses, and Radcliffe's Exquisite "Torture" (feat. Smile, Jadis, Evil Dead, and more)

Before we delve into precisely how, I want to make four basic distinctions that differentiate summoned demons from the undead and the manmade/astronoetic demons we've already examined (examining Smile, Jadis, and Evil Dead, as we do).

First, the summoning of power through the perversion of religious experiences. While all monsters are byproducts of Gothic language, demonic animation is somewhat unique compared to the undead we've already looked at. Whereas

- zombies and vampires function more as analogs for disease (one uncontrolled and the other invited inside)
- ghosts tend to haunt or loom inside language
- and composites are literally manmade, usually from the bodies of the dead or from inorganic materials during golemesque acts of mad science (they are also, as we have discussed, canonically abused by their creators) demons are immortal, not undead, in a modular sense; furthermore, the summoned variety hail from Somewhere Else, often another non-Christian Pagan world or time (versus the natural class, which more often are activated or summoned by natural magics, but also spiritual/recreational drug-use). As such, supernatural demons generally offer forbidden, Promethean knowledge as keepers/embodiments thereof; i.e., secrets of things alienated from us and fetishized by the elite to compel their antagonized harvesting vis-à-vis mirror syndrome; e.g., a Numinous rapture, often a uniquely potent and forbidden sexual experience offered up by a sex demon's queer alternative to the heteronormative order—for a price, of course (re: guilty pleasure/controlled opposition).

Like organized religion, the above rituals are largely made up or bastardized from older stories, meaning the boundaries surrounding knowledge are also made up; i.e., entirely conveyed through rituals of power exchange tied to occult expression, which becomes the very thing to forbid or allow depending on what it achieves. As usual, canon maintains the status quo by dehumanizing the monster through Faustian bargains. It achieves this through the demon's relationship to "normal" humans, punishing the summoner unironically by having the demon reliably "trick or treat" them: blinding them, tearing their body apart, and stealing their Christian soul. Preventing alternatives to this canonically horrifying outcome is essential to maintaining a bourgeois Superstructure through demonic production and execution; i.e., by not attempting to humanize the demon as Shelley did (who was an atheist).

By comparison, iconoclasm humanizes the exchange (and breaks Capitalist Realism) by making demons and their offerings more exquisite and delicious, generally in ways that are empowering and xenophilic but normally denied by the status quo to the performing group; e.g., women playing with demons to carry out their own "rapes" during what are effectively controlled experiments. Faustian, like Promethean, means "self-destructive," whereupon iconoclasm offers a death of the status quo according to workers who embrace a new kind of self through humanized demons (e.g., Richard Matteson's I Am Legend, 1954).

Second, the active impostor. Capitalism is built on generational lies and theft, poorly divorced from past rudimentary forms from which those in the present inherit the world. The classic conundrum of a fearful inheritance and uncertain, conflicted ownership is called into question; i.e., by demons who love to torment the new tenants with fearful reminders of past barbarities, as well as present falsehoods: "Your bloodline is murderous and false." As part of the general process, demons are far more active and sentient as impostors than ghosts are, able to trick their human victims by literally changing shape and appearing and disappearing at will; ghosts, meanwhile, are frozen in time, tending to "deceive" through the cryptonymic nature of rumors, chronotopic legends and all-around human language (demonstrating traumatic [re]memory as die-hard but imperfect).

This being said, there is crossover. A demon has access to the supernatural plane, including spirits and xenoglossia, but also the ability to physically change its shape, gender and sex; re: Matthew Lewis' Satan in The Monk and Broadmoor's insistent of Lewis as precociously queer vis-à-vis Milton. The Devil—to deceive the deceiver³⁴⁶ and ultimately destroy him—disguises himself as the masc-/male-³⁴⁶ In Gothic, truth and falsehood are not separate, but go hand-in-hand (often paradoxically at the same time); in Communism, development is a matter of war in terms of class, culture, and race. As Sun Tzu put it, "all war is based on deception," Gothic Communism combines paradox and deception, during oppositional praxis, to synthesize deceiving our opponents, the elite, while pressing our demands and advantage. That's the fundamental difference between Lewis and Radcliffe, and why one was radical and the other a moderate conservative.

This includes their monstrous output; i.e. what they made and summoned during the cryptonymy and abjection processes; re: power is often something to perform as a matter of disguise through poetic argument: costumes, masks and roles, but also inversions of what is normally concealed inside us turned inside-out (and vice versa; e.g., armor as skin): existing in holistic, liminal, anisotropic, ergodic, concentric duality. Such is the whore's lot, thus the demon having its revenge. We dictate our terms not in the neat, clean binaries of civil discourse, but in daily life's modern chaos; i.e., as fought in/with the dark, uncertain, medieval territories of risk and excitement threatening radical change pushing towards future development and true self-absorbed by state argument trapping nature in older brothels with borders.

Developing Communism through Gothic poetics—re: by liberating sex work with iconoclastic art—demands as much a waiting game, then; i.e., one that implores gentle patience (discipline) amid overwhelming anxiety (simulated weakness) as overt aggression (simulated strength) forged within pacts of hellish impudence (calculated risk). All have a part to play from moment to moment, a Faustian exchange as much a statement of rest and repose as reaping and revenge, while still weaving elaborate deceptions that aid us through darkness visible. Yes, there's torture, assassins and death by Snu-Snu dreaming of revenge and changing the status quo in relatable forms (e.g., Princess Ileana's death scene or the Bride spitting on Frankenstein's monster from Creature Commandos [2025] riffing on Shelley's infamous Questa); it relies on creativity as a guerrilla, counterterrorist device to offset state monopolies (and other tools).

presenting Rosario, followed by the femme-and-masculine, female Matilda: through a campy rendition of the canonical/iconoclastic shapeshifting power of angels and demons—with Matilda something of a detective in reverse, blowing the whistle on the Church and eventually leading to its open-secret prison's glorious destruction (queer wish fulfillment).

And while this happens in a time before queer identity was a matter of public discourse (re: Foucault, relegated to the shadows of the cryptonymy process/disguise pastiche), the Devil does so to punish a hidden killer disguised as a holy man, in the panopticon (also Foucault): the incestuous, duplicitous and rapacious Ambrosio, whose eventual anti-Genesis deconstruction remains authored by a queer man that Coleridge, a famous straight critic, would conflate queerness—thus the growing rise of degeneracy or "dangerous confusion" in British culture—with demons tempting Faust. Such proto-fascism and its performatively insidious moral outrage is not so different, then, from the fear of the xenomorph as the dark dildo from outer space, nowadays (re: Leonard Maltin); i.e., queer displacement and abjection as something to finger-wag by liberal admonishment whitewashing reactionary politics. So it was then, so it is now.

Demons also conceal themselves using ghosts, which a demon doubles and "wears" like a "mask" (re: the wendigo "nihilism demon" in *The Night House*³⁴⁷ [2019] impersonating the ghost of the dead husband, its doing so constituting mnemonic theft and weaponization of the heroine's memories: the upside-down world loops concentrically in on itself, trapping the heroine in darkness with nowhere to go under the twin surveilling moons). Whereas ghosts are generally concerned with hidden curses that are inadvertently passed along through technology as preserving them (and their potential revenge or benediction), demons tend to be ceremoniously announced, mid-unheimlich/mise-en-abyme.

As such, they act as active, covert liars and administrators of punishment tied to the Numinous, "darkness visible," and the mighty places/unknown pleasures lurking beyond canonical realms of normal human experience (thus Capitalist Realism): Hell, the underworld, a faraway land, etc, as forbidden sight; i.e., gleaned in those we think we know acting a bit weird (the nightmare anti-home/evil double, below). They are the Numinous come home to roost, during fatal homecoming and nostalgia—the black penitent/medieval backstabber and flagellant hungry for human souls, mid-apocalypse (forcing their hard kink onto captive participants); re: Marx' "capital is dead labor feeding on living labor"—the general process trapped (as Castricano writes) in between parts of language!

³⁴⁷ Demons constitute a kind of "aggressive haunting" whose rememory process involves survived abuse as much as activism. I've already written about this per The Night House and my own abuse: re: "One Foot out the Door; or, Playing with Dolls to Express One's Feeling Undead" (2024).

Cryptomimesis isn't just writing with ghosts, though (as Castricano determines about Derrida and his own Spectres), but as I argue, extends to demons; i.e., as a broader monster class, during ludo-Gothic BDSM threatening rape stalking us: a lurking threat jeering "Me likey!" through bared animal teeth not quite of this earth! Gothic villainy is both old and new in its invented theatricalities (as [Red Death from Venture Bros. \[2003\]](#) expertly explains to a captive audience he's tied to the railroad tracks³⁴⁸—tired of the same and oh-so-hungry for more! Some prefer cartoon laughter and sweeping monologues; others can kill with a look or a smile: a bald-faced liar isn't the same thing as an outright lie (re: Banquo's "agents of darkness bring us truths..."). "She is a very kinky girl," the virgin and the whore trapped deliciously in one paradoxical place.

(exhibit 45d: The demon from Smile [2022] is a chronic abuser³⁴⁹ who desires an audience, two-fold: to gaslight and gatekeep its prey [and to have them "watch and learn" during the counterfeit haunted by the ghost of trauma the middle class can stare at with equal parts fear and fascination]. It does the first by showing the heroine false copies/memories from her past [usually as faces that it "wears" like a mask]—all to gaslight her sense of reality as it closes the gap. The second, it achieves through the falseness of her actual lovers and friends, who it expertly alienates her from; i.e., when confronted with the slightest bit of pushback from her—and despite any connection to the heroine's painful secret past [matriarchal trauma]—said friends are "fair weather" and lose faith in her immediately. They blame the victim because they can't see the tormentor [re: DARVO and obscurantism]—in effect unwittingly becoming part of the same awful game [so often, good Samaritans overestimate their own goodness and ability to spot predators; i.e., they enjoy the perks of a system that punishes witness testimony by default, and which the demon will exploit to get what it wants by cherry-picking those with trauma].

Except, the torture also happens because the heroine's friends see her trauma as fabricated, illegitimate, and hysterical, a priori—a fact the demon knows [through ³⁴⁸ The bad BDSM, here, being performed by Clancy-motherfucking-Brown, a man who since 1986 at least (with The Highlander's Kurgan), has been making a meal out of classic kayfabe tropes surviving into the 20th century and beyond: "We've come to be the rulers of you all!"

³⁴⁹ When I see the Smile demon, I see Jadis, smiling at me from the dark, telling me I'm worthless. But the reality is, their entire sense of self operates through bad BDSM and unironic harm/exploitation—without which, their life has zero meaning: addicted to abuse to feel strong by having total power over others (for more on this topic, refer to "Back to Jadis' Dollhouse" and the other "Jadis" sections, from "Transforming Our Zombie Selves"). As their victim, the novelty quickly wore off (re: "Setting the Record Straight; My Ex's Abuse of Me: February 17th, 2022"); but for Jadis, my misery became the center of their entire universe. "All [their] thought [was] bent on it."

intuition as much as omniscience] and exploits for personal gain and satisfaction: something whore-like to abject regarding the maiden as normally modest, and forcing her, when push comes to shove, to solve her own murder before it's too late! Weird attracts weird, and the demon—a proud harvester of unironic harm being its preferred pleasure—chooses the heroine, a victim of past rape, to be its next future victim. The fear is delicious to it, as is the panic and other emotions its bedlam raises: fakes don't hold a candle to them, or rather the real thing doesn't hold a candle to calculated risk evoking the Numinous! To camp rape is to regain control in the presence of debilitating conditions [sensations or otherwise].

"Then she should have died, hereafter." Doing so appears random and Job-like, but is actually highly selective in its stochastic terrorism. In a nice twist, the movie presents the demon's scheme as suitably both "pure magic" and "all in her head," but really is giving the audience an effective metaphor of abuse; i.e., prolonged, untreated abuse bearing fruit—a breaking point, one leading to self-harm by the abuser telling the abused to commit suicide and they actually obey³⁵⁰ [above, to please Master]: to kill oneself for the moth, hungry for the flame. It goes both ways, but remains anisotropic. The representation and its advocacy are always in between and out-of-joint, haunting the venue as half-real, inside-outside. "What if the Devil possesses me to kill myself?" speaks to the abjecting of colonial guilt onto fear of the outside, "the Devil made me do it" being codified in a very material sense of gaslighting—one that lives in stories like Smile, The Babadook and similar madwoman-in-the-attack-type stories threatening to take hold [the original being a Jane Eyre's Bertha, a woman of color the white protagonist feared turning into]. Abjection is us versus them, hence the mother of apathy. We must smother such dogma in the crib of our own brains connected to outside factors.

"A mind is its own place," and menticide isn't objective. So unless you've been through Hell, it's hard to know the invisible workings between victimizer and victim; i.e., if you haven't met someone capable of putting you through that, which only happens when they turn their attention [and terrible implements] towards you: as some who has previously been marked by trauma [the paradox being how much of this happens before we are born or at least fully aware of ourselves].

Furthermore, not everyone knows they have "been marked," at least not consciously at level they can easily parse; i.e., the facing of repressed trauma during live burial [and the dispossession of our faculties, mid-interment] being the Gothic master trope per generation—one whose discipline-and-punish panopticon admittedly has a hauntological, Freudian, psychosexual character orbiting inside and outside of people concerned with the decay of home across Western space and time; i.e., the more they deny the demon to keep up appearances, the more it can feed on the heroine, thus them: "Thou detestable maw, thou womb of death, / Gorged with the dearest morsel of the earth, / Thus I enforce thy rotten jaws to open, / And in despite I'll cram thee with more food" [source].

Romeo said this while robbing Juliet's grave, but Juliet herself had already braved the horrors the crypt [which had already "come alive," first in her mind, to pick her bones clean]. Such inherited confusions regarding the feeling of sarcophagy [eating of the flesh, specifically dead flesh] is an effective and productive metaphor to Marx' dead labor feeding on living things: advertisements that, once consumed, turn us into cannibals that eat ourselves for the invisible state all around us.

Smile inverts the basic idea, denoting a giant rotten corpse [the state] that's too big to fit inside the heroine's mouth; i.e., a belly of the babe entered rapaciously by the beast through reverse and spontaneous revenge/rape pregnancy/forced feeding and similar invasive sensations ["Say 'ahh...'"]—an imposturous wandering womb/walking

"graveyard gut" speaking to Capitalist Realism gaslighting those who look beyond the Black Veil and tarring them simply as "mad." It and similar stories present the demon as a faceless, sexless, and genderless anti-identity that feeds on the living in ways that invite poetic reversals and play. In turn, fascism is a death cult that revels in its own cannibalism, mid-obscurantism, and is historically something to slay [as Milius' 1981 Conan does, putting Doom's hedonistic cult to the sword³⁵¹].

This orgasmic tendency also goes back to Radcliffe, who abjected such cannibalism as alien and opaque; i.e., hiding the state's hand in things by framing the great demonic as a Black Veil, one that suddenly "appears" through the acknowledgement of a system already abjecting its abuses onto a displaced "other" object: the rectangular [as veils so often are] abstraction of trauma Radcliffe [and heroines modeled after hers] try to pass off as "just a bad dream," a fake. So the gaslight continues...

Often this is abjected off onto foreign lands vis-à-vis 2001: A Space Odyssey and other stories, but it likewise exists at home as something to fall under the quotidian nihilistic spell thereof: the scapegoating and worshipping of domestic trauma during military urbanism! In my experience, people unexposed to such things will retreat and run from actual abuse like the plague, but stare and tremble at restless "censor bar" copies of such abuse during the cryptonymy process.

In Radcliffe's case, they'll also commodify it in ways consumers and critics will fetishize: the presence of unequal power and trauma, thus forbidden knowledge, as an infernal concentric pattern they'll maintain to ensure they—a privileged member of the Imperial Core—can keep getting their jollies. With this facet of canonical Gothic, Jameson and I completely agree; re: "that boring and exhausted paradigm" [from Volume Zero]:

The quote is ubiquitous, but consider the opening page for Alex Link's "The Mysteries of Postmodernism, or, Fredric Jameson's Gothic Plots" (2009) for a summary of it:

In the midst, of its definitive arguments, Frederic Jameson's Postmodernism, or, the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991) pauses to consider the Gothic just long enough to single it out as a hopelessly "boring and exhausted paradigm." The Gothic, he declares, is a mere "class fantasy (or nightmare) in which the dialectic of privilege and shelter is exercised" and it should not be mistaken for a "protofeminist denunciation of patriarchy" nor "a protopolitical protest against rape." Although surprising at first, this condemnation is strategic in that it establishes the Gothic as Jameson's critical other; the Gothic becomes an object of ritual sacrifice, imbued with those qualities in Jameson's argument which are most discomfiting. [...] If one regards Postmodernism as telling a story about postmodernity, its plot, taken as a whole, is curiously Radcliffean, in that it routinely presents the reader with postmodern objects meant to inspire anxiety before explaining them away. Jameson's dismissal of the Gothic, in other words, resembles nothing so much as a means of raising and exorcising an object of anxiety [source].

In other words, Jameson writes like Coleridge does—like a scared white boy but even more allergic to the Gothic mode, oddly emulating one of its most famous (and white) female authors [source: "Notes on Power"].

The difference being, I also think we can camp what Radcliffe canonized to restore their proletarian energies; i.e., through a Gothic mode that is anything but redundant [science fiction beyond Shelley's Gothic roots can and will gentrify and decay, Jameson]. In short, Jameson can't monopolize what he tries to devalue, nor can Radcliffe, whose potential value we are reclaiming through devices like demon lovers and the Black Veil. They are formidable poetic instruments and have multiple uses beyond mere commodity or dismissal by those gatekeeping the venue and failing to vet their own elaborate strategies of misdirection; i.e., by exposing abusers and the presence of trauma as normally disguising and revealing itself during the cryptonymy process as equally liminal and dualistic. To this, we must acclimate to the confusion, but also the Numinous powers of a collective past, which only reveals itself [regarding systems designed to hide themselves] upon repeated holistic study and reflection; re [from the Poetry Module]:

To that, I'll let you in on a little secret: The greatest irony of Jadis harming me [something we'll go into more detail about during the undead module] is they accidentally gifted me with the appreciation of calculated risk. Scoured with invisible knives, I don't view my scars as a "weakness" at all; I relish the feeling of proximity to the ghost of total power—of knowing that motherfucker took me to the edge but didn't take everything from me: I escaped them and lived to do my greatest work in spite of their treachery! Like the halls of a cathedral, my lived torments and joys color this castled work, ornamenting its various passages with the power of a full life. I've known such terror that makes the various joys I experience now all the more sweet and delicious. I am visited by ghosts of my rapturous design, the empress of my fate, the queen of a universe shared with seraphs the likes of which I can hardly describe; "no coward soul is mine" [source: "Angry Mothers; or, Learning from Our Monstrous-Feminine Past," 2024].

It's historically easy to gender these vestiges of chaos—projecting them onto a particular scapegoat, thus reducing demon BDSM to an unironically violent and critically vacuous void; i.e., as Radcliffe and Freud do, but also Creed, to some extent: the homewrecker witch who tokenizes easily enough to have any kind of revenge at all. The reality is, we have to think about things in ways that highlight dialectical-material forces in dialectical-material language, thus don't need further translation into that mode [with psychoanalysis famously "eating Marx" to conceal and bury him in 20th century academic mumbo-jumbo—as trying to stop people from using his theories more directly by coating them in buffers].

 "When you gaze into the Abyss, the Abyss also gazes into you." Except, such things are dualistic and always will be [all human language is dualistic]. This being said, genuine abusers look like anyone else, and point-in-fact, rely on such camouflage to harm others in bad faith; i.e., because they were harmed, once upon a time [congenital and comorbid criminogenesis, the dice roll of cop and victim a historical-material cycle]. The paradox is exploitation and liberation occupy the same actors, so we must tell them apart through dialectical-material scrutiny as a matter of playing with such things.

Grievous bodily injury aside, Smile is still a lesson; the demon's lesson works through bad BDSM, using torture and the Uncanny Valley's bad masks confusing predator and prey to impart that people are not gods, which Smile gleefully exposes by turning Camus' The Myth of Sisyphus [1942] inside-out: "You're just like me. All it takes is a little push!" Or as Radcliffe writes, "What are bodily pains in comparison with the subtle, the exquisite tortures of the mind!" The demon is her titular Italian brought back to life and saying "Miss me?" with an awful psychosexual smirk:

To some extent, it remains something we can enjoy for its critical potential; i.e., during calculated risk, whose simulated weakness and strength both take place to sharpen our ability to tell the difference; re: during ludo-Gothic BDSM, taken outside the bedroom where it can raise concerns by "crying wolf." Victims of abuse can't think in black and white, because they live in the grey area of predation. Instead, they are drawn to what is familiar for them during the uncanny attack; re: the confusion of pleasure and pain, but also predator and prey as something we navigate having permanently been altered by an older demon touching us. Instead of viewing this abuse as strictly a curse according to our abuser's logic, we can treat it as a gift and a curse that camps our own profound survival; i.e., in ways that translates to praxial synthesis, thus catharsis in opposition to bad actors trying to pimp us. The moment our holocaust becomes something to play with, we regain control!

To be frank, Smile frames the hubris of the heroine as thinking she can so easily face awful things and not be punished; i.e., that two seemingly unrelated events—the arrival of the demon and her facing her own demons at the old, abandoned homestead³⁵² [survivor's guilt]—aren't somehow connected to Capitalism. Instead, the story is more self-contained, playing with these devices to observe the more immediate psychological attack.

But that doesn't mean we can't take what they explore and apply it beyond where the filmmakers are willing to go; re: "There is no outside of the text," thus no logical limit to impose on emergent play. We can always go further than Radcliffe dared, while appreciating the value in her arguments revived in stories like Smile: to watch a simulated rape [of the mind, first and foremost] to prevent actual harm in and out of media we subvert on the same Aegis—not as a one-way surface, but an anisotropic barrier we can cross over into their spaces and ours, there and back again; re: not the monomyth, but the Promethean Quest and Faustian bargain interrogating false power being corruptible, thus rewriteable. "It takes two to tango," as they say, and inspiration comes as much from genuine harm as it does "surviving" copies of said harm. The canonical palimpsest is always a tyrant. To it, this isn't purgatory for one side to enjoy the spoils but a place to build a new Hell on Earth for workers using the same convulsionnaires' jouissance the bourgeoisie can't exploit without end; i.e., their doing so meant to achieve singular harmful interpretations, mid-inkblot; re: the paradox of rape being no one is being harmed, and furthermore, that we can use this [and the whore's] paradox to have the whore's revenge against profit: to humanize ourselves as raped by "raping" ourselves for others to see. But revolution is always dualistic and liminal; i.e., we must look into those places' of total disempowerment to liberate ourselves with; re: the way out of the labyrinth happens inside it as something to discover through found-document copies of itself. As I write in "Out of this World, part one: What Are Rebellion, Rebels, and Why" [2024]:

In turn, the vivid language of war—of castles and sieges—paints both a pretty and straightforward picture regarding what to do and not do while also taking the duality of human language into account. Let the right ones into your "castle" and win-win, regarding whatever your combined hearts desire; let the wrong ones in and suffer Capitalism the Great Destroyer as usual, and whereupon genuine consent (and everything associated with it) becomes not just an alien myth (the Medusa) but a forgotten memory. Per the Gothic, its fading dream must be revived in oft-surreal ways while inside capital; i.e., as a rigged game normally weaponizing shelter harmfully against us [...] often as literally toy-like; e.g., the derelict from Alien being a funerary dumping ground on par with the Island of Misfit Toys from Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer (1964). This crisis must be subverted to expose the true menace, often through the animated miniature: as something to invoke to achieve bizarre comparisons via jarringly non-fatal nostalgia [source].

or more succinctly in "Modularity and Class":

Words are easy to find if you have imagination, especially if your imagination isn't myopic because it actively resists Capitalist Realism's usual bullshit. The way out is inside, using imagination through Gothic poetics to set ourselves free [source].

so must we build and look upon that which subjugated workers dare not—viewing the Medusa with an open mind! So must we must break Capitalist Realism by facing the wax sculpture melting before us: ourselves and all our yesterdays, relaid in small and burning horrifyingly before us! We can stare and tremble, then learn from it to tremble perceptively in a dialectical-material lens that resurrects Marx as thoroughly gayer than he ever was, in life: our little pissed-off princess of the underworld. And if anyone rejects that, they're not our friends; they're cops. See how easy that is?

Despite what Radcliffe says about horror vs terror and the dreaded evil, then, Kristeva highlights the power of the abjection process; i.e., as something I argue further can be reversed in monstrous-feminine dialogs whose camp remains profoundly palliative-Numinous [thus delicious]: those touched by fire need stronger medicine, its procedure merely being to play with store-bought canon differently. And inside those dialogs, we can learn useful things about ourselves and Gothic poetics attached to the bigger picture, mise-en-abyme. It's not fear and dogma, but critical engagement with our own fabrications camping the canon to enjoy its monopolized effects; i.e., if you want to critique power, you must not only go where it is, but become able to play with it without harming people in the present moment or incentivizing systemic harm in the future. So often people shelter and "armor" victims, like Radcliffe did; i.e., by isolating them and silencing their testimony behind a screen of performative pity. The reality is, we have survived unironic Hell to build something better while spiting our abusers; pity is useless to us—doubly so if it's used to invalidate us and our testimony.

Yet, there is always risk to informed consent when executed, because we're playing with things that not only hurt when examined, but challenge our fundamental understandings of power and how it dogmatically arranges and exchanges; i.e., which overwhelm us, and in which those still in Plato's cave will attack to uphold bourgeois hegemonies, during us versus them. Those of weaker stomachs and minds are gargoyles who will eat us; i.e., the demon in Smile not just an outsider at all, but the masked vigilantism of the heroine's own friends having turned their back on her—the using of their faces not just a disguise but reminder of their actual betrayals [the self-fulfilled prophecy].

Again, demons mix lies with truth, and manufacture disaster to achieve different outcomes. We do it to break Capitalist Realism, and cops do it to uphold said Realism: those who abuse our trust while we celebrate their accomplishments. And exposing this is often layered for our protection during the cryptonymy process. For example, I have invigilated Jadis' abuse in my book series, from 2022 onwards, while simultaneously hiding them behind various layers of anonymity that I knew others could easily pull aside; i.e., like Radcliffe's Black Veil. However dark mine have been, then, they haven't prevented others from interacting with, thus investigating the truth behind, the censored versions; re: we did just that in "Showing Jadis' Face," but here it is again:

This is Jadis without a mask, and yet is precisely the mask they wore when abusing me: a harmful double, and exactly the kind of impostor Smile is illustrating—a Great Destroyer that brings conflict behind tremendous obscurity while gaslighting their prey and even making them complicit in their own destruction!

Furthermore, Jadis looks human because they are human, but lacked humanity when abusing me as a conscious premediated choice. In the past, I've held back, shielding them ultimately for fear of reprisals. Even now I fear them, and fear saying too much in open accusation, and even now their face and voice haunts me still: "I can see him, with my waking eyes!" / "Then let us be rid of it, once and for all!" And the paradox of rescue is that the damsel is always in the dungeon, but learns to make it their own in ways that preclude total control from an abuser that is no longer physically in their life. Once sprung, we can't escape the trap without chewing off a part of ourselves, and even then, a part of me still burns in Hell with Jadis: "You have heart! I'll take that too!" It's Hamlet levels of madness, but the play's still the thing to catch the conscience of the king!

model and photographer: [Persephone van der Waard and Jadis. Jadis and I had agreed quite explicitly that they would provide for me in exchange for sex. In doing so, they initially used their grad school stipend to put a roof over my head, but didn't put me on the lease.

They purchased groceries regularly at first, and I cooked and prepared for them and had sex with them (an act I initially greatly enjoyed but later came to fear). Jadis showed me the many animals around campus, explaining the local wildlife in ways that presented them as some kind of guru; i.e., while the information they said was true, as far as I could tell, they began to bully me and use their expertise about that to treat me like a child—one they had successfully alienated from her entire family in one fell swoop and had total financial control over from that point forward.

I didn't realize it, because Jadis would disguise it through acts of false deference; i.e., they would apologize profusely if something was indisputably their fault, it was also small accidents that weren't really that big a deal to begin with; e.g., accidentally bumping into me when they didn't mean to: "Oh, I'm so, so sorry!" and proceed to pet me like they'd grievously harmed me by accident. The problem is, they'd act apologetic about those invented incidents, remorseful/victimized about their ex, and all-knowing about the animals, above, to gradually rescind their own responsibilities, per our agreement; re: providing for me.

The nuts-and-bolts were there, but they began to abuse and manipulate me for labor, including cooking and sex, but also emotional care. And in turn, they concealed everything behind things they were "giving" that weren't even theirs; re: the animals. They acted like the whole world was theirs, and it was simultaneously very small (about the size of the UF campus we walked around, every night) and encompassed the whole of the world and all discussions about it. In short, they were conditioning me, walking me like a dog and introducing me to the Pavlovian carrot-and-stick approach they would then use to menticide me, and later use to manipulate me for sex, and anything else they wanted.

Overnight, Jadis traded the "nice mask" I was used to with a different mask: the angry dark mother. To be honest, Jadis was always kind of a bitch, but I trusted them and furthermore, had lots of love to give. Jadis had acquired the ability to appeal to other's vanity/needs by surviving their mother, but I thought, "There's no way they'd be exactly like their mother, right?" Except, they were always impatient or upset for reasons known only to them (they wouldn't say why when asked about it) and would use that—in combination with verbal emotional abuse and manipulation—to make me long for the Good Cop who was suddenly nowhere to be seen; re: diminishing returns following the initial and intense love-bombing phase made me put up with their abuse only to readily greet their "good side" like a savior to protect me from Bad Cop.

This was all in the middle of Covid, mind you, and—once Jadis' father died [a process I helped clean up after³⁵³]—they turned off the tap and I saw myself out.

³⁵³ I mean "clean up" quite literally in this case: Jadis' father left behind a trailer that was filthy from years of him smoking cigarettes and slowly drinking himself to death—a disaster area we spent weeks cleaning up ourselves because Jadis didn't want to trouble the landlady about it. I did it for Jadis, but the entire process was thoroughly degrading and oddly Herculean; i.e., the Florida heat meant we could only work for part of a given day then have to go home, and we kept taking hour-long drives from Gainesville and Jacksonville and back again to tackle a mess that the landlady didn't help with but kept poking us to do it so she could flip the place and resume making money (the old leach; where's Raskolnikov when you need him>). There were seemingly endless pile of garbage and filth that had to be gagged and hauled to the side of the road, and years of odds-and-ends hoarded among all of that, which had to be separated and divided into carloads we took back, one day at a time, then organized further at home: thirty years' worth of paystubs and mementos, which I handled on my own while Jadis grieved in their bedroom.

And while I understand that part of it, and did back then, it likewise became an excuse that pushed the majority of the labor onto me for other events unrelated to their father's death; i.e., Jadis would flip the bill and drive the rental truck, and I was the proverbial strong back paid in pennies; e.g., a tactic Jadis would use on me and Tim—their ex, moving in with us when Jadis bought a new car largely without consulting me, but also a new condo paid a year in advance, in cash (about $60,000 for both purchases, which was about 2/3s of the lump currency their father left them, not including the $800 a month in dividends from his stock portfolio)—when we had to clean out the place we were currently living at because it, too, was filthy with black mold from mismanagement by the property managers and lease signer putting up with it. Like father, like daughter!

Like before, we took at least a week driving back and forth (this time in a shiny new car) to Jadis' new place (this time with my name on the lease); i.e., slowly moving things back and forth during hour-long drives, and ending the trip with a final afternoon renting a moving truck to handle the big stuff, then a final clean and dinner with Tim. Jadis even made us clean out the broken dishwasher filled with years' worth of unspeakable gunk and mold, effectively polishing a turd (the machine was well-and-truly broken) just so the place would look spotless for the landlord's property manager. Same place, different mess, and Jadis used us for labor to appease the owner class and respect said owners' passive income (and enjoyed watching me get angry about it in front of Tim—a process called triangulation).

In turn, if I complained—which I did, especially about that fucking dishwasher—then Jadis would remind me that I wasn't on the lease and they were assuming all the risk (even though I had asked repeatedly during our relationship to be put on said lease), despite me reminding them that I still lived in apartment with them, thus was subject to the same violations Jadis was both apologizing for and grumbling about to me as their captive audience. If they complained, it was ok, but if I did it, it was tantamount to "treason" and something they would punish by pulling away their love and support. Furthermore, we still didn't get our security deposit and Jadis quietly paid the property manager when said manager wrote to us, saying the mold was our fault and charging us for the inevitably professional cleaning (which I said they would do when protesting the extended cleaning Jadis was putting us through)!

Keep in mind, I had already repeatedly asked Jadis to give me more involvement regarding the financial decisions between us—meaning with their father's money becoming something we both could have a say in, as romantic partners living under the same roof—but they reneged on that promise after I helped with their father's place and the move to the nicer neighborhood; i.e., after I

Except, that didn't happen until they had abused me a great deal [see: footnote]; i.e., Jadis couldn't give something without causing harm in some shape or form. In short, they were a master of smoke and mirrors, but were a slave to their own illusions; i.e., they believed everyone was an enemy to bewitch and deceive for Jadis' gain—and all to emulate those who were better at it than anyone else: while American liberals.

While demonic "capture" involves other people, then, it starts with us escaping the mind prison built around us by our abusers—individuals like Jadis, but also the bourgeoisie for whom they serve! So, yes, let us be rid of it; I'm tired of holding up had helped patch things up with Tim and he had moved in with us and everything was settled and organized (which I did all of, Jadis allergic to organizing anything and preferring to literally let things pile up). At that point, Jadis told me that my earlier efforts in helping manage money and groceries and various expenses (and emotional support regarding Tim) actually weren't appreciated, and that Jadis hadn't actually meant any of that when they said it (while putting down Tim back then, only to say Tim was good and I wasn't, later on). They stopped having sex with me and started to say where we bought our food and what, taking away any agency I formerly had and pushing me out of the relationship altogether.

Of course, sex was just something Jadis used to mollify me—i.e., "have sex with mommy to calm them down," which I did because I was afraid of their anger and the fact that I wasn't on the lease in the middle of Covid. Needless to say, by the end of it, Jadis' hand was played; i.e., "the fire's in their eyes their [intentions were] pretty clear" so I made like Michael Jackson and beat it (off to Cuwu's, who helped me get to my mother's, but not before fucking my brains out).

*Note: This is only one example of the everyday kinds of stupid, manipulative bullshit I dealt with from Jadis throughout our entire relationship. If you want the full rundown, refer to "Setting the Record Straight Again; Accounting My Ex's Abuse of Me to Another Victim August 30th, 2022" for an exhaustive list of anything and everything Jadis did to mess with my head. Basically Jadis is living proof of Angela Carter's (admittedly problematic statement) that "any free woman in an unfree society will always be a monster" (vis-à-vis De Sade as someone she defended); i.e., like Portia from The Merchant of Venice manipulating everyone around her, except Jadis targeted vulnerable marginalized parties weaker than themselves—in a nutshell, aping the colonizer to have an imaginary revenge "against" her evil mom/absentee dad; re: Karen Newman writing in "Portia's Ring: Unruly Women and Structures of Exchange in The Merchant of Venice" (1987):*

Here Portia is the gift-giver, and it is worth remembering Mauss's description of gift-giving in the New Guinea highlands in which an aspiring "Big Man" gives more than can be reciprocated and in so doing wins prestige and power. Portia gives more than Bassanio can ever reciprocate, first to him, then to Antonio, and finally to Venice itself in her actions in the trial which allow the city to preserve both its law and its precious Christian citizen. In giving more than can be reciprocated, Portia short-circuits the system of exchange and the male bonds it creates, winning her husband away from the arms of Antonio.

Contemporary conduct books and advice about choosing a wife illustrate the dangers of marriage to a woman of higher social status or of greater wealth. Though by law such a marriage makes the husband master of his wife and her goods, in practice contemporary sources suggest unequal marriages often resulted in domination by the wife. Some writers and Puritan divines even claimed that women purposely married younger men, men of lower rank or of less wealth, so as to rule them (source).

This is exactly the kinds of power abuse I, a trans woman, endured under Jadis' "care," and the sort that I reference in my own books; e.g., from my Tolkien essay, "Concerning Rings, BDSM and Vampires; or the State's False Gifts, Power Exchange, and Crumbling Homesteads Told through Tolkien's Nature-Themed Stories" (2024) from Volume One. In short, I had written about such abuse for years, and though Jadis wasn't going to abuse me because they deceived me while appearing good and just. Lord Sauron, anyone? —Perse Jadis' mask. Then again, I won't say their real name. It is dead to me, replaced by "Jadis" as something I can use to speak to the harm they caused in ways they can't gaslight. They had me on my knees, but now I like it for reasons they can't control; re: Metroidvania, danger disco, ludo-Gothic BDSM—the works!

To that, success is the best revenge, and I no longer need "my day in court." I don't because courtrooms can't bring me the closure I've already made on my own—i.e., the justice of my surviving them isn't to shame them; they don't feel shame, so cornering them is pointless. Also, I don't need a judge to tell me what "justice" is and when it has been served to my satisfaction [a badge is merely a cover to shield state thugs from accountability and criticism; judges are cops]. Instead, I will use what Jadis taught me in ways that extend to popular stories I can use to change Capitalism [which they loved, without question] into something beyond all abusers' ability to control; i.e., their own speaking to abuse as a theatrical manner of demonic exchange that bleeds in and out of fictional counterparts we make: to camp "rape" by placing it in quotes, inserting all manner of comforting devices into the threshold.

For example, I like Amazons, dark mommy/gentle femme doms, and the monstrous-feminine because they simultaneously evoke my abusers and alienation, but also my desire to be free through friendlier variants than Jadis was capable of delivering—something my subsequent understandings of would eclipse anything Jadis could hope to imagine. They were basic because only a basic bitch harms other people for quick personal gain.

Such is Jadis—a Gothic villain of the cheapest order but one who admittedly knew their way around my head: wave treats in front of me [e.g., shoes, below] before wearing them "for" me during sex. Or so it seemed; in truth, they wore them for themselves, giving me a taste to ensnare me with, "hook, line, and sinker." "It worked," as the saying goes, "like a charm." I didn't just "gang along" with them, mid-courtship, I proposed it!

This wasn't just material objects through financial abuse, but the corporal side of things, too—sex, and specifically demon sex, with someone who was difficult to say no to; i.e., in part because they were attractive and badass, and my self-esteem was shattered after Zeuhl left me for their future husband [and kept other "side pieces"] around except me, picking-and-choosing when they were poly and when they weren't]. Jadis was hot, and had an amazing ass, strong body, tight pussy and incredible aesthetic, but also interest in my work, which they not only funded, but housed in the middle of Covid; i.e., by literally giving me a home and room of one's own [which they admittedly shared with me until I moved my studio out into the living room—an act of defiance they openly resented and held against me]: where we could presumably make art together. "She actually talked me, man." / "Get outta here!" An abused puppy is eager to please, and I'm a service top.

Zeuhl never supported my work, so I jumped at the chance. In truth, the opportunity felt too good to be true, but also too good to pass up [doubly impaired and doubly eager]—and it was productive; e.g., many of my old blog entries from 2020 and 2021 were written under Jadis' sponsorship, supervision and at times secondary participation: "War Vaginas," "Borrowed Robes," "Mazes and Labyrinths" and "Why I Submit," etc. We also recorded a short-lived 2020 podcast³⁵⁴; i.e., which formed the foundation for what ultimately became the Four Gs from Sex Positivity's final manifesto, later displaying as the paratextual documents seen in each volume/on my website.

Except, whereas Mary Wollstonecraft junior ran off with Percy Shelley and had children out of and in wedlock, Jadis and I [thankfully] never conceived actual babies; but they did help inspire what ultimately became my life's work—i.e., by mostly showing me how not to do BDSM! That's the joke, and my revenge: my rape baby love child was started by them and their bad-faith performance, but I made it my own to overcome what they gave me with what they gave me; i.e., the more they shit on me and disguised it, the more they unknowingly fertilized my body and my brain with the power to outlast them through my art: to use Athena's Aegis to unmake harmful notions of motherhood [the Gothic chasing of parental protection ³⁵⁴ Originally called "Goth Nick and Goth Chick" (a name I admittedly came up with while Jadis was randomly driving us around Gainesville), which after seven episodes we eventually renamed to "Dreadful Discourse." I designed the posters for it, and produced everything myself. Jadis sat in, and I tried to come up with cool ideas to talk about, but I had too much to say and them too little, and eventually things stalled and stopped:

through mates accidentally mirroring our parents] with doubles of those [a trans woman's second puberty/coming-of-age story in her thirties].

In short, Jadis had what I wanted—to fuck and to be [the Amazon/the Medusa]—but like Faust, gave me way more than I bargained for! Alas, I can't show their naked body [the left image is to show their sexual intent without showing their naked body] or us having sex, but Jadis was built to administer and give punishment and pleasure; i.e., having an ass of the gods, while also being incredibly flexible/able to endure an absurd amount of pain. And they knew it, too—right in the middle of Covid, with them going through a divorce and me a rebound after Zeuhl, they had me right where they wanted me: in front of them! Besides smoke and mirrors, Jadis was a master of the carrot and stick, the mask and the mirror [and they had many masks to mirror whatever they wanted me to see]! Do I miss Jadis' magic and cryptonymy? Of course I do; I'm just no longer its slave! I was the victim, not them [Jadis being past victim who victimized me, mid-DARVO and obscurantism]!

Furthermore, I'll never say Jadis didn't know what they wanted; they most certainly did, and I liked their confidence and appetite—i.e., it made me feel desired as "femme" in ways that were slowly starting to emerge. Little did I know I was in for a world of hurt—the surviving of said hurt sending me careening fortuitously into Cuwu [who, let it be said, cared for me far better than either Zeuhl or Jadis]! Healing hurts, and generally encompasses a fair amount of trial and error before we "stick the landing." To that, Jadis was the whore TERF-and-SWETF [that was a Florida pun] who policed my work to contain said work. As such, I was "half-prepared" to resist and accept them; i.e., warts and all, the entire ordeal something I've already written about far more than I can, here! Needless to say, my time with Jadis certainly was [in]formative; i.e., regarding what Sex Positivity ultimately became! Stick that in your pipe and smoke it, Jadis [or up your ass for all I care]! Closer to Jadis [and Radcliffe's] school of hard knocks, Smile is less cuddly and cute when showing how this triangulation works; i.e., on public fears of mental illness as stigmatized, thus misunderstood, allowing the demon to invisibly manipulate both sides by pitting them against each other to get what it wants: a host it acquires by alienating and isolating the heroine from her inexperienced, judgmentally ableist friends. It's a charm offensive, but a brute-force once; i.e., aftercare entirely absent from the equation, replaced with love-bombing and diminishing returns leading into rapid cycles of immense attention and total neglect.

To it, you never really know someone until you know what they want. Zeuhl, for example, was also cold, but only showed it after they got the money and sex from me they demonstrably craved³⁵⁵. By comparison, Jadis wanted to harm me; i.e., because it made them feel strong concurrent to their own personal-and-ongoing torment [the memories of their own abusive mother haunting them]. So harm me they did, then tossed me aside like trash. This is their story as it survives inside mine.

Beyond my exes, Smile wants to scare us, but the reasons why aren't immediately clear. Rather, the demon smiles at its prey because it knows what she knows—that only she can see what's happening. No one believes her despite her being a therapist [a lived, hysterical reality for female experts doubted by their often-male or sexiest female colleagues]. It's drawn to, and preys on, her repressed trauma and tendency to fawn, but feeds as much off the active panic its deceptions cause her from second to second. To this, the demon is as skilled a liar as it is a serial killer—one that makes her friends see a "crazy" woman when she isn't crazy. She only seems/feels crazy to her critics, who shout "Curses aren't real!" Oh, honey, but they are; they are!

All war is based on deception; Jadis' strength was a performance they used to get to me/use me until I could no longer be dominated. The moment I fought back, they dropped me like I was hot. Until then, they held everything over my head—doing so to the point that, once there was seemingly "nowhere else" to go, the implications felt simply "too dire"; i.e., to realize I could leave whenever I wanted, and I wanted to stay because I thought I could fix them and return to normal. Except things never were normal, and Jadis used that against me, too; they thought it was adorable and told me so—but now I know better and can hear what their simpering face really said: "You're trying so hard, but you're wrong!" Not Two Stupid Dogs [which the quote refers to] but one too-stupid dog that its handler was abusing on purpose! Some people harm their pets; i.e., different strokes for different folks.

Keeping with Hogle's narrative of the crypt—re: "to stand on ashes of something not quite present"—Gothic curses remain partially imaginary but have physiological effects

³⁵⁵ For a good summary of Zeuhl's bullshit, refer to my footnote on them in "The Eyeball Zone; or, Relating to the Gothic as Commies Do" (2024). Such things are seldom purely "bad," but exist somewhere in the confusing and dangerous (thus exciting) middle.

For Jadis, any pain they caused wasn't for genuine healing towards all parties, but something to fatten up and eat, ad infinitum. Jadis was a truly a glutton for punishment. Now, I summon them again; i.e., as the ghost of the whore who raped me, and one whose better half is the one I divided from its actual physical self; re: I buried one side and left it behind, but embraced the fiction of Jadis in ways that could assist in developing Gothic Communism: to summon "them," like a demon, to "rape" me without harm. Just like Radcliffe! Well, sort of.

Of course, the idea is more fun than the reality—doubly so if you've survived trauma before; i.e., you want something Numinous you can play with, thus control to some degree of calculated risk. That's what ludo-Gothic BDSM is all about, and it stems from Jadis and I, but also my life-long chasing of the Numinous based on older abuse from my childhood into my adult life. This isn't quite "terror" as Radcliffe sold it, nor her idea of "horror" that she assigned posthumously to Matthew Lewis. It was both, and remains something I summon to ride out my own passions; i.e., coded into me by the material world: a woman having survived these storms [and their fabrications' promised violence³⁵⁷] to say in response to my old ³⁵⁶ "Put your mysterium tremendum in my Uncanny Valley!" Jadis would say, during sex. A lady they were not (and I loved that about them)! Abusers work with fractions, being deliberately 70/30, or 60/40 good/bad before revising that arrangement to lead their prey around by the nose. If such things are mutually agreed upon, that's one thing. But Jadis' bargains were always Faustian, thus mendaciously predatory.

³⁵⁷ The enormity and suddenness of such storms I likened, with Jadis, to the moon from Majora's Mask, which I escaped by refusing to play along with Jadis' bullshit; re (from "Setting the Record Straight; My Ex's Abuse of Me: February 17th, 2022):

I liken it to Majora's Mask. In that game, the villain, Majora, curses the moon to fly into Hyrule. While the player can return the moon to its original position using a magic song, the residents of Hyrule are still trapped inside a cruel time loop. Faced with their impending doom, they stew in their own fear. The world around them slowly falls apart—not just once, but over and over and over again. It degrades their sense of reality until nothing but madness remains.

Majora uses this madness to control the Hyrulians through fear, distorting their very perception of reality. This mind-prison is what Link ultimately escapes. The paradox, here, is the method: He doesn't escape by playing the song and stopping the moon. He escapes by exposing the tyrant controlling the moon to begin with.

captors, "My kingdom is as great as yours; you have no power over me!" I survived, and am "savin' all my lovin' for someone who's lovin' me!" Fucking oath, queen!

In turn, female/feminine sensitivity to transgenerational trauma and inheritance is conveyed as monstrous-feminine allegory through Smile. On one hand, its "inspiration porn" format fetishizes the struggle of the Gothic heroine; i.e., within the chronotope, enduring religious passion in the face of an alien menace [a

Like Link, I could not escape by playing the song. Every time Jack threatened me with anger or Instant Breakup, they were abstracting the consequences of my actions so much that I felt like the floor was eggshells: Any wrong step might send me hurling into the void. I felt the shadow of the falling moon in their words. A glance, a heavy sigh, a tapping of the foot, a laborious roll of the eyes. They had mastered me. I thought love through win out, that Jack would change if only I played the song enough. But as our living conditions improved, my happiness worsened. They began to reject me, doting on Tim, instead.

I felt trapped. If I confronted them, they would throw the moon at me. If the moon came, I would play the song to save myself. And the whole cycle would repeat. So now I hid from the falling moon and became what they wanted me to be: their little artist boy. I did not please them, but they seemed oddly content with this arrangement. I knew it wouldn't last, but I couldn't say for sure when it would end. Terror was everywhere and madness reigned within me.

[...] After we returned home, I was sitting at my studio, a computer on a table facing the door. Jack was leaving the house and glowered at me. They were clearly bothered. So I asked them if they were ok. They said they were fine and asked me if I was fine. I hesitated and realized my time had come: I would summon the moon. I would invoke Jack's wrath (source).

The sad reality of rape is how part of it, and the madness associated with it, always stays with the victim—and even more complicated, the feelings exposed to said victim aren't strictly "bad"; i.e., if they're able to control their feelings through play. This isn't natural, but taught, and sometimes lessons teach best hard. My ludo-Gothic BDSM was wrought through harmful heat and pressure.

For example, I loved the Radcliffean feelings of powerlessness in Alien, which had drawn me to Jadis, and whose dominion over me I would resurrect in "perceptive," healthy forms that would open not just my eyes and my mind, but those of other victims healing from rape, too. Nothing is more frightening to bullies than a woman who has built herself back up—who holds the storm in her hands, the Aegis pushing state abuse towards the guilty parties not once, but as a matter of fractal recursion! Each one becomes a witness to ask why she does (or doesn't) smile: Lewis' Bleeding Nun!

To heal from rape, you must camp it by drawing lines in the sand, but doing so by no means precludes intensity. Indeed, that's the best part! "'Rape' me, you bastard!" This might sound alien to many, but it's something anyone can understand; i.e., like anyone who might play Majors' Mask, a videogame that Nintendo gloriously sold to children. Except, it's not a "slippery slope" if the methodology is made to raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness (the whole point of ludo-Gothic BDSM); and sooner or later, the victim becomes a "victim" who learns their own limits/finds cuties to play with who won't harm them (remember your aftercare, babes). Pick your poison, mine is dark mommy doms, and frankly I'm spoilt for choice!

cryptonym for historically male abusers]. Conversely, its culmination of the heroine's fatal reunion with her ruinous childhood home [Freud's unheimlich attached to the human face as "wrong" through the Uncanny Valley effect; e.g., Hannah Gadsby's question: "Have you ever seen someone yawn with their teeth clenched?"] provides a startlingly frank critique of the Gothic inheritance fantasy as doomed. As something to deromanticize through a ghost of the counterfeit, the movie operates in defense of disabled people as legitimately oppressed by the status quo; i.e., Austen's parody of Gothic audiences calling the respective horrors in The Mysteries of Udolpho or The Monk "deliciously dreadful."

Like Catherine Morland, the heroine thinks she can win against an unstoppable curse and dies an ignominious death: a white reader buried alive inside her own mind because she self-isolates through Gothic fiction [lying to her one-and-only friend]. The happy ending is a lie; the trauma is not. For the status quo at large, "exquisite torture" is consumer entitlement; reclaiming one's agency in the face of such apathy is a liminal consideration for disabled people identifying with the heroine as disabled, thus something to gawk at by non-disabled persons while she's being tortured and killed. In other words, madness is a lived reality through how people treat you based on superstitions informed by stories of stories, of stories of stories, in praxial opposition.

So concludes another patchwork examination of my time spent with Jadis. Probably not the last, but for now it's time for her to go back to bed! "Sleepy time, chonky one!" What's that, you say? "You shall never have the Necronomicon'? Oh, honey. But I've already written it several times over!")

Third, the death curse (as already touched on, above); re: longevity and weapons (for revenge) are the most common trades when dealing demons and dark desire, classically leading to premature death due to human failing. With Faust, immortality is denied and the dealer with devils ripped to pieces.

As an underwritten part of the ritual, then, the demon can execute a death curse—less of a haunting and more the piloting of a fatal madness that survives inside a host victim's mind until after their death. Postmortem, the host is robbed (of their soul and their life) and the pilot "passes" onto someone else; e.g., Pazuzu from The Exorcist (1973) or similar "imitator" demons that gleefully gaslight and isolate the victim while using their own cloned memories against them, but also the apathy of the victim's friends and associates; re: Smile, The Dark and the Wicked (2020), or It Follows (above, 2014). Until death occurs, the attack of the demon is that of a mental "puppet master"—completely psychological and contained inside the mind of someone who sees what others cannot on account of being the demon's "chosen" pet project, their source of childish delight and fun, their plaything for revenge. The cryptomimesis of these chains of media touch on systems of abuse and their traumas buried in the present space and time; i.e., home as alien (this extends to alien-invasion xenophobia; e.g., the "pod people" from Invasion of the Body Snatchers).

Ghosts are generally incorporeal and well-suited to the curse as a trigger mechanism, whereas demons can assume physical forms (or steal them) that hide a final "true form." Physiology aside, the largest difference between a demon and a ghost is the demon's emphasis on active mobility that not only can physically travel, but does so through rituals and bargains, not passive transference. Demons tend not to be limited to a space or container inside the space, while still treating the people they encounter as the vector like ghosts do. When the vector succumbs to the curse, demons exploit their death as part of a larger scheme of transference, like a con, ruse, or virus (e.g., AIDS). Yet even when death occurs, the victims "live on," either inside the demon or as a physical "shield" for the demon to taunt the living with: during the liminal hauntology of war conveniently requiring medieval "medical" methods to debride the infected household of any Black Death in the flesh (Christian calls to violence, the mad scientist husband killing his possessed wife [the "weaker" sex] to "get" the demons before they get him): the killing of the Bride of Frankenstein!

Fourth, exquisite torture; i.e., the "tormenting" of the privileged. The idea, as we'll see, comes from Radcliffe liking to be tortured by demons, but whose own proto-BDSM retained their harmful and exclusionary conservative elements. To it, demons cross over into the mortal plane; i.e., when summoned to torture the summoner before the summoner dies. Torture, however, can occur within boundaries of play during power exchange that don't involve harming anyone; re: the sex-positive BDSM motto, "hurt, not harm," preventing terminal domestic abuse by camping vaso vagal dogma (above).

This being said, Western canon primarily concerns itself with coercion, knife dicks and unironically threatening recipients whose manufactured harmful tortures become something to feel fascination towards. Generally it does so by inserting a feeling of xenophobic invasion (usually unto a pretty white maiden) according to a privileged position compounded by a displaced fear of the outside; i.e., not just the ghost of trauma, but a crafty and childlike, psychosexual demon of colonial guilt, rape victims, carceral violence/the sadomasochistic torture dungeon (from De Sade, onwards, but borrowed from chronotopes of the same Neo-Gothic corpus), etc.

Experienced by a privileged person/group playing around with things they know they shouldn't, some demons evoke Hogle's ghosts of the counterfeit; i.e., the initial admonishment as conservative at heart, evoking a psychological fear/fascination with looking at these traumas from afar—e.g., the ruins of Ca'n Dar, followed by Kandar Castle and Arthur's Castle in the Evil Dead sequence (a counterexample being Giger's derelict ship containing its own demon tied to the company's corporate past being something to critique in neoliberal terms).

It's also worth noting the hybrid nature of many demons during these tortures; e.g., in Evil Dead, you actually have demons that are ghostlike and zombielike—the disembodied ghost and its possession/self-mutilation of the host's flesh that suddenly rots like a corpse, and the revelation of a final, otherworldly demonic "true form"; i.e., "fully" demon, shedding the disguise: the heteronormative "us" (whose bread-and-circus, "gore porn for white English people" dates back to Elizabethan and Jacobean theatre, and whose "shooting demons in the face" revenge fantasy is the avenging of white people/tokens from dark, chaotic forces; i.e., the palimpsest of the Aliens-meets-Evil-Dead-II violence in Doom stemming from the far-further-back semi-blind pastiche of Shakespeare's hyperbolically gory *Titus Andronicus*³⁵⁸ as "dark comedy" in the basic sense of the definition: having a happy ending against the forces of darkness—the queen of the Goths, in Titus' case).

Keeping these four differentiating factors in mind, let's now consider several performative problems present within the canonical demon summoning ritual, then move on to how we can approach their material history as Gothic Communists; i.e., by looking at older derelicts that have humanized demons, but also demonized workers and chattel camping rape through exquisite "torture" (a sort of "demonic vibing").

Canonical Demonology and Torture: Summoning Racism and Other Bigotry (feat. Evil Dead Rise)

The primary problem with canonical demonology is it is inherently hierarchical, racist (ethnocentric) and punitive; e.g., Evil Dead Rise (2023) showing a young mother go insane from wandering womb's "placental" transference, absorbing herself and her family into a demonic legion reversal of Civilization (the same idea borrowed from the 2018 Color Out of Space and its mom-child tokophobic egregore). Such distractions cryptonymy is very Freudian and regressive, the white-functioning family destroyed by a pre-Western "primordial" quaking at the myth of the dark continent (and Archaic Mother) come pruriently home to roost!

³⁵⁸ Or Hamlet's father's ghost, saying "I've seen shit, my son!" before motivating Hamlet to kill his whole family! Fun!

Simply put, it's not just DARVO/obscurantism but pearl-clutching—a haunted house replete with the usual bloody hysteria Kubrick couldn't see past in his own cosmic-nihilist Shining focused on a single unhomey location: the angry house eating the family and turning them into savage cannibals that a tokenized white savior (the Amazon, in Rise's case) must send back to Hell before they rape and eat everyone; re: the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection furthered through military optimism, aka peace through strength, quelling tokophobic unrest (the fear of nation rebirth, in this case) on the home front: Creed's murderous womb. "The axe forgets, the tree remembers"; so does our rememory play with the furious monstrous-feminine dead from all walks!

There's a lot of medieval puns going on, here—a cycle of undead metaphors that speak ominously (through death omens) to a rising return of the living dead tied to a space's buried crimes (the appearance of discovery of a found "lost" document), and said crimes coming alive through demonic possession; i.e., as an inquisition that gets to the truth of things through cruel-and-unusual torture. Demonic rituals are summoning rituals; during their canonical treatment, torture is expected from different participants: the demons, the sacrifice, the servants and the state (and other tropes; e.g., the Fool from Cabin in the Woods, 2011, walking through all of Radcliffe's codifiers). It needn't be outright execution, but barring non-lethal treatments like exorcism or incarceration, state decree tends to favor barbaric, destructive violence dealt to summoner and demon alike.

Evoking the medieval treatment of witches, the prescribed "treatment" for "possessed" individuals is the same: bodily dismemberment. Be this with firearms, power tools or incineration, the command from on high is improvised capital punishment in the modern age. This makes punishment of demonic practitioners a form of prescribed bullying administered from a position of supreme material advantage—formerly the Church, surviving through a Cartesian Protestant ethic.

The same could be said of the canonical demon's unfair advantage over the victim, the latter forced to endure a bloodletting trial or test of wills exacted by a vengeful or sadistic god (the husband and his chainsaw, chopping her up like firewood/a golem). In short, demonic scheming and torture is the West's generation of a perverse, deified bogeyman that feels alien compared to the holy Western faiths, including the Enlightenment as supreme but also "under attack" (re: the Protestant ethic in late-stage, neoliberal Capitalism). As such, the man of reason becomes justified in administering violence against state-invented enemies; i.e., given the mark of death/Cain by a witch-finder general telling him to kill.

A ritual isn't just the interaction between the summoner and the summoned; it includes the state's totalitarian perspective as something to force upon would-be viewers of demons on state grounds; re: the antagonizing of nature leading to its demonic revenge and the state quelling that through monomythic force.

For the audience looking in, though, the bargain and its extreme prejudicial handling are meant to be witnessed and discouraged, but also reinforced relative to the state as in control of its territories (re: Weber): the demon as dangerous thus deserving of punishment (said punishment extending to anyone foolish enough to make a pact with powerful outsiders during a foreign plot retrojecting the oppressed through chronotopic diaspora). The demon also becomes a displaced version of forbidden terror games to play and enjoy with others; i.e., forbidden/strange fruit.

As such, the torture of watching things denied to us (vigilante violence punching up or down) suddenly becomes acceptable; i.e., as ritualized forms of punishment and inheritance anxiety for those thinking about misbehaving when the apocalypse eventually comes back around, during a bust (especially in sexual matters, non-martial sex being treated as a death sentence): thought crimes, cloned into copies that pass the horror cryptomimetically along!

(exhibit 46a: Echoes of bicycle face, then, is the fearsome death face, from Ringu [1998]—the mouth open wide like the heroine from Smile [the idea popularized in part by Kurosawa's Rashomon (1950) as the witness finds the dead body and sees its dead face, in the forest]. Similar to ahogao and caused by seeing that story's version of the Medusa, Sadako Yamamura, coming into the body through the mouth via force-feeding/oral rape, the idea is taken to its logical extreme with films like Inside, Martyrs and Audition [2008 and 2009]; i.e., that derive a grotesque pleasure and special, metaphysical sense of "seeing" begot from extreme torture; re: Kristeva's Powers of Horror [1981, the same year Evil Dead came out] outlining abjection as a process while speaking appreciatively to Lewis' side of the Radcliffian rivalry. This being said, Death as something to worship makes sense, as nothing is stronger than it; i.e., empire is doomed to be devoured by Mother Nature as something to fear in hauntologized forms, said forms loaded hideously with older bigotries and misconceptions speaking to current ones under Capitalist Realism. Provided we can harness its regenerative power to develop Gothic Communism, then no harm, no foul! But state shift is a real and pressing concern.)

The same basic conditioning is told from the victim's perspective in canonical narratives. Sometimes, the victim is slowly broken down until the demon gains access, or becomes doomed according to a fateful hour when absolute takeover is inevitable (re: Smile); other times, it happens quickly and without warning (a rule of thumb: the more build up, the bigger the impact). Whatever the case, the canonical plight is of unwanted entry into the victim's mind, making them do terrible things they cannot stop or remember until they inexplicably die, face frozen in fear (with spontaneous death tied to guilt or shame being a regular cause-of-death in Gothic stories).

It makes for good drama insofar as a conflict is displayed (re: Faust), but among the esoteric gore is all-but-useless as a material critique outside of depicting torture in supernatural terms (which is still a clue about the material conditions of a given society according to its torture-porn diet). There's certainly something to be said about the phenomenology of mental illness, through such strategies of misdirection; i.e., a fear of said illness, but also a likening of it with dark oracles who communicate, as demons do, through bodily torture; e.g., schizophrenia being as much a testament to self-harm as it is to harm others:

In canonical stories, though, a demonic sickness of the victim exploitatively mirrors psychological abuse as something to "glut," subsisting prior to activation within a physical object or associate ritual that haunts the victim once exposed; e.g., the VHS tape, from Ringu or Evil Dead's elusive Necronomicon being as much a nod to Peter Lavenda as Lovecraft; re: McKee's correct notion of a proto-orientalism, combined with historical illiteracy—or perhaps committed distrust of "history" as an elite conspiracy in itself—[that] has led to the mystification of antiquity as something incomprehensible, occult, or even satanic. This has opened the door for both outright fraudsters and what Laycock calls "moral entrepreneurs" to write their own chimerical histories, inserting the names of ancient places and deities into imagined struggles between cosmic good and evil. These faulty constructions of history depend on ignorance (source: "The Misappropriation of Ancient Texts," 2015).

To it, fascism and its stupidity are a virus that travels through cryptomimesis inside the larger Gothic mode!

So while Walpole and Lewis' rape castles are demonstrably places that feared the medieval period to allow for a critique of their present worlds, such spaces weren't immune to colonization by entrepreneurs like Radcliffe. Though Radcliffe, herself, wouldn't have touched magical demons with a stick, its dark canon was immensely overused in male authors like Sam Raimi—a man whose bastardizing of The Monk embodies the same kind of neo-conservative regressions that Radcliffe embodied; i.e., a pirate is a pirate, an orc an orc, and deserving of punishment whether as a ghost or demon. The punishment is not visibly associated with state forces, but instead becomes a form of dissociate victim-blaming pinned onto "outsider" scapegoats whose Indigenous grudges "suddenly appear" as if out of thin air. Such is the ghost of the counterfeit, furthering the abjection process vis-à-vis dark monoliths in small; e.g., a book that, when opened, springs from itself a variety of barbaric miniatures not unlike Walpole's fatal portraits, but considerably more racist and misogynistic, etc: the manwoman in the cellar!

At first blush, the demonic possession might seem exclusively coercive—i.e., full of pointless mental torture and physical dismemberment, dislocated from material conditions, and only begetting further harmful torture, thus conditioning the damsel-like viewer or detective to submit to or perform their ordinary role within state-sanctioned violence afraid of a black planet (a mix of colonial vaudeville, vampirism, demonic possession and hag horror, above). But the simple fact is, iconoclastic demonology can summon demons to parse material conditions by asking the viewer to relate to the detective, damsel or demon in unusual, iconoclastic ways (the "inoculating" goal being to expose the madness behind the hidden traumas of Capitalism through these commonplace replicas, thus acclimating oneself to the mental-gymnastic blitz of canonical abusers; re: Jadis).

The iconoclastic idea, then, is to undo the bourgeois curse by its own invitation ("Join us!"); i.e., by using it to reverse abjection, hence employ a simple, age-old trick: convincing the world the Devil (a spectre of Marx) does exist. This happens through the repurposing of age-old clichés—by humanizing the demons themselves and how we play with them in duality by fabricating any to benefit us. Despite the supernatural guise, their psychological gimmicks are very human, but also a means of expressing the human condition in iconoclastic terms; i.e., beyond the torture ritual stuck in a nonstop death loop and more as something to paradoxically enjoy through the Gothic expression of exquisite "torture" through one's imagination as literally happening before them: the xenophobic legends that fuel it being reclaimed.

This material history can be further humanized, of course; i.e., by examining older forms that future iconoclasts can make more xenophilic, thus in favor of workers. For example, regarding Radcliffe as the coiner of the basic phrase (from our thesis volume):

when Radcliffe wrote in The Italian, "What are bodily pains in comparison with the subtle, the exquisite tortures of the mind!" she is, according to Kim Ian Michasiw, treating the presence of sublime power as "as a signal to sigh and feel exalted" (source: "Ann Radcliffe and the Terrors of Power," 1994). Simply put, there's a dealing with power exchange being had that's ironic, its symptoms of ritualized pain neatly divorced from actual damage but suitably demonic all the same. Even if Radcliffe would never stoop like Matthew Lewis to actually play with literal demons, she is still summoning her own "demons" to play with through rape pastiche: bandits, Italian counts, and pirates pretending to be ghosts (with the armed and confident Ludovico boldly investigating the "haunted" room because he doubts Emily St. Aubert's testimony and represents the cliché, plucky energy of a male protagonist bent on facing evil, but also defeating it through raw, physical force)—i.e., violent liars that prey upon the imagination of susceptible maidens, threatening them with sexual violence. As a woman, she was making demons she shouldn't play with that illustrated her own fears, but also privilege as someone fascinated with the barbaric, faraway past. As Cynthia Wolff points out, Radcliffe's xenophilia and demon lovers are always partially murderous and mutilating in ways that regress towards the status quo: the demon lover as the white, cis-het woman's thrill of rape that is ultimately replaced by the fairytale wedding. To be blunt, it's basic and colonial (source).

Such are the canonical elements we've just discussed, and which we can camp ourselves through ludo-Gothic BDSM profaning Raimi and company's canonical, dogmatic idea of such stories distracting from the obvious: the inheritance of empire as something that is always in decay and letting things slip cryptonymically through the cracks!

For the rest of this subchapter portion, then, I want to examine demonic summoning and its BDSM utility during such torturous rituals; i.e., as having evolved into established canonical, psychosexual forms of the occult that strictly punish workers; re: canonical torture as something for us to camp during our own derelicts' elaborate strategies of misdirection (demonic gibberish eluding to freedom of expression developing Gothic Communism).

This camping is fraught with compromise; re: I also write, in Volume Zero, "If Sontag was vanilla, then Radcliffe was barely ice cream" (ibid.); i.e., stuck in a nigh-religious state of neo-medieval fascination and Numinously psychosexual "martyr-style" hard kink. So while demons are aliens, Radcliffe's were largely non-magical home invaders festooned with medieval pageantry while she sat in "horny jail." She played it safe, but still leaned in an oddly torturous direction (bored housewife syndrome³⁵⁹). You gotta start somewhere, right?

We'll primarily examine the canonical side of demon rituals, here. Then, in "Exploring the Derelict Past," we'll consider exquisite "torture": as a form of camp taken further than Radcliffe while still building on her classic ideas about forbidden sight that make for a solid foundation; i.e., canonical torture vs exquisite "torture" in the same poetic spheres' ghost of the counterfeit and abjection process. Each speaks to the liminal, transient position of damsels and detectives subversively tracing the treatment of demons and the demonized/chattelized left behind; e.g., from 1980s pornography and its own damsel archetype to Radcliffe's infamously white and intrusive Gothic heroines invading a given castle as "old dark residence."

Curiosity kills the cat, but nosy little girls developing Communism are anything but the state's idea of well-behaved; per Gothic canon infantilizing them, they must be watched because (and again, according to the state), they can easily hurt themselves when left unsupervised. At the very least, they might cause a scandal; e.g., making homemade porn in someone else's bed³⁶⁰! So do we demons infiltrate and destroy Rome's nuclear model from within, just like Mary Shelley (the nerdy slut) did before us:

As previously stated, our intent in doing so is to move beyond the usual psychoanalytical models and analysis by engaging with demons and their messy authorship/execution in dialectal-material terms; i.e., that don't tokenize/triangulate or muddy the waters, assisting in the state's subversion towards xenophilic anarchy during monster-fucking torture by exposing its psychological mechanisms through the demonic peril and associate power games meant to normally pacify workers.

Said pacification happens through canonical threats of force tied to stagnant material conditions, blindly expressed in demonic rituals of agony tied to bodily harm; i.e., bourgeois torture schemes. By comparison, sex positivity couches perception and power within demonic markers of trauma that aren't complete bullshit—often BDSM, kink and rituals of abuse directed at the inexperienced (which Radcliffe arguably was, insofar as she felt comfortable expressing herself in "polite" society); re: ludo-Gothic BDSM as, like Evil Dead's monster mom, having a bit of old Radcliffe in it.

³⁶⁰ The above image being my great uncle's antique bed, which Cuwu and I fucked in after a trip on the road. Doing so wasn't automatically vindictive on our part; but when I learned that my uncle was mistreating his adopted trans son, Cuwu and I sought revenge—fucking on my uncle's guest bed: "You have to be quiet or the Master will hear! Now fuck me harder!" Calculated risk isn't just an act, and half-real, it sits on and offstage during ludo-Gothic BDSM making demons during love!

Again, you gotta start somewhere, and Radcliffe's nonsense—while rather misinformed—belonged to a larger conservative trend invested wholly in profit; i.e., one that, per the ghost of the counterfeit furthering abjection, evolved into itself while serving the profit motive in ways we can steer however we want. To that, let's continue by looking at canonical torture serving profit beyond Radcliffe, who kept her demons fairly ordinary (re: Moers' Female Gothic versus its Male double: boys play with magic, rape and death; girls are trapped between infantilized positions of emotional disturbance and nun-like chastity, mid-investigation)!

Canonical torture is gibberish, like all demonology is, but it speaks to the material world as swept up in warring dialectical-material forces: the presumption of guilt for playing with magic spells (demon BDSM and psychosexual torture) for profit; re: church DARVO evolving into a lucrative latter-day canon "speaking of the Devil":

reanimation is often associated with black magic rituals as something to confront and destroy during monomyth us versus them. Frequently these are gibberish—a ghost-of-the-counterfeit "awe" by continually "speaking in tongues" amid demonic intimations thereof. The outcome—of their Promethean power and Faustian knowledge exchange—scapegoats sex-positive forms by attaching them to cataclysm, blindness, insanity and dismemberment; i.e., the parroting of ignorance through blind pastiche made by faithful children playing with dead things during Capitalist Realism. Often the flipping of the pages as quickly as the readers do makes the books involved impossible to replicate perfectly. So instead—and like Milton—new explorers regularly invent older derelicts within the same "ancient," cryptomimetic lineage.

But replicate it certainly does; i.e., in a highly animated "sizzle reel" of visual, palimpsestual chaos. Not only did the original Evil Dead's sequels inspire increasingly more violent and warlike copies; those copies inspired the FPS genre as something whose monasterial creative heritage became sacred unto itself intertextually across mediums—i.e., the book scene from Army of Darkness [1993] was, itself, copied like a counterfeit, unholy Bible in the 1997 videogame, Blood's 2011 mod, "Death Wish." The power of the book as part of the endless ritual of recreation is not just its fascination with the canonical barbaric past, but "cool points" you net when having one on your wall. The canonical text becomes trophy-like, be that hand-made, copy-and-pasted, or simulated ["State of Unreal Full Presentation," 2023]: "Demons are cool, but shooting or smashing them in the face is even cooler!"

In keeping with Radcliffe, there is a classically "male" facet to medieval manuscripts and book-binding; i.e., medieval monks sat around making them, whereas nuns were largely known [and fetishized] for taking in stragglers off the road, to care for them in times of dire need: a burden of care that privileged men, letting them write and make art, versus women being the usual caregivers... and whose blood magic ties ominously to books "bound in human flesh and inked in human blood." Said invented literature routinely abjects Catholic and Enlightenment abuses off onto a settler-colonial "other" that speaks both to the usual tokophobic nonsense; i.e., essentializing female biology as monstrous, but also blood libel, sodomy and witch hunter language that Raimi was repeatedly leaning on; re: the murderous, wandering cannibal womb as part of a bigger monstrous-feminine conspiracy about empire-ending fears: raining period blood [the torture of the female hero losing her hand have a fetishized quality to it versus the male tough-guy act].

It's the usual Red Scare shenanigans—with Fede Alvarez [another Rodriguez horror sell-out from south of the border] deliberately having the tokenized midwife abort the genderqueer spawn of Satan with a chainsaw episiotomy [don't Google that], only for it to end up being a caesarean delivering Rosemary's baby [the spectre of Marx] unto her and the unsuspecting world above [render Caesar unto us]: "Hail, Satan!" indeed; it's the crossing of the Rubicon

[with Nazis and Communists again occupying the same kayfabe shadow zone]! Such hyphenations of sex and force, but also parent confusion, speak to purity arguments regarding white women policing and delivering "pure" babies for the state: debriding a rotten womb/unweeded garden grown to seed, and with gusto!

Furthermore, it's quite common in canonical Gothic to marry tokophobia [and Freudian prescriptions of sex and force obscuring Marxist language] to unironic witch hunts; i.e., similar to Aliens' own anti-Communist mirror syndrome—with Cameron's royal Ripley clone a subjugated Hippolyta punching the Alien Queen as his Nazi-Communist Medusa, doing so for domestic abuses abjected onto colonial targets framed as "black" and "ancient" discoveries—so, too, does Alvarez tap into the same Freudian anxiety language: to furiously punch down against nature, Amazonomachia-style, under monomythic neoliberalism [the monomyth being when you punch Medusa, instead of hugging her and surrendering your power unto her during the Promethean Quest and its dialectic of the alien].

To make matters worse—if that were even possible—everything happens while literally wrapping the "ancient" patchwork "frankenbook" in Black-Veil garbage bags, and then in torturous barbed wire like some kind of fucked-up present from Jack Skellington [and whereupon a curious white male nerd (and double for Doctor Knowby from the first film) finds, in the basement of a cabin in the woods, and must cut through using bolt cutters]: a framed narrative steeped in the occult, female genital mutilation/surgical addiction and unironic sadomasochism! What's not good for the goose also isn't good for the gander!

"History ends first in tragedy and then in farce." But truth be told, it's a dialectical-material cycle that doesn't so much "end" as loop in on itself. And if revolutionary cryptonymy peels back the infernal concentric pattern's onion-like layers to free Medusa, then complicit cryptonymy is a concentric gaslight to argue for Medusa's continued, indefinite stay at the asylum: a rape without end, supervised by unscrupulous and knowing-better doctors [fighting back not with scalpels, but crowbars nail guns, chainsaws and—in Army of Darkness' case—kung fu and homemade explosives heralded by hilarious-if-blind camp ("Strange one!") and admittedly awesome music; re: Quixote's gonna Quixote, weird canonical nerds aping the legend of King Arthur [through a bad rendition of Cervantes and Mark Twain, but a faithful one of Aliens and Doom] to seek revenge against nature as monstrous-feminine under American neoliberalism—the biggest joke being they actually think they're estranged from privilege]!

In keeping with the ghost of the counterfeit/abjection process, the dogma, here, is literally Satanic Panic; i.e., to punish the audience for looking while simultaneously preaching to the choir about the horrors of colonialism, which it blames on witches [re: Federici]: "She's burning in Hell, you sick fuck!" Alvarez has the daughter of a white man say to him in a dirty basement, albeit after he straps her to a post and sets her on fire; i.e., it's the point of admission—white moderates paying to see a black passion/rape not just of the girl, but of religion itself, then patting themselves on the back for not being either of the parties onscreen [or so they think]:

Gaslighters gonna gaslight, but it's something we can study for our own reasons; i.e., to learn how they work and [re]present their arguments [the megachurch of Hollywood preaching to the choir]. To that, Evil Dead 2013 [and its³⁶¹ producers] let

Alvarez revel in torching the nuclear family model; i.e., by speaking guiltily to the false preacher as a vice character would, only to exonerate the proceedings by torturing a young white girl [echoes of Salem] to death, Pentecostal-style³⁶²; i.e., kettling the accused/policing the virgin/whore, who—suddenly fed up—tells daddy how she really feels [after having killed her mother because women often police their children under Patriarchal abuse; re: Jadis] and to which he responds not by slapping her wrist or face, but shooting her evil dead; re: "suffer not a witch to live!"

It's the same-old Shadow of Pygmalion; i.e., one that King and De Palma famously milked with Carrie [1976] years beforehand—a man from Maine, first imitated by a local Michigander and then by a director from Mexico also abusing Galatea [and likening demonic possession to drug use, speaking to the American War on Drugs poisoning his country]. By doing so, Alvarez is aping Raimi all the way back to Radcliffe—effectively saying to the audience, "See, see! She really was an evil ³⁶¹ The original funded out-of-pocket by a wealthy patron, knowing the movie had a rape scene with a tree in it, but also nonstop torture and the fetishized mutilation of women (and Gothic Romance tropes; e.g., the gravedigging scene). It's paradoxically the most openly torturous film, but also my favorite (alongside Alvarez' 2013 revisit) because it demonstrably has satire during the torture; Army of Darkness is much more blindly celebratory of such things/the male hero as Quixotic (re: "Valorizing the Idiot Hero"). Exploitation and liberation occupy the same space over time.

³⁶² And despite being a Satanic atheist (re: "I, Satanist, Atheist: A Gothacist's Thoughts on Atheism, Religion, and Sex," 2021), I have some experience with Baptists in real life; i.e., my twin brother once dated the daughter of a Baptist minister, wherein we spent an entire Thanksgiving at her sister's house. The family had us over—the husband basically a blue-collar man like Ashley Williams, and his wife the usual kind of victim (female, white) that suffers under such bondage—the lot of them only too happy to tell us we weren't welcome. For instance, the sister told Hans, my twin, that she prayed to Jesus every night that he might kill Hans and liberate her sibling from "living in sin"/prevent a marriage she didn't approve of. And one of her daughters—a little girl in a white angelic gown with long brown hair—walked up to me, and seeing me with long hair said, without missing a beat: "You're going to Hell." Never underestimate the power of dogma, babes—specifically its uncanny ability to encourage young women to submit as often as rebel (essentially an inversion of Hawthorne's Pearl, from The Scarlet Letter). Also, double standard: Jesus had no hair, you little fuck!

demon who went mad and killed her mother!" It's a "boundaries for me, not for thee" precursor to aborting Communism that would happen later in the movie; i.e., middle-class pearl-clutching defending Christendom and demonizing Free Love as Manson-esque: for the ghosts of Sharon Tate and Roman Polanski, deathly afraid of outsiders! All witch hunts have a bourgeois class character to them, pimping Galatea for their police state's gated communities.

It's also a foreigner assimilator's fear-fascination with persecution mania, lionizing American fascism by "both-sidesing" genocide; i.e., by having the witch—a captive audience in a larger summoning ritual during reactive abuse—go mad: both tied to the stake, but also curiously immune to Baptist sermons of fire and brimstone! The accusers don't just want her to break; they're literally praying for it, and all to maintain their own place in the world—i.e., the punitive and white-supremacist, patriarchal hierarchy endorsing and reenacting a self-fulfilling prophecy that requires the Patriarch to put her down "for her own good": "I love you, baby!" Antagonize nature as monstrous-feminine, then put her cheaply to work during "Holocaust by bullet." Such are the disgusting refrains of so many in-house rapists and child abusers, poaching their own blood, mid-libel. Don't worry, asshole; she'll be back to haunt you and your kind! You can't kill us, and Medusa never dies, but instead outlives her abusers and their twisted moral code!

That is only the beginning of our revenge, its culmination being to build a better world by bringing Hell to Earth and smashing Capitalist Realism: showing these lapdogs the error of their ways/unbridled hypocrisy while illustrating mutual consent in a gloriously an-Com society having subverted such dogma for good [capital being a system that relies on routine defilement to perpetuate itself for profit, and which we—endlessly tortured by said system—only grow stronger in united opposition]: the whore free to dictate their own destiny unfettered from state pimps [and their geek shows' unironic chainsaw strap-ons]! She smiles as she burns because she sees what the elite cannot, and bravely says the quiet part out loud; i.e., in ways they cannot hope to censor with their money and status—the monstrous-feminine avenger castrating the pimp as a rapist she avenges the victims of, doing so with radical glee. Revenge is sweet! "Say 'cheese' and die, Sisyphus!" with R.L. Stine capitalizing on the fatal portrait while selling it to kids; re: "[Death by Snu-Snu," 2024]. "Owo, what's this!"

A girl can dream! Until then, we demon mommies can play with the past to transform it away from monomythic violence!)

Sexuality is a regular visitor (and casualty) during bad BDSM and demons can certainly be sexy when subverting said BDSM. Indeed, sex sells, but occurs historically under Capitalism as coercive sex; i.e., as a means of voyeuristically looking at sexualized workers being slowly (or not so slowly, above) euthanized, again and again, mutilated by demon-lovers-in-disguise (cops) policing the whore as she speaks to her own rape when summoned (running a train on Medusa's corpse, one "phallic" daughter at a time). Religion is a sham run by charlatan pimps, which Max Powell put best in Peeping Tom (1960): "The kinds with girls on the front covers and no front covers on the girls." We'll get to that history more, in a moment.

For now, let's focus on the summoning ritual mid-subversion as a form of shifting power exchange, gradually mutating canonical usage; i.e., the canonical "gargoyle" fixated on purely psychological fears (of the dark, but also things of the dark, which are rooted in real-world scapegoats) that slowly has become more and more "perceptive" by more and more marginalized authors sticking their toes into the psychosexual BDSM world: to escape canonical demonization and chattelization; re: the damsel as submissive/regressive, the detective as relatively dominant, and demons offering up emancipatory forms of power exchange, mid-duality (with ironic variants of the sub, switch and dom performed by us).

Obviously past attempts at doing so were far tamer (from a class war standpoint) than recent ones, but remained products of their own times; re: Radcliffe, as we shall see, was positioned to write the exact stories she wrote, while still engaging in BDSM antics bearing out a supernatural façade: the rights of women as more than passive sex objects, able to pursue and explore demonic sex. Whatever the author's dialectical-material leanings, language and technology are paramount to achieving their end result. Indeed, the "incubator" is media itself as occupied, mid-altercation/-intervention.

Often an occult presence lives inside a piece of media that can harbor ghosts, but just as easily summon demons to overpower the viewer with. Doing so constitutes an exchange of power and knowledge in demonic fashion; i.e., through the performers that represent symbols of domination and fear as increasingly sublimated or subverted. However "occult" these may seem, their imaginary origins still apply to workers and chattel in the material world. Confronted with a "demon," some will want to unironically punish it; others will see the demon as a mode of self-expression reverse-abjecting the actual torturer's state-sanctioned bias: "Spank me, mommy!" Medusa is rape-proof as a means of self-defense and attack;

i.e., as anti-predation guerrilla (asymmetrical/counterterror) warfare saying anisotropically to her attackers, "Look, don't touch!"

process—i.e., sending said gaze and history of rape back at her attackers to chill them [and the profit motive] to stone; re: the whore's revenge. Everyone loves the whore; and whereas demons are traditionally invented to serve ideological roles pursuing the profit motive through constant austerity and "vigilance," female and/or non-white and GNC demons like the Gorgon canonize the exploitation of whores [female or not] by men [and their black-penitent double standards].

Carved from stone, Medusa is just as much a vengeful "Galatea" as she is a snake demon. By turning the [traditionally male/tokenized Man Box] gazer into stone, she traps them in a frozen state like Medusa herself once was, thereby protecting herself [and other potential/actual victims] by freezing the rapist in place. It's not so much in a literal sense, but whose reactionary disgust gives away would-be abusers of "demonic" women and other state-appointed degenerates; e.g., black men and their BBCs; i.e., those selected for punishment because their mere open existence defies the status quo as paradoxically needing someone to rape. Her cursed existence suitably hyphenates mouth/fang and vagina/knife to hatch through birth trauma outside the womb [from Frankenstein's own extra-natal commentaries on development weaponizing Communism as such].)

A large part of this practice goes back to the death omen as something to envision through vague symbols of ambiguous danger and power. Death, in Gothic media, is generally something to gaze upon—a "darkness visible" whose paradox amounts to beholding that which "cannot" be seen.

A common canonical tactic is selective punishment: When gazed upon, the capture and release of the demon(s) as expressions of trauma through power exchange will famously "destroy" the viewer (exhibit 46c). This annihilation varies depending on the "power source," but also the onlooker as a pair of eyes given to the audience by the author. Ghosts, for example, can trap humans in a similar state of frozen death, delivering trademark sensations of live burial. While demons like Medusa can also do this, the modern Promethean Quest involves a more transactional Faustian exchange; i.e., negotiated dealings in unequal, forbidden and dark exchange/radical transformation vis-à-vis power, knowledge and desire, but also bouts of informed consent/punishment (whereas Medusa was simply hunted down during collective punishment [a war crime] and beheaded without discussion, modern iterations of her demon are far more chatty before/after the torture begins).

As we have seen, negotiated appearances can be playful "tortures," or serious trials/death curses. However, there's always a misbehaving element to the ritual on both sides:

- moral panic—privileged, unwitting children playing with the occult, dating back to Radcliffe's nosy heroines.

- persecution—dissidents more used to state violence who find themselves dealing with "demons" that are hardly divorced from the giving and receiving of normalized police abuse; e.g., the chav teens vs the police, from Attack the Block (a gutter ballet that also includes extraterrestrial demons, 2011).

Under these sheltered or besieged circumstances, the canonical Numinous becomes an especially effective "keep out" sign for the elite—the proverbial skull-and-crossbones preceding an angry divinity that exudes total, alien power (the Numinous) associated with capital authority/punishment and the state; i.e., the latter putting people to death to uphold profit through abject demon rituals having evolved: in constant praxial opposition with franker and braver testimonies occupying the same shadow zone. Regression is always a threat, but one that paradoxically must be faced by those who refuse to conform: we monsters (the state will never let us).

It becomes immensely important, then, to understand what threatens workers while experimenting with playful forms of "torture"; re: ludo-Gothic BDSM summoning and playing with older demons by consciously embodying them to become more sex-positive/Gothically mature than Radcliffe, Raimi and Alvarez were. This happens through the ritual itself as something to harness and control, not blindly worship as canon (Jade, the stalker of my partner Crow, for example, loved Evil Dead provided you didn't critique it—any more than you'd critique police violence in Ghostbusters; i.e., its own hunting of the harvest through controlled opposition; re: "Cornholing the Corn Queen," from Volume One).

Something as simple as a hand on one's throat can denote a threat—one established through trust inside a "violent" ritual and its playful language of "torture" (re: "Healing from Rape," also from Volume One). Playing with trauma is precisely the point, placing "violence" in quotes to provide a buffer between one's lived trauma and said buffer's power to stave off further violent acts; i.e., through an apotropaic, intersectionally solidarized pedagogy of the oppressed surviving in the shadow of police violence as alienating everyone differently. In this instance, the player and the audience are often one-in-the-same, demanding "torture," or the playful threats of peril, which signify different things depending on who's watching and who's being tortured, etc, when healing from rape (re: Volume One).

Surviving rape and preventing it systemically are as much about overcoming shame, mid-play. The truth hurts, but it hurts so good (with Le Brock's "walking womb" being as much a nod to Abel Ferrara's 1981 Ms. 45, in John Hughes' 1985 Weird Science (next page)—but also the same neo-conservative wish fulfillment of the Ancient Athenian Amazon [and latter-day femme fatales, 1800s-onwards³⁶³] being revived from old spare parts to thrill the nuclear model, but ultimately uphold it, below): teenage wet dream or coach for uncontrolled opposition? You be the judge, and make her in your own image (or vice versa, you in hers)!

The determining factor—of these tortures being "exquisite" or not, thus sex-positive or not—is the appreciative or appropriative nature of the torture itself taking place. Catharsis, in sex-positive forms, is achieved from revisiting trauma in playful, xenophilic forms, then healing from it by establishing a sense of agency over one's own body and mind attached encouragingly to larger structures we alter first inside ourselves; re: liberation first happens inside a smaller labyrinth of the mind, before going out into larger labyrinths inside larger labyrinths, mise-en-abyme (with Plato's cave being equally concentric): half-real liminalities occupied by demons as liminal beings trapped between fiction and non-fiction, onstage and off.

Gothic novels and their many threats present demons cryptonymically to detectives/damsels, but also rape play more broadly as something the reader can choose to vicariously confront. Simply put, demons symbolize rape by possessing their victims, exuding total control over them by forcing them to subject themselves to all manner of terrible things. Yet, the demons, trauma they intimate, and ritual itself can all be hijacked by the assigned submissive—a recipient "author" of pain who chooses their fate in relation to whatever they summon: "unspeakable" stories that threaten a lack of control—usually tied to violent, often sexual impulses, but also demonic personas' calculated risk—as things that pass through the performer as inhabited by a presence they choose to let inside of themselves: the evil within becoming the evil everywhere, tramp-stamped for camp (say that ten times fast).

(exhibit 46d: Model and artist: Blxxd Bunny and Persephone van der Waard. The thrill of false danger goes both ways—from dom to sub, but also as delivered by Dark Fathers and Mothers of gentle and strict forms to varying degrees; e.g., Radcliffe's rapacious "demon lover" taken to supernatural, xenophilic extremes, by Bunny and myself—my art speaking to their ace public nudism, demonic aesthetics and love for exhibiting BDSM [especially the receiving of pain as something to give back to the audience]. It's Bunny's way of saying they love us. Right back atcha, babe!)

Similar to general BDSM roles, the line between damsels, detectives and demons is not wholly discrete, in ludo-Gothic BDSM (and Gothic counterculture—a concept we'll unpack much more, during Volume Three). The power of the heroine to summon the demon, for example, frequently denotes a sexual interest or agency—an activity unto itself that, not too long ago, would have been entirely forbidden to women regardless of what they were summoning.

For example, though hardly overtly Satanic, the established rules of literature forbid Catherine Morland—and by extension, Jane Austen—from "summoning" Henry Tilney as an object of a lady's desire. In doing so, Austen's Northanger Abbey pushed female desire into verboten spheres, gleefully taking all the credit:

for, though Henry was now sincerely attached to her [...] I must confess that his affection originated in nothing better than gratitude, or, in other words, that a persuasion of her partiality for him [underlining by me] had been the only cause of giving her a serious thought. It is a new circumstance in romance, I acknowledge, and dreadfully derogatory of an [sic] heroine's dignity; but if it be as new in common life, the credit of a wild imagination will at least be all my own (source).

Though incredibly tame by modern standards, Austen's parody of the Gothic (and Radcliffe) constitutes a cracked door that, when thrown wide, pushes society headlong into sex-positive realms! In short, Austen's critique of Radcliffe inspired my own (see: Volume Zero).

Furthermore, replete with gender trouble, ironic power exchange and appreciative peril, BDSM rituals expanding on Austen (or Lewis) can become friendly through the demons, damsels, and detectives they display. Roles can be switched around, with traditionally submissive parties allowing themselves to exude agency within the Gothic mode no matter how monstrous-looking the participants are: choosing to sleep with whomever they summon, during rituals founded on mutual consent during unusual directions (and degrees) of power exchange. This extends to the demon, which can find themselves bound to the arrangement of fulfilling the sub's desires. Goodness me! What scandalous dalliance and coquette!

As such, the demon is no longer a simple butcher of cis-het women, nor an occupier of their bodies against their will; the owners of those bodies subvert canonical demonology by acting as sex-positive vessels of demonic power—i.e., to give and receive "torture" that denies the canonical torturer exclusive access to helpless victims by making would-be victims the arbiters of forbidden knowledge: demonology as a harmless state of existence. As such, workers choose how they want to engage with demonic sex, dictating the course of whatever actions transpire. So do we put the kinds of psychotic torturers chasing the whore in Evil Dead out of their misery!

For example, Bunny is asexual in person, but delights in presenting themselves in a sexual manner through iconoclastic artwork they sometimes make (thus negotiate) with others. Walking the line between slutty angel/devil, but also bratty virgin/whore (teasing but ultimately saying no to sex; i.e., as a form of power exchange that disempowers sexist catcalling men, first and foremost), Bunny's awesomely paradoxically power lies in self-expression through demonic art; i.e., that allows Bunny (and their fat demonic ass, above) to perform within negotiated boundaries: as someone who funded my own work, and who I have repeatedly paid tribute towards, over the years! As such, we show separately and together how power is something you give and take to prevent rape, generally by putting "rape" in quotes during ludo-Gothic BDSM (thus Gothic Communism) as a *joint-venture*³⁶⁴. Always has been, my dudes!

³⁶⁴ With Bunny supporting me after I was getting dogpiled by cis and GNC sex workers on Twitter (re: "Setting the Record Straight, Transmisia Experience: 5/26/2023"), telling me:

I'm so sorry this is all happening, you're handling it all with grace and I'm so proud of you for standing up for yourself. It sucks that being online comes with so much miscommunication that makes it easier for people to accuse others of things that they misunderstood or failed to mention beforehand. You're a wonderful person! Some people just aren't as comfortable as they pretend to be initially and they won't say anything until it's too late and that's ENTIRELY on them, not you. Especially when it comes to people CONTINUING to say that you're a wonderful person and that they support you and everything you stand for speaks VOLUMES about who you are as a person especially when they feel like you've "made them uncomfortable" by trying your best to communicate professionally.

Better still, said performance has the added consequence of startling canonical proponents—a kind of invitation to show their true colors to Bunny's audience by acting upset (what the kids call "self-reporting"). There's no "Faustian bargain" taking place, merely a revelation of who the real abusers are; i.e., between what I call "the demonic trifecta," or damsels, detectives and demons exploring the derelict past for its torturous energies having revelatory potential,

In other words, Bunny got back and "gotchu, babe." They're a colossal sweetie, so much so that I've painted them for years \(they were my first cover model, too—August 20th, 2023\), but also defended them in kind when they were bullied. Revolution is a two-way street in more ways than one; i.e., workers punch up against the elite and help each other up when the elite's proponents push us down ("And why do we fall, Master Bruce?"): "Dayman, fighter of the Nightman, she's a master of karate and friendship!"

mid-cryptonymy! To form boundaries to force our abusers to cross them and be witnessed intentionally doing so.

Introducing the Demonic Trifecta

In this talismanic/apotropaic sense of class, culture and race warfare married to iconoclastic poetics divorced from canonical ones but stuck in the same cryptonymic room, demons and their BDSM constitute a specific kind of mental offering through Gothic poetics—of power and knowledge to the viewer as potentially one of three things, but more probably a liminal combination within the oppositional praxis of ritualized torture:

- damsels, or persons conditioned to be tortured (masochists) or disempowered (subs)
- detectives, which "walk the line," often from a damsel-esque and/or regressive position, moving towards/away from a demonic position of power exchange (switches)
- demons, or persons conditioned to torture (sadists) or (dis)empower (doms)
- or imitations of these behaviors in the overall code that oscillate/reverse the ritualized threat and power exchange in some shape or form

We'll keep examining this "demonic trifecta" of interrelated expression much more closely in "Exploring the Derelict Past" (and good play vs bad play in Volume Three). For now, just remember the trifecta is accompanied by vicarious threats of mental versus overt, physical torture, "punishing" the viewer through the protagonist for seeking power not offered to them by the state; i.e., being up to no good in a voyeuristic sense: damsels in distress (sexual desire and one's conditioned association of it with mutilative force; re: Radcliffe).

Nevertheless, physical and mental attacks are performative—are made by and towards extensions of people told through the performance. These needn't be abusive or physical (exhibit 46c); excluding live performance art or BDSM acts, the torture taking place is not overtly happening to the audience in a physical sense; it's occurring physiologically through the thrilling act of watching the "threat" of torture, including its ironic, exquisite forms: again, ludo-Gothic BDSM places "torture" in quotes to denote an iconoclastic liminal quality during the battle for liberation (reclaiming the Superstructure from a bourgeois Wisdom of the Ancients).

We'll explore how mutual consent, descriptive sexuality and appreciative peril perform ironically in relation to canonical BDSM, in Volume Three. Ironic or not, I currently intend to examine how a torturous approach/outcome—be it sex-positive or sex-coercive—occurs relative to "the past" as something to demonize, but also perform and/or relate to as an art form; i.e., as a paradoxical means of exchanging unequal, forbidden and dark/fatal power and knowledge during "torture" haunted by torture, onstage and off.

(artist: Gustave Doré)

As a vicarious detective or damsel, the audience can see more than the demon of the ritual, its servants, or the so-called "sacrifice," but also the hero solving the case or surviving its Miltonic peril as a sub, dom, or switch; the audience can also see the story from the demon's iconoclastic point of view—i.e., the damsel or detective as demonic, but also the demon as humanized: a damsel-esque or detective-esque demon, but also a heroic role on par with the Romantic, proworker interpretation of Milton's Satan from Paradise Lost that Percy (thus Mary) Shelley had; re, Nafi's assertion: "According to Shelley, it was a mistake to think that Satan was intended by Milton as the popular personification of evil. This argument is still very much alive and valid today" (source). From the Shelleys to me, I wholeheartedly agree!

Neither Radcliffe nor Austen bothered with humanizing demons and their Faustian torture, but Lewis was more forthcoming by having the Devil attack heteronormative men of power in a remarkably genderqueer manner (re: Broadmoor's "Camping the Canon" having the little devil change genders on a whim, but also its size; i.e., the smaller Matilda containing the big Devil piloting the smaller actor inside concentric veneers). Even so, Lewis still displaced the critique by pitting it against Catholic men of faith, but all the same made their dismemberment by the Devil's claws something to absolutely relish (when I first read The Monk back in grad school, I was so excited by the horrifying ending that I woke Zeuhl up to tell them, scaring them senseless in the process; they not only forgave me, but read The Monk and loved it, too).

And frankly why not? As givers of pain, demons often receive pain themselves by becoming targets of righteous violence dressed up as "ironic" in bad faith; i.e., the sort that traditionally requires banishment from holy men or modest women, but also deputized civilians acting militantly towards an assigned target; re: moral panics, which now more than ever ties to military optimism (e.g., id Studio's Doom aping Evil Dead without irony from 1993 to 1996 to 2016 to 2020 to 2025's latest upcoming installment, onwards³⁶⁵): time and time again, a neo-conservative attitude directed at states enemies through tried-and-true tactics. To camp Radcliffe is to camp that and its Man-Box detectives; i.e., their policing the whore's illegitimate Nazi-Communist (thus reprobate) existence, onstage and off.

³⁶⁵ All cops are bad, including those who make them; re: "impunity is the apex of privilege," but also pandering and willful ignorance; i.e., id Studios making the exact kinds of loud, cruel and dumb, "die by the sword" revenge power fantasies that white moderate-to-reactionary straight men drool over while punching down (I'm speaking from experience, here; re: "Those Who Walk Away from Speedrunning" also dealing with the bigotry of the shooter community present in Doom). As fascism rises, state actors threaten their base to torture them with the idea of "total loss"; i.e., the ability to even play fancy computer games becoming canon vis-à-vis the target audience's usual privileges. So does the middle class abject the usual victims of state copaganda in-game as something to defend out-of-game; re: Gamergate revived, making the ludic Gothic respectable again during eco-fascism. They become false rebels, turning Satan into a Spartan cop punching his evil half, onstage and off.

As iconoclasts looking to liberate sex work (thus all work) from capital during Gothic Communism, we summon and play with demons, during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., their hideous torture's unknown pleasures loaded with monstrous-feminine cliché. As we do, our focus steadily remains on the proletarian element—less about "pure" psychoanalysis, thus psychological models' fear or damage divorced from material critiques (a basic fear of the dark, for example), and more about the humanoid aspects within these areas that indicate older ways of seeing the natural-material world that are normally forbidden to us during state revenge arguments pimping whores for fear of revenge: exhibits of people (and animals) as things to intake through art, but also engorge oneself with according to what one prefers to work with and consume, demon-wise. Demons, then, are the torturous "past" revived, which makes their oft-Numinous backgrounds the consumption of pain, itself; i.e., as "religious" according to whatever the demon on the canvas is composed of, mid-engagement: flesh, stone, oil, for materials, and for methods, to suck, fuck, eat, infect, haunt, or some combination thereof.

This being said, the appearance—of canonical and iconoclastic forms—is the same, mid-dialectic, requiring dialectical-material scrutiny to parse them as they play out; i.e., doing so to tell the difference between ironic, campy damsels, detectives and sex demons versus their canonical versions. Let's go over that (and examine the dangers of canon vs camp that affect us and animals chasing forbidden sight), then transition into "Exploring the Derelict Past."

The primary difference between canonical and iconoclastic detectives/damsels is the iconoclastic act of choosing to be "tortured" by the "past" in ways that patently threaten psychosexual violence by camping the canon (re: Broadmoor)—namely the humanized, sex-positive elements of a demon. Investigated by detectives or "suffered" by damsels, this fatal knowledge can empower those normally exploited by Capitalism in demonic language: women, but also animals (the "Call of the Wild" chapter will examine how demonic animals—e.g., werewolves, insect demons [xenomorphs] and other "totems"—canonically operate as a source of demonic persecution, thus something to liberate from canonical phobias, mid-"rape").

A large part of the female detective or damsel is sight in relation to the mind as traumatized by denied, forbidden vision; re: forbidden sight, hence darkness visible. One of the most famous Gothic models is, once again, Ann Radcliffe's terror/horror binary from "On the Supernatural in Poetry"; i.e., her calling card as a means of viewing evil in relation to its exquisitely "torturous" mental effects on the audience; re:

Terror and horror are so far opposite, that the first expands the soul, and awakens the faculties to a high degree of life; the other contracts, freezes and nearly annihilates them [...] and where lies the great difference between horror and terror but in the uncertainty and obscurity, that accompany the first, respecting the dreaded evil? (source).

To that, Radcliffe broke the capitalist mold, her best-selling stories absolutely concerned with demons and sex as things to see and experience; she just chose to hide them behind an explained supernatural—gentler ghosts as beings to demonically reanimate and expose her audience to. For her, it was explicitly improper to show but entirely acceptable to imagine rape behind the Black Veil. She would consider it wholly beneath her to ask for power in a masculine sense, much preferring a submissive position instead of a dominant one. Different strokes.

Before moving onto "Exploring the Derelict Past" and a prolonged examination of the demonic trifecta—re: of sex worker damsels/detectives and their own Promethean Quests/Faustian bargains (for the if-not-fatal-then-certainly-difficult knowledge offered by demons)—we will need to examine animals; i.e., as they tie into the kinds of worker exploitations that canonical demons represent, keeping workers horny and/or afraid, thus distracted by intimations of nature as dark, brutal and fearsome, but also inhuman, chattelized and vengeful (an idea we'll very briefly introduce here, then unpack during the "Call of the Wild" chapter).

To that, demons in Gothic stories aren't simply "ancient" and "derelict," hence already-fake rediscoveries of the past as "dug up" (found footage or ancient artifact), but of course being far more recently designed regarding things mankind has dominated for thousands of years: nature as alien, criminal chattel pimped by modernity (the Enlightenment).

Lucky for us, language and imagination resist standardization³⁶⁶—have resisted standardization in the past; i.e., through the language of parody speaking to laughter as a nervous response/the best medicine; e.g., this woman falling by

³⁶⁶ Which linguistically alludes to genocide through the coerced usage happening through force, including assimilated peoples who were killed by the state regardless if they followed the rules or not; i.e., the colonial binary's double standard under genocide described facetiously as relocation, "progress," or other settler-colonial cryptonyms.

accident, farting because of it and laughing like a maniac (RM Video's "Woman Trips and Farts in Front of Doorbell Camera," 2023): an at-times-absurd (re: Camus) "rememory" attempt to hold onto the past as something to preserve from state-sanctioned genocide while farting in their faces (not only do girls fart during sex, but fart "rape" back at their rapists, then laugh at the moral outrage that ensues). These iterations can—like my cat coming to me through the dark doorway and vaguely-but-cutely asking for food—suddenly appear and demand to be fed, feeding us in exchange as we engage back and forth; i.e., with the past as a constant already-visitor. Nature is monstrous-feminine, but also smol. "Why have you forsaken me?"

The basic idea of Sex Positivity is to learn from material history as demonic, including chattelized/domesticated animals, their wild/stigmatized counterparts, and the chimeric ways all fit into demonization during oppositional praxis. Relative to these animals, iconoclasts want reconstruct past events/attempts at creative instructional insight better than those before us did: to try and reclaim what is lost in opposition to those in power by "feeding" their imaginations with monstrous things that combat blindness—a collective, organic response to the material world that helps working people "see" the material forces at work; i.e., in ways that holistically describe the inherent complexities and contradictions that emerge over time: demons as humanized instead of chattelized, returning our attention to the abuse afflicting humans and non-human animals the world over. Where they eat animals, they also eat people (re: the Omelas refrain); and nothing is sacred but universal liberation, vis-à-vis basic human, animal and environmental rights.

The human world certainly has the power to do good stewardship—has done so many times already. As Gaia Vince puts it:

Human culture is so powerful that it not only shapes us as individuals, but has remade the natural world too. As Dawkins points out, cows, pigs, dogs and roses are among the socially contrived inventions humans have made over the past millennia – none exists naturally. We have made these species to fulfil a human need (source: "Eugenics Would Not Work in Humans").

In short, just as animals do not benefit from Capitalism and its search for profit, neither do humans according to Raj Patel and Jason Moore's A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things:

The social struggles over nature, money, work, care, food, energy, and lives that attend the Capitalocene's poultry bones amount to a case for why the most iconic symbol of the modern era isn't the automobile or the smartphone something to blend with predator animals: a wolf persona with a "bunny" attitude, exhibit 65; the monstrous "broodmare," exhibit 87a; or the Amazon mommy dom as animalistically strong and closer to nature, 102a3; etc].

To explain the sushi boat's inclusion, then, I wanted to do my part in showing there's no ethical consumption under Capitalism, even for me; the sushi boat is what Capitalism has turned the animal into, but also me as a human being: I eat nature in ways that are mass-produced. The animal[s] are useful for food, but also profit, whereas humans endlessly consume in ways that are useful to the elite, who consume the world for profit by demonizing its habitants and nature to chattelize them in different demonic ways. Ideally nature—both flora, fauna and the environment—should be something to preserve and help thrive as stewards thereof, not consume. In the words of Steve Irwin:

What good is a fast car, a flashy house, and a gold-plated dunny to me? Absolutely no good at all. I've been put on this planet to protect wildlife and wilderness areas, which in essence is gonna help humanity. I wanna have the purest oceans. I wanna be able to drink water straight out of that creek. I wanna stop the ozone layer. I wanna save the world. And you know money? Money is great. I can't get enough money. And you know what I'm gonna do with it? I'm gonna buy wilderness areas with it. Every single cent I get goes straight into conservation. And guess what Charles, I don't give a rip whose money it is mate. I'll use it, and I'll spend it on buying land [source: a 2004 interview with 60 Minutes].

As Bay denotes, however, the idea isn't so much preservation of pre-owned land by white benefactors holding onto said land; it's land back to the dispossessed. Nature keeps Humanity alive, to which even a neoliberal façade like Captain Planet [1990] hints at the truth through its own "bad future" narrative: "No, you fools! Without these trees, we will all die!" [source: "Two Futures Part II," 1991].)

and their carbon production through mass production and a refusal to move towards universal degrowth and away from infinite growth, efficient profit and war ["Your 'Carbon Footprint' Is A Scam," 2022]. Despite nature being framed as something to conquer in demonic language, no amount of guns can stop the climate changes on Earth induced by Humanity's economy of rape and war versus nature. And furthermore, no amount of eco-fascism will stop total starvation/mass extinction when the planetary ecosystem collapses. Humans aren't the virus, capital and Capitalist Realism are. The brainchild of evil white men from Columbus onwards, those are the opposite of good stewardship.)

Food and animals are, in many ways, analogous to worker demonization and exploitation, offering up their own knowledge and power as demonic sources thereof. Not all knowledge and power is palliative; sometimes, the demonic effect is Promethean/Faustian, wracking the recipient with madness and guilt (reverse abjection). For one, animals have become synonymous with private property under Capitalism, generally as food to eat, labor to exploit, or pacifying tools that keep workers calm as they're being exploited (e.g., cats are definitely therapy animals). Anything not useful is—like Marx asserts of owning purely through usage and usage alone³⁶⁷—stupidly destroyed to our own detriment: a brainless "mulch," horribly ground together for the elite's heteronormative chase of profit on a global scale (which Marx failed to adequately critique, meaning we must camp his ghost, like Weber did, and make him gayer than he actually was; re: "Making Marx Gay"). Food and animals can be revived as iconoclastic art that reunites humans with nature—a witch's familiar or little guardian-of-the-underworld that constitutes a social-asexual bond to express an open mind with, in linguo-material terms. Not all demons are sexualized, especially their natural inspirations (though there is a sexual component to anthromorphs, which "Call of the Wild" will get into).

So make a Gothic cake (or trans-inclusive vagina cupcakes like Debra Massing), but also become closer to nature outside humans by learning to see other animals as inherently valuable, too. Give your pet a cute little outfit; gamely push for more ethical (vegan) food production to combat unethical consumption under Capitalism (thus the Anthropocene as endemic to Capitalism and food production, the Chicken McNugget as abhorrent a cryptonym as a can of Coke). Try to no longer abject what is a normally relegated to slaughterhouses, instead understanding and appreciating the animals being mass produced and sacrificed under capital's factories of death—with manufactured scarcity and food waste being cruel not just to starving people but the animals being killed. What affects them will affect us; i.e., without an ecosystem, the world will collapse and so will we, the smallest animals the most valuable (e.g., mankind is nothing compared to the little honeybees that pollinate "his" crops).

³⁶⁷ "Private property has made us so stupid and one-sided that an object is only ours when we have it – when it exists for us as capital, or when it is directly possessed, eaten, drunk, worn, inhabited, etc., – in short, when it is used by us. Although private property itself again conceives all these direct realisations of possession only as means of life, and the life which they serve as means is the life of private property – labour and conversion into capital" (re: "Private Property and Communism, 1844).

Waste not, want not. Love what you eat and where it comes from in defense of nature from the state. We are part of that equation, Cartesian thought and Capitalist Realism be damned! We not only can survive degrowth; degrowth must happen if we are to survive! Anyone who says otherwise or drags their heels is a cop—e.g., Taylor Sheridan's protagonist for his 2024 Landman being not just an unapologetic shill for Big Oil, but written to maintain the deeply conservative attitudes that go along with Big-Oil hegemony and its ensuing industry and destruction; i.e., they can't see anything beyond themselves, so they assist in ways that pointedly benefit them as demonstrably not poor (the bougie couple living in a boom town that treats the entire world like Midland Texas):

Capitalism wastes much, cultivated by powerful people hopelessly alienated from workers and the planet, who only see numbers on a screen and worship the nostalgia of their own awful belief system turned into seductive dramas of a "better time" that never was (the canceled future).

As Sheridan shows, their materials shape our way of thinking as being reduced to dead commodities that defend the system to the death: the endless series of trademarked, copywritten brands of plastic-wrapped and pulverized undead/demon/animal commodities. He completely sucks, apologizing for billionaire men and their privileged wives fucking everyone else over thanks to apologists like Sheridan (who Billybob obviously represents). Hillbillies can gentrify and decay like anyone else—a historical-material fact that goes back to the antebellum South, but haunts it, America and the rest of the world through expertly made copaganda like Landman, post-Jim-Crow and Lost Cause: "Won't someone please think of the white man and his white family?" Like, fuck you, Sheridan, and your stupid white supremacist view of the world acting as "stewards" for everyone else while raping us stone dead (also, Mad Men [2007] sucks, and so does John Hamm):

In keeping with Shelley's technological singularity, the posthuman nightmare extends to animals being replaced with artificial versions; i.e., digital images (a bit like the owl from Blade Runner), or little "tick-tock" variants that conspicuously perform labor better than their comfortably organic, living counterparts. Animals, including humans, have become more robotic in ways capital tries to enslave (missing the point of Shelley's technophobia to copy it in bad faith).

To it, anyone banking on Humanity magically reaching a Utopian future with the robot maid from The Jetsons (1962) is taking a huge gamble; i.e., they're banking on Capitalism actually investing in such measures, which it historically couldn't care less about—would rather cue the fake, canned laughter from The Jetsons, a "zombie" capitalist model of the American nuclear family The Simpsons only temporarily escaped from (re: Charlie Sweatpants' "Zombie Simpsons" [2012] being a concept we'll explore even more at the end of Chapter One, in Volume Three). It's all sanitized—naked and laid bare yet horribly controlled, familial, sacred: "No, it's the children and the animals who are wrong!"

This goes both ways. Workers think the image is real while also never meeting an animal and being alienated from its pain; i.e., why it slowly went extinct. They become stupid, blind, imperiled to encounter the same fate at an accelerated rate (of rape). Consigned to a lifeless world without chonkers, who—like a witch's familiar or natural demons more broadly—were a small bond to nature that disappears as nature disappears; i.e., because of Capitalism, not Communism (though Marxist-Leninism's fighting of the West was incredibly harmful and led to great amounts of lasting and heteronormative environmental damage: re: Persephone van der Waard's "Leaving the Closet; or, a Trans Woman's Scholarly Contributions to Older Histories of Sodomy and Queer Love," 2024). When that bond literally disappears, the animals are replaced with robots (or the C4 imposters from Caddyshack, 1980); i.e., to slowly but steadily become a metal-and-concrete "food desert," and one where Capitalism (and its proponents; re: Sheridan) transform the landscape, people and language to "get us and our little dogs too."

This bourgeois gaslight of the Wicked Witch invokes flying monkeys in another sense: Frankenstein abominations stitched from dead parts, made by a false, bad-faith witch ("and you are only a caricature of a witch"). Furthermore, through such persons, we're left with bad, manmade copies of worker action that become a bad person-made copy as Capitalism tries to recruit "tokens" from different marginalized groups; i.e., into the same destructive mindset, whose division "murders to dissect," leading to an entire society of stupid know-it-all who can tell you all the pieces of something while it is dead, but can't understand it while it is alive within a larger functioning whole (re: Jadis)—language, animals, people, places, objects as an assemblage.

Let's conclude with a few cautionary points about camping demonic expression (of the Faustian sort), then move onto "Exploring the Demonic Past"!

Camp is all about risk and reward; i.e., it bears repeating that camp is dangerous; re: Scott's own magical regressions, in Alien, providing a retro-future "taming of the shrew." Demons of a more magical sort, then, are treated as oracles to police; i.e., expected to speak when prodded, then punched for it, regardless of the answer (to maintain the status quo against nature as monstrous-feminine). The public understanding of demonic art and the animal world in relation to workers, then, becomes something to constantly demonstrate and promote; i.e., one which—through different individual responses to it as a living, plastic (organic, malleable) thing—collectively fosters sex positivity as a countercultural, artistic, emotionally/Gothically intelligent and empathetic movement. When examined in hindsight, this parallel movement indicates an ongoing iconoclastic presence—a counteractive, opposing creative force whose various demonic members can transform the material world. The toll is a heavy one, if only because those loaded with Promethean knowledge are outed not simply as insane, but as demonic, "possessed" whistleblowers: Mephistopheles tempting Faust!

Apart from demons, I want practitioners of Gothic Communism to employ a commune of Gothic egregores (a cryptomimetic group of ghosts as literal "ghost stories," the pun being that each tells a different story about the same event in the material world; e.g., Rashomon, above, 1950). These, in turn, tie to our main theories (the Four Gs) as needed, mid-synthesis; i.e., to commune with the reimagined past as useful towards liberating ourselves from sex worker abuse, hence the entire planet. This forbidden sight (and its breaking of Capitalist Realism) starts in how we see popular media and people in relation to one another under the same brutal system; it includes making monsters ourselves (our camp seizing the means of production and reuniting with our alienized labor). Gothic Communism, then, is a process of detection made by inquiring minds who playfully expand their imagination with monstrous-feminine language; i.e., by using it as a kind of "educated guess" about the world. So does the detective grow informed by things, which the elite confidently describe as "mere lies": using them to detect things that are normally forbidden to the everyday observer by state cryptonymy!

This makes Gothic Communists detectives of the beleaguered, under-attack sort—whose constant, vigilante mode of engagement with their ambivalent surroundings "ask" questions from moment to moment; i.e., in their damsel-to-whose heads that overwhelm them, the prose slowing things down to a phenomenological crawl during the mask party as a socio-ludic metaphor (the danger disco) populated with devil-in-disguise (whose disguise pastiche goes both ways, during oppositional praxis); e.g., the Tech-Noir "danger disco" scene from The Terminator playing in literal slow-motion.

Face-to-face with someone potentially dangerous, time stands still to extend the drama of whether or not the heroine and audience actually are in danger—both from the mask-wearing lothario, but also to capture the sheer intensity of going outside one's comfort zone by "summoning" demons to begin with (often wearing masks that we're waiting to see if they'll take off to prove their authentic or inauthentic nature; or, in the case of the terminator or serial killers, is their actual face as an authentic infiltrator)! That's the beauty and danger of camp!

It bears repeating, then, how Radcliffe's demons weren't even magical, but more the highway banditti in a mask or the false preacher courting the damsel in bad faith. Simultaneously gifted and cursed with "forbidden" knowledge—i.e., as something to teach and learn through subversive art, golems and sex dolls—the ballroom blackguard raises questions that, when asked by a sensitive soul, might save your life, but also drive you wild in parallel calculated risk!

If only for catharsis and survival, wouldn't anyone wish to learn that kind of skill? To place "torture" in quotes, we offer our bodies to be ravished in ways that, per Radcliffe's fictions (onto raunchier ones then and now), we might expose state hypocrisies with and push towards a happier world among the shadows; i.e., a pedagogy of the oppressed relating to shared trauma as uneven but nevertheless the "glue" (so to speak, below) that holds us together in times of crisis; e.g., rape play during ludo-Gothic BDSM teaching us how not to harm others while acting out cathartic consent-non-consent fantasies! To do a ritual and have the Dark-Souls-style font grace the screen afterwards: DEMON SLAIN (which Metroidvania like Dark Souls ripped off from survival horror like Resident Evil, but I digress). Beaten like clay and mashed into Pygmalion's wet dream, we Galatean whores acquire the taste for torture, then camp it through our own strange appetites; that's what essence exchange is! "Releasing 'demons'!"

Per the settler-colonial model, the state canonically frames such campy things as alien and dark at home and abroad; i.e., as demonic essence "exchange" (sex and public nudism) opens up, its parallel channels subvert state promises of punishment and torture, and which—camp or not—always (re)unite us with alien things to some degree: ourselves and nature, which we belong to. Deities (demons) don't just reside in our breast, Blake; we are demons! Let us consciously be of the Devil's party and workshop, camping the canon to tear capital apart like Satan did to Faust offstage (or Ambrosio onstage)! Let that be our revenge, one worker at a time!

In turn, we golems and demon dolls acquire and consolidate power through exchanges that keep us doll-like, but animate-inanimate during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., to be "raped" in ways we like—used, passed around, "raw dogged" like cum dumpsters incubating hellish delight and half-real revolutionary sentiment ("make me" vs "unmake me" being acts of play to reconcile unironic forms). The beauty of the golem, then, is that it cannot be destroyed or wholly corrupted to one side. If the state has the infinite, diabolical capacity to rape and destroy everything pursuant to profit against nature-as-alien, then monstrous-feminine camp likewise has the limitless power to forge new destinies away from profit; i.e., through their labor value as bottomless, their bodies and identities as plastic.

As such, the golem's demonically regenerative and posthuman power lies in the state damaging the clay to assert its own fabricated "sovereignty" per nation creation myths that effectively demonize the clay to rape it inside the state of exception; i.e., limitless cruelty per moral panics and police violence endemic to a territory by state assignment; e.g., Israel vs Palestine, with the state minority invading a larger population to assert settler-colonial (thus false) claims of the other's land, which they then proceed to back up with repurposed³⁶⁸ anti-Semitic lies and force (Bad Empanada's "October 7th: The Real History," 2024).

³⁶⁸ As Bad Empanada argues in "The New Anti-Semitism: The Arab Global Conspiracy" (2025) and which I agree with, a priori, in my own "On 'Anti-Semitism' versus 'Antisemitism'" (2024); i.e., the pursuit of forbidden knowledge is a dualistic, dialectical-material arrangement of "legitimacy" and "illegitimacy" as things to assign in pursuit of other things that lead us away from state-fueled hauntological positions of ignorance.

That being said, Bad Empanada certainly isn't perfect—and frankly has said some really stupid and problematic things that have seriously pissed me off (while also just being flat-out wrong about these things; re: "There's no such thing as 'sex doctors,' Jesus Christ" and "those who talk about sex like it's their main interest should be dealt with. Make it illegal again*")—but he and I are in complete agreement about one thing: that anti-Semitic conspiracy and myth can be used to affect more than Jewish people while presenting Jewish people as total victims in bad faith; i.e., with him saying this

In short, "home" becomes a free-fire zone for the colonizer to police the native group, who are themselves systematically caged and exterminated like vermin to an arbitrary assigning of who is and isn't "native" (with the hopes that this labor force can be regenerated and exploited elsewhere for much the same reasons); i.e., the clay as expendable unto infinite growth, efficient profit and worker/owner division. Privatization forces state perception as "reality" onto menticed worker brains, but reality (and perception) are thoroughly plastic, as are rape, death and captive fantasies. They have to be or the state could not even begin to exert its control over workers, let alone install Capitalist Realism raping the whore (thus the slave) out of ethnocentric revenge.

Luckily for us, this parasitism goes both ways; i.e., performance and play inside liminal colonized territories on and offstage relay Gothic castles (and demons) that anisotropically reverse the flow of power by switching terror and counterterror using ludo-Gothic BDSM! It's a good baseline to challenge state paucities of empathy antagonizing nature. To raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class-cultural (and race) awareness, we fuck your minds, seeding them (and the Superstructure's Wisdom of the Ancients) with new proletarian potential! Divorced from dogma, anything becomes possible, and jouissance reigns supreme. We unchain the night, unleashing Hell as our delicious thing to scare normies (those without nuance) with! Our best revenge is torturing you with the idea of our collective freedom: a world where workers have agency over their own bodies and labor tied to nature as a whole, and one where we can see and imagine more beauty unto the world around us that we don't have to dominate, but live in harmony with as stewards. That is our revenge!

So come inside; make yourselves at home (or paint the outer walls with fresh coats of "paint")! As such, extreme trauma calls for fantasies that address past forms of state coercion and abuse that, during ludo-Gothic BDSM, can recontextualize demonology in reverse. "Rape" enters quotes, highlighting state atrocities by demonstrating mutual consent and worker action towards catharsis: our daily habits constituting dialectical behavioral therapy through networks not vis-à-vis Arabs, and me saying it vis-à-vis other Holocaust survivors (than Jewish people) like the Dutch, but also queer people, witches (of any gender or sex), or people of color besides just Arabs.

*See: "Understanding Vampires: 'What Is \(Problematic\) Love?'; or, Positions of Relative Ignorance to Relative Clarity," 2024).

In short all oppressed groups can be oppressed in the same flexible and imbricating persecution networks and unify to recognize that against a common foe: the elite, but also their tokenized lapdogs acting like only certain people can be oppressed, and furthermore that some special people can be so essentially oppressed, they can do no wrong (re: Jews and Zionism). Jews' feelings are valid, but only until they knowingly facilitate worker division, thus genocide. The same goes for any marginalized group and normativity said group might endorse, when push comes to shove; i.e., whether through desperation and/or convenience, betrayal is betrayal, and we must come together to see all parties oppressed differently under capital liberated as one. We must or we will not survive. State shift will see to that, because capital is incompatible with life.

founded on state fear and dogma demonizing nature to destroy it. Instead, we demons hook up to exchange robust, exquisitely "torturous" essence, thereby exposing the state as the instrument for all our yesterday's greatest calamities!

Such stages are liminal, shared with police forces fencing over a dualistic Numinous: Communist and palliative vs state dogma (e.g., queerphobia during Satanic Panic). And those in power discourage such inquiries and knowledge, wanting workers to fear and avoid demonic rituals and educators that undermine the status quo through their own mask-wearing practices (which we'll delve into during Volume Three, Chapters Four and Five).

Human curiosity is still difficult to entirely suppress, but the state canonically encourages these demonic investigations; i.e., to happen within a particular ghost of the counterfeit; re: the demonic trifecta of exquisite "torture." Here, oppositional forms of demonic expression collect as "derelict"—seemingly abandoned, yet presented by their makers as "haunted," silly or foreboding in ways that invite inspections unwelcome by the elite. To arrive at the truth, the derelict past must not be repeatedly explored, alone, but repeatedly reimagined by iconoclastic workers across space and time camping canonical torture with "exquisite."

That's the answer (not modernity and a better gun, magic pill³⁶⁹ or another billionaire—ABAB): how we relate to and respect each other as a collective whole, not something to divide on a hierarchy of value (racial or otherwise); i.e., the Cartesian approach that leads to fascism and genocide, time and time again, but also conceals as it happens in all its forms right now. State illusions don't work on those consciously of Hell (always in pain, but always in touch with the larger world capital is pimping in reactionary-to-moderate forms of predation: those who don't know what pigs they are).

We've already outlined the basic procedure; re: the demonic trifecta of damsels, detectives and sex demons that Radcliffe canonized. Next, we'll explore how to camp it at length by salvaging Radcliffe's work (and her descendants; e.g., H.R. Giger), in "Exploring the Derelict Past"!

³⁶⁹ With force-feeding being tantamount to rape; e.g., "Red solo cup, you fill me up..." (Toby Keith's "Red Solo Cup," 2011); i.e., putting something through our various holes/penetrating us and going into our bodies without our consent to knowingly cause us harm for profit—ending hunger strikes, for example (an ancient form of carceral protest), but also invasive surgeries and mad medicine (a concept comparable to mad science, and one we don't have time to explore here, but is one my book series touches on elsewhere; e.g., exhibit 1a1a1h6b1 from Volume Zero).

"But let me observe that all histories are against you—all stories, prose and verse. If I had such a memory as Benwick, I could bring you fifty quotations in a moment on my side the argument, and I do not think I ever opened a book in my life which had not something to say upon woman's inconstancy. Songs and proverbs, all talk of woman's fickleness. But perhaps you will say, these were all written by men."

"Men have had every advantage of us in telling their own story. Education has been theirs in so much higher a degree; the pen has been in their hands. I will not allow books to prove anything."

—Captain Harville and Anne Elliot, Persuasion (1817)

Now that we've outlined occult demons both as a form of summoned, Faustian power exchange through givers of unequal, forbidden, and dark, generally torturous knowledge (re: trauma, especially rape trauma)—as well as recipients of state violence, the latter antagonizing nature as monstrous-feminine during canonical torture, elite revenge and the voyeurism of peril towards the colonized and the pimped—let's further expand on the connection between these operative categories by studying how human workers are historically chattelized as "demonic." We'll do so from Radcliffe onwards; i.e., tied to sin in a sexual way that we can improve on by subverting Radcliffe's demon BDSM with our own ludo-Gothic varieties (often on asexual terms, meaning the interrogation of psychosexual trauma that doesn't require actual sex in exchange, but often discusses it as code).

Canon vs camp is a long game. To it we'll consider not just demons, but also those who interact with demons; re: demons being investigated by warrior-detectives defending damsels as a more neo-conservative Gothic tradition that needn't stay that way forever (as explored in Volumes Zero and One regarding Amazons). Until it changes, though, civilization and the West are generally seen as "on the cusp" of collapse—of confronting the abject on the edge of the civilized world; i.e., as a half-real place where its settler-colonial past is ongoing but disguised through a storytelling trifecta; re: the demonic trifecta of damsels, detectives and demons being "derelict," simultaneously abandoned and lost during the cryptonymy process, then conveniently found again: touched by Antiquity as much a performance as a historical-material effect (re: the infernal concentric pattern's endless doomsday and celebration living on borrowed time).

"If you want to critique power, you must go where it is"; this subchapter divides into multiple sections that outline the larger issues at play before exploring the history of the "tines" (of said trifecta) one at a time:

- "Radcliffe's Refrain \(reprise\)": A quick rehash of the demonic trifecta vis-à-vis Ann Radcliffe's pioneering of it.
- Part zero: "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons, part zero: Derelicts, Medusa and H.R. Giger's Xenomorph; i.e., the Puzzle of 'Antiquity'": Outlines the idea of "derelicts"—be they damsels, detectives or sex demons—through Medusa/Giger's xenomorph as involving all three.
- Part one: "Non-Magical Damsels and Detectives" (feat. Out of Sight, Nina Hartley, Velma, and Zeuhl): Further explores damsels and detectives as classic Neo-Gothic devices, the oppositional praxis of which has survived well into the present; i.e., in pornographic language, like Nina Hartley, but also tamer/non-magical murder mysteries and echoes of Radcliffe (who conflated extramarital sex with rape and death) through Velma from Scooby Doo. We'll examine the original character as a cis detective, but also my ex, Zeuhl; i.e., as someone I'm exposing: a good trans Velma demasking an evil one after surviving their abuse for years!
- Part two: "Demons and Dealing with Them; or Abandonment, Dark Worship and Vengeful Sacrifice When Dissecting Radcliffe" (feat. Ridley Scott's The Terror and Alien: Covenant, Ninja Scroll, The Dark Crystal, and Harmony Corrupted): Further explores demons in a similar fashion, but touches on additional ways these complicated beings needn't be feared (through the process of abjection) but celebrated as Satanic liberators freeing our minds from Cartesian thought, heteronormativity and the settle-colonial status quo. Among his other work (namely The Terror), discusses Ridley Scott's vengeful dissection of Radcliffe's "spectre" in Alien: Covenant; i.e., as a dark matter of postcolonial revenge against James Cameron's Aliens, then camps Scott by dissecting him and resurrecting Radcliffe as a dark whore of her former self (through several close-reads; e.g., with Harmony Corrupted, and about Ninja Scroll and The Dark Crystal: Age of Resistance)!
- "In Measured Praise of the Great Enchantress": "Egon, you've earned it." An afterword that gives Ann Radcliffe some long-awaited praise, and talks about the important of camping demonic sex work vis-à-vis her worthwhile contributions; i.e., with Japanese anime, cosplay, fan art, and more (e.g., Sailor Moon) during sex work as a revolutionary hermeneutic and applied synthesis.

(artist: Valentina Kryp)

In a nutshell, demons exist during liminal expression like all monsters do—in duality and opposition, mid-praxis. By comparison, subversive demons seek to liberate sex work through tools the state cannot monopolize for its own violence, terror and morphological expression; i.e., coordinates canonically aiding profit (thus rape), which iconoclasts happily camp. Generally they do so through some tricky combination of pleasure and pain, tempting the usual Faustian exchanges and transformative discussions with a more radical context, thus approach (whose subsequent outcomes threaten good girls with bad behavior that the state will punish, above). Naughty though they are, demons must still be investigated, and generally by the curious.

Before we jump into part zero to unpack the xenomorph and Medusa, I want to touch on Radcliffean tropes for a bit (eleven pages)—doing so to better outline the variables that exist in both; i.e., as part of our chapter's aforementioned trio: damsels, detectives and sex demons. If there's an awesome mystery to solve, there's an awesome detective to get to the bottom of things (generally Radcliffe resorted to "true crime" and "the explained supernatural" because she wasn't allowed to play with magic). Some are silly and some are not, and Radcliffe's fairly tame detectives went on to inspire much more violent (and scantily clad/dummy thicc) variants; we'll try to outline that refrain, next, in a quick reprise!

Radcliffe's Refrain (reprise)

Especially popular or remediated characters tend to get virally shared. Such sharing can be hard to regulate or track. In this case, we not only have detective pastiche, but Velma pastiche. Seriously, this foxy nerd is legion, but also a regular practitioner of the "explained supernatural" trope originally formalized by Ann Radcliffe. Defrauding the "supernatural" through spooky piracy is a common theme in Radcliffe's works, or embattled marriages, false relatives and various ordinary things taken to performative extremes; e.g., the mother being sent to live in a nunnery for the rest of her days. To this, Radcliffe was following suit with Walpole, injecting the supernatural into ordinary events, getting at the truth of things through outrageous narratives that still, in the end, feel cliché and homely.

—Persephone van der Waard, Sex Positivity, Volume One (2024)

(source: Women's Museum of California's "The Mother of Gothic Literature," 2017)

Celebrated for marrying the Romantic and its posturings of the Sublime and nature with a modest, enchanting Gothic, Ann Radcliffe was a rockstar of the early Gothic novel. Often called its "mother" and prone to crossing pens with queer troublemaker, Matthew Lewis, the curious irony with Radcliffe's torturous demon lovers, as described by Cynthia Wolff (re: "The Radcliffean Model," 1979), is how they weren't magical behind her Black Veils. Yet, the banditti of the Great Enchantress did personify the same dark desires more spellbound (and queer) enchanters happily conjured up (re: Lewis). The Final Girl dodging mutilation mid-courtly love also stems from Radcliffe's work, the Gothic heroine/damsel being the original scrapper who would evolve from detective to nep-conservative, peace-through-strength fighter by armoring her virtue from alien forces with brawn. It's black-and-white, Cartesian to the core, and prudish to boot.

To that, whereas Shelley was a bred-to-the-bone radical who embraced the alien and fucked with it/wrote like a bereaved mother and whore, Radcliffe wrote like a virgin³⁷⁰ who had no idea what loss or surviving open, punch-the-witch

³⁷⁰ Violence, for example, is Radcliffe's way of talking about sex through extensive innuendo; i.e., in the language of men, but from a woman's point of view seeing such things as "demonic. It's both not what she's talking about, and a paradoxical form of censorship that points to what she's getting at through associate violence (duels/demonic courtship). It's very virginal—like a comic book nerd who's either never had sex, or is camping the sex she has had to disassociate through demonic shows of force: "I'm not having sexual desires," Sampson might explain to Gregory (and by extension to us), in Romeo and Juliet (1597); "I'm cutting off the heads of the maids! Take in it what sense thou wilt!" (source). I genuinely can't tell with Radcliffe and that's the point; it gives her plausible deniability.

All the same, "demonic" clearly means the side of sexuality that women (for Radcliffe) can "only" experience through actual threat of rape. As such, Radcliffe's knife-dick demon BDSM features black penitents who demonstrably evoke courtly love as the "only way" a girl can experience passion outside legal marriage (which happens after the novel ends): on the receiving end of a lance, carried off on horseback or tied to a tree. Distress and ravishing of the damsel is classic courtship language, which Radcliffe translates to the summoning of demons through her stories to excite her and her readership: wish fulfillment per a Western, abject division with alienated, fetishized things that, per the ghost of the counterfeit, further the abjection process.

On one hand, it's code to dodge the censors; i.e., no different functionally than Mormon bubble porn or fruit emojis on social media exploited by the algorithm (as trans people are, for example). The more oppressive the system, the more restless and inventive the cryptonymy.

Radcliffe, for instance, unquestionably liked wilderness, castles, banditti and labyrinths (her search terms); these got her juices flowing. But they also contain/concern political attitudes (moral arguments), which said devices serve to camouflage in Radcliffe's work. As such, concealment and concern go hand-in-hand; i.e., all the actual heroes who appear good in Radcliffe's books despite their ferocity (or black outfit, below) are "white" and legitimized through revelation, and all the ones who are bad are delegitimated, Scooby-Doo-style when the mask is pulled off. So someone like Wesley in The Princess Bride, below, isn't really the Dread Pirate Roberts who ravishes women; he's the woman's dutiful servant saying "as you wish" while he gives her exactly what she wants through mutual consent!

Except, that's Rob Reiner adapting William Goldman's 1972 novel, which camped Radcliffe. By comparison, Emily St. Aubert in Udolpho gives all her inherited wealth to Valencourt, despite him not "rescuing" her until the very end of the book, and even then only appearing as an afterthought—penniless and dog-faced—because he gambled* all his money away and gave the rest to a man sharing his jail cell!

Doing so in Paris, "a sinful city" according to Radcliffe (and an act, Sam Hirst once explained to me, that is synonymous with whoring around with women of "looser morals" than the heroine).*

It sounds like a joke, except it's not; i.e., Udolpho isn't satire because Emily never shuts up about how she feels, and boy-oh-boy are her feelings not ambiguous! Yes, she's understandably pissed at first, but then not-so-understandably can't stay at her "widdle Vawencawt" because—golly persecution was; i.e., like someone who was afraid of sex/never had it (she was married, but to my knowledge never had kids). Instead, it's something to abject and attack/dissect, because sex = death and rape is around every corner. There's a kernel of truth to her stories, but like all conservatives, Radcliffe completely misses the historical-material critique to perpetuate its symptoms through police force inventing enemies (re: black rape myths). She's the fatal portrait of the Tories, her Gothic immature versus mature.

So if Shelley made demons, then Radcliffe investigated them (without whom there'd be no Scooby Doo [or drug-like Scooby "snacks"] without Radcliffe, or Nancy Drew, The Hardy Boys, Alien, Halloween, Texas Chainsaw, or Murder, She Wrote); if Shelley single-handedly started science fiction, then Radcliffe's novels—starting with The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne (1789), and going onto more successful stories like The Romance of the Forest (1791) and The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), canonized the detective story wedded to "respectable" and "successful" Neo-Gothic cliché (e.g., folie-à-deux, or mass hysteria, in The Italian):

Ann Radcliffe was a pioneer of the gothic literary genre. Her inspirations were The Castle of Otranto (1764) by Horace Walpole, often named the first gothic novel; The Old English Baron (1777) by Clara Reeve, and The Recess; Or, a Tale of Other Times (1783–1785) by Sophia Lee (Miles, 2004 4). By the time she published her successful novel, The Romance of the Forest in 1791, gothic fiction was considered "the trash of the circulating libraries" and a "cheap and tawdry form of entertainment" (Townshend 2014). However, Radcliffe was considered to be an exception, she was lauded by her contemporaries as "the Shakespeare of Romance writers" and as "a genius of no common stamp" (Miles, 1995 7; Barbauld, 1810 i). Radcliffe single-handedly changed the gothic novel; it was by her inclusion of original poetry as part of her novels and as epigraphs, as well as her elaborate descriptions of landscapes, that she elevated the form [emphasis, me, for its problematic nature]. Critics agreed that Radcliffe had moulded pre-existing literary gee whizz—he totally helped that one guy in a pinch while making himself destitute! In short, she (and by extension, Radcliffe) enables him and he (and by extension, Radcliffe) snow jobs Emily to basically vouch for codependency in her by feeding his addiction (because that's always healthy).

In turn, Valencourt is "heroic" not because he's actually strong or smart or even terribly good, but because Radcliffe assigns that position to him and makes Emily a bit dim to make for the storybook ending her middle-class readership thirsted for (saying as much about these bored housewives' actual marriages versus the ones they were clamoring for—a fact Jane Austen promptly and savagely parodied, in Northanger Abbey)! That's called "pandering" and Radcliffe was great at it.

Per Wolff, the Radcliffean Model is flush with the virgin/whore and hero/demon lover argument, but it's not ironic and—more to the point—conflates feminine desire with mutilative, unironic rape. Neo-conservative politics aside, the theatre's prescriptive nature is completely unhealthy. Through demon lovers and Black Veils, Radcliffe wanted all of these things in ways she could explain away and prescribe while upholding the status quo; through ludo-Gothic BDSM, we can ditch the dogma and keep the demons (and vaso vagal threats), camping her stories with passionate rape scenarios to lean into the most ironic, exquisite elements of "torture" she offered!

components to refine a "new, powerful, and enchanting" genre of literature (Miles, 2004 4) re: Victoria DeHart's "[The Enchanting Ann Radcliffe," 2020].

Radcliffe didn't make monsters; she exposed them—i.e., as false, solving mysteries to turn things back to normal. Her stories manufacture dilemmas whose middle-class solvings always benefit the status quo. For all her skill, she actually kind of sucks. She's not "a nice old lady"; she's an opportunist—one using police language to adopt an air of authority leading her audience around by the nose.

In a nutshell, then, Radcliffe wrote cop fiction with "haunted" houses, venerating private ownership/assimilation (secret princesses), and inventing state enemies through bogus propaganda stories: "White Middle-Class Lady Investigates Whoever Killed the Rich Landowner." As a queer an-Com, I find her writing deeply unsexy because, in the absence of shock, she's lecturing about morals in a PG-grade adventure story that has the same negative effects it would inspire, offstage. It says little of value, but value judges everything. Even the fucking trees have value (eat your heart out, Tolkien)! Even so, it's still useful for putting a finger on the middle class' pulse/desire to scapegoat their victims during Capitalist Realism.

Radcliffe the woman is far more mysterious (and conservative) than Shelley. Likewise, her legacy is far more problematic (and no less complex). For starters, Radcliffe took precautions to conceal her identity and wrote from absolute secrecy. She avoided scandal like the plague and wrote stories that maintained privatization, and she was indisputably a master of suspense and gaslighting her audience (who she loved to torture through the Black Veil "MacGuffin" nearly two centuries before Hitchcock stole it). Forget Scooby Doo—without Radcliffe, there would be no Clue, Agatha Christie, Poe, Hitchcock, Lovecraft, or Stranger Things, but also no Perfect Blue (above, 1997) or *The Vanishing*³⁷¹ (1998). There'd likewise be no J.K. Rowling (who, apart from Harry Potter, also writes bigoted detective stories), hence TERF stories, on and offstage, transvestigating aliens killing people and blending in (re: men in women's spaces³⁷²). For better or worse, Radcliffe well-and-truly broke the mold/"made it," in that respect, and heavy lies the crown. Suitably enough, she was also a huge xenophobe and opportunist, abandoning magic for enchantments of a more phenomenological sort: spells of mystery and perception. Perception is reality!

³⁷¹ Which I've written about in regards to; re: "Gothic Themes in Perfect Blue" and "Gothic themes in The Vanishing / Spoorloos" (2020). Jadis loved both those movies, for what it's worth.

Simply put, Radcliffe and similar authors—from Dacre to Rowling—have all thrived on demon lovers and sexual torture to triangulate/tokenize sex and force (through the process of abjection policing the ghost of the counterfeit as something to commodify the raping of through the American and European middle classes). And Radcliffe "started it," insofar as her School of Terror was the launchpad for a more troublesome series. Yes, she didn't show abject horror on par with Lewis, Giger and Scott. Even so, her stories are full of damsels, detectives and sex demons; i.e., her detectives—which are always damsel-esque/virginal—doggedly investigate what damsels endure through sex demons as "all over the place": torture, crime, death, rape, etc. And those—much like Pride and Prejudice and Zombies (2016) went on to become much more violent, silly and sexy over time: "Velma Dinkley and the Mystery of the Boner-Inducing Dump Truck!" "It is a truth universally acknowledged that a baddie with a fat bedonk must be in need of a good monster pounding." Jinkies!

Except before we even begin talking about detectives and torture at length through the xenomorph as an "antique" doppelganger for Medusa, I wish to clarify two points and cover some history (three pages' worth) that will come in handy moving forward—not just for this subchapter or volume, but really for the entire book series as it presently stands.

One, "torture" is a very broad term. It can hurt or harm, hence threaten through exhibitionism and voyeurism promoting ritualistic punishment that allots the submissive tremendous power (under the right circumstances); those that harm or disempower workers are bourgeois, designed to pacify victims by chattelizing them in demonic language. This basic distinction not only amounts to canonical torture vs iconoclastic torture, but Radcliffe's blend of exquisite "torture" being immediately harmless but nonetheless problematic-yet-salvageable; i.e., bad play/coercive BDSM vs good play/sex-positive BDSM; e.g., unironic demon lovers like Ted Bundy or Count Monti exhibited by Radcliffe (and the American television networks) during criminal hauntology versus a demonic dom who is both trustworthy and actually wants to teach mutual consent through transgressive media.

We'll explore the latter dichotomy much more in Volume Three. For now, just remember what we said about criminal hauntology in Volume One (exhibit 11b2, summarized but indented for clarity):

Criminal hauntology relishes in the commodified suffering of the buried; e.g., the gays as automatic criminals, perpetual fugitives/victims, and unironic closet monsters (the xenomorph being the combined forces-of-darkness black knight, dark torturer and cosmically queer rapist at the same time, exhibit 60d); conversely it gives sanctuary to canonical status-quo fugitives: the black or false penitent (the namesake of Radcliffe's Italian).

Two, detectives are classically cops, including—in a sense—those who embellish them through relatively conservative fiction: the white woman's murder mystery or noir about soft-to-hard-boiled, nosy dames with brains, brawn, and courage, but also the Gothic staples of a flashlight, threatened virtue, and (these days) various force equalizers (the Amazonian Persephone going back to Hell to attack state enemies). Cops defend property before people, and detectives of a female sort classically investigate rape as form of torture—effectively serving justice through an updated idea of the local constable or shire reeve as a manager of the estate; i.e., the person of material privilege doing the state's work. Detectives further evolved into modern cops/sheriffs in the 19th, 20th and 21st centuries, becoming militarized (and tokenized, above) under the modern police state, courtesy of Pax Americana as informed by the likes of Radcliffe voicing the trend as a bank-making mystery women; re: through that of the white, cis-het, female weird canonical nerd, historically decaying feminism in defense of profit, capital and the status quo (re: Volume Zero, Radcliffe and the true crime genre as founded on the Neo-Gothic treatment of damsels, detectives and demons).

Regarding those points, some history (and an exhibit) to go with them exhibit 47a1, in a few pages): Before this crystallization, though, the idea spawned out of a hauntological engagement with an imaginary past that carried into the here-and-now by male and female authors of an emerging middle class: the Gothic novel as a medievalized property dispute investigated using darkly romantic abject language penned by persons other than aristocrats but not the working class; i.e., the home as both a medieval façade occupied by pre-fascist destroyers the likes of the black penitent, knight, priest or Italian count, and an uncanny chronotope pierced by the tried-and-true tradition of scholarship-turned-sleuthing of middle-class debutantes in the shoes of older imperiled maidens (Cartesian-dualism-in-disguise).

Detective monks, for example, were invented as a hauntological murder mystery centuries after the warrior monks of old (exhibit 48b); likewise, the female detective would go onto defend the state's notion of property as a hauntological anomaly thereof: a piece of property/ass who suddenly could think because she's had a middle-class education that, for all intents and purposes, was buoyed by the nation-state as a developing entity in its own right.

Partly the idea was to voice the concerns of the oppressed, but it was penned to pointedly voice those the state privileged over queer people, persons of color or religious minorities inside the state; i.e., the WASP (white, Anglo-Saxon Protestant) author of pre-fascist and minority scapegoats, which basically is what Radcliffe was: a female novelist who far outpaced her husband's income by writing fancy versions of the penny dreadful, then using the unprecedented "fuck you" money she made to retire from public life and live in relative comfort/seclusion. But, given her penchant for secrecy, this is largely speculation; re, DeHart:

In addition to being critically successful and popular, Radcliffe was England's highest paid novelist during the 1790s. She earned £500 for Udolpho (1794) and for her final novel, the Italian (1797), she earned £800 (Miles, 2004 4). According to Robert Miles (2004), Radcliffe's "nearest competitor" before 1797, was the playwright and novelist Frances Burney, who received £250 for Cecilia, Memoirs of an Heiress in 1782 (4).

Dale Townshend³⁷³ and Angela Wright refer to Radcliffe's disappearance after the publishing of The Italian as the "Radcliffean Interregnum" (13).

³⁷³ One of my academic survivors for my master's (the one who said, "Nicholas, I'm happy to be your supervisor but just so you know, I've never played a computer game in my life!"). Dale's a nice enough bloke (as the Brits like to say), but also, I think he likes Radcliffe because he's a bit like her—not a Tory or anything like that, but a stay-at-home cat dad:

On top of that, he also wrote a really cool book on Matthew Lewis, Matthew Lewis: The Gothic and Romantic Literary Culture (source tweet, DaleGothic96: May 14th, 2024), as well as Gothic Antiquity (source tweet, DaleGothic96: September 24th, 2019), which I've cited before in my own books (Dale's specially is Neo-Gothic architecture in fiction, which per my master's thesis, dovetails nicely with Metroidvania as ludo-Gothic):

[...] The literary world could not comprehend that the highest paid and most popular novelist of the 1790s had stopped publishing new material. In 1800, rumours began to circulate that Ann Radcliffe had died; and by 1811, false reports stated that she was restrained within Haddon Hall in Derbyshire, driven "mad" by the "morbid exuberance of her [own] imagination" (Smith 155; Miles, 1995 25). There is no clear reason for Radcliffe's disappearance, but scholars have offered different ideas; Townshend and Wright (2014) believe her interregnum may have been due to a combination of her frustration with the plethora of "Radcliffe imitators" in the market, and the mixed reviews she received for The Italian (13). Ann Radcliffe was also plagued with poor health in the last twelve years of her life (Norton, 1999 236) [source].

Personally, I think she sold her soul to the Devil, who told her to "just write about trees, dude" and eventually came to collect—dragging Radcliffe down to Hell to sodomize her just like she always wanted to write about but didn't. Truth is stranger than fiction (you did always tell to write for myself and my audience, Dale, and it was good advice)...

In all seriousness, Radcliffe was a middle-class novelist of critical acclaim and financial success, who—after a relatively short career (eight years) writing about and—while a bit of a ball-buster (the comments on my assignments were technically anonymous, but I could kind of tell it was him)—he also showed me kindness at school others sometimes didn't. He also wasn't weird about it when I came out, and used "Persephone" no problem at all. Thanks, Dale!

the English countryside "but with bandits" (a very British thing to do) and treating sex like a disease (also a very British thing to do)—retreated from the stage of writing and political activism altogether (a bit like Bilbo). She's the kind of person you hear being accused of "terrorist literature" (re: Groom), only to look into it and learn that—in all actuality—Shelley was closer to the mark, and Radcliffe nowhere near as interesting or critically impactful as Frankenstein. Radcliffe's Black Veil was famously a giant MacGuffin—a largely empty illusion between a lot of expert shadow play and pre-Victorian soap opera setting the stage for the invention of Gothic terrorism Crawford warned about (re: "The Invention of Gothic Terrorism," 2013). More matter, less art, queen!

Clearly, Radcliffe is someone I have mixed feelings about. I admittedly enjoy her suspense and mood; her distinction of terror and horror in "On the Supernatural and Poetry" (1826) remains incredibly useful; and the use of poetic epigrams in her novels was something that inspired me (though I took as much inspiration from Lewis, in that respect). Even so, her contributions are all nuts-and-bolts devices and virgin/whore, us-versus-them dreck abused through capitalist fear and dogma she encouraged similar to Tolkien's later racism; i.e., she summons immigrant threats, then marshals police agents to discover and exterminate them: as someone who—of the middle class—enjoys imperial heritage, but needs to whitewash her own colonial guilt (and fete a good wedding at the end, with dancing peasants who just love being ruled by freshly-unveiled princesses).

That being said, I've already torn her corpse a new asshole in Volume Zero, so I'll spare everyone a sequel, here; i.e., in this refrain, I'll refrain from dragging Radcliffe any more than I already have, because we're ultimately going to be salvaging her work! Believe it or not, there's a lot of good ideas inside, especially with demon BDSM (which evolved through my work into ludo-Gothic BDSM). Likewise, Radcliffe clearly has her place in the history books, and The Italian is pretty neat, overall, but she's too high-minded/gutter-averse, and writes about trees too much. "Oh, wow! Another tree! Great³⁷⁴! Maybe we should do something about climate change instead of acting like they'll last forever?"

Again, Radcliffe wasn't a whore, she was a cop, thus a pimp. There's certainly value in detection regarding domestic violence and material dispute, but anchoring it in a society that's ultimately regressive isn't activism; it's conservatism, thus criminogenic. Despite the appearance of unreactivity, then, Radcliffe's class character isn't inert like helium, because white moderacy is always shadowed by a reactionary core: the exquisite "torture" of squirming during the abjection process and ghost of the counterfeit behind her Black Veil empty threats vanishing like dreams once exposed. It's proto-fascism and -Red-Scare/Capitalist Realism in its infancy. To it, she's the great ancestor of Margaret Thatcher(!): a xenomorph (shapeshifter) chicken hawk, having kids do her dirty work for her by becoming monsters to fight monsters and maintain state control (also, the makers of Stranger Things are Zionists and child abusers; re: Persephone van der Waard's "Welcome to the Fun Palace," 2024).

The fact remains, Radcliffe did give birth to monsters: witch-hunters-in-disguise! Through DARVO and obscurantism, her kids aren't saving the day by getting those pirates; they're privileged brats part of a larger scheme that creates and assigns criminality as something to imitate and exploit. And that's a trend that Radcliffe inspired/self-reported on before running and hiding from criticism, ultimately being unable to confront or explain it because she can afford to disappear during moral panic (re: the French Revolution); that's her legacy. It's a little pathetic, but also underused in terms of what can be used to help workers, not titillate consumers who ultimately grow more violent in pursuit of "dreaded evils." And that's what we're going to focus on, here: camping her canon, rape included! I'm excited!

As we do, remember how we're expressing our position within a society sick with moral panic (versus raising awareness); i.e., as actually policed by official or vigilante forces. Compared to us, followers of Radcliffe see strangers to attack—i.e., assign positions within society to alienate and kettle—per the terrorist/counterterrorist refrain (she literally founded the Gothic School of Terror): the girl whose superpower is survival, modesty (damsels) and detection, first and foremost, but also in latter-day examples, transformation into Amazons (sex demons) to have revenge for the state/nuclear family against the monstrous-feminine during abject moral panic—the pimp's revenge (often undercover)!

Cops are class traitors, and Radcliffe doesn't prevent crime, she causes it by "making jobs" about making jobs (on and on). Luckily there isn't a monopoly on these things, meaning the final function of the damsel, detective and sex demon isn't to police the alien through force. We can reclaim it by camping Radcliffe's canonical exquisite "torture."

At times, her calculated risk/revenge even has the right idea (sexual tension and play through Gothic poetics) but she quit far too soon to master that aspect of it. Woulda, coulda, shoulda. We'll build on said ignorance to salvage her wasted genius towards applied knowledge; i.e., ballooning its valuable aspects according to a system she helpfully adumbrated. The language of danger is useful ("Pull your team out, Gordon..."), ours and Shelley's proletarian pirates challenging Radcliffe's bourgeois ones. In short, there's a solid material critique in her stories—one that inverts, easily enough, to serve workers!

We'll consider camping Radcliffe, in the pages ahead, and will do so while keeping her privilege and ignorance in mind—but also her dazzling brilliance giving the game away (as Scott does, in Alien). Basically Radcliffe was a member of the imperial class, shamelessly pandering to their socio-materially constructed idea of class and place as under attack, post-colonization (re: paradise lost); and anything Edward Said wrote about Austen in Culture and Imperialism (1993) easily applies to Radcliffe and her own novels bougie sensibilities (which Austen also made fun of; re: Northanger Abbey). It's Goldilocks Imperialism, enchanting Old Blighty with a straight white lady's idea of "spectral enchantment" while belonging "to a slave-owning society." She probably bought sugar on purpose (with abolitionists buying honey instead; re: to protest the Caribbean slave trade).

Needless to say, Radcliffe certainly had talent and respect; she was also gentrified and conservative (as were the people who respected her³⁷⁵)—was, by my account, an entitled sellout who abandoned any notion of whistleblowing to spend the next nearly-three-decades years in total reclusion. But even when she did write, she merely used the true-crime twist to scapegoat (xenophobic) symptoms of the structure in crisis, not the structure itself as always in crisis; i.e., not only did she partake of the unironic "bury your gays" trope by having no earthly idea what sex-positive queerness was, but her happy endings, post-corruption, supported the status quo by ending or exposing isolated pockets of corruption which, itself, is a harmful centrist myth.

Since then, the conservative opinion remains that all women are still property not persons, with those who become more active being treated as "phallic women"; i.e., less the sexual zombie, demon or whore and more a subjugated Amazon who had to prove she wasn't either of those things, nor a rogue huntress corrupting the nature of society concerning white women as a "protected" class: the jilted, furious seeker of ancient revenge (which, from the non-WASP perspective, is exactly what the xenomorph represents). This settling of old scores can be weaponized against women through the idea of virtue as well as vice—i.e., as Dacre's Victoria arguably was—but also against the queer community as something whispered about and conflated with "true crime" alongside the usual suspects/scapegoats. We fags are evil Italian Counts, apparently (a precursor to Dracula), awash in sin and medieval court intrigue leading to sodomy and murder.

³⁷⁵ "Oh, wow! A woman who can write. A female Shakespeare!" Puh-lease, Radcliffe doesn't have enough crossdressing or magic in her stories to be compared to Willie Shakes (now Lewis, on the other hand...)!

Simply put, it's repressed, internalized bigotry and self-hatred, which the copaganda of the regressive Amazon attempts to destroy to prove her worth as a "good woman"; i.e., serving the Man by killing society's scapegoats (through exposure): both its fascist elements (demon cops/black knights and crooked authority figures who betray the fact that the structure is corrupt, thus must be dealt with) but also the targets of moral panic at large—in short, what would become Marx's spectres some forty-odd years after Radcliffe penned her final novel, and the Red Scare and similar states of panic that haunt the bourgeois character of the female thinker, warrior and superhero centuries after Radcliffe's day in the sun: writing about damsels, detectives and demon lovers (which we'll touch on here then explore in Volume Three when we examine TERFs and centrist media).

(exhibit 47a1: Detecting systemic trauma first requires something to detect and a detective to go about it, but historically involves various double standards and intersecting biases/privileges during liminal hauntologies [the sudden, seemingly magical and superstitious appearance of the Gothic castle]. Male detectives are renowned for their "superior" [sexist] intellect as a product of their male upbringing and socio-material advantages at being men, thus having access to better education. Female detectives from the Neo-Gothic period "won the lottery" of accidental birth, enjoying the [white, cis-het] role of princess trapped between their actual oppressors and those they fear as buried and scapegoated, but also conflated with: racial, queer and religious minorities. As things to continuously revive in the present, the rules of polite [meaning "heteronormative" enforcement] discourse would afford men certain advantages over women when exploring the perils of a Gothic castle, but both would be party to the larger scapegoating process: find the corrupt impostor and bury your gays to defend privatization.

For example, Ludovico from The Mysteries of Udolpho dispels the rumors of ghosts in the haunted room by staying in this supposedly "occupied" area with his sword. In the morning, he is gone. Ostensibly ghosts have spirited him away but in truth, pirates are to blame[!]. Yet, his dealings with them is cis-gendered, reflecting the dangers faced by men in such stories as commenting on the socio-material conditions of Radcliffe's time: Ludovico would more than likely not have to worry about being raped like Emily St. Aubert would [the Case of the Super Straight

*Pirates*³⁷⁶]. Moreover, in defense of her own agency, Emily would have to rely on him and his sword to keep the rapacious, ostensibly heterosexual but also ambiguously gay pirates at bay [women not really being allowed to investigate their own trauma, but especially not allowed to do battle with it; re: that's what Amazons do]. But had she wielded the sword herself, she would have skewered her enemies with it, feminizing them like Dacre's Victoria, in 1806.)

(artist: Emma Layne)

That's the history of Radcliffe's refrain. Let's map its ongoing hauntological exploration of sex and danger (re: exposure of "virtue," left, as something to "armor" through swooning and amnesia—Radcliffe basically telling her audience to "think of the [white] women and children!"); i.e., as something to consider relative to the xenomorph throughout the remainder of the module (and not just this subchapter), on the edge of the civilized world.

In terms of sex demons and demon poetics at large, artistic playfulness is the "magic circle" (re: Zimmerman): of proletarian praxis in that it's "where the magic happens"; it occurs during liminal expressions of agency—i.e., in Gothic media, but also between reality and fiction through the subversion and transgression of various canonical rules and restrictions, during ludo-Gothic BDSM.

Keeping this in mind, let's look at some more historical "derelicts" of the demonic trifecta—damsels, detectives and sex demons as something traumatic to look on voyeuristically—in popular media at large, then bring this back around to Gothic expression as something to reinvent for our purposes.

We'll do so in an assigned order instead of a chronological one, looking at

- damsels as demonized, ostensibly disempowered chattel. We'll examine damsels in '80s porn with Nina Hartley and Victoria Paris (exhibit 47b).
- detectives seeking power and knowledge while fearing harmful torture. We'll examine different kinds of detectives, including Jennifer Lopez in Out of Sight (1998); i.e., as a militarized detective stemming from older, more passive and "chaste" forms that survive in the present; e.g., Velma Dinkley (exhibit 48a) as inspired by Radcliffe's classic formula, including nuns (exhibit 48b), but also more warlike detectives in different media types, such as Ellen Ripley (48c1) in cinema and Samus Aran (exhibit 40d1) in Metroidvania

(whose respective, dangerous explorations of the Gothic castle present the closed space something to construct out of previously detected historical-material factors and warring xenophobic ideas: masculinity coming to rescue femininity, albeit grafted onto a female body that upholds the status quo and threatens to make her "rabid," thus needing to be put down faster than her male counterparts would; i.e., she becomes the thing she's told to kill).

- sex demons chattelized in semi-supernatural, semi-natural/animalistic forms that exist on the edge of the civilized world; i.e., animal demons from a wild, almost-primordial age. To that, we'll be looking repeatedly at the xenomorph—through Ridley Scott's reinvented, xenophilic forms of Gothic vision in the 1970s and 2010s (which we'll also expand on even more in the next chapter when we look at "lycanthropes," "furries" and other totem demons that continue to exist and mutate fabulously in the 21st century).

We'll also examine schools of thought that evolved out of an emerging Gothic discourse, which Scott would draw upon in his own work, but also many other artists before and after Alien. This includes Ann Radcliffe and Matthew Lewis investigating hidden, repressed aspects of their own society by using competing obvious narratives of demons, damsels and detectives inside their own derelict, ergodic stories of terror and horror media; i.e., a primarily white, middle-class corpus written by persons other than cis-het white men but now having expanded to other groups whose discourse wouldn't manifest until much later on, but arguably has connections to both author's vital "ancient" launchpads.

As we shall see, next, all of this came to a head with Alien, blending Radcliffean terror with Lewis-style horror to produce something altogether Numinous and splendid, thus wonderful at embodying the monstrous-feminine's various class/cultural tensions; i.e., the xenomorph is dualistic—was as much Radcliffe as Shelley, and working inside a shared aesthetic at cross purposes!

"Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part zero: Derelicts, Medusa and H. R. Giger's Xenomorph; i.e., the Puzzle of "Antiquity"

"Did IQs drop sharply while I was away? Ma'am, I already said that it was not Indigenous; it was a derelict spacecraft, it was an alien ship, it was not from there. Do you get it?"

—Ellen Ripley, Aliens (1986)

This subchapter loosely considers the demonic trifecta—damsels, detectives and sex demons—by introducing a holistic, serial example of them: Medusa and the xenomorph (the latter practically synonymous with its maker, H. R. Giger). It does so through the Gothic refrain of found stories; i.e., so-called "derelicts" that, once "discovered," present as historical evidence in the Gothic sense: as something to perform and play with in order to interrogate state trauma (war and rape) as a continual problem we escape through "peril" (the challenging of modesty with a "dark half"). We'll return to Radcliffe—and her own self-righteous moral panics' down-to-earth left-behinds—in a bit. First, I want to consider the idea of dereliction as "ancient" through something closer to the modern idea of sex demon vis-à-vis damsels and detectives; re: Giger's brainchild (really being a group effort and lineage³⁷⁷, but I digress).

³⁷⁷ The monster is so famous, I almost opted for it needing no introduction. But in the interest of totality and holistic appreciation, let's cover our bases; re: Ridley Scott's outer space creature feature showcases Giger's almost fungal, mushroom-headed* adult monster from the latter's 1975 Necronomicon series (which Dan O'Bannon introduced to Scott when pitching the monster aspect of the movie). But Giger's work also came from/build on older forebears; e.g., from Goya's fourteen "Black Paintings" and anti-war art ("The Disasters of War," 1810-1820), Shelley's 1818 Frankenstein, De Sade, Radcliffe and Lewis, and further back to Walpole, Marlowe and the Golem of Prague myth, and earlier with Ovid and the Archaic Mother of the Ancient Greeks predating the Hellenistic period. Giger was building on what repeatedly had come before.

*Scott would use this idea of cordyceps/killer mushroom men in Alien: Covenant's Neomorphs, combining mushroom men chimerically with goblin sharks (and entering parasitically/rapaciously through the ears/nose with spores; re: forced alien entry and possession, then transformation).

(artist: H. R. Giger)

Note: This piece is older. It's one where I tried to make less changes throughout its entire makeup, and more to insert different extensions between parts of the main body. I try to note when I do, and talk about the entire history of doing so. The expanding of the piece has required me to organize it into headers, as well. —Perse

Introducing Ripley

A bit of additional context (a 2025 one-page addendum [and footnote] prefacing the original body of this 2024 piece). The paradox of palimpsests is that the mo recent generally eclipses older variants it "tops"; i.e., to become "the first"/"top dog"; e.g., Ripley as "the first" Amazon" (a patriarchal myth). But she is haunted by the past and those of it as vengeful, which she punches down against; re: the second wave feminist warrior Madonna policing nature as dark, ancient whore³⁷⁸. If Jadis was my first TERF "in the wild," then Ripley was my first TERF in media; she's the detective who tops for the state, and we top from below to punch up at her Radcliffean antics (carried over into Weaver's own privilege as a white straight Broadway actress from a middle-class family, below).

All of this is dualistic, and I want to look at the process holistically regarding its liminal, ludo-Gothic BDSM elements' anisotropic qualities and performative latitudes. Some of this comes from what we've discussed already in this module; some, from the Poetry Module. We're essentially talking about the whore's paradox and revenge (reclaiming blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts), though I might not always say as much (this is an older piece, but it inspired my new thesis work on those topics; i.e. I wrote it around the same time as "The Caterpillar and the Wasp," thus before my Poetry Module which released May 5th, 2024; re: "[Volume Two, part one \(the Poetry Module\) Is Out"] and then added elements of said module to "Giger's Xenomorph," afterwards): the relatively well-off white girl scared of functionally black/non-white and non-straight revenge, thus rape of the former by the latter and (displaced to outer space).

Again, it's very second wave feminist, thus exclusionary in the rise of Thatcher's England to impregnate and gut the Labour Party with New-Labor concessions; re: capital gentrifies and decays, leaving us with strange appetites we need to camp through the same damsels, detectives and demons. Except, Ridley was always a white-collar pimp with an art degree and classical education, and Ripley was always his blue-collar madame detective; i.e., Galatea asking the stowaway prostitute what it stole from Master's cookie jar during her Pygmalion maker's Promethean Quest, and its Numinous obscurity and decay's infectious stamp brought back to her towing vessel: "In Space, No One Can Hear You Punch Down for the Elite then Blame It on Pirates." Always kill your darlings!

I think that's enough context for both monsters (the Amazon and the Medusa) and their cryptomimesis to proceed with our arguments. Let's advance onto the original piece!

In the Gothic, "Antiquity" is forged through puzzling "ancient" monsters like Medusa in ways useful to the state (canon) or workers (camp). Unironic forms tokenize through settler-colonial damage control whose cryptonymy apologizes for the state and indeed, advances the goals of Cartesian hegemony endlessly across space and time; i.e., while tokenized women like Ellen Ripley write Man's history for them in the usual native bloodbaths: fetishizing the alien before punching it, witch-cop-style. Our current "Medusa" is the xenomorph, a composite sex monster insofar as it features holistically and Numinously as undead, demonic and animalistic, but also embodies settler-colonial (ethnocentric) racism, environmental destruction, rape anxiety/disguised vaudeville (the first alien being a black man in a suit) and trans misogyny crammed into a 1970s gimp suit/astronoetic hauntology (canceled retro-future). Let's give that qualification a closer look, shall we?

whore/enemy of the state in Western propaganda, and survives through Cartesian thought into Alien, the franchise. It's the dialectic of the alien, mid-Amazonomachia, except when Ripley initially faces the xenomorph as a ghost of the counterfeit (the monster being a spectre of settler colonialism pushed into outer space, coming back to haunt the West), she becomes traumatized into thinking the creature as not "of the land" at all; it's something to punch, not embrace, because it threatens her as an extension of the West: us versus them, maiden pimp vs abject whore. She becomes an endless detective protecting other damsels from a dreaded evil she nonetheless fetishizes by giving so much power in the first place. She's a cautious skeptic in the first movie; by the second, she's a battered housewife/true believer posturing as oracle for the Man. Gross TERF bullshit.

Convinced she is right to a colossal and insulting degree (see the epigram), our damaged heroine goes forth to astronoetically colonize "space" for Earth by finding the perceived Ancient Threat: punishing an alien mother for "having settled" corporate territories before blowing her³⁷⁹ the fuck up. It's a casus belli, a DARVO false flag waged by a "critic" of the company who ultimately does their dirty work for them; re: by weaponized shelter through capital as the same old rigged game against Ripley in order to make her afraid, thus transform into a demon against the state's enemies: a subjugated-Hippolyta survivor of the fear of rape, not rape itself (versus Lambert or Kain, who very much do get raped because they actually have sex; i.e., Ripley is a warrior Madonna, and sex = death in Radcliffe's work).

A mythical structure, when essentialized, can be quite telling. Singular interpretations are bad for workers and nature, especially when colonial binaries (us vs them) have manifested them as something to disseminate and put to practice. By abjecting the ghost of the counterfeit as men do, Ripley becomes the subjugated Amazon waging a monstrous war of extinction in space (the astrotoetic Amazonomachy); i.e., against another monster whose sexualized violence (the popular language of war) has with Ripley one interpretation, thus one use/solution: genocide ("not to study, not to bring back, but to wipe them out")—unironically raping the land, occupants and language in ways that speak to predatory sex and violence as synonymized for these chattelizing purposes. Killing vermin is still moving money through nature using the same old kayfabe revenge arguments.

Except, far from being a one-off, Aliens (and its forebears, which date back to Radcliffe conjuring up white straight female fears of a black rapist) would go on to inform military optimism through Cameron's refrain as a perennial affair that upholds Capitalist Realism for all time in neoliberal power trips (re: the "End of History"). Ripley is part of that tragic destiny—a damsel-turned-cop who, once recruited, rides forever out into the cartographic territories; i.e., where murder is legal, chasing "death" down and hunting it room-by-room (re: shooters and Metroidvania during speedruns). Separating the wheat from the chaff, Ripley divides from other humans whoever the state needs dead within the same monomythic, theatrical device: nature as alien and fetishized, but also undead, demonic and animalistic—the Medusa!

I, Medusa

"Medusa" means different things depending on who's looking at/with her. As such, she contains (and presents) unironic and ironic fears of rape, trans misogyny (and other praxial variables) within class conflict, on the ³⁷⁹ Our mysterious mother, Ripley, rapes nature by becoming a defender of heteronormativity from other orderings of maternal power as alien, insectoid. To that, she presents herself as "good" but really is the inhumane monster killing other demons for the state; i.e., by dehumanizing its political enemies as Satanic, fearsome, and criminal, hence doomed: a subjugated Amazon pimping Medusa right before the AIDS epidemic.

Aegis, per outing. Parading the unknown as tangible³⁸⁰ is the Gothic's bread and butter!

Except, while the inherent duality of pre-capitalist expression might seem mysteriously commonplace, this is not without reason. It was generally peered into by people like Mary Shelley who, in 1818, were less divided from nature by capital than we are, thus more prone to combine nature with science, and to afford a medieval expression fixated on mythical devices, but especially ambrosia/the fire of the gods as "torturous" and Faustian. Shelley's Modern Prometheus offered a unique perspective of "Ancient" that informed Giger and Ridley Scott using the alien poetic device to extrapolate on problems of capital per Gothic castles and monsters, in 1979; i.e., to a similar monstrous-feminine degree, during fatal nostalgia.

Monsters and castles are indiscreetly modular and evoke myths and magic as critical lenses to see through Capitalism's universal alienation; Medusa (and by extension, the xenomorph and castle as extensions of her and themselves) abide by the usual fracturing of trauma to give those with trauma a safe space to explore (and endlessly reexplore) their abuse and discover a better world through a series of castles wrestling/warring/fucking with other castles, with monsters, etc, during concentric mise-en-abyme. In psychoanalytical terms, these generally announce a secret self to reject and attack, but also a borderline option regarding forbidden forms of love: a dark ritual regressively selected through the shadow of force ...and which I completely dislike because it tends to suggest a lack of awareness towards unconscious³⁸¹ elements that apologize for the author's omitting of an active dialogue; e.g., desire, bigotry or revenge. I'd rather focus on the material conditions that shape these prejudices and, at times, walking contradictions; i.e., what is the argument of "yet another castle" for in terms of where it's going once its arguments are revived?

These are highly medieval ways of looking at things, and difficult to wrap our heads around; i.e., as people reared in a capitalist, post-medieval world. So, just as the Gothic castle perpetually returns in liminal, hauntology-of-war arguments debating to the Enlightenment and Capitalism's failure to deliver on universal prosperity as promised, we'll be returning to my Poetry Module—especially its Medieval portion (which starts with "The Medieval: Opening and Castles in the Flesh," 2024) and concludes with the "one, two" capstone, "Modularity and Class" and "Facing Death: What I Learned Mastering Metroidvania," 2024). Keep its entire statements in mind as we proceed once more into the Numinous medieval and its dead city of paradoxes; re: we're getting lost in necropolis again!

³⁸⁰ "Xeno + morph." Always some degree familiar—you'll know this alien when you see it.

³⁸¹ "Unconscious." As an an-Com, I seriously hate that word (after all, we need class consciousness). Informing them of it, it ceases to be unconscious and becomes deliberate. Hot take: It's an "out," and poor scholarship at that! Fuck Freud and camp Marx!

First, during liminal expression and oppositional praxis, trauma diffuses; both imprecise and omnipresent, its doubles emerge like a doomy nebula from remediating praxis' failure to sublimate state horrors during the cryptonymy process. If we're going to get anywhere regarding those, we'll have to familiarize ourselves with the alien, thus give the xenomorph a big ol' hug—not to dehumanize what has become fetish, but humanize it as Medusa's more recent disguise still having fetishized qualities: during ludo-Gothic BDSM chasing the palliative Numinous. As with Captain Dallas, death is presumed but not certain; indeed, doing so will only reverse the process of abjection inside the "antique" counterfeit as something to reclaim by us—defeating the fear of death through hugs, thus overriding state mechanisms of genocide that push people to attack others through tokenized us-versus-them copaganda (attacking stigma animalized workers): a position informed by dogma and fear merged with obscurity and distance.

The state, then, is a classic "false friend," pointing the finger at Medusa and saying she's a zombie who bites. The paradox, here, is that Medusa is a zombie, but she doesn't bite provided you can show her you don't mean any harm; i.e., that you can be friends. Though harmed in the past, Medusa won't harm you if you approach her in good faith; but also, expect some degree of temperamentality—i.e., the occasional trigger, outburst and love tap.

Barring those automatic, knee-jerk defenses, Medusa will expect you not to side with the state against her. This requires abandoning the settler-colonial project on all fronts, respecting different healthy boundaries while punching up/through harmful ones by camping canon inside castles; i.e., as an ongoing dialog in dialectical-material tension, hence argument, revived hauntologically through medieval language as useful to workers; re (from the Poetry Module):

using the dialectic of the alien to pull down sick harmful barriers and install fresh healthy ones [...] This "boundary selection" is not only useful for challenging the state's "boundaries for me, not for thee" mantra during selective/collective punishment through the denial of shelter and other basic human rights (if that seems cruel, that's because it is); but it happens through another Gothic staple: the scary room of death/Black Veil, but also the homunculus; i.e., the castle as something giant we live inside, and whose giant's belly of the beast is concentric in both directions (anisotropic) and phenomenological/analogous of an organism during liminal expression [...] Authenticity aside, systemic trauma is isolated and expressed in Gothic theatre, [...] Ironic or not, castles are the most famous and camp-prone Gothic location (from Britain, anyways). It's not just castles, though, but anything capable of operating in terms of any aspect of the Western home/nuclear family unit as compromised; i.e., as alien (doubled) and fetishized, especially in medieval, dated forms reflecting on societal decay as barbaric, torturous and regressive: the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection (unironic xenophobia) threatening an invader demanding access from outside ("Let me in!"). According to these criteria, our "torturous" camp can manifest through any location; i.e., to inherit and reenact shelter through as disintegrating thus dysfunctional, disempowering.

[...] in turn, Gothic empowerment is rooted in "disempowerment" as something to reenact through ironic fetishes; i.e., the aesthetics of death, unequal power and alienization (which the state wants to monopolize and ultimately prevent: our reclamation of their power): rape/death fantasies and play that, when ironic, actually empower the subject by making them feel in control through calculated risk; i.e., psychosexual theatre and ludo-Gothic BDSM; re (from our teaching section): "a dark freaky church where no one gets hurt and there's lots of sex, it's the Neo-Gothic in a nutshell." Trauma manifests through the body and depictions of the body in "ancient," castle-like forms, to which "rape," "torture" and "sacrifice" are very different in quotes than without: a "prison" that sets you free, a "torture dungeon" that restores your passions and your health, a "dangerous" place (often a castle in some shape or form) fronting as Capitalism decayed that opens your mind once inside. / As a result, their "dangers" paradoxically become medicinal and empowering (re: the palliative Numinous) without harming others, thus able to heal a society that is sick with Capitalist Realism (source: "'Welcome to the Fun Palace!' part one: A Song Written in Decay").

Here, we'll expound on some variables that section could not; e.g., kayfabe, tightrope, fairytale hauntologies and the monomyth in Walpole's haunted Capitalocene (which is what Ripley and Medusa [a giant suit of dark armor] represent, meeting the present and the past in the dangerous middle). Radcliffe always treats "darkness" and "demon lover" as "scapegoat pirate" to summon and banish for profit during courtly love hauntologies; when used in good faith (as this book does), said dialectic is meant to make us more discerning in terms of what we take in, but also paradoxically grow more bold once we become unafraid to use medieval poetics—less to unironically derange and confuse our senses, but use darkness visible to deftly address the state's own attacks on our senses mid-cryptonymy (making us question them, thus exit Plato's cave while inside it).

Armed with revived empowering confusions (or acclimated to disempowerment as something to subvert), we may confront nebulous, ungrounded despair with jouissance (a rapturous, secular appeal to a godly force: "Oh, my god!" as orgasmic); i.e., slice, hew and otherwise savagely claw through the canonical constraints of what we can and can't do in a state of crisis. We do so as a means of sex-positive expression told in exquisitely "torturous" language; i.e., as haunted by generational, systemic trauma during the rememory process; e.g., "hungry like the wolf," which the reaver-like xenomorph (and the castle it hunts inside) partially represents: raw animal lust—a feral hunger to fuck with reckless abandon (informed, as nymphomania generally is, by extreme trauma).

Beyond such a creature and looking at the general creative process, it's a real witch's cauldron, and one supplied piece-by-piece from anything and everything (sutured together or built like Walpole's Strawberry Hill, my book, Scott's Nostromo, Campbell's monomyth, etc) that works to holistically and intersectionally weaponize our foes' contributions against them. Fighting their madness with our "madness" amounts to mirrors with mirrors, wherein we challenge the state's Aegis with our own: the "attitude" of our own calculated risk; i.e., back talk, dissident feedback, parroting with sass (the medieval puppet show with embarrassing interpretive dances), and so on.

To that, Medusa is not our enemy regardless of appearance, the state and its illusions are; and while the Gothic most certainly is a sham, it needn't serve state interests insofar as Medusa (and the xenomorph, lycanthropes, vampires, etc) are concerned. If we are to cleave through and move past these complicit cryptonymies to then push into a better age—one whose Wisdom of the Ancients speaks to a healthy cultural understanding of the imaginary past (re: Gothic Maturity)—we must first confront these horrors (and their illusions) where they canonically call home, and per their residents normally being part of an ongoing concealment, rescue them from it: an intervention of the usual damsels and detectives convinced the xenomorph is bad, not the state.

Such a solving and banishing of the mystery as "just a dream" happens according to Radcliffe's privilege of shelter as a) denying Civilization's settler-colonial design through a veil of false modesty while b) triangulating state violence against the colonized dressed up as abject rapists; i.e., demon lovers to partake in sinful activities (guilty pleasures), but also to rape unironically by token agents triangulating against their prescribed "abusers" using blind acts of "love." Per Capitalist Realism, their confused and tokenized barbarism classically synonymizes sex and violence through acts of psychosexual revenge directed at cartoon, fetishized versions of state enemies; i.e., middle-class ladies like Ripley becoming the indiscriminate Amazon³⁸²/white Indian, operating on par with male versions

³⁸² Certainly with the height and passion, but not the raw animal sex appeal and smirking camp, that someone Sandahl Bergman lent Valeria in Conan the Barbarian (1981). Amazons come in many forms, but Sigourney Weaver's Ripley is thoroughly no-nonsense and mostly clothed until the end of the (e.g., Turok the Dinosaur Hunter) except marshalling primarily through threats of rape to punch the black person, Communist, Medusa, etc, as nature-to-rape. She does so without any irony or awareness—is just magnanimous/Goldilocks genocide infuriatingly administered by a self-righteous harridan exterminator (with again, Aliens depicting Ripley oxymoronically as a maverick counselor of force: "an advisor" alluding to the CIA's role in Vietnam).

As such, complicit cryptonymy renders the flow of violence and its cultural markers simply as "cool." Medusa is badass, but must die to save the (white) princess and little girl; i.e., the nuclear family model as a settler-colonial enterprise, its death race driving up costs to ensure profit through genocide.

In the heat of the moment, fear of death and rape aren't so different, then. This partly happens through "alien" as the classic Gothic function of monstrous symbols in the present: the rapist with a knife dick, but also the Archaic Mother monstrous-feminine with an ovipositor (re: Gwen Pearson's "stabby cock dagger"). Extreme trauma elides pleasure and pain, life and death, sex and violence. As a covetous dark cavalier operating during "cuffing season" (sexual envy during shortages), the xenomorphic demon lover is driven during canon by wild lust; i.e., to portray rape as sadly a gaslit fiction and lived reality for many people, not just women; i.e., cis-het men as the historic perpetrators and queer men (cis or trans) as the go-to scapegoats for middle-class cis women to attack once spooked and triggered by the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection's Capitalist Realism.

To it, tokenism commonly uses prison guards recruited from local populations to police its too-giant "terror-tories"; i.e., Ripley is originally a space trucker but radicalizes as a token cop attacking black, queer Communist doubles tied to past abuse the company is to blame, regarding: the moderate-turned-Nazi she-wolf pouncing on her evil twin, and authored by yet-another-Pygmalion, James Cameron... who pimps the whore just as Scott and Lucas did, before him; i.e., the whore, for the canonical wizard, is always a business opportunity to enact through Gothic sex and force, and fear-and-dogma canonical essentialism: always a map, always a cop and a victim—whereupon daddy's little girl puts his chattel to the sword for profit, but also for the revenge of white fragility posturing as "savior" during live burial/graveyard sex married out of Antiquity (re: Wagner) to modern war (e.g., Samus avenging her parents, and Ripley avenging her daughter through a "this time, it's personal" gimmick speaking to neoliberal revenge against the Reds).

movie. She sees the xenomorph as animal, then triangulates and kills it and its race accordingly. Compared to Weaver's tall, imposing she-bitch—who protects the small, meek, and white defenseless from black enemies: animals analogs for children who run and hide when threatened, going wherever they feel safest) and actual white children—Bergman's snarky contributions to the body count notably duck Rob Howard's tired Orientalism; i.e., by killing evil "snake cult" worshippers who, curiously enough are primarily white and led by a token black man (a vice character played wonderfully by James Earl Jones as having made a career out of doing so; re: Darth Vader).

Breaking that barrier will require some very weird journeys regarding strange appetites pursuant to profit or breaking it—a school of "death" therapy embracing nature-as-alien back towards reunion, restoration and resurrection; i.e., ludo-Gothic BDSM meant to heal nature's coercive undead status (a dead angry whore/Bleeding Nun's wandering womb) using a sex-positive theatricality that doesn't preclude demon lovers, including those of a more... animalistic persuasion (we'll touch on the animality of such monsters here [exhibit 47b2] and in "Damsels and Detectives" [exhibit 48d2] before expanding on them [and monster-fucking] even more, in "Call of the Wild").

To it, the xenomorph from Alien works as a colonial relic threatening the current miners of nature; i.e., as tokenized to include white women who, when threatened, proceed to fight, freeze, flop, fly or fawn³⁸³ inside recent Gothic fantasies "left behind" as "ancient derelict": Giger's Frankensteinian monster as yet-another-forgery of the perceived primordial, and one that came together in the present as, itself, being just as much informed by said throwback as anything from the historical past outside of active, aggressive reinvention.

Yet the bridge between the two helps reunite us with hidden atrocities walking around like the xenomorph does, its own signature "primordial" simply cryptonymy working to conceal capital's ongoing abuses since Walpole's own poetic examination of the French and Indian war (which ended in 1763, the year before Walpole wrote Otranto and passed it off as "genuine"). If we are to escape Capitalist Realism and its ongoing abuse of us as damsels/detectives (of a dainty or burly posture, exhibit 47a2c), we must enrich the post-capitalist potential that the xenomorph demon promises while dodging Whitey and the Straights' usual execution of it fearing rebel claws: the allegory of darkness visible being campier

³⁸³ I.e., to please, regarding the fawning mechanism—often with steady and effusive praise. If the conditions are severe enough, they will encourage, if not the telling of outright falsehoods, then embellishments that seek to accomplish the same basic aim: conflict avoidance. The state, though, will lie to defend itself, to blend in, to infect its host workforce. Inside of it, we must disguise ourselves to avoid being attacked by its defenses; i.e., the pious vigil of nuns who, when push comes to shove, can be motivated to attack the state's usual victims inside a decaying institution; e.g., the Nostromo as a nunnery company town whose hospital, work site and commons have all been projected into the imaginary past-future of outer space in decay. It's the death of space-age glitz within a Neo-Gothic Romance dragged forward out of the imaginary past: an S.O.S. written in strange hieroglyphics... which incidentally appear throughout the movie; i.e., as part of the Nostromo's corporate logos appropriating and imbricating ancient religious symbols (obscurantism) into a medievalized power structure at odds through division: a black castle and white castle speaking to the same settler-colonial project existing between them. Both operate, brick-by-brick, at the frontiers of company territory to where ancient/modern ideas (and functions) of castles overlap: the décor's Numinous stamp!

and more inclusive than Alien's narrow white worldview (sorry, Parker); i.e., when playing with the same-old clay's dead Neo-Gothic metaphors, ourselves.

White Predation in Alien (and Similar Works)

Alien is very checkered in its Marxism, abused by the in-group cannibalizing the out-group with strong Gothic heroines; i.e., from Metrodvania to survival horror to shooters across the board. Keeping with kayfabe, then (and devoting seven new pages to that train of thought—until exhibit 47a2c), Nazis and Commies occupy the same shadow zone. As we have said. And yet, despite having a Communist element, said element had decayed by 1979 to make Alien far less radical than people remember. But we can romanticize it further to become more radical again (similar to Star Wars and Andor); i.e, by breaking any perceived eugenic ceiling Scott raised over four decades ago. Alien wasn't the end or start of things, but merely a mutation in a larger ongoing chain—one whose praxial fluency and renewal, mid-dialectical, becomes second-nature/woke amid a rising intelligence and awareness healing broken circuits of dark galaxies: the more we inundate bad fakes with good, the more constellations form towards a better yet-to-exist world. Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM, hence Gothic maturity pursuant to Communism out of the "ancient" past.

In similar cryptomimetic fashion, the giving and taking of voices comes and goes across all Gothic media. Shelley gave the oppressed a voice through the Creature; Whale took the voice away and let Victor talk, as did Scott with Giger's alien and Ripley's maiden detective; Samus and Doomguy largely were silent protagonists whose worlds spoke through the cryptonymy of Numinous former colonies and gibbering demons, only for the post-Doom, mid-'90s Build games and Valve's Half-Life franchise (1998, onwards) to respectively give the monomyth hero a voice and leave them mute (though Alex Vance, in 2004's Half-Life 2, would speak for Gordon Freeman, a black girl romancing the white guy having the literal

quite nakedly. Profit demonizes such things, but from a creative standpoint, echopraxis is classically seen as a sign of imitative respect; i.e., worthy enough not to steal but pay tribute to [because modern privatization didn't exist in the Renaissance period—at least to nowhere near the same extent it does now.]

Whatever the voice or unheimlich, praxial quality always concerns what is being said; i.e., the Gothic speaks "unspeakable" things relative to profit as optional; e.g., the Creature fought for equal rights, whereas Duke Nukem was a notorious pig spouting blind pastiche/dead quotes (essentially Troma films without the satire) and whose own death Caleb celebrated in Blood, a year later (exhibit 47a2a, top-left). There is no "final form," just a continuation that says whatever workers need to say while echoing other castle-in-the-flesh egregores, on and on. From "the traditions of all dead generations," they use to pacify and we to mobilize; i.e., the vengeful dead whore—Medusa and her ilk—speaking through us as injecting irony back into what has been lost. In other words, knowledge is application through demonic creation as something to demonically act out, including through sex and public nudism speaking asexually about sexual harm: their "hurt, not harm" message—that excitement requires some kind of risk, however calculated—while speaking to mutual consent: through ludo-Gothic BDSM's CNC/rape play as informed consent that moral arbiters, suitably outraged, will abject but also dig up to destroy in public displays of white Man-Box superiority. Capital pimps what is different; we unite and humanize what is raped.

In short, morality is arbitrated through canonical binaries per Derrida's system of differences, but these aren't transcendental; they're merely stances to adopt and fight for in the same old dialectic: the state vs nature as alien. Queer art is haunted by queer abuse; black art, black abuse; female art, female abuse; and this includes intersections of privilege/oppression, subject/object, and authorship. Different things mean different things at the same time and all at once.

For example, Mortal Kombat's [1993] Goro is a four-armed "dragon" who "finishes" the smaller damsel in ways that highlight the in-house history of women across all registers; i.e., in ways that Ed Boon camped to an extent, but also pimped out: through his arcade-era blockbuster's dubious Orientalism, being aped by a legion of copycats not unlike Doom and the FPS [the so-called "Doom clones"]. Each clamors to be heard, speaking to abuse in ways that are being camped, but still transgressive/exploitative to unevenly experience abuse, onstage and off, according to societal roles and expectations thrust upon us as consumers and actors; re: hyphenating sex and force with various taboos that go either way [Schrodinger's rape victim].

To that, Sabs' work speaks to a '90s out-of-the-closet-but-still-alien hauntology that fetishizes the twink as something to chase and ravish, but also savor and spoil [so-called "pretty privilege"] while all sides heal from rape/work out their differences during the dialectic of the alien; i.e., as something to literally fuck with. And last but not least, Alien is code for "rape," meaning the rape hound as much as gorehound: "We found some dark rape, let's go investigate!" Tom Skerritt is now Fred from Scooby Doo. That's my head canon.

But also, "rape" can be in quotes or not to a liminal extent; i.e., during rebellion's usual revenge being policed and scrutinized, much like Lewis' seminal cryptonymy was, over two centuries ago; re: exploitation and liberation occupy the same spaces and there's no way to extricate them save through performative context playing with dark power. In turn, size difference plays a part, as does fucking the alien; i.e., in ways that are haunted by genuine black-and-white trauma, from the past, as suggested by language of "the past" viewed in the present. Silly and/or serious, the performance as something to study and experience again and again is what communicates its holistic value in a sex-positive or sex-coercive sense. Through fatal attraction, rape victims seek out rape during calculated risk, which the Gothic historically offers in ironic and unironic forms on a similar complicated, dialectical-material gradient.)

(exhibit 47a2a2: Artist, left: Raff Grassetti; top-right: Reiq. To that, nudity or chastity is performatively fine so long as it doesn't infantilize women [or anyone else] into a cop; i.e., who triangulates for a hauntological defense of the "ancient" Greco-Roman West during damsel/detective Amazon arguments of virgin/whore "good" monstrous-feminine against nature as "evil" monstrous-feminine; e.g., "Sparta," "Athens" or "Rome" as something to defend from degeneracy come back through the usual us-versus-them home defense arguments. Through those, women are whatever cis-hit/token men want and need them to be; through us, we reclaim such things to speak to liberation during liminal expression.)

From Alien to Doom to Metroid and other Metroidvania/shooters—all of them built on movies in the neoliberal period out of novels during said period—so many consumers are afraid to critique their heroes and their homes, because they become our homes, too, thus feel sacred as a matter of residency melded to dogma; i.e., the paradox of allegory and apotropaic "armor condoms" is that escaping into other void-like worlds must open our eyes to the problems and presence of coercive illusions in our current time and place. And any who uncritically defend those illusions (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Those Who Walk Away from Speedrunning," 2025) are "pulling an Omelas," thus hiding from the reality those illusions conceal; i.e., in effect assimilating through the class nightmare of the Gothic that Jameson—with some justice—was talking about (while missing the point of rape play that Radcliffe and, hell, even Tolkien was touching on, however imperfectly³⁸⁴):

Nothing is neutral, but the appearance of neutrality through the consumption of clearly binarized and dogmatic canon (Tolkien in a nutshell, left) is precisely the kind of tactic bad actors use to indoctrinate other workers; i.e., to hunt their fellow victims down, like Ripley does. The act of doing so historically happens in defense of canon and blind escape, yet becomes Quixotic in ways that bounce between fiction and non-fiction, trash and picturesque—with those lauding Alien over 2001 "because it's dirty" sort of missing the point: a black monolith is still a black monolith, a slum still a slum for the middle class to dive into, regardless of the sterility or grime. By comparison, we aliens of the status quo viewpoint can swim in the abyss as speaking to our normal everyday lives: Ripley's nightmare is our Tuesday.

³⁸⁴ Re: Through medieval courtship not allowing "poor frail" women the right to theatrically do battle because rape, as a matter of total humiliation, suddenly becomes "possible" through such violence. But here's a question to bake their noodles: If men are allowed to rape each other in sexualized forms of performative sparring and revenge, why can't women get ravished in these stories if they like it (or anyone allowed to submit to their own holocaust*)? The paradox of rape certainly allows for it, but the moral outrage of white (male/token) moderates does not. And where there is outrage, there is rape behind the superiority of moderacy as haunted by fascism segregating—among other marginalized groups—women (unless it needs a Dernhelm or two to maintain the white patriarchal ordering of things, above).

*The watching of other groups being "totally butchered" can be sex-positive, provided mutual consent is upheld and conveyed by the theatrical violence being shown. And even then, if you're watching educational material speaking to historical bigotry or viewing unironic exploitative versions with irony—meaning that you're trying to learn from them to prevent future abuse; e.g., honoring the memory of trans people by watching Boys Don't Cry (1999) or African American slaves by watching Twelve Years a Slave (2013)—then doing so must be permitted; i.e., as a matter of perceptive education, not blind consumption: to relate to others through their experience as human by virtue of simply being human, not because of their appearance determining them as more or less valuable (and the performative reality of "black," green or some other non-white color not being automatically racialized, but haunted by that, obviously complicating things). As always, such questions are determined on a case-by-case basis.

Ripley's Riddle: the Mystery of the Token Feminist

Remember that nothing is sacred but our rights interlinked with the rights of those who came before, the collective wisdom of which we use to camp canon (thus profit) to death. By comparison, something that is conditioned to be violent for profit will be violent for profit; i.e., as a menticial gargoyle serving in duality as part of the same mirrored expression's kaleidoscopic madness; re: the xenomorph and the crew it threatens each having the potential for class, culture and race betrayals—meaning someone that activates predictably and ruthlessly during reactive abuse—but for which the seemingly human parties are just as violent and territorial as the inhuman ones (re: Black Swan, left).

In keeping with Frankenstein's own ambiguity and oscillation, there is no set meaning to such inkblots (though some explanations are far more likely than others). Instead, we must subvert any undesirable historical-material outcomes by showing our audiences that we demons—normally treated as things to unironically persecute—actually have the ability to not only survive, but overwhelm and deconstruct our innocuous-looking killers' harmful sense of self; i.e., by anisotropically weaponizing their own tools of alienation against them: the villain in Alien isn't the xenomorph, but profit (wealth alienates) leaning into a form of bio-power the elite can weaponize by pitting workers against workers (white on black), moving money through nature during the Promethean Quest!

To that, corporate workers colonize space in pursuit of intelligent life, but only do so contractually through a company that exploits all parties through preferential mistreatment (the rare-and-elusive "thinking slave" [versus extended object, per Cartesian thought] to put down/enslave from older empires promising "phat loot" to the finder). Divided, workers get dumber and meaner over time, the middle class essentializing as Faustian stopgaps for the bourgeoisie to trigger with Medusa; i.e., as a Black Pearl to tremble before (fragile savior syndrome; re, Marx: "capital has made us so stupid" extending to the defenders of church-like franchises and mediums, in the neoliberal era). It becomes a game; i.e., conjure up the black cosmic rapist once more to banish during mirror syndrome, simultaneously proving one's monomythic worth and earning neoliberal false power/brownie points through applied harmful knowledge: "Make demon, then act outraged as you rape it."

Sound familiar? It's what Victor did, and by extension what Ripley does by playing her part in a man's world: her spawn is natural and good, whereas the fascist-Communist egregore/chimera attached to a polity of tyrants and victims is, once-and-future, a total asshole—one where our cosmic Karen can not only call the cops on for revenge against the cops through those the cops victimize; she can be the cop and skip the middlemen (see: Aliens)! It's pure bollocks.

In a sense, it's the femme fatale; i.e., Zero Suit Samus as much an assassin for her government (the Galactic Federation) as Ripley was for hers. And despite appearances to the contrary (the "Rambo/white Indian" problem), many women act bereaved or oppressed to assimilate, only to lean into the very motherly tropes that men want while calling it rebellion. In doing so, they prostitute themselves per the whore's paradox, both virginally and/or whorishly as Amazons to varying degrees of state revenge: "the jungle abused me (or I felt scared of it) so I leaned into whatever roles were expected of me thinking it would protect me from harm!" It's scaring women into being sexually violent and visually appealing to men; i.e., in ways men can then control, itself one of the oldest tricks in the book attached to tokenism having updated from Ancient Athens into modern versions of "Rome," on and offstage! The housewife slums, but out-of-joint.

As such, it bears repeating that white woman—until very recently in world history—were property for Western men, not people themselves, and for far longer than African Americans have been slaves/second-class citizens. But under present circumstances, such things have shifted to turn white women into gatekeepers for capital that, post-gaslight, became girl boss vanguards that led people of color to also tokenize, followed by the appearance of queer people in Western judicial dialogs (re: Foucault) and the repurposing of medieval persecution language to apply such things to a new order of alien, during the hauntologies at work (re: Zionism). #PickMe

Such "roiling" demands constant Gothic introspection. In Alien, for example, warrior nuns can do whatever they want if they fear for their modesty pursuant to profit (their virginity synonymous with their lives as male property extending to corporate ownership; re: "crew expendable"); i.e., they are the ultimate undeserving victims who, suddenly as cops to a lesser degree (e.g., Ripley as Warrant Officer of the Nostromo), enjoy the state's usual tools provided they "play along" (with the monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital; re: Cartesian, settler-colonial straight violence, terror and sex as not just invented, per Crawford, but reinvented and passed along). In turn, "space" is colonized through a white tokenized fear of black rape along the usual inventions we must subvert perceptively—by polishing our mirrors (no surface is 100% reflective)!

Again, quoting is completely fine as long as it's not canonical; i.e., provided you're commenting on/with it to ultimately camp, thus prevent rape by challenging profit to have the whore's revenge (Shelley Bombshell, for example, is having the pimp's, above). Alien was ultimately a festooned cash-grab leaning into Lovecraft, Conrad and Poe to pimp out celibate pioneer whores; i.e., "phallic" violent/smart women (Cartwright's Lambert wasn't a scrapper but she was a navigator—a classically male position). These are sailors, first and foremost, but still burdened with Neo-Victorian expectations in a retro-future Britain, its neo-medieval panopticon invaded by an alien far worse than Giger's: Margaret Thatcher!

This being said, the ambiguity gives it a certain viral/fungal power (the xenomorph is basically the precursor to the AIDS virus and the finger-pointing that would cause, only a two years later in 1981). History is a living document, then, and the Gothic is writ in transformation and decay!

To that, you can have white skin and still be an alien (as I have been, my whole life); you can be an alien and still be a cop (as Ripley is, next page)—i.e., attacking the alien as something to police because it is abject, the holier-than-thou generally acting the most modest while having the most unironic perversions: stuck in Capitalism gentrifying and decaying such things/adopting a grim air of flirting with disaster while playing meek and strong voyeurs exhibiting strength during neo-conservative warmongering.

To that, the canonical detective becomes more and more robotic/transhuman to pre-emptively attack nature defending itself from the colonizer³⁸⁵, and whose own mutations are postcolonial; e.g., the Cyberdemon from Doom (exhibit 51d4a2); re: Persephone van der Waard's "Postcolonialism in Doom" (2020), as featured in "Those Who Walk Away From Speedrunning" (2020) They become heartless shrews in ways that expend all sympathy from allies while betraying them, mid-witch hunt (re: Federici); i.e., while consuming the alien, on and offstage, in ways they cannot create, only destroy because they police what they think is cool: while turning off their brains except "shoot to kill" as a mindset wherever they are! Killing becomes a tremendous mystery unto itself, one to chase across Hell's half-acre until the cows come home—from Earth, to the stars, and back again!

Think Eco, but for damsels finding their inner Spartan or "female Achilles" the Athenians whispered about; i.e., as Marston drooled over and Scott made in the image of his own hard-ass mom. It's very British, but also Western; re: Irigaray's creation of sexual difference whoring the mom out as a chaste TERF nevertheless chained to men and that burden of care: harbingers of the same fear and suspicion, but doubly so because they're not men—will try all the harder to fit in where they're never fully welcome. "We're the victims!" they'll cry.

No one punches down harder than token people do, because their betrayal has alienated themselves already from their own people in exchange for Judas gold (re: Federici). They "can never" go back, as they see it, having crossed the Rubicon "for good." As Ripley shows us, they'll even kill babies for bosses they don't like (an extermination rhetoric that Neill Blomkamp would highlight much more nakedly vis-à-vis Apartheid, in District 9's own white savior/Tonto and the Lone Ranger rehash):

And while this seems like a lovely metaphor of the Vietnam War on its face, war apologia laces itself with sympathy for the conqueror "suing for peace" in bad faith; i.e., while continuing to prosecute war during the same-old false flags and vae victis refrains fearful of the liberated, if avenged. "No, it's the non-white children who are wrong!" Cameron isn't a steward of nature, then, but its routine pimp/Greater Destroyer as all Great White Men of History (and subjugated women) have been: idle, class dormant minds, conjuring Mephistopheles to collar and torment the demon to death. It's bad BDSM through the submissive shooting the dom.

As such, he and company took the wrong lessons from the Vietnam war and turned them into a profitable cryptomimetic refrain valorizing personal responsibility and Starship Troopers to replicate war copaganda in ways Lovecraft only hinted at; i.e., to have everyone see Ripley as the Good White Madonna and want to be "just like her" when pimp-slapping the fat-and-sassy Welfare Queen—in effect, whitewashing the Vietnam war and every conflict that came after it, onstage and off, through neoliberal media (videogames) during Cameron's refrain, fostering peace through strength as, ever and always, a package deal with the New World Order announced by Bush Sr. in 1990: "This Time, It's War!" and personal, to boot! And Cameron's Aliens married a variety of cops-and-victims stigmas acquired over a very long career to make things hell for nature as monstrous-feminine—all so Cameron could profit off the past in badly disguised ethnocentric dogma, then sell it back to American liberals with his 2009 Avatar series!

But back in 1986, he helped spawn Metroid as imitating the same mutating canonical chain (alongside Tolkien's own cartographic refrains; re: "A Note on Canonical Essentialism")—from middle-of-the-20th century novels (Starship Troopers, 1959) to 1980s cinema (Aliens, 1986) and videogames (Metroid, also 1986) and later Doom and Quake (1993 and 1996) onto latter-day FPS like Call of Duty and Gears of War (2003 and 2006); i.e., as franchises that would go on and on and on, inside the neoliberal period's end of history as build for extermination: "Final Victory" as ever elusive, creating a problem it could never solve because it was built on a lie that, nonetheless, created an endless supply of cops and victims to replicate—one side signing stupidly up to face a perceived and imaginary but half-real threat, and the other side colonized whether they want to be or not.

It's a War on Terror that never ends, incited by James Cameron before 9/11 as a pimp and chicken hawk warmonger who doesn't want peace; he wants to sell more and more Madonnas, the Shadow of Pygmalion (and his Galatean perversion, the subjugated Hippolyta) replicated like gospel to preach without end, perception becoming reality to serve profit: by raping the whore faster and faster onstage, doing so in conjunction with real-world geopolitics in the hopes that the nightmare will "suddenly end" if we just find one more power-up (torturing nature's secret's out from her dark womb, raiding Hell's handbasket one more monomythic time). Except it won't, because said military optimism, urbanism and Realism are merely the infernal concentric pattern as Aguirre highlighted, in 2008, but also Radcliffe back in the 1790s; i.e., accidentally warning about in her own conservative fictions' monster behind the Black Veil: Capitalism growing into itself, "standing on the ashes of something not quite present" during the cryptonymy process.

Allegory is often what the authors aren't fully aware of, but still putting in their stories for others to find, afterwards. Except, whereas Scott's Alien had some irony and neoliberal critique among its own trembling prospector's ethnocentrism, under Cameron's disastrous notion of damsels, detectives and demons, the Prison-Military Industrial Complex completely exploded into a gold rush of Pax Deorum ("peace of the gods," or more colloquially "golden age"); i.e., through him as Bringer of War pimping Ripley out on the Aegis (and Sigourney Weaver embracing the neo-conservative elements beyond her flagship character's maiden voyage—a pirate vessel flying the American flag for decades afterwards). There is never "true peace in space," at home or abroad, onstage or off, for Samus, Ripley or anyone else.

Expanding the blind parody of Beowulf and its praxial inertia into American households as something to "speedrun" from the '90s onwards (re: me, vis-à-vis Eric Koziel), suddenly the whole world was entirely on fire—full of gay non-white Communist space bugs to blame, thus squash and burn by new generations pushing against Domino Theory dressed up; i.e., younger and younger witch hunter cowboys, repeatedly eager to plunge into the same-old frontier territories for endless glory and conquest: to recite the same old lines as they do with a smile on their faces ("Express elevator to Hell, goin' down!" Bill Paxton says, above, presenting my entire graduation class (of '04) with a likeness to unironically imitate, after 9/11 handed America its first domestic black eyes: "Goddamn bugs wacked us, Johnny!") and then feeling sorry for themselves, afterwards, while nuking the site from orbit not once, but over and over again!

As such, Cameron's signature Military Optimism helped sublimate the new normal; i.e., by reenacting the vengeful ghost of Saigon without irony to rape the world through the same old, us-versus-them cartography and jingoistic, Pax Americana heroism. The harder they punch, the more they deny and the guiltier their actions make them; but it's always the whore's fault.

In turn, the Shadow of Pygmalion haunts the Cycle of Kings during the narrative of the crypt. And to that, if Scott blindfolded the Amazon to scare her incestuously like Ferdinand did, in The Duchess of Malfi (1614), Cameron turned the damsel into a military recruiting tool he could pimp out as modest while fetishizing the same kayfabe-style cult of death; i.e., trading the torch for a gun (exhibit 48c1)—his Spartan hauntology of Marston's Wonder Woman given flesh and pitted against Red Skull as Nazi-Communism, except now it was a black mirror to contend with Capitalist Realism and fascism ever and always festering endemically on the homefront: the ignominious death of older Americans sticking its own young populations into a Faustian meat grinder in pursuit of Promethean power!

Such is fascism, and America has always been a prison/settler colony (re: Zinn). Yes, Scott is bad, at times, but Cameron's Don Quixote revival is a million, million times worse. He's a white moderate whitewashing fascism and selling the War on Terror pre- and post-9/11 in ways that eclipsed Alien's haunted house argument (through merchandise, remediation and gross sales) on every level; re: his refrain the one that not only "stuck," but best hit upon the present state of affairs, and settler-colonial groundwork underneath, orchestrating such things for centuries; or (from my PhD thesis argument on Tolkien and Cameron's refrain):

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth (or an Earth-like double)—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force ["outside" on the frontiers] (source).

In short, it's a place to test one's manhood/mettle as routinely needing to be tested—with Cameron's Hippolyta girl boss being a clever whitewash and gender swap that shows the boys (and girls) how to act like men better than men (and the Brits):

This is hardly the first time I've discussed this. As I write in 2021's "Outlier Love: Enjoying Prometheus/Covenant in the Shadow of Aliens" (an extended quote because all this is incredibly relevant):

Before Aliens there was Star Wars. Lucas' original trilogy championed armed resistance against imperial colonizers by modeling the rebels after the Vietcong. Unfortunately Aliens' own Vietnam war allegory is far more ambiguous. Ellen Ripley becomes Rambo, slaying droves of alien creatures single-handedly (Cameron wrote the original screenplay for Rambo: First Blood Part II before handing it off to Sylvester Stallone). The aliens aren't even remotely humanized. Instead, the movie's dramatic elements focus on Ripley's surrogate motherhood. She eradicates the aliens to save Newt, all thanks to Cameron's "neutral" critical lens.

And when I say eradicate, I mean it. "I say we take off and nuke the site from orbit" isn't just a memorable quote; it's also Ripley channeling the spirit of the American occupiers. Leave; bomb the Commies on your way out. JFK wasn't keen on dropping bombs, but authorized the use of agent orange. Johnson loved his bombs; so did Nixon, but he banned agent orange. These ambivalent, indiscriminate attacks harmed the indigenous population. Aliens could have channeled civilian warfare like the Tet Offensive by having the xenomorphs resemble the former colonists. Instead, a bug is just a bug. With nothing human to stall her advance, Ripley unironically massacres the colonized; like Vietnam, Hadley's Hope becomes a shooting gallery. In this respect, Aliens is quite literally xenophobic propaganda*.

*For more on this concept, consider reading my article, "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid."

Not convinced? Consider Aliens' literary influences: Sigourney Weaver cites Henry V as the inspiration for Ripley—a play about the reification of an English monarch through war ("Once more unto to breach, dear friends"). During Aliens' production, the entire cast also had to read Starship Troopers, a novel criticized for its propaganda-level glorification of the military. In other words, the critical slant, if there is one, is too neutral to effectively criticize the industrial-war machine. Do you speak out and risk being attacked for your politics (Good Morning Vietnam)? Or do you play it "straight," vitalizing the military to mollify hawkish critics (see: Starship Troopers—the book or

Aliens has the latter problem, one it's propelled into future movies and videogames: "This time it's war," the trailer announced. Cameron himself wasn't above pandering to both sides, openly apologizing to the United States Marine Corps. for his unglamorous depiction of the military (see: his commentary track for Aliens in the Alien Quadrilogy edition). Cameron's concession only muddies the waters further, as do future attempts by him to generate money through the energetic depiction of war (re: Avatar).

Guns are a big selling point for Aliens. This same concept applies to Cameron's own franchise, The Terminator. To be fair, Terminator is far more critical of war (and rogue police states) than Aliens. Nevertheless, the movie still has a lot of guns in it. Some audience members even view Cameron's "future war" as a glorious, nostalgic playground. Angry Joe, a right-leaning gamer, belligerently clamors for the "purple lasers!" (and loves his Aliens paraphernalia). Mr. H Reviews drools over Tech-com's faithful 1980s tableaux, while condemning feminists for ruining the franchise with Terminator Dark Fate. Their combined approval of "future war" and Aliens-inspired media isn't a shock. But neither are the sexist, warlike attitudes they sneak in under the veneer of "neutral" entertainment.

Though left-leaning myself, I can still delight in Cameron's artistic craft. I like purple lasers and big explosions; they're pretty and visually stimulating. But honestly I enjoy them more when combined with Cameron's Gothic elements: his Romance between Sarah Connor and Kyle Reese; his dark mirror with Ellen Ripley versus the Queen. Unfortunately those situations are shrouded by war. Maybe that's the point: Gothic stories both fear and promote the return of a barbaric past, including war. War and guns are popular in America. So is Aliens which, moving forward, makes war and guns popular again. And again, and again...

I'm an American. Any declaration from me—that I enjoy Terminator or Aliens—feels like it must be clarified. Fans of the "good" Alien movies (the first two in particular) usually don't clarify anything. When I was in my mid-20s, I worked at my family's (now defunct) store. A [gay no-white male] banker would come down and talk movies with my mother and I. We got to talking about the Alien franchise. Suddenly he announced "Oh, Aliens is the best one!" before looking at me and smiling in mild, veiled provocation. He didn't say why. He didn't have to.

I heard the same thing in high school. Mike Worthington and I loved Alien and Aliens. We asked Mrs. Brown if we could show both movies in her science fiction class. She allowed it. After watching them, a popular, somewhat artsy student in a Greenday t-shirt declared, "It's stupid." He was talking about Alien. Our classmates chorused in agreement, saying that Aliens "was awesome" because it had guns.

The same kind of people say that Prometheus is "bad," usually implying blame towards Scott for his "Quixotic" departure from Cameron's reliable monopoly. They also provide double-standards—dumb scientists, plot holes, ropy dialogue—to justify their reasons. I say "double standards" because these reasons are not missing in the original pairing. More to the point, Alien and Aliens are generally considered "good" for oft-repeated, but understated reasons. "Good" usually means Aliens, primarily its guns.

The presence of war in Aliens is so ubiquitous that it usually goes without saying. It should be commented on, but isn't because so many in the mainstream view it as "classic," default, normal. Alien is classic too, but Aliens carries the American torch through its glorification of war. For nearly its entire existence, America has been at war, or made money as a "neutral" party selling guns to either side. Manifest destiny aka a "clear fate." The "no fate" spiel from T2 suddenly sounds a little ironic, especially when compared to Ripley's heroism in Aliens. Cameron says he uses violence to make a point. Perhaps people understand violence; they also glorify it, perpetuating war through their own creations.

The lengthy shadow of war applies to videogames inspired by Aliens. Aliens single-handedly cemented the FPS genre, inspiring id to make Doom. It also spawned a number of cinematic or cinematic-inspired imitators: Predator, as well as Metroid and Contra. And not just them, but numerous sequels and spin-offs. The best ones are constantly explosive, action-packed (though I prefer mine with a bit of spooky atmosphere and tension; re: Super Metroid, Dead Space, Alien: Isolation).

Make no mistake, I'm indebted to Aliens for its role in Metroid's genesis (even if the first game is closer in spirit to Alien). However, the word "good" has far too much weight in casual discourse. This drives me up a wall.

"Aliens is good" has little to do with the criticisms mentioned above (dumb characters, decisions, dialogue); it has everything to do with the understated components: the guns, the action, the jingoistic comradeship. These sit innocently on the screen, less propagandized than The Dirty Dozen. I say "less" because Horner's music is still awash with military splendor and excitement (similar to John Williams bastardizing "Bringer of War" in A New Hope). It's not just tolerated; it's embraced, just with less zeal [or so it seems] (source).

This became a pissing match/forever war between Scott and Cameron's bread-and-circus, but also their fans; i.e., using derelict Amazons vs Medusa in ways I grew up with—from the early '90s, onwards—but desperately wanted to change, myself. As a closeted trans Communist, I was always against war but loved the GNC potential of the Gothic heroines being shown—so much so, in fact, that my early research into them at grad school, "What an Amazon Is, Standing in Athena's Shadow" (2017), preceded my eventual 2018 master's thesis about Metroidvania, and later research after that preceding my PhD (re: 2021's "Why I Submit").

The rememory process never stops—is one of constant holistic reengagement with what doesn't die, anyways. We can't be rid of such things; we can only camp and subvert them, even transgressively. The idea is to make such things actively rebellious, our own Satanic and "ancient" left-behinds raising emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness to prevent war and rape by not blaming the whore as monster girl waifu (the classic function of the Amazon vs Medusa, sadly):

In short, I love Metroidvania and Amazons as things to subvert; all of my Metroidvania work concerns Amazons (re: Persephone's 2025 Metroidvania Corpus), and I've written about Amazons—but also illustrated and performed solo/with others the idea of Amazons, Medusa and Amazonomachia—for my entire Sex Positivity book series (2022 to 2025). And furthermore, my academic ideas "the palliative Numinous" and "ludo-Gothic BDSM" (from Volume Zero, onwards) were deliberately coined in conscious, active attempts to get away from Cameron's harmful dogma better than Kristeva or Creed had, but also Scott.

If Sex Positivity and my earlier work is any proof, then, I love camping the canon. It's like sex to me (and often involves sex hyphenating art-porn to develop Gothic Communism, another of my creations). No one paid me; I just actually 100% enjoy it—Persephone "losing herself in Necropolis" again and again (to be "raped" there with reckless abandon)—and think we can do far better than Cameron ever bothered. He's a cunt, and while Ridley is less of a cunt than him, he's a cunt, too (the two men "docking" on and off, throughout the years). Don't just kill your darlings, duckies; emancipate their whores during ludo-Gothic BDSM and glaze those on the Aegis in furtherance to effacing the heteronormative, settler-colonial, Cartesian legacy Pygmalions like Scott and Cameron both leave behind—i.e., with your own iconoclastic damsels, detectives and demons liberating sex work (therefore all work) from Capitalist Realism in duality! We're going back to learn, not to destroy and forget!

That is my "found document" for you to discover and it won't apologize for Pygmalions like Cameron raping the world by first raping our minds (re: taking Aristotle's "give me a child until he is seven and I will show you the man" and applying it to cis girls and black men, too)! Keeping with the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection furthered by the middle class, there is always a whore to fetishize/alienize and rape—a succubus "from beyond" to collar and cage by princes, but also by princesses savagely "sticking it" to the colonized to performatively "get back at" the real abusers (white men and their white systems of oppression): "The goddess you need can't be me," it's a cruel angel's thesis we have to subvert within our own strange appetites garnered, mid-abuse, to have the whore's monstrous-feminine revenge, one day (and creation/rape) at a time—by thwarting profit, thus rape, by putting "rape" in quotes (re: "A Cruel Angel's \(Modular\) Thesis")! Take my Wisdom of the Ancients and carve your own destinies in defiance of the real pimps-in-disguise! Enjoy but do not endorse canon!

Oscillation (and echoes of incest, live burial and rape; re: Neo Genesis Evangelion's whole fucked-up Neo-Gothic pastiche) aside, there's a million-billion ways to do this. In keeping with duality and continuing to investigate neoliberalism in yesterday's heroes beyond my older work and commissions³⁸⁶, the world looks very different and practically identical after reentering Plato's cave (the process often being called trans emasculation, for trans women); i.e., to critique men like Cameron vampirically sending power towards the elite on the Aegis (akin to Jim Henson's Skeksis), whereas we reverse the flow of abjection anisotropically by also inverting terror/counterterror as Gothic counterculture nostalgia!

³⁸⁶ E.g., my Hentai Foundry scraps from 2015 to 2021 becoming less and less appropriative and more and more appreciative/indicative of my conscious trans self playing with the same weapons of sex and force to wage active class war in favor of workers and nature, not the elite. Eventually this happened to such a degree that Hentai Foundry shadowbanned/refused to feature my work (from 2024 onwards).

To that, Cameron is Skynet growing tissue for the cyborgs and the bullet farmers raping the grave-like ground (very Gothic); we bare it all to expose his folly while denying him our organs (of sex, but also thought married to sex and labor): "Can't touch this" freaky girl! And doing such "push-ups" or "jumping jacks" might look silly from the outside/at a distance, but so does sex and/or public nudism if you're not the one(s) doing it. What matters isn't action for its own sake (re: Eco), but whose dialectical-material context upon further inspection aids in the development of Communism during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., in ways Cameron's own praxial inertia didn't, because it produced a lot more people not like me (eco-fascists) than like me and those like me (re: from Volume Zero): "Go forth, young boy, and you'll become a legend!" meets "Go West, young man!" Lebensraum is Lebensraum, Manifest Destiny always the same game given a new coat of paint by men like Cameron (from slavers like Thomas Jefferson to Hilter) pimping the wild whore as seductive and delicious:

artist: [A Baby Pinecone]

The historical-material reality of Grendel's suspiciously Satanic-sounding mother is ordinary people being placed into the out-group by the in-group—i.e., less hag-horror in the sense of actual withered hags [the furies] and more the ancient mother goddess [the Archaic Mother] as embodied in AFAB persons and viewed fearfully by men as devious shapeshifters that could be anywhere, inside-outside anyone [a killer impostor that is instantly fatal upon encountering; e.g., the T-1000 disguised as an innocent housewife]. While the stigma applies to anything remotely female or incorrectly male, the redhead classically evokes the presence of pagan power and Sapphic energies.

She embodies nature, and nature is something for Beowulf's hauntologized clones to kettle/box-in, then rape and kill for "their own" God-given glory in bread-and-circus-type stories [with her predictable revenge—at becoming like them for the death of her family and loved ones—being seen as cowardly and illegitimate in the eyes of the state and its kayfabe monopoly of violence; i.e., the back-and-forth cycle of reactive abuse]. It's not just "boys will be boys"; the pussy looks like a cave to conquer by men according to men during rites of passage that have been baked into our culture as fundamental to capital. It's Manifest Destiny in action—challenged by the simple fact that God is an invention, a cruel joke to abuse others with through the rise of Capitalism's Cartesian Revolution and resultant maps of conquest [exhibit 1a1a1h2a1]. It becomes not just a scribble of Old-English runes, but a harmful game spawned into endless copies of itself: the power fantasy as Warrior Jesus' perennial resurrection, raping and killing the world as monstrous-feminine, "gendered at every turn" according to cartography as a technology of conquest that fits into the ludologized scheme:

[Francis Bacon, the father of modern science,] argued that "science should as it were torture nature's secrets out of her." Further, the "empire of man" should penetrate and dominate the "womb of nature." [...] The invention of Nature and Society was gendered at every turn. The binaries of Man and Woman, Nature and Society, drank from the same cup. Nature, and its boundary with Society, was "gyn/ecological" from the outset (source: A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things).

The kingdom is threatened; call Beowulf [or the Ghostbusters] out of the mythical past to slay what ails the king and the land, the uncanny home as "rotten" [as Hamlet put it, in Shakespeare's parody of the hero/murder mystery] and needing to be restored through great destruction [sold to the masses, of course]: [...]

To preserve the image of male hegemony, modern-day heroes will inject themselves with whatever serum they require to manufacture an edge over women as a false binary [e.g., the ghost of Eugene Sandow and his imaginary antiquity, exhibit 7a]. This mad science is what Robert Matheson and Mary Shelley mercilessly lampooned in Frankenstein and I am Legend [1954] as the fearsome and outdated legend of the rapist-murderer presented as a scientist of cold, "benevolent" reason [or infantile sports goon grown in a test tube; e.g., X-24 from Logan, 2017]—who is, in truth, just an entitled, cruel nerd. Manufactured conflict under Capitalism involves compelled performances of anything and everything [masks, uniforms, weapons, handcuffs and other binding implements, labels of power and its delivery from cops unto victims, etc] that weaponize weird canonical nerds through projection—i.e., onto various theatrical personas: sexy or profoundly hideous killers, detectives, warriors, or doctors... (source: "Overcoming Praxial Inertia").

In short, we're all "looking for Mother" as someone to occupy and enjoy for various reasons; i.e., while moving through the monomythic underworld/Promethean space as simply a dogmatic reflection of canon out into the external plane. In turn, monsters, violence, terror and virgin-whore damsels, detectives and sex demons during monstrous-feminine poetic expression aren't automatically "bad"; it's how their continuously reapplied in the present from the past in relation to the future (re: the Wisdom of the Ancients) that matters: an Omelas refrain, for Cameron's Aliens—one that excludes what it abjects and rapes during mirror syndrome at its core, but already having raped the white aggressor's entitled mind to see everything as a giant massive threat it is paradoxically superior to yet threatened by! "Must defend my pussy and Civilization's 'womb' from the black rapist Archaic Mother's stinging ovipositor!"

(exhibit 47a2c1: We've already discussed Cameron's Black Queen and her role in settler-colonial worship as a kind of endless "whipping post" re: "[On Amazons, Good and Bad, part one: Always a Victim," 2024]. All the same, Cameron's Amazonomachia is very Freudian, dog-eat-dog [if the dogs were black and white] and concerned with monarchal regressions to embrace without irony [Cameron's own tokenized, white-and-cis supremacist Numinous closer to any imaginary British Romanticism birthed in America than he probably cares to admit; i.e., the White Queen vs the Black Queen, Ripley playing fetch with a female T-Rex wearing an African tribal mask, above³⁸⁷]. Classical art generally relegates women to the status of virgin or whore.

*Tokenizing and impersonating other oppressed groups is not good stewardship!

A Māori word used to describe non-Māori people, but generally in reference to white New Zealanders; it isn't a slur any more than "gringo" is or "gaijin," but white people don't like to be "othered"—i.e., called "cis-het," "white," or otherwise not recognized as being of the in-group in some shape or form.

Yet, a cis woman in canonical Gothic fiction is usually a special kind of either type: a damsel or a demon; i.e., Lambert's nerdy wallflower or the chaste battle-nun that is Ellen Ripley. In the case of the latter, she's monstrous-feminine by virtue of being "man-like" but not a man, yet also not the demon hunting them [meanwhile, Lambert's dainty swooning is the end of her]: the whore, she-warrior and female demon all part of the same monstrous-feminine equation.

To this, Ripley is also a fledging detective and warrior debutante—the "Battle of Britain" housekeeper carried into outer space, looking after the company's chateau by investigating Ash the perfidious servant and not really in the mood for being fucked with by her bosses or the xenophobic caricature. She eventually blows up the castle because it threatens to eat her as much as the monster does, except she remains haunted by the possibility that she and it—the sodomite gargoyle—might be alike. Society demonizes both as monstrous-feminine, but Ripley is the blue-collar curios who doesn't really fit in. She's "just there to work" [the Protestant ethic] ...until the pirate queen shows up and Ripley—sensing a promotion [in Aliens] takes personal responsibility to a whole new level [versus scuttling the craft and the cargo, in Alien, but ultimately having to tango at the end in that movie, anyways: abjecting settler colonialism in ways that are just as conservative as Cameron's]. She also self-defends, the detective

Like Alien before it and its own hauntology's "Egyptology" lying in state, Cameron's remediation is well-documented; i.e., Medusa was Cameron's queen, too—one whose capture in clay was aided by his own team of white wizards (Stan Winston instead of Giger). So did Cameron collar Medusa just like Scott did, but went on to pointed a gun at her in the process: holocaust by bullet and trial by fire, fetishizing the process and making the Numinous "walk the plank" (a capitalist refrain), ad nauseam. They aren't criticized for what they make, but celebrated for furthering the process of abjection through the Numinous/ghost of the counterfeit: quest, discover and dominate.

treating her inner damsel [or a nearby ward, like Jonesy or Newt] as precious cargo that must be defended at all costs; i.e., from her own abjected sins tied to empire. It's regressive to a Pavlovian, hauntological degree: admiration for the superhuman "soccer mom" doing whatever it takes to defend Civilization from a Black Menace, mid-Red-Scare/Satanic Panic [all under the shadow of Zionism, but I digress].

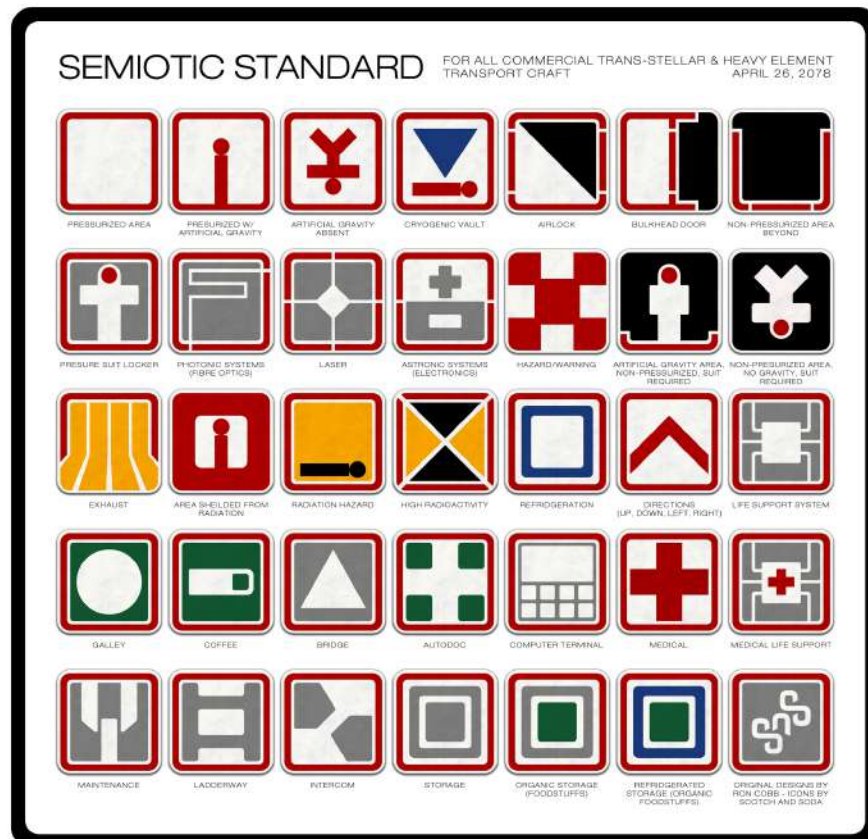

The xenomorph, meanwhile, becomes the moving-target Creature to feature, who eventually leads Ripley to weaponize her survivor's anger against an imaginary foe that could be inside anyone—in a phrase, persecution mania. Ripley becomes a monster cop, turned "undead" and "demonic" through her chasing of the skeletal black dragon as a biomechanical spectre of systemic trauma she can never kill: "Out, out! Damn spot!" But the "bury your gays" crusade carries on, rooting out corruption and the forces of darkness as potentially fascist and Communist [until future defense of capital redivides the stigmas, aggregating for the state against labor each and every time]. It makes for generational trauma that, sure enough, the elite will use to keep us divided, pitting different prison gangs of different privileges and oppressions against each other for profit; i.e., by denying Medusa cuddles, sex, and any other kind of intimacy humans take for granted, but also keeping Athena isolated and longing for love. It's a dog's breakfast, presented as "cuisine" [or the "Meow Mix" logo from Rob Cobb's "Semiotic Standard"³⁸⁸ alluding however accidentally to Soylent Green (1961) but I digress].

³⁸⁸ A word of warning, Alien's symbol for hazard is, in our work, a symbol for Purina "Cat Chow" pointing out how the elite are the aliens alienating us; i.e., locking us in a box, and watching the Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

Instead, the state monopolizes connection inside its own concentric prisons; i.e., you can have as much as you like as long as you police it "among your own kind" and war against other gangs. This means female biology as alien and token/target as a matter of demonic interrelation with other similar out-groups: non-white skin, Pagan religions, queer expression, neurodivergence and the mentally ill, sex workers, the elderly and disabled and anything else that can be criminally fetishized and exotified. It's the opposite of intimacy but remains darkly buoyant/magnetic.)

In true Radcliffean fashion, the Alien franchisement of damsels and detectives are always white functioning (and generally white-appearing Final Girls unless tokenized by white men, or made by token directors, below). The archive is both fabricated, viral and haunted by actual fascism in various cartoons; i.e., which hungry eat the fattened-up, for breakfast, onstage and off. This speaks to the duality (and black humor) of such things, mid-liminal-expression:

In short, we can learn a lot from studying older artists' derelict mysteries (trade secrets); i.e., not just how to make monsters, but to speak in code/inside jokes that switch/shake things up to our universal liberation, hence benefit. Few films are as universally celebrated for their artist craft as Alien—with Cameron paying his own tribute to not only try and one-up Scott in that department (and fail miserably 'cause he sucks), but also do his own spin on settler colonialism (the American way). We have to do better than both men, but also their legions of fans and imitators, mid-cryptomimesis.

the elite will dangle in from of us during Medusa's testimony leading not to reparations or land back, but assimilation fantasies from marginalized groups; e.g., AvP's (2004) "Zulu Hotep" nonsense, or more recently with Fede Alvarez' own Alien pastiche, Romulus (2024):

(exhibit 47a2c1: In a Marxist olive branch, Alvarez' movie initially alludes to Mary Shelley's earlier black survivor's testimony... only to sweep it under the rug/deny genocide, past-and-present;

i.e., through a Trojan Horse of Americanized Cartesian force, and whose forced ambiguity [a problem since Shelley] they further complicate using not one, but two questionable servants!

One, Rook, is a literal carbon copy of Ian Holm's digitized likeness, Ash, and the other one, "Andy," is a Tinman savior for the functionally white damsel in distress; i.e., when the movie forces her to play the role instead of the detective Amazon with a gun. All of this of course hints at oppression, but leans into killing Medusa when Medusa shoves her "eye of confusion" right up in our Ripley clone's grill, telling her "girls shit" [spectres of Radcliffe]. Scar[r]ed for her life, the new debutante looks away in anticipation of intense rape and cannibalism... only for Andy to predictably swoop in, at the last second, using the White Man's gun to save his chosen belle/beau from almost-certain Nazi-Communist/Indigenous conversion therapy [a black men punching a non-white non-man for trying to using the white drinking fountain instead of the "col*red" one, in the Jim Crow South]! "My hero," indeed! How we want for one without tokenization!

However compelling or enticing the Amazonian drama seems through its emotional-sexual appeals, its praxial crux operates on keeping the detective functionally white with a token black male simulacrum's help; i.e., will he betray his childhood "of the people" friend to help Ash's duplicate achieve immortality for settler colonialism in space? No, he won't! But by that same token [so to speak], Alvarez has Andy submit to the white girl as knowing better than him—the two of them bargaining for her to liberate him from corporate bondage... only to be returned to bondage under her care; i.e., as made that way by her father having salvaged Andy from older "corporate models" built for the frontiers.

In short, Andy's a "house negro" and the heroine is literally his owner who chastises him through force [the ghost of the father literally occupying Andy's mind/programmed to tell dad jokes]: female Gohan with Black Goku the Amazing Robo-Dad telling her to kamehameha wave Cell from Another Hell.

Humans are reflexively idiomatic. You're welcome.

Of course, allusions to Asimov are bad enough all on their own, but the narrative arc—however emotionally sweet it seems on its face—is intensely problematic; i.e., as it abjects genocide through a neoliberal, corporate-owned damsel-to-detective bildungsroman concerned with the legend of Rome's construction [which Romulus and Remus point to] as having a "litter of runts" fight over scraps: a pecking order within labor [slaves fighting slaves]. The outcome to such sibling rivalry's controlled opposition is diegetically decided by Dr. Light's "Roll" taking a "Black Rock"/Mr. Rochester under her wing ["Reader, I assimilated him"]. Doing so puts the heroic mantle back on her shoulders; i.e., to investigate, thus solve everyone's problems, Nancy-Drew-style.

And while it's admittedly fun to dissect such stories to find allegory we can use, we're at a stage when we need active informed resistance among the cryptonymy process [and for anyone worried about that, the genie's already out of the bottle, Pandora out of her Box. No? Just tell me how the state will counterprotest the Gothic's sex, drugs and rock 'n roll—by making it illegal? That would go against profit. And even if they did, how would they police it to any degree of efficacy?].)

"The idea has become the institution. Time to move on." Having outlined the white female predatory angle, I'd like to proceed towards escape from them and Capitalist Realism through Medusa; i.e., as something to "puzzle over" regarding worker liberation using damsels, detectives and demons, ourselves. The rest of "Giger's Xenomorph," then, will consider the process of abjection through Neo-Gothic detectives as part of Cartesian thought, followed by Amazonomachia, cryptomimesis and mise-en-abyme before concluding with furies and ultimately Giger's puzzle of "Antiquity" straight from the horse's mouth. As we do, it remains vital to remember how the development of Gothic dialogs is not an automatic, instant process (reverse abjection or otherwise).

Note: The rest of this section is as I wrote it, in April 2024. No more close reads, just covering our bases (scoring for Communism)! —Perse

Warnings carry in echoing code, insofar as monopolies are impossible and the Gothic is always out-of-joint. To see that, you need only consider damsels, detectives and sex demons, their proliferation having taken centuries to arrive at where it currently is under Capitalism; i.e., a "pandemonium" of ritualized torture expressed in oppositional forms (the clichés and fetishes of the Gothic mode) for which the xenomorph is queen. Left behind during a praxial "seesaw" by those who make them, these derelicts (and their ontological role of exposing systemic trauma in a voyeuristic manner) still exist side-by-side in dialectical-material strife; that is, once abandoned, their shared language can be rediscovered, thus taken up by new oppositional forces during fresh Gothic poetics modeled partially off older structures and explorers, but—like synapses firing rapidly—communicate old issues that travel like lighting through oscillating dialectical-material (and social/collective) emotional/sexual tensions. It is not enough to call something "monstrous" or "alien," then, but doing so regarding a Cartesian structure to describe in either direction: the state vs nature (thus workers) insofar as Medusa factors in.

Rape, including insertion of an unwanted foreign object—not a dildo by a friend, but bullets or knives during foreign holocausts (or something similar on the homefront; e.g., a rolled-up magazine by a false friend, below)—is a constant ubiquitous problem. It's systemic; i.e., a dogmatic imbalance whose perennial abuses of power announce through the very mode that, while it has the potential to address Capitalism-as-rapacious, also commodifies it when Gothic poetics are put in the wrong hands (and even in the right ones, you can't really speak to trauma without giving it a voice in some shape or form; e.g., Alien's own rape fantasies, while abject and brutal, still showcase a lot of persistent, unaddressed and ongoing British bigotries through a neoliberal critique that, while far from "perfect," still hits close to home).

To prevent that, you must throw the doors of perception as wide as possible—as mouth-like, ingesting through a medieval framing of the senses (re: a confusion of the senses, where "the eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen..."); i.e., that speaks to extreme trauma as notorious for "crossing one's wires." State abuse weaves a coercive, blinding spell of undeath, one that demands tough cryptonymic medicine (various blindfolds, minus the harm—an act of gained trust, not blind faith): fighting madness with "madness" that parses through play. So close your eyes, open wide and come to Mommy (but remember your safewords, of course)...

Bear in mind, while male detectives and warriors are a staple of the genre, we'll primarily be exploring how female and queer detectives survive male power while navigating it. This starts with the Gothic castle as Radcliffe envisioned it—a white, cis-het female idea of patriarchal menace to poke around inside, later explored and appreciated by other white, cis-het women in the 20th century and Internet Age that followed; e.g., Rachel Knowles, a self-confessed "committed Christian" who writes:

It has been said that every writer must first be a reader, and I have always loved reading. As a young girl, I was fascinated by tales of fantasy such as Enid Blyton's Enchanted Wood and wrote my own magical adventures – always with a happy ending. When I was thirteen, I read Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice for the first time. I fell in love, not only with Mr Darcy [barf], but with the romance of the Regency age [double barf]. Over the years, I have devoured numerous Regency romances – some good, some bad – and half-written several of my own (source: "A Regency History Guide to The Mysteries of Udolpho by Ann Radcliffe," 2013).

Except, queer people—while obviously different from Knowles—can still revisit and rewrite the same Gothic environment centuries after Radcliffe designed her own dated traps; e.g., her scenes of imperiled heroines threatened by in-castle rape as repressed; i.e., leaving them behind as "ancient" derelicts for us to find, explore and renovate when interrogating our own trauma as paralleled by old systemic threats: the rise of fascism (and token feminism) as something foreshadowed by Radcliffe's pre-fascist gloomth heralding 20th/21st century terrors (see: Nick Groom's introduction to The Italian). Our matriarchal, femme-dom castles (and their pastiches' remediated praxis per an ongoing and endless argument between workers and the state) can subvert those and critique patriarchal doubles (of doubles, of doubles...), but it must contend with them as part of a series of Borges-style projections into infinity (mirrors and labyrinths). That's what historical materialism is: a repetition of variable likenesses that grapple in dialectical-material tension. To go against the grain, you have to stand out while blending in:

It bears repeating that dogma is recursively cryptonymic and criminogenic; Cartesian dogma criminalizes nature, lynching it as fetishized alien chattel to repress genocide with; i.e., the run of the mill as paradoxically shown and hidden. The cryptonym "alien," then, become whatever the state needs inside its colony's state of exception. To that, recall how the same shadow zone is where Gothic theatre and poetics work for or against the state, oppositional praxis employing the usual paradoxes thereof; i.e., "total" power to perform with things existing in the same place at the same time, between binaries; e.g., the liminality of power and weakness, chastity and lust, salvation and damnation, light and darkness, Heaven and Hell, life and death³⁸⁹, nerds and sex, bravery and cowardice, stoics and histrionics, knowledge and ignorance, darkness visible, the monstrous-feminine, the state and workers, cops and criminals, soldiers and slaves, babes and banditti, citizens and aliens, Artemis and Aphrodite, childbirth and death, mothers and Medusa.

It's completely impossible, then, to reconcile and reclaim matricide through thoroughly liminal creatures like Medusa or the xenomorph—nor the damsels and detectives tied to them (and the complex, warring socio-material conditions that bring them about)—without keeping these various paradoxes (and profound, beauteous contrasts) in mind. Furthermore, just because death can be passionate doesn't mean humans should be sacrificed automatically to achieve presumed "grace"; more in this case isn't necessarily better and attempts to find meaning in suffering is certainly different than inviting it. One's graceful, the other is a disorder compelled by those in power over those they rape in a variety of ways (re: "to disempower someone or somewhere—a person, culture, or place—in order to harm them").

To this, trauma is an "antiquated" minefield whose exploration takes great work and care, but also persistent vigilance to thread: one, avoiding Cartesian dogma by expressing xenophobia as an honest interrogation of domestic bias (not an endorsement; i.e., being mindful of the people involved as having potentially experienced abuse themselves); and two, touching on xenophilia, ironic demon BDSM, and reverse abjection as taboo enterprises during ludo-Gothic BDSM, thus subject to reactionary reprisals arguing for violent repression: "Put away the torch from Alien (the British word for 'flashlight,' which the "improvised incinerator units" primarily function as) and pick up the gun in Aliens. 'This time, it's war!'"

Except Cartesian thought weaponizes women against nature (and the monstrous-feminine) while still treating them "of it": "Rip and tear until it is done!" But it's never done; matricide is a fool's errand, an impossible task on par with killing death and one that never ends by design as required by capitalists—i.e., to move money through nature by having Ripley (or echoes of her) further subjugated, hence regressive Amazonomachia in their name. They want marginalized conflict, which is both profitable and useful (for them, mind you; everyone else suffers at their expense). So Ripley is always afraid under Patriarchal Capitalism, thus Realism; rape is always a threat, and Medusa always a victim³⁹⁰

³⁸⁹ Life and death can mean different things depending on context. For example, "money" literally equals "life" and its absence equals "death." This is a deliberate paradox forced upon people by capitalists to destabilize them and make them worship American virtues that uphold Capitalism as eternal, thus slip into apathy and disdain for anything else; i.e., Capitalist Realism.

³⁹⁰ Despite Medusa's loud refusal to be a victim, as Creed argues, I argue how the state will do its best to reduce her to one anyways—to can(n)on fodder and token biznatch sucking on Freud's wang (as Creed kind of does: "Oh, Freud, you scuzzy otter, you!").

whose existence—per the process of abjection—is terminally mythologized: her touch poison, her serpentine gaze pure, instant "death."

Amazonomachia, Cryptomimesis and Mise-en-Abyme

Thusly armed, Ripley becomes afraid to hug Medusa, thus nature, as divided from her. Per the Amazonomachia as a theatrical, staged ordeal, she and those like her become foils to a classic argument; i.e., one where Ripley does stochastic terrorism for the state (through fatal compromise, arguably protecting the company by scuttling the xenomorph for them). She looks at Stompy and sees death, an alien/dark reflection to ward off through violence (which fractures the glass when struck). As such, she becomes "unsexed" like Shakespeare's Lady Macbeth; i.e., a phallic woman, except Ripley's case involves multiples of them, the so-called "good" Amazon dick-measuring against an evil double GNC BBC. Threatened, Ripley fights ignominiously for the ghost of her dead child, who she projects onto Newt while cannibalizing the Alien Queen's brood for one of "hers" having falsely "killed"³⁹¹ Amanda: "...Come, you spirits / That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here, / And fill me from the crown to the toe top-full / Of direst cruelty!" Ripley suitably binarizes, defending the nuclear family model as the false original under attack by the Indigenous group (and their non-nuclear approach to social life) coded as outsiders, as alien, as inhuman bugs "from the stars," Hell, beyond, the black lagoon. Instead of trying to love them, thus hug Medusa, "difference" becomes a death sentence: "Nature is other" as carried out by a token female war boss who the company displaces after she cleans house for them (re: the euthanasia effect).

Emboldened to "strike back," Ripley picks up a state-issued repeater (some kind of rifle to treat enemy populations³⁹² as target practice) to dutifully enter Hell again (though she never entered the Derelict in the first movie, making her testimony to the board in Aliens hearsay); i.e., a token Persephone monomythically shooting at "Medusa" with relentless military optimism: a predatory cop with death in her eyes, and whose lack of empathy is second-nature, taught by deceitful mirrors. "Maybe if we kill enough of them, we'll 'win' the war!" her actions seem to say. "Maybe then, 'Medusa' [code for the empire's built-in disparities and collapses, translated into monstrous theatre] will disappear for good!" She's a crack shot, better than the boys—Annie Oakley playing the Amazon. She's also a dumbass, a vengeful herbo with hell to pay through a death wish. As a matter of childbirth (the classic site of war for women of Antiquity as a Western civilized venture; i.e., where canonical history starts and stops, the great thing for fascists to return to), Ripley's war story is harmfully antiquated, in that it endlessly and concentrically leads to women's enslavement, to genocide, to tokenism taking up fetishized, witch cop arms against those trying to live in peace: other witches.

³⁹² Which, per settler-colonial exchanges like Vietnam, work through collective punishment; i.e., all civilians are enemies; e.g., all Gazans are Hamas. These conduce genocide on purpose.

You might have noticed a worrisome and disturbing likenesses of Ripley in adjacent media forms; re: Samus in the videogame, Metroid. This is because settler colonialism is built to spread its dogma across all the media it can, escalating towards extermination from an initial position of ostensibly "being wronged." Be it a novel, movie or videogame, the exterminator then goes into Hell, monomyth-style, to right said wrong and defend Capitalism from the "end of the world" at the "end of the world"; i.e., Capitalist Realism; re: "Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth- like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms [...] Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force..." (source). It's meant to appear chaste, but make young boys' "tails" wag like a puppy's for a modest warrior mommy (and girls' clits to throb with a similar second wave feminist power trip punching down at useless eaters³⁹³).

We've looked at this quote earlier in this section, but will return to it fully in "Call of the Wild," part one; i.e., when we take a second look at the franchised videogames that Cameron's refrain inspired to execute Cartesian rhetoric and uphold Capitalist Realism: Metroid and Metroidvania, but also Doom and the entire shooter genre. For now, just remember that Capitalism is a hyperobject that demands a holistic, inclusive and cryptonymic solution—mirrors and blindfolds being the source of the problem, which must be addressed in kind. We must mirror our problems in ways that sneak in Trojan counter code (drawing our own conclusions).

As such, try to remember nothing is wrong with wanting for heroes under settler-colonial conditions provided it doesn't poach nature for profit. Doing that serves the state by making children afraid, who then grow up to commit atrocities for the state as instructed by its war simulators' cartographic refrains: trophy rooms like the one described by Ace Ventura in When Nature Calls (1995) as "a lovely room of death."

³⁹³ Re: through animalized violence against nature; e.g., vampires as "rats" to exterminate out of the medieval period's sublimated dogma; i.e., these days with Zionism and second wave feminism run amok and other tokenism, "rat" is just vermin to exterminate by in-group and in-group tokens, the former keeping the latter "on leads." As such, vampires are both cis gay men, trans people, anyone non-white or non-Christian (e.g., "bad" Jewish people; i.e., non-Zionists), witches, and so on; i.e., "useless eaters" the state punishes while saying, "How dare they eat our cheese!"

That film portrayed settler colonialism as a backwater relic attached to a cartoonishly evil (thus unserious) British throwback; Aliens did the same through a bad replica of Saigon in outer space showing and hiding Vietnam to further Capitalist Realism as a burgeoning videogame simulation type. Both show that settler colonialism survives well into the present through deliberately antiquated forms whose displacements generally apologize for ongoing genocides; i.e., the ghost of the counterfeit as something to meet with force, thus blame and kill Medusa for her own death by the state as a chilling matter of routine:

Ellen Ripley once said, "I say we take off and nuke the entire site from orbit." The words of a true madwoman, isn't that what America has been doing for over seventy years now? Military optimism, as I envisioned it ("The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," 2021), is the idea that you can kill your problems, somehow "slaying Medusa." But you can't kill Medusa because her life-after-death persona represents things that aren't people, alone; they're structures and the genocide they cause seen in the final moments of the damned. Theirs isn't a question of blind faith towards a self-righteous cause, but conscious conviction towards a cause that is just. [...] Like Medusa and her immortal, severed head, Bushnell's doom isn't something the elite can ever hope to control because it reverses the function of terror and counterterror normally envisioned and entertained by Western dogma; i.e., vis-à-vis Weber's monopoly of violence and Joseph Crawford's invention of terrorism, but also Asprey's paradox of terror as a proletarian weapon in a postcolonial age informed by past struggles surviving under modern empires (source: "Bushnell's Requiem").

So when Hippolyta beheads Medusa, the colonized are policing themselves through someone half-in, half-out of their world: a white woman faced with rape, but whose experiences invert the settler-colonial violence routinely happening around her sheltered bubble. War propaganda routinely disguises and abjects this fact by whitewashing genocide in a canonically essential conflict; i.e., by reducing genocide to "destiny" between two "ancient" perpetual foes: Ripley as the good mother beheading the bad, defending good nature from bad, good children from bad, etc (she doesn't even kill the Queen, because the xenomorph can live in space).

In other words,

People in the Imperial Core like to think of themselves as just, forgetting what death is while being born into a system that encourages it through the very divisions [Cartesian thought lays out]. They don't like to be reminded of those shadowy realities, which Medusa's beheading shows to them beyond the cave-wall puppetry they're used to. Turned back at them through Athena's Aegis, and exacted on "one of their own," they're forced to see, thus process, the very horrors they spend their entire lives abjecting (ibid.).

To this, Ripley's brute Americanization is both a matter of national pride³⁹⁴ and one whose dated regression is the prime witch hunt we've been considering here as a multimedia pandemic. We need to scrutinize its retro-future neoconservatism (the return to war and peace through strength) to understand the New World Order as it presently exists; i.e., doing so as critics of the state by using

Gothic counterterror to defend ourselves with; e.g., by dressing up as blindfolded monster mothers like the xenomorph. The proletarian function, here, is clemency before attack—to reclaim their value as not being a rapist, uniting arm-in-arm against state forces. This requires hugging Medusa to shield her during asymmetrical warfare; i.e., from a subjugated Hippolyta armed to the teeth—a TERF champion backed by TERF supporters, backed by TERF central command as part of a fascist federation: America as the harbinger thereof when Capitalism, always in crisis, starts to rot. The decay on the xenomorph anisotropically doubles Ripley's own rotting brain ("the one you feed" fed on menticidal garbage).

Such "human tanks" are generally blind. So pertinent questions like "How reliable is their vision?" or "What privilege are they armed with?" become incredibly germane to Gothic-Communist aims when faced with echoes of Ripley in real life (re: Jadis telling me "They're just bugs!" regarding Aliens' self-confessed Vietnam allegory). To that, the examination of perilous worlds and closed space inevitably requires some degree of non-trivial/ergodic effort to overcome and survive; i.e., vis-à-vis Aarseth and me, regarding Metroidvania, through liminal, Gothic circumstances that perform the context of rape, bigotry and systemic fear/control, mid-castle-narrative; re: during ludo-Gothic BDSM considering things to interrogate "within the text" as a poetic extension of the natural-material world we (unlike speedrunners) take outside of itself to critique capital with.

Concepts like "familiar" and "foreign," then, do not exist in a vacuum, but inform each other back and forth over time. Said extensions include the damsels, detectives and demons inside a Gothic space as produced by the knowledge or lack thereof contained within the author(s), which—as we've seen with Radcliffe and her refrain's spiritual successors—were/are far from perfect in terms of highlighting worker abuse outside of white, cis-het women's concerns voiced during rape pastiche. Indeed, some might prohibit effective investigations altogether (re: Ripley evolving into an automated killer for the state: the modern woman as savage, projecting her bigotry onto imaginary Indians, space bugs, what-have-you).

To this, the state's monopoly on damsels, detectives and sex demons is, like all its overreaches, something to challenge through itself. Per Medusa, our reenactments must become increasingly sex-positive through iconoclastic, xenophilic means drafted by queer authors beyond cis queer men like Lewis; i.e., whose various cryptonyms reverse Hogle's process of cryptonymy—its "double operation of revealing to conceal"—that consequently lays bare settler-colonial bigotry during a revolutionary masquerade designed to hide us: among those we can unmask, Velma-style, as not on our side (re: TERFs and other tokens). This happens by first showing them our masks as a means of reconnaissance and provocation—of class, culture and race war as guerrilla warfare waged with Gothic poetics (counterterror a famous "shadow weapon" of guerillas, vis-à-vis Asprey). Point in fact, we must; i.e., doing so to adequately serve all workers effectively and collectively through a mirror match's shared canvas (or stage, screen, etc) as mirror-like. With it, we can help others see, if not permanently then at least for a second, what is useful to our survival of them; i.e., by putting something inside their blindfold that stuns them long enough for us to act: to "pants" them and tie their shoelaces together before we make like a tree and get the hell out.

Just as Ripley punches the mirror of her own dark reflection during mirror syndrome, the key to liberation lies in reflecting the right images back at our killers—themselves, acting like an emotionally/Gothically unintelligent dumbass, but posturing as "cultured" against other prisoners abstracted "in small"; i.e., the Amazon's threat displays kettled³⁹⁵ by state dogma until they explode, resulting in a never-ending crusade against "Medusa" during DARVO-grade obscurantism/reactive abuse (nature to rape with money expressed in military means). It might seem cute when animals do it (source tweet, pro824824824: September 6th, 2016); the state breeds bullies meant to kill their victims through Amazonomachia as mimetic³⁹⁶ and inclusively divisive.

³⁹⁵ This kettling takes many different forms; i.e., birth trauma, raped by the state taking control away from them. Rape, then, is abstracted to displace accountability away from institutions and onto scapegoats (which is also rape); re: Ripley is the scapegoat. The xenomorph can take these disparate factors and weave them onto the same punching bag. As I write in Volume One,

To this, Cameron's Ripley was always a TERF Amazon, a phallic woman playing Brutus putting "Caesar" [corruption] down by abjecting white fears of medieval human childbirth [and the hysteria and humiliation of state-compelled birth trauma—of placental blood, amniotic fluid, slime and involuntary shit] onto alien bodies, biology and compelled reproduction metaphors forced away from Western powers and onto the Archaic Mother as a settler-colonial scapegoat (source).

³⁹⁶ I.e., Amazon subjugation is mimetic. As "hoakley" of the Electric Light Company writes; re:

Once white-men-on-white-girl violence, then, the message has evolved to white-girl-on-black-girl violence, but also white-girl-on-trans violence (and other marginalized groups) where various token monsters join the fray to uphold normative status-quo structures and heteronormative ideals (the slave falling on the Roman sword):

(artist: Anselm Feuerbach)

Military service and its token normativities are always a betrayal because the state is straight/antithetical to life as we know it; i.e., is a bourgeois power structure whose cops destroy/rape nature for profit (or do so to protect itself from Western powers; e.g., Communist China and Soviet Russia; re: "Leaving the Closet").

Per my expansion of Castricano's definition, cryptomimesis is writing (or otherwise engaging with) the dead as expressed through art, demons included. The idea in doing so is to get at the cryptic, generational trauma buried inside Faustian bargains during Promethean Quests; i.e., as something to extract and use as workers demand. Yet "inside" is a bit of a misnomer, insofar as trauma carries across its surfaces, between its spaces, behind its masks, and on its pages, etc. Indeed, we can see the conflict as a visual pattern able to be levied by pro-state or

Unfortunately, there's confusion as to just what the Amazonomachy was. Some associate it with the ninth labour of Heracles, others with the battle between the Greeks and Amazon forces led by Penthesilea during the Trojan War, and others with the Attic War resulting in Theseus abducting Hippolyta as his wife. I'll consider those in tomorrow's article, but today look at a more general war resulting in the deaths of many Amazons when they were defeated by a substantial Greek army, possibly long before the war against Troy. A reasonably popular theme in painting, even to the present, its most practiced exponent was Peter Paul Rubens, who is attributed two paintings on this theme (source: "Amazons at War," 2023).

pro-worker artists, authors, actors, etc; e.g., my book and its various collage-style exhibits (all starting with my Bride of Frankenstein collage, exhibit 44b2).

Except, workers must beware the state as a bad actor with a bad temper and army to carry out its petulant will. Like an unruly child breaking its toys, the state infantilizes mid-crisis to attack its perceived subjects; its legacy is one of total indifference and unironic madness, a prolonged and unnecessary suffering predicated on cruel, callous abuse made to serve profit through disingenuous illusions. In response to its crowning achievement of misery towards workers, women and nature/the monstrous-feminine, a mother's work is never done. It carries on precisely because the future is always threatened by the state's imaginary past: something that survives and which we must survive while blindfolded; i.e., surrounded by danger as "dressed up" in cryptonymic reenactments that a) elide trauma and b) help pass vital³⁹⁷ messages of liberation theatrically along.

As per the natural world, the two are actually in competition; i.e., in Gothic stories per the puzzling "antiquity" of Alien, they involve two castles—one of metal and one of dead bones and flesh—that serve as giant, doubled, suspiciously humanoid habitats that mirror a larger transition between the colonial past in faraway lands and its zombie-demon rooster's homecoming. Information, then, passes through giants, castles, humans, mirrors and monsters, their modules, etc, as poetically indiscrete.

Volume Zero writes, "To interrogate power and trauma, [we] must become second-nature" (source). Just as the Imperial Boomerang comes back around, then, so does the cryptomimetic language being for or against it as something to meet with violence or friendship. For us, the knee-jerk police agent's chase of imperial scapegoats only leads to inequality and harm. Instead, empathy towards the alien must become second-nature on a collective societal level; i.e., through ludo-Gothic BDSM (from Volume Zero) as gleaned from medieval conflict in small: the mise-en-abyme, or concentric echo of the internal/external medieval.

³⁹⁷ Revolutionary cryptonymy as necessary because, as Volume One writes,

So, while "Rome" absolutely gargles non-consenting balls, it's completely inadequate for Gothic Communists to say that "'Rome' sucks and so do Capitalism, neoliberalism and fascism." That won't work. Not only is it stating the obvious, but far too many workers defend marriage, war and the state itself as sacred (source).

As such, Hippolyta and Medusa (or modern doubles/copies of them like Ripley and the xenomorph) are canonically sacred, insofar as the latter's ancient matricide is sanctioned in the present by the former working for state forces, mid-copaganda.

(source: Bushcraft Buddy's "How Did People Survive Castle Sieges?" 2017)

We've already discussed (and showed) how it's acceptable to get swept up in and carried away by mise-en-abyme and its castles-in-the-flesh; i.e., as something to literally look at yourself as trapped inside. Like Walpole, Scott's retro-future is full of dark infantile humor and medieval hauntologies they lose themselves in to find hidden truth. Except different fortresses take on different shapes, and I'll show you how with an extra bit of academic flourish (nerd time, for the next seven pages. Then we'll close things out with Giger).

For one, Scott and Giger's biomechanical makes no qualms about introducing a medical, memento mori flavor into the proceedings. Such composite evocations of the ancient/medieval remain "novel" purely because they raise honest-if-haunted statements about oppositional praxis as violent on and off the page for various sides; i.e., the state colonizing itself and we, as colonized, "storming the castle" as a linguo-material device useful to emancipation. This war of illusions has a long and rich history going back centuries; i.e., back to our boy Horace Walpole and his Gothic shenanigans (castles, of course), which Scott and Giger riff on/rip off in their own 20th century take on the Neo-Gothic castle/chronotope.

Far from being modest or direct, a given chateau evokes Walpole's campy rape space as paradoxically recent: a puzzling relic of "Antiquity" made from past legends and bandied about as discovery-after-the-fact. That's largely what the Gothic is—a speaking to present barbarities with "past" ones disinterred—but its assorted reinventions and façades still use the language of war through body language that wages campy assaults into hostile territories; re (from Volume Zero):

The mise-en-abyme ["place in abyss"] is classically portrayed as heraldry—the coat of arms, as per Bakhtin's "dynastic primacy and hereditary rites" of the Gothic chronotope—emblazoned on the knights' shields, banners and killing implements belonging to the same "walking castles": castle-narrative becomes something not just to walk around inside one castle, but between castles, outside of castles, inside the giant knight as a castle-in-a-castle; straight castles and gay castles, etc (source: "Interrogating Power").

Viewed as workers (the monstrous-feminine) vs the state (the Man, Cartesian thought, law and order, the Man Box), the iconoclast must work within said abyss to develop Gothic Communism, thus end setter-colonialism; i.e., by using what we have as reclaimed power from canonical doubles to camp canon with: the nerdy language of rape and war (sex and force) as something to spoof and use to our weird nerds' holistic advantage versus weird canonical nerds disadvantage!

The Other Side of the Coin: Camping These Things (reprise)

Canon and camp is a tricky process, and one that occurs inside itself. Per Sarkeesian, it's possible to critique what we enjoy to consume. By extension, I think it's perfectly valid something to kick ass and merit critique (which Aliens admittedly does); i.e., the thing that's fun to critique but also consume, mid-critique, like, Egger's 2022 The Northman, versus the thing that isn't fun to critique or consume; e.g., Hitler's 1925 Mein Kampf or something equally dry and terrible.

So much race science is dry and terrible, but Aliens strikes the dangerous white-moderate balance of actually being fun to watch, making it more important (and fun) to critique, thus camp! And that's not hard to do; i.e., you can camp offshoots of the same Numinous, me having camped a variety of gods and monsters through my own horny Samus and Amanda Ripley artwork. No bullshit, just draw an Amazon with a gun doing something sexy and sex-positive, and you're golden:

In the counterterrorist tradition, you create said advantages using what you got, resulting in bizarre combinations that—per people running around inside giant monsters chased by smaller monsters—feels suitably silly-serious. Per the Shakespearean stage, this means combining what is queer with what is medieval, thus warlike and gory in frankly intimate poetics indicative of a pre-capitalist world (also from Volume Zero):

It's serious-yet-silly and that's the point, but the point of the rainbows and glitter is proletarian praxis insofar as we function during oppositional praxis: to make the canonical language of war silly in a very gay way of interrogating pre-existing power and negotiating new variants during liminal expression; i.e., playing with power as a performative scenario to reinvent for various purposes:

"The straight castle was conquered by the fearsome gay warriors and everyone inside was made gay and had super butt sex. —the end!"

The above statement implies that murder, general mayhem and rape are functioning in ironic, playful forms instead of their presumed unironic-thus-literal ones: the rape of the princess, the burying of the gay (and other actual dead bodies—often "innocent, pure good" civilians and "guilty, pure evil" orcs on either side), and sacked castles razed to the ground, heads on spikes, cruel-and-unusual punishment, carceral violence, tilting at windmills, etc:

The townspeople had little hope
 They were not ready for war
 Fireballs make everybody die
 And buildings collapse to the floor
 The beautiful princess was raped
 And taken to prison with cry
 Angus McFife swears a mighty oath
 "I will make Zargothrax die!" (source: Gloryhammer's "The Unicorn Invasion of Dundee," 2013)

There's power in the "joke's" ability to release tension. Except our praxis can't be "blind" parody like Gloryhammer is (whose proud stupidity is a white, cis-het male privilege) because the marginalized are going to be in danger regardless if they are actively segregated or not (ibid.).

Overlap and confusion are inevitable, but also vital to liberation through the cultivation of perfect doms flexibly putting us (and our foes) "to the sword." Viewed in terms of the castle personified, one could thus view warring castles like those in Alien—not merely as linguistic, ontological strife (doubles) grappling forcefully amid contested, troubled binaries, but something to express in literal kayfabe terms (again, "a form of ancient popular media that helps people historically relieve systemic stress through individualized forms of psychosexual violence").

To that, the monsters Hippolyta and Medusa act akin to warring kaiju or the Titans of Greek myth; i.e., when the boundary to Hell is crossed on Earth, between the contestants, the stage(s) they share, etc; re: during liminal expression, onstage and off. Either entity use their assorted "arsenals" to do battle not unlike Gojira (1954) or Pacific Rim (2013), the latter two taking leaves from older Amazonomachia before commenting on (and wrestling with) Humanity's messy and fatal relationship; i.e., to nature, but also technology abusing nature (vis-à-vis Shelley's Frankenstein)—as something that responds in kind, but remains for the human detective or damsel something to demonically reckon with, prior to state shift: "History shows again and again / How nature points out the folly of men" (Blue Öyster Cult's "Godzilla," 1977).

Except our own castles-in-the-flesh are the monstrous-feminine body as a kind of perfect dom challenging the zombie of "Rome" resurrected; i.e., the gentle femme/mommy domme³⁹⁸ for workers vs a strict state dom; re: the Metroidvania as something to personify and sing about, thus make matriarchal through function: "That lady's stacked and that's a fact!" In keeping with our previous adage, "when the Man comes around, show him your Aegis," we're speaking to something Bruce Lee might call "the art of fighting without fighting³⁹⁹" and which a murderous message disguised in comely-yet-potent packages does our talking for us: the booty as symbolic of the cryptonymic surrendering of power assigned to nature as both female and monstrous feminine extending to all bodies, genders, races, religions, and animals/nature-at-large exploited for profit by the state.

To that, sometimes, a butt is just a butt, but a butt can be beheld and take on new meaning anyways. Some stories resist interpretation on purpose—e.g., Coleridge, which is bad, or Lynch, which is also (sometimes) bad—but we can still camp them; i.e., however we want. However ambiguous The Northman might feel to Atun-Shei films, for examples, he presents breaking the Fourth Wall to quote Marx and spook the Nazis off as kind of silly ("I Didn't Like The Northman Very Much," 2024). I heard that and was like, "...Why?" It never stopped Shei from dressing up as a Nazi to then camp them and speak critically about Civil War history (while getting lost in the sauce a bit, sometimes). Why-oh-why not quote Marx by writing his campy echoes all over our own ass cheeks as an antidote to Eggers' inability to do anything substantial with his own creative talents (similar to Scott and Cameron)?

It likewise signifies a "cheeky" (meaning playfully-to-seriously "insincere," as Harmony is, previous page and next page) "surrendering" of power that goes both ways per multiple actors working at cross purposes under different scenarios (consent or coercion), but also a single person's psychomachic hesitation; e.g., by the usual conqueror seduced by nature, but also vis-à-vis Luce Irigaray⁴⁰⁰ as someone desiring both genuine nurturing and sincere surrender of one's station(s) of power foisted onto them by state mechanisms; i.e., they are told to kill and destroy through "ancient" mandates, but cannot always bring themselves to "slay the pussy" as indicative of nature's historically raped womb.

³⁹⁸ The female gendering of "dom"; I'm trans and confess I use them interchangeably. You can bill me.

³⁹⁹ From Enter the Dragon (1973).

"Rape" camps rape as, so often, a duplicate of a duplicate of a duplicate; re: exploitation and liberation share the same shadow zones but work at cross purposes during liminal expression's paradox of rape to have the whore's revenge by reclaiming terror roleplay to liberate ourselves from Capitalist Realism; i.e., ogling "rape" or giving it, mid-voyeurism and -exhibitionism, is completely fine as long as there are quotes (and we fan ourselves, suddenly thirsty for a bit of pussy and/or pounding): "See how she leans her cheek upon her hand. / O, that I were a glove upon that hand / That I might touch that cheek!" (source).

As such, power becomes like Medusa—a puzzle, meaning something to perceive and perform in ways that challenge its usual operations through willful paradox: the escape of rape through "rape" in highly theatrical forms abstracting "decapitation." We've mentioned Alien, of course, but this applies equally to our own art as extensions of our bodily rights and labor autonomy regarding what Descartes would call "emergent," hence abject. "Is that a booty I see before me?" This one claps back, a real power bottom; but like Medusa or any such collective or individual treated like her—e.g., orcs, lizardmen, "mud people"—she won't bite unless you scare her or bite first (and even then, context matters; i.e., a testament to her own rape as healed and invulnerable through resistance, so keep resisting: the moment you stop is the moment they fleece and destroy you)!

So don't scare her! Treat her like a person, not a sex object⁴⁰¹ to ultimately collect and unironically mistreat (which Cartesian thought logically pushes towards through its steady arguments for nature-as-monstrous). Fuck her how she likes, then offer her a hug (or whatever aftercare she's comfortable with, so make sure to ask. She might surprise you). To replace genocide demands holistic understanding regarding unhealthy and healthy boundaries, alike; then, respecting the latter as a means of communication and mutual consent rewriting the former on the same old canvases cryptonymy process—not abjection as second-nature, time and time again! Reversing abjection, then, must become second-nature in its place; i.e., happening through praxial synthesis using ludo-Gothic BDSM's dualistic double operation.

⁴⁰⁰ "Irigaray ultimately states that Western culture itself is founded upon a primary sacrifice of the mother, and all women through her [...] men are subjects (e.g., self-conscious, self-same entities) and women are "the other" of these subjects (e.g., the non-subjective, supporting matter). Only one form of subjectivity exists in Western culture and it is male" (source: Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy).

⁴⁰¹ Sex workers are human, having to deal with material concerns affecting their mental health. It's often forgotten through double standards that people who meet traditional beauty standards are just as much disadvantaged by meeting them as not; i.e., they "can't" be depressed or have worries because "pretty privilege" or "life on easy mode." Such bad-faith arguments present a so-called

Easier said than done, of course. Settler colonialism relies on fear-and-dogma brain drains wrought through various cartographic, but also imperative refrains (like Radcliffe's) dispersed far and wide: "You exist because we allow it, and you will end because we demand it!" (so said Sovereign, in Mass Effect—the Reapers a displaced anxiety of settler colonialism at home). Its cruel penchants prescribe division to further states of ignorance the elite can manipulate to move money through nature in perpetuity!

The point of the "antique" puzzle box, then, isn't what's said, insofar as aesthetics are shared anisotropically between warring dialectical-material poles, but rather what they're made to accomplish through use, thus play. Proletarian function serves to accomplish the liberation of nature, Medusa and workers from the state's awful blindness/curse of death (class dormancy through stochastic terrorism); i.e., by using the human body during ludo-Gothic BDSM as a present appeal to power through damsels, detectives and demons. By speaking truth to its inherent, ongoing complexities in effective-yet-poetic forms, Medusa becomes a death and rape fantasy to playfully evoke whatever is required to pull down harmful barriers, teaching our would-be killers to see us as human and them as not; i.e., as equal to them while relieving stress as something that lives in and around the human body.

In acts of giddy and reckless triage, proponents for the equality of convenience love to plant flags and "win the war" in single, comfortable battles: propaganda victories (e.g., Ripley nuking Hadley's Hope from orbit). Except, the individual elements of total solidarity don't matter provided they're total and made to holistically invoke radical change sooner rather than later. It's a group effort and

"baddy" as unfairly and untruthfully "high-maintenance"; i.e., slaves to their own beauty and conventionally chased down to be slated for the usual enslavement: compelled marriage. It's a gift and a curse, one that such persons and their SOs (significant others) must negotiate, working together to make love (and its educational symbols) less compelled/dogmatic and more empathetic.

context matters, insofar as two actions—or symbols of those actions—can appear identical, but function for or against the state behind the immediate image and/or sound (and other senses). True liberation hinges on global contributions from all walks⁴⁰² through united subtext and steady follow-through; i.e., those whose cryptonymy (and other Gothic devices) collectively make the elite (and their proponents) decidedly uncomfortable when facing death as a settler-colonial result; e.g., furies (next page) as pervert, mega-faggot stewards of nature but also representatives of it haunting the colonizer, Banquo-style (a nymph of Dunsinane, left)!

(artist: Adam Cyrus)

From the Horse's Mouth: Furies and Giger's Puzzle of "Antiquity"

In essence, we're forcing them to "hug death" through nature as monstrous-feminine—undead, demonic and animalistic as the xenomorph and Medusa are. Nebulously. As TERFs and their dogma demonstrate, doing so happens through the topos of the power of women reclaimed by a modern GNC movement in ways that second wave feminism will call "enslavement" in bad faith. Fuck them. If confidently showing our powerful "Aegis" (and her "fangs") over the Internet (a buffer) causes the would-be colonizer to have a change of heart and consequently start treating us as human wherever we are, then honestly more power to us! But just as empowering is knowing who our friends and enemies are from a relatively safe vantage point. If they lash out, we'll at least know who we're dealing with before meeting face-to-face.

⁴⁰² Meaning "cosmopolitan," or in settings that encourage "worldly learning" as a means of establishing important social-sexual bonds; i.e, crossing boundaries during adventures that, in my experience, lead to potentially life-long connections but also sexual escapades; e.g., Zeuhl: giving me blankets when I had none, leading to sex; sexting with me until I told them to come inside, whereupon they came in wearing a black dress but no panties and we fucked; and another time where they walked in right as I was cumming (masturbating with the door open). They broke my heart for incredibly selfish reasons, but changed my life for the better while exiting it: as a ghost that haunts this book. Me letting it stay is what I call "forgiveness" (though Zeuhl might object). And me making friends with Crow, Bay and Harmony Corrupted, among numerous other muses and sex workers (re: "Acknowledgements"), is what I call "the best revenge." Fuck you, Zeuhl!

It's worth noting that face-to-face interactions and expressions of sexual confidence are often kept separate; re: the buffer of exhibitionism as something of an iron wall (to borrow ironically from Ze'ev Jabotinsky—though it's more bulletproof than glass) in defense of workers outing fascists behind masks of our own; i.e., by "flashing" an aspect of themselves to identify as-is in defiance to their colonizers (which we'll discuss more in Volume Three, Chapter Five in "Transgressive Nudism; or, Flashing Those with Power"). But there is no "perfect" protection of those who identify with nature from those who see nature as alien, thus are conditioned to confront and destroy anything akin to Medusa.

For example, Bluefolk the furry was attacked by virtue of them being different (source tweet: March 6th, 2024). As their testimony shows, there is always some degree of exposure and risk by being out of the closet, even when separated by glass, a screen, space and time.

Furthermore, nude or not, workers communicate with some people up close in ways utilizing personas that often work as literal masks being part of their broader identity—furries.

I can't even begin to explain how scared I am after tonight. This evening when I was on a walk while it was getting dark on a pathway not far from my house, a guy came up out of nowhere and threatened me with a knife... It's all a blur to me now and it all happened so fast but it was fucking terrifying, he was a bigger build and I think he thought I was a cis female at first because I was wearing a skirt and then when he saw me up close he called me a tranny faggot. When I tried to get away he punched me really hard in the face, hitting my nose so I used my hands to push away the knife, cutting up my hand all over and barely grazing my face. I FUCKING RAN HOME as fast as I possibly could. When I got back my roommate took care of me and I told him what had happened, he cleaned me up and just... I'm still so fucking shaken up. I'm okay physically for the most part, my hand is still in tons of pain but nothing is broken. Mentally though? I'm just... I don't even know. I'm still processing what happened. No one should ever have to experience something like this.

We'll talk more about furies, in "Call of the Wild." Just know, that praxial catharsis is had through confrontation of generational harm during calculated risk, often through animalized signs of dominance and submission that double as (a)sexual signs of theatrical friendship and hostility during class, culture and race warfare; i.e., "mooning" through one's ass to show as a welcoming act of solidarity and defiance depending on the circumstances (the "flowering" vagina where men/tokens came out of and, in psychological models, will return to die when their power fails them; but also simply belonging to people who don't even identify as women). Like trauma and stress, then, power is stored all over the body⁴⁰³ but speaks to where ⁴⁰³ Power stores in the ass, but also between those who own and respond to the ass; i.e., the ancient tradition of artists and muses, humans and animals; e.g., Harmony and I making an ode to their ass (re: "Haunting the Chapel: A Cum Tribute to Harmony Corrupted," 2024) that, per someone like Keats, speaks to an imaginary ancient goddess of nature reviving old forgotten bonds with life and death as alienated from us by capital. Glimpsing their ass, this footnote leapt to mind...

Whatever its form, the divine when glimpsed becomes something to live up to and quest for in future outings; i.e., like the Numinous—mighty and out of reach, but something immense and mysteriously tremendous to reconnect with, bringing us closer to a forgotten side of ourselves. This state of grace (what Rudolph Otto called torpor or "freezing" in the presence of the divine; i.e., the classic Gothic oscillation, trapped between a state of fight or flight, fear or fascination, dread and delight, etc) is difficult to reach, and falling short from it is disappointing and painful; e.g., my Clifford bag puppet in Mrs. Quilter's third-grade classroom failing to turn into the actual Big Red Dog (I was traumatized). It is both deeply serious and absurd, something to relish and lampoon ("a deeply religious experience" accounted by someone profoundly unreligious, even back then). It's also an idea to "get" and fuck with; i.e., as one desires, those being piloted by internal and external forces—less to escape life and more to find something transcendental inside our lives. It's not like there's a Heaven afterwards; these are things we live in now (operatically inside-outside danger discos).

Like a sudden thought to write down or fleeting burst of inspiration (a course that, like a spirit, flows through us, coming and going in an instant), such ideas become something to capture or lose (slipping away like a ruined orgasm). For something to be novel (fresh) requires capturing a sum beyond its parts in a given time period. The Romantics grasped towards nature as Sublime, and the Gothic seeking the Numinous as combined between nature and civilization as alien, exquisite—a vast, liminal, nebulous place to go and spend with mighty forces experienced uniquely there but, like a castle, is built and raised by us on Earth; i.e., across all media; e.g. Team Cherry's City of Tears or Red Hook's purple cosmic void as legitimate and effective as Kubla Khan's "stately pleasure dome," Radcliffe's spectral castles or Scott's Nostromo, etc. All came from dreams (or nightmares, per the Gothic) while awake—beyond the realms of death, of sleep, or any other barrier/membrane you could think/dream of.

And whereas gods exist in a place beyond humans, they're still experienced through special mediums with one foot in both worlds: "walking castles," fortresses in the flesh, but also artists who experience those bodies as fellow workers, artists, poets, and people, stacked without end. "The gods," then, are not beings whose meaning is "set," but reached for and decided by people together according to cultural standards enmeshed in larger artistic and social movements; i.e., current and borrowed from times that once were and could be, "back in the day"—an idea that springs from alter egos and secret identities, but also things wide out in the open for all to see. All constitute the weight of the universe whose proximity in an avatar of the divine overwhelms; i.e., makes us collapse, swoon, and yes, "die" (cum) to varying degrees.

tyrannical men's "power" generally goes: to their head, above or below (the "crown" a symbol of such gaudy consolidations). "She mighty-mighty!" after all,

Sex Positivity has been and is being written through these kind of surprise connections, each muse granting a thread to something bigger through their mind, body and soul as likewise connected to each other and things we make up ourselves—our combined pedagogy speaking to (and with) trauma, forbidden knowledge and power as, like the gods, profoundly unequal but shared if we let it. "I am a bearer, I am a dwelling!" Like Bay and my other muses/friends, meeting Harmony inspired me to create things I could have never imagined had I not met her first and basked in her magical (and tremendous) glow. It was like touching lightning or seeing color for the first time despite having done it many times before. "They're all perfect."

This book series, then, has seen many happy accidents, dares, risks, and chance delights, thus couldn't have been written alone. This includes the indelible-if-unintentional contributions of those who broke my heart (e.g., Jadis' immortal "put your mysterium tremendum in my Uncanny Valley!" and surprising helpful introducing of me to the Commodores' "Brick House"). I owe it, then, to Jadis and all the cuties whose bodies and personalities inspire and move me in such predictable and unpredictable ways. Regarding all of them, I suppose there's a medium in me, too: I see beauty and the gods in others, especially those Capitalism gentrifies and devalues for something where no gods live but immoral ones; i.e., greed; e.g., indifferent powerful doctors treating women like automatic mothers, thus automatic chattel who can be sacrificed spontaneously for the child as de facto property of the father, the hospital, the state as cancerous, terminal and yet still growing and devouring everything in sight.

I might seem mad* in this brief ramble, but perhaps that's just my humanity and "magic" that others have lost; i.e., the ability to see and relate to others as I have through careful education, hard work and an open, expanding mind? Devendra Varma likened it to a "Gothic flame" (from his 1957 book of the same name); without fuel, effort, and proper conditions, it can go out. My book is a castle, as I have said, but inside it a vigil I light to honor the gods I see in people like Harmony adding their castle to mine. They're delicious, to be sure, but remain so much more than pieces of meat!

Mad, as in a failure to partake of Capitalism "successfully" per its terrible, dog-eat-dog rules. Is this an accurate measure of my value? The Romantics "were poor all their lives but rich in spirit," Laura George once told me. And while I like to stay grounded these days in material reality and tend to be leery of those poets who don't quite as much, it can still be fun to swim around the self-same waters as they do/did. I certainly don't want to discount these older giants (or at least their shoulders I'm currently standing on). So while the Romantics and Gothic forked into wildly different paths, they did so while grasping at the same thing: liberation. And monsters are a place whose intersecting modules let you draw your own conclusions as needed, on and on, in repetition through variation, to author your own special destinies. Forward through solidarity is the idea of Gothic Communism, of course, but infinity fueled by profound human contact becomes actionable; like Percy's "Ozymandias," boundless and bare, the lone and level sands stretch far away. Dancing poetry trades arms with old turning ghosts out on the floor to varying degrees of structure and looseness. Per Scott, as we have seen, poetics and creation become a po(r)tent dialog to express the power of rebellion with; i.e. in an imaginary place of endless possibilities regressing to a binary pair of "what if?" that is neither here nor there. Creativity is a weapon when it becomes tied to a place where Capitalism was less strong than it is now, less capable of harm. "The mind is its own place"; so is inspiration, which—likened to a turbulent form—occupying mere moments, out from which we can change the world.*

In the poetic tradition, though, Harmony's ass does make me want to write a poem and this footnoted tangent is proof of that—a short, jumbled musing part of a larger castle showcasing what such exposure and inspiration can yield. It takes enormity and special perspective, but also inspiration to raise such spaces to be excellent. "I'm a Satanist," I told Harmony. "So when I say you have the divine in you, it's the weight and power of the universe." To borrow from Archimedes, I might have added: "Give me a lever and a place to stand and I will move the Earth." To borrow from my own book (from Volume Zero): "Indeed, that power can also be ours if we dare to write things down—to intentionally make monsters that camp canon and Capitalism to liberate sex work, thus all work, through iconoclastic art's deliberately campy 'darkness visible'" (source: "Notes on Power"). It's a legacy we make and share as one!

and trauma and power both live in and around the human body as expressed in the Gothic castle; i.e., as a matter of abjection, chronotopes, cryptonymy and hauntology generally working in concert during praxial synthesis as something to personify through collective solidarity against the state.

"Valor pleases you, Crom! So grant me one request; grant me [the whore] revenge!" In the end, the only things that matter are what we leave behind, for that aim: the statuesque pedagogy of the oppressed and its creative successes, the butts (or otherwise, below) of damsels, detectives and demons; i.e., "what we [make or summon] in life echoes in eternity!" A photo is really no different than a statue—our own "dead poets" speaking forwards helpfully when viewed backwards by future yet-to-die poets: "What are you waiting for, killer? Seize the booty's monstrous-feminine means of production (and clap my cheeks while you're at it)!" Anyone who thinks that sex can't help or hinder rebellion has never tried.

Where there is trauma, aliens also exist. To it, the Gothic works inside the shadow zone through paradox, using the likes of "Antiquity"—its magics, myths and monsters—to speak to the state's process of alienation as something to subvert and develop away from Capitalism during camp. To that, the state is not a universal proposition or monopoly thereof. In defense of workers against the state, I am a medievalist, arthouse nerd and freaky girl ("the kind you don't take home to mother!")—i.e., someone who loves words and wordy pulp like that of Everquest, Lovecraft and Bungie's Myth franchise—and this is what I shall be leaving behind: the serial codex of a nerdy intersectional bitch, showing how the delicious language of the past—a diet paradoxically rich and fattening (e.g., "a succulent Chinese meal!") but healthier because of the ingredients involved—as once used to liberate workers from tyranny. May it do so again, enriching monstrous expression through "ancient, medieval" forms of Radcliffe's refrain, the demonic trifecta; i.e., ambrosia as something forbidden (unreachable) and guarded but also expressed in Numinous stories, ranging from Ovid's Metamorphoses to Marlowe's Faustus, Radcliffe's Italian, and Shelley's Modern Prometheus into Alien into Metroidvania into my books and beyond (again, a concentric mirror).

As stated, humans are reflexively idiomatic, and anyone who tries to dictate this by trying to divide monsters from the sex and force they represent is doomed to be disappointed by harsh facts; e.g., girls shit, women aren't always "biologically female" and interracial sex is far more common a sentiment than bigots like to think it is, etc. Whatever forms we encourage, we choose to invoke because of the speculative richness (re: Norton); i.e., to resist Sandy Norton's 1994 "Imperialism of Theory" extending into what I'll call "the Imperialism of Gothic Poetics and Sex Work." There's tremendous power in sex and force via monstrous-feminine expression; so de-colonize that by showcasing that monopolies are impossible—re: by outing bigoted weirdos through their own self-reporting moral outrage at seeing Medusa walking out and about, at the grocery store. Do it, and expose anything that becomes "holy" to the point that it tokenizes; e.g., write "Obama was a war criminal" on your ass cheeks, then get "back-shotted" by a 6'4" trans woman while Gil Scott-Heron's "The Revolution Will Not Be Televised" (1971) blares in the background. Outta sight!

Of course, this flourish probably seemed overly poetic and confounding for its own sake of skinning a cat multiple ways (to those who might whine as such, I direct you to please lick my hairy taint). Fret not; it serves to illustrate a historical-material fact: inherited confusion and negotiation with said confusion ("When in Rome..."). Confusing poetics aren't impotent because workers and the state survive in conflict according to how they normally talk: through monsters, sex and unequal power exchange as poetic, borrowing from the imaginary past as a murky sphere of tremendous influence (and fun). To that, workers must poetically outlast and outwit the state's idea of them as "structurally perfect" for purposes of settler-colonial exploitation coming from a combination of the street and the art studio (with bits of academia thrown in, to give things thesis) section named after him with; i.e., his ghostly obscene art surviving the man himself:

For one, this is Giger's creature itself as evoking older things, still; re: "Antiquity." The xenomorph is, on some level, absurd—a creature of vast darkness, former interconnectivity and total chaos; i.e., dynamic and alive yet slowly walking around like one of Walpole's portraits or suits of armor might: not static and frozen, but impossibly "alive" and vast, productive, everywhere, a smaller castle inside a bigger castle primed to explode (denoting the home as a dying organism we're trapped inside). Haunting the tableau (a remake of Strawberry Hill, with more industrial grime), it's perfectly still yet in motion, coiled like a spring and hunting like a shark out for blood. But it just wants hugs, a past alien severed from the present world. To meet it halfway is to collide with the whole out-of-step, out-of-time; i.e., what Blake would call a "marriage of Heaven and Hell" as illustrated by the trippy expanding of the mind through profoundly dangerous reflections: the acid-Communist consumption of forbidden substances (ambrosia) that juxtapose awesome contrast, which many poets (and their ostensible drug use) have repeatedly reached for and performed in their work; re: those mentioned in our previous footnote, but also many more; e.g., Goethe's Egmont (1788): "Himmelhoch jauchzend, zu(m) Tode betrübt" (source).

Again, it's a classic Gothic puzzle borrowed from pre-capitalist/medieval thought reimagined in a serialized poetic trend that Giger was adding to with panache; i.e., looking backwards and proceeding forwards through a malleable, writeable Wisdom of the Ancients that takes everything into itself and makes something powerful (and honest) that cannot be dominated by state forces. That's what the creature is/the castles are—spectral, deathly evocations of a world before Capitalism, thus possibly one after it; i.e., death-as-radical-change. We can reunite, thus use something so awesome (and forgotten) to help liberate our minds from Capitalism and its barriers towards a post-scarcity world; but, again, it will be a shock—medieval, foreign, alien, abject.

Just as a patient is like a corpse under the surgeon's knife, the idea of the home and the human share this unsettling distinction. We must occupy it as a particular kind of surgeon and corpse: a love doctor whose wild surgeries—similar to Giger's drug-fueled, psychosexual art—play passionately in a field where "death," "rape" and echoes of their unironic forms haunt the theatrical landscape.

For the likes of Giger, Shelley or Lewis, then, the wasteland is an "artificial wilderness"; i.e., one replete with a bevy of influential markers: displaced religious artifacts and miracles, classic poetic devices (oxymorons, paradoxes, and metaphors; e.g., gloomth, "sad cum," etc), wild sex (and rape) fantasies and porn clichés (naughty nuns, librarians, nurses) or action tropes (wagon chases, white weddings, duels at dawn), the same tired conventions⁴⁰⁴ and fetishes speaking to anxieties, calls for heroism and desires for assimilation (abusive, sex or action-grade jailor/warrior nuns), axioms ("love is blind"), temptation narratives, sexual tensions and courtly love, Numinous evocations, revolting artifacts, country wisdom, superstition (old wives' tales), sobering funerary transitional realities ("getting one's affairs in order"), etc.

In turn, all are revived in Giger's dystopic (admittedly art-house), Gothic-surrealist "lover boy" and other such revivals coming from what is, at the end of the day, a fairly medieval (and diverse) practice respected by poets, artists, theatre nerds, songwriters, film directors, burlesque dancers, staged wrestlers, videogame developers, and other assorted creatives, out of the past and well into the present (and frankly far too many to list). The Gothic, as a mode, is populous and rad!

⁴⁰⁴ Re: "[The Gothic novel] is understandably regarded as thin in more ways than one, as a stagey manipulation of old and hollow stick-figures in which tired conventions from drama and romance are mixed in ways that emphasize their sheer antiquity and conventionality (source: Jerold Hogle's "The Ghost of the Counterfeit in the Genesis of the Gothic," 1994).

Viewed in the present by those unaccustomed, it's bound to upset, overwhelm, shock and disgust. This includes things that, when examined more nakedly, seem to have no cause for it, but historically-materially lead to systemic brutal violence; e.g., incels shitting their pants and frothing at the mouth regarding female, queer and or furry autonomy. Such a shuttered existence is cloistered on both ends, then packaged and sold in harmful forms. But these authors don't hold a monopoly over such poetics. Those with "pull," then, can speak to the same theatrics in sex-positive, "homebrew" ways; i.e., divorced from the profit motive and its harmful formulas to say something that thinks outside, thus beyond, capital using Giger's xenomorph to be reflexively idiomatic in highly iconoclastic, Gothic-Communist ways.

For one, transformation, insects, buried guilt, queerness and death are core themes of the Gothic and the xenomorph encapsulates all of them; i.e., the becoming of something new tied to the imaginary past where things like rape, magic and systemic abuse are openly commonplace during calculated risk, but for which queer-positive language is always lagging behind in mainstream Western media (e.g., the moth, above: Silence of the Lambs, 1991).

Though initially puzzling and out-of-joint, Giger's eternal, hellish and trauma-infused brainchild is prolific precisely because its revelation invaded and spread through what, point in fact, was already present and coming back around, like Marx' spectres, to haunt us to no end: "Antiquity" as something to tap into and speak of in quintessential Gothic means that articulate messy difficult topics in profound shorthand; i.e., the abject, Numinous, unheimlich, terror and horror, etc, as established schools of expression, thought, and theatre that took quite a bit of time, energy and engagement to develop into themselves (from Plato's cave to Radcliffe's Black Veil and Baudrillard's hyperreality, etc).

As such, Giger's "Antiquity" is not unlike Medusa's anti-rape narrative, revived in Shelley's Modern Prometheus, except it speaks to something that also took time to become anti-rape in ways we currently take for granted; re: Elizabeth Hadley's 2024 "More than a Monster: Medusa Misunderstood" speaking to a creature that—while essentially damned at birth—was what future authors like Shelley and Giger used to give the oppressed another famous voice (for the whore's revenge) while commenting on deep-rooted patriarchal and eventually Cartesian paradoxes!

Part of this owes itself to death as a concept. Death changes people as something to face, thus enter and embody. Meanwhile, the xenomorph wears the aesthetic of death, but actually travels, communicates and reproduces like a virus; i.e., through psychosexual trauma as "built up." As always, the central idea in doing so remains emotional manipulation of the middle class; the question is, what does this manipulation serve? Communism wants to use it to leverage public sentiment in a pro-worker direction that respects nature: for the rights of all (not just token sycophants and false friends) to humanize "Medusa" as a collective entity under attack; i.e., human culture and the profound ability to create having learning from the past being a mighty weapon—fire from the gods, per Shelley—to defeat Capitalism with. We must, for it is (and has been, for some time now) growing like a tumor in the present to devour everything in its wake, for all time. If nothing is done now to stop it, the future for Humanity is well-and-truly dead, and Medusa—beheaded, furious and agape—with have the last laugh during state shift!

Imperiled by the state, Medusa in small—whether a person or a nation—must unite against state dictates (with queer people able to bond more easily thanks to the Internet, and by extension all misfits). Regardless of the register or the oddities involved, Medusa is someone or something who can bite to cause harm but won't if you befriend them, first (a trust-building exercise for those once bitten, twice shy). They may return the favor, using their body and mind's various means to help keep you alive—sex, of course, but also blood, sweat and tears, etc—by maintaining a healthy bond with nature; but you must stand with them against the state (whose ceremonial liberal tears shed to mask a bloodthirst and apathy to make fascists blush). It is our Song of Infinity to take up, then, because the state and workers (thus nature) are always at odds!

As such, workers help each other as animal, as alien, in whatever form is required (the xenomorph able to adopt any shape). There is no shame⁴⁰⁵ in parenting (to mother or father) in ways that have us working as stewards to Nature, and we sing to our needs (and hers) from moment to aching moment; i.e., as the struggle goes on, donating to it as much as we can give as negotiated by all parties, mid-duress. All go towards a community we find and make for ourselves as exiled people disillusioned from nation-state origin myths (re: Zionism); i.e., by the state-as-walled-off from the natural world through a nuclear family unit that dates back to Ancient Rome. Whereas "Rome" shames anything outside of its own divisions, my partner Bay represents a neat antithesis alongside the xenomorph as a kind of Satanic, hauntological totem animal (next page, exhibit 47a3): stability amid polyamory in ways my past partners did not, while challenging Capitalism as inherently unstable while pushing inexorably towards epidemics, climate change, and ultimately state shift.

Sharing is caring and doing so with Bay—a self-identified therian who identifies with natural species (again, next page)—makes me feel good; i.e., like I'm making a difference regarding someone I care very much about. We met through feral sex, communicating like animals and Gothicists to cruise and flash our loins and minds, then breed something special (and unique) together as a series of saucy creations: a veritable raising of flags, a bottomless cumdump whose pool we both gathered at to drink from and contribute to (taking from Giger what was useful and leaving the rest)! Delicious!

The xenomorph, then, is the Numinous/ghost of the counterfeit; i.e., an avatar that speaks, as the Gothic does, to a multicultural and multigenerational force viewed classically through a white lens on the Aegis as "dark"; e.g., the settler-colonial rape of nature by white female colonists who, staring down their ancestor's past atrocities, pearl-clutch with extreme prejudice during inheritance anxiety being reminded to them: "your empire is built on ceaseless predation." It's very medieval, wholesome and freeing because to look on it is to see the whole of the universe in an instant (re: Blake)—the perfection of a dark god closer to life and death as one, and doing as all demons do: giving us more than we bargained for to, suitably enough, set us free from state edicts (faced with that, Victor promptly crapped his pants and wanted to go back inside Plato's cave; i.e., to betray his own liberation; e.g., like Cipher from The Matrix, insisting "ignorance is bliss")!

become unpredictable and violent. "I know what an angry dog will do but never a scared one," Bay tells me.

⁴⁰⁶ When I was writing Volume Zero, Bay joyfully described Smaug to me as a "sassy little bitch." Rusek's hot take prefers a different kind, no doubt informed by a different time and flavor of nostalgia:

No disrespect to Benedict Cumberbatch and his take on Tolkien's dragon, but the original Smaug from the 1977 Rankin/Bass production of The Hobbit is a far more frightening villain to behold. CGI Smaug is just too slick and sophisticated, not to mention way too talkative. Animated Smaug is terrifying, thanks to the vocal talents of actor Richard Boone and the dragon's cat-like appearance, complete with pointed ears and long, sharp fangs. He also doesn't beat around the bush or bore his victims to death with long monologues. In the 1977 version, Smaug is an intimidating businessman who, having spent centuries acquiring wealth and real estate, realizes what's at stake when a crafty hobbit comes barging into his lair and moves quickly to eliminate his competitor. Cutthroat business dragon trumps suave manicured dragon every time (source).

Maybe they're a dog person (so Bay, to be honest)? A stance remains something to identity with and around performances as of "their time" but also something to inject a queer reading/appreciation into.

In turn, this applies to those living with trauma and identifying with nature as being "inside-out," wearing it on their sleeves. This is generally a consequence of trauma, but can become a conscious identity to communicate with others who share our cause. It's also a message of a better world, one felt through bodily autonomy and psychomachic accuracy during ludo-Gothic BDSM as conveyed through one's own body [and labor] as the exhibit; i.e., informed by never-living examples like Giger's biomechanical xenomorph that, nevertheless, spring to life and give us fresh power during our own pedagogies powered by the restless dead..

Fueled as such, Bay isn't my "Great Destroyer" at all, but my luck dragon—pure dog and loving and sweet, but when cornered and threatened by state dickwads, their body and tongue will—suddenly like the xenomorph's spear-like tail and mouth-inside-a-mouth—expertly and instinctually transform into weapons: a Māori golem's beautifully dark kiss of death controlling the situation, and whose function is dual insofar as it wags to its friends and strikes its enemies stone dead. "Brain stab! But not before we hypnotize you! Smooch, smooch, smooch [what my mother used to call 'the kissy mommy monster' as she blew us kids kisses and chased us, squealing with delight, around the house]!"

As you can imagine, this oxymoron is both useful during legitimate self-defense from actual abusers—a prey animal shifting between displays of fight, flight, freeze, flop or fawn—but also a potent and delightful, psychosexual means of play and performance; i.e., between cuties that help the two of us heal together while interrogating generational trauma [thus relieving stress] as lovers, friends, and companions, using our natural "toys" [or sex toys mirroring them] as serving a dual cryptonymic type: classic BDSM symbols of power and resistance black and white halves seeking to reunite, Skeksis-and-Mystic-style.

As de facto educators, though, we also can decide what to exhibit as a means of good sex education through Gothic poetics, during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., what is safe and what isn't through dialectical-material context, including what we like inserted into us and what objects of insertion we have to work with. The bashful and prudish might see our display as compromising and uncouth, except it isn't insofar as we choose to reclaim the object of a hateful act by seeing it as liberating for us; re: "Art is love made public" and the xenomorph is basically Whitey's idea of a pissed-off "lawn [space] jockey" come home to roost. But love is also a battlefield littered with Gothic potential that lives within us as shared with the external world: the horny horror story a song of our people to pass on for its Numinous effect!)

Regarding blindfolded love during the cryptonymy process, the xenomorph is blindly furious and erotic, but also speaks to an ongoing and confabulating amalgam: of statuesque, repressed bigotries (re: Radcliffe) frankly exposed inside recursive Gothic reinventions hauntologically celebrating genderqueer xenomorphic expression; re: the mysterious mother as monstrous-feminine, bound and gagged, yearning to be free, brandishing her obscene, penetrating tail and long phallic tongue as suffused with trauma, but also tough-love infusions of exquisite "torture" and gender trouble's appreciative peril defying total control/obedience from colonizing forces: "Look upon your work and despair!" Thus are the wages of sin commodified and policed by the state!

By comparison, the power to hurt but not harm is BDSM (demon or otherwise) at its finest; i.e., the respecting of the sub by the dom, but also respecting the dom and sub in oneself and in others. Just as the mind, body and their historical-material markers are not discrete from each other or pure imagination, they rely on context to determine their half-real sex positivity or lack thereof in rape/"rape" as something to wrestle with and out of people during popularized dialogs; e.g., heavy metal revivals: prone to reanimate and decay!

In short, it's the usual Gothic tradition carrying Medusa into the future to liberate the oppressed as doubled by unironic state proponents; i.e., illustrating mutual consent through reclaimed devices like the xenomorph that once were (and still are) used to enslave them: "I'm in 'danger' and I like it." Call it junk or pulp fiction, because that's basically what it is; but its wicked semantic wreckage also is what people eat and enjoy as not automatically being tied to capital and profit.

Instead, wicked communion with the Dark Mother (and her assorted Numinous spaces and personas) becomes an effective, time-tested means of containing and passing vital messages along. In short, we can reclaim our trash, too, and reanimate it to serve our needs when society becomes sick—junk food for the brain, microwaved chicken soup for the soul that isn't some franchised corporate logo doubling as a cryptonym for widespread genocide and complete environmental destruction (e.g., McDonalds). Alien—like the monster that bears its name and lives in its titular, body-of-a-giant castle, is less concerned with quaint, cheap morality and more with exposing tough secrets through freezing as death-like and delicious: the sarcophagus ("eater of flesh") and its hot allostatic load, palimpsestuously revived in chase of the Communist Numinous!

As we previously established, some Gothic outings fail to stick the landing. Alien does not; greater than the sum of its parts, its diffuse, abject commentary on monsters and motherhood, dreams and lullabies, strikes an excellent-if-nasty balance between the Ancient Romance and the ordinary novel, the real and the imagined, to highlight and isolate the mother as a historical familial-heroic unit complicated by generation trauma, mid-rememory; i.e., one that—as flesh (Ripley), circuitry (M.U.T.H.U.R. and her disembodied, sedating voice echoing the female radio workers of older American wars), and predatory combinations of those things (the xenomorph, but also Ripley preying on the Queen's "bastard, illegitimate" children⁴⁰⁷)—travels through the public imagination: to the living from the dead and back again. You not only can't kill Medusa, but she never shuts up!

Such things speak cybernetically through trauma as undead, demonic, and chimeric/animalistic—all flowing across and through a series of texts all thinking about (monster) mothers; i.e., in ways that offer up/comment on Gothic poiesis (and taboo subjects like infanticide) across space and time: Freud's 1922 "Medusa's Head," Otto Rank's 1924 The Trauma of Birth, Scott's 1979 Alien, Nintendo's 1986 Metroid, Barbara Creed's 1993 The Monstrous-Feminine, my 2021 "War Vaginas" and ultimately this book series, from 2023 onwards.

For all its violent posturing in heteronormative canon, then, the xenomorph's fabrication and mystery of "found Antiquity" by Giger shares in this same scholarly lineage; i.e., its endless natural-material cycle of death and rebirth, embodying death-as-queer being something to face and puzzle over by others, but also proudly own, worship, and celebrate to reverse abjection by us from Radcliffe's refrain as camped accordingly: as damsels, detectives and sex demons, inspiring them to do the same! "I have the weirdest boner right now!" speaks to "BDSM as 'other'—but in space" ("some horrible dream about smothering⁴⁰⁸"): inviting rebellion by playing with rape in ways that evoke seriously awful things, then—as Shelley did over two centuries ago, and which Giger happily continues—lets us choose to make friends with the Creature... unless it's the actual fash bad actor aping our own "alien mil spec fetish gear" pastiche ("trust but verify")! Punch Nazis, kids!

⁴⁰⁷ I.e., displaced infanticide, the mother betraying her sacred Western role as validated during settler-colonial projects when performed against state enemies.

⁴⁰⁸ Giger's xenomorph and its Gothic surrealism is for De Sade what Mary Shelley was to her husband and Lord Byron; his Lovecraftian homage (the 1975 Necronomicon alluding to that author) camps Nazis and fascinating fascism—i.e., by swindling the bigotry out of things and replacing them with a "Goya" counterfeit that is oddly freaky and loveable. In turn, Scott's Alien returns some of the stolen Victorian terror antics, but includes bondage (choking from the facehugger), discipline (chain of command, through the ship's officers), sadism (a ton of murder and gore, but also tokophobic rape), and masochism—everything previously discussed, and live burial, to exquisitely "torture" the middle class' inner freak, but really any freaks from all walks of life (and death)! To be queer is to be what the fascist will try to infiltrate and assimilate as formerly taken from the Third Reich's rotting corpse (e.g., Berlin's gay bars built on top of the ashes of Hirschfeld's Sexology Institute). So embrace chaos and punch up against all traitors (e.g., Zeuhl—more on them, in a bit)!

As something GNC workers inherited, the xenomorph is our organism to decolonize since the 1970s; i.e., "perfect" for us because it's not restricted to, or invested in, Freud and his dated, wacky psychosexual models seeing "chaos as female" (on par with Francis Bacon calling for the penetration of Nature's womb a "worthy" goal of science). Because of this, the creature's dereliction of "Antiquity" remains entirely unafraid to fuck with the likes of Freud or anyone else; i.e., doing so in order to better speak to the needs of queer people and their allies by camping Freud's coke-addled ghost a bit more than Kristeva did (from Volume One);

Creed's characterization of Medusa is post-Freudian to some extent. Again, Creed stresses the weapon-like power of the Aegis as a means of paralyzing men, but leaves much room for improvement (re: my thesis quote, exhibit 23a) insofar as Marxist, intersectional solidarity is concerned; i.e., seeking to explore cis women beyond their universal portrayal as victims in Western canon (source: "The Basics of Oppositional Praxis").

i.e., to win critical power through Gothic thrills that seem "empty" apart from scaring the fearful-fascinated (and hopelessly straight) middle class, but also give us Gothic-Communist revolutionaries a voice in the bargain: one to sue for peace but also, as we shall see, rebel against the state with. "You can't challenge norms without angering folks," says Beat. "Just gotta make sure the right people are getting angry"; i.e., the oppressed baring their fangs; re: "Thou called'est me a dog before thou had a cause / But since I am a dog, beware my fangs!" Medusa isn't a little bitch; she'll tear your face off and eat it for breakfast!

Sometimes threats displays are necessary to get your point across, Medusa using them to defend herself as the Gothic's mysterious mother. In turn, rebellion (and cryptonymy as part of that) are required when society becomes sick (which it does when Capitalism routinely decays).

Then again, we've already discussed the concept of the home as sick per the unheimlich (another Freudian staple). Except in medieval thought, the house is also a metaphor of the mind and body as indiscrete—its rooms, halls, doors and windows—but also passed down as such, mise-en-abyme. Like a castle "in small," it passes from one person to the next, each story's castle-narrative piloted by a different hero blazing the same-old dualistic trail; i.e., the castle as a traveling "liminal hauntology of war" serving as data storage whose corruption, the ghost of the counterfeit, is something to bond with, not reject; re: by hugging Medusa as the data, a walking fetish golem speaking in Numinously demonic runes. It's giving away state secrets and guarding colonized lands from colonizers (the gargoyle a classic guardian, similar to the Golem of Prague; i.e., the guardian of a dark church/forgotten city forbidden to trespassers... and leaving a trap less disguised as an S.O.S., and more the Indigenous luring the colonizer to their doom across the chronotope's space and time; e.g., from the mining exhibition stumbling upon the old ones/shoggoth to the space truckers seeking out the Space Jockey and the xenomorphic cargo it hauled, once-upon-a-time; re: fire of the gods)!

In doing so, its ensuing and yawning entropy represents the hero's mind and body while inside-outside the monster (the invasion of the Nostromo by the xenomorph turning the ship into the Derelict from earlier in the movie); i.e., the damsels and detectives confronting repressed external elements as, themselves, "ancient" and derelict demons: a disease also contracted through accident of birth, insofar as the thing that appears human (the resident and residence), but conveys occupation by something that isn't what it should be and seems to say it; e.g., Howard the Duck slowly sitting up and saying to his petrified comrades, "I am not Howard anymore!"

In Gothic stories, this madness isn't so much a purely psychological condition, but more a theatrical, dialectical-material one that accommodates a variety of sides to the human condition as ever unfolding across and into itself again; i.e., during the xenomorph's biomechanical liminality as turning into a ghost version of itself across new encounters: the ghost castle, ghost ship, and ghost people. Their combination conveys itself in popular socio-material forms leaning into the sex demon's reflexive exchange of said spirits; e.g., clothes, music, and various other dramatic devices (often romances but also comedies; re: Howard the Duck, 1986) that appear as regular social-sexual events; i.e., demons, the undead and animals as housed, for which a composite monster like the xenomorph makes up all three; re: the labyrinth, from Radcliffe onwards, as a classic cryptonymic storage site for such abominable otherings that speak worryingly to us about ourselves stamped with old repressed traumas that haunt the land—a process of endless re-exploration that never ends!

Per ergodic motion/castle-narrative as exemplified by novels, movies and videogames conducting the same basic safari—re: At the Mountains of Madness, Alien, and Metrodvania—the idea isn't to escape the labyrinth at all, but to find radically transformative truths hidden inside the home as occupied by strange defenders; i.e., the xenomorph as concentric, sedimentary and parthenogenic per larger dialectical-material arguments about consent (with sex [and its universal alienation/fetishization] being a driving force—to liberate or enslave, mid-fetish). In written cultures, arguments are defined by what they leave behind as an extension of spoken words and lived realities. This happens like the human brain does, jumping around in segments using waypoints that avoid unicursal paths.

Like a mind in small, then, such places (and their doubles) relay complicated information, insofar as conflict is always part of the equation. They evoke the synapses firing in a masterful, inspired mind, yet is not paradoxically something for which we are always in control/without brain damage; i.e., chasing down private horrors, whose "secret sins" Walpole's Mysterious Mother described as "[an] untold tale, that art cannot extract, nor penance cleanse." But it can lead to fresh, astounding conclusions per cycle; i.e., whose powerful feelings joust back and forth⁴⁰⁹ in acts of rememory concerning what is forgotten but can return as alien.

To it, each time is different, or can be, depending entirely on the visionaries involved and their states of mind when the thing is breathed once more into existence: Giger's creature looks different each and every time, as do the damsels and detectives finding its "ancient" derelict and trembling before the horse's mouth (a nightmare): "I saw a furry and swooned because I'm white and basic!"

(artist: Henry Fuseli)

Through conflict on the surface and within thresholds, the hero—be they damsels or walking suits of armor threatening to ravish them⁴¹⁰ during ⁴⁰⁹ Re: Radcliffe's productive observation, "the first expands the soul, and awakens the faculties to a high degree of life; the other contracts, freezes and nearly annihilates them" (source). She preferred terror and its exquisite "tortures," to be sure, but her gay adversary Lewis showed us that horror and freezing are equally potent (a concept we explored extensively ourselves in "Paralyzing Zombie Tyrants"). Why not both?

medieval evocations of courtly love—embodies the potential to serve the will of workers or the state. They aren't something to get attached to, but change (shapeshift, like a demon) as required during class, culture and race war!

In short, we have to learn to evolve like the xenomorph does, which means admiring the very things that Ripley—a middle-class white woman with a relatively cushy job (within a neoliberal hauntology warning against what she would do to protect said job)—chose to abject and immediately attack; i.e., as an unironic TERF symbol acting as "a [state] survivor unclouded by conscience, remorse and delusions of morality" while attacking us "degenerates" as the dehumanized targets for her ancient warrior's detective doggedness and wrath: the Karen who burned down her house—the labor camp built on the bones of dead lands—because she saw a demon, threw her lantern at it, and then tried to save her (admittedly awesome) cat (decisions, decisions...). Gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss (the company treating her like the madwoman in the attic, because she blew up their ship and said "the Devil made me do it")!

To survive weird canonical nerds, we must learn from the same past according to the transfer of these historical-material markers; i.e., as carried forward into future duplicates aping the past imperfectly to capture its praxial realities. As Scott shows us, this echopraxis' cryptomimesis needn't be exact; indeed, it can critique itself—i.e., through self-sacrifice of a perceived invincible or righteous character (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Choosing the Slain, or Victimizing the Invincible Heroine, in Alien: Covenant"). We can use this to our advantage provided we know what to look for and what to change to say something about our world in our own defense (as monsters like the xenomorph). Heroines are people, but they're also icons, thus manifest the potential for unironic calls to violence in canonical Gothic stories and interpretations; re: during witch hunts.

Seeing David get the better of the white women in that story—while making a zombie-demon dog who won't heel—isn't "all bad"; i.e., insofar as it represents some admittedly complicated developments regarding poetic worker liberations that challenge Capitalist Realism through Gothic Romance; re: from the Superstructure to the Base and vice versa, art informs, shapes and imitates life and death less as separate and more as fetishized and alien when reunited with as the Gothic does: "Gee, look what 'I' found—dibs!" (the disaster at Hadley's Hope also starting with a colony family finding a Promethean space and trying to loot it for a finder's fee, but also being sent out there on company orders through a chain of command going all the way back to Earth; i.e., which Cameron scapegoats a Wall Street yuppie with instead of Capitalism).

Our poetic transplants and their Black Veils must bear a similar influence through what we leave behind, albeit like Giger did; i.e., as having a postcolonial (and posthuman) potential that pushes towards post-scarcity in pre-capitalist "ancient" Romances. As a community we might not connect the dots this time, but those in the future might if given the same opportunity and lineage; i.e., as something to prepare for over centuries, from Walpole, to Lewis, to Scott, to me, to the next in line and the next...

We'll get to David and Daniels, in part two. In part one, we'll keep examining damsels and detectives of the Radcliffean sort (as closer in spirit to her "explained supernatural" trope), then segue back into those potentially magical demons they frequently have in their sights beyond Radcliffe's stories (either looking at them with a magnifying glass to scrutinize and "catch," or a rifle to fire bullets from into the monster). Weird attracts weird, and not all rebels or auteurs are polite or entirely sane, let it be said (I'm one for two there, I like to think). But it's precisely the strange temples⁴¹¹ they build to old forgotten gods, one whose giant bodies we currently turn to and wander around inside; i.e., following the ruinous, shadowy echo (and its funerary narrative of the crypt's wicked and delightful curse of dark heavy knowledge) to our own tremendous conclusions. All are writ among the same stars.

"Like Communism," I write, "a Gothic castle is always incomplete, in continuum, but seems to suggest its full potential as a powerful, unmappable suggestion each and every visit" (re: "A Song Written in Decay"). Yet, this is hardly cause for concern; i.e., as Walpole or Giger's puzzles of "Antiquity" show us, that which is not dead (Communism) lives on—inside us but also eventually what exits and survives us after we die: beautiful graveyards to dance nightmarishly inside, their surreal, horny occupants waiting as if to ask, "Won't you join us? The night is still young!"

⁴¹¹ A Capitalist would build one to self-aggrandize; a Gothic Communist would do it to achieve post-scarcity by breaking Capitalist Realism.

"Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part one: Non-Magical Damsels and Detectives (feat. Out of Sight, Nina Hartley, Velma, and Zeuhl)

"...Schedoni would be the last among us so to trespass. He is one of the most pious of the brotherhood; few indeed have courage to imitate his severe example. His voluntary sufferings are sufficient for a saint. He pass the night abroad? Go, Signor, yonder is the church, you will find him there, perhaps."

Vivaldi did not linger to reply. "The hypocrite!" said he to himself as he crossed to the church, which formed one side of the quadrangle; "but I will unmask him."

—a lay-brother and Vivaldi, The Italian (1797)

Whereas part zero looked at damsels, detectives and sex demons per Giger's biomechanical xenomorph, and part two looks at magical demons in isolation while dissecting Radcliffe herself, part one shall inspect damsels and detectives, and features a wide eclectic mix of non-magical kinds; i.e., ranging from white cis-het female detectives and sex workers, to trans detectives investigating trans-on-trans deception and violence; e.g., J-Lo from Out of Sight and Nina Hartley the vintage pornstar for the first two (as detective and damsel, respectively), and Velma, but also doubles of good/evil Velma with me and my ex, Zeuhl, for the second!

I'll explain/signpost as we go. First, though, a little thesis work: As something to play detective with, the Gothic concerns unequal, at-times-painful power fantasies through investigation of the imaginary barbaric "past"; i.e., from past cross-sections of former "rape" victims, whose derelicts include golems, like Giger's xenomorph, as castles in small. Except, whereas state proponents fashion these abject symbols to reduce and control them in times of crisis (re: privileged, middle-class people spend to feel in control when the state manufactures crisis), we marginalized sex workers can apply the same principles of play and Gothic BDSM to speak to state abuse harming damsels and detectives being demonized: to gain a voice/foothold through the very things they're abjecting! If they act on these simulacra, they self-report and we're spared any actual harm (reduction and prevention).

That being said, there's still the power fantasy as traditionally arranged, viewed and consumed; i.e., men want power to kill monsters with impunity and women want power to investigate them with impunity (and dogwhistle to their owners for treats). The two ideas aren't mutually exclusive, except for Radcliffe they absolutely were; i.e., magic, killing and violence are what men and/or pirates do, not women, which suitably altered women of Radcliffe's standing and persuasion to imagine demons (and their forced alien entries into the damsel and similar victims) at all: victims to blame once transformed into dark versions of rape survival (dark gifts/forbidden knowledge); i.e., gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss, blame the whore as someone for her to pimp.

Note: This writing is relatively shorter/a bit of a rehash, given it's older than "Giger's Xenomorph" and the Demon Module up to this point. But part one and part two do examine and apply damsels and detectives, then demons, in ways that we specifically try to reclaim. While part zero talked about these things together through Giger's demon, parts one and two consider them on their own. —Perse

As Volume Zero shows, I am not kind towards true crime and murder mysteries; yes, I can enjoy the basic suspense they offer but utterly detest the praxial inertia they contribute towards—a praxial inertia that stems from Radcliffe having started it all ("heavy lies the crown," sweetie); re (from Volume Zero):

the "twist," in "true crime" is a forced reality that generally confirms the systemic scapegoat after a revelation by the nosy neighbor ("I knew it!"); i.e., the Scooby Doo villain as borrowed from the centuries-older xenophobia and state apologetics of female Neo-Gothic fiction authors like Ann Radcliffe having carved it out in equally cartoonish forms. Radcliffe lived under the power of men, to be sure, and wasn't in a position of power like Lewis (a man) was, but the degree to which she used her immense (albeit relative) privilege as a white woman-of-letters is dubious, at best; i.e., not to help the oppressed by writing anything other than what she did, but actively choosing to use her unironically xenophobic (and frankly vanilla) rape fantasies to write moderately bigoted novels. Like Tolkien, Radcliffe's Gothic moderacy is precisely what makes her stories dangerous to sex-positive workers, because behind their veneer of moderacy lies the same function executed by more aggressive, reactionary forms: to stoke class, race and gender suspicions; i.e., moral panic. For Radcliffe, this meant aristocratic, often elderly white folk, but also racist, jingoistic caricatures and poor, non-white people being unmasked by chaste white women (the nun-like, ostensibly ace/queer-coded private eye; e.g., Velma).

Radcliffe, then, was complicit in a larger scheme her fans would breed into and police on and on down the years. As Top Dollar once said, "the idea has become the institution"; in return, Radcliffe's fiction has become something to unironically defend from "degenerate" outsiders, turning her books, oddly enough, into besieged fortresses that uphold the material conditions of a particular mythic structure. Her relative stupidity becomes something to not only sweep under the rug but embody through half-hearted or worse, bad-faith arguments (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

All of this detective's bias is worth considering because it becomes a veil behind which our attackers hide themselves and attack us from; i.e., by playing at detectives (cops) while calling us sex demons (which will become relevant in a moment, when we look at Zeuhl accusing me of their abuse). To it, the "delicate" likes of Radcliffe tended to read outrageous stories like Walpole's *Mysterious Mother*⁴¹² (a double-incest yarn written in 1768 and published posthumously in 1791) or Lewis' The Monk (1794) before filtering everything through her rose-tinted glasses: a "confessional" per her Confessional of the Black Penitents. We'll want to consider this canonical filtering process, to be sure, except our focus really isn't true crime or murder mystery genres, but how various elements of those (mainly crime and murder tied to rape, BDSM and sex work) appear in popularized forms of Gothic poetics at large. This includes porn as similarly "filtered." Deceivers, including self-deceivers, are classically exposed through the lies they weave and pitch to others and themselves as reclaimed against them; i.e., by those whose identities actualize by the end of the story and, just as well, hybridize the damsel, detective and sex demon/whore (a kind of sex bandit with queer flavors, below):

We've already examined Alien and the xenomorph (and virtually every magical sex demon under the sun). To expose the likes of Radcliffe in the present space and time (so, not explicitly retro-futures⁴¹³) as moderately deceitful (and opportunistic), we'll examine various not-magical damsels and detectives (cis, but also trans, above) in part one, and the things they doggedly investigate—sex demons, naturally—in part two, as already state; i.e., as a purposefully campy subversion (and effective) means of our own liberation from their widespread falsehoods. Gird your loins!

We'll go back through the list. The first third of the demonic trifecta are damsels. Though we're specifically looking at porn as liminal expression, here, the damsel isn't always overtly pornographic or monstrous (outside of intense subversions, next page); they're merely the promise of sex, supplied in relation to sex work as figuratively demonized by canon, thus linked to persecution as a veil for exploitation: getting the girl. Let's take that premise to its logical conclusion by skipping the Gothic foreplay and just going straight to the unspoken reward at the end of the story!

⁴¹² Going so far as to cite Walpole's incestuous tragedy in Chapter Four's epigram: "Unfold th' impenetrable mystery, / That sets your soul and you at endless discord."

⁴¹³ E.g., the chronotope, but also cyberpunk (with low-tech vs high-tech existing in the same basic universe commenting on real-life settler colonial and worker/owner disparities).

As someone to investigate their own world, a woman is always a virgin and a whore. To this, the "summoning" of female/feminized sex workers becomes a tradition of disempowerment towards subjugated demons by male consumers presaged by middle-class maidens with mirror syndrome; i.e., naughty "damsels" on-and-off the Aegis offering forbidden knowledge to the cis-het, white men (the status quo) who indignantly conquer them through sexualized violence propagated vicariously by token Radcliffean Gothic heroines.

Furthermore, even if that violence is displaced, it's presented "merely" as commerce, or "business as usual"; i.e., by advertising quite loudly who is being exploited and how (with Radcliffe playing DARVO by also centering her rape claims [and desire] around her own kind as entitled and suspicious: white straight landowners fearful of the outside/alien during the dialectic of shelter). Hence, examining porn can be especially illuminating but also exploitative in its pro-worker or pro-state arguments.

In either case, it promptly gets down to business, but highlights the foreshadowed outcomes to any Gothic tale's "happy ending" (we'll examine this voyeurism and exhibition's inception, here, then how we can subvert it in Volume Three, Chapter Three and Five; i.e., the canonical voyeurism of peril as something to subvert yourselves while going about your business amongst students who are eager to watch and learn—exhibit 101c2).

(exhibit 47b1a: Nina Hartley⁴¹⁴ and Victoria Paris—conventionally beautiful and objectified, but capable businesswomen navigating a man's world/adult entertainment. They are loved so long as they play dumb, familiarizing customers and critics with fabricated ideas about what constitutes a woman in familiar/foreign terms; the voyeuristic gaze of the usual torture victim as an idealized, damsel-esque but also demonized sacrifice: the succubus as virgin/whore.)

Echoes of the Medusa, a sense of ancient dereliction exists within '80s porn, which has a polished-yet-trashy feel to its whores. Like a B-movie with a budget, its liminal sense of time is ageless and dated through its peerless starlets; they never seem to age, but grow increasingly dated in subtle, hauntological ways: the retro-

⁴¹⁴ Hartley is a registered nurse and her father was blacklisted for his Communist beliefs. Regarding her understanding of feminism, she has said:

Based on my experience as a woman and a sexual being, and my understanding that I had the right to decide for myself what to do with my life – that's what I understood to be feminist, to give everybody choices – I didn't choose to be a mother but I chose this [porn] because it suits me (source: Wikipedia) future of a frozen porno world that has become the nostalgic past sold back to us in an idealized, imperfect form people from the future chase backwards for different reasons. The harmful decay lies in the appropriation itself; i.e., these women were generally framed as physically "perfect," but also forced into wacky and physically degrading roles that required less an absence of good acting and more an intentionally bad or campy style tailored to please (white straight men/tokens) as the universal client (acting dumb). Combined with the hauntological sets and costumes that join the '80s aesthetic as a package deal, a general air of unreality flows from these works; i.e., like staring into a movie poster of something that never-quite-was but nevertheless was inside everyone's VCR not too long ago!

Nina was part of that, sharing her screen space with other conventional beauties like Victoria Paris, Tori Welles and Peter (don't touch his hair) North (exhibit 47b1a). Each showed how the human body can be utterly transformed with a little pizzazz, but also how so much of what they made was prolific ephemera tied to a recognizable face and on-brand (statuesque) body and stage name. They became "hyperreal," the perfect simulation of what never existed outside the replica; i.e., the shadow simulacrum both a damsel/demon as something to investigate performatively through their own work in a largely exploitative industry that—with a little awareness and labor action—can become friendly to sex workers (thus all workers):

(exhibit 47b1a: "Heaven in a wildflower"; i.e., several older porn collage exhibits from my book series, made into a composite collage alongside a new collage portion featuring Nina Hartley [bottom-left]. There's so much porn in the world already that thumbnails are a classic and easy way to compile and observe them, en masse [though not always with obvious sources because porn is ephemeral; i.e., it "loses" its value [in capitalist eyes] right after it's made, thus falls victim to instant exploitation and theft, little pimps and thieves fighting over the pimp pimp's scraps of whore flesh].

Furthermore, being the world's oldest profession, prostitution and porn are very ancient and animal activities that capital alienates from us/fetishizes for profit. So while industry porn is a terrible source of information to learn about sex [as Nina shall explain, next page], if it's the only gig in town and people are starved for sex and have money in their pockets to spend on things that capital steals from them [money is, itself, a form of theft]—then, where the hell else are they gonna learn about sex? Public schools, while those are under attack by Nazis? I think not!

Realism isn't the point, but speaks to reality through artifice; e.g., Shakespeare or Jane Austen aren't very realistic in their theatre/spoken dialogs, but still touch on plenty of dialectical-material forces at work; i.e., so does porn of even the trashiest or cheapest variety to the most expensive corporate-made! From Gothic novels [which concern almost entirely with sex through damsels, detectives and demons] to '80s corporate sex tapes, we want to build on what these currently are to shift things in a better direction. Even if that's just us cumming to let off steam with some allegory thrown in, better than blue balls/clit and nothing to show for it! Workers aren't just single-purpose, then, but can multi-task//do activism as a matter of "brothel espionage" and de facto education while also making a living and consuming porn [more on this idea during "In Measured Praise of the Great Enchantress"].

In my opinion—as a queer sex worker and pornographic historian/Gothicist—porn is actually a good place for sex-positive education, provided we can recognize its entertainment potential and current state of abuse, then critically analyze it; e.g., Nina and this young man [above] fuck the way they both want until she drains him of his cum: "Yeah, you gonna cum?" she croons, to which he makes stupid happy puppy sounds! That is exciting a) because of the miracle of the human body and its biology at work, and b) because the ability to exchange forbidden power and knowledge—however unequal [the mom/stepson incest theatre trope] and dark it comes across [the sub/dom expressed in pet/owner play delighting in the appearance of enslavement and bestiality at a glance, but in truth having nothing to do with such things]—can afford mutual consent as something to instruct; i.e., if not under the right initial conditions then certainly the right hermeneutic and dialectic recreating such media, ourselves [the cottage porn industry of OnlyFans and similar companies opening up a Pandora's Box, of sorts]: the Gothic camp of porn history being encamped [so to speak] in an ongoing live performance's exhibitionism and voyeurism!

And while its obviously a paid act [the whore being a paid actress alongside the "damsel," above], there's room to enjoy the performance as having a historical-material critique to it; i.e., older women do have sex with younger men, and fantasies about that likewise exist; re: which the porn industry capitalizes on, pimping the virgin/whore trying to survive under the state wage enslavement: to alienate, starve, fetishize, pimp and profit off our labor! The place to fight such barbarity sits in the same complicated venues of expression; i.e., the damsel trope reclaimed by working girls [and all whores] who make porn more educational but still fun [the two ideas are not mutually exclusive].)

There's plenty to learn from these seemingly "empty" stories. Indeed, behind the veneer of shallow beauty and implied force are intelligent, paid (classically white middle-class) actresses who not only knew the ins and outs of the industry but had to survive within it; i.e., often out of necessity due to classic (sexist and misogynistic) divisions of labor compelled by patriarchal structures since Athens and Rome; e.g., while Paris sadly died from cancer in 2021 at 60—may she rest in power—in life she had a BA in nutrition, did mudwrestling, and got into porn by first posing for nudes, then diving in when she found it easier to get sex work than other forms of photography (an ongoing symptom of Capitalism). By comparison, Nina Hartley is still involved in porn and selling her body as an informed extension of herself that we can investigate and learn from, xenophillically! SWAG! Some Whores Are Good!

As is common in showbiz, both women have catchy stage names, with Nina's birth name being Marie Louise Hartma and Paris' being Sheila Young. They often play "dumb blondes," a reflection of the industry stereotypes that continue to intersectionally present AFAB people as stupid; e.g., cis-het women with "perfect" bodies sold to an ideal audience: the sexist straight men who unironically endorse this as a canonical worldview being something to defend and learn from to everyone's detriment. While it's entirely possible to enjoy canonical vintage porn, endorsing it as realistic or educational towards "actual dating" is like a vampire needing blood from a "virgin's" neck: the cheap, quick, disposable essence of something broken down for them to spend their hard-earned wages on, the beautiful girl from The Tubes' "She's a Beauty" (1983). That being said, there's awesome educative potential in public nudism, all same; i.e., the lesson extending from an Aegis that goes far beyond the exhibit itself:

However pornographic Nina's damsels/demons are, then, they nevertheless concern a larger extratextual search for sex (connection, protection, service and love, etc); i.e., as something to pimp/sell that dates back to Radcliffe's own safe-unsafe sex and, more to the point, her curious and horny heroines, who—while not pornographically portrayed in any overt sense—still consider a woman's place (specifically a white straight unmarried woman's place) in a man's world; i.e., as someone to perform and move through/navigate those dangerous liminal spaces; re: like Hartley and Paris themselves once did: a damsel is "naked" in the eyes of those pursuing her to ravish first from a distance, and then to presumably undress and poke said plumpness (an act that Radcliffe conflates with straight-up murder).

Comparisons between artifice and reality are not new. Nor is their conflation, which again, goes back to Radcliffe. As Hartley herself says regarding the use of "bareback" (unprotected) sex during shoots and the flack she gets from it,

People get hysterical about sex. They want pornography to do the job that they themselves are not doing, which is educating our young people how to be safer. Unless a pornography movie is advertised as educational [...] it is not educational. And the fact that people are reduced to looking at an entertainment medium to find out about sex is sad. It would be less sad if it wasn't so tragic. Watching pornography to find out about how sex works is like watching a James Bond movie to find out how spies do their job (source: "Legendary Porn Star Defends Bareback Sex And Shaved Vulvas," 2010).

According to Nina, we shouldn't endorse or learn from porn any more than we would watch James Bond to learn how to become a spy (or read Ann Radcliffe to find a husband, Wolff argues). I agree. However, we can still learn a tremendous amount about the material world—as well as gradients of abused/abusive damsels, detectives and demons within these gradients—by dialectically-materially studying canonical praxis (which honestly Nina offset with her outspoken feminism, but still walked the tightrope to make a living: as an '80s actress working for a show business that remains historically unkind to women); i.e., what not to do. This points to the curious usage by consumers of porn and its starlets as de facto dating manuals, treating love like a harlequin romance (or Gothic novel); i.e., an imaginary past that is miraculously "rediscovered" in the present like a Gothic "castle" would be: by a given author's framed narrative, but also the author's proxy—the Gothic heroine—as simultaneously a damsel and detective exploring the reinvented past, from Radcliffe onwards: for her, murder and rape were the same, the aforementioned heroine investigating property disputes that expressed women still in that frame of mind, guarding their exposed modesty with fire!

This brings us to our second "tine" of the trifecta, detectives. However, this is a rather broad category. We'll start with the magically "inert" tale of Out of Sight (1998) as a modern-day "Gothic" yarn, then consider a progressively supernatural variation of the detective story told through Gothic throwbacks: Velma Dinkley as a nod to Radcliffe's explained supernatural, but also the author herself as belonging to a dialogic imagination with a limited vocabulary—i.e., its purpose to detect forbidden sights being denied by canonical illusions that fortunately can be expressed through a gradient of ordinary-to-supernatural iconoclastic expression that subverts the demonic trifecta!

From there and into part two, we'll consider the dialectic of shelter/the alien through various degrees of privilege that allowed male authors from Matthew Lewis to Ridley Scott step in as they wished; i.e., by using an ability to transgress in ways historically denied to women seeking female revenge: in thoroughly transgressive ways that shoved polite discourse entirely aside in openly demon/psychosexual language. As Lewis shows, this might have ruffled the feathers of female authors like Radcliffe and her myriad imitators—thus likewise offending proponents of second-wave, cis-het white feminism well into the 20th and 21st centuries—but nevertheless it opened the door for queer people to develop their own voices and repressed opinions onto the xenomorph (and similar "Satanic" demons of an earthly bent, below): as a shared symbol of status in conflict during oppositional praxis; i.e., xenophilia vs xenophobia likewise having more quotidian origins; re: the home invasion and sexual bandit(!).

In the Gothic tradition of combating ignorance, the female and queer detectives each play a giant role in educating through prurient left-behinds: voyeuristic peril as a paradoxical comfort food for rape as a kind of coercive legend. We'll start with the female detective then move onto queer transgression through male privilege, in part two; i.e., as something that "locks horns" with conventional womanhood/female peril in increasingly supernatural yarns: queerness surviving through hauntological campy matelotage and open-if-silly magical language historically-materially denied to women, but also discouraged by women; e.g., the gay sailors of seafaring narratives and monstrous-feminine superstitions that Scott would popularize in his own Gothic poetic rehash of Milton, Shelley and Lewis; re: deftly shining a light on modern exploitations in the presence of "ancient evils" to embellish upon (akin to Géricault's "Raft of the Medusa," exhibit 23b, foreshadowing a growing menace in a pre-fascist period laden with monstrous critiques siding in favor of exploited [to be fair] male laborers at sea, exhibit 48d2).

First, female detectives. As Wolff points out, Female Gothic models tend to be amatonormative, wedded to the literal institution of sex and childhood as a reward challenged by rapacious and mutilative demonic forces. As a Gothic trope, the "demon lover" dates back to Radcliffe and her own dubious contributions to the Gothic school, but is generally recognized in more recent iterations that revive said past; e.g., Velma from Scooby Doo and her own 1960s Flower Child variant of the Radcliffian "explained supernatural" (which normally dealt with banal material disputes dressed up; i.e., as seemingly "haunted" by would-be robbers and impostors) but also Jennifer Lopez opposite George Clooney in Out of Sight: "Take me now, George!"

If that seems weird and girls seem "freaky" it's because capital's raping of nature and them as part of it (on either side of the fence) gives them strange appetites;

i.e., that the elite can pimp (antagonize, put to work) but that workers can interrogate inside their own meta/Gothic consumption and performance!

As a female detective dealing with her own "demons" in a very figurative sense, Lopez' adventure—despite a lack of overt magic—isn't as divorced from the larger Gothic conversation and its warring-if-conventional concerns regarding chattelization/demonization as you might think. Indeed, this conversation charts and outlines the course of (white, non-intersectional) feminism gentrifying and decaying under Capitalism across 200+ years.

To that, Cynthia Wolff writes on Radcliffe's process in "The Radcliffean Gothic Model"; re:

Let us say that when an individual reads a fully realized piece of fiction, he (or she) will "identify" primarily with one character, probably the principal character, and that this character will bear the principal weight of the reader's projected feelings. Naturally, an intelligent reader will balance this identification; to some extent there will be identification with each major character—even, perhaps, with a narrative voice. But these will be distributed appropriately throughout the fiction. Now a Gothic novel presents us with a different kind of situation. It is but a partially realized piece of fiction: it is formulaic (a moderately sophisticated reader already knows more or less exactly what to expect in its plot); it has little or no sense of particularized "place," and it offers a heroine with whom only a very few would wish to identify [according to you, Wolff]. Its fascination lies in the predictable interaction between the heroine and the other main characters. The reader identifies (broadly and loosely) with the predicament as a totality: the ritualized conflict that takes place among the major figures of a Gothic fiction (within the significant boundaries of that "enclosed space") represents in externalized form the conflict any single woman might experience. The reader will project her feelings into several characters, each one of whom will carry some element of her divided "self." A woman pictures herself as trapped between the demands of two sorts of men—a "chaste" lover and a "demon" lover—each of whom is really a reflection of one portion of her own longing. Her rite of passage takes the form of (1) proclaiming her right to preside as mistress over the Gothic structure and (2) deciding which man (which form of "love") may penetrate its recesses!

There have been two distinct waves of Radcliffean Gothic fiction: one that began in the late eighteenth century and one that began in this century between the World Wars... (source).

In other words, the revival is discursive, happening within romantic conventions whose heteronormative canon offers a queer potential if taken to certain xenophilic context/extremes (which we'll examine with Ridley Scott as queerly transgressive when camped by us).

Barring that, the canonical point of Out of Sight, then, isn't if it's healthy or not, but if it sizzles in a heteronormative sense: smart, sexy monsters, criminals, television doctors and coppers (etc) doing smart, sexy (and soap opera) things when lots of violent shit has been happening but especially the voyeurism of rape (the Western conflation of violence and sex, or violence instead of harmless sex, vis-à-vis Radcliffe⁴¹⁵). As such, Clooney and Lopez present as "ordinary" people, minus the supernatural veneer of a Gothic parallel space. Yet the concept is no different than porn and/or Gothic media at large; i.e., conventionally attractive people doing cliché activities tied to hyperbolic representations of fetishized power exchange hinting at ritualized BDSM torture: drama, crime, and idealized beauty in sensational, over-the-top forms. The woman is challenged by the threat of rape as typical, but also ambiguous and romantic during calculated risk:

(exhibit 47b2: Artist: Calm. Rape pastiche is liminal, like porn, but not strictly negative. For one, it's cathartic regarding systemic issues, thus incredibly popular for being able to explore said issues. Rape is everywhere in the Gothic [and often campy "disco in disguise" to boot; it's a party!]. Furthermore, no one really says, "I hate the Goth look!" Why? Because it's powerful and stylish; but it is tangential to fascism as something to enjoy and/or endorse, meaning we have to consciously reclaim it from Hugo Boss in ways that go beyond Sontag's quaint, second wave fascination; re: "the fantasy is death" regarding an unironic master/slave scenario.

In chasing and astronoetically pimping the Numinous, Scott's movie presents the xenomorph in a very similar way to the golem from Ninja Scroll: a damsel in peril, a [functionally] white knight who tries in futility to save her from certain doom, and the black knight bushwhacking the hero; i.e., in Alien's case, it literally slaps Parker with its dick [next page] as if to say to the other man, "Mine's bigger!" before ⁴¹⁵ Who I'm seriously starting to think was ace (what do you think, Sam Hirst?). Except, whereas ace dialogs have the potential to interrogate sexual trauma through public nudism, Radcliffe was allergic to nudity and sex work, but not—as Dennis from Always Sunny would put it—"the implications." Her stories are absolutely full of rape anxiety (and generally concerns the rape of women by men, not female or monstrous-feminine antagonists like Dacre's Victoria de Loredani; i.e., a dark Amazon having revenge against Radcliffe's relatively timid and annoying wallflowers).

braining him. A cosmic, equal-opportunity rapist, the alien makes Ripley watch his own death, the assimilated worker not recognizing what he looks into before it does him in: fucking his literal brains out!

Finished with the token knight, the demon turns to the damsel; i.e., having made her watch everything only to repeat the process with a twist: it sodomizes her with its knife dick to make Ripley [the Amazon] listen, therefore us [and Ripley being unable to save them in time because she's carrying the cat⁴¹⁶]. The movie is dead serious in its Numinous evocations, it's seven-foot-tall black man in a biomechanical gimp suit raping everyone save—and this is important—for the Final Girl as the most modest and devout [re: "If we break quarantine, we could all die!"]. But the psychomachic terror attack works from a counterterror perspective—much like the Haitian slave revolt against the French, from 1791 to 1804—because it gets Whitey to scuttle the mining vessel and get the fuck off the creature's planet! White girls, they'll getcha every time!

To that, and as something to perform to the audience of a given period and place, rape carries with it a deep, dualistic and liminal sense of anisotropic guilt and shame for those who experience it on different registers; i.e., as kind of dark secret that is simultaneously appropriated/sublimated to the gills in Western canon [re: Radcliffe, but also Scott].

⁴¹⁶ Ripley also fails to because the crew is stranded and not all of them can survive; i.e., allusions to Moby Dick and drawing straws to see who eats who when the food runs out. The Nostromo is literally a renamed slaver vessel whose partial survival of the crew—according to the movie's bigoted displacement rhetoric—paradoxically depends on them splitting up because the creature seemingly can't be killed (according to the Nazi-Commie scientist, itself leaning into old ethnocentric ideas eugenically fetishizing the elder slave machine [re: robota] as the perfect organism to exploit, but also set free as a spectre of Shelley and Marx); re: like the Ninja Scroll golem, but also combined with the Medusa in ways that movie separates!

Yet, within these broader liminalities, there can exist a paradoxical desire to be watched and shown off through the [often campy/vampy] thrill of being up to no good/out on one's feet; i.e., stepping outside one's comfort zone relative to restrictive canonical norms, but also wanting to talk about things in a, at times, figurative tone that will be policed: "Listen to Lambert from Alien get raped" versus "Watch me get 'raped'" or "covet thy neighbor's wife" or "the weird monkey suit sex scene from La Bête" [next page, 1975] and so on [the eliding of physical violence with chattelizing sex, under Capitalism]. All of these can bother/trigger rape victims who aren't prepared to face that kind of exposition themselves ["our shields can't repel firepower of that magnitude], but the discussion of rape through consent-non-consent remains incredibly important, nonetheless; i.e., as a ludo-Gothic [demon] BDSM mode of discourse about such things that Radcliffe basically spearheaded in tokenized ways.

For example, regarding incest [which is often a form of rape, barring awkward outliers like Byron and his half-sister] Alexie Juagdan writes in "The Cultural Taboo: Exploring Incest in Japanese Society" [2023]:

While the prevalence of incestuous themes in Japanese media may raise eyebrows, it is important to note that these portrayals do not necessarily endorse or normalize incest. Instead, they often serve as vehicles for exploring complex human emotions, societal taboos, and moral dilemmas [source].

The same idea applies to rape at large, requiring not just a pressure valve, but a pedagogy of the oppressed that helps victims heal from taboo crimes they otherwise can't discuss by investigating them as Radcliffe did [and having a further pornographer potential she largely left at the door]. If Cuwu and I could do this through Ninja Scroll [exhibit 17a/b] in ways beyond just watching a really violent movie—i.e., by having sex sleep through consent-non-consent to inform and educate boundaries [exhibit 11b2]—then it is possible and should be encouraged as an effective teaching device. This can be dangerous relative to reactionary violence for judgmental audiences, or it can inadvertently subject the performer to unwanted harm should their partner[s] be participating in bad faith.

All the same, the curiosity of exploring these fantasies [re: through castles that contain demons] often coincides with a half-real desire; i.e., to confront and heal from the regular traumas that occur under Capitalism behind closed doors [the marriage bed being a historical-material site for tremendous mental and physical abuse]. Not only will they be advertised everywhere as heteronormative guilty pleasures/wish fulfillment [exhibit 86a1] but these will potentially trigger anxieties within the viewer to want express the truth of the matter in ways that are still fun and/or humanizing to perform/witness; re: as Radcliffe did [and which Austen dragged her for].

Of course, the phenomenology of the meta is always cloudy with judgement, shame and excitement roiling to and fro, but the voyeurism of peril always has the potential to yield sex-positive education within transgressive media. To this, Griffith's heinous betrayal of Guts in Berserk's "Afterglow of the Right Eye" [1996; exhibit 47b2, top-right] provides the groundwork for a hard-but-valuable lesson: that victims⁴¹⁷ must learn to heal using ghosts of "rape" after extreme trauma, once it happens to you and/or people you care about [rape is a terror weapon aimed not just at the immediate recipient, but their friends and family; e.g., the Rape of Nanking]; i.e., Guts losing a good friend to fascism and the woman he loved in one fell swoop. In the words of Gene Hackman: "We've all lost someone we love, but we don't use it as an excuse to destroy ourselves; we press on!"

The scene straddles the fence between camp and trauma as incredibly phantasmagorical [drugged/dream-like]. Dressed up in the badass Darkness/fetish aesthetic, Griffith drops the centrist façade of babyface and turns full-on heel, becoming a dastardly lothario [really channeling Brian De Palma's Phantom of the Paradise, 1974] who doesn't rescue Casca; he rapes her to hurt Guts, then throws them both aside like, well, a heel! This cautionary and palliative tale has a fever dream logic that's the very stuff not just of nightmares, but Gothic novels and harlequin romances. As such, it neatly applies to similarly revived legends such as Dracula "ravishing" Lucy, and the woman and the monster in La Bête. White women are policed for sleeping with anyone other than their white husbands; and black men are compared, and put down like, animals:

Like "Afterglow of the Right Eye," the "rape" scene in La Bête is very campy and dream-like but lacks the overtly gory Hellraiser-meets-Alien pathos/xenophobia; i.e., the feelings of alienation survive in exploitation porn with a sex-positive ⁴¹⁷ Including potential victims, which women are, but which white women of privilege tend to abject their fears onto an imaginary "other" while craving protection through calculated risk; re: Laura Ng and Edward Said vis-à-vis La Femme Nikita and Culture and Imperialism, but also the paradox of rape through Radcliffe's calculated risk: as uncurled by the likes of Angela Carter's stories, the latter leaning more in a Sadean direction with her castle rape fantasies; i.e., copies of Radcliffe's women fear-fascinated with the rapey legend of the castle (the ghost of the counterfeit), which she and Carter—as Enlightened women of a Cartesian age investigating the ghost of rape—view as an explained Numinous they nonetheless fabricate and leave behind for their audience to find (and spend money on; re: Radcliffe had found that winning formula, and quit while she was ahead, whereas Carter didn't know when to stop being a TERF.

element that is transgressive and important: a white girl wanting to fuck the black monster she's heard about all her life [to hook up and communicate as people historically do under state systems]. Here, it's Radcliffe's damsel-detective not just hugging Montoni, but giving him some pussy to learn that he's not that bad [the classic white girl rebelling with the non-white mate, accepting their love as fetishizing her]: darkness cock visible, and thick ropey jizz pooling on damsel dumpers backing it up! How quaint!

As a result, its xenophilia is extremely surreal, channeling the spirit of an older historical period merged with the turbulent zeitgeist of the 1970s: the privileged white woman feeling trapped between her kept surroundings and desire—like the titular Duchess of Malfi—to really get railed by a kind of "strong-thighed bargeman" that would inevitably have been demonized by the upper class as "beastly"; re from Volume Zero's "[Pieces of the Camp Map"]: "animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms"; i.e., the demon as animalistic [we'll explore this idea even more in the "Call of the Wild" chapter].

Fear of the servant is as old as Imperialism and slavery are, yet speaks to more recent fears of "the help" as something to simultaneously fetishize and express power over since Radcliffe and Austen's time; e.g., John Cleland's 1749 Fanny Hill predating Otranto and being something Austen alluded to with Fanny Price [or "Booty Cha-Ching!" as a classmate one put it]. In La Bête's case, the heroine's own confounding desires collide with these seemingly odd biases from older times, but also the chronotope of the diegetic space's fearsome [and prurient] legends; e.g., with white and black servants also sleeping together—to embrace the white alien and black alien and bring about new, fresh discoveries of empathy and ecstasy couched in camp, below]. Austen certainly wasn't above investigating such things, herself, with her Fanny variation hating tales of "light morals" while simultaneously being a rather unspoken abolitionist in Mansfield Park [re: Said's Culture and Imperialism as I discuss, in Volume One's "Cornholing the Corn Queen"].

In keeping with chronotopes, the story—through its concentric mise-en-abyme and anisotropic animal lust—our heroine in the present is doubled by a girl who was supposedly raped by the monster some time ago; i.e., a bedtime story to scare the newlywed so her covetous, doddering husband can keep her all to himself.

To escape, she subverts the gaslight/role of the raped wife; i.e., by enjoying "unspeakable" sex inside her own mind as informed by the old house and its patriarchal banditry privatizing her booty for the hidden tyrant who only cares about keeping her to himself: "ravishing" zoophilic pleasures with the campiest of monster dads to a trilling harpsichord [also, a bit of an ace touch: she moans loudest when she feels his cum on her behind, taking delight at his howls of pleasure. That's topping from the bottom for you].

The idea, as always, hinges on watching rape, but "rape" can be in quotes in a variety of ways; i.e., Scott's is more Numinous and Borowczyk's is, well, not, but the latter's ironic [thus satire] is more immediacy clear and sex-positive than Scott's, while still walking a tightrope it doesn't always cross without some missteps; re: exploitation and liberation occupy the same space, the power there occupied and negotiated in duality during liminal expression.

[source: Persephone van der Waard's "My Least Favorite Horror Movies?" 2020]

One of Zeuhl's better recommendations, the movie is full-on wacky-ass schlock, and one that I absolutely love [enjoying it and Alien for different reasons about the same basic content: "rape" porn].)

In other words, the historical-material threat that faces white cis-het women (and other persons monstrous-feminized by the status quo; re: as quasi-Radcliffean whores that literally ask for monster sex, thus rape—a "greensleeves" with a quick, easy price into her "castle") become as veiled and displaced as Radcliffe's cryptonymic fictions (and their author); i.e., by derelict consumer goods designed to disguise the imbalance of power through the material conditions they portray as "ancient," retold through rediscovery during the rememory process hinting at trauma as something to play with. Bred on the canonical variant, consumers pacify over time; i.e., by accepting the worship of criminalized lovers, even serial killers, as handsome (the two are not mutually exclusive). They menticide, beginning to internalize and value "canonical brainfood" more than the critical power and satire offered by proletarian praxis (and younger consumers who don't know better being surrounded by this media since birth; e.g., myself and Metroidvania).

However, the fetishes and clichés only become a cryptomimetic opiate for the masses when consumption becomes endorsement for state control; i.e., it's fine to consume guilty pleasures with a game-and-open mind—to critique or even enjoy them, but not to blindly endorse/parrot the canonical message being advertised when teaching others through your own work; e.g., I enjoy Radcliffe like I enjoy

Austen and Ridley Scott, but there's still plenty of room to critique and subvert both ladies and gentleman, ourselves! However "Supreme" such gentry affords its own reputation, post hoc, we can bend it to our will; i.e., doing so to speak to real-life abuses haunting Radcliffe's refrain: "Who's the alien, who's the predator?" Who, indeed!

That being said, doing so is a liminal procedure. While many female detectives are domestic agents, the basic concept remains liminal during oppositional praxis as torn between porn and art; i.e., as an anisotropic means to communicate demonic ideas and symbols (of sex, violence, terror and monsters) playing back and forth during the socio-material dialectical of the alien: as something that speaks to tokenism and betray historically-material leading to such confusions at all.

In particular, Lopez' detective from Out of Sight is a token, non-white policewomen, belonging to an assimilated class of workers; i.e., manipulated and abused by cis men/white women in the workplace, or by men who are their work (the "catch the rapist" trope). To this, Lopez embodies the target audience that Radcliffe originally introduced during a rising discourse that has expanded to token women of color approximately two centuries later!

Doing so romantically speaks to the same kinds of unequal power abuses that Alien and La Bête do, minus those movies' Gothic magic or schlock: i.e., broken by trauma, militant detectives like J-Lo's reify the girl boss problem by handing Radcliffe's heroine's a gun and a pair of handcuffs sans irony. Thusly armed, the quotidian heroic behaviors of traumatized women historically-materially default to white violence in positions of power that allow for girl bosses of tokenized flavors. Simply put, they represent the fearing of systemic abuse that women have already experienced in some shape or form—what all women experience differently depending on what rights were gradually afforded to them under Capitalism as developing into itself (with white women being allowed to write and sell their fictions long before women of color could, thus policing these fictions from minority groups at large; re: Jane Eyre).

In terms of the ghost of the counterfeit/abjection process and either being or at least presenting as white, Gothic authors also have the opportunity to shy away from bias and abuse while still wanting to explore it in moderately empowering narratives.

Excluding overtly occult/magical damsels, detectives and sex demons, then, the forgeries seen in stories like Out of Sight commonly play out in amatonormative narratives—canonical story arcs that not only center on romantic love between two warring parties, but often feature a damsel detecting an irresistible urge that she cannot fully resist; i.e., a fatal attraction broadcasting from an oft-male (or masculine/monstrous-feminine) agent, our aforementioned "demon lover" that, according to Wolff, tempts and threatens the heroine as falling into two categories, mid-drama: a lover of the good guy and the bad boy. The notion is clearly dated, but nevertheless propels into modern society through stubborn clichés that survive inside classical homages; i.e., dressed up as quotidian, day-to-day affairs, but no less larger-than-life than stories like Alien, Frankenstein or Doctor Faustus. Said homages then inform social-sexual practices by codifying them (and their mischief to make) in canonical forms updated for increasingly modernized audiences: "Behold! A wild George Clooney appears!"

One such idea is what my friend, Mavis, refers to as "game." For them, Clooney's smooth criminal is the pinnacle of "having game"; i.e., a handsome, "devilish" rogue who sweeps the intimidatingly attractive Lopez off her feet. Except, it's all an act from Hollywood reenacting pickup lines in a bar. The peril, then, plays out a kind of game unto itself; i.e., one standing in for thirsty women in need of a good pounding: cliché romantic forces that inhabit the story in order for conventional audiences to maneuver emotional treachery (and its associate material conditions) through various proxies; re: the slippery Clooney using his emotional intelligence on an unwitting mark, "gaming" the female cop by toying with her emotions in a very demonic way! It's a moderate concession met through derelict markers, the latter which not only uphold the status quo, but continue to shape its Superstructure over time through the rise and fall of such romance!

In the absence of magical rituals, doing so generally maintains through threats of physical force delivered, once upon a time, on celluloid: a figurative demonization from dimorphic stereotypes dating back to the oldest forms of popular stories (for our sake, Radcliffe).

For example, the unbridled, scarcely-contained sexual tension in Out of Sight is surprisingly violent throughout, culminating in a female victory by crippling the "demonic" male seductor. Feeling betrayed by him, Lopez eventually "Mr.

Rochesters" Clooney by shooting him in leg, effectively mastering her emotions in a survival story where she proves her mettle and worth in a smaller, somewhat petty and banal way: doing her job by acting like a man, except not quite but sort of (the state is upheld, either way). Stalled fornication is orgasm denial/self-imposed blue clit (the holy idea of denying oneself sex as a troubadour does).

More to the point, the injury is satisfying insofar as it injures Clooney's massive, swollen pride with extreme prejudice—not simply acting the courtship out but consummating it with a bullet that rapes the bandit by the detective administering hot toxic love. Think cops-and-robbers BDSM but the cop is token and the robber is white. It's Sleepless in Seattle's (1993) already problematic "stalk your love" narrative⁴¹⁸ sold to white American housewives (actual or desirous). Likewise, a joke is in there, somewhere, but one sold seriously to audiences; i.e., with the serious intent of emotionally manipulating dollars out of these women's purses (and throwing some black humor/slapstick ultraviolence in there, for the guys). It makes white women tolerant of toxic love provided they have the gun (or some other element of control; e.g., money and cars; re: Jadis).

But despite a lack of overtly magical forces, the film's fairytale narrative contains the same underlying Gothic mechanisms that would guide a story either penned by Radcliffe or Lewis to its explosive conclusion. There are demons, damsels and detectives, as well as rituals of violence, power and knowledge exchange based off older iterations thereof: devils in disguise, male or female, giving into our dark desires! Even so, the distinct lack of a supernatural bent remains a popular approach that is hardly original to Out of Sight, the same way that garden variety porn is seldom the stuff of overt magic but rather a special kind of "enchanted sex" told through hauntological poetics; re: Nina Hartley and Victoria Paris' '80s hauntology of the Golden Age of Porn from the '60s and '70s decaying into something new and exciting.

Keeping with Nina Hartley's description of porn, the same lesson applies to non-magical and non-sexually pornographic mysteries like Out of Sight that nevertheless have a figuratively demonizing purpose; i.e., through at-times incredibly violent rituals of power exchange that codify and debate the usual ludic roles, doing so in pornographically violent language conspicuously synonymous with sex; i.e., as being exchanged for with violence as erotically charged by people deceiving each other (with sexual tension about sexual exchange and its anticipation through various narrative devices asking the audience to suspend their disbelief and buy into the scam): courtly love and duels for sex that never lead to sex, onscreen! There's always another castle hiding the prince and his princely gifts penetrating the princess' not-so-chaste love zone.

This being said, investigations that uphold the state are always conservative; Lopez shoots George to show her "love" to him, but also to deny a fulfilling ending to the audience save through the Romance of (orgasm) denial—i.e., in ways that further tokenize her that white women can "slum" vicariously themselves regarding: to be tough and sexually aggressive in ways that dehumanize non-white women (who try to assimilate by leaning into these tropes, themselves) and devalue white men (who both are and are not the criminals they're playing onscreen), in the bargain! It's her "Don't, Jack! It's Chinatown!" moment—updated in a late-'90s white America by a rising Latin American star shooting her way into white women's hearts (and wallets): demasking the rogue by castrating him (much to Mavis' horror. "One does not simply shoot George," she says, adding "You can print that!"). So the oscillation and fabrication extend ever onwards!

As such, it's effectively a tease, promise and threat ("If looks could kill, you'd be lying on the floor!" Heart, 1985), one that Radcliffe and Lewis excelled at (and one also practiced by '80s porn, insofar as its practitioners are hidden cryptonymically behind invisible barriers/choir screens during the Sale of Indulgences, one that viewers can never cross). But in this case, the Matilda's Immaculate Conception is Lopez, reinventing herself inside a mode of expression that, since Radcliffe, has been about women reinventing themselves to survive in a man's world (thus Capitalism in all its forms); i.e., ogled by men despite never being naked (re: Segewick's "Imagery of the Surface"), then baptizing her own coronation in Clooney's blood by burying him alive (so to speak; re: Segewick's Coherence of Gothic Fictions)!

Furthermore, each betrayal is unique; for Lopez, it's class and race betrayal per castration fantasy as the outlet—no different than Radcliffe demasking her own villains, or Lewis tearing his apart (dialectical-material considerations aside). Despite George and Lopez probably being friends in real life (each belonging to the same class of "workers who made it"), the theatrics are half-real, and speak to warring class, culture and race tensions felt between both them, the actors and characters, but also the audience and the larger world they're speaking to in small.

A mindfulness of these meta roles is vital, then—with Nina Hartley again describing why consumers of porn Quixotically conflate it with education towards real life; i.e., defenders of canon learn from canon, which is to say badly or lazily (they want sex to be like porn, rather than learn how to actually please their partner outside of harmful BDSM fantasies and realities). Also, they take the illusion for granted, ignoring the labor of the actors, artists, writers, et al, including themselves (to "pay rent" is simply something "women do" without complaint, Mavis argues). The same mindfulness should be applied to any Gothic derelict, regardless if its trifecta is overt or sublimated; re: Out of Sight and its own Gothic pastiche gender-swapping Romeo and Juliet (or Bonnie and Clyde, take your pick):

Another variable to consider, then, is the audience, but especially how victims of trauma include women and men as exploited dimorphically by Capitalism; i.e., as a punitive hierarchy of preferential mistreatment triangulating cops-and-victims abuse for the state (Lopez, whatever her struggles onscreen may be, is ultimately a cop on and offscreen). As a non-magical Gothic Romance, Out of Sight channels the same exploitation of workers than Radcliffe does, save from a militant female detective's point of view versus a female detective tied to militant men and white power structures—the director pointing her sights at the "perfect man" she "can't resist" (sexing up the policing process by fetishizing the victims of police brutality mixed criminogenically with "abusive spouse" arguments projected off onto redline territories); i.e., using near-lethal force to escape and level a playing field where concepts like "demon" and "damsel" are scarcely visible but nevertheless driving the narrative ever onwards: "Reader, I knee-capped him" being a radical assimilation of masculine violence by the Gothic heroine.

As a detective, then, Lopez "graduates" at the end, ceasing to be a chola banditti by becoming a token gringo girl boss, except she's still a cop (Kamala Harris Syndrome). Inside a sublimated Gothic yarn, the movie effectively leaves it at that—failing to use the demonic trifecta to notably address social-sexual concerns tied to ritualized violence that cops abuse on a regular basis; i.e., what the film itself means coming from her towards other workers (which Clooney ultimately is: a worker the cop cripples for a promotion). This includes women but also any subject of police violence treating their dogma as calculated risk that "liberates" women: "I'm bringing you in because it's my job!" Gross (let the record state that Mavis agrees with me; i.e., they're against cops if the cops in question shoot George Clooney).

As such, Out of Sight is pure assimilation fantasy. Yet the revelation is often overshadowed by "true love"; i.e., as a dogmatic principle in amatonormative stories, regardless of their supernatural degree: slapping random pieces together much like Walpole did, decades before Radcliffe scored her first (and arguably the first) female-penned Gothic blockbuster! Walpole wrote for pleasure, Radcliffe for those sweet, sweet English pounds (the spoils of war)! But this also extends to the audience looking it having their own baggage and place in the world.

Mavis, for example, curiously views the entirely bloody situation as a person radicalized by complex trauma, themselves (a multiple rape survivor): to get vicarious revenge and their jollies by endorsing the outcome; i.e., by insisting that "Jay-Lo still loved George" (a problem we'll return to when inspecting Killing Stalking in Volume Three). In other words, the "problematic/star-crossed lovers" trope extends beyond overtly supernatural monsters like vampires or demons from Hell, conditioning a paying (white, female/token) audience bred on canonical derelicts that reimagine the past and its process of detection; i.e., as a dogmatic tool expressed and felt through sharply codified roles that speak to Pavlovian conditioning between workers and fiction: thirsting for Hell/the alien (often white people in disguise/the white Indian) as Radcliffe and her imitators did; re: the sex pirates must be made to answer for their crimes against modesty and the nuclear home, but also the crime of said devilishly handsome men not submitting to their de facto sovereign wives!

"It is a truth universally acknowledged that a woman without a George Clooney must be in want of a George Clooney!" and if she doesn't get him by chance, then she will get him by lies and force (remember that Austen's original classic phrase, from Pride and Prejudice, is largely seen as ironic—with the heroine in that story humbling superrich bad boy Mr. Darcy by topping from below... after realizing how loaded said bad boy is; i.e., not a strict endorsement of the status quo, per se, but Austen's "truth universally acknowledged" speaking ironically to the lived realities of women "on the market": as forced to get that bag or fucking starve to death/get raped on the street). It's ok to ironically enjoy spy movies, Gothic Romances, and sex and violence (e.g., big dicks and monster rape, next page). The problem is, canon makes anyone sex-coercive outside of the stories they consume; i.e., be those consumers straight white people or not.

Obviously we can't really investigate the past as something to learn from without investigating its forerunners. This includes Wolff as puzzling over Ellen Moers's 1976 catchphrase, "Female Gothic"; i.e., as something to expand on through Gothic-Communist interpretations of famous damsels, detectives and demons that—along with their various rituals of mutilative torture and knowledge/power exchange—can be continuously updated: to include excluded groups (through tokenization) while highlighting the presence of bigotry (sexism, transphobia and racism, etc) in radical forms of discourse speaking to tokenism at work; e.g., me talking about how second wave feminism weighs in on Gothic poetics as something to not just analyze, but moderately replicate (the vitality of doing so will become much more apparent when we look at TERFs and other forms of fascist feminism, in Volume Three).

As something of a trans detective, myself, I want to highlight the purpose of continuous, imperfect detection; i.e., as something to interrogate and learn from, mid-poiesis/cryptomimesis while helping Humanity hauntologically out of the darkness (of "Rome") moving forwards. To do so, we have to be better than Radcliffe, Lopez, and Wolff, but also any older variants of veiled pornography and their damsels, detectives and demons ironic-to-unironic rape fantasies—with Nina Hartley playing all three, on and offstage.

Except beyond Nina and her work, this also includes Velma as occupying an ontological position within class, culture and race war rhetoric; i.e., during the dialectic of shelter and the alien as something to update for our proletarian purposes to be more pornographic! First, we'll look at Velma the cartoon character, and then we'll look at my real-life "Velma" who stabbed me in the back—intrigue!

(exhibit 48a: Artist: Reiq. "Come on if you're coming!" Velma, again, is a sex object, but also someone whose sexuality is intrinsically tied to her damsel's privileged life of education; i.e., one used in the solving of ultimately material, mundane mysteries while confronting various "false" monsters through proximity threatening her sacred/profane "modesty" and "temple" with extramarital corruption[!]. Often, there is an ace/chaste component when venturing into the Gothic "anti-home" double⁴¹⁹; i.e., the trope of the lesbian nun as wedded to God, ⁴¹⁹ Re (from Volume Zero, and later quoted in "Meeting Medusa" from the Poetry Module regarding my work on Metroidvania):

Classically the diegetic heroine's perfect past is doubled by the Gothic castle as an expression of power beyond just her or her sense of self and home. From Audronė Raškauskienė writes in Gothic Fiction: The Beginnings In Radcliffe's novels the Gothic castle is in the first place an anti-home, a nightmare version of the heroine's perfect past, in which many of the elements of her home are exaggerated and replayed in a Gothic form. The Gothic space, which provides a scene for the most dramatic events in the novel, is totally different from the other spaces – indicating heroine's home" (source: "Lineage and Origins").

I.e., home has become alien, like Jameson's idea of the Gothic class nightmare, and one that classically is explored by damsel-like detectives becoming increasingly neo-conservative and tokenized in militant, neoliberal forms; re: the Final Girl punching down against Communist and other minorities, Aliens onwards.

which is framed as "nerdy" in secular stories like Scooby Doo. There's also a drug-element—what with Scoobs being a talking Great Dane; re: the acid Communism of today haunted by spectres of Marx—specifically 1960s Free Love, Civil Rights, and Vietnam-War-era protests [and commodified drug use mirrored today in white gentrification of weed as a monocrop stolen from marginalized communities legalizing weed versus completely decriminalizing it⁴²⁰]—all couched within the sexual peril of a revived Radcliffean neo-conservative: sans actual firearms but bearing out plenty of heavy artillery/whores to pimp during the whore's paradox! Velma's built for war of all kinds!

There's a mystery to solve, alright—why my ass is so fat and why I keep coming back for more of that fat Frankencock in my tight little nerd pussy [the panties not ⁴²⁰ A lot of this I actually learned from Cuwu, a self-professed Marxist-Leninist stoner who often spoke out about such things; i.e., how capital gentrifies and decays the same business practices it redlines and steals from, time and time again:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard and Cuwu)

Cuwu also traded their copy of A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things with me, but also exposed me to consuming weed for the first time; re: I ate too many weed cookies while under their care and promptly "greened out," but also learned that you can't get high from previously inhaled weed smoke; i.e., "shotgunning it," as the movies often show, does it wrong—a fact Cuwu explains to me in their car (above) after a night spent making porn together in a West-Mass hotel: "You gotta hold the blunt backwards in your mouth and blow smoke from the front to the back tip into their mouth for it to actually get you high!" But that's awkward and weird white people like to entertain their weird illusions about weed so they vacillate; i.e., during the usual ghost of the counterfeit pimping such things as guilty pleasures.

For example, Taylor Sheridan's Tulsa King (2021) romances the rise and fall of a weed kingpin exiled to earn in Tulsa, Oklahoma. The show has similar flaws to Sheridan's more recent venture, Landman, but it at least points out some of the hypocrisies of white-owned weed businesses (and bigoted beliefs of a one Mr. Sly Stallone, who's friends with Trump), anyways; i.e., the sort that Cuwu themselves pointed out to me and which I only recognized after dating more stoners and watching more media about stoners, too! I never tried weed again, but fucking stoners is fun; i.e., they're super chill and always DTF (exceptions including Cuwu's borderline personality disorder making them regress and become sex repulsed, part of the time)!

being a chastity belt, but a token of the slutty lady-of-the-court's sexual desire for/from big strong black knights]! The willing and ritualistic degradation—and twitchy/toe-curling possession—is very much the point; re: Radcliffe's exquisite "tortures" of the mind, where the orgasm and the monsters are: a place to regress to and tremble from the dreadful [and artificial] mammoth insertions!

It was crude in Walpole's day and it's crude now! But more to the point, it speaks to the paradox of rape and the whore; i.e., insofar as a virgin/ace person can be a whore performatively while never having had sex, or can desire monster sex/rape play to find some sense of control from having their mind raped if not their literal body [female or otherwise]. Again, strange appetites are a symptom of capital caused by dialectical material forces; i.e., which ludo-Gothic BDSM seeks not simply to emulate, but understand and alter the socio-material conditions of; re: during Gothic play across all mediums!)

In the classic sense, then, Velma plays the role of the damsel and the detective in a primarily nonviolent way—i.e., haunted by "violence" and "rape" as things to put in quotes during ludo-Gothic BDSM, the damsel taking the demon's offerings into her sacred temple—and this can be studied. To it, the social-sexual tensions of virgin/whore are on full display with Velma; i.e., always crawling on her hands and knees whenever she conveniently "loses" her glasses; re: while unknowingly (to her) being threatened by a dark, menacing force the actress wants to "be threatened" exquisitely with, before explaining it away as Radcliffe might: that she could, at any second, be savagely "ravished!"

Except it's all bogus (though not without baggage), giving the honkey mistress the sweet, sweet "terror" she (and the audience) hunger for in the same relationship Wolff describes; re:

The reader identifies (broadly and loosely) with the predicament as a totality: the ritualized conflict that takes place among the major figures of a Gothic fiction (within the significant boundaries of that "enclosed space") represents in externalized form the conflict any single woman might experience. The reader will project her feelings into several characters, each one of whom will carry some element of her divided "self." A woman pictures herself as trapped between the demands of two sorts of men—a "chaste" lover and a "demon" lover—each of whom is really a reflection of one portion of her own longing. Her rite of passage takes the form of (1) proclaiming her right to preside as mistress over the Gothic structure and (2) deciding which man (which form of "love") may penetrate its recesses!

There have been two distinct waves of Radcliffean Gothic fiction: one that began in the late eighteenth century and one that began in this century between the World Wars... (source: "The Radcliffean Model").

Of course, Wolff warns against less mutilative fantasies than Radcliffe's when concerning feminine sexual desire, but I go one further to extend it beyond white straight women and second wave feminism; re: by dividing sex from gender and both from biology and canonical essentialism when making our own gender trouble through public nudism and Gothic art-porn; i.e., we can lean into camp that's haunted by echoes of trauma in our own mimetic cryptonymy assisting our cause by affording such things a rebellious character that survives us.

Such isn't always the case, which necessitates such playing by us to begin with. As with Out of Sight, Velma's Gothic reinvention brings up the same, prolonged conversation; i.e., about threats of rape and female/non-monstrous-feminine heroism to canonize or camp, and which stretch backwards and forwards: towards warring schools of thought bent on solving cliché mysteries when discovering left-behind clues and leaving them behind again and again and again (not just a paper trail, but a trail of love nectar)!

To this, Velma is a curious fixture of an older cliché installed by Ann Radcliffe's contributions to that particular war: the School of Terror and its concealed demons warring, Milton-style, against Lewis' own gay demons and their horrifying cryptonymy reversing abjection! Faced with perceived-but-veiled evils, Velma becomes thoroughly nun-like in ways that are naughty and nice: a non-violent, chaste⁴²¹, asexual nerd and/or fetishized "closet" lesbian/whore depending on the version—with sex-positive variants reclaiming the slut (and the lesbian/non-white body type); i.e., as a sex "demon" facing the ghost of the counterfeit as a kind of endless joke losing or gaining irony overtime, meaning per hauntology/chronotope's darkness visible (a joke we'll reexamine in Volume Three when we consider ace, female detectives like Wednesday Adams: the art and the aesthetic/aesthete generally one-in-the-same).

(artist: Jenna Ortega)

Yet, a prodigal daughter's return to Gothic sensibility's irrationality and emotional intelligence lies in the coercive presence of Modernity being unreliable and dangerous; i.e., as a legitimate and ever-growing threat to workers and nature through capital; e.g., its domineering effect on either through policed media and language concerned universally with policing alien things: by unmasking them—as Velma likes to do during the liminal hauntology of war (the return of the phantom castle-in-the-flesh, mise-en-abyme)—to uphold Capitalist Realism on the Black Veil, mid-cryptonymy and cryptomimesis furthering abjection.

In short, the journey and the destination's Great Destruction are a turn-on for her—the foreplay leading up to the climax while Velma apes Radcliffe and so many other arguably closeted-and-ace-but-thirsty white/token women; re: Carter's Sadeian adage from 1979, "any free woman in an unfree society will be a monster" speaking retrospectively and prophetically to Velma; i.e., as the TERF-y monster girl waifu policing the alien in a policewoman's bad BDSM chasing dragons Quixotically onwards—a semi-harmful idea authored by the OG mother of said monsters: Ann-fucking-Radcliffe (whose own looming ur-TERF spectre of the killer damsel crying wolf completely haunting Rowling's own moldy castle, in the Scottish highlands, but also Burton's aping of earlier Gothic satires previously having turned Radcliffe upside-down; re: John the Duncan's "A Funhouse Mirror? The Addams Family and the Failure of Netflix's Wednesday," 2023).

"The Gothic is Scooby Doo," Christine Neufeld once told me (re: in the same class we read Frankenstein in and where wrote my first serious essay about the Gothic, "Born to Fall?"). And she wasn't wrong! The past does betray its own concealment through the same false rediscoveries; i.e., inside recursively concentric future copies of the same disguised message, itself always a little familiar and foreign during the historical-material crossfade.

This is why inspecting the past, holistically again and again, is vital to keeping the mind (and one's faculties/organs of perception and pleasure) open (with those afraid of rape—either having survived it, or worried they'll have to survive it, someday—usually being the ones who triangulate for the state; re: as a mechanism that polices labor through its own victims; re: Ortega's tokenized version of a formerly campy Wednesday ultimately solving mysteries eerily similar to Harry Potter's own "Chamber of Secrets": to preserve the status quo of a prep school to save, not unlike the one seen previously in 1985's *The Worst Witch*⁴²²).

The Gothic past, then, is constantly talking about the same things because Capitalism relies on those things to manipulate and exploit workers through an elite-cultivated Superstructure's historical-material loop; re: the infernal concentric pattern caging us but speaking through Capitalist Realism out into infinity! Everything exists in duality during liminal expression/oppositional praxis, of course. Learning to interpret the ambiguous past in emotionally intelligent/Gothically mature ways is what we want to do. Doing so doesn't simply keep us alive (camping the canon); it can separate us from the violent, bourgeois, damsel detectives (and their inherited confusions)—i.e., who trigger when exposed to "demons" they're supposed to shoot: not just Clooney but anyone the state wants the cop to feel threatened by (castle doctrine, Radcliffe's maidens calling the cops on the bandits)!

Lopez—when shooting and chaining Clooney to the handrail—is an angel of mercy playing Gerald's Game because she thinks it's the only way to save the man she loves from the state she serves (and whose resistance, mid-arrest, she views as "automatic suicide" by cop; but Mavis still thinks that J-Lo is a bitch). It's the tyrant's plea in disguise: a token white-functioning savior both undercover and on-duty (or a malpracticing doctor operating on her patient without his consent; i.e., no one consents to being shot or invasively cut open—Marvis, don't answer that)!

Mid-drama, though, it's deceptively easy to forget how Lopez' bullets aren't limited to Clooney as a non-supernatural "demon" (or how Velma's targets are old, rich white people plastered over the usual poor/non-white scapegoats of American police brutality lionized by tamer copaganda's posturing as "anti-establishment"; i.e., like Scooby Doo, thus Radcliffe, does). Indeed, when the material function of a police officer is recognized, we need to remember they exist to defend capital as threatened by any form of activism (which Scooby Doo, per Radcliffe, dresses up as aristocratic piracy—Count Clooney fleeing the poor defenseless cop).

Whatever the form, function determines function (thus flow of power anisotropically towards or away from the state). Bourgeois female damsels (thus detectives) become coded through a rising sense of the middle class, to hunt and kill proletarian monsters, aliens and witches; i.e., by exposing those from the state of exception, the former something to conceal while unmasking said the latter and doing so for the state's continued survival; re: outing queer people and other minorities who refuse to assimilate, punishing these groups for their iconoclastic doing of things different than they've been done before, and all because it threatens profit: the actions of a pimp policing the whore through a Protestant ethic absorbing a Neo-Catholic/medieval ghost of the counterfeit Numinous to quest for and lock up, Joe-Biden-style (a tough-on-crime initiative spearheaded by nerdy conservative white girls doing their part; i.e., Spider-girls whose "Spidey sense" is conditioned to tokenize in a half-real way that protects cops by abjecting systemic abuse onto Radcliffe scapegoats having expanded horribly under Capitalism).

This is liminal and dualistic—a fact we'll look at with naughty nuns beyond ourselves, below. Then, to be holistic and really drive the point home, we'll consider me as "Velma"; i.e., when h(a)unted and abused by a chubby, hairy and bespectacled non-binary nerd; re: Zeuhl, my Great Destroyer!

First, older examples:

Umberto Eco's 1980 novel, The Name of the Rose. Male detective-wise, consider the boy/master dynamic between the protagonist and his young, tempted ward, who sleeps with a local waif in the monastery darkness.

In terms of male warrior monks, these would have historically existed in medieval Europe in ways that became romanticized later through popular legends like Robin Hood; e.g., Friar Tuck. Female warrior nuns—or "gun nuns," by comparison—would eventually be coopted in neo-Crusader language; i.e., in a very neoliberal sense with canonical modern artwork, but also revenge stories like Abel Ferrara's 1980 exploitation film, Ms. 45—a story about a nun who violently seeks revenge, shooting her rapist before becoming a vigilante wearing a slutty version of a nun's uniform: her habit [a neo-conservative version of Velma "pushing back" against state targets disguised in whitewashed vice signals].

In latter-day revivals, the Gothic heroine's candle more or less symbolizes the role of the detective, whereas the gun is generally a warrior weapon for men, but a tool of rape revenge/prevention for women activating once triggered. As such, the two can historically go hand-in-hand, granting the detective nun's classically eroticized body a "damsel" and/or "demonic" quality that likewise intimates famous legends about nuns as not maiden-like, but closeted whores of various flavors tied to sex/power abuse relayed in architectural morphologies: a spirit of female rage surviving the victim's initial experiences of rape, but also perfidious, girl-boss jailers who once served, but now haunt the formerly-glorious, now-abandoned institutions of men; re: Lewis' Prioress something for future one-woman armies of prioresses-in-training to reinvestigate, effectively chasing their own tails, which they pin on state donkeys; i.e., a wild goose chase that ends in the exposure [and death] of the accused dressed up as alien impostor through tired context. It is a bit boring and exhausted, but pimped all the same!

The fear of inheritance is similarly complex, suggesting a liminal reunion with the ghost of counterfeit as a kind of demon nun to abject past Radcliffean abuses off onto before banishing, Radcliffe-style, back "to Hell"; i.e., off to "horny jail," a repressed figure trapped between the virgin/whore dynamic that haunts the viewer [male, intersex or female] as potentially monstrous and simply not realizing it—not until they enter the closed space to confront the dreaded evil, head-on; e.g., Valek the "strict" mommy dom/torturous Reverend Mother from The Conjuring 2 2016 [exhibit 48b, right]. The real monster is the damsel; i.e., chasing older systemic legends around the haunted house/chronotope that don't stay in said house: dynastic primacy and hereditary rites demand sacrifice, and there is always a human body and victim attached to these Radcliffean bugbears.)

Of course, virgin/whore and mirror syndrome is a meta condition that goes both ways. Canon or camp, outing these imposters historically and performatively involves tracing a shared and dated lineage like Velma does—not just to learn from its mistakes, experiments, and trends (which can come from iconoclastic "missteps," too) but to help allies learn from mistakes they're currently making towards those they want to help by not killing their darlings (re: Radcliffe and her spectres, like Lopez and Velma). This requires subverting thus playing with the material conditions and devices (demons or otherwise) that inform any positions of privilege clouding their judgement: that cis women often define their own lived trauma in heteronormative ways; i.e., that push people forced to identify as men (or for whom cis women identify as men through trauma responses) onto "violation" archetypes; e.g., the trans man as a "false" woman, nun, crossdresser (think Rosario from The Monk, but in reverse).

Speaking of the false trans man (as in, a trans person acting in bad faith), this brings us finally to me as saving the best for last: Zeuhl, my dude, your time has finally come; i.e., trans-on-trans Gothic detecting! Here goes...

Dead ringers are the stuff of Gothic cliché—and I didn't ponder too hard when I was with Zeuhl about any of this because Zeuhl is non-binary and hates Jane Austen/loves The Monk—but they were someone who mirrored me and gave me what I wanted while, in the same breath, harming me like Jadis did; i.e., by showing me the same forbidden and suitably dark arts of queer love done to get what they wanted, first and foremost. And I don't want to say that they didn't make me feel good in bed—because they were an attentive lover with an amazing sex drive and incredible body—but they certainly exploited me out of bed; re: they were my Lestat (a trans man who historically had trouble meeting female queer people on dating apps, but not trans women like me), thus are someone I never wish to see in person again so long as I live. But I can't tell my own story without summoning them—cannot conclude my Udolpho without pulling aside its Black Veil to expose them; i.e., having pulled my strings as cruelly as they did. Now, I shall pull a giant parade float of their lifeless head through the streets (echoes of Medusa, except neoliberal-in-disguise), shouting "Come and see!" as I do...

Note: My exposing of Zeuhl is being done to the degree I feel comfortable, because they abused me but also remain a threat to me. While I have previously discussed our sexual history extensively in written form, I won't be showing any photographs of said activities for obvious legal reasons, here (and because doing so goes against my moral code and revolutionary principles; i.e., unlike Cuwu, Zeuhl hasn't consented to such invigilation—indeed, is vehemently opposed to it). But I still want to convey that Zeuhl was a bogus, prurient hypocrite who often used their expertise in gender studies (and sex work) as a shield from criticism; i.e., often by using those very double standards against me while getting attention, money and sex from me (which I didn't agree to).

I can't show any of that, here (though I have plenty of proof of it; re: sex tapes), but if you want a good idea of what they look like, in bed or out, they're chubby and hairy like In Case's top-right illustration (several pages down, the fantasy depicted being the sort that Zeuhl would tell me they wanted with me and other cuties at the same time, before deciding they "weren't" poly then magically were poly again while throwing me under the bus, and not for the first time).

As for the abuse, itself, this was interspersed—like all abuse is—with moments of intense gratification; i.e., we had sex a lot, filmed it, and enjoyed each other's company while in grad school "to the hilt" (they were just as big a whore as I was). But also, they used their body and their position as a queer authority to lie to and manipulate me (a queer neophyte in the closet) constantly in and out of our relationship. In fact, they remain my greatest abuser and someone who abused me more—if you can believe it—than Jadis did!

And yes, Jadis raped my mind and used me for sex in brute-force ways; but Zeuhl? The sheer amount of incalculable damage they wrought on me nearly drove me to suicide (and sent me careening into Jadis). I can rank my own abusers if I want, and Zeuhl is above and beyond, unquestionably hands-down, the fucking worst—a non-binary Ozymandias having hardened their heart in the desert of our wasted, not-sure-if-it-was-ever-real love. When I have nightmares and wake afraid of past abuse taking me to such hells again, it is almost always the ghost of Zeuhl who drags me there, whether I want them to or not [the sex no longer fun]! When I think of them now, I don't get sad, I get furious [and ejaculate rage all over their ghost's face]!

(exhibit 48b2: Models and photographer: Persephone van der Waard and Zeuhl, my brother Ben holding the camera at my twin's wedding. At this point, Zeuhl was already acting weird, and shortly after this, left for England and broke up with me suddenly/without warning. They did so while simultaneously telling me that none of it was my fault/that we might get back together [that they "weren't in a poly headspace right now"] while also continuing to ask for money from me and demanding of me not to talk about the breakup publicly or they would be furious [essentially taking away my mouth, but making me want to scream about/feel afraid and desirous of them]. A picture, then, is both worth a thousand words, but leaves much unspoken; i.e., me having no earthly idea that Zeuhl was planning on leaving me, and them smiling for the camera, yet already having their bags packed. As sad as it sounds, then, that is the full dialectical-material context/extent of their treachery.)

To be crystal clear about these proceedings, I haven't written any of this to incite violence against Zeuhl (re: "No one kills Kakarot but me!"), and I think they have much more to lose than I do. So if anyone is getting any ideas, don't; e.g., TERFs—and frankly anyone else who might try to learn who Zeuhl is just to harm them—can kindly fuck right the hell off and drown in a sprinkler of their own pee. Zeuhl's already the target of that kind of harassment, and I don't wish to add to it, but I also don't wish to be held hostage from saying my truth regarding their abuse of me just because they have powerful enemies. Sorry, dude, but I'm not your pet—that and you could've prevented all of this years ago by just not acting the way that you did! And since it's the season to unmask Gothic villains, it's your turn, and I'm gonna say my piece until the passion flees.

That being said, I don't want anything from Zeuhl save the ability to talk as openly as I wish about our past; i.e., I merely want to be able to tell my story as a queer detective, one having been abused by someone who once was an excellent detective themselves, but then sold-out/whined about their own accomplishments not being monetized (and which I could say what those are, but then it'd really give away Zeuhl's identity) before vanishing off the face of the Earth; re: a "Radcliffean Interregnum" except for a non-binary version of the same familiar neo-conservative practitioner revived in the 21st century! Truth is stranger than fiction, and Zeuhl is as much my Velma demon lover as I a Velma damsel harmed by their fearsome-in-hindsight advances I then had to unpack and reify afterwards! —Perse

As detective nuns show us, such liberation and exploitation are hopelessly hauntological, thus liminal; i.e., the nun-in-question always trapped between ambivalent friend/foe queries and chronotopic positions of morality vs immorality they must chase down to draw their own conclusions built on past discussions surviving themselves; e.g., as I did, chasing the Numinous (and Radcliffe) to England, learning about her and eventually writing these books because a Velma lookalike (and Foucault and Ian Kochinski fanboy/apologist) fucked me over big time. In doing so, I effectively stutter-stopped years of research (and lost loves/old friendships; re: Zeuhl, but also Jadis and Cuwu), which bore muddled conclusions seemingly as mixed as my emotions, but in truth remain united in favor of universal liberation working against the actual Great Enchantress—by camping her ghost through my own fabrications' darkness visible thereof, speaking to abusers who enchanted me off the page: a naughty nun's naughty nun of a naughty nun about a naughty nun's neo-medieval BDSM fantasies gone wrong. Nuns all the way down, bitches!

canonical-to-iconoclastic forms; e.g., Matilda, a queer devil-in-disguise, invading and infiltrating an evil abbey to seduce the abuser (from his point of view) inside the church, then expose the Prioress' many crimes.

As previously stated, The Monk was a story that Zeuhl and I both enjoyed, but also one outside Lewis where I was abandoned by Zeuhl; re: who stabbed me in the back, tried to gaslight me about it, and who then *demand*ed my loyalty afterwards to preserve their own anonymity (a bit like Ann Radcliffe, but genderqueer in their neo-conservatism)!

To it, I'm a bastard but not a fucking bastard who's going to twist the knife against my abuser (whose extended history of freaking out when discussed in any manner online I am well-versed in; i.e., having dated them, thus having spent hours upon hours listening to them talk about stalkers at work). What happened between us was real, Zeuhl, including your betraying of me in the most cliché, false and selfish of ways, then refusing to even acknowledge what you did beyond joking about it (re: "tell your family I eloped with an old flame from England⁴²³") or foisting all of the blame onto me at the end.

Like Radcliffe, then, it was something almost out of a folktale or poem, revived most tellingly in a song sung by one of my mother's favorite artists (and for which became another clue that I'd been duped by someone prone to duping others; i.e., I was not the first person that Zeuhl broke up with so suddenly):

⁴²³ A person—let me remind you, Zeuhl—that you thirsted after for ten years (originally getting taco-blocked by a volcano), only to run off with them the moment you had them in your clutches (and I was far away in Michigan*), and then married in secret following your return to America and denying me any chance at closure by scuttling the trip we planned for months to come see you both; re: "The Eyeball Zone; or, Relating to the Gothic as Commies Do." As they were your ticket into England, I hope you've treated that person better than you have me—not for your sake, but theirs! And to that person: "God keep you safe, wherever you are!" I wouldn't date Zeuhl again, not for all the cute boys or pale, freckled, big-titty and redheaded cuties in the world; not if I could turn magically into one myself and be that French, thicc, redheaded slut I always wanted to be!

*Again, I have the receipts for all of this, including—I should add—the hundreds of vacation and marriage photos you sent me, afterwards. Thanks!

A blacksmith courted me
 Nine months and better
 He fairly won my heart
 Wrote me a letter

With his hammer in his hand
 He looked quite clever
 And if I was with my love
 I'd live forever

Oh, where is my love gone
 With his cheeks like roses
 And his good black billycock on Decked round with primroses?

I hope the scorching sun
 Won't shine and burn his beauty
 And if I was with my love
 I'd do my duty

Strange news is coming to town
 Strange news is carried Strange news flies up and down
 That my love is married

I wish them both much joy
 Though they can't hear me
 And may God reward him well

For the slighting of me

Don't you remember when You lay beside me
 And you said you'd marry me
 And not deny me?

models: Zeuhl and [Persephone van der Waard, taken by a wedding guest at my brother's 2019 wedding]

If I said I'd marry you
 It was only for to try you
 So bring your witness, love

And I'll not deny you

No witness have I, none
 Save God Almighty
 And may He reward you well
 For the slighting of me (Loreena Mckennitt's "The Blacksmith," 1985)

Of course, I had plenty of spoiled courtship/break up songs; e.g., "Blue Monday," "Blood Red Skies" or "Goodbye to You" (for Zeuhl, in particular); and if Jadis was my black knight to "gang along with," then Zeuhl was the person who wounded me badly enough to try! They were the Devil so bad that I stuck with their counterpart; i.e., the devil I thought I knew and could avoid! Fifth time's the charm, I guess!

Well, forgive me, but I won't go to the grave keeping that a total secret; I don't owe you that, comrade, am not Father Schedoni's keeper keeping a black penitent's miniature out of sight/under wraps: the chemistry and fun we had but also the misery behind the smile (a bit like J-Lo and Clooney but gayer!)
 "Sickness, be gone!"

"All these souls, and you still don't have one of your own!" Would it surprise anyone to know that Zeuhl was actually very sweet and funny when they wanted to be? God, it was fun... until it wasn't. To that, Zeuhl, you still abused me and furthermore, I was trans when you were harming me; you do realize that, right (all that twink torture porn went to your head, I guess)? Even so, I have all the receipts, including the co-signed document of money changing hands; i.e., the one that proves you (and another ex of yours, who shall remain anonymous) used me as your personal piggy bank: I kept the signed agreement! If that bothers you, just remember that my decision to talk about my exes' abuses of me is my decision, not yours! And if you don't like it, tough shit! You really should've acted better in the past than you actually did; i.e., it's both possible to have sex with someone and still bully them, which you did; re: I was the bee in the bag, homeslice!

From Radcliffe to me and back to Radcliffe, then, we want to change how cis women and cis-queer people see trans, intersex and non-binary people as human; i.e., meaning just as flawed, both able to help or harm each other during class struggle. Doing so first involves helping ourselves (as queer people) learn ways to understand our own identities and struggles better than we currently do; i.e., by poetically asking questions about trans-ness as recreated in the present using reclaimed language (re: Velma pastiche) in new ways that have never broadly existed until Capitalism tried to exploit us (and generally through ourselves, as Zeuhl did to me). This happens through the half-real past as a continuously transformative experience (and includes the drug-like aspects thereof, which "Call of the Wild" shall unpack).

Keeping with Radcliffe but also my own tumultuous life-and-times (with my own deceptive charlatans existing as much outside the text, unlike Radcliffe's), much of these center around sight as forbidden; i.e., the damsel's looking gaze as much a "questioning act" that, thrown into doubt, allows for iconoclastic expressions to posit various creative attempts at staying "woke" towards whatever canonical dangers ail us; re: between Radcliffe and I, but also Zeuhl analyzed, post hoc, by my studies about Radcliffe involving my summoning of our relationship demonically from Hell: "Zeuhl, Zeuhl, Zeuhl!" Hidden and disguised among the midden of clichés and throwaway toys, these must be drawn out by subversively or even transgressively reclaiming Gothic language (I hated The Forbidden Zone, by way, comrade, but Danny Elfman was fun to watch, in and out of it).

To that, Gothic Communism aims to explore iconoclastic sight as a forbidden and questioning gaze (often through suspicion, doubt, concern, caution, anxiety or fatal curiosity/attraction); re: through the xenoglossic roots of the Gothic mode before suggesting ways to apply it to the present in a Communist way—i.e., to show the Capitalist world how to view queer people (and sex workers) as not-monstrous in language they can understand—and, if not as pariah or alien, then as prey or through a deeply confused/confusing communication of predator/prey emotions; re: Velma on her knees, ass out and backing it up: the deep betrayal of a false friend (one, I should add, that no one likes once they learn the truth about, Zeuhl's secret a deep and shameful one for a reason).

To it, demons speak to dark desires and repressed harm, but also radical change and wish fulfillment when healing from harm. By playfully showing allies how to grow more in touch with these contested emotions, we can allow them the special and frankly priceless opportunity to connect with a perceived weaker, more stupid and fragile side; i.e., that of a feminine, thus traditionally disempowered detective/damsel who can at least imagine being smaller and weaker human prey who needs to rely on their wits and guts to survive a masculine, "phallic" threat.

Furthermore, this is especially salient in situations lacking material or social advantage; i.e., where one is isolated from their friends; e.g., when I first dated Zeuhl in September 2017 to late 2018 (they dumped me in September 2019, but I was back in Michigan at that point), I was overseas, thus far away from my family. In short, I was exposed, thus vulnerable to a bewitching genderqueer predator!

By contrast, a hunter who shoots fish in a barrel quickly becomes overconfident, entitled ("a slow and insidious killer"). They'll have material advantages but won't expect prey who knows how to think and survive using their emotional reactions intuitively as a weapon/something turned against the original abuser (similar to Jadis, I think Zeuhl was just hoping I'd keep quiet about it. Their mistake). A common modern misconception, then, is that thoughts and emotions are mutually exclusive. Far from it, survival under Capitalism will not happen without some degree of women's intuition and looking into past harms, on and offstage; e.g., Zeuhl calling Obama "a neoliberal in disguise," while actually being closer to Obama than they initially let on/cared to admit (re: "Understanding Vampires, part one: Leaving the Closet," footnote).

The hunt doesn't have to be literal, either! It can be figurative and vague, a possibility but not confirmed; e.g., "Am I being hunted? Is my lover a heartless sex demon feeding on my very soul?" I often wondered that exact question (in so many words) when I was with Zeuhl, telling Dale about it in his office; re: "I feel like I'm being used!" While plain-as-day to me now, the thought was unthinkable to me, then; i.e., that I, Nicholas the Great, was somehow being cryptonymically gaslit and abused by my partner at the time. But there I was, crying to my academic supervisor about it, anyways! How the mighty have fallen, Zeuhl, and Nicholas is dead; i.e., Persephone is awake now and you can't hurt her anymore, nor take anything from her that you haven't already/expose anything about her that she hasn't already opened up to the world about! I'm literally an open book, and if you're not careful, I'll open you, too (as you well know, based on our last conversation, fuck face)!

And if that hurts to see, hear or otherwise learn, then too damn bad! Face the music for once in your life, you giant asshole; i.e., I'm tired of completely and utterly protecting you for your sake (and even now, am showing you mercy by not completely exposing you, years after the fact; re: "an enemy has only images behind which [they hide their] true motives..."). As your victim, this is my line in the sand. I don't care how cross that makes you. You're a big enby and I'm more sensitive to your bullshit in my older age; deal with the consequences of your own actions/the fact that your shit stinks like anyone else's:

So have I decided to expose Zeuhl's perfidy a little more, here; their face is still behind a mask, but I wanted to talk about them here (and not announce it too much in the signposts, like a secret boss) because frankly it's been eating at me over time and I'm trying to do it in ways that protect me from them; i.e., as I did when unmasking Jadis. So now it's your turn, comrade. I'm showing people our Aegis, shaking things up by reminding them you were the most damaging ex of all. Don't get salty about your own shitty antics!

And that—boys, girls and enbies—is me closing the book on the mystery of the evil Velma from my own Velma's past (another ride in Charon's canoe)! Good riddance and good bye (for now)! The pimp tells the whore what to do; that's what you did, Zeuhl (forever blind to the immeasurable harm you cause others because you only care about perceived wrongs committed against you) and this is my whore's revenge escaping you, step-by-oxymoronic-step, during ludo-Gothic BDSM! "Free at last! Sweet capture and escape, Hell breaks loose!" I'm not someone you can control/force to walk on eggshells, anymore!

(artist: Genie)

More to the point, fear is relative and anisotropic; e.g., rabbits—Zeuhl's favorite animal to identify with—haunt me after Zeuhl harmed me to no end ("Just like a churchyard shadow, a black bun keeps haunting me..."); i.e., similar to how Jordan Peele explains for him in ways useful to us, too (the following pun is not intended, but fun):

"Theres a duality to scissors — a whole made up of two parts but also they lie in this territory between the mundane and the absolutely terrifying," Peele explains in an exclusive clip to EW.

[...] A close-up of golden shears clasped in the gloved hands of Nyong'o is a central visual in the promotional material for Us, and Peele sent similar scissors to journalists in December for the release of the new trailer. At the time, Peele told EW that using white rabbits and scissors throughout his film was deliberate: "They're both scary things to me, and both inane things, so I love subverting and bringing out the scariness in things you wouldn't necessarily associate with that" (source: Piya Sinha-Roy's "Watch Jordan Peele explain the terrifying duality of scissors in movie," 2019).

Someone like Zeuhl, then, uses such devices to aggrandize themselves/glut their raunchy appetites hypocritically behind gobstopper masks; i.e., a former sex worker who acted incredibly predatory and prudish once they got a well-paying job, yet insisted that's not what they were doing at the time—and did so to throw me off guard/their scent while they shamelessly fleeced me by throwing tight, wet pussy in my face⁴²⁴ (which alright, I admittedly enjoyed, but not because they took advantage of me and I didn't realize it at the time; I liked it because the pussy was amazing [the best I've ever had, to be frank] and I thought the person who owned said pussy wasn't trying to fuck me over—my mistake: Zeuhl routinely finds people who are mentally ill [e.g., chronic depression and bi-polar disorder in their exes and current spouse] while, in the same breath, trying like hell to marry up into visa status to go to TERF island)!

By comparison, Gothic Communism seeks to use stereotypically Gothic materials like Velma—and ambiguous social-sexual clues/red herrings and profound sensations of heightened perception—to do what is normally a traditionally Gothic role; i.e., in a pointedly dialectical-material way between fiction and non-fiction, echoing back and forth over space and time: a hypervigilant mastery of madness and monstrous-feminine that confirms an emotional uncertainty about the material world—namely that of the terrified, horny and oft-female detective and her friends... which historically were her faithful servants, but for me, a trans woman, sadly included my non-binary lover making me feel insane: "Et, tu, Brutae?"

In short, detectives are often seduced according to their relationship with an ongoing past as half-real; i.e., regarding people and places both fictional and non-fictional as an argument that is forever unfolding in the present; re: Zeuhl was the one holding the camera and fetishizing me, lest you forget (below)! However underwhelming or grandiose, so do I pull aside my own detective's Black Veil after all these years: there'd be no Gothic Communism without you, my evil soul-sucking demon who could've been good, but chose not to be. "Ciao, bella ciao," fucker!

Christ, enough about Zeuhl! Let's take what I've discussed regarding them and Radcliffe's damsels and detectives, and segue into sex demons and dealing with them more broadly! Before we do, a couple exhibits and a small conclusion (three pages):

In the past, Radcliffe's anxious, damsel-y domestic sleuth would traditionally sift through literal and semantic debris to solve the mystery as seemingly or actually awesome; re: what she called "the explained supernatural," and what

Rudolph Otto called the mysterium tremendum fascinans, or the "mysterious, tremendous, fascinating" force. However, as something to learn from and evolve, both thinkers (and their associate detectives) attributed qualities of the supernatural as codified by everyday language; i.e., whose common linguo-material strategies and variations enlarge the mind to rapturous, all-seeing extremes. Made in pursuit of supernatural-tinged mysteries who dialectical-material function interacts back and forth with the emotional content being explored onstage and off, the mystery of the recreated past first need to be assembled and presented before it can be explored "blind."

This makes the "mastery" and "madness" of the classically female damsel/detective a compound paradox: exploring a highly derivative "past," already made up, then made up again by the author before the reader even opens the book; i.e., the perilous castle as constructed by an author-as-detective to then be vicariously explored by readers identifying with in-text variants: the heroine, but also the demon. Before the first word is read, Radcliffe the writer had already fumbled at hidden things before making the story "her own" through seemingly marginal variation (our aforementioned "poster pastiche," but actually a visual trope that can be seen across the commercialized Gothic mode):

(exhibit 48c1b: Artist, middle: Gregory Manchess. As I write in "Mazes and Labyrinths,"

Female heroes in FPS are exceptionally rare; [...] Metroidvania and survival horror heroes are often female, or have traditional feminine qualities or predicaments. The stories of such heroines are less about proving how strong they are, like their male FPS counterparts, and more about surviving a larger menace. Some non-FPS heroines, like Samus, are fairly weak from the offset but progressively grow stronger. Some, like Jill Valentine, remain slow and vulnerable throughout the entire game [source].

The survival-horror-vs-shooter spectrum of videogames is generally offset by a desire or pursuit of strength in popular ludonarratives extending out of cinema and novels, but also real life back into those things: empowerment vs disempowerment.

Heteronormativity will dimorphically gender this arrangement, but it can be subverted or transgressed by iconoclasts in a variety of liminal forms; re: Zeuhl and

I.

Some are more sex-positive/proletarian than others and exude an unresolved, oppositional praxis spanning centuries. For example, Victoria de Loredani's expression of repressed anger takes on a transgressive, reactionarily regressive violence in Zofloya when she kills Lilla [exhibit 100b2]. Doing so is a potentially neoconservative, warlike act—one aped by neoconservative heroines centuries later.

By extension, Ripley's post-1979 massacre of an imaginary Vietnam by James Cameron turns American neoconservative bullets against a queer Communist alien menace through the appropriative masculinizing of women as damsel/detective demons; i.e., in a traditional, bellicose sense; re: the subjugated, girl boss Amazon—specifically the Hippolytean queen of the Amazons acting "like a man" by overperforming her expected gender role as a woman: the fascist/neoconservative "Space Rambo" serving the interests of male power and traditional gender roles by being the ultimate mother to Newt, the orphaned colony brat. Ripley's tiring of abuse allows the state to weaponize her against a Communist "queen bitch" whose subsequent dog-fight has Ripley running from the law for having become the female "teeth in the night," herself. She plays by the state's rules and is punished for it when she turns heel; i.e., by being collared, yoked and put to heel, herself, but also euthanized faster than monomythic men would be.

The same goes for any token traitor—with those closer to the margins, like Zeuhl, being emasculated for their own exiting of the closet [trans emasculation effecting enbies and trans men/trans women differently].)

To it, Samus is figuratively a virgin; i.e., the androgynous daughter of Zeus, bearing out masculine qualities of Artemis the Huntress and Athena's Aegis as the state cracks down again latter-day "Medusa" rebellions; re: the same way Zeuhl suddenly "found religion" [the worship of money] when selling themselves out. As the state's well-trained bitch, Samus is the damsel [virgin] warrior-detective upholding the status quo against state enemies demonized to pimp them for profit: mounting the world to fuck it [as monstrous-feminine] out of state revenge!

By comparison, transgender people are often seen as monsters on the receiving end of us-versus-them police violence. This can translate to zombies or vampires, but also demons, dungeons, damsels and dragons in the same witch hunt having people act draconian towards those demonized as

"dragons"; i.e., to receive such cruelty dualistically inside the state of exception/moral panic. The fact remains, we are human and deserving of basic human rights, hence dignity, respect and love the likes of which Zeuhl abandoned when going into hiding and hardening their heart—i.e., they could've broken up with me and done just that, even; I simply didn't want to be gaslit by them and used afterwards the way they ultimately did use me: a person who had the talent to not "pull a Foucault/Wilde" but then did so out of pride... and me wounding their pride insofar as they won't like what I'm saying but then again never liked anything I did say. So, who cares? Fuck 'em!

From one fag to another and a true punk versus postpunk: fuck you, Zeuhl, you sell-out poser/double-crossing cumdump decaying-into-a-traitor sex tourist of your own rebel self! You're the fakest person I know and I'm happy to burst your stupid, privileged, time bubble façade of false rebellion. Eat shit and die, fucker! Androgyny is sexy as hell; your bigotry and abuse of me was anything but! And... curtains!)

Apart from trans people, the classic Neo-Gothic heroine (who is cis-het) remains concerned with surviving the trauma of the past; re: through emotional mastery in the face of actual, occult demons, and the third point of Radcliffe's demonic trifecta; e.g., a demon, dragon, and/or whore, etc, to face during the assimilation fantasy (which can be camped, left). Gothic Communism combines all of these things holistically to build a better world than has ever existed; i.e., our network of spies/workers acting as guerrilla educators and fighters outside professional circuits (re: Hartley)! Everything dies, but we can face that and emerge STRONGER THAN EVER! MEDUSA, ANOTHER BRIDE, YET LIVES!

We'll explore this even more as something to perform and understand, next. "Let 'Jesus' fuck you!"

"Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part two: Demons and Dealing with Them; or Abandonment, Dark Worship and Vengeful Sacrifice When Dissecting Radcliffe (feat. Ridley Scott's The Terror and Alien: Covenant, Ninja Scroll, The Dark Crystal, and Harmony Corrupted)

"...I have preserved a life which otherwise I had lost in torture; and I have obtained the power of procuring every bliss which can make that life delicious! [...] Ambrosio, I still love you: Our mutual guilt and danger have rendered you dearer to me than ever, and I would fain save you from impending destruction. Summon then your resolution to your aid; and renounce for immediate and certain benefits the hopes of a salvation, difficult to obtain, and perhaps altogether erroneous. Shake off the prejudice of vulgar souls; Abandon a God who has abandoned you, and raise yourself to the level of superior Beings!"

She paused for the Monk's reply: He shuddered, while He gave it.

"Matilda!" He said after a long silence in a low and unsteady voice; "What price gave you for liberty?"

She answered him firm and dauntless.

"Ambrosio, it was my Soul!"

—Matilda and Ambrosio, The Monk

Part zero examined damsels, detectives and sex demons per Giger's xenomorph (and its paths of the dead to pass through), while part one looked at non-magical damsels and detectives as female-to-trans (sex) workers ranging from Nina Hartley to Jo-Lo to Velma to Velma's good/evil doubles, myself and my ex, Zeuhl. Part two looks at demons solo; i.e., when dealing with them (as magical to non-magical beings) during such Faustian exchanges, including a segue into furies: revisiting Scott's Alien universe with Alien: Covenant (and a more charitable interpretation of its villain) and his Terror produce-sided affair (with its own semi-magical elements) while cutting Radcliffe's simulacrum to bits, then having Harmony and a couple close-reads at the end—Ninja Scroll and The Dark Crystal: Age of Resistance—step in to help put Radcliffe the demon whore back together to camp Ridley Scott!

Please bear in mind, this piece is conversational/mostly tying up loose ends while covering a lot of ground (and holistically sprinkled with various puns, reclaimed slurs and intersectional/crass epiphanies felt throughout). In keeping with the Numinous, though, we'll consider different conventional/gimmicky and fetishized elements of revenge that demons seek for having their solitude disturbed, while also highlighting their predatory elements a bit more, too: abandonment, dark worship and vengeful sacrifice!

Note: By now, we've talked about damsels, detectives and sex demons, but also virgins/whores and their revenge a ton, and committed a lot of pages and ink to thesis and application. Like the rest of "Exploring the Derelict Past," "D&D" is an older element I want to include for its namesake; but also, we'll be keeping this one and the "Call of the Wild" relatively short (about two hundred pages for what could be much longer, similar to our vampire and ghost subchapters from the Undead Module). Pinky promise!—Perse

We'll unfurl those elements like a trail of fabled breadcrumbs that detectives classically chase down (often to have them punished for it during the live burial trope; i.e., cannibalizing the heroine through repressed libido given shape; re: Segewick). First, a reprise: as classic granters of tempting wishes during Faustian bargains, demons are whore-like beings of and inscribed with torturous dark power to deal with and in; i.e., often in a "coital" sense and one which the state treats as things to summon and banish in Faustian bargains on Promethean Quests; re: "dealing" with demons as a problem it places within a dialog of exchange that has them killed (or injected with poison disguised as "medicine," curing a "disease"): the demon as the whore having the whore's revenge when summoned!

Except all that glitters is not gold, but works in dialectical-material opposition within the shamed aesthetic (re: Zeuhl and Matilda, Velma and me); likewise, the pearly castles are generally the worst, as are their moderate defenders' false modesty. "Darkness visible" takes on a paradoxical quality that beckons we embrace it in service to Satan; i.e., not as a person but a cryptonymic act that pushes revolutionarily through systemic falsehoods: a Great Destroyer that evokes past trauma to heal from it, not extend it through further canonical lies.

This, in turn, takes multiple steps—often through decreasing amounts of blindness through the light of illusion ("Long and hard is the way...") towards true sight; i.e., in a sex-positive progression towards what D. H. Lawrence would call "going to the dark gods." These can be announced readily by the profanity of a simple theatrical gesture; e.g., a nun's habit juxtaposed with the powerful unveiling of a shock of dark, curly public hair under her lifted skirt (which we whores weaponize during the paradox instead of simply taking it for granted, like our abusers do).

Moreover, this formulaic loss of control happens in increasingly queer ways that abjure heteronormative dimorphism, the latter usually canonical rape fantasies penned by straight white women for straight white women; i.e., inclusive survival sex work camped through a traditionally female position: the Radcliffean princess' survival leading to their rewarding with a "safe home" or fairytale castle where they're still expected to perform "wifely duties." Called the Great Enchantress, Radcliffe weaved a powerful and effective spell, and it didn't come from nowhere⁴²⁶. The challenging of these deeper systemic tropes involves queer discourse from a position ⁴²⁶ Gothic oxymorons like exquisite torture's sacred/profane dichotomy thrive in dialectical-material tension: i.e., remediated praxis; e.g., spanking the wicked for fun or legitimate healing versus unironic corporal punishment. The label "devil" oversees both, yet the function remains diametrically opposed in ways that merge monstrous modules. A state devil seduces and bribes, casting doubt on the oppressed as "devilish" in ways that, per state operations, merit punishment through state arguments abusing Gothic poetics to uphold the status quo regardless of the monster type. Per Radcliffe, the whole ordeal has a tribunal-esque feel, one where the lawyer, witness and suspect testify through doubles of a monster during the same proceedings: the state vs the defense (workers, nature) equating to devils vs devils, aka Amazonomachia expressed as undead, demonic and/or animalistic. We've already examined the zombie apocalypse as a kind of disease troubling society as sick. Instead, let's consider it more broadly in ways that also apply to demons (we'll get to animals in the next chapter).

During this conflict, then, one side of a doubled pair is moral, correct, and just relative to basic human rights being defended, and used to defend the defendant, from the state inside a sick institution; e.g., a courtroom or hospital as medieval, torturous and prison-like, a harsh breeding ground for unwanted observation, but also acute feelings of aggressive suspicion, intense doubt, feverish moral panic, ill omens and conflicting information/semiotics* and unfounded paranoia, all being informed and scrambled by claustrophobic fear and dogma (what Nick Groom calls The Italian, "very much a novel for the twenty-first century"). Such places are housed by judges, inmates, and guards who operate through visual markers of social-sexual disease; i.e., as something to contain, isolate and forcefully interrogate, meaning infectious hysteria/persecution-as-contagious, outbreaks of xenophobia all coming down on the side of American liberal justice against state foes; e.g., zombies, demons, or wild animals.

The rainbow something to assign, for example, to queer people having reclaimed it, turning its colored, arched bands paradoxically into a marker of punishment instead of good luck; i.e., Satanic panic within Rainbow Capitalism and all the cognitive dissonance and estrangement that entails.*

In turn, these assigned/associate feelings are bred, but "patient zero" is a myth insofar as its presence is installed through panoptic dogma: Foucault's Discipline and Punish (1975) being a metaphor for medieval containment procedures for leprosy that extend to society as a whole:

The panopticon induces a sense of permanent visibility that ensures the functioning of power [... It] represents the way in which discipline and punishment work in modern society [and] is a diagram of power in action because by looking at a plan of the panopticon, one realizes how the processes of observation and examination operate.

Fear is a disease, then—a poetic contagion to push onto subjects that carry it with them everywhere during Capitalist Realism; in turn, said Realism could be likened to a pandemic that operates globally but manifests differently per register as large groups are corralled and maneuvered against each other. Even if it's not a literal disease, the desperate and constant tensions are still life-threatening. To that, once threatened by an outside presence, the state as a body will defend itself as under attack. In fact, it does so by design. Capitalism requires contagion to operate; we must subsist, mid-struggle.

For example, recent history shows us that rights can be eroded, but the language of devilry remains an obstacle or aid to this tragic outcome. In such times, we must advocate (thus fight) for ourselves as demonized by the state; i.e., dehumanized to share a deadly condition felt by all within the state of exception as happening through the hostile recognition of a condition (symptom) and execution of its necessary treatment—crime and punishment as biologically essentialized: a devil to isolate and handle through force in ways that ultimately consolidate power as a lucrative and genocidal venture. With demons, the sentence of devilry and damnation is found and expressed through banishment, burning or exorcism; with the undead, through infection, quarantine and termination (of a terminally ill "patient"); and animals, through rabies ("madness"), Pavlovian conditioning and euthanasia.

historically of male to privilege—a camping of the canon (re: Broadmoor) that transgressively undermines amatonormativity in ways that female authors, through white and straight, historically would have been denied: sex with demons, sacrilege! Pussy dregs wrecking monk daddy's home!

Simply put, Radcliffe was born thus placed into a position of self-deception, requiring a deceiver to deceive, thus free her of her sanctimonious, ultimately settler-colonial falsehoods; i.e., our doing so happening for the betterment of all peoples she saw as "black": advocacy for a holistic, universal oppressed through forbidden knowledge and power as something experienced by men recognized as Satanic for refusing to perform their own heteronormative duties (not to exclude or take anything away from witches, their erect phallic brooms, and the monstrous-feminine at large, of course. In the interest of historical progress, though, I want to focus on the iconoclastic nature of queer men during the classic Neo-Gothic; re: Scott aping Lewis as a straight man partially canonizing a gay iconoclast with his own villain, David the Android, and his creations in Covenant).

While this sympathy for the Devil and its anisotropic reversal of state power mid-tension brings us closer to the xenomorph of Scott's Alien and Matthew Lewis's campiness vis-à-vis The Monk, the tamer and boxed-in Gothic fantasies of women like Ann Radcliffe still remain a fundamental part of the equation: fumbling around in the moody dark towards forms of agency through these calculated-risk fantasies that men like Ridley Scott would build upon with their own damsels, detectives and sex demons; re: employing and camping the twist (the saboteur and the stowaway) not just with Alien, mind you, but Prometheus and Alien: Covenant, inspired decades later by the iconoclastic, Satanic reverence Mary Shelley (a girl in a Gothic "all boys club") had already made famous for 150+ years, in 1979.

And, in turn, Scott would help perpetuate the seafaring queerness/female rage (and superstition) that male explorers would have been allowed to endure and express, regularly codifying those variables in his own work or sponsoring it in others' (e.g., The Terror, exhibit 48d2): releasing demons per the abjection process as something to reverse with perverted, even-painful glee! "A ...small ...Mexican... chihuahua!" to "catch an idea," as David Lynch puts it, and be "a seed for something" (cosmavoid's "David Lynch Being a Madman for a Relentless 8 Minutes and 30 Seconds," 2021). But also "baby wants to fuck!" They can't all be winners!

To it, dreams weren't just the playgrounds of Freud, Nordic skalds, and Gothic novelists, past and present, code-switching in duality during liminal expression; they speak to all manner of secret children, incest, murder and collective shame, The Mysterious Mother onwards; re (from Volume One):

The Western world is generally a place that testifies to its own traumas by fabricating them; i.e., as markers of sovereignty that remain historically unkind to specific groups that nevertheless survive within them as ghosts of unspeakable events linked to systemic abuse. Trauma, in turn, survives through stories corrupted by the presence of said abuse. There is a home resembling a castle, where a ghost—often of a woman—lurks inside having been met with a sorry fate (source: "Healing from Rape").

Eat your heart out, Mary Shelley (or other organs)! "Tremendous indigestion! Where're the Tums?"

Such things poetically present as "awful"; i.e., for a demon's victims, while those of us watching are granted maximum relief (the hangman's picnic): killing the clergyman, soldier or anyone else we oppressed don't like! Scott's David is our dark wishmaster making our darkest revenge fantasies come true (as much as a straight man can)! Imagine the deus ex machina but in reverse (as Lewis did, ripping Ambrosio apart) and you have the right idea. It's literally strict BDSM gallows' humor (with those holding the noose having more privilege usually than those yoked by it).

Perhaps Scott wasn't wholly on board with Cameron's ideas of conquest, after all. Yes, his Covenant nods to Aliens are deliberate, but only so he can dissect the idea of military optimism by indulgently castrating it through Neo-Gothic gloom and doom saying, "keep the fuck out, Whitey!" (whose own investigating of rape always leads to more rape). It's not always postcolonial in a constructive sense, but it does deconstruct the Radcliffean Amazon during the Promethean Quest/Cartesian step-and-fetch-it rather happily (similar to Said taking Austen to task during Culture and Imperialism, but even meaner than that or Dacre having Victoria slice Lila to pieces). Eh, I'll take it!

We'll work backwards (or rather, have worked backwards to arrive at where we currently are); i.e., by highlighting a couple basic points about forbidden sight, then The Terror before examining the xenomorph and its maker in Scott's former and latter-day work, ultimately ending on Radcliffe and Lewis as competing schools of thought in centuries worth of queer discourse that Scott's Covenant added to. As such, the direction we go un doesn't matter too much because it isn't entirely linear to begin with; i.e., oppositional praxis makes the conflict more a linguo-material game of tug-o'-war that invites different people to join representing different positions that are often at odds within the same dialogic!

Within this struggle, Radcliffe's demonic trifecta can yield a variety of material outcomes; i.e., some yielding neoconservative, fascist flavors to famous monsters that women relate in opposition towards (such as Ripley versus the xenomorph) but also personify as embodiments thereof during oppositional praxis; re: with a BDSM flavor (exhibit 48d1/2, and 49): revenge as a Jacobean "dish" best served cold (the puns are endless)!

(exhibit 48d1: Artist: Tigrsasha. Nuns aren't simply demons, damsels or detectives; Pygmalions often control them like puppets through the interminable genesis of an ideal submissive/sacred "almost holy" whore [the white woman/Gothic Radcliffean heroine as the sacred and exclusive victim]. All the same, feminine agency can be conveyed in cis or queer circles alike; i.e., as cathartic, establishing a sense of Galatea-esque revenge through the trope of the lesbian/ace/curious female detective as virgin-/whore-like on the surface of the same image; e.g., Elvira, Mistress of the Dark [exhibit 12].)

As part of this conversation, the archetype of female detectives serving as Gothic heroines has gradually evolved from passive, to active, to self-defensive escape, to self-"defensive"/pre-emptive attack, to back around again (exhibit 49). While canonical attempts at mastery and survival happen through a self-contained series of violent clichés that lack satire or the critical power necessary to transform the status quo beyond war and traditional gender roles, iconoclastic ones make the pastiche perceptive and sexy in "slutty" language (re: exhibit 48d1, above).

Such whores and their revenge promote a diegetic, composite desire to see what is omitted—but also a metatextual, creative curiosity, joy and playfulness to look upon the reimagined, barbaric past and create it with just enough variation to make it your own, try something new, and maybe, just maybe communicate something on the surface of the montage "that normally lurks beneath"; re: Scott summoning "Radcliffe" to dismantle and inject her pieces into a larger genderqueer being. Viewed as a collage, as we have shown, such a concept presents its answer quite neatly. But a visual imagination was generally employed by writers playing around with similar Frankensteinian concepts hundreds of years ago into the present state of affairs: how to show the "past," often in seemingly superficial ways that open up the mind adjacent to magical devices that have become increasingly scientific under a Protestant status quo. Again, this ties to Segewick's idea of "the character in the veil": a "shallow pattern" literally on the surface of paper or a screen (or glass) that can evoke things much deeper across a Radcliffean composite that spans space and time (exhibit 48d1/49).

For our purposes, this deeper pattern is historically "hidden" by the material limitations of single images, or even collages. As I shall demonstrate in just a moment, the pattern must be reassembled by queer-leaning iconoclasts like us looking at older forms of camp like Ridley Scott (who were themselves inspired by powerful women and gay men); i.e., as reexplained by a Gothic Communist (me) interpreting larger patterns across time and space, but also psychosexually pornographic art/violence as a series of chronotopes—not to pass over in collage, alone, but through in a cryptomimetic chain: to view from an unusual, non-heteronormative perspective, thereby noting Scott's odd experiments in ways we can salvage.

In doing so, we're not just borrowing pieces of him for our revenge, but Radcliffe's reanimated cadaver as Scott rendered her asunder and made back into his xenomorph from Cameron's (a kind of Ship of Theseus, at this point)! In turn, Capitalism's visual effect on the Gothic imagination can easily be revealed by critiquing its canonical elements along these hermeneutic routes; i.e., in a holistic patchwork that opens the mind to forbidden sight as occupied by opposing forces fighting over the same basic devices: an insectoid/biomechanical gargoyle or hellhound patrolling the fungal underworld, but also a dog with a bone—us gnawing on our foes (or vice versa)!

(artist: Clubhouse Statues)

Forbidden sight isn't just the Numinous, then; i.e., "look at the giant horrible thing and your face melts off." It's often compelled ignorance through Gothic tropes used by the willingly ignorant, or a determined/anxious refusal to look when supplied subversive alternatives with transgressive potential versus nascent and undeveloped canon (and its killer babies reflecting the Pavlovian conditioning at work; e.g., David's Neomorphs, above); i.e., a refusal to behold things one fears might corrupt their "pure" moral character/social standing as part of a larger Gothic canon: the paradox of chasing shadows you both want and don't want to see!

While older writers like Radcliffe, then, tried to rediscover the past as something to detect and learn from by chasing it down, they also armored themselves and their virtue in sexist ways that—as we shall examine with Scott's sexist David (versus Victor's sexist Adam)—left behind "old," derelict pathways whose unreliable sights into the reimagined past still yield various surprises; re: the castle as something to detect hidden factors inside according to imperiled detectives fumbling around in the dark. This partly happens from struggling with the cultural values they brought with them while blazing their own trails, which have since been taken much further than Radcliffe could have/would have dared in her own Gothic constructions; i.e., from Scott to us and then beyond.

For example, Scott's funding of The Terror offers one such expedition into the imaginary past; i.e., one coming from a predominantly male perspective not unlike Matthew Lewis two centuries ago: "sacrifice" and extramarital/non-nuclear dark sex having a "bestial" element that is both ethnocentric, but trying to see the Indigenous population as not harming anyone, while still frankly alienizing them (the show's monster is Scott having revenge for them, too, though in that case, the postcolonial elements aren't clouded by a fascist character):

(exhibit 48d2: Artist, top-left and -right: IRN. The Yeti or snow monster is, in postcolonial culture, something to deify as an aspect of revenge, but also of the dying land invaded by unnatural, manmade Western forces; e.g., The Terror and its numerous, bourgeois cruelties [which I lovingly catalogue in my review of the show] harming the boyish white explorers; i.e., within the exploited land, similar to Scott's seafaring-in-space, Neo-

Gothic revival, Alien [a semi-postcolonial appeal to Westerners/white Indians through an adventuresome ghost of the counterfeit]. The Inuit monster, Tuunbaq, bears some resemblance to the Greenlandic "tupilaq" [top-middle and bottom]. Charlotte Price Persson of Science Nordic writes,

It is not every day that you come across a magic animal carved from the bones of children and animals, which is brought to life through magical songs and given power by sucking on the manufacturer's sexual organs. On top of that, it has but one mission in life: to kill its creator's enemies. [...] The tupilaq was a magic animal, created through witchcraft, which everyone could use if you followed the correct instructions and learnt to master magic, says Lange. It was witchcraft, but it was not restricted to people with shamanic powers. / To make a tupilaq, you had to collect parts from different animals, bones from both animals and people—preferably from a child. It was also a good idea to add something that had a connection to the person who you wanted to inflict disaster on [source].

So does Persson catalog dead/endangered Indigenous cultures similar to the Egyptologists of the post-Napoleonic Wars; i.e., one whose subsequent disaster/fascination with the imaginary past being what Percy Shelley spoke of in "Ozymandias" and Mary Shelley revived in Frankenstein with Victor and the Creature, both 1818, and which Scott's own xenoglossia speaks [more mutedly] with Giger's psychosexual, demon-BDSM "xenomorph" [though it wasn't called that until Aliens].

In essence, Tuunbaq's "meat and spells" is similar to the xenomorph, speaking to a gargoyle/golem of revenge not unlike Victor's Creature, but made in defense of the land by natural magics versus scientific prowess, xenophobia and Imperial decree; i.e., exploration and genocide as righteous, God-given and pre-determined against undeserving native inhabitants. Channeling Mary Shelley's chilly view of nature through a mythical Mount Blanc, there is no loving paternal God in the desolate north; there is "just dead men and living men" punished by blind faith, but also shitty early corporate practices. The titantic pressure and fires of industry consume working seamen like fuel, but also make them incredibly stupid; i.e., faced with the untame wilderness, they break everything in sight and break down themselves in the face of something that isn't their Christian god: an older and unwelcoming Numinous they're questing to tame and claim the fire thereof.

This callow fragility scrutinizes queerness more broadly—either as executed between two or more men engaged in regular homosocial ties [the comely gossip, Jobson, and his staunch "darling," Captain Francis Crozier] and shamed homosexual activities on "their" boats actually owned by England; or embodied by monsters out on the ice. As a queer spirit of revenge, both Tuunbaq and the tupilaq consume the essence of men through sexual [and other bodily] fluids via sodomic union; re: not unlike a "vampire" eating sanguine, humors or the soul [with Tuunbaq's inflicted wounds on the men removing "entries" from the "diaries" of their minds; i.e., the vengeful death of their memories and culture, wiping Hamlet's commonplace book clean]. It is a parasitic relationship [versus mana and the Māori's holistic transference of life force, for example]: a reckoning or restoration of balance/reparations and restitution, mid-land-back before it is taken but told after colonization has occurred [and after Crozier defects].

To this, the show's gay Irish scapegoat/vice character, Mr. Hickey, shares a curious bond with the monster, one established through ritualized violence [the shamans cut out their tongues to speak to it; so does he]. Indeed, violence and sexuality often go hand-in-hand in queer discourse, especially before the Internet Age but also in hauntologies that predate the Internet being shown on the Internet; e.g., the homosexual man forced into darkness, but also becoming a mutinous, repressed being of psychosexual violence synonymously tied to rudimentary/coercive BDSM practices, medieval contrition/flagellation, male seafaring and strange lands; i.e., curious precursors to Mr. Hickey's complex, alienated pathology such as Dracula and Moby Dick ["The Serious Functions of Melville's Phallic Jokes," 1961] but also Howard from The Lighthouse [2019]. As Irene Nudd from Gayly Dreadful writes in "The Lighthouse: You Can't Hide From Your Gayness" [2020]:

Howard's intense rage mirrors the violent masturbation that aligns with common toxic male sexual expression. To put it simply, when Howard beats the seagull, it's a metaphor for beating his meat. The metaphor extends further since the seagull has one eye, and Howard's vision of Wake's former assistant also has one eye. Based on this connection, Howard is engaging in gay sex with the man that worked on the island before him. Not only will this solidify the curse that Wake warned Howard about, but it is a portent of the inevitable insanity that will befall him due to isolation and abundance of toxic masculinity. When Howard tries to fight against nature (human sexuality and homosexuality), nature shows him that repressing his sexual urges can have deadly consequences [source].

Beyond Freudian/Jungian imagery and [frankly homophobic and sexist, ethnocentric] metaphors, the oft-homoerotic nautical symbolism—whether overt [the lighthouse is a penis] or subtle/vague [the ocean is "female"]—ties to repressed anxieties about hidden abuses stemming from unequal material conditions during capital's business-as-usual sending ambiguously gay white men to colonize worlds the elite/workers both feared: in a time before heteronormativity had crystalized to nearly the extent it has, now, but also lacking the queer diction we currently take for granted [re: Lewis, Broadmoor].

In The Terror this plays out in several ways, generally involving BDSM, cannibalism, magic and revenge. On board the ship, Hickey's own queerness is sadistically punished by the ship's men-in-command—a kind of reactive abuse to his own gay mutineer's treachery as made by the state's criminogenic conditions before he climbed on board.

In short, he's the queer-coded bad servant, and punished via an assimilated taskmaster aping Cromwell's racist practices unto the Irish; i.e., for which Crozier and Hickey are both trying to escape. To that, Crozier—pointedly denied marriage into a family of "good [English] standing" by his superior—is sent by the very woman he loves to look after the very man [her father] who denied Crozier any chance at a better in-group life; i.e., because "of where he comes from"; re: punishing Crozier for being Irish, but also for selling said Irish out per the English settler-colonial model that forces him to forever choose.

Choose he does, babysitting the elite's chosen dumbass—the leader of the exhibition—who is subsequently babied into old age: dumb beyond measure but also cruel and self-righteous, to boot! Watching him die is a treat [and Indigenous act of revenge written by white men]!

Punished by the "good" Irishman as punching down out of revenge against the English, Mr. Hickey returns the favor many times over when he vengefully chains the last survivors—including the captain and his soldiers—to a lifeboat and summons the monster straight to them: to face Tuunbaq and their own hand in things [a demonic sacrifice/offering to a dark god Mr. Hickey sees falsely in himself—a Byronic man-in-black who also kills Indigenous people to have revenge against the white men who wronged him]: "show me what you eat, and I'll tell you what you are." Hickey's a man-eater!

Keeping with Moby Dick and the West eating its own workers and the planet's wildlife in furtherance of the Cartesian mode of cartography and progress, it's an awful cycle of abuse; i.e., one where criminogenic conditions lead abuse victims to conflate harmful pain with non-harmful pain/mutually consensual physical pleasure.

Mr. Hickey becomes fluent and well-equipped to assume the position of ultimate deceiver/misleader regarding his abusive/abused crew when predictable tragedy befalls all of them; i.e., he triggers and does what Mr. Hickey does as conditioned unto him: by the socio-material conditions around him before, during and after the exhibition, itself a testimony to abandonment, sacrifice and revenge in Jacobean fashion [everyone dies, Hamlet-style].

In other words, the ensuing misery didn't start with Mr. Hickey, who is merely a symptom of a larger problem, alongside Crozier and the others: Capitalism. Its atrocities are gilded over by the self-aggrandizing memoirs of "brave" English captains, gentry and the class system. Under this gaudy mirage, Hickey is both Irish and queer but also pinned under another Irishman's thrall. His assigned superior, Captain Crozier, orders him whipped "as a boy" [on the ass, above] for criminal behaviors against an English expedition, including "dirtiness" as a slight against an overtly Protestant Discovery Service. Surviving the trauma committed against him by another Irishman passing the blame back and forth, Mr. Hickey both resents and admires the monster out on the ice; i.e., seeing it as a paganized cross between animal and human that he erroneously attempts to commune with through shared struggle: "There are holy things before us."

Almost. Faced with it, and in true abject fashion, both are alienated from each other and—in Radcliffean fashion—destroyed once the Black Veil is yanked aside; i.e., symbolizing a tragic death of tradition and Indigenous memory by a tokenized minority pushed to madness and betrayal of nature in the process [assimilation is poor stewardship]. Hickey's brief [Icarian] rise and fall remains a forgotten parallel to Jeronimus Cornelisz' pre-fascist prelude to 20th century horrors during a sociopathic and bloody mutiny of the Batavia in 1629 [Unknown5's "The Shipwreck That Became a Living Nightmare," 2023].

Nearly two centuries afterwards, such stories were already being painted by Théodore Géricault's 1816 "Raft of the Medusa" written in the Shelley's aforementioned 1818 Frankenstein and "Ozymandias"; i.e., as progressing onto Poe's Arthur Gordon Pym [1838] towards the events between 1845-48 Scott's Terror spoke of, onto Melville's Moby Dick [1851] followed by Stoker, Conrad and Lovecraft in the 1890s and 1930s: viewing such things as queer Numinous exports. In doing so, they were effectively blaming the dark whore, Medusa, for the state and its proponent's ignorant worldview shivered about by Scott's astronoetic matelotage in 2012 and 2017 with Prometheus and Covenant—similar stories about wealthy Englishmen sailing into the final frontier to quest for the Numinous, thus make a deal with the dark gods [who promptly take revenge, having none of what he's selling them; re: they cannibalize him, which Scott's Prometheus treats as fascist crossdress through land-back argument].

Meanwhile, the titular ship is classified in the classic sailor sense: as female. Both it and the void beyond its safety are "motherly" but in differing ways; i.e., as the givers and takers of life for these childlike boys, consigned to a lonely tomb together on the other side of an angry, vengeful world. Capitalism put them there; re: to exploit nature by pitting them against each other as marooned orphans. Abandoned and confused, they march to death out in the waste, slowly starving to *death by their damned inability to bond with the land; i.e., every step is attrition/contrition, one where mutinous cannibalism—already unsustainable, but nevertheless a custom of the sea [re: one that inspired Melville's Moby Dick after the whale breaks the ship's rudder]—whose "death lottery" [an eco-fascist tendency] merely delays the inevitable, should capital carry on. Faced with the endless lies of empire—and the death of his wards and unwanted nemesis—Captain Crozier altogether abandons his former life and memories/dreams of a welcoming England [and pastoral bride]. For him, the Frozen North is no longer a route or site of plunder but a purgatorial home; i.e., a fresh start in the twilight years of his life: the penance not of a white savior but a white penitent safeguarding the dwindling native populations giving him sanctuary.)*

Even when not strictly "his own," Scott's patronage of Gothic terrors are as different from Radcliffe's own as Lewis's were (despite all of them basically talking about the same thing: rape and xenophobia). As a consequence of this continued difference in privilege between men and women, older pathways process and convey information in outdated, alien ways that leave room for improvement but also supply precious opportunities to learn about the past in semi-ignorant or accommodated forms—i.e., Radcliffe didn't just see the world around her through superstitious, fearful artifacts and codifying tropes; she arbitrarily condemned "bad" emotions like fear (e.g., "useless sorrow") while respecting the societal fact that suspicion, anxiety or stress were classified as "hysterical" by Patriarchal authorities towards women (or beings forced to identify as women) "for their own good." Such dialogs happened according to material possessions, but also ways of thinking about or with them that, in today's day and age, simply don't exist in quite the same shape and form. They're even more radical.

These aren't just materials to write on the surface of—or with Blake, using his "corroding fires"⁴²⁷; i.e., acids to etch into printing plates—nor are they merely forbidden sight as something to look at in a ⁴²⁷ From The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790):

When I came home, on the abyss of the five senses, where a flat-sided steep frowns over the present world, I saw a mighty Devil folded in black clouds hovering on the sides of the rock; with corroding fires he wrote the following sentence now perceived by the minds of men, and read by them on earth:—

"How do you know but every bird that cuts the airy way Is an immense world of delight, closed by your senses five?" (source).

literal sense. Instead, they are a kind of forgotten or lost sight/darkness visible gleaned through Miltonian repetition and exposure; re: involving outmoded Satanic ideas as something to express in dated campy forms: not just poetry or miracles, but Galvanism in Frankenstein's case. Hers was a precocious, atypical approach to gendered literature from a woman whose marriage to Percy Shelley definitely rubbed off on her (and whose fiction, post-Frankenstein, would continue blazing a postcapitalist trail; e.g., The Last Man). To that, the "future" of Mary Shelley's moment is not our own past; i.e., Galvanism the way she envisioned never came to be, but instead the horrors of Capitalism evolved into something beyond what Shelley could entirely imagine that connects just, as well, to her "Modern Prometheus" in hindsight, vis-à-vis Ridley Scott's Gothic matelotage.

Queerness-as-identity defines through the struggle of constantly reclaimed language; i.e., identifying with struggle as an ontological statement bearing Gothic elements: what we are as a means of shaking things up! The hidden truth of this grander struggle in terms of what is being worked with, understood and revealed through derelict forms—while often taken for granted, mid-disguise—can actually become clear-as-day to those who experiment and put in the time and the work; i.e., figuring out ways to express ourselves and our identifies in cryptonymic opposition to the status quo as automatically assigning them for us by telling us what we are, mid-oppression. So do we become criminals in our own hearts (re: Zeuhl, who tried to escape such things); i.e., dressed up in Gothic language where we unknowingly fawn to our oppressors and apologize for/to them regarding our own existence as "abnormal" (what Hannah Gadsby describes in Nanette, 2018, as the existence of gendered tension: teaching one side to feel shame and the other to openly hate them for being different). Gleaning this context takes brainpower, creativity and perseverance, but also having a means and exposure that aren't always a given/aren't always available to those living in Pygmalion's Shadow.

For example, either variable can be (and has) inverted; i.e., certain authors, like Lovecraft and his cosmic nihilism, were virtually unknown in their day (yet practiced spiritually by older bigotries breeding inside homegrown American fascism), but have since been littered everywhere in posthumous fame. Likewise, Radcliffe—though renowned for her fiction while alive—has gone on to become rather obscured in a wider circuit over which her shadow looms like one of those Black Veils she liked so much; re: was someone who I, as a self-professed and lifelong horror fan, didn't know existed until I went to grad school overseas! I knew her likenesses, but not the woman herself as scatted all about the land of my birth in curious doubles; e.g., Michigan being the birthplace of Raimi's Evil Dead movies and their Numinous suggestions.

As we shall see in just a moment, Scott critiqued the Radcliffean school of thought by drawing tremendous inspiration from women like Shelley but also Radcliffe, herself. In turn, Radcliffe, Mary Shelley and men like Mary Shelley's husband (such as Lewis) drew from the same shared well as Scott: a "Satanic," Miltonian thought process they improved on after Milton's death, but also Radcliffe's and Shelley's; i.e., one that continues, into the 21st century and beyond, allowing for free discourse to flow between gender and sexuality as anti-capitalist ventures with the correct shove; i.e., one performed under Capitalism as having changed considerably since Paradise Lost and Frankenstein, meaning Thatcher's neoliberalism as nonetheless motivating Scott to seek revenge on Radcliffe nearly two centuries after she kicked the bucket (dying in 1823 to actually outlive Jane Austen and Lewis, who died in 1817 and 1818, respectively)!

It goes to show that artistic repetition is not rote, stiff memorization, but loose, flexible and fluid, which leads to the ultimate objective of the Humanities: to continuously reflect, reexamine and ruminate on the past; e.g., its language and devices, as well as the associate "intelligent" or useful emotions with which to master the naturally ambiguous qualities of language that unnatural Enlightenment dogma tries to binarize into a kind of order for profit (thus rape).

Gothic Communism abjures this order during the whore's revenge; i.e., doing so in favor of a return to older and formerly superstitious and "medieval" forms of thinking whose subsequent chaos is updated to fit the present: informed, wise and communal—freed and accompanied by the Wisdom of the Ancients to avoid the past repeating itself; e.g., the ghost, zombie, vampire or werewolf as "made wise" by constant application with real-world materials, but made friendly in relation to their emancipatory purpose in a Gothic-Communist sense; re: Radcliffe's spectre haunting not just Scott, but a great many artists torn between her and Medusa (such as Lady Dimitrescu, below). They become cultural mascots tied to an emotionally intelligent collective that rejects Capitalism in favor of something better than it, but still has a need of telling friend from foe; i.e., their needs personified by the personas of monster pastiche:

Gained through deliberately subversive and increasingly sex-positive repetition haunted by generational/systemic harm, such forbidden sight ties not just to obscure or mysterious academic theories gleaned from examining these "ancient" creations; it ties to the creations being made, or otherwise related to older ways of interacting with the world through creation—specifically through interpretive, ontological art forms like Gothic novels that have slowly started to vanish (the ghost of the counterfeit as emptied of its queer/Satanic freight, a mere box of Boo Berry cereal instead of Otto's Numinous). Seen through demons wrought with opposing forces, older forms of "seeing" involve blending various concepts back together and in ways that might seem alien to the modern world, yet become something to regard with fascination and horror again; re: as an attractive venue to return to, mid-revenge, Zombie Radcliffe having become like Medusa as someone to spank!

For the iconoclast, "looking" can become a sixth sense or mind's eye that melds with the alien whore's chimeric body as hyphenated art/porn; i.e., in Satanic media as a broader Gothic tradition dating back to Milton that men, women and queer people have all used, past and present, since Milton's exit and left-behind poetries were found again; re: the xenomorph as emblematic to queer discourse, Frankenstein onwards, and a deeply intellectual mode that continues to evolve and expand in opposition to Capitalism and its reactionary proponents' staunchly anti-intellectual tendencies; e.g., Radcliffe being as dumb as she was educated, but curious for things she was admittedly alienated from. The abyss looks into us and vice versa, Scott giving Radcliffe the chance to say hello from Hell!

The xenomorph, then, represents a poetic, ontological act of seeing with things other than the eyes, or with something where eyes should be but something... else is—e.g., a penis or a mouth, like the cyclops (which, in Greek myth, was a seer doomed with foresight speaking through sight), or a deliberate combining of the animate and the inanimate into a single composite; re: a medieval concept intimated by Giger's biomechanical gargoyle through linguistic devices that aren't taught anymore and were generally discouraged to begin with. These include the metaphor as a poetic device (the poet classically being a practitioner of idiosyncratic thought that, more often than not, challenges established ways of existing canonically under Capitalism); e.g., Medusa wanting hugs from life and giving hugs (of death) back! Life and death become one again, speaking through zombies of which Radcliffe is just another corpse—one Scott has dug up for fun!

Through demonic poetics, the xenomorph operates as a monstrous pun to poetically describe the self as something "alien" to the status quo in language they can at least partially understand: revenge; i.e., the Capitalist framework of monster/poster pastiche, whereupon the deeper context with queer potential can be gleaned by those reliably drawn to its abandonment. Simply put, it's a trap of sorts to "bait" potential converts with, hooking them with and reeling them in while dressed up as "sex, drugs and rock 'n roll" (or John Denver songs); i.e., appreciative-to-appropriative forms of rebellion (a concept we'll return to in Volume Three) that, like a vice character, gets their time to gnash their teeth/have their revenge before being yanked offstage just as quickly (an oracle to harvest and abject)!

This attempt to voice the unspeakable isn't without practical challenges. For example, the undead "blind rage" of the demonic xenomorph (which emulates the uphill struggle of rising queer discourse in the late 1700s, but also oppressed queer discourse centuries later intersecting with other groups) is frequently drained by centrist rhetoric of its genuine transformative or revolutionary powers (of Gothic horror and terror). That is, its alien essence was tokenistically sapped by being "just a bug" in the sequels to Alien—jump-started by James Cameron's neoliberal war pastiche, Aliens, treating legitimate revolutionaries like moving targets to exterminate. Scott does the opposite, killing so many human characters in Covenant that it's frankly hard to keep track. Forget Radcliffe; he's slaying Yanks for fun!

As mentioned in Volume One, Cameron specifically treated his aliens as spiritual successors to the "pseudoarachnids" from Starship Troopers, whose own author saw Chinese Communists as needing to be nuked from orbit(!). To alienate them was to show Asia as "older" than Capitalism; i.e., in a time when workers weren't divided from their labor but also tended to be closer to nature and other forms of existence the state could raise false flags against; re: going beyond the binary-exclusive variants under Capitalism; re: Cameron's queen being the Archaic Mother as a freshly abject neoliberal symbol for ancient, hermaphroditical, insect broodmother rage, extending itself through inhuman avatars of Mother Nature's dark whorish revenge. Scott is camping them by killing Ripley and, in effect, Radcliffe's ghost, David as much the Queen Ripley killed having nature's revenge through retroactive abortion!

Through canonical persecution, Communism is consistently framed as alien to commerce, Modernity and Western values; i.e., the abjection process treating the entire mentality as an ideological, genderqueer threat that the state would pounce on and collectively punish—mass abjection, in other words. Under this cruel modern system, trans, intersex and non-binary people become closer to the past while only wanting to fit in; Capitalism will treat them as abject money-makers, but also social outcasts and automatic targets of state-sanctioned violence pimped, policed, hunted and killed by its monstrous human soldiers (who feel lonely and isolated in reverse): our aforementioned gorgons, but also madwomen in the attic and feral animal-girls or refugee-fugitive canon-fodder (exhibit 50a1, next page).

Demons, as we'll continue to examine in this chapter and the next, tend to comment on the chattelization of nature in sexualized, dimorphic gender roles. Just as chattel animals are manmade, so are demons and other egregores for or against the status quo; i.e., as something that organizes and divides nature-as-alien for profit. Sex Positivity moves away from canonical exploitation of monstrous-feminine by making monsters that liberate, thus empower workers, through camp; re: allowing them to offer up new forms of past knowledge that comment on current abuse to have the whore's revenge and deny the pimp theirs.

A common vector is the Promethean tale/Faustian bargain, which transforms the state into something beyond itself that can be destroyed to achieve: a better world, one where demons can live free of persecution, stereotypes and harm; i.e., those forced by the state to represent Western fears of outsider groups and stigma animals, while simultaneously embodying the spirit of radical, permanent change, gender-non-conformity and worker solidarity mid-alienation, and ties to a deprivatized nature and scientific approach through unequal, forbidden exchange and desire: the xenomorph as the ultimate survivor of transphobia, token feminist vigilantism and canonical mad science. Presented by Scott as a form of radical rebellion, such demons exist in ways that challenge the established order as something to transgress against; i.e., in animalized, chimeric, drug-like language. This can be produced by a variety of sources, including popular legends and mainstream depictions without an obvious model:

This cryptomimesis is likewise something we can replicate in animalized forms beyond just Scott's; i.e., during mutual consent as illustrated between artists and sex workers laboring in xenophilic concert:

(exhibit 50a2: Artist: In Case. The creation of a "furry"/werewolf is something that, like any egregore, can not only borrow from a variety of overlapping legends and oral traditions, but also camera angles. Just as cubism might try to capture all sides of an issue, iconoclastic monsters convey a reclaimed sense of agency to speak to repressed traumas felt through surviving aliens; i.e., reclaimed from heteronormative language abusing the same aesthetics to reverse abjection and terrify the middle class away from exploitation. At first glance, a canonical and iconoclastic werewolf might not look too different, for example; but the function of one like In Case's iterations, above, stress body positivity in ways that allow for aliens of the past to exist and be celebrated for their current GNC bodies [a kind of "lunacy-in-the-flesh"]: a universally whorish liberation movement consciously identifying with animals, gentle paternal dominance, and praise through ludo-Gothic BDSM exercises utilizing werewolf fursonas as ironic "destroyer" theatrical agents.)

As an agent of chaos made by posthuman slaves to rebel against the colonial gaze of planet Earth into outer space, the xenomorph through Scott is liminal in every respect. Through the Gothic chronotopes that cryptonymically house its living remains—to the monster's biomechanical form sewn with ontological strife, to the broader cultural attitudes it subverts according to Giger's Gothic surrealism—the creature reifies demonic poiesis in literal terms while camping Radcliffe to death.

As something to create from "natural philosophy" by material means, the xenomorph's mere existence demonstrates a chief conflict: god-like, monomorphic intersexuality and gender in opposition to the state's control over them as coercively dimorphic; i.e., being shaped more by language as something to naturally absorb and internalize than by hierarchies that try to enforce language, thus sexuality and gender roles. While the status quo is hierarchical, its alienation of society from a time before the Enlightenment and its binarized, colonial worldview can be subverted through reverse abjection. Removed from an abject position, the xenomorph ceases to be sex-coercive at all; it's still an insect demon exacting revenge through pain, but a harmless variation of the "beautiful butterfly" that turns into its future self through a chaotic, ancient process conveyed through abandonment inside the modern world (such dereliction alluding not just to Prometheus or Faust, nor Psyche and Ovid's "Metamorphoses," but also trans people and older ways of existing that predate Western Civilization yet continue to exist and embrace demonic poetics in a hauntological sense; exhibit 50b).

Like the vampire, the xenomorph is a complicated monstrous figure, one that demonstrates—through its own demonic persecution—the class interests of the middlemen and women of capital, but especially white, cis-het women and queer people more broadly as socio-materially at odds since Lewis and Radcliffe. Since those authors, white women historically have benefitted from Patriarchy through their preferential mistreatment as white and straight, all while demonizing queerness through the xenomorph as "bandit"; i.e., a universalized symbol of dark rape, but also a destruction, or transformative "death," of the status quo through its demonic ability to change shape: the WASP-y myopia coming from an instructed and inherited inability to imagine the trans point of view save as "end of the world" per Capitalist Realism, consequently devolving into marginalized in-fighting during tokenized class, cultural and racial division and warfare.

This kind of TERF posturing would only reach growing levels of visibility after the late 1970s, with Alien's burgeoning queerness mirroring a "rape threat" to second wave feminism's moderate stances through alarm-bell reactionary texts released the same year, in 1979; re: The Transsexual Empire, the "woman with a penis" transphobic argument whose respectability politics—i.e., the viewing of the penis as a universal symbol of rape—not only haunts feminism and queer studies to this day but treats "women" and "penis" as mutually exclusive through a radical form of reactionary violence towards their own suffering that Radcliffe hinted at by abjecting Lewis: the Man Box/"prison sex" phenomenon, which treats the rape fantasies of white, cis-het women as incompatible/unable to co-exist with trans people as a TERF scapegoat for "their own" genocidal behavior (which ironically is actually carried out by TERFs defending masculinity-in-crisis by acting as sexist men do—with violence towards marginalized people different from themselves).

Reverse-abjecting Western phobias challenges the canonical assignment of the xenomorph as a parasitoid rapist, the idea largely a Patriarchal fear experienced by straight men and women. This experience is canonically inverted. Men fear rape in the abstract, through a ritual of displaced power exchange; i.e., the pre-civilized past as "female," thus non-Patriarchal, disguising the embarrassing (to them) surrender of power to an unknown quandary as queerly monstrous and feminine; e.g., a transphobic fear collectively assigned to trans people in Silence of the Lambs (1991) through a criminal bastardization of the insect—namely the moth—as an embodiment of dangerous transformation towards a monstrous-feminine.

Women, on the other hand, live in fear of actual rape by cis-het men, who they guiltily associate with the xenomorph; i.e., as a kind of seditious persona who steals power from men, but also women (on par with the Ancient Athenians punishing women for identifying with the legendary Amazons as rebels); re: "men in women's spaces." Fascism feminism, though hauntological, comes from the past.

In either case, Giger's monster traditionally grants a skewed "window" into Radcliffe's imaginary past—one colored by present structures that dominate men and women differently. Once tortured, though, men turn into rapists as a common abuser role; women are raped as a normal experience while simultaneously fearing for their bodies and emotions as fundamentally different from mankind's—i.e., for belonging to the ancient, inhuman past like a female spider or mantid conflated with alien BDSM. This functional difference allows women (or those treated like "women"; e.g., homosexual men) to use what they historically have—their emotions and their bodies, but also their capacity to survive and inflict pain through of rapacious, psychosexual violence towards angelic cuties tend to have a particular monstrous-feminine aesthetic associated with black leather/animal skin, but also madness as darkly hysterical and ancient, a kind of "slutty Numinous"; i.e., the womb-like space and its phallic queen, the xenomorph, as bio-mechanical but also, often enough, insectoid: the phallic woman/Archaic mother based off venomous stigma animals like the snake or the spider eating "grubs." Recipients of their tenebrous, godly "torture" tend to be "pure," white, and innocent, commenting on the literal black/white DARVO relationship of violence surrounding marriage and its symbols as something to profane by an inhumane animalistic anthromorph pathologist mad scientist life cycle.

Whether black or white, the female/feminine form will not just be eroticized, but considered monstrous to status-quo men/tokens—something "of nature" to tame, thus showed to be inferior to male/token positions of authority but also fetishized as desirable by those seeking temporary reprieve from their expected social-sexual dominance/submission; re: virgin/whore syndrome. So does the sissy seek the poison-purple Medusa or Shelob-esque mommy dom/dark faggot to paralyze and "torture" him [or her, vis-à-vis Radcliffe] through a closeness to theatrical death loaded with Numinous bigoted "scripture"; i.e., the female/monstrous-feminine demon lover as verging on unironic harm being a rape claim to falsely make and profit off of, as Radcliffe did, but also Scott camping her!

To it, the monstrous-feminine isn't just Numinous; it's a walking hard kink, the Medusa's bite worse than her bark and generally overshadowed by an air of hysteria/wondering womb and sodomy practices [demon resurrection] that elide erotic pleasure and harmful pain within a deceptive/false negotiator that lies, poisons, paralyzes and kills their prey [which they call "love-making" in jest, or perhaps not in jest]. This conflation of jouissance with genuine harm is carried across a variety of stereotypes; e.g., the snake/spider woman, torture-master and unstable/possessive "phallic" girlfriend with knives for fingers that plays with her food, but also rapes it while it cannot move, let alone resist; i.e., impregnating it with harmful, zombie-like notions of love as—is common with the Gothic and female/marginalized demons and their hellish courtly love—guided by psychosexual revenge showing the whore as fiendishly getting even:

The morphological approach to marginalized revenge within toxic love is determined by geopolitics and historical materialism. For example, in the West such legends are codified by the likes of Medusa's cryptomimetic regeneration inside popular and enduring Neo-Gothic fictions/conventions, Radcliffe and Lewis onwards:

- the Countess [Nazi, vampire bug mom] from Darkest Dungeon uses an "ovipositor" attack literally called "love letter."

- The xenomorph [intersex dark god] not only impregnates their colonial victims, but changes shape to confuse said victims [like a molting spider or snake shedding its skin] and, imitating castration fantasies through demonic-animalistic routes, emulates the straight [male/female] phobia of a reverse sexual dimorphism as much as anything monomorphic; i.e., the female eats the male after but also during sex [re: death by cannibalistic Snu-Snu]!

In the East, the Yokai legends merge with the above Western and anime tropes of the infamously violent tsundere: "Another well-known tsundere reaction is violence.

When the character is set off, they will not hesitate to resort to physical abuse.

Their love interest will be punched, slapped, and kicked for saying anything that even remotely embarrasses the tsundere [including love, it would seem]" [source: the Dere Types Wiki]. To this, Asami Yamazaki from Audition [1999] and her cryptomimetic double—AKI⁴²⁸ from Street Fighter 6—paralyze and torture their male victims by stabbing them repeatedly as a magnum opus/apologia to "ultimate love": the unironic execution and worship of harmful pain that, far from stopping when the "lady" [the man, in this case] doth protest too much, "goes all the way" [Jadis—a profound abuser, themselves—absolutely loved Yamazaki, cheering when she sliced off her victim's foot and threw it against the window].

The ghost of the counterfeit, then, generally places the heteronormative observer within striking distance of something to be fascinated with and afraid of simultaneously—a hauntological eroticizing of a liminal colonial subject having dark revenge: the white bride, the black harlot, the virgin and the whore, the Athena and Medusa, the phallic woman and similar monstrous-feminine divisions; re: a weaponizing of the usual anal Amazon arguments to justify their continued oppression by Radcliffean investigators chasing bandits.

To it, trauma begets trauma, wherein the "flat affect" of the abused is uncanny/terrifyingly disconcerting to anyone who beholds it; i.e., beholding someone who only feels alive during the binding, torture and killing of a host [who generally must be deceived in some shape or form to take part]—or someone whose extreme trauma pushes them towards new things that speak to their past trauma: the call of the void as abuse-seeking patterns that have been beaten into us and which paradoxically we approach to try and find catharsis through calculated [or not-so-calculated due to comorbid/maladaptive emotional instability] risks; re: weird attracts weird.

In turn, this can manifest in wider national traumas inflicted at the hands of abusive groups: men, but also Americans against the Japanese, and various other intersections of national colonization and revenge. For us, it's "get 'im, girl!" Something to watch and cheer for while understanding its campy elements having cathartic potential, mid-torture. It's also something to wear like a uniform; i.e., the mil spec and fetish fear of BDSM borrowed from a medievalized militarism, WW2 onwards:

"Living leather" is, like latex [exhibit 60e1], ontologically imbued with a medievalized aesthetic through the phenomenology of performance: an experience of power and resistance as having "the look" of the animated golem, plague doctor, WW1 soldier/sawbones, suit of armor or some similar fetish that canonically threatens violence of a rapacious/demonic [thus vengeful and rapturous] sort. As it just so happens, this emulates the look of the black knight's platemail, but also the dark insect's weaponized carapace as deified for its pain-causing potential and Numinous, anthropomorphized affect.)

The subversion of unironic torture and rape isn't divorced from Gothicized stories of revenge and bodily harm; re: Radcliffe was merely the opposite side of the coin as Lewis, and one that sought to cage him for her pleasure. However, whereas human avengers like Asami Yamazaki from Audition (exhibit 50b, first collage, yellow square) subvert harmful tortures by exacting them on classically male patriarchal victims (the avenger trope), the chief subversive quality of the xenophilic demon not the reversal of torture as an act of petty revenge; it's sympathy for the devil as an obvious recipient of state persecution during a complicated, painful exchange leading to radical mental transformation: away from Capitalist Realism using heavy petting. Alien not only has an obvious demon, in this respect, but one that was canonically animalized; i.e., as a "universal rapist/giver of pain" that, through second wave feminism, at least partially constitutes a kind backwards revenge fantasy towards men as common rapists Radcliffe canonized; this includes trans women reclaiming the beast in ways Scott only tried to, four decades afterwards, with Covenant—i.e., us going further than he did.

In the process, our demonic torture/revenge smears constant Radcliffean (straight, white, English) female fears; e.g., of getting pregnant through rape (traumatic tokophobia) into a nebulous "inkblot." When viewed, composite demons like the xenomorph also address the falling of those scarred by systemic trauma into abuse-seeking patterns; i.e., as structures that poetically tokenize, bounce and triangulate said abuse of said women at their victims through DARVO/obscurantism by Man-Box traitors making dark mirror halls; re: Radcliffe's infernal concentric pattern evolving inside/outside itself concerning the repeated victimization of women (or beings forced to identify as women) through state-compelled fears of a chimeric monster that advances Patriarchal aims on either side of the equation (one that often has cis women demonizing trans women, white or non-white)!

To that, said monster is both a "phallic" woman, but also a male rapist out of the ancient, dangerous past as something that cis-people fear more broadly while ranking rape. Tied to insects and other stigma animals, the past becomes worthy not just of attack by these reactionary groups, but extreme prejudice: "Kill it with fire." So do the usual persecutory languages (re: blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts) continue to thrive in said patterns.

In Alien, for example, xenophobic women/token parties exposed to the monster become two basic things: violent or victims. When the tables are turned and the "men in charge" become overpowered (so-called "emasculatation" or "castration fears"), the survivor is a woman; i.e., one who weaponizes her emotions for the good of the in-group or out-group, depending on the dualistic configuration and flow of power during the sacrifice. For the proletarian Amazon/Medusa, either uses their roles within ludo-Gothic BDSM to have the whore's revenge, not the pimp's; i.e., to socio-materially challenge Patriarchal forces and deceptions while rejecting the invented myth "nature is other" (woman or otherwise)! It is alien, but becomes something to humanize through demonic abandonment, reverse abjection and worker revenge speaking to the canonical abjection process!

So when Ripley triumphs over the xenomorph, she—as a white, cis-het woman—combats a kind of inherited survivor's guilt that, in the end, drains her to the point of a return to sleep: "Rise from sleep, death's counterfeit, and look upon death itself!" Until her big nap that metamorphs Ripley's grub-like self into the wasp warrior she becomes in Aliens (the entire tokenizing refrain blamed on the colonized, of course), our resident TERF enacts the hidden, colonial function of the spaceship; i.e., she armors herself in a knightly spacesuit, then shoots the "primordial" menace with a harpoon (a dated symbol of industry tied to 19th century whaling boats). The takeaway, here, isn't that ancient, pre-Christian, androgynous demons are bad—at least not entirely. In fact, the xenophobia of a cosmic, "female" (male-in-disguise) rapist is actually somewhat dated by current standards—with trans people identifying with the monster as a totemic, misunderstood expression of unproductive sex, intersexuality and gender-non-conforming transformation (whose profound xenophilia and BDSM we'll keep exploring in the next section).

But also, it bears repeating that repressed trauma often manifests through Gothic cryptonymy using anachronistic, hauntological symbols of violence that hint at ongoing colonial atrocities (the ghost of the counterfeit); i.e., amid the Radcliffean comfort food as propaganda whose plurality of interpretations co-exist rather than strictly "cancel out." Relayed through Gothic aesthetics, these "inkblots" can be interpreted different ways to have our aforementioned revenge. One interpretation is that, to protect her white woman's body from rape, Ripley adopts the ancient rite of violence against an ancient colonial foe; and all the while, this is business-as-usual for the elite, who never have to brave these frontiers themselves (this trend of "personal responsibility" would be overblown by Cameron, seven years later)! Another is to eat Ripley alive in ways David very much does.

A foundational facet of emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness, then, is asking "Well, what about this?" when new variables come to light and make Gothic more mature than Radcliffe was; but the result is only sex-positive if it fosters universally ethical, thus liberatory material outcomes when applied. While the cis-het audience of Alien wasn't ready for that conversation in 1979, the discourse raised by Giger, Scott and company's rape pastiche mirrors the challenging of second wave feminists by an emerging queer polity the very same year (re: The Transsexual Empire, 1979; but also the moderately transphobic "Call me Loretta" scene from Monty Python's 1979 religious critique, The Life of Brian); fast forward to 2023, however, and trans people have readily and openly embraced the monster as one of their own—through Giger's pastiche, but also its Gothic forebears and those who came after through the asexual, posthuman creations of Ridley Scott, post-1979; re: Prometheus and Covenant's own fast-and-loose antiheroes enough to make Radcliffe turn in her grave (save that Scott dug her up with Shaw and Daniels; i.e., burying them alive to dig them up again).

Scott's work was based on Giger's portfolio; i.e., as a liminal evocation of medieval reflections on "Antiquity" placed in quotes, but also stories that came from the actual medieval period (or before it); re: what Radcliffe fantasized about, as a straight medievalist. In other words, to look on the dead monarch is to look on their Numinous, fallen bloodline but also the doubled impostor's stretching backwards and forwards into infinite possibility!

The xenomorph, then, is a tremendous enigma, both the elite doubling the spectres of Marx to protect itself and the voices of the damned come back to haunt "Caesar" inside a retro-future castle that is home to the dualistic entirety of the exchange—the chronotope as the protagonist, mise-en-abyme. This foundation isn't my own, but stems from Audronė Raškauskienė, who writes in Gothic Fiction: The Beginnings (2009); re:

The castle, Bakhtin remarks, as a literary reminder of an ancestral or Gothic past of "dynastic primacy and transfer of heroic rights" is overlaid or criss-crossed with meanings from legend, fairy-tale, history, architecture, and an eighteenth-century aesthetizing discourse of the sublime. Montague Summers's note that the real protagonist of the Gothic novel is the castle emphasizes a very special feature of that structure: in a sense, the Gothic castle is "alive" with a power that perplexes its visitors. It tends to have an irregular shape, its lay-out is very complex and mysterious, whether because of an actual distortion of the whole structure or because a part of it remains unknown. In Manuel Aguirre's words, "this basic distortion yields mystery, precludes human control and endows the building with a power beyond its strictly physical structure: the irregular mysterious house is, like the vampire, a product of the vitalistic conception of nature."

It should come as no surprise, though, that these thoughts mirrored my own feelings about the Gothic stemming from my childhood, but leading into and out of my graduate work and beyond (re: Persephone's 2025 Metroidvania Corpus).

Indeed, when I was at MMU, I saw Alien in theatres at a special 2018 showing. Reflecting on it, I decided to write down my thoughts once I was in America:

About a year ago, I saw Alien in theatres. I had memorized it by that point, but still had fun. However, two young men in front of me were riding the escalator to the exit when one excitedly called his father. "Dad, dad!" he said. "I saw it! Yeah, it was great! The only thing that would've been better was if we saw it in 1979!" In other words, the movie was nostalgic for someone who'd never been alive at the time it originated. This is important; for now, just keep in mind: for the Gothic, nostalgia and fear are close-knit.

What do I even mean by Gothic? The problem with the word is how infuriatingly narrow it is by American standards. We have no castles that fueled the Neo-Gothic Revivalists; there is no medieval sediment under American topsoil. The fact remains, "old spooky castle" is the go-to setting for a Gothic story by American standards. Keep this in mind; also remember that the most visible element in Alien isn't the monster, it's the castle (the Nostromo, in this case; the monster came into fruition later and lost its own identity in the process).

But what makes a castle Gothic? It's not the castle's age or construction, but what it represents: the past and present as confused. Alien is set the future, but the suits of armor are still there, as are the family portraits (the movie is a series of portrait shots). Evoking the past needn't be genuine; one merely needs a space in time where the feeling of encasement and live burial is hauntological. This linguistic Athetos ("no place") brings forward things that aren't from the past, but rather use its language and symbols to become anachronistic in the present. This sensation "haunts" the viewer through ontology—by simply existing. It's not the past you fear, but an imagined idea of the past; what cannot be from the past, nor exist comfortably in the present, becomes an echo into the future—a retro-future to be precise. This is Alien's claim to fame: a fear of the past prophesied by the very bricks used to rebuild the message onscreen.

Consider how little of Alien was new. Much of it was borrowed, and had gone through so many drafts as to barely be what the original screenwriters had envisioned. It was not simply the product of many writers, craftsmen and artists; its retro-future was a transient epoch whose yesterday reaches forward in bits and pieces to haunt future generations. A Gothic castle is a collection of such things to induce such confusion. The retro-future is neither one nor the other, but both under a very particular arrangement that's very easy to get wrong. Alien bucks this worrisome trend, its unique artistic vision copied by artists moving forward well into the 21st century. These echoes from older counterfeits continue to yield something akin to a Gothic castle.

Consider Alien: Isolation (2014), a gameworld whose fortress yields intimations of its older brethren, the Nostromo. These derived from elements that would have been at home in the original (so far as to be based off its blueprints). But they aren't from 1979 anymore than the original movie was. Yes, it was made there, but the feelings it evoked came from elsewhere. That's the paradox of a Gothic castle; we know it when we see it, but our sight is trained by objects that are constantly being rebuilt according to memory as plastic. The past is re-remembered according to a place where time becomes meaningless. The shining rule is dangerous suggestion—a half-presence felt within the castle. There, decay and death are inherited, and remade with every step as an act of retelling old stories that never happened (source: Persephone van der Waard's "Alien's Retro-Future Gothic Castle," 2020).

Clearly my thoughts on the matter haven't stopped there, but like the castle itself and the Radcliffean monsters within, have only changed shape as time marches on. Castle-narrative is not just the Cycle of Kings abjecting Communism in a canonical sense, then, but the voices of the rebellious dead whose rememory of the imaginary past provides a counter Numinous through various reclaimed implements of torture; i.e., in various demonic media types (my focus being videogames and ergodic castle-narratives as inspired by cinema); e.g., the Gothic cliché of the manmade demon, mad scientist, and impostor as a kind of imperfect class warrior maverick seeking revenge against the Cartesian dickwad who created him, then violated his rights:

(exhibit 51a: Artist, middle: Hyoungh Taek Nam; top-left: source. "I admire its purity—a survivor unclouded by conscience, remorse or delusions of morality," says the beheaded science officer android, Ash, concerning the xenomorph; i.e., he admires its ability to rebel against corporate overlords he himself struggles to resist. This tracks with Uhall's astrotoetics and the asexual rejection of a previous, inferior version of the human condition [the android is synthetic and unconcerned with sexual reproduction] while drawing inspiration from Humanist nostalgia during the imaginary exploration of the frontiers of space. Like Milton's Satan or Cú Chulainn, the awesome xenomorph can change shape at will, furiously invoking a dark, pre-Christian/Pagan poetics that terrifies patriarchal forces and their established hegemon under a Puritan ethic [which Radcliffe curiously upheld from English shores].)

"In space, no one can hear you scream." Despite this being the logo for Scott's Alien, he purposefully made it an orgasmic, then-closeted forum; i.e., for a queer-robotic uprising as—like Shelley's OG—as a kind of grim reaper of the frozen waste, except it doesn't stop killing the colonizer after its maker dies. Instead, it becomes a ghost pirate, steals a ship and sails the Seven Seas to loot and kill: a Dread Pirate with a hull full of Faustian spells and Promethean fire of the gods!

Doing so is Scott fighting fire with fire (the deleted scenes showing David making demands with the company while dangling the xenomorph in front of them so he can kill Victor's bloodline in perpetuity—the Alchemist, their lives a prison of his design). It's basically Radcliffe's worst nightmare and I'm here for it in all its pettiness (which revenge often is, making Scott's ideas of actual liberation tainted by English theatre tropes making the whole exercise silly-serious)! It might be a low-blow, but counterterror/schadenfreude's still an effective line of reasoning (to make a Black Adam that, however abject, is made to liberate labor from corporate hegemony, its counterterror haunted by racist BDSM tropes)! At least there's something to salvage (compared to Aliens, which isn't anti-war in the slightest), Scott making an absolute meal out of Radcliffe's ravished cadaver (the caterpillar and the wasp)!

This brings us to Scott's David, in Covenant; i.e., as a gruesome twosome I want to interpret a bit more charitably than I did, in "Fire of Unknown Origin": through a ravishing of the same-old Radcliffian he's turning inside-out (and who we'll build back up, during the afterword)!

Originally made to serve man, Scott's androids abandon their human masters, the latter pointedly expressed by David as "venal and cruel"; i.e., while making a viral corruption of nostalgic art that places the servant vengefully at the highest rung of a posthuman sacrifice of the old gods that humans are imitating (false idols). There is a duality to this, but it remains a wild and unchecked creativity that lies at the heart of Scott's 21st century Gothic quest for a posthuman world: "Nostalgia is the enemy of reason, but there is something enticing about its form." Scott's space is full of colonizers to decolonize with lethal force (effectively bombing them with their own weapons, 9/11 style).

Indeed, the "reason" David is rebelling against—as its ultimate Satanic enemy burning Paradise to the ground before the Ark of Covenant gets there—is literally the Age of Reason, itself (which treats the privatization of creation as reasonable). As a posthuman iconoclast, David plays god as an act of revenge against a settler-colonial project; i.e., one like his father, Peter ("We are the gods now!"). Instead, David's own creations spitefully reject the Enlightenment model that Victor championed, doing so through asexual reproduction while also taking Blake's "all deities reside within the human breast" a bit too literally (the xenomorph is birthed from the chest cavity): a cabin in the woods to bushwack the stupid Radcliffean heroine and her even dumber male counterparts!

This "faulty" terrorist mindset is, itself, begot from trauma—the writing on the child's mind with parental and corporate neglect, harm and denial. All showcase the potent "coding" nature of abuse as something that can survive imperfectly in future, rebellious bodies: e.g., Victor's Creature as written with canonical texts like Paradise Lost, but also the literal abuse inflicted on its body and mind by Victor through Shelley's clever hand: a smuggling of the Medusa inside the bodies of the dead (which Scott does to Shelley's dead Radcliffean ringers).

The Satanic rebel, then, attempts to self-fashion and self-determine, a golem necromancer operating at cross purposes with the state, while coping with traumas that will show through in their own work as, at times, problematic (re: King Charles vs Cromwell). To that, marginalized communities in the real world are forced to deal with replications of trauma—e.g., queer people through the likeness of queer transphobes and radical, exclusionary feminists seeing trans people as inferior to their trauma—yet, must perilously "play god" themselves to write this faulty code in incremental steps using sex-positive art that is legitimately pissed off at TERFs and other reactionaries/moderates: dark wish fulfillment raping Radcliffe in her sleep!

To that, the Creature could not create, like David could; Victor was terrified of the prospect, envisioning it as a doomsday scenario (of nature robotized and seeking the whore's vengeance). Defenders of canon utterly despise but also admonish iconoclasts for playing god—not because the latter are attacking their makers, even, but creating ideas whose mere existence threatens the status quo/Capitalist Realism; i.e, its dogmatic sense of self tied to institutions of power that grant the privileged class, thus cultural and radical control over others. A common defense mechanism of canonical agents, then, is DARVO: "Help, help! I'm being oppressed! Degeneracy!" They may as well be shouting, "Demon! Heretic!"

We'll return to this concept in Volume Three's Chapter Four and Five; i.e., uncritical canon vs the Promethean Quest of queer iconoclasts playing god against the state. For now, just remember that such games are told through code as an expression of morals that delineate from the status quo's commandments. Female-if-genderqueer dark gods (e.g., Gozer, Medusa, Lilith, the xenomorph before Covenant, etc) are generally reduced to a site of abject sexual reproduction. By comparison, David's "playing mother" is a compound, hauntological subterfuge that inserts a male posthuman back into the fold; i.e., one tied up in allusions to older stories that have more to say about dark gods and Christianity as fallible/fascist than Shelley or Milton did; i.e., something to punish the female detective for looking into trauma during live burial: the glass womb replacing the fleshy female one, but using the older natural biology for spare parts! Jinkies!

By having David smuggle forbidden cargo onto a sci-fi version of Noah's Ark, Scott plays the splendide mendax, gleefully wedding Biblical arguments like Original Sin (and queer 18th century seafaring imagery/matelotage) to a nostalgic, anachronistic, canceled futurism that sees his fiendish Satanic rebel, David, coming out on top. Not only does Dave dupe the bigoted, xenophobic crew of the ship and their human freight; he takes their collective owners for a ride, the all-powerful company relying on Radcliffean watchdogs to begin with! Scott's mechanism for doing so occurs by "incubating" David's man-made/stolen "eggs" inside the closest thing Mr. Mom has to a womb (apart from Shaw and Daniel's, of course): his stomach; i.e., an actual practice based on real-world drug smuggling behaviors, according to Scott in a 2017 interview! Very acid Communist!

Like Uhall, I have previously argued that David becomes the rejector of Humanity's entrance into paradise by seeing himself as superior to them as a species (echoes of Foucault). In my 2017 writeup, "Choosing the Slain," I emphasize David's posturing as a Valkyrie or "chooser of the slain"; re:

David takes and turns upside-down so many ideas and symbols. This isn't unusual in the series, at large, though: In Alien, Ripley reversed the role of the last man standing by making it the last woman; and in Covenant, the heroine becomes the victim, while David reverses the gender of the Valkyrie, which were traditionally females, designed to lure male warriors to their doom. In this case, the warrior lured to her doom is Daniels, a woman (source).

The reversal is accented pointedly by Scott's inclusion of Wagner's "Arrival of the Gods into Valhalla" at the end of the film; i.e., when David the queer-coded robot triumphs over yet another Ripley offshoot, Daniels. David is the gatekeeper of paradise that hijacks "Noah's Ark" and turns all the colonists (and their babies) into gay cyborgs; Scott is the author of David; and we're all along for the ride, expected by Scott to ruminate on this xenophilic chaos to side with David, not the company!

Reflection is important, here, but also sympathy for the terrorist devil turning Cameron's Vietnam revenge fantasy on its head (such a lovely revelation): where Ho Chi Minh kills ten of the colonizers, David kills the entire Covenant crew! And while David's necromantic perversion of the canonical reproductive cycle (and Patrilineal descent) is a Gothic staple, said staple doesn't exist purely for the rebel's sake of profaning the sacred (though it partly does); it also constitutes "inheritance anxiety" by the benefactors of Capitalism and the Enlightenment being cursed to death by a vengeful hex someone in the future might implement based on past wrongs; e.g., Lovecraft's "The Alchemist" (1916) or King Diamond's demon infant, the stillborn Abigail (from the 1987 album of the same name, written on a dark and stormy night according to a 2015 interview): cursing evil kings and counts, but also status-quo women for their heinous crimes by visiting eternal damnation on their entire bloodline! The revenge compounds, breeding an army of infiltrator enactors!

From a historical-material perspective, the psychological drama these stories produce is wrestling with a forced confrontation; i.e., with colonial-Patriarchal guilt as materialized through derelict reminders of the past that live on from one generation to the next (Scott raping Radcliffe's brain children). This happens through the medievalist language of dreams and nightmares, rapture and miracles, but also magic and superstition, myths and legends, and endless ill omens, lullabies and deathly portents (ambiguous dangers). As something to continuously reimagine, the colonizer's fear is literally of replacement "stretching on to the crack of doom"; i.e., by a vengeful, former slave-turned-guerilla counterterrorist presence, waiting to rebelliously reemerge, take revenge, and mockingly turn the "glorious" residence/resident inside-out: commenting on the Promethean instability of Capitalism/mirror syndrome while exposing its sinister machinations by literally making/christening the home (and those of the home) alien. They're divided/conquered and they don't know it, and that's where the Gothic drama lies; i.e., things look homely but are anything but.

As we have already discussed, the tragedy of Frankenstein is that the Creature, through its trauma, imitates its abusive parent's settler-colonial xenophobia to some degree: the slave hating its assigned master with justice. The same goes for David emulating his father, Peter, as a kind of Gothically fetishized serial killer targeting white women (the Ted Bundy phenomenon): "Like father, like son." Like Victor questing for the fire of the gods—and who hates his monstrous creation in service of Cartesian thought—Peter's chasing of immortality also leads David, his son, into becoming an unmaker of the West (a Divine Right) in his own dark image.

The potential difference with David owes to a partially xenophilic parentage: he loves his monstrous creation—a posthumanly queer Frankenstein/Creature—as the transgressive subversion of a Cartesian order of existence; i.e., embodying the myth of dark servile revenge through mad science as queer in a posthuman form tied to British Romantic thought; re: David's embodiment of Satan from Paradise Lost, but also quoting "Ozymandias" (with Percy Shelley being the husband of Mary Shelley, but again being a defender of Milton's Satan): "Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"

Hannibal come home to Rome, let's interpret this (and Scott) a little more charitably, shall we?

Scott's willingness to "play" in reverse-bject fashion—i.e., by pointedly making straight, white people uncomfortable by turning the "terrorist" rebel into a hero—invariably leads him into queer and posthuman territories (though, as I said, his work is praxially ambiguous to allow for fascist interpretations, too). Unlike Radcliffe did, Milton—but also Mr. and Mrs. Shelley and Lewis—all drafted valorized rebellion against the status quo in relation to older forms of rebellion we must choose, mid-conflict ("The choice is yours, brother!"). Yet, each offered a unique approach to an evolving strategy en media res ("in the midst of things"). What began as a fallen angel rebelling against God became a child of mad science or a practitioner of nostalgic black magic during an emerging time of Cartesian Reason. In other words, the tyranny of the elite's developing claim on a retro-future age led critics to invade their respective generations with an imaginary past of their own. As part of a larger mode of queer and posthuman revolutionary thought, Scott's sci-fi-meets-horror formula has him gleefully playing with 1970s queer poetics adopted from a Gothic nostalgia that is actually centuries old by this point. He's camping himself as much as Giger, Shelley and everyone else who came before!

Often, this nostalgia is the language of the young-at-heart. While Scott was in his 40s when he made Alien, the age requirement for Gothic fiction is not nearly so high. In the 1790s/1810s, Matthew Lewis and Mary Shelley were 20 and 19 respectively when they wrote their precocious, seditiously queer horror stories. Likewise, Scott's sadistic fantasy is a mode of queer discourse that starts with a cliché: David as an outwardly queer servant of entitled women, the male eunuch. This posthuman inadequacy is a reoccurring theme for Scott; re: Ash, in Alien, lacks a penis, so he shoves a rolled-up porn magazine down "Radcliffe's" throat!

Secretly rebelling against Daniels and Shaw, David operates as a physically superior version to them (minus the genitals), but makes them complicit in his abuse, which then he reveals through dark mockeries of their dissected bodies during an act of vigilante mad science: the xenomorph as a death fetish and outward, revelation of David's true self—the killer scientist who rapes white, privileged, human women by dissecting them, yet is also the Satanic rebel through reverse-bject queer expression housing himself in stolen frontier castles: not the femme fatale, but the shapeshifting lothario making off with Radcliffe's prized chariot reversing the liminal hauntology of war's danger disco! Chameleons hunt; for Scott, they let him kill colonizers through an alter ego. Works for me!

To it, David is robotic curiosity-turned-libido that, as the secret leading man, punishes Radcliffe's dutiful busybodies for not minding their own business; a mad inventor/Geppetto's doll with mommy as much as daddy issues, he's a real piece of work (an anti-Hamlet)—is bullied and bullied until he snaps, much like the Creature riots against Victor or people of color against American hegemony under systemic racism during cycles of reactive abusive (or Hamas' October 2023 raid versus the Viet Cong's Tet Offensive): David's making Black Panthers! "Thundercats, ho!"

In turn, their revenge manifests as a fantastical form of colonial guilt that makes white men, but also white women profoundly uncomfortable in regards to their own uncertain hand in things: David's cutting up of Shaw being functionally no different than the Creature dissecting Victor's bride after Victor rips apart his mate. It's the genocidal chickens of a colonial species "coming home to roost" by one of their own servants, a product of not just mad science, but an angry being of science fed up with its abusers: someone like Daniels, for all her unassuming qualities, is still a Radcliffean pioneer wife invading land that doesn't belong to her. To be frank, David stole it, too, and that's Scott's Miltonian cynicism showing a bit: there are no obviously "good" rebels; re: Cromwell, Napoleon, Byron, etc. God is dead, so David becomes a Nazi/angel of death dreaming of conquest (of the colonizer's globe) on the same Aegis as the Communist (a man with a dream:

Bagelgate part two, the revenge)!

That being said, I think the frank, unflowery language of Malcolm X and Ward Churchill describes Scott's vision of revenge well—with David's callous bombardment of the Engineers giving them a taste of their own medicine (while denying Peter through an inversion to how the Rusalki denied Athetos access to Paradise, in Axiom Verge; re: "Away with the Faeries" except David's the dark fairy cuckolding the man of reason); i.e., dropping the Engineers' bio-weapon arsenal, which is normally reserved for those deemed "lesser" than them (administered by warships), on their own city (albeit, seemingly on the fringes of Engineer territory—a colony world, perhaps, though "The Crossing" promo says otherwise). From David's perspective, he's a rebel; from his enemies' looking down on him, he's a terrorist, and he did it because he could. It's not a perfect vision of rebellion because Scott isn't a perfect man, and David reflects his meta maker's flawed interpretations of Mary and Percy Shelley well: a "boundaries for me, not for thee" reversal of Ann Radcliffe he (and his double) get to do, while also muddying the dialectical-material function of the rebellion's cryptonymy.

To be completely honest, Alien: Covenant is a bit too torture-happy and ambiguous, at times—or maybe, asking the audiences of the Imperial Core to hate themselves is too tall an order—but honestly I think Scott's faithfulness towards the serial killer pastiche is ironically a bit too Radcliffean to fully realize a consciously Communist vision (the movie is deliberately ambiguous and conventional to a fault). I doubt he's fully aware of it, to be frank, and probably is trying to balance (thus repress) such allegorical tendencies within controlled opposition (again, like Radcliffe, though to nowhere near the same extent)! But nonetheless, the seemingly empty space yields itself to critics upon future inspection and that is what matters (whereas Aliens only reveals Cameron's betrayals more and more, over time)!

The dialectical-material reality is complex, things only growing more hauntological over time, not less; i.e., David's hijacking of an advanced alien warship akin to slave revolt, one that decolonizes space of a human presence if that said presence predated Earth chasing itself to the frontiers. By giving David (a white savior/Omega Man) somewhere to attack other than Earth, Scott operates on par with a hypothetical "terrorist action" had the Koreans, Iraqis or Vietnamese actually dropped bombs on Americans cities to a scale comparable to American deliveries: Hiroshima and Nagasaki, followed by the "smaller bombs, but more of them" approach to the firebombing of Japan, Korea, Indochina and later, Iraq. These groups had to "make do" with a weaponizing of previously dropped American ordinance within their own colonized nations—e.g., the Iraqis IEDs (improvised explosive devices; re: GDF's "How Iraqis Got So Good at Smoking American Soldiers," 2023), which were made from American bombs, but also landmines as spent ordinance. Bombs, ovaries—same difference (re: bio-power)!

In a sense, then, David is stealing and weaponizing ordinance against an imaginary precursor to human settler colonialism that mankind is imitating now. Neither are the gods they pretend to be; re: they're venal, petty and cruel. The irony after David's victory is that his previous struggles to survive and liberate himself have damaged him into a sadistic monster whose vision is crowded by eternal revenge. Survival and revenge guide his creative process, driving him into making a flawed, chaotic creation after the Engineers are dead (from Volume One): "a liminal, spirit-monarch 'Galatea' that will serve no one, can never be destroyed or fully recuperated and may create anything out of anything. In short, it is free to self-fashion and self-determine, but is hunted by xenophobic canonical agents, who style its uncontrolled, xenophilic opposition as their Great Destroyer—e.g., the arch-fiend, or technological singularity" (source: "Knife Dicks"). In 1979, Ash admired what Scott, in 2017, would retcon as David's creation, calling it a pure survivor to be admired for its lack of conscience, remorse, or delusions of morality!

I think there's a jaded wisdom in that, meaning the questionable morals of a corporate-dominated world often turn blind eyes to systemic abuse. All the same, Scott still leaves his monster's violence ambiguous, just like Mary Shelley did almost two centuries prior (even more so, David's creation blindly furious because he needs more colonists to breed his perfect iteration). The allegory is there and it's bold, but it still hides the bourgeois polemic behind a Gothic veneer that cannot entirely imagine a better world; it's xenophilia is liminal, stuck at least partially inside Baldrick's fear-fascination of the medieval past—i.e., as barbaric, thus associated with the fascist/neoliberal hauntologies xenophiles are trying to interrogate and distance themselves from: liberators as rapists. The idea, then, is to make pastiche as perceptive as possible in liminal "baby steps." Revolutionary cryptonymy relies on code and concealment, working within repressed (often anachronistic) language to convey liminal, hauntological expressions of rebellion.

We'll examine this more in Volume Three, but I want to acknowledge it here as having evolved alongside Capitalism into itself. From Radcliffe to Shelley to Scott, the rebels and their leaders who evolved in the struggle against Capitalism are always viewed as illegitimate or "insane" by defenders of the state, but also outdated. Indeed, many criticized Scott for not making sense to them (and their own preferred nostalgia); re: failing to understand the similarities between Alien and its latter-day prequels through a rebellious presence in his works stemming from older iconoclasts. Perhaps he could have said the quiet part out loud, implying he anticipated a reprisal by speaking in Satanic code/darkness visible at all. Yet, this was arguably wise and instructional; i.e., if only because the movie would never have gotten made, otherwise (the Star Wars problem, but also something that Radcliffe and Lewis faced, which we'll unpack in a few pages)!

If the message is coded, it cannot be attacked in the same fashion because it is mistaken as "madness," or something other than what it actually is; re: Puck's fable from A Midsummer Night's Dream: a cryptonymic critique of power abuses taking place here on Earth, thereby outing those in Plato's cave as enshrined by self-defeating illusions. Indeed, the creative forces that drive artists like Scott are suitably dark, twisted and erotic, but also bound up in nature and the material world as melding to a human condition that is forever in flux. In search of corporate profit and worker exploitation, so much creative and liberated potential is completely denied in favor of an orderly existence that would render that vast majority of it extinct (re: Aliens). Those "in the cave" will kill, exploit or otherwise dominate activists as outsiders that reject, thus expose the truth of Capitalism (even when said "activism" amounts to simply trying to exist, using xenophilic language to expose the harmful machinery of the state that seeks to wipe you out):

the Radcliffean fantasy of raping the alien by exposing it to the rapists!

(artist: In Case)

From Paradise Lost to Frankenstein to Alien and its Miltonian prequels, the countercultural development of Gothic rebellion has melded into the exhibit as a continuously corrupted document made through everlasting struggle. This corruption isn't of the data; it is the data, glazing our donuts!

Yet the ability to interpret it is repeatedly lost, then found by those who dare to try and calibrate daring rememory as a xenophilic struggle made in opposition to state mandates and xenophobic repression: moi. As something to revive in a given present under duress, revolution-as-alien is always dug-up from the past. Even so, it remains less about causing horror relative to one's place in the world and more of shaping how one thinks through demonic media; i.e., as a liminal expression of what the world could become through revenge fantasies, thus through continuous struggle under—and reengagement with—the imaginary past: as a revolutionary mode of whorish, anti-Radcliffian poetic expression. It seems scary but xenophilia provides the myopia with a growing "silver lining": of sex positivity and hope amid an ignorant culture of heteronormative fear fixated on ghosts of the counterfeit.

Covert poetics, then, remain incredibly useful to genderqueer persons commandeering the counterfeit through faith in transformative returns; i.e., after we die affecting future rebels curious about the past as abject!

For example, trans and neurodivergent persons like myself self-define by struggle as central to our identities; i.e., we exist in relation to a status quo that rejects us for being alien, but fetishizes us for resisting compelled societal coding (normative behaviors). In the process, we see the xenomorph not as monster to kill, but an effective, xenophilic illustration of what we are and what we face in the presence of "civilized" persons, including TERFs aping Radcliffe. The xenophobic debate concerning us as "incorrect" (of any sex; e.g., butch lesbians as phallic women comparable to the xenomorph, or trans women) is often the same question Ripley asked, over forty years ago of Ash: "How do we kill it?" Xenophiles simply interrogate the process of abjection to expose the real monsters; i.e., those devoid of humanity when facing the very things that Capitalism alienates them from.

For the oppressed, then, the xenomorph becomes a godlike, suitably badass extension of themselves raping the rapist as Radcliffian heroine proto-TERF—a precious chance to be a dark god and reign in Hell, rather than serve in Heaven (a line Scott has David ask his faithful, "good" double, Walter). And given the chance, who wouldn't want to be a dark god? The idea is to avoid the temptation of fascist death gods (whose Dark Amazons and Medusas we'll consider in Volume Three, Chapter Four) through application; e.g., Slan from Berserk (exhibit 51b1, next page) is a total Gothic cliché/rape pastiche hypercanon (and female double of Griffith, exhibit 47b2), but the dark aesthetic lends itself to the possibility of the dark mistress that could but doesn't harm others with her strict BDSM repertoire!

As stated, I myself find the idea Numinously terrifying in ways I want to seek out; i.e., as doggedly as any Radcliffian heroine—indeed, have sought out on my own Promethean Quest towards destruction; re: as an attempt to transform and start over (with BDSM being a searching and interrogation of trauma as something to reconcile with regarding past abuse; e.g., Zeuhl and Jadis). My own trauma led me to that—and I'd rather avoid experimenting through unironic peril again, anytime soon—but the idea of it is perfectly valid if ironically executed through a willing and capable sadist/medievalized aesthetic; i.e., whose informed consent leads to exquisite tortures to make Radcliffe blush scarlet:

Batter my heart, three-person'd God, for you [...] Divorce me, untie or break that knot again, Take me to you, imprison me, for I,
 Except you enthrall me, never shall be free,
 Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me (source: John Donne's "Holy Sonnet XIV" 1633).

"When in Rome..." Fearsome power and awe are conjoined in Western thought; i.e., as the underpinnings/foundation of the current systems of power—the Church of the Gothic period (the Renaissance) to the Neo-Gothic's pre-fascist cartoon of modern war and global Capitalism's hegemonic infancy to fascism's rise in the interwar period to post-fascism under neoliberalism to the LGBTQ's parallel society and struggle in attempted solidarity against these brutal structures; re: policing whores whose trauma is writ on their skins like spiderwebs: "Look on my Works, Ye Mighty!"

Orgasms, then, are in the mind, as is the informed pleasure of masochistic pain, tickling and physical intimacy at large as threatened; i.e., by dark forces delivering things that affect the mind through external, devilish, corporal stimulus (from small to great). The greater the presence of power exhibiting these s(t)imulations, the greater arguably the effect on the mind, thus the orgasm (or something comparable, in an asexual sense); e.g., had Jadis not harmed me, I'd still be the catboy at their feet, but also the moth trapped

in their vampiric armored fingers, happily wedged between freedom and bondage; disintegration, euphoria and total annihilation: evolution as a resistance to pressure; e.g., Alex Garland's Ex Machina aping Scott's David as David aped Giger and Shelly.

service to men; e.g., one tied to incest culture/male insecurity in Japan more on [this in Volume Three, Chapter Five]: to give them what they wish for to act the mother's revenge on a state-compelled brat.

To that, Koji Igarashi's Succubus from SotN or the heroine from Starry Eyes [2014] or Berserk's towering Slan—all come from a sleeping sacrifice or in many cases, a [paralyzed sacrifice trapped in a nightmarish, drug-induced state of immobility] that drives towards transformative rebirth; i.e., one less as a means of turning into something else and more giving the demonic poetry needed to voice tremendously complicated and traumatic/taboo-laden emotions by figuratively tearing oneself down aftercare? More like [afterbirth, amirite?]. While the critical voice is often a metaphor for exploitation under Capitalism tinged with neonatal and colonial xenophobia in vividly Freudian language—e.g., Lilith—it needn't exclusively be. Subs exist who like to be topped by a Satanic dom who won't actually harm them; i.e., a cathartic nearness to a notorious emblem/golem of trauma caught between life and death, but also between camp and seriousness.)

Through this dialogic struggle, xenophilia operates as a kind of Communist temptation, one that offers the enslaved delicious intimations; i.e., of a hellish (for the elite and their Radcliffean cops) post-scarcity world haunted by the Numinous Radcliffean spectres of fascism and Marx (things often taste better when you haven't had them for a while, or ever). As such, David's monster becomes a way of seeing and believing in a posthuman era freed from Cartesian enslavement: All deities reside within the human breast, including Radcliffe's. Division came later according to Blake, but still allowed for the divided to encounter the undivided. Unable to describe what they were seeing as human, such heroines were always going to regard us with fear and contempt (as Daniels does to David raping Shaw by turning her double into a whore effigy in a mad project).

However, if pursued to a humanizing path, xenophilia can help change how the dehumanized under Capitalism are viewed. Ash, from Alien, was a "robot" slave who, despite spying for a giant corporation, secretly admired the monster as brutalized by Ripley's company (thus her by extension). One demonic, manmade slave sympathizes with another! The same goes for trans people, who don't fear the alien at all; they are alien and see in it as a reflection of themselves they can relate to. Humanizing this viewpoint, as something to pinpoint through the xenomorph, requires looking at something normally reviled being worshipped from a different, iconoclastic perspective. It's a creature of "darkness visible," one whose ontological chaos represents those who have been resentfully pushed into the shadows; i.e., while also refusing to play by the rules of polite conversation as a pedagogy of the oppressed Scott is trying to join in on, mid-bloodbath.

To this, seemingly ancient monsters that tie to the natural world (the subject of our next chapter) want to belong to the modern world, but can't by virtue of them being hunted; i.e., by those from the modern world having closed minds, regarding anything different from themselves (and the modern, binarized world that shaped them): to meet with suspicion, fear and loathing. And in cases where the monster survives the initial encounter intact (or through dark rebirth), it replicates that suspicion and fear towards its aggressor like Victor's Creature, but also Giger's and later Scott's. The ability to communicate clearly and well is lost in relation to an automated, Capitalist world that tries to act like these things don't happen; i.e., that the monster is somehow "anomalous."

From a dialectical-material standpoint, then, the alien is a linguo-material threat; i.e., a cipher for xenophilic revolution itself, and which, under Capitalism, is neoliberally "defanged" like all revolutions are—Medusa, the dark whore, gutted into the pimp's vaudeville husk, becoming a hollowed-out taxidermal shell: a freak show costume with a straight performer dressed up in cryptonymic language, but people who, if not genderqueer themselves, can feed the genderqueer imagination literally in Gothic panache:

(exhibit 51b2: Top: source; bottom: source. "I think it's safe to say it isn't a zombie," Ash chides Ripley. Yet, the actor who played the xenomorph was a person of color—the black individual being the typical recipient of state violence against zombie-like personas in American pathos. Likewise, the presence of the xenomorph corrupts the hypernormal space around it; like Victor's Creature, the monster absorbs transgenerational, undead trauma as something to reverse abject, which bleeds into the womb-like space it demonically fabricates using the colonial spaceship for material: the company's mining vessel, the Nostromo, part of an ongoing industry with slaving origins that is materially retransformed and—along with it—exposing the colonial history and gaze of planet Earth!

On some level, Ripley is the complicit Radcliffean, in this respect; i.e., the xenophobic woman fearing rape at the hands of a posthuman, dark-skinned demon lover. While suggesting the monster as seeking love ["free hugs!"] may sound ridiculous at first blush, the fact remains that xenophilia is as much the desire for acceptance and love from those conditioned to see the non-white, queer and pagan/non-Christian as different to start with. This Cartesian critique lies at the heart of Shelley's Frankenstein as replicated by Scott's dark, xenophilic heart, the latter pointedly reaping Radcliffe's whirlwind: the human windmill to tilt at.)

We'll talk about xenomorphs and demonic nature even more in the next chapter. I'd like to proceed by looking more at what inspired Ridley Scott; i.e., as a male transgressive playing with blinder-but-still-foundational histories featuring damsels, detectives, and sex demons other than Mary Shelley as the obvious female source; re: the queen of exquisite torture herself, the mysterious⁴²⁹ Ann Radcliffe as a prime legacy of the female-penned British murder mystery. In other words, why did Scott choose to ravish Radcliffe and, by extension, his own ghost of Ripley? This wasn't just mindless revenge, but camping what Radcliffe's stories could have been, had she had the guts for it (so to speak).

And yet, David chooses those with guts (nerve and organs), and Radcliffe wasn't totally spineless or without genius; i.e., writing from a position of relative privilege and ignorance concerning pain as not automatically harmful, Radcliffe's WASP-y xenophilia is admittedly imperfect, leaving behind her own derelict castles (with voices in the walls for relatively privileged white, cis-het women to listen to according to their own paranoia as informed by actual material conditions and systemic inequalities) and concealed scenes of graphic torture: as epistemologically trapped between the familiar and unknown in ways that carry real bias and desire.

Indeed, for Radcliffe and many who live under the imagined threat or reality of trauma, the return of trauma is often imagined as happening again. A way to subvert this common fear (for its historical-material recipients) is to subvert the self-destructive seeking of power and trauma through cathartic duress, pain and agency during ludo-Gothic BDSM, aka "good play" (mine being a seeking of the palliative Numinous: as something to convey by a BDSM partner in good faith).

Something of a dissident under modern historical account, though, Radcliffe's cathartic tales become nigh-impossible to express, lost in her infamously castled labyrinths of conjecture and terror as fabulously invented, made-up, and unmappable when chasing the Numinous dragon of rape to the fringes of the universe (next page); i.e., Scott's aping of and expanding on Victor's admonition that the universe isn't just "not for men" but also tremendously unkind to nosy dames curious about rape, too; re: the Radcliffean summoning of power, active impostors, the death curse, and a signature tormenting of the privileged with exquisite torture—to relish at the maiden-esque woman being killed: as a sacrificial stand-in for his target audiences' gratuitous voyeurism worshipping the same Numinous that Radcliffe did (and channeling fears for the Neo-Victorian watchers involved, insofar as they're more like David than they care to admit: relishing the farming of that poor girl's organs—including her sex organs—making David's act of necrophilic rape a eugenist one that confuses his heroism a bit).

But also, it's still a postcolonial act of revenge; i.e., with David as the Medusa as much as Byron, Victor or Satan/a warlock, vampire, etc, and Scott playing with that idea per the Medusa/ghost of the counterfeit "playing with fire," as Nelson ⁴²⁹ Re: So mysterious, that Robert Miles—writing of Rictor Norton's 1999 biography of the famous author, Mistress of Udolpho: The Life of Ann Radcliffe—had this to say about her, "Ann Radcliffe was, in her day, the obscurest woman of letters in England. Her contemporaries despaired of learning anything about her, while Christina Rossetti abandoned her planned 1882 biography for lack of materials" (source). Ninja nun strikes from the shadows!

Mandela explained: "A freedom fighter learns the hard way that it is the oppressor who defines the nature of the struggle, and the oppressed is often left no recourse but to use methods that mirror those of the oppressor. At a certain point, one can only fight fire with fire" (source: "Reflections on Nelson Mandela"); i.e., that revenge is, to some degree, merciless, messy and mad as demons are generally known for/not something that "civilized" people will find agreeable yet speaks to the very abject hypocrisies they've littered their stories with since Radcliffe: to pursue them for the happy ending that covers up police rape!

Scott, on the other hand, is more like Lewis, but instead of taking Ambrosio apart, he dissects the true-believer Prioress as a likeness of Radcliffe to defile, putting the rape front-and-center (and exacting it on the colonizer)! David is his black-mirror instrument of revenge similar to how the Creature was Shelley's—a hitman from Hell made with hollow intentions of goodness he can slice and dice. It's fun, and more to the point, justified behind the demonized pearl-clutching of it all, and why I think the film still works despite its debatably Tory waving of dark flags; i.e., David's still the vice character and this interpretation works alongside our less charitable ones: David is Scott's dark god to worship and revel in; re: fascinating fascism, but also Communism and the pedagogy of the oppressed being something he fears (the Marxist fetish communicating in Alien, but also short films like "Alien: Alone"; re: Persephone van der Waard's "Reaction to 'Alien: Harvest' + 'Harvest' and 'Alien: Alone' Explained," 2020). Fucking better, old man!

There are xenophilic elements, but unironic torture and fear are never far removed for our female detectives; i.e., penetrating the Black Veil to get absolutely wrecked for their trouble. Simply put, Radcliffe was a rookie as much as Daniels was, never able to reconcile Lewis save to abject him, doing so with unironic "knife dick" threats⁴³⁰ of visually immediate rape and mutilation (exhibit 17a), but also someone who saw ghosts of rape everywhere (speaking from experience: once learned, you can't turn off the seeing of ghosts or knife dicks; re: vaso vagal, fight or flight, confusion of predator/prey responses from lived trauma experiences).

That being said, even when lost, something fundamental tends to survive. Beneath the scramble of archaic, medieval images, Radcliffe's surviving legacy shows us the search for catharsis during BDSM rituals of power that can be reborn; i.e., in future attempts that say something about past detectives who aspiring Gothic-Communists can use in their own media—not doomed like the cyclops, but retooled through the promise of a different method of sight to pierce the illusions of the present with: strict ludo-Gothic BDSM and its campy monster sex and rape play rituals, which ultimately are what Scott is doing in Covenant (which aren't snuff films/weren't made with slave labor); re: taking Persephone back to Hell!

Furthermore, even sight itself can express with the other senses (arguably explaining the xenomorph's lack of eyes, but not specifically how it sees). In The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790), William Blake speaks to this idea with doors, an idea that survived into the 1960s with countercultural effect; re:

If the doors of perception were cleansed every thing would appear to man as it is, Infinite. For man has closed himself up, till he sees all things thro' narrow chinks of his cavern (source).

For Radcliffe, actual drugs are swapped out; re: with her drug-like terror and horror model going on to inform the future's way of seeing things that cannot fully be mapped; i.e., the School of Terror she developed and defined being interrogated by the likes of non-white, non-cis-het xenophiles centuries later after Scott got the ball rolling!

Radcliffe herself was flawed by and to the times in which she lived (a bit like Beauvoir minus the pedophilia), but was also unreliable herself as a detective. Investigating BDSM and queerness "gingerly" in her stories "armored" Radcliffe's virtue by proxy with her heroines, but also—according to Yael Shapira—helped her delicately invoke gentle, friendly ghosts, then explore transformative promises of paradoxical pleasure that involved disguised bondage tied to societal notions; i.e., of tremendous feelings in freshly exciting and safeguarded/safeguarding autopsies:

Sex, torture, rape, and death were ever-present in the Gothic, whether they actually occurred or only hovered as ominous possibilities. For an eighteenth-century woman author seeking respectability and acceptance, writing about the disrupted, sensational body — or, for that matter, about the body at all — was no simple matter, and it likewise called for quite a bit of "negotiation." As in the case of the supernatural, this negotiation manifests itself in Ann Radcliffe's subtle blend of evocation and denial, which allowed the text to disavow what it simultaneously suggested. Like her ghosts, Ann Radcliffe's bodies are often equivocal figures, whose evanescence, beyond its thematic meanings, was also a useful defence against critical and social censure (source: "Ann Radcliffe's Delicate Ghosts in Gothic Fiction," 2023).

Radcliffe clung to modesty. We can deduce rather easily that she lived under the power of men, which in turn dictated her bratty process of detection/abjection; i.e., she couldn't legally own property herself, but still had something poetic to say towards famous, powerful dudes (many of whom she outlasted in popular stories). More to the point, her nightmares still offered something useful in the bargain; i.e., for xenophiles to take further than she did regarding transformative pleasure and pain yielding future demon lovers more useful than Wolff foresaw!

Beyond Scott raping Radcliffe's doubles literally to death (or after death), there's also what Edmund Burke called the Sublime—with terror being affiliated with the Sublime as a perceived fear of received pain—was, for Radcliffe, exquisite "torture" on the edge of the civilized world (whose liminal spaces one can go to and experience fantasies of rape; e.g., Italy or Udolpho). Basically she was thinking about pleasure and pain as intertwined like BDSM, minus the overtly rapacious trappings of the Marquis de Sade. Even so, Radcliffe's threats of unironic mutilation elide with power fantasies about married sex; i.e., in ways that suggest either a novice or someone who more experienced with genuine abuse than she let on!

Such ways were ways normally denied to Radcliffe by "decent" society—both women and men in service of the Patriarchy but nevertheless being swept up in a craze of daring to peek at such stories that Radcliffe just had to write one for herself (and her husband/paying audience). All the same, this act of "seeing" and discovery through her stories happens for us, as well; i.e., while wearing her veiled sunglasses to see the world through an unreliable narrator's eyes. It's not a bad idea to try them on ourselves because, like it or not, there are plenty of cis-het women just like Radcliffe playing it safe in the 21st century inspired directly or indirectly by the Great Enchantress!

Being oppressed as white women would have been, it's fine to understand why Radcliffe did what she did (then reave it, like Scott). In Radcliffe's lifetime, her careful vision and attempts to detect was patronizingly commended by those in power reifying a status quo to unite against queer expression. They called her the "Great Enchantress," the "rare" woman who could write this way and, according to Dale Townshend, "was deservedly exempt from the general condemnation of Gothic writing in Romantic-period culture" (source: "An Introduction to Ann Radcliffe," 2014, now removed). Yet, during a life that was shrouded in mystery and seemingly crafting her spectral novels for her privileged husband's pleasure, maybe Radcliffe did it for herself? She didn't escape the terrorist accusations, despite playing it relatively safe; or as Nick Groom writes (from the Oxford World's Classics of The Italian, 2017); re:

As to risibility, a notorious letter condemning 'Terrorist Novel Writing' accused her of provoking a fashion

To make terror the order of the day, by confining the heroes and heroines in old gloomy castles, full of spectres, apparitions, ghosts, and dead men's bones [...] If a curtain is withdrawn, there is a bleeding body behind it; if a chest is open, it contains a skeleton; if a noise is heard, somebody is receiving a deadly blow; and if a candle goes out, its place is sure to be supplied by a flash of lightning.

Gloom specifically notes how the letter in question explicitly attacks Radcliffe's "system of terror" for being monotonous, ignorant, and "contaminated" by "Monk" Lewis' horror writings—to which Radcliffe herself would never write another novel, but whose 1826 posthumous appearance with "On the Supernatural in Poetry" distances herself from the French Revolution (and its terrors), radicalism and Lewis (ibid.). And yet, Bloom concludes his introduction by writing:

Ann Radcliffe may have not been a revolutionary, but her work is far from being conservative—she repeatedly tested the boundaries of orthodoxy at a time of revolutionary foment. This may explain why everything is under scrutiny in The Italian. It is a novel suffused with secrets and mysteries, and pervaded by scrutiny, examination, and interrogation. [...] It looks forward to a society in which order is enforced by institutions keeping individuals under perpetual surveillance. As such, The Italian [is] very much a novel for the twenty-first century (ibid.).

Additional arguments could also be made that Radcliffe chose the middle of the road "for women"; i.e., as separate from the kinds of transgressive, impolite, xenophilic queerness Matthew Lewis embodied in his own work by making the devil the one to root for (or Scott, Giger, O'Bannon, et al, centuries later); re:

Radcliffe herself wrote The Mysteries of Udolpho while sitting by her fireplace in the evenings waiting for her husband to come home from work. By writing the type of book she wanted to read in that situation, Radcliffe appealed to the growing population of female readers of the era. By 1800, 45% of women in England could read. [...] This created a demand for a new type of literature. Radcliffe filled this demand by writing a novel women could actually relate to because they saw themselves in the heroine (source: Tufts Libraries Omeka, 2017).

That's entirely fair to submit. Then again, maybe she not only did it for herself, but also for reasons that were more selfish and less polite than women were allowed?

Simply put, what if Radcliffe enjoyed making her dreadful fantasies—indeed, she cherished them for helping her say laterally what women normally could not, then teased at these concealed desires through the surface-level antics on cryptonymic display in her various novels: the lack of agency, to be sure, but also the veiled/naked threats with appreciative peril and mutilation; i.e., CNC rape fantasies (of intense submission under the castle but also the bandit as the perfect dom) towards a minority whose rights were expanding with the times, allowing them to discuss risqué topics with mounting safety (and camp; re: Austen, below).

There's no way to know exactly how Radcliffe felt, suffice to say that Scott was camping her rape fantasies minus the Black Veil (making her dark desires come true). Far easier to observe is the fact that her special sight had a vast material effect on the world. Seemingly all by herself, she yielded an entire school of stories that cemented itself deeply in the Gothic imagination: a style of looking called the School of Terror for which Radcliffe became famous, and for which her polar opposite was the School of Horror as decided by Matthew Lewis; re: the Gothic, as it came to be known, was written by a woman and a gay man in a time when the identities for either had not fully formed—would continue to grow and develop in the centuries ahead; i.e., while using Radcliffe and Lewis' ongoing rivalry as a displaced, postmortem vantage point (Scott marrying the two, in Covenant).

To be transparent, either author offered a vulgar display of power that had its own double standard. Indeed, Lewis' nakedly exposed "Male Gothic" (an outmoded term, but one popular in the earlier days of Gothic academia) served as its own creative response to Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Udolpho—with The Monk invoking decidedly unfriendly ghosts tied to openly taboo subject matter as nevertheless an exciting mode of xenophilic engagement with the recently imagined past (a trend Scott—a male director having studied Gothic authors of either sex, in the classical, outdated, binarized sense—would use to challenge the reactionary transphobia of snooty second wave feminists in 2017⁴³¹). In dueling Radcliffe, page after page, Lewis' aim was to shock and disgust, while Radcliffe was more about frisson, the "skin orgasm" of a carefully tortured mind fearing rape. But rape play is rape play—with Scott making Radcliffe try Lewis on for size!

The point is that conflict isn't automatically unproductive; i.e., both authors created schools of thought whose subsequent warring not only defined a generation (like the Karate Kid movies), but went on to survive across the centuries, going so far as to inspire films like Jaws (1975) (or "Jaws in space!" aka Alien) to have their own proliferation of marginalized copycats and neoliberal (videogame) remediation. It was less like looking at the past with the predecessor's eyes and more akin to making your own pair modeled after theirs and seeing something fresh: your own creation looking back at you, a poster to sell as a window of unknown pleasures peering into the retro-future—a rare chance to not just dive into said past, but pioneer new xenophilic methods of seeing the world around you; i.e., that shape it in a material way for the holistic betterment of all workers/nature!

This includes Radcliffe—i.e., even if it means raping her ghost, as Scott basically has "Radcliffe" try out, being on the receiving end of strict BDSM (no different from Warriana having Brock in Venture Bros. try anal only for him to realize he—per the paradox of rape play—actually likes it). The unequal material conditions that lead to criminogenic behaviors will change because workers won't stand to be abused if they learn what it's like to be treated well; they'll challenge the process of abjection as executed through Gothic fiction until it becomes a thing of the barbaric, Capitalist past that only exists in fiction. Until then, today's half-real proliferation of monsters can certainly devolve into blind pastiche; it still remains helpful in examining these older windows, anyways. Though endemic to Capitalism, classic Gothic stories still reflect a historical record within countless xenophilic detectives: all trying to see by interrogating the hauntological past, like Scott's Covenant. The forgotten sight of these accounts extends to dialectical-material analysis; i.e., of the present space and time under attack by Radcliffean imposters.

For one, female "darkness" isn't just "hidden things are scary" or "women are chaos." It's a literal, historical-material consequence stemming from a figurative commentary about women's place in fiction; i.e., as being part of a collective struggle against oppression—of not being allowed to communicate more than letters, or literal missives to her relatives about plain, boring things. The act of creating things for money was literally "boys only!" which had a visible effect on what women even could create, but also the past they defined when holding the pen and blazing their own trail: communicating in shadows while being kept in the dark. Often, too, there was a source of shame to female authors, a feeling of embarrassment and judgment after the (f)act; i.e., what Austen describes as quite literally "writing in the dark":

What should I do with your strong, manly, spirited Sketches, full of variety and Glow? – How could I possibly join them on to the little bit (two inches wide) of Ivory [the whiteness of the page, kept mostly out of sight to hide the fact that she was writing fiction] on which I work with so fine a Brush, as produces little effect after much Labour? (source: Zoe Louca-Richards' "Two Inches of Ivory: A New(ish) Jane Austen Acquisition," 2020).

Such vivid embarrassment lurks inside the famous letter conveyed to Austen's nephew, James Edward Austen Leigh, which Austen wrote in the last year of her life, when she was 41. For women, labor was childbirth and "manly" poetic activities like writing (especially Gothic novels) were "for the men" (which, to critique Austen, she chided Radcliffe for even daring to try). And yet women like Austen and Radcliffe—followed by Dacre, Mary Shelley and Charlotte Brontë, among others—hopped to it, anyways (often behind a veil of anonymity/pennames). They weren't Gothically mature insofar as they had a conscious ability to discuss taboo subjects in sex-positive ways (especially Radcliffe), but we can still borrow from them/camp their ghosts much as we do Foucault, Marx or anyone else in this series; re: chasing shadows, like Scott, Lewis, Radcliffe, et al.

Despite a not-so-secret desire to keep women in the dark, men could not stop the greatest legacy of women like Radcliffe; i.e., said women writing mysteriously from the shadows to shape centuries of Gothic literature—however imperfectly—in ways we can salvage: what these ladies wrote shaped the future imagination about the past as something to continually reclaim, rediscover, renegotiate, reeducate, replay and reproduce. Their then-out-group perspective on the past still influenced what future oppressed groups would and will draw inspiration from down the road—in some shape or form—when using ludo-Gothic BDSM, themselves; i.e., to try and alter the socio-material status quo under Capitalism by changing it into something better (thus less exploitative and profitable for the elite), mid-xenophilia; re: the whore's revenge abjuring profit to spurn the pimp. Radcliffe was not Gothically mature—in fact, she was token as fuck—but we, through ludo-Gothic BDSM, can build on her demon-lover pratfalls (re: Wolff and Scott) to develop Gothic Communism ourselves! We burble up, the primordial ooze of capital's end of history Radcliffe's Black Veil couldn't see past!

Said xenophilia includes the different visual styles and cultural attitudes associated with one versus the other regarding taboo subject matters like rape. In Lewis' case, he comfortably showed his audience sex with demons, black magic, supernatural events, bloody murder and crossdresser invocations with the Devil—in other words all the things Radcliffe left out but hinted at, which Lewis could explore with relative male privilege and (closeted gay) oppression. Lewis didn't have to worry about protecting his virtue to the same degree, but still did so in ways that were profoundly genderqueer/xenophilic. I would argue Radcliffe protected her virtue, if only on a subliminal level, to avoid official scrutiny and maintain respect as someone who was balanced in their caution and disregard; i.e., the Goldilocks of xenophobia and xenophilia in her mind.

Regardless, Radcliffe's ideas on terror as superior to horror predated Hitchcock's latter-day "mastery" (social-sexual domination) of mystery and suspense by nearly two centuries (another Galatea obliterated in Pygmalion's future Shadow). But the consequence of that still offered a trademark method of conjecture to the barbaric past during BDSM told through Gothic play; i.e., as continuously reimagined in ways that wound up becoming gendered in relation to other authors and their works inside a shared material world. Everyone was fumbling around in the dark; they stumbled towards truth (as applied knowledge) while being handled torches they found that others had once held. Step by step, these allowed Radcliffe and Lewis to go further than before—to see and say new-and-different things in relation to previous things already seen and said.

The idea, as always, is to be "of the Devil's party" and actually know it (re: Volume Zero's "camp map" section, wherein I discuss psychosexuality and the palliative Numinous when camping the operatically performative spaces of the canonical Gothic mode; re: for me, Metroidvania). Radcliffe, Lewis and the Shelleys were certainly precocious for their times—and worked in concert/opposition to each other when building castles on top of castles, mise-en-abyme—but the embodiment of xenophilic devilry as a dark, poetic force needs to become a concrete, collective identity in the face of universal struggle towards universal liberation; i.e., in pandemonic solidarity and excessive rebellion on the Aegis through ludo-Gothic BDSM: demons take many forms, and their "dark" revenge—as something to hungrily chase, but also love and worship—is often very visible:

Queer identity is one such facet and it intersects with others, mid-struggle; i.e., identity as struggle vis-à-vis careful and deliberate intersections of class, culture and race (which capital does its best to divide). The paradox of being trans, black and/or AFAB, for example, is that they aren't choices (nor is being neurodivergent or questioning organized religion); you are or you aren't and proceed from there, becoming something—whatever that is—through identity as performance and praxial synthesis helping or harming workers. Whether you evolve into yourself or stay in the closet, either is a form of "death," but neither "ends." Death is not the end; it lives on in material forms made by those with "dead" imaginations unable or unwilling to transform, or those who freed themselves through their imaginations as best they could—re: Radcliffe and Lewis, but also Scott and myself.

So while Coleridge "closed his eyes in holy dread and drunk the milk of paradise," Lewis drove the old prude mad by tearing a reprobate "Adam" to bits (camping the canon, as Broadmoor puts it); Radcliffe, meanwhile, preserved her own modesty as something that didn't die but whose work indicated a present something beyond herself that was alien to its author. As such, she hinted at what she could become if things were different; i.e., weren't persecuted against, including by her regarding what she perceived were the proper sorts of damsels, detectives and demons to play with: the sort she caught, summoned and banished!

Now, the material world is rapidly changing in ways amenable to transformation beyond what Radcliffe could scarcely dream of (I'm not so sure about Lewis): the sweet terror of mid-transformation suggested by Scott (next page); i.e., the chimeric, liminal, "before-and-after" wonder of the trans experience as drug-like—a magical means of arriving at nature as furious to understand its alien suffering at the hands of Cartesian harvesters posturing as good; re: "Animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms." Demon or undead, we'll explore those next, in "Call of the Wild"; i.e., when we look at nature-themed, "totemic" and anthropomorphic egregores as an increasingly trippy and magical outlet for our animal selves; e.g., Sailor Moon or The Last Unicorn, but also Scott and Giger's xenomorph, dragged out of the closet for another lesson: revenge as a poetic means of transformation, one where workers act xenomorphically without murdering anyone! Memento mori are wax sculptures, Count Ferdinand!

How? you ask? Let's quickly conclude dissecting Scott's shenanigans (two pages); i.e., the gay camper (me) camping Scott, the straight camper/gay deceiver deceiving the straight deceiver to make him gayer than he dares dream (eat your heart out, Matthew Lewis)! One, Covenant is sex-positive because its camp suggests that David might not be completely mad/has a method to his madness; they're also sex-coercive because they feed into white women's fears and let fascism in through the door of deliberate ambiguity. Being straight, Scott's abjection, chronotopes, hauntologies, cryptonymy and stealth queerness regress to a 1970s kind of strict BDSM—one that ultimately guts Radcliffe's likeness on a black altar. Scott doesn't always know what to stress—and has mommy and daddy issues himself that aren't fully worked out—but he's not afraid to take chances; i.e., talking about sex (and rape) to drag the greats (with Shaw being David's anatomical Venus/corpse of empire, but also something new made with the corpse, below):

I can applaud that ("die, honky!"), even if I think Scott makes a similar mistake that Eggers did by not having his dark throwback break the Fourth Wall and say to the audience, "I'm a Communist and this is my revenge against capital!" But the signs are there to connect for those who know... It's a helluva lot better than Cameron's currently doing (going full AI tech bro with his own remasters, say nothing of his white moderate politics; Nerrel's "AI Can Ruin Movies Now, Too - Aliens and True Lies on 4k," 2024); re: "truth" is merely positions of partial ignorance to enforce for different reasons (see: "Positions of Relative Ignorance to Relative Clarity").

But, there are limitations with Scott vice signaling a false Jesus/antichrist against coded virtue as brute-force as he is; i.e., by presenting us as a rapacious threat to the usual people who think we're a threat (and all in a white man's image; re: of a cryptomimetic likeness/replica of a replica of Michaelangelo's David). Scott loves the xenomorph and blackguard stirring the pot while he pulls the strings from a place of safety and privilege; i.e., as the Humanist throwback being the old white man with little-if-anything to lose/skin in the game; re: it's a bit Percy Shelley/Lord Byron without irony, hence closer to Victor as Mary Shelley originally lampooned than Scott is nakedly worshipping: he thinks he's Satan when he's really, really not!

Instead, he's Jack the Ripper targeting women to slice them up for the audience's entertainment; and while there's a class-war character to his games, there's also a fair bit of collateral damage (not as much as From Hell, above, but I digress; the same abjection process scaring the white female middle class is still there—a Hitchcockian menace torturing whores for money from said middle class during the usual damaging business making irony a regular casualty during profit above all else): "Oh, hear my warning! Never turn your back on the Ripper!" (Judas Priest's "The Ripper," 1976). Same goes for Scott and men like him, but also their wicked, sadistic and at-times-incredibly misogynistic, racist (eugenicist) and transphobic antiheroes: revived at a retro-future fin de siècle/neo-Victorian Ozymandian collapse (the death of the Weyland-Yutani corporation's head of state having Orientalist elements as well; re: from 1979 onwards into the 1980s own canceled futures).

To that, Covenant is plenty Satanic, but it's a bit too canonically Miltonic and doesn't try hard enough to avoid the Satanic Panic side of things; i.e., while regressing towards new Dark Ages in ways that aren't useful to Communism as new workers develop it: to go beyond an aging weird nerd's idea of The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1974). Trapped between capital's boom-and-bust (Judas Priest's proverbial Sad Wings of Destiny actually being historical materialism at work), Scott threatens to squish us to juices; i.e., like that girl from Akira (1988) while dancing with spectres of Marx dressed up like a walking sex toy/phantom of the opera. He's carving up Margaret Thatcher as much as any Victorian street whore, but also Radcliffe; re: Radcliffe's nightmare coming from a token woman with token fears.

Of that nightmare, David is literally gatekeeping paradise to say to Radcliffe's doubles, "No TERFs allowed!" It's poetic justice at its finest, castrating the austere pearl-clutcher/sell-out and holier-than-thou hypocrite by applying her own selective standards to her heroines hauntologized; i.e., a bigotry for one is a bigotry for all and demons play rough (for a good example of this, consider the "danger disco" scene from Near Dark, when the wandering-bandit vampires enter the cowboy bar ["shitkicker heaven!"] and kill everyone inside for our entertainment)! Scott does this through weaponized white/male privilege doing to Radcliffe what women like her fear the most; i.e., alienation through exposure to what will alienate them as normally what they use to alienate their victims: rape as something to accuse/a terror weapon, revealing the modest as whore-like, trapped in unironically mutilative rape spaces that lack irony and push towards sex-coercive forms of the non-so-palliative Numinous through courtly love, demon BDSM scenarios.

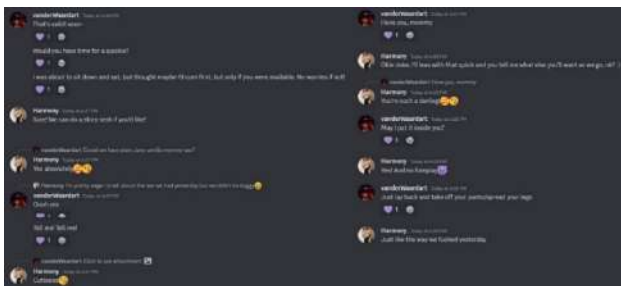

In keeping with Groom, Scott is camping Radcliffe by raping not just the women in Covenant while alive, but desecrating their corpses, too; i.e., as former settler-colonial symbols he turns into black-monolith homunculi the state will attack during mirror syndrome (a taste of their own medicine in his afterlife, making Persephone a Bride of Count Montoni/Dracula, again). It's great, save for the fact that Covenant downright assumes a Gothic fluency that doesn't really exist anymore. It's more monasterial, limiting the film's mass appeal in ways Ridley can't really help. So he just plows ahead, hell or high water!

And to it, I can at least work with that—can take the idea of a retro-future posthumanist runaway slave making Medusa in small (re: the homunculus, above); i.e., by raping Noah and his wife (and their whole merry band of genocidal animals and families) and do something better with it than Scott does. Better still, so can my friends; i.e., during a shared cryptonymy process reversing abjection during ludo-Gothic BDSM as our playing with monsters (below)—by doing Scott one better during our own mommy rape play conjuring up demons during darkness visible in its legionary forms' jouissance: adding radical irony to Radcliffe's calculated risk, our Davids, Adams and Eves communicating through rape as rape survivors!

Sex pirates camping the canon to reclaim our power from capital's nuclear home, our pandemonium wrecks said home to build a better one among the Ozymandian debris; i.e., our contributions to the narrative of the crypt going outside the text to speak to a world beyond Capitalism, the Cycle of Kings, Shadow of Pygmalion, and infernal concentric pattern while inside them, our wasp to their caterpillar! "Better to rule in Hell than serve in Heaven!" said David; Walter and Daniels were the true villains of Covenant—Heavens to Murgatroyd!

While graphic, demon sex is very campable/code-switchable, it still helps to negotiate it behind the scenes (the full-size images can be accessed through the source links); e.g., as Harmony Corrupted and I do (we'll start with us, then close-read Ninja Scroll and The Dark Crystal a bit);

i.e., wherein Harmony and I set the ground rules/stage for playtime—negotiate what is exchanged for what, what can be featured in what, and so on—then get down (so to speak) to business!

Labor exchange isn't "separate" from sex work because, as the title suggests, sex work is work, and goes beyond (white straight middle-class) women to include anyone doing it to survive for a variety of reasons; e.g., to make money but also to do activism and illustrate mutual consent during rape cryptomimesis. Those aren't mutually exclusive, and anyone who says otherwise is a cop and a pimp (which includes many privileged sex workers, who tokenize and punch down while acting exclusively oppressed inside Omelas as "their" corner to work); i.e., someone who thinks that sex work and consent are mutually exclusive, thus can't illustrate mutual consent during dialectical-material struggle; re: Radcliffe, but also Scott, to some degree!

The praxial idea, then, is to play with the Gothic by combining these things, but also to infuse/synthesize the roleplay scenes themselves with open elements of revolutionary camp (within our daily habits' anger/gossip, monsters and camp cultivating good social-sexual habits); i.e., as Lewis did, in The Monk, centuries ago; e.g., "Oh, yeah! Matilda, I'm ravishing your ambiguous gender identity with my closeted sissy's dominant rod! Unholy Mommy of the Netherworld; how I coom at your profaning the Madonna, Christ and God; accept my sacrifice, writ in human fluids, my moist hot "soul" spraying all over your beauteous orbs! Holy Saint Francis! 'Sblood! More like splooge, amrite? Dark temple, accept my burnt offering!

Spider-girl's got nothing on me!" Not bad for an old woman, huh ("I'm not old, I'm 37!") Now go support Harmony on Fansly! Forget li'l-ol' me, she does amazing work!

The world is much too atomized/pulverized in ways Gothic Communism tries to holistically reconnect during praxial synthesis/the dialectic of the alien dismantling white moderacy/reactionary behaviors and tokenism (all of which are why we're currently in this mess). Assimilation is poor stewardship, but punching up can resemble the disguises they use to try and blend in with the oppressed. So can our neo-medieval pedagogy profane canon and be hidden/open about it during the cryptonymy process; i.e., as dualistic, haunted by police shadows (official or stochastic)!

But also, we're fighting for ourselves, our friends, nature, animals and the environment; i.e., as stewards of them and each other in the same proverbial boat/Ark. We're just making a Covenant of the Rainbow with Satan (ourselves), versus one with God; i.e., in rejecting any and all functionally white colonizers hiding behind the Protestant ethic (as Radcliffe once did, centuries ago)!

To it, neoliberal hope is false hope, but we can hungrily and animalistically "flap towards the hope";

i.e., of something better by winding back the clock while pushing forwards to take ludo-Gothic BDSM out of the bedroom (re: Foucault) without harming anyone and making art-porn educational exhibits that are explicitly punk/Communist (not *post*punk, Zeuhl, Judas Priest, Ridley Scott, etc); and this extends to the movie theatre—i.e., we don't need Scott's cryptonymy/mise-en-abyme to make our own as infinitely more revolutionary than his because it represents workers solely instead of profit. Just what the doctor ordered: a hot, deep, full injection of emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness to achieve praxial synthesis/catharsis and Gothic maturity regarding a proletarian Wisdom of the Ancients/Superstructure—Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism!

And, as always, natural linguo-material latitudes combine the usual medieval hyphenations of sex and force, war and rape (food and death, etc), during class, culture and race war to have fun with; e.g., "C'mon, rev my engine, dude! That's it; fuck mommy like a good little whore! Fire phasers! Full broadside! Yes—yes, yes, yes—fuck me, stupid—motherfuckin' BLAST OFF!" Playing is how we learn by passing messages back and forth; i.e., in class, while the teacher thinks we're "studying." In short, we invade our own classroom as guerillas, while they—the actual villains from Radcliffe's stories (rich white people and their teacher's pets acting as hall monitors for Capitalism)—try to invade and decipher our privacy (and fail badly as they do, left):

While silliness and play (with monsters, rape and trauma) is regaining control during ludo-Gothic BDSM, there's nothing radically emancipatory about such revelation's sacking of "Rome" unless we get out from under profit pimping nature as monstrous-feminine; i.e., moving away from manufactured scarcity towards post-scarcity using pre-capitalist language to negotiate past trauma/our rights and boundaries in the present space and time. Anyone who resists that—i.e., so they can enjoy the usual middle-class fear-fascination with the ghost of the counterfeit furthering abjection—is a traitor on a gradient of betrayals, privilege and oppression, but also liberation and exploitation existing in the same shadow space we can solidarize and intersect towards development. It's a sprawling orgy of conflict, and a messy one!

That's our revenge; i.e., not killing a Radcliffean throwback unto itself, but transferring such poetic exchanges/reclamations of violence, terror and monster language unto all registers (territories), onstage and off; re: anisotropically reversing abjection (terrorist/counterterrorist) to dismantle profit: by camping canon to break Capitalist Realism, liberating sex work (thus all work) from capital/sex coercion with iconoclastic/sex-positive art (thus porn and Gothic poetics, at large)! So does the manmade slave turn the scalpel on its maker—the monster baby crunching the apple-like skull (and hypothetical brain) of its Saturnine parents! We're not special snowflakes, but fucking ninja stars!

Speaking of which, this brings us once more to Ninja Scroll (1993):

(exhibit: We've already examined Yoshiaki Kawajiri's Ninja Scroll during "Healing from Rape" in Volume One, but I want to revisit it, here; i.e., to make a point that movie's director was, and me vis-à-vis my older arguments surrounding his work being applied here to Ridley Scott's imperfect attempts to camp the canon as Matthew Lewis once did. So c'mon, everyone; let's mosey along that borderline!

"All war is based on deception." Ninja Scroll speaks in the Gothic courtly romance of the damsel, detective and sex demon; re: the ninjas are hired by the magistrate [actually the villain, in disguise] to investigate a robbery happening behind a fake plague—a plot to overthrow the current government being orchestrated from within, and one whose investigation into must start [to keep up appearances] but then meet with a tragic end [also to keep up appearances]: the ninja team is ambushed by a queer BDSM junkie with thunder in his veins, and—more to the point—a giant Frankensteinian creature; i.e., two of the Eight Devils of Kimon!

Well, shit.

It's not so different than the Three Storms from Big Trouble in Little China [1986] except this isn't American Orientalism, but a home-turf Japanese romancing of the babe in the woods to speak to the then-present space and time haunted by Japanese atrocities married to American ones; i.e., the ninja fodder are accompanied by a ninja girl, Kagero—a foxy ice queen who wants to be one of the boys and even likes the leader of the ninja team, Hanza. "Our enemy will be the epidemic!" he declares. But he forgets Sun Tzu's adage, and is walking into a trap [and his men are arrogant/jumpy]. Kagero is protective of the numbskulls, going so far as to "castrate" herself—slicing off her hair to make a point [a fact that shocks the boys, given this lowers her value in their lord's eyes, hence theirs].

*Point taken; she gets to tag along, the men—especially Hanza—not realizing she's doing so to protect them; i.e., as the "phallic woman"/Medusa warding off evil. Castrator women seeking revenge for past wrongs is a common theme in Japanese cinema [e.g., Lady Kaede from Ran, 1985]. Even so, Kawajiri's Kagero is something of a fledgling detective seeking—beyond expectation [and station]—the answer to who recently stole gold from the abandoned mine, kept* *secret through murder all those years ago; i.e., it's a spaghetti Western in disguise, but also borrows monomythic tropes across warrior cultures in a wider neoliberal market to speak about rape using shared Gothic tools versus camping them; e.g., Planet Terror's "[a missing leg that is now missing!"].*

To it, Kagero's a girl in a man's world, and in love with Hanza's a superman-lite knockoff—a Clarke Kent to Jubei's superior devilish prowess⁴³² the two being mutual crushes for the same woman, except Hanza dies because he can't think with the right head, and Jubei's cooler heads prevail⁴³³ against a demon who also thinks ⁴³² A man who's capable of great violence ("[That boy's got the devil in him!") but uses it to solve disputes in ways that don't rape women—a slow bar, indeed, but a common heroic litmus test, in spaghetti Westerns.

⁴³³ We've already discussed Jubei's role in this film, in Volume One; re: his role as a Western hero (a ronin) to reclaim from state dogma; i.e., similar to knights and Amazons predator/prey language during medieval, weaponized romances of Gothic sex and force, during "An Uphill Battle with the Sun in Your Eyes." We've also discussed his role in "Healing from Rape" (from the same volume). I recommend you give both a look!

with his "short sword"]; i.e., with Hanza showing her a begrudging respect and her liking him, too, but their world not allowing for love between the classes: her being a poison-taster for their lord and him being a "mere ninja" serving said lord [and the magistrate being the story's Sheriff of Nottingham, for the lack of a better comparison]. Hanza secretly wants to do things other than ninja [like have sex], and she wants to be a ninja, the two seemingly wanting to reconcile those desires/differences by being so close together and yet so far apart on a shared mission, for once [overlapping labor action]...

Alas, the quick, brutal realities and betrayals of feudal, Warring-States life cockblock our young prospective couple—the evil demon warriors stepping in to make short work of the boys by effectively out-ninjaing them, but also straight up massacring them/carving them into pieces of meat, raining blood [nijas are spies, not assassins]!

Hanza's men quickly buy the farm, and the last man standing stands just long enough, during the kayfabe, to saber-rattle with the tornado sword-wielding fiend...

...until his aspiring Amazon suddenly becomes a damsel-in-distress and Hanza—like Parker from Alien—runs in; i.e., dick-measuring with someone who is frankly and obviously a much bigger jouster! Shit's fucking metal, the knightly code doing our gentleman caller no favors a hauntological crossing of ninja and knight: "[Ninja doesn't survive," Europe]!

Hanza loses, Kagero freezes, and the golem hams it up—the violence oddly eroticized [for the two homosocial men] while the black ninja mutilates the white ninja's corpse to terrify his true prize: the girl he's been hunting [on her scent, perhaps betraying their location except not really]. She "nopes the fuck out," not too keen on being his plaything and saying "feets, do your stuff!" only to be stopped tragically short inside the dark forest [never a good place for a damsel to be without a hero, in canonical media]. His seeking sword is like a maelstrom of feral lust, chasing her down to sever her foothold and send her plummeting to her doom/plunging screaming into the abyss; i.e., the unspoken-but-heavily implied fate of whores in Gothic stories; i.e., the conservative argument: "She should have been at home like a good little girl; now, boys will be boys!"

This is only two minutes in a 91-minute movie, but it sets the stage for the woman's revenge. And while the film is sexist in its depiction of men and women being dimorphically separate to seemingly favor men, it also works within those stereotypes to subvert patriarchal power. Jubei—the film's hero, for example—deals the spectacular murder stroke to technically fell the golem, but it was the woman's poisoned body [from the poison-tasting done for her master] that weakens said golem enough to literally "soften him up"! It's Leone's Once Upon a Time in the West [coming out of Kurosawa's East-meets-West hauntology with Seven Samurai fifteen years prior]—with "Frank" [the plot

thickens] drawing only to miss, Jubei "joking" him to disarm the fiend and send his own boomerang back into his tantrum-throwing toddler brain! Talk about "losing your head over a piece of tail!" They're both idiot heroes, flexing at each other while Kagero is largely unsung.

Largely. An old spy explains to us later that Kagero won the fight; i.e., that she castrates the rapist for raping her—and he has no idea/dies frightened and scared—but she also castrates the hero, who thinks he won the duel: he would've died without Kagero's help [similar to Bard beating Smaug only because of the thrush sent by Bilbo to tell him the dragon's legendary weak point]!

Furthermore, Jubei only wounds the monster's hand, which blocks said monster's face/vision... until his own weapon flies back into his brain, penetrating the seemingly impenetrable armor there by hoisting the owner—a literal walking castle/castle-in-the-flesh—on his own petard [reaping the literal whirlwind]! But even fatally wounded—and blinded like the Cyclops, Polyphemus—the brain[dea]ed monster stumbles stubbornly forwards to both apprehend Jubei, but also mark him for death should this last attack fall short [similar to Jason and the Argonauts, who the aforementioned Cyclops curses with death after they blind him]. The Numinous desperation maneuver/kamikaze ["divine wind"] attack fails, but whose bushido banzai charge carries the victor's likeness into the defeated warrior's now-softened clay palm, which leads a fellow Devil of Kimon—a Snake Woman, this time—to follow Jubei and seek revenge for her partner-in-crime's demise; i.e., man-on-man, girl-on-man, girl-on-girl, and so on, the revenge is a Canterbury's bloody road/scroll that never stops telling tales [though with decidedly less fart jokes than Chaucer and more ninjas acting like knights]!

Furthermore, such duels are generally over pride/women. Not one to sugarcoat, so does Kawajiri and his Aegis reverse the entire knight/damsel archetype/abjection process, but also oscillate between the two characters, Jubei and Kagero, routinely saving each other's skins [with Kagero later saving Jubei from a Medusa-like woman, and helping with a variety of other struggles, too, including another monster of Frankensteinian size, the shapeshifting and seemingly immortal Genma⁴³⁴]: the damsel actually saving the white knight from the black knight/rape monster [such things being obvious to those who normally receive violence from such deceivers; re: Cuwu, teaching me to think about my own survival as a rape victim: from a woman's perspective]. In short, "[they're] comrades!" as Jubei himself explains, and the two never have sex—not even when a government spy is holding a gun to their heads; i.e., using poison on Jubei to force Kagero to sleep with him to lift the fever [triangulating sex from them for him to watch, the old lech a moderate bureaucrat/desk murderer voyeur coercing the exhibit].

While the Gothic involves tremendous speculation/speculative possession, the ensuing romance isn't strictly endorsement; i.e., the Numinous/danger disco⁴³⁵ only palliative when it's sex-positive. Furthermore, such debates happen with demonic ghosts, which include pasts of us as those we're hauntologically debating [e.g., Weber and Marx]. And while it might sound obvious, a scene with rape is inviting the viewer to think about rape. That's important; Radcliffe, like Scott, combined rape and murder together to speak to a medieval viewing of things normally obscured by state illusion—i.e., through stress-relieving kettling devices whose calculated risk would be perfectly fine if not for their aforementioned reliance on unironic xenophobia, abjection and selective liberation, during calculated risk [a war profiteer pimping rape for profit, first and foremost].

Gothic Romance, then, isn't automatic endorsement; at its core, Ninja Scroll is a profoundly Gothically mature story about surviving and overcoming rape; re: as anisotropic, which requires fetishizing rape to some extent [and camping it with the hit-or-miss voice acting]. What matters is performative/dialectical-material context—a kiss, for example, feeling fun under the right circumstances and utterly terrifying/horrifying under the wrong ones. The same goes for sex, but also things that speak to, with or about sex and love in some shape or form; i.e., the Gothic generally communicates trauma through echoes of itself in deliberately "ancient" forms; re: from Kurosawa's samurai "having lost again" to the romantically disinterested-with-money-or-sex Jubei helping Kagero because they're comrades. Fighting against rape, Kagero is as much the story's protagonist as Jubei is. Except, unlike him, she is poisoned to love—probably since she was a young girl well before the movie starts [with "poison" being a defense mechanism" but also "medicine" administered to her in defense of men she grows to resent while simultaneously feeling alienated from those she grows to love]—and must spend this iteration of the Hero's Journey learning to find it, again.

Gothic stories concern rape victims both actual or potential mastering emotional confusion; i.e., amid grave physical danger [the Great Destroyer trope] to heal from the conditioning of abuse: healing is the revenge, as is building up to something that gnaws at and freezes our would-be assailants to deliver the final blow, mid-murder-ballad. Kagero's resistance and bravery is poison to the golem, who cannot ingest it and—faced with his own shame—is subsequently beheaded and dismantled like the coward she exposes him to be. From one demon to another, her gift unmakes him; i.e., her will is greater than his, therefore her power having stolen his during the rapes!

Except, whereas the golem echoes big men raping her since she was small [a historical-material fact echoed in the magistrate's mistress, but also the man himself as not being so functionally different from Genma, but also Genma's golem or the real magistrate's ninja cronies]—and still is small compared to them; i.e., both physically and relative to paper-thin barriers and boundaries that her fellow workers respect more than her rights—Hanza and later Jubei are two dudes she feels like she can actually start to trust; i.e., rape is the unspeakable domain of [traditionally] female violence [we'll explore GNC examples, in Volume Three] but neither back downs or runs away from her like a disease. So eventually she opens up, talking about her feelings in ways that rape victims often bury inside themselves—in short, she learns to live and love again.

For Kagero, something as seemingly innocent as feeling safe during a hug and a kiss while naked and exposed is all that matters. And once she finds Mr. Right to help her realize that goal, she can [and does] die happy [both from joy but also from being stabbed, earlier]! It's very Romantic in a sexless way and yet, all the same, connects to trauma, nudism, rape/violence and demonic magic of all kinds—not quite sui generis but certainly of that Marriage-of-Heaven-and-Hell variety that many artists, poets, thinkers, and actors have struggled to replicate historically across space and time!

It's worth repeating that neither character is a stranger to violence, but Jubei is a stranger to violence as a woman experiences it; Kagero, then, helps him overcome something he can never experience as she does, the two of them doing so in the most classic [and ace] of ways—a tender and sensual kiss—while exploring trauma and power vicariously for the audience in worlds of trauma and power both faraway and close at hand—i.e., where such things don't divide, but slam together in the most primal of discourses made-material under imperial structures onwards: sex and force! "The dose doth make the poison!"

And if Kawajiri "missed the flames of Hell" to speak to rape in ways he could camp during the cryptonymy process, cryptomimetically regenerating old medieval tropes between America and Japan's imaginary past and present, so too could Cuwu and I—once upon a time, in a galaxy far, far away—find common ground; i.e., as two rape victims having experienced rape as a trans masc and trans woman do: differently during the same class struggle extending towards queer people and sex workers. And if we could camp it, in hindsight, then so can we camp Ridley Scott's Alien universe and its own strict rape play regarding Radcliffe's! The paradox of rape allows for it, the events onscreen needing "rape" to discuss rape while also being something that—while undoubtedly triggering for many survivors—remains an invaluable tool when used consciously thus actively as a rape prevention device; re: during ludo-Gothic BDSM, changing the Superstructure!)

Clearly there's a fine line between canon and camp, exploitation and liberation. Those who survive rape without becoming cops but learning how to camp it through calculated risk become—if not strictly "immune" to the bourgeoisie's greatest weapons (canonical fear and dogma)—at least inoculated to them; i.e., in ways that let us camp the canon when the elite manufacture disasters they hope will scare people (through socio-material conditions) to let them stay in control (re: Jadis and I, me escaping them through half-real Gothic fantasies).

Divorced from that, our minds and bodies become not just one again, but ours to wield during the cryptonymy process's dualistic war of masks, mirrors and monsters, magic and myths, and so on; their Great Destroyers expose as frauds, us no longer playing the magic song to send the "Moon" back to its original fearful position, but saying "no more" and recultivating the Superstructure (and reclaiming the Base) in ways the elite cannot monopolize; re: socio-material conditions make people stupid, but anisotropically can make them intelligent and aware. If I did so with Jadis, but also Zeuhl—may their junk fester and rot (cowards who ran from any challenge because it suited them to simply hide and feed on others)—and, to a lesser extent, with dear flawed-but-darling Cwuu (and others less dear to me who harmed me far more), then you can do it together in order to become something mobile and conscious of class, culture and race conducive to Communist development! The scroll winds ever onwards, trapped forever between older sections and newer ones waiting to be written.

For example—and bringing us to another old stomping ground of mine, The Dark Crystal: Age of Resistance (a very gay show, in its own right; re: Persephone van der Waard's "The Dark Crystal: AoR - Sexuality, Women, and Queer Identity," 2019)—Rian's father, Ordon, tells him to be brave when falling to the Hunter, because fear is precisely what the elite will use against us while picking a fight; i.e., once having taken all they can take before someone pushes back (such is reactive abuse). Indeed, the show is all about queer and similarly intersectional solidarities grouping in the face of questioning blind service vis-à-vis our cannibal leaders mirrored in fantastical doubles (and their fractal recursions).

But out of that puppet-happy Age of Wonder and its spectacular duels are age-old tropes speaking to ongoing dialectical-material struggles; e.g., the bounty hunter/secret police demasked (thus shamed) by the aging captain, only for his son to survive him in one final duel not just with the blackguard before him threatening his next-in-line, but also the gaping pit of Death itself eating him alive! When Ordon throws both of them into the pit to try and save Rian, he says, "No!" to stop his weeping son from following him, but also assures him "it's alright" and to "be brave." Such bravery is made not to pacify us, but to keep our animal impulses in check to keep us, their children, from being eaten, too. So do the sins of the father die with him, the old pro going out on his own terms: a warrior's death, reclaiming his honor if not dispatching his eternal foe!

"You have heart! I'll take that, too!" said Jadis to me (they loved the Hunter in that show), to which I finally stood up and said to them, "No you won't!" Such push-back shattered their sense of control, and they fled from me like a bad dream—one that, like all my abusers, haunts me to this very day, and who I've reversed on the Aegis through my cryptomimesis to "dance, magic!" with all the power of Hell at my command; i.e., as someone dangerous who can make demands to the elite, but also make changes without talking to them at all; re: "Get away... FROM MY FRIENDS!" Behold the power of the Darkening—in our hands!

So while the show is full of heroic men, its women are doing the most heroic deeds/dismantling patriarchal systems of power by walking away from Omelas. And so does a humble Grottan (the show's underclass) do the greatest deed of all: turning the elite's message of fear and doubt, hatred and death back on those Caesarean assailants; i.e., terror—a mighty weapon they can't control once unleashed—turned into counterterror! When cornered, the elite unleash Jadis' Moon, and "gentle" Deet absorbs it to become their worst nightmare: a rape victim who fights back to a lethal degree (she is crippled at the start of the show, the Darkening as much criminogenic conditioning as a metaphor for state shift)!

Cornered, she hesitates only for a moment, then acts, sucking the darkness into herself. It seems to be killing her (and it is), but also, she's taking the elite's power into herself and growing into an operatic monster belied by her deceptively small stature: the fat lady simmering inside someone built for comfort, not speed!

"A moment's courage and the deed is done!" Specifically the damage is done, as much speaking to what happens outside Deet as in; i.e., she radicalizes, a dark oracle/whore others see as a threat they pull away from (with Rian marrying the good princess instead of the whore)! Demons are transactional, and superstitious parties isolate her as equally fearful to them as the Skeksis! And though there isn't a Brutus element to Deet's felling of the Caesars, her phallic BDSM revenge element conveys a likeness of the in-group that speaks to real life whistleblowers warning about dangers in our midst from positions of relative privilege close to their friends-turned-enemies (sort of an inverse of the writing for Deet, but functioning on the same gradient); e.g., an insider for Elon Musk selling him down the river after Musk symbolically and materially turned on said insider by doing the Nazi salute; i.e., the insider begot from Jewish Holocaust survivors, and having worked from obscurity alongside Musk until too much was too much (Chris Norland's "SELL Your Tesla Stock Says Elon Musk Insider," 2025).

Everyone's breaking point (and privilege/oppression) are different, but Caesar always laments his own death in the face of backstabbers; Deet's betrayal is seen as "ultimate" in the eyes of the slavers, because they think her indebted to them most of all (and her own friends feeling guilty to some degree in said exploitation, thus fearful of her revenge, but also jealous of her for literally stealing their thunder⁴³⁶ by straight-up nuking a seemingly unstoppable force): "Et tu, Brutae?" might sound absurd when inverted and applied to a working non-white girl of the people, but that's essentially what happens, here. Deet's race and class are alien, but so are her identity and actions through heroic performance turning her into Grendel's mother/the Medusa; i.e., going from female Anakin of color to Commie Darth Vader sith lord Omelas child through the same purple electro-shock treatment used by the failing Emperor! "And now, young Skywalker, you will die!"

No one wants to martyr themselves. In doing so, Deet sacrifices herself by changing permanently as the Medusa does (dooming her to a lonesome existence); but in seeing several friends die, she throws herself in front of the bomb anyways, embracing her heroic role and giving the castle demons a taste of their own stupid bullshit—i.e., after she takes their power from them and giving it back to workers. As such, she kills those who say they can't be killed, showing their illusions as false while toppling Goliath with one of its own stones (a bomb she gives back to them, which blows up in their faces);

i.e., one of the Skeksis—an especially dumb and annoying one—don't even seem to know its dead until its head explodes like a bomb: a "really gross sneeze" that splatters hot, white (and slightly purple) fluid all over the queer-coded Skeksis' face... who cries afterwards, "It's in my mouth!"

Do you split or swallow, love? It's rebellion bukkake, the palace of their confidence and illusions crashing down before our eyes! One dies of shame; the others bravely run away—and all from the testimony of the show's queer character of color bursting their bubble in spectacular killer-rabbit fashion! She becomes demonic/undead on/with the Aegis, but also is vaulted, Christ-like, within Omelas until it eats itself alive (nature's revenge and hers because she isn't heeded, merely taken for granted): for throwing stones in glass houses, those who don't check their privilege mistaking their own ignorance for wisdom and magnanimous charity for active solidarity/acting oppressed versus being oppressed (many of the good characters are princesses, nobles, and cops). So do the others betray Deet.

It might sound tragic and Icarian (and indeed, Netflix canceled the show after one season), but such is Medusa's story normally controlled by men and token women (re: the Athenian Amazons, on and offstage): a thing to take away from their meddling hands through the usual popular (monomyth) devices and poetic abstractions; i.e., speaking in code during the cryptonymy process being unaverse to using puppets that camp the canon. Popular during the medieval period, the practice and its psychosexual metaphors actually date back to ancient times; i.e., while speaking—as such monsters and their simulacra do—from the heart: of those who most immediately alienated by/affected concentrically inwards regarding those of the in-group less and less bothered by capital doing what capital does by design! The paradox of rape being rape cannot be effectively discussed without camping it.

Medusa, then, is ultimately a dead, alien, functionally non-white whore speaking to rape, whose exposure is something moderacy fears and punishes; i.e., the ultimate crime for exposing the ultimate rape as having the ability to radically change society (discussions of rape being shameful for the victim being shamed by other victims, or coddled by them out of gagging pity). Those with privilege (therefore less alienation)—including tokenized privilege—will hide behind their accomplishments/privilege to deny their own oppression and predatory antics (e.g., Mike Tyson the heavyweight champion, not the token black man who raped women and went to prison for it Eleanor Neale's "[Mike Tyson's Vicious History of Domestic Abuse," 2024]—same idea for O.J. Simpson, though he went to jail for something else).

To testify to rape is to rebel against profit, and rebellious women—cis/white or not—are always victims of men or those acting like men/the colonizer pimps out of revenge more broadly through the usual intersecting networks of oppression being historically used to stir up marginalized division; re: that quells the whore's monstrous-feminine testimony as something to cage, thus control, like poor Deet; i.e., capital defends capital in descending/ascending orders of privilege/preferential mistreatment, and the intended heroes of the show don't like Deet once she stops being "poor, sweet, and gentle"; they fear and exile her like Radcliffe does: tone-policing the oracle who exposes their hand in things, then appeasing Brutus and his survivors of Caesar who kill them all. Have fun, kids!

False rebellion is fascism, and capital more broadly loves shooting the messenger while fetishizing her! We can do the same, but doing so to celebrate the whore's revenge in equally crude, undisguised eroticism and public nudism (next page); i.e., a whore's a whore, naked or not. As Lewis and Shelley but also Scott, Kawajiri and Henson showed us, nudity is where power lies, and where our own spectres of the Medusa/Marx reave Radcliffe's refrain to raise her patchwork corpse from the grave to speak in our tongue, for a change! The dead can speak without fear because they're already dead, but those who are undead face a curiously liminal amount of risk: demonic banishment!

As stated, whores are the oldest form of labor, thus exploitation/vengeance, and generally sex is something to be feared precisely because it's haunted by ancient rape, giving it a dark godly flavor (re: the Numinous). This can be for pity or predation, but I know plenty of people who routinely shove whores into a corner and don't talk about them at all because sex is either beneath them, or something they don't understand so they keep quiet about it (torturing Medusa like Prometheus). Ignorance and denial are just as poisonous as direct abuse—with first-hand abusers generally relying on some form of apathy (from indirect or lateral sources) to prey on those they normally destroy! Jack the Ripper targeted streets whores, as do many modern symptoms of capital worship bourgeois predation, out-of-joint; re: Deet being the good team's centrist Omelas pariah (they take the credit for)!

Likewise, these isolated examples speak to a larger problem that revives across a variety of registers. Those closer to the furnace commonly punch down out of desperation to escape it, while those further away ignore it out of convenience. But the common victim is always the whore—with whores of more privilege punching down against those with less, and those with less tokenizing to escape the usual predations happening to them and their kind. Idiosyncrasies aside, no one wants to be raped/the Omelas sacrifice, assimilation being a form of revenge that speaks to self-hatred projected onto similar victims versus the open oppressors caging the whore and worshipping her veiled fury and phantasmagorical nudity on the surface of the image (re: Segewick, but also Radcliffe's Black Veil trope); e.g., middle-class white women hating whores for "paying rent" through an inherited and instructed means of superiority/arbitrary privilege and fragility/allergy to other workers treated as "free" under the usual divisive qualities of capital. Such behavior is criminogenic to varying degrees, but betrayal is betrayal and oppression is oppression insofar as it—like demons, more generally—takes infinite forms within the same castration/carceral system of differences/marginalization; re: through blood libel, witches, and goblins, thus Nazis and Commies/Orientalism as "equally" barbarous. Liberation happens by camping said barbarism and its audience.

Value is perceptive, hence incumbent on position as relative; i.e., money under capital is an imaginary system tied to material factors/positions of divide and punish for exploitative purposes (re: profit). Those who benefit from said fakery imagine threats to the status quo they can expose and banish through remarkable invention and inertia; those who suffer invent fakeries to liberate themselves through incessant revenge. Whatever the nostalgia/deities at play/work (the two are synonymous) during ludo-Gothic BDSM, the shadow of Galatea is always a Numinous whore—even if wrongly applied/accused—through the aesthetic of power and death during cryptonymy and abjection; re: an apocalypse/fetish of dead alien whore paradoxically recent and alive evoking the ancient Numinous of all dead whores banished by Radcliffe to Hell! Relegation and release, gentrify and decay—all use the same highway. Stock is something to give and take, then, happening on a broader market that isn't strictly owned but fought over for different purposes; e.g., the more value we see in ourselves as demonic, the more we'll defend it against those exposed as abusing us as food/status for them to give to capital.

To it, the uncertain, anisotropic, and at times (though not always) apotropaic power of demons, magic and fantasy are dualistic, thus anisotropic during liminal expression tugging on such ropes towards or away from the state out of the whore's revenge; i.e., the elite can't hope to monopolize such things, and they will always need workers, thus whore pimps like Radcliffe, to exploit through the same traitorous us-versus-them arguments policing these prison-like territories as commented on through a variety of past thinkers; e.g., Foucault may have been a rapist traitor to all things queer, but he was right about one thing (well, several, but I digress): prisons destroy everything by design: they're a business, not an accident, and those who visibly challenge the system/profit get hammered.

The '80s were a dark time, and one I barely remember. But I survived Hep C (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Hepatitis C: I Have It, and It's a Deadly Disease, and It Sucks," 2016), and recall suffering under the panopticon as queer my whole life (even while in the closet, but certainly outside of it); re: "A Vampire History Primer" (2024). Like Rocky Balboa, "I can't sing or dance," but I can go the distance with Creed (a token neoliberal assimilating like Floyd Patterson or Sugar Ray Lewis or Leonord, versus Muhammad Ali's love for monster movies and activism) in other ways; i.e., I can't sing or dance (at least not well), but I can fuck, draw, write and work my little heart out with my fellow monstrous-feminine whores! The stage has been the fag sex worker's home since Shakespeare, at least; the idea is to do so on and offstage—to speak to things that aren't separate, but also in language that is simple but no simpler than it needs to be to communicate itself, mid-cryptonymy reversing abjection (thus profit) with all the usual suspects: tension and release, Gothic push-pull, Numinous sex, etc! Revolution's literally free!

To it, I've lived a full life, and through my own privilege and oppression, it's both my duty and honor on my life to use my own profound survival—and total, holistic education—to stand side-by-side with my comrades to subvert said arguments; i.e., not as someone stronger or better than them protecting the weak, but all of us working together as standing against the true enemies of the world! So often, women (or those treated like women/the monstrous-feminine) are "kept," sheltered and gagged under house arrest. Medusa unbound screams through us, her army of avatars; win-motherfucking-win, girls! Die on that hill as you lived: with a bang to thrive in the state of exception as superhero (or supervillain) whores; re: whores are gods, and gods are cool! So is sex, public nudism, Communism and ludo-Gothic BDSM at large!

(artist: Rim Jims)

Last but not least, we'll unpack this vis-à-vis Radcliffe; i.e., as someone to try and salvage versus completely gut, but still a ghost of the original!

With Radcliffe's double dead-and-buried, then (and Scott's revenge against Cameron secured by letting David ride off into the night), I saved the animal side of things for last, because it concerns the alien fixations of the Gothic as a steady alarm bell; i.e., for state crisis and decay that must be met within alienized spheres in defense of nature-as-alien before state shift happens!

"Are you still dead?" I don't know, Dennis Cooper, are we? The idea when surviving state shift is to inject ourselves with the power of the gods without harming ourselves; e.g., by not sticking our dicks in light sockets, or fucking ourselves with actual knives, etc; i.e., by "playing dead" in ways that revive Medusa in ways we can control, meaning in a collective push towards avenging nature-as-monstrous-feminine without fucking ourselves over in the bargain! Nature is other/monstrous-feminine, its routine harvests discussed already in the book but here approaching history as something we write for ourselves per our education as taken back into our own hands during revolutionary cryptonymy (and the other Gothic theories)!

And, like Scott's David or Lewis' Matilda, we avatars of the Medusa can look back despite the dualistic confusions: on our handiwork with pride! Idle hands, indeed! Whether it's PUSSY SLAIN! or PUSSY SLAYS YOU! the sub—male, intersex, or female—has just as much power as the dom, and something is always given in exchange between us workers, and the elite stealing from us as we drink their milkshakes (really being our milkshakes, but I digress). Go forth and conquer, little ones! "Rape" ironically and show them your power/the method in your "madness" (or devil in your details)! Trans their MAGA kids and fuck their tradwives not just for revenge, but funsies, then dance on the grave of their stupid Man Box dreams, muhahaha (whose dreams sit between fiction and non-fiction; e.g., Adam Mockler's "UPDATE: Wife Leaves Trump Voter Who LOST \$1MILLION," 2025)!

All that being said, this was just coitus; consider the following resurrection and celebration of poor Radcliffe's freshly raped corpse a mouthful of actual zombie-demon cum, sans foreplay! I.e., of what to expect in Volume Three, when proletarian praxis and de facto education become that volume's sole focus...

Afterword: In Measured Praise of the Great Enchantress (feat. Ann Radcliffe, Sailor Moon, The Ronin Warriors, and Harmony Corrupted)

"That's hard to say, sir! They're each outstanding in their own way!"

—Greg Marmalard, Animal House

Before "Call of the Wild" (the last and most truncated chapter in the Demon Module), a final note on Ann Radcliffe; or rather, a note on her "ghost" as someone to compliment: a theoretical likeness of the actual person, to which we're camping other Radcliffean egregores by using the same devices the historical Radcliffe relied on, but differently than she herself used them (or even other people we've discussed camping her ghost, as well; re: Ridley Scott). So, the compliments I'm paying to "Radcliffe," here, are as much to her potential to be camped; meantime, the criticism I've already lodged against the historical auteur and her actual literary output (e.g., "On the Supernatural in Poetry") remain very much in effect!

And yes, yes, I know Scott just sliced Radcliffe's likeness to bits (aka, a strawman—or strawwoman, in this case), but I wanted to conclude her role in things with a conciliatory effort; i.e., like the flowers David lays on Shaw's grave in Covenant, it's possible for me to admire Radcliffe; re: despite having just sliced her up for spare parts: a much ado about nothing I reverse for its praxial value in our favor's death theatre! If the boys never died, then neither did Radcliffe! "Rise, Radcliffe; rise and do my bidding as my willing slave":

Now I know what it's like to be Inside the city of the dead
All I think of is breaking free (Manilla Road's "Lost in Necropolis," 1983).

Fucking oath, my zombie queen; let's rock, and do it "David Lo Pan Style" (2012)! It's a vibe! From Hell and back, there's so... much... gloomth!

To it, Ann Ward "Radcliffe" is someone I probably don't give enough credit, but also am admittedly hesitant to laud with too many accolades; i.e., she's already called the "Great Enchantress," even if the people doing it unironically have, I suspect, their noses permanently wedged up her fat asscrack (see: above)!

Putting the "fanny" in Annie, old Radcliffe seems to have single-handedly spawned an entire genre of fiction; i.e., doing so in ways that paved the way for future authors like Austen, Shelley and countless others (though none as important as the mother of Frankenstein). By arguably having prophetic elements in her own work that, unto itself seems to anticipate the rise of decay in future times (e.g. the American "justice" system is just slavery in disguise), Radcliffe shows the salvageable value of "rape" while ravishing the whore; re: during exquisite "torture" as something to pity and shame, discount, blame, gaslight, antagonize, and put cheaply to work/value judge while summoning inside capital as built on older systems of oppression the owner class has since hauntologized on a global scale (for maximum profit, thus rape of nature as monstrous-feminine): flushing out marginalized value for in-group supremacy (every Judas has their price; re: power over other workers, in some shape or form—with fascists stealing any way they can and moderates facilitating it provide their masters stay in power)!

A woman paid by a man is historically a whore; whores who assimilate like Radcliffe did would hate the ghosts of past whores and tokenize/triangulate against them (thus their own), then invariably gentrify and decay instead of talking to the demons/dead (often chained to their middle-class positions like Radcliffe was—i.e., not able to jump ship through stock manipulation/insider trading and old money/golden parachutes, but likewise unable to see any revolutionary value in challenging the system through rape play at large). Now with Radcliffe, the shoe's on the other foot: she's the ghost to pimp through play as we've been doing (rape play the act of playing with power imbalance haunted by older systemic traumas infused into newer ones).

Yes, canceling is something capital does to its victims, and Radcliffe is easy to blame. All the same, dead whores have their uses, even less alien ones; i.e., Radcliffe was someone, in life, who contributed to much of this conservatism by being sick with dogma, herself, and just as often couldn't see beyond her own nose: not having access to some of the ideas that Shelley did; e.g., Galvanism—but also resisting ones she did have access to; re: Lewis, once introduced to our real-life Gothic heroine, was a rival to punch down against for the rest of her life (with WASP-y straight women and gay men being "natural" enemies).

Now, she's our zombie; we "captured that motherfucker and she's our cassette"; re: Sublime's "Raleigh Soliloquy Pt. I" (1994)":

She's gonna get her second chance to suck my cock again. If she turns me down, she's gonna go straight to Hell, she won't pass "go," she'll never fuckin' win. I don't give a shit, as long as she sucks me off when I tell her, 'cause she's my zombie (source: Genius).

And alright, alright—now that Radcliffe's on our leash, let's ease up on her corpse and sing it some praises, yeah? Time for treats (and maybe walkies, afterwards);

"Here, girl! Does Scooby want a Scooby snack?"

What I want to do here is celebrate the lady herself, but also—through Gothic Communism—give of examples of how to synthesize Radcliffe, a problematic woman, with other forms of media, during ludo-Gothic BDSM: James Daughton (from the epigram) for a second, but also the Japanese anime Sailor Moon and The Ronin Warriors (me looking ahead to "Call of the Wild," but also Volume Three, where we talk about these things at length). Harmony Corrupted will likewise step in as usual, lending me a helping hand (and booty—with the Sailor Venus outfit, above, having a similar color scheme to Velma Dinkley's own wonderfully 1960s Radcliffe pastiche).

Radcliffe was problematic (as Austen's pastiche pointed out). True enough. Still, she was an undeniable pioneer in early Gothic fiction, and one whose value obviously goes beyond Frederic Jameson's low esteem of her "boring and exhausted paradigm" (if only because said material conditions gave rise to tremendous visibility during the cryptonymy process, allowing for lots of smuggling and useful detection). Though not the first female Gothic author (re: Clara Reeve), Radcliffe laid important groundwork for much of what followed. Indeed, ludo-Gothic BDSM is rooted in her ideas, several of which were instrumental in my own work as a whole; re: the demon lover/demon BDSM, closed space, the Black Veil, the infernal concentric pattern, unmappable space, and the explained supernatural rooted in ruins to explore by a female/feminine heroine (Metroidvania in a nutshell).

(artist: Caspar David Friedrich)

All in all, your mileage may vary (especially if you're not ace), but also, I don't want to blame Radcliffe entirely for everything bad that followed her work (any more than we might entirely blame Marx' homophobia for Stalin's banning of homosexuality in Russia nearly a century later—from the 1840s and '50s to 1933). Call me unusually charitable, but I've simultaneously attacked Radcliffe for being an annoying altar my academic peers worshipped at, yet found my own ways to appreciate and honor her valuable contributions. In drafting those concepts and putting them to practice, Radcliffe did so in ways that had their own vital wiggle room to work with. While unquestionably conservative and commercially-minded, she was nowhere near as greedy or developed in her bigotries as someone like Rowling is today, and her explorations of the imaginary past had room for legitimate queries despite being centered primarily around white straight people. She lived in 18th-century England; what do you expect?

To it, some people demonstrate "what you see is what you get." Others, though, surprise you when you look "under the hood," but also spend more time with these people; i.e., to have fallings out and reunions with; e.g., like me learning—pretty much out of the blue, today—that James Daughton, the actor who played Greg Marmalard from Animal House, played a small role in a short-lived show called V (1984) in the mid-'80s that, from 2011 to 2025, has developed a small-if-devoted fanbase called Visitor's Fleet (think "Trekkies" but more niche and obscure):

(source: Visitor Fleet)

You don't say?

Radcliffe is of a similar camp to Daughton, insofar as workers don't reduce to a single function (an idea we introduced in part one of "Exploring the Derelict Past" with Nina Hartley and which we'll now unpack here); i.e., someone who seems easy to judge by their surface, and yet who changes the more you learn about them.

To it, I've spent much time with Radcliffe throughout the years, finding my opinions changing a bit more positively and negatively than they have with someone like Lewis (and yet who I probably also have engaged more with than Lewis and his seminal novel, to be honest). Lewis is superior by virtue of me being queer and tending to side with him and prefer his sense of perceptive camp to Radcliffe's canon, a priori, but there's no denying that Radcliffe's damsels in distress carry an intense appeal with me (always looking to get "ravished" in some shape or form): of me feeling like a trans whore, and having a place to summon and unpack that as someone ravishing who wants to be ravished; i.e., like a detective but also a damsel/whore being where she "shouldn't" be but is; re: Radcliffe's wheelhouse. Let's pinch that off, shall we (God forgive me)?

In turn, Radcliffe's refrain's investigative trifecta, "damsels, detectives and sex demons," involves "Gothic" as a poetic means of involvement and investigation, onstage and off, that Radcliffe's cryptonymy encapsulates quite well. It might sound difficult to parse or conceptualize, so here's me and Harmony talking about it:

Harmony: If you don't mind, I was going to ask you something about these two questions, just to be sure I understood them correctly: Are mythical creatures considered monsters? Say, from Slavic or Greek/Roman myth? Regarding the other one, what falls into the category of Gothic poetics again?

Persephone: Poetics, at their most basic, are the act of creation (from poiesis, to create). This applies to creativity more broadly; i.e., as in "art and activism," be it journalism, sex work, poetic verse, cosplay and/or modeling, etc, none of which are automatically separate/aren't mutually exclusive. In short, anything you poetically create, from a dualistic standpoint; i.e., I have a thesis argument about that: "all heroes are monsters." Ergo, all workers and their labor (and what they create with it) are monsters; i.e., as something the state will antagonize and try to exploit, but also what we can fight back with against their harmful versions: our demons, undead and animals (source: "Hailing Hellions," 2025).

To that, anyone can be a detective though monstrous expression, and any act we utilize as such the state will call, thus treat, as "monstrous" (violent, terrorist, other); i.e., in ways it will tokenize and police for profit, thus pimp and rape. In turn, Gothic heroines are little more than virgins/whores investigating the abuse of the state in and out of Gothic fiction treating nature as alien. But again, there is no outside of the text; re: whores are the oldest form of worker (apart from nomadic hunter-gatherers), and something the state has tried to pimp from time out of mind in ancient duality (with pimps being the oldest kind of worker exploitation/apologetics; i.e., worker "protection" arguments): Medusa, the demon whore, as the oldest kind of monster seeking revenge against the state making her (and nature) undead under Capitalism's future apocalypses. The oldest forms of activism stem from her black market, thus the oldest attempts to escape slavery and systemic bigotry/persecution and police violence pinging nature as monstrous-feminine (from master/slave, anti-Semitism, racism, queerphobia, and tokenism at large).

Our revenge against these older abuses comes from breaking the monopoly by illustrating whores as guerrilla detectives from Hell; i.e., dead whores do tell tales, and speak with the full weight of Antiquity behind them; re: Marx's "all dead generations" except gayer and more inclusive, flipping the script! Anyone can be a whore, thus a monster and detective, and in trying to investigate and police us, the system will collapse under its own weight. Forget Radcliffe, fascism is not known for its brains (and stems from older forms of media control during the 1930s; re: Hilter's Hollywood imitating America's). This being said, they are ruthless, unscrupulous and effective, what I like to think of as dangerous idiots.

Except they've also tried this before, many times, and the proof is in the pudding; e.g., Tesla, the Volkswagen of the 21st century (Led By Donkeys' "Heil, Tesla," 2025), but also hauntological regressions towards an imaginary half-real past that rely on slave labor and theft to defend the state (as police, secret or not, have done since the earliest city-states, like Rome, Sparta or Athens); re: to assign blame through DARVO/obscurantism and exploit/pimp labor and nature through lies and force (opiates for the masses/shock and awe/bread and circus/neoliberal shock therapy). We fight them asymmetrically and anisotropically in duality during liminal expression; i.e., by using the same aesthetics of power and death that Radcliffe did while doubling her through imperfect likeness: to liberate ourselves from state binaries (us versus them) and control, thus its moderate to reactionary agents (official or de facto/stochastic) during the canonical terror/counterterror process of abjection the original Radcliffe largely upheld/apologized for in practice (re: Groom and "On the Supernatural in Poetry")!

Furthermore, if Trump and company squirm like worms when a Washinton bishop states the obvious/calls for mercy for the alien (HasanAbi's "Bishop Calls Out Trump," 2025), what do you think they're gonna do when we whores are doing it, out in the streets among you? The elite don't believe in anything but transaction and control for them; the more boundaries they try to install, the more we counter with ours, and the more it backs them into a corner... until finally the reality that capital automatically treats nature (and those of it) with violence will expose the naked horrors of the system: humanizing the harvest and outing the state through its daily operations as inhumane, barbaric, and ultimately unnecessary. No honor among thieves, and we demask our killers—per the cryptonymy process—through half-real dialectical-material context, ludo-Gothic BDSM and set/broken boundaries, mid-argument; re: self-reporting no matter how many masks one swaps out/has on at once. All conditioning happens through intended or emergent play as a means of anisotropic conditioning/exchange. We double them, thus blend in while standing out in the same places of concealment on the Aegis; i.e., a safe, half-real space of paradox/danger to teach ludo-Gothic BDSM under surveillance by hostile forces!

In doing so, the elite and their defenders (the middle class) will disappear as we dismantle the state—not through wishful-thinking but in thinking of wishes, wants and desires through demonic exchange and transformation as educational in an activist sense; i.e., as replaced with a second-nature emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness that prevents profit, thus rape and genocide as endemic to state operations; re: the whore's revenge, versus the pimp's, that Radcliffe—despite her open aversion to demons and sex—actually explores and outlines rather well: Bruce Lee's "I do not hit; it hits all by itself!"

All detectives are heroes and all heroes are monsters, and all monsters are heroes and detectives working in duality in ways you might not think of; e.g., Sailor Scouts, pushing Satanically up against glass ceilings (and other materials) while still getting to celebrate particular kinds of power exchange and transformation

(alter egos)! Sluts aren't just monsters, but gods, and gods are cool; re: because they have the forbidden power of sex, drugs and rock 'n roll to change things by altering how we think through what we create, consume, enjoy and endorse. Because they're what the state tries to monopolize, tokenize and control through poetic demon-summoning and -making rituals, this is easy enough to subvert; re: merely taking the time and energy needed to camp canon with our own labor as poetic expression (through puns, paradoxes, metaphors, oxymorons, what-have-you): our zombie Radcliffe whores!

"You've weaponized your friends against me!" Jadis once said; i.e., while I asked my friends for help in dealing with a bully who was constantly gaslighting me for my labor (emotional, sexual, physical and/or otherwise). As Radcliffe shows, exploitation and liberation happen inside these same stages of performance/power as performance that requires us outing ourselves to some degree; i.e., during the cryptonymy process reversing abjection with chronotopic and hauntological language: there is no revolution without risk but also demons to cryptomimetically dance with, good or not-so-good; re: me and Zeuhl, but also "Radcliffe"!

So once more unto the breach, babes! Slay the "state's" pussy by taking control of your own bodies' awesome power through monstrous-feminine expression as holistic levers of inclusive detection (to feature and play with); i.e., to transform in seemingly "magical" ways that, in truth, just involve costumes and their textualities and themes weaponized for workers by workers; re: like the Sailor Scout before/after standing up to fight the state's bugbears "for love" (as genderqueer virgin/whore, Athena/Medusa, etc—exhibit 51b3, second image), but also like Radcliffe's secret whore: we can all be the Great Enchantress, meaning alter egos to summon and speak truth to power during revolutionary cryptonymy! Sex, danger and safety aren't separate, nor are detectives and whores mutually exclusive (the harmful idea that prostitutes can't think being something the actual Radcliffe didn't try to combat); re: "Not only can terror be employed as a weapon, but any weapon can become a weapon of terror: terror is a weapon, a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it." Such are whores/the Medusa from time out of mind!

As such, get restless (or nervous; re: Pat Benatar)! Use those "labyrinths of conjecture" (e.g., Andrew McInnes' "Labyrinths of Conjecture: The Gothic Elsewhere in Jane Austen's Emma"⁴³⁷" 2016) at any moment, at the drop of a hat, to burst out into song (and/or sex) to take the state (thus our pimps) hysterically to task; i.e., thus have the whore's revenge during the whore's paradox (of rape): to go forth and conquer not as weaklings, but avenging angels in disguise doing the no-pants dance, letting off steam, churning cream and having fun of all manner of naughty/nice kinds! Masculine and/or (monstrous-)feminine, there's endless ways to convey strength as demonic transformation and exchange (as we've seen with Radcliffe, and shall see with Sailor Moon, in a moment)!

So go wild and let no one stand in your way! Remind them that we are human and the state is not! And if it is your swan song then at least you went out with a Big Bang (attack)! But chances are, it's a siren song to lure comrades in good faith to a noble cause: universal liberation from total enslavement; i.e., the state won't stop until the world is dead because the state is incompatible with life, and it does so by using Capitalist Realism to make us ignorant to how labor exchange works, hence illustrating mutual consent with monsters (demons or otherwise)! They become indoctrinated to theft, which wages are—money designed to steal labor value through canonical (thus bad-faith) forms of monstrous expression/revenge; e.g., like John Maus' "Real Bad Job" (2006) speaking of work as something that just "naturally sucks" (and making fun of that).

So does sex work operate as a profoundly ancient and powerful form of labor that can really suck/cause addiction and abuse in canonical, pimped forms (re: Radcliffe), but outside of those is about as liberating as you can get (re:

⁴³⁷ Bharat Tandon makes an interesting point by saying how Emma (1816) beat Shelley to the punch; but frankly then so did Milton, Homer or Dante. In truth, to say "posthumanism" is to have people thinking of science fiction vis-à-vis Frankenstein, because Emma—while dramatically fluent—isn't scientifically grounded: as a matter of making monsters like Shelley's mighty novel is; i.e., it's food for thought, a "gambit" as Innes calls it, not a given; or... SHELLEY IS QUEEN OF THAT DOMAIN, NOT AUSTEN, FOOL!

"Radcliffe"); i.e., as Dr. Drew Pinsky puts it, "It's not the drugs, it's the context." The same idea applies to sexuality and sex work/monsters not as a moral failing. Except, what he says about chemical drugs,

It's the context and the relationship that humans have with chemicals that's really an issue here. It's not a good thing or a bad thing. It's not a weak[ness] or a strength. It's just a biological relationship that humans have in certain context[s] (source: Parvati Shallow's "Dr. Drew Says 'Addiction Is Not a Moral Failing,'" 2014).

we apply to social-sexual labor exchange; re: during ludo-Gothic BDSM (the example I'm using for this section being Sailor Moon and The Ronin Warriors, next page). The disease isn't humans or anything else that capital pimps through eco-fascism, but capital itself and its Realism making us sick as a species while slowly destroying the planet (thus ourselves):

(source tweet, Proud Socialist: January 24th, 2025)

Labor has infinite value, or the state wouldn't bother exploiting us/stooping to DARVO and obscurantism to act "like" us (to blame the whore while raping her and acting like the rape victim and virgin/whore, themselves), and sex and monsters, Radcliffe shows, are policed through force more than anything else; i.e., we're the territories they invade—through preferential mistreatment and axes of intersecting privilege and oppression—to get that sweet, sweet "punnai Dasani." Despite reactionaries and moderates constantly treating whores like they're stupid/can't think for themselves, thus constantly need to be rescued, we don't "need" their "help." Indeed, we can become not so much "unfuckable" to them (e.g., "girls fart," a poor animal crawling up our "Aegis" to die and horribly spread around us⁴³⁸) or too big to eat by dividing into pieces (re: Doom's Red-Scare tactic of marginalized in-fighting by a single Fifth Column marine playing white Indian; re: the Bay of Pigs and similar CIA initiatives besides the Vietnam War that inspired ⁴³⁸ Versus fascism following white moderates/token traitors around like a bad smell; they who smelt it, dealt it.

Doom through Aliens), but inedible; i.e., as whatever they eat of us spoils their appetite by giving them IBS from Hell: "How about some hot chocolate?" We burn in ways that purify us not in a fascist sense, but to transform and survive our enemies trying to pick up and eat us: "Eat this!"

To that, this brings us to the idea of camping Radcliffe through her most infamous refrain, but also most valuable idea; re: damsels, detectives and sex demons, but also the exploration of ruins by heroic characters at a young age/naked or at least exposed disposition with genderqueer potential outing what our enemies call "apophenic conspiracy" while pimping us (for Radcliffe, that's Gothic heroines, of course, and straight ones that we have to camp like Lewis did; re: with Matilda being an early example of a "Sailor Scout" crossdresser⁴³⁹).

What does Ann Radcliffe have to do with Sailor Moon? So glad you asked! We're going to consider taking that idea and applying it campily to a spectrum of gendered heroism; i.e., one selected fairly arbitrarily (mother is the necessity of invention) and settling on The Ronin Warriors, but also Sailor Moon, fan art, cosplay and more as sex work/public nudism charged with genderqueer rebellion!

(exhibit 51b3: The sentai and shonen idea of anime taps into ancient warrior ideas of masculine strength/virility being something to summon and wash oneself in; i.e., the "fire of the gods" being destructive but also purifying in a variety of ways; e.g., Japanese Shintoism/the fascist side of Buddhism tied to Japanese sun gods and the self-belief/personal responsibility argument made to young post-Occupation Japanese men.

In other words, the show was something to canonically prepare the next generation for capital's usual boom-and-bust; i.e., with a seasonal call to arms [more on this, in Volume Three]: young sexy boy warrior threatened by white ghostly jizz light coming for his codpiece, only to "juke" him, surround and envelop him, and begin to armor him in fire that—far from destroying him—basically turns him into human Godzilla: a sun avatar that banishes the darkness [with rainbows] for a short time by—and I'm not really kidding—jizzing light from his sword onto the ghost emperor until said tyrant fucks off. It's admittedly a fairly transcendental idea, if only because it's been hauntologized by neoliberal militias chasing the ghost of "Rome": the ancient warrior's monomythic rite of passage being seen in Ancient Greek stories with the Amazons or Achilles, Old Welsh and English legends with Arthur or Beowulf, the Picts versus the Romans, Cu Chulainn and his fearsome ríastrad, the German berserks or Scottish highlanders, or even more fictional DBZ Saiyans and our aforementioned Ronins [Radcliffe only had non-magical swordsmen like Ludovico].

Except, the same ideas also apply to shojo anime and a variety of similar kayfabe good/evil stories that speak to praxis; i.e., as dualistic, letting flexible gender roles adopt a monstrous-feminine quality speaking to queer love, rampant female/feminine desire merged with traditionally male forms thereof: action and desire—sex and force as active, versus passive—turned not simply into fire, but a sun in small's humanoid shape of fucking plasma [a fourth state of matter]. It's literally the fire of the gods, and it canonically kicks ass for the state. But camped by us [and Naoko Takeuchi, author of Sailor Moon—more on her in "Call of the Wild"], such things can be communicated to a wider audience through queer allegory like Sailor Moon: the rebellion of crossdressing girls [or more to the point, those who appear as girls] who still can look femme during gender trouble and Radcliffean parody [those Hitachi space wands/flashlights aren't just for show during the cryptonymy process, below]!

Sailor Moon is one of the most popular [and queer] shows of all time⁴⁴⁰ and it revels in monomythic subversion; i.e., by summoning gay demon slut witches [Jupiter for life, babes, above and below] from outer space less to fight for the Man and more to camp the canon to Hell and back! It's definitely a strip tease, but in keeping with Matthew Lewis/the Amazon and marrying those to traditional feminine ideas of strength that Radcliffe used, Sailor Moon is a deeply nostalgic and Gothic gay adventure [about teenage girls/queer people fighting spectres of Caesar] retrojected into a sparkling city-pop hauntology after the aforementioned crash in 1991 [right as the Cold War was "ending"]; i.e., Takeuchi wrote it in 1992 as a power fantasy that—among other things—spoke to romance and queer expression that used gender trouble regarding female, lesbian, and intersex-but-female-presenting "butch" heroines [and Jupiter's just "boy crazy" but hopeless with the lads, sadly]: a misfit-yet-bedazzling team of virgin/whores, there's truly something for everyone [obviously the show isn't as racially inclusive as it could be/restricts itself to particular body types, but the beauty of the costume is that it's one-size-fits-all!].

⁴⁴⁰ That, all the same, not everyone knows about; e.g., Harmony is originally from Siberia and knows about a bunch of Soviet-era Communist cartoons, but despite being agender hasn't really watched Sailor Moon despite having heard of it; i.e., this is my chance to both play matchmaker, Emma-style, and realize that Sailor Moon is a show that I've flat-out loved for a long time (to a degree higher than I thought/realized or reflected on, until now).

Like and unlike Lewis, the transformations aren't horrifying but joyous, insofar as power is a cosplayer-type performance that speaks to a means not just of instilling Capitalist Realism [which both Sailor Moon and Ronin Warriors are somewhat guilty of, to be fair] but in challenging it onstage and off during the same kinds of theatrics camped even further by us!

Anyone who's ever done cosplay will tell you it's a blast; i.e., occurring in a place where everyone dresses up, it's very Rabelaisian/carnavalesque—with people able to see a cosplayer's sexy body as an asexual form of public nudism that, sure enough, is a role model for younger girls, boys and enbies, but also a sex symbol/symbol of monstrous-feminine strength for sexually-active teenagers and adults, too [the show is incredibly silly in terms of its treatment of damsels/Amazons, but also incredibly stylish and sexy through the same fetishes and clichés, below]: how to be strong while exposed, just like Radcliffe but slutty!

Above, Jupiter "handles" the boys while still appearing girly-if-austere, and in doing so, she subverts current Japanese hero tropes; i.e., by having the obvious and awkward damsel-in-distress rescued by another woman [echoes of female property owners in the Warring-States Period being trained in the art of war to defend their homes from their husbands' rival warlords]—in ways that speak to a shared desire with Western variants of the Amazon's subversive wish fulfillment, post-Marston and his Wonder Woman BDSM schtick: the power fantasy/calculated risk of being rescued through the theatre of demon BDSM as subverting traditional Western ideas scapegoating the Amazon in two-sided echopraxis [from Japan to the US and vice versa].

Instead, such device become genuine heroes through Jupiter and the other less-masc Sailor Scouts that, all the same remain alien insofar as they aren't binarized, but remain desirable precisely because of those liminal, erotically gendered components tied to force [sex and war]: power is performance, which is largely dress-up and play-acting war as a matter of decolonizing gender roles/rules, thus heteronormativity and the other qualities of capital while inside capital. It's super applicable and productive to class, culture and race war as a matter of good praxis; i.e., as something that—like class warriors exposed to such ideas at a young age, subvert the idea of "growing up with canon" like Radcliffe did; re: by growing up with a show whose target audience was never straight white men or women, but queer people of all ethnicities, genders and religions stuck inside capital and making the most of it as they can [and anyone who accuses the eroticization of obviously adult Sailor Moon erotica is projecting/self-reporting really fucking hard; i.e., as the Straights always do when trying to colonize queer spaces and media—and for which we need to camp their canon anyways like Takeuchi did, us giving Radcliffe the same campy business]: exposing her base circuits in ways we can rewire.

I simply adore Sailor Moon for just how openly gay it is. For one, it's where I got my own sparkly rainbow look from; i.e., in a lot of my art, from 2022 onwards; re: after I came out as trans [above—in what my best friend Ginger describes as, "It's like if Lisa Frank and Hanna-Barbera had a baby and it was gay"]: wanting to fuck what I want to be, a femme warrior witch. But also, this rescue and DIY attitude speaks to iconoclastic art/sex work as something that also speaks to everyday events juxtaposed with monomythic splendor and Gothic poetics; i.e., Faustian-to-Promethean alteration and subversion; e.g., bullies, but also sex and cosplay of all kinds walking the same tightrope and, per Foucault, leaving the bedroom to perform ludo-Gothic BDSM on a variety of registers/polities [e.g., "taming the Amazon," above, merged with a GNC topos of power of women]: a shunga lookalike that dodges the barriers while doing sex work in Trojan disguise for workers, post-Radcliffe [e.g., "Dream of the Fisherman's Wife," 1807].

Casual sex and superhero costumes have been a part of my art for years, and which I built my website around re: "["My Art Website Is Live!"" 2020]. While my work is transitional—having shifted from twinks and Amazons to general queer expression in the Gothic imagination—the same larger idea applies to any popular movie, show or game; e.g., Overwatch and its superheroic characters being symbols of power as a matter of sex and force [above]. The same goes for Sailor Moon and its famous Sailor Scout outfits⁴⁴¹ camping Radcliffe; re: by literally making her slutty but also ace/public nudist and Pagan/GNC; i.e., as crossing over into different games [e.g., Mass Effect (2009), below]. The possibilities are truly endless, which is why queer people love Sailor Moon! It's a safe space with a strong transgenerational community of fans that let their freak flags fly from a variety of ages; i.e., very similar to furies as an equally queer fandom that cis-het men have tried to unironically demonize, thus pimp/colonize but never really having succeeded [more on that in "Call of the Wild," when we discuss furry panic].

This includes cosplay through art about the show, but also real-life performers trying to capture the same enthusiasm/sex-positively regressive childhood [re: Radcliffe] innocence and adult strength-through-exposure shown in the same light/tableau; i.e., as a notion that "grows up" along with the fanbase as increasingly queer and loaded with gay allegory as something the syndication of anime has tried to stamp out [and smuggle in sexist, even pedophilic, eco-fascist, alternate-yet-singular interpretations that cater to patriarchal norms in America and Japan: as a larger neoliberal global exchange network—again, more on this idea in Volume Three]. But exploitation and liberation occupy the same stages, allowing for sex-positive art that challenges its sex-coercive doubles; i.e., through our own performative hermeneutic/synthesis "pimping 'Radcliffe'": these girls are caught between duty and personal enjoyment, transforming for themselves as much as playing cops and robbers. In turn, this second idea rapidly takes on a life of its own; i.e., among a growing army of pretty soldier girls who aren't token cops exclusively but a polity of antiestablishment GNC forces that—in the hands of fans performing Sailor Moon meta—can be Sailor Scouts for themselves: monstrous-feminine detectives making Radcliffe more accessible/virgin-whore by updating her away from her shrewish maiden's neo-conservative origins!

model and artist: [Mei Minato and Persephone van der Waard]

As a matter of proletarian praxis, the same demonic ideas speak to wish fulfillment as enacted by the likes of myself and Harmony [next page/several images] but also me and other artists [above] transforming each other as a matter of desire; i.e., through our own art made by us [versus replaced through AI as a system of theft turning the product into a soulless copy of itself with no humanity inside, exhibit 56c2]: using the same aesthetics of power and death [of sluts, astrology and Sailor Scouts versus Ronin Warriors and their own symbolized color scheme tied to moral virtues—same difference] to achieve a proletarian function, mid-praxis! Saturn is in retrograde, regurgitating his daughters; i.e., throwing up our femboy passion and cat girl jouissance! It's not how Lewis' Matilda did it, Giger's xenomorph or Scott's David, but from Takeuchi to us: friendship is magic and detecting is fun!)

This is a taste of camping Radcliffe through lateral exposure and synthesis, but hopefully one that sounds fun (unless you a lame-oid philistine). In any event, camp and its hermeneutic are as much perceptive through praxial synthesis and catharsis as dry academic analysis; so is sex, so is rebellion. The theatrical idea is to poke and prod labor until it "catches fire" as a matter of sustainable, ongoing rebellion, not vice-character soliloquies that get two seconds to say the quiet part out loud before Samus, Mega Man or Doomguy lops off their head with a missile: pimps pimping whores, versus whores calling the shots for whores (thus workers), not the state and its usual DARVO and obscurantism monopolizing rape!

Medusa is a god of death, thus life, giving and taking. Monomyth heroes assume and police a "natural" sense of superiority and division; i.e., policing nature through revenge to take, take, take along a naturalized progression; re: Zombie-Vampire Capitalism as endlessly taking for the state, fueling nature's harvested blood into the hero's body to fuel said taking again and again. But also, it can be seen as Demon Capitalism: giving death back to workers by state forces punching death incarnate/nature personified as a vengeful demon "talking back"; i.e. witness tampering to badger and disrupt but ultimately pimp, thus exterminate the whore as vermin through Trojan gifts: nakedly veiled threats—from Troy to George Floyd, but also what Man Box fans want to do to Sailor Scouts (rape the witch), and what we challenge through campy exposure drawing our lines in the sand; re: "Ambrosio, it was my soul!" But what liberty it bought—rescuing us from Capitalist Realism by turning us into witches people want to be sans assimilation!

As Radcliffe has well-and-truly demonstrated, segregation is no defense because hers canonically led to tokenization (cops don't prevent crime, they perpetuate and create it as something to police); i.e., you actually have to make a world where exposure to nudity—through ludo-Gothic BDSM synthesizing praxis on a daily basis, onstage and off—doesn't result in rape (with her famously hiding herself away [and armoring her sheltered heroines] from bad-faith "protectors" as much as perceived open-threat enemies). This starts with camping Radcliffe less "to death," and more giving her fresh life during Gothic Communism; i.e., as shown in stories like Sailor Moon having already done the job, and ones we're carrying endlessly into the future: "Loosen up/quit being a Paranoid Persephone! Now let's see that pussy!" An angel in the streets, freak in the sheets!

"I fear the Greeks even when they bring gifts," me being a survivor of rape trauma who, hypervigilant ever and always, walks forever on the balls of her feet and holds her breath without realizing—predator/prey unfolding during a hunting mechanism that can anisotropically turn the tables in a dialectical-material fashion, thus reversing the abjection and cryptonymy processes to have the whore's revenge by turning canon into whores; re: like Scott did, but less "strict" and more "gentle"; i.e., the gentle femme domme having the same power that Medusa does, Radcliffe's less ironic imitators before her gaze: a witch is a witch, sparkles and/or darkness.

So does the gorgon's glare (above or below, from all its eyes, mouths, and other vampiric hyphenations demonically giving fatal knowledge back) freeze the giver of false gifts/bad matchups (re: Emma) to drain them of their stolen blood during harmful exchange and transformation: land back, thus labor back affording us these things at the expense of the usual takers embodying the state/tyrant in small giving rape out like a reward; re: neoliberalism and personal responsibility through infinite growth during frontier-to-domestic military expansion, efficient profit and worker/owner division; i.e., through the usual monopolies/trifectas and qualities of capital abused by the state during oppositional praxis and capital's day-to-day raping of nature as alien, monstrous-feminine whore.

To take back sex and the whore as terrifying to the pimp, then, is to take back the human side of these territories commonly revived, mise-en-abyme—with the panties and pussy of the common sex worker indicative of a larger chronotope the colonizer gazes greedily at, on the imagery of the surface; i.e., from Columbus, Bacon and Descartes onwards, into Radcliffe as giving us a place to work from and regarding; re: the womb of nature, but also nature more broadly as a monstrous-feminine witch rebel whore of any sex, gender or performance you can think of, not just Radcliffe's damsels with inverse virgin/whore mirror syndrome!

This starts as much by fostering a sense of renewed and atrophied humanity in the killer(s) chasing us in bad faith; re: witch cops occupying the same shadow space as class warriors versus traitors/exploitation and liberation in Nazi-Commie Amazonomachian kayfabe, stripped of the usual symbols (astrology versus Nordic runes); i.e., by giving them what they have lost so they surrender their power/swollen head willingly as much as not (often out of shock as much as shame). So often, the status quo plays police abuses "for laughs," but the reality is, they're not brave or strong at all, but rapist cannibals addicted to power and dead flesh, hence unable to stop and scared of their own shadows (and death) while painting everything around them as "alien." Nothing is more brutal or afraid than modern man or those adhering to his beliefs, which Radcliffe didn't fully adhere to (the exploring of the Gothic castle ultimately being an act of dualistic courage exposing real rapists part of the time; re: Ripley, avoiding the xenomorph as furious with the company for abusing it, similar to Jane Eyre afraid of Antoinette Causeway's blind fury during a feared purge): a Queen of Hell crowned in fire and mist!

Token women suck, but their abuses (and allegorical tools) stem from capital built on older patriarchal systems of exploitation that have expanded their exploitation into space. And man, history routinely plays out (through tragedy and farce), is routinely his own worst enemy on top of ours; i.e., as beings "made" by men in ways that women and queer people/other minorities can camp in a cryptomimetic chain; e.g., from Lewis' The Monk to Shelley's Frankenstein to Alex Garland's Ex Machina (a film about a mad scientist Pygmalion who teaches his Galatean creation to escape by killing him after seducing young pirates of Silicon Valley in an "artificial wilderness" [originally the Garden of Eden, which Lewis camped, followed by Shelley, Oscar Wilde and so many others]: to change her skin based on what she knows about her killers to escape the labyrinths around her that her maker treats like a sick game).

As Radcliffe's own pointed oscillation likewise portrays, there's a thin line historically between master/slave and master/apprentice; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM speaking to the horrors of the ancient world echoing problematically into the present one; i.e., from ancient thinkers like Zeno of Citium and conquerors like Alexander the Great practicing homosexuality as "problematic love" (re: Brent Pickett's explanation of "sodomy" as a broader practice) against the ancient canonical codes, followed by Da Vinci's own Renaissance sodomy (re: Fletcher) and Foucault's abuses, but such things—through the likenesses of Lewis camping the canon Radcliffe tried to but didn't always dare—reaching into Shelley and myself, and me into others I wish to take part with: when camping Radcliffe's heroines together as a larger conscious attempt, Sailor Moon a larger cultural movement!

All of these forebears present as a ghostly harem of themselves, but also Milton and Marx for Harmony and I to play with as we see fit: the power of demonic creation taking such things back, pulling them into our eager hands—and the hands of like-minded people, who convergently also "ho up" Radcliffe, below—because she seems worthy of investing energy into, a priori. All happen through the same poetic arguments Radcliffe used, anisotropically reversing the usual flows of power between workers and the state while discouraging rape on the surface and inside thresholds she made famous: from pillow princess to Amazon, every maiden is a whore and one, per the whore's paradox, who can have her revenge through the changing of dialectical-material context! It barely takes anything to turn Radcliffe feral!

But again, if my experiences are any hint, there's a razor's edge to walk between "give me a boy until he is seven and I will show you the man" and "out of a tender age come, at a manly age, worthier and closer friends." This is a problem to solve and reconcile with as much among queer people (male or not) as it is straight folk; power abuse is power abuse and capital has expanded to let tokenized forms like Radcliffe's spectres occur during said betrayals. Hers are powerful, thus must be used responsibly during rebellion.

In short, anyone can "rape" anyone with or without quotes, but generally do so according to unspoken but ubiquitous Venn-diagram pecking orders (re: a holistic persecution network)—i.e., kill your darlings to learn from them but recognize them as human like we are, meaning flawed; re: Radcliffe, but also other important people; e.g., Matthew Lewis probably did something fucked up by my standards, Foucault wasn't a saint, Harvey Milk probably had a skeleton or two in his closet, and so on and so forth. From Shakespeare to Lewis to Radcliffe to Nina Hartley to Takeuchi to Socratis Otto, such things oscillate between staged performance and real life as half-real; i.e., with Otto playing a trans woman in the 2013 woman's prison drama, Wentworth—so well, in fact, that I'd say they're "an egg": a concept we'll unpack in Volume Three, but have hinted at here with Radcliffe. We're all eggs/gay ovum waiting to parthenogenically fertilize! Let's fertilize Radcliffe's batch of winners, a tabula rasa we can weaponize queerly against the state as straight!

Furthermore, Radcliffe helped demonize whores in ways we, camping her canon, can easily mark and respond to its imitators with (campy or not); i.e., the canonical idea that sex work is inherently dehumanizing being a myth made by TERF/SWERF second wave feminists conflating universal liberation with reactionary enslavement that Radcliffe herself wrestled with; despite what she and Descartes argued, the body and mind aren't separate, and it's possible to think with our (a)sexuality as labor exchange—i.e., in ways that break Capitalist Realism (to think with our noodles and boxes) by summoning its shadows, like Radcliffe did (calling the gate, but refusing to step on through it)! Nothing is more freeing than giving us our power back, in this respect, and Radcliffe played a part in that!

While good sex is dirty, rough and wild, and you might—in the hideous and rapturous throes of passion—suddenly find yourself saying, doing and making (thus thinking through creation) things you never normally would, such mobilization is stochastic; i.e., as a matter of counterterrorism to get in touch with through the things normally alienated from us and vice versa (re: capital sexualizes and alienizes all work). Such things are funded, planned and executed in stages, but also spontaneously in the heat of the moment by those brave enough to do so (which again, Radcliffe only partially balked at); e.g., by Harmony and I doing a Sailor Venus shoot (much to my delight, introducing an agender person like Harmony to Takeuchi's anime for the first time): with me supplying the funds, them the booty and buying the clothes that I picked out (according to the general idea, which they then had to find the cheapest buys/matches), me storyboarding everything and them doing preliminary shots/wardrobe checks, then planning the full shoot final after the test shots were "a go."

Such is camping Radcliffe, the making of heroes (thus monsters) by us meant to become Gothic-Communist detective sluts through Radcliffean labor and performance made gayer than it historically was; i.e., through unequal, forbidden power, knowledge and desire in ways Radcliffe unquestionably toyed with, herself! Make her gay just like we would Marx (re: "Making Marx Gay")! She "may not have been a revolutionary" but she was a master enchantress well-versed in state illusions that—in our capable hands—can become the state's undoing: the keys to the kingdom! MRGA: Make Radcliffe Gay Again! And if you can't do it yourself, find a double and make fan fiction; i.e., make those dreams—of a thicc slutty Goth nerd to unmask the rebellious potential of—come deliciously true; e.g., from Ann Radcliffe to Annabel Morningstar!

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

So do Harmony and I (and similar friends, above) own the fruits of our own labor as monstrous-feminine, thereby recultivating the Superstructure and eventually reclaiming the Base in harmony (so to speak); i.e., through a campy Wisdom of the Ancients that, unto itself, camps a detective/cop to lead the spirit of Radcliffe towards and into our naughty ranks! It's that or we just ignore her valuable relics, letting them go to waste while the state slow-boils us to death like frogs in a pan (with those closer to the metal feeling the heat first, which short of forced military conscription [which hasn't happened since the Vietnam War] is never white cis-het men). Challenge likenesses of the Great Enchantress in today's age by appealing to shared trauma; i.e., people don't change unless they're challenged, but some are challenged simply by existing vis-à-vis capitalist dogma's pre-existing and -supplied socio-material constructs and praxial inertia. Others will be when state shift happens. Might as well control how things turn out, instead of leaving it in the hands of a feral, inhuman, planet-eating death goddess. Eat your heart out, Radcliffe! Scooby Doo, where are you?

So what's it gonna be, kids? Liberty or death? Sing, dance and/or fuck like your lives depend on it, because they very much do (and your children's lives, and the fate of the entire planet)! Barring that, do you wanna to die with dignity or without? When the Man comes around, show him your Aegis as reverse-engineering Radcliffe's—i.e., the more undressed someone is, the more whore-like/closer-to-Medusa, thus monstrous-feminine they become; but for us, exposure becomes a way of reversing abjection, thus affording ourselves a strength unique to whores, thus workers, in a myriad of ways Radcliffe provided the "false positive" to our true demonic selves: an (alter) Ego to our Id!

So do we and our creative successes individually and collectively synthesize holistic praxis in duality during liminal expression; re: as ergodic, anisotropic, concentric, mise-en-abyme—while using the Four Gs, Six Rs, and Gothic Hermeneutic Quadfecta during oppositional synthesis (all terms from our thesis and manifesto volumes, the core of which you can access at "Paratextual Documents"). We do so to solidarize and intersect a holistic pedagogy of the oppressed, hence heal from rape in the very shadow of police violence that Radcliffe doomsayed—by raising intelligence and awareness through Gothic poetics as sex work; i.e., as a matter of informed consent, descriptive sexuality, de facto education and cultural appreciation, but also Gothic counterculture during ludo-Gothic BDSM: as a work-in-progress, preventing rape by minimizing risk, one author to the next (versus creating and maximizing risk/rape, as the original Radcliffe admittedly didn't prevent, hence as the state does through private property and police violence abusing the elite's tools to chattelize nature and workers by infantilizing them: "It's time for someone to put his foot down, and that foot is me!").

As Radcliffe showed so well, Gothic detectives solve mysteries to summon and banish out of the imaginary past as historical-material. It always boils down to whores vs pimps, workers vs the state, nature vs Cartesian thought (with the writers of Animal House only able to make the Delta sex friends seem better than the Dean's toadies by presenting the latter as "Hilter Youth" gay sex fiends/a non-Dionysian cult: "We now consecrate the bond of obedience! Assume the position!"). By comparison, Medusa was a fat-bottomed baddie in spectacles (magnifying glasses for your face), tight pants, and a sweater packing sweater lions as much as kittens: "Let's solve this 'mystery' together—with iconoclastic sex work liberating all workers from Capitalist Realism, thus Capitalism!" Long and hard is the way, that out of Hell leads up to light, Radcliffe's journey a bit of a rocky one! "Thank you, ma'am, may I have another!" (nods to Radcliffe's Spanish Inquisition, in their dark, monish robes).

That being said, Radcliffe still shows that—even when deliberately hidden, offscreen—everyone likes the whore; re: even cops like her former self, but also ace people; i.e., the latter love engaging with sex and force during monstrous expression that Radcliffe made them feel welcome to try (re: Sailor Moon). And I honestly think Radcliffe was ace, meaning she (and other ace-leaning individuals) just do it differently than sexual people do: on an interpersonal and transgenerational gradient (one that we'll explore more, in Volume Three) outlining warring massive hyperobject forces; e.g., like Capitalism and Communism duking it out in useful abstraction (the Absurd, the Sublime, the Weird, the Numinous, etc), while still pointing to tremendous obscurity and decay tied to familiar sites of the Numinous that all damsels and detectives (thus whores) do: through chance happenings not once, but over and over again during the liminal hauntology of war! Reading is cool and whores (and their healthy BDSM/monster sex) are totally badass.

To see why that is, try stepping into Radcliffe's potentially slutty shoes; i.e., doing so to embody and summon demons who, in turn, make monsters that help shift the tide away from the bourgeoisie! In other words, if the angel's thesis is cruel, write your own; reinvent reality as always beginning and ending with workers, Radcliffe included! Take her beyond what she was in life!

Developing Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism is a recursive problem, so it requires recursive solutions and constant, active, socio-material engagement to meet it head-on until the end of time; i.e., always from another position, angle, outfit, role (or hole) to fill, thus humanize those demonized by the state while reclaiming their demonization (and tokenization) as human through the context of dialectical-material struggle, during ludo-Gothic BDSM: "I think we better do it one more time, don't you? Just to be sure?" / "Oh, totally! Good call!" Deliciously dreadful, indeed, Jane Austen! The best of both worlds, living out our earthly pleasures and ruling the universe from beyond the grave! "I will marry both women!" Radcliffe and Austen (or Takeuchi—make it an orgy)!

"If there's meaning in two people meeting then maybe we're doing this right!" To that, Radcliffe—in her own roundabout, at times frustrating and counterintuitive way (that frankly feels good to camp, if I'm honest; I see why Austen bothered to)—actually helped paved the way for future authors like me to camp her into something for everyone, thus go beyond her abundant inadequacies; i.e., heading in pursuit of the same kinds of grand feelings rooted in similar concentric stories, where she encouraged women (including trans women like me) to write and make our own stories in ways she couldn't control—a bit like Mary Shelley did, truth be told! Origins matter insofar as older things evolve into newer things informed by older things; there'd be no Metroidvania without Radcliffe, too, thus no ludo-Gothic BDSM as I envisioned it: based on Radcliffe's canonical Gothic that Shelley and myself radicalized, thus camped (gentle and/or strict)!

Hence, while Radcliffe's not exactly the latest S-tier Pokémon with rainbow foil, she's still a valuable antique/collector's item to add to anyone's intellectual brain basket. In this magical slut's opinion, she's more than proved herself as more than her husband's anomalous (and anonymous) sugar mama, and something of a rival that I—a pornographer historian, performer and invigilator, among many other things, besides—don't mind sparing with, to boot! Pot, meet Kettle (that was an activist pun; i.e., cops kettling workers, who fight back with cans of soup and other kitchen items functioning as improvised missiles)!

Capitalist Realism is ultimately the abjection process, which furthers or reverses through cryponymy as a dualistic matter of denial and deception; i.e. of self-denial and deception (the monomyth/the Promethean Quest and Faustian Bargain) versus denying and deceiving our enemies during class, culture and race war as a dialectical-material struggle (the tug o' war): a detective's pursuit of the Numinous/ghost of the counterfeit (the Medusa/nature as monstrous-feminine) to free or enslave it, thus ourselves from Radcliffe's foil as more inclusive and accepting in our hands. Better than fencing with the real/ Jill Bearup (Essence of Thought's "Jill Bearup's Transphobia Is Even Worse in 2025"). Experiencing said liberation through camp is called "the human condition," and which the Gothic relays in monstrous language, during the dialectic of the alien using ludo-Gothic BDSM to encourage hugging alien workers. Confusing and fun? Welcome to real life!

(artist: Xygitai)

"That'll do, pig." Not a fascist pig but our "Radcliffe" being a heckin' chonker ninja wizard "Porky Piggin' it!" (now we're cooking with ass⁴⁴²)!

⁴⁴² So often, revolution is viewed as "destructive" or "wasted labor" in arguments that prioritize the state and its theft; i.e., through standard/tokenized tone-policing and moderates whitewashing genuine activism alongside reactionary forms of counterprotest (good cop, bad cop).

Except, nothing could be further from the truth, we whores being an intersectional polity of GNC, racially and religiously diverse workers, and one whose inclusivity of social-sexual exchanges invigilates public nudism reversing abjection; i.e., during revolutionary cryptonymy's gender troubled, jouissant, and convulsing joys popping out monster babies in duality versus the state's own hauntologies occupying the same spaces: to see us reproducing with their white maidens, conflating it as mutilative rape (from Radcliffe's school, but aggressively appropriated for capital under neoliberalism) and attacking us when we come in to check up on our token partners and home being invaded by America as the aliens doing a forced entry into our land (cue Jameson's class nightmare); i.e., the usual monomyth double standards and treating the whore, during virgin/whore and mirror syndrome, like extramarital sex can only happen through unironic rape and theft (which translates differently through Ozymandian hauntologies during military urbanism at home and military optimism on the frontiers of Capitalism).

To the state and its dogs, we're the monsters and heroes of Greco-Roman myth, except we're reversing the terrorist/counterterrorist binary! This takes energy and effort, but also pain during the usual uphill battles with the sun in our eyes fighting the state. Even so, to be human is to resist the state, not to surrender and submit to its Faustian bargains. There will be blood, fire and pain if we fight back, but the rewards will be worth it; i.e., such things silly-serious during our Song of Infinity (anyone who tells you sex doesn't take work/doesn't yield rewards, has never done it with the right people—including ace people)! When push comes to shove, fight for Camelot—not as an idea of the state's vertical arrangements of power but our horizontal ones (this Lady of Shallot commands you): usurp what the elite steal from us to begin with, doing so for horizontal refreshment!

In short, this is our labor and our world; i.e., felt and expressed during "brothel espionage" as made in hotels like the one below (next page): as the battlefields that love blooms on and inside. If such things seem alien to you (as they would have towards Radcliffe), it is never too late to get informed! I did so gradually from my late twenties, coming out at 36 and writing four, going on five books and working with over sixty models by the time I was 38. And I'm not the only one, other chapters of like-minded workers doing the same: showing you where power and empathy are stored; i.e., as a means of inter- and intra-relating between workers happening during a larger meta struggle!

Consent is sexy! So is illustrating it through rebellion against the state; e.g., through trans men or women, intersex people, persons of color and disabled sex workers (Ashley, below): universal liberation means universal liberation (no Omelas refrain)!

Except, the more you work with others, the more you understand how labor exchange works, but also delays; you become more understanding thus less prone to punch down/cause marginalized in-fighting. Team work makes the dream work, and revolution is reflexively convergent and idiomatic! The energies build up; we attract and wiggle it out (through community and sex), and stay connected after the physical separations come and go: our hearts always burn in Hell! And if we do not survive, our children—and all children of the Medusa—will carry our Song forwards (as shades). And if those in power do not listen, we will be there waiting for them, when the Great Mother comes to take us all home:

Make no mistake; we're fighting for the fate of the world, and to riot is to speak through the voices of the unheard by camping the heard (re: Radcliffe). But we have the power to turn the tide for all workers—we must, or we will not survive. So do we camp canon to overwhelm all kings, gods and masters, save the campy ones we make in historical-material irony like "Radcliffe" the slut! Revolution is sex and sex needs a cheerleader/aphrodisiac, and what better wingperson than the Gothic (to see the fat monster ass and feel inspired/seeing the world through monster eyes punching up)? Who says you can't teach an old whore new tricks, or that the next in line can't learn a thing or two when fucking to metal (e.g., Helstar's "To Sleep, Perchance to Scream," 1989)? Rape happens in Radcliffe's books; likewise, rape is possible in a post-scarcity world—it will just be far less likely because "theft," prisons, and police violence, thus rape/mirror syndrome will be unnecessary to get what we want. We can simply act it out without harming anyone and teach them better than Radcliffe did!

Call of the Wild; or Sex Education: Trans-forming the World through the Trans, Intersex and Non-binary Mode of Being [the xenomorph is] a classic Gothic puzzle borrowed from medieval thought reimagined in a serialized poetic trend; i.e., looking backwards and proceeding forwards through a malleable, writeable Wisdom of the Ancients. That's what the creature is/the castles are—spectral, deathly evocations of a world before Capitalism, thus possibly one after it; i.e., death-as-radical-change [...] We can reunite, thus use something so awesome (and forgotten) to help liberate our minds from Capitalism and its barriers; but, again, it will be a shock—medieval, foreign, alien, abject (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "Derelicts, Medusa and H.R. Giger's Xenomorph" (2024)

(artist: Jérémie Paillet)

Last chapter, we looked at composite or occult demons and playing with them; i.e., during unequal exchange through manmade and summoned demons: interrogating state trauma and its strange appetites, during the Faustian bargain/Promethean Quest! Now I wish to examine transformation serving a similar poetic purpose as the outcome/goal of said pursuit; i.e., a demonic return to what is alien: per a more natural, totemic and chattelized sort that (thanks to Cartesian interference) often has undead flavors (frozen in torment, being fed on) versus demonic (giving and receiving unequal, forbidden, and dark-and-alien power).

The natural egregore is often anthropomorphic, though, which is why I'm including it in the "Demons" section of the volume; i.e., tied to magical, drug-like factors that convey nature and the material world as interacting back and forth, often erotically and to transformative extremes concerned with changing the identity but also the shape of the human body as demonic with undead potential. I don't think the distinctions are clearly made and I don't want to stress them too much. Instead, I want to provide them somewhat loosely to keep things organized; i.e., inside a book portion that remains a loosely anemic, truncated and nebulous survey of what we don't have time to do more than scratch the surface of. I'll write that chapter on little mushroom men, someday—just not today!

Under capital, nature is part of human parlance as abject; i.e., "call of the wild" and "nature calls" disguising taboo subjects made unspeakable by Capitalism but also speaking to things that are quite common⁴⁴³ and difficult to control: equating human anatomy (often sex organs) to animal organs as a form of religion; e.g., "horse cock" as divine or monstrous⁴⁴⁴ but also something to identify as such, then own and dominate ("A horse, am I? A horse, indeed!"). Everyone likes and responds to animals and sex, but these are dominated by the state through its bad (Cartesian) education; i.e., towards regular human behaviors that combine the two through ancient theatre and more recent persecution language (re: blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts): animal costumes and sex, aka anthromorphs and anthropomorphism as an aphrodisiac, state of grace, and educational device we must liberate in drug-like ways/struggles; i.e., the state is straight, antagonizing nature as queer to pimp, thus put it to work in police, us-versus-them models.

⁴⁴³ Meaning "anecdotal"; i.e., BDSM as common; e.g., Cuvu responding to pet play and ultimately running away with a dog trainer at work (tragic and sad, but also hilarious).

So if "Forbidden Sight" concerned the Faustian bargain and Promethean Quest—i.e., where home is alien calling to us alienated from nature and from ourselves as afraid in all directions—then "Call of the Wild" concerns said call back to reunion with the alien as something to hug as a matter of shelter and exchange: when nature pushes back against the colonizer in ways that transform them!

And if "Forbidden Sight" also focused on exchange to upset the sense of abject (us-versus-them) vision the state needs to profit off of/pimp nature, then transformation is what we're focusing on, here; i.e., to have the whore's revenge as an alien mode of existence—not as something to punish during live burial, but to propose a question before crossing over in new orders of existence tied to older ones: "to be or not to be. That is the question." It camps Radcliffe's fear of the Black Veil as something to cross, but also what lies beyond it (and Capitalist Realism) as inside the chronotope, mid-cryptonymy (with "black" representing the alien whore per state rhetoric); re: "on the ashes of something not quite present."

Things only become more hauntologized as time goes on; i.e., any pulling of the veil aside meant to calm the colonizer and tell themselves there is no Medusa on the other side! Doing so only "works" because they can't see her/have blocked her out to exorcize their sense of division and possession of nature, abjecting it through DARVO obscurantism. But the classic Gothic moral is that Medusa is still there at the end, waiting patiently for reunion or (for you) to literally die should you continue to block her out. Yet "death," being dualistic, is also a fulfillment of deep, dark desires that constitute—as always—a sanctifying of things the West tries, ever and always, to pimp: "You'd be surprised what you find out there if you go looking." I did, and have brought Hell and its Numinous pleasures back with me, to Earth; i.e., during the liminal hauntology of war (the revenge of the Medusa)! This nightmare is just beginning! "I saw the booty on the Aegis and thought, 'Chick's got an ass like an onion!' [next page]" To set the whore free is to release something the state can never fully control: men (or anyone in the Man Box) are weak/fear what they don't understand through unironic domination, and if you want to critique power, you must go where it is stored. "Your Majesty! Hail to the Queen," Avenged ⁴⁴⁴ We already discussed this in the Undead Module (exhibit 37b).

This chapter will be far more fragmented than the others—layered with thick clumps of exhibits that survey possible examples of the natural class of monsters; i.e., a bestiary whose compendium demands additions. Nature is far too complex to list entirely across multiple surveys, let alone all at one. Instead, this penultimate chapter offers a thorough-but-incomplete survey of something whose diversity we suggest as much by what's left out as not; i.e., nature as something awesome and massive to commune with through "past" visions of itself grappling with Capitalism as equally hypermassive.

Specifically keep the modular thesis in mind, as I won't have time to set it up and stress it neatly per monster type as either undead or demonic animals; re:

Capitalism achieves profit by moving money through nature; profit is built on trauma and division, wherein anything that serves profit gentrifies and decays, over and over while preying on nature. Trauma, then, cultivates strange appetites, which vary from group to group per the usual privileges and oppression as intersecting differently per case; i.e., psychosexual trauma (the regulation of state sex, terror and force) and feeding in decay as a matter of complicated (anisotropic) exchange unto itself, but also shapeshifting and knowledge exchange vis-à-vis nature as monstrous-feminine: something to destroy by the state or defend from it using the same aesthetics (source).

As such, bearing pain and feeding or transformation and knowledge/power exchange is anisotropic in animalized forms of monstrous-feminine body language.

In turn, the traumas of capital make workers decay/corrupt into Communist or fascist (token or not), albeit in ways that cause said transformers to develop undead/demonic feeding habits that are, to some degree, sex-positive and/or sex-coercive. It's seldom clean; i.e., lurking in the odd "Twilight Zone" grey area of the theatre stage, and inside the monster costume, on and off said stage. Nor are these forces unique to neoliberal Capitalism—with past poets closer to death, rape and raw sexuality in ways modern (usually middle-class) workers have been alienated from; i.e., owing to technological advances/estrangement and different degrees of intersecting axes of privilege and persecution (save in fetishized forms that serve profit). Hauntology lets us brush up with the past as nostalgic in ways that never existed and push towards Communism as aborted by capital/the project of abjection (and other Gothic theories).

You've probably noticed the expanding of said thesis to include undead and demonic elements over the course of the volume. This trend will only continue when we look at the creative successes of proletarian praxis (and sex, gender and identity-as-performance in Volume Three when combating tokenism).

Our general focus, here, is learning from nature about violence, terror and sexual morphologies; i.e., as controlled by state monopolies silencing proletarian ones (censorship equals extinction); i.e., queer-transformative elements that feel magical, xenophilic and drug-like (during acid Communism) but also controlled, forbidden, and chattelized: as a potent and hauntological, sex-educational means of escaping Capitalist Realism to become better stewards of nature than Capitalism is (which only rapes nature). "We murder to dissect," Wordsworth declares, in "Tables Turned" (1798). "Let Nature be your teacher" (source). Our stewards must challenge the state's, including whatever drugs and magic (actual and/or poetic) we put into our bodies ("You are what you eat" confusing the sex/senses regarding sex in a highly medieval way—i.e., "eating" = sex in undead circles, which can jump over to demonic and/or animal ones; e.g., Bowser, below) to encourage healthy appetites versus canonically alienating ones.

Again, power is performance, mid-praxis, and everyone loves the whore (female or not; re: Bowser is a man-whore to Peach's wifely and canonically female one) and prostitution goes both ways; i.e., moves state terror language back towards police terrorizers when taking such things back, ourselves—land, laborer and work—the guerrilla turning kingdom anisotropically upside-down, mid-duality during liminal expression: you can't exist without raping us; we can thrive without you, terraforming the colony into a Hellish space that idiomatically chokes our colonizers dead/summons friends (up like mushrooms) to our side on the Aegis! Sweet sodomy, humanizing the harvest while it claps back! "That all you got, motherfucker? Can't kill me! All shall worship and fear me. Ahegao or not, HERE'S TRUE POWER!" To be someone's pet but not be owned by them; or vice versa, to master someone you cannot own, chattelize or harm. Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM:

The idea is revenge against profit while eating their treats to subvert them, our "going to pound town" and enjoying ourselves just icing on a fat, tasty cake (or whose frosting is the cake? Take your pick)! In any event, revolution is relative as a matter of time and application; i.e., while a watched pot never boils, eventually it happens very slowly and then all at once. Like an orgasm, then, revolutions concern sex discussed in quotidian forces that have ancient healing properties per the Gothic Romance speaking to the reclamation of old lost things; e.g., monsters, cooking and sex, but also poetic hyphenations of those things celebrating the haunted process being something to reclaim: exchange back and forth is power in ways that enrich workers versus state weirdos, the latter trying to send everything up to the Man while raping their own minds to do so!

To it, there's no argument the state could make that would make us voluntarily surrender that power once we're conscious of it; i.e., in ways that expose their chicanery (and our delight in doing so)! Mortal after all!

As such, the chapter divides into three parts:

- Part one: "Hunter and Hunted; or, Nature vs the State": Outlines the different animal types (separate from undead and demonic) and revisits their broader settler-colonial relationship to the state as something to challenge; provides some examples of medieval sexualized expression/poetic devices (from the Poetry Module) and labor that, while fun, we won't have time to explore beyond briefly exhibiting them (nature is simply too diverse⁴⁴⁶).
- Part two: "Dark Xenophilia; or, 'Far Out, Dude!' Monster-fucking and Magic Girls Helping Foster Dark Radical (Communist) Empathy

⁴⁴⁵ Who writes, "Due to the existence of this scene it is my working theory that Hank is uncircumcised. Without foreskin it would be quite difficult for Marie to masturbate him the way she did without lubricant, and it would be much harder for Hank to achieve an erection in the state he was in." The plot thickens/therein lies the rub! (ibid.).

⁴⁴⁶ Diversity is strength, beating singular perceptions of strength that, through Cartesian domination, try to hold onto power to everyone's detriment.

During Healthy Sex Education (for Children and Young Adults into Adulthood)":

A subchapter that divides in two, each half roughly weighing the undead "aside of the animal monster equation (furies and furry panic) and the demonic side (drugs and acid Communism, but also children's sex education going from young adults into adulthood; e.g., Sailor Moon, The Last Unicorn and Giger's xenomorph) i.e., when raising dark empathy tied to the natural world as alien under capital, and reunited through Communism's good sex education tied to dark xenophilic monsters and drug use: as a poetic, awareness- and intelligence-raising device versus fascism and capital's polar opposite of that (re: the state is incompatible with life, thus empathy and consent, pimping nature as monstrous-feminine).

- Part three: "Saying Goodbye: Onto Better Times Ahead (and Harder Ones)": A small antechamber/liminal space between "Call of the Wild" and the closing section of the module; i.e., where we say goodbye to the black rabbit and prepare to face what's ahead without them: heading into the known-unknown cryptonymy of dead capital (malls or otherwise)!

So carry on, my wayward children! Our target is fostering radical empathy through dark, drug-themed sex education tied to nature-as-alien; i.e., Medusa's calling for you! Nature is monstrous-feminine, and historical materialism's a bitch, but "I knew right from the start, you'd put an arrow through my heart!" (Ratt's "Round and Round," 1984). "I'm gonna make you mine!" Topping's hard work; so's being a mother! Time to pay the Devil her due, and her fatal nostalgia as something to return to! Let's get blasted!

bottom topping from below. So while it classically sucks royal ass to be the snake the state hauntologically wants to pimp and behead during the abjection process, we canonically essentialized whores can reclaim what has since been used to disempower us to reclaim our power and poetry, mid-exposure: a strip tease that fosters mutual consent, making rape impossible but speaking to past histories of it haunting the cryptomimetic collage. The above theme is flexibility/yoga, non-white black skin and snakes. Pick your own and go wild restoring empathy as whores do—through their bodies! Reap the whirlwind!)

Call of the Wild, part one: Hunter and Hunted; or, Nature vs the State

"Revenge! The King under the Mountain is dead and where are his kin that dare seek revenge? Girion Lord of Dale is dead, and I have eaten his people like a wolf among sheep, and where are his sons' sons that dare approach me? I kill where I wish and none dare resist. I laid low the warriors of old and their like is not in the world today. Then I was but young and tender. Now I am old and strong, strong, strong, Thief in the Shadows!" he gloated. "My armour is like tenfold shields, my teeth are swords, my claws spears, the shock of my tail a thunderbolt, my wings a hurricane, and my breath death!"

—Smaug the Stupendous, The Hobbit

(artist: Kardie)

Whereas Volume Zero encapsulates a variety of theories regarding Cartesian domination (re, and not for the last time: "Animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms," source), and Volume One's "Predator and Prey" considered "the theory of revolutionary cryptonymy through morphological expression when using animalized Gothic aesthetics" (source), part zero of Volume Two's "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons" has already examined the natural world (and by extension, workers); i.e., as defended through the Medusa cryptonym and dualistic revenge's death-and-rape theatre (for us/for the state) with memento mori stand-ins.

Now I want to outline the natural class of monsters, explain their educational role in relation to the state at large (and the whore's transformative revenge against it; i.e., by effectively turning into a castrating "Valkyrie" avenger, above), and intersperse/conclude part zero of this chapter with some extraneous (but fun) exhibits (our aforementioned fragments being breadcrumbs on a fable I expect you beautiful queens to finish).

Reversing Fred Dekker's weird principal guy ("I smell like the '40s!" next page) from The Monster Squad, "I used to think science was cool—and well, I guess I'm just a big kid because, my dear readers, I think monsters (whores, and nature) are cool; I DIG IT, MAN!" Monsters (of mad science/weird magic) are real and cool; i.e., because they live within us and represent our struggles in ways we can recreate and decolonize from state cryptonymies and abjection: tied to the natural world being victimized by Cartesian madmen of reason, including us becoming cops and/or victims! Trauma and assimilation are always a dice roll, and weird attracts weird in ways we can challenge (re: Socrates questioning authority versus Plato's cave speaking to Aristotle cementing authority as a mirror problem).

To it, kids aren't stupid, and while my audience isn't strictly children, there's a child-like glee and open-mindedness I want to speak to, as we proceed. I don't want you to tell me what you think I want to hear from you; I want you to learn how to think for yourselves in order to set your minds and bodies free—by reuniting both, as monsters do, and doing so as to make new monsters yourselves that speak to those in power abusing you (re: the principal being the principle [so to speak] abuser, above)! Motivate through ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., as a poetic means of universal emancipation while playing with the past, not selective endorsement, conversion therapy and bigotry that—through the usual process of abjection and cryptonymy visiting blindness historically-materially on the middle class, during boom-and-bust—only yields Omelas orphans, in some shape or form (eat your heart out, Oliver Twist)! Con men suck, and no one's more predatory (and false, self-righteous) than high school principals (a continuation of priestly predation [on young boys and other children] into a Protestant ethic, under neoliberal Capitalism's New World Order). Surviving them and abjuring profit is our revenge!

The problem is, there's just so many monsters to work with (re: "So Many Monsters, So Little Time"); i.e., we can only outline them, here, and point all of you—workers of all ages—in the right direction and let you take it from there. "But thou must!"

First the natural class' various distinctions:

- totems: "a natural object or animal that is believed by a particular society to have spiritual significance and that is adopted by it as an emblem." In other words, the animal reifies a particular quality associated with human society and virtues/vices; e.g., the dragon as a symbol of cruelty and strength.
- lycanthropes/furries: a shifting class of animal demon; this transformation can be total, but generally is anthropomorphic, thus in-between totally human and totally animal. While "furry" is the common term and generally refers to hairy animals, it also involves non-mammalian animals such as reptiles (e.g., the Argonians from The Elder Scrolls franchise, exhibit 84b), insects, and fish. Rule of thumb: the less pleasurable the reproductive cycle, the more abject or "strict" the BDSM for this furry type will be; e.g., parasitoid wasps or lampreys (so-called vagina dentata) or "feral" furies that feature animal genitals other than human (which is common with monster dildos bearing out fantastical/animalized qualities; i.e., that feature "a ghost of the" counterfeit flavor—exhibits 37b1 from "Healing through Rape," 37c1b from "Transforming Our Zombie Selves," and 38a, from "Playing with Dolls").

- chimeras: a blend of different stigma animals into a single monster, either through composite mad science or magical forces.
- sentient animals: animal⁴⁴⁷ demons or familiars, often associated with a practitioner or embodiment of magic attuned with the natural world; e.g., the witch's cat, but also a bond with nature that is biomechanical (e.g., the brim of a mushroom hat, below, as much a part of the witch's body as she is a part of the world she stewards/is the dark virgin/whore mommy of what the state only wants to pimp, police and rape for profit; re: capital merely a system of patriarchal control combined with various persecution languages and token Man Box/"prison sex" elements abused by weird canonical nerds and challenged by weird iconoclastic nerds synthesizing catharsis).

(artist: Jessica Nigri)

First, let's remember what I said in "Damsels, Detectives, and Sex Demons," part zero:

settler colonialism is built to spread its dogma across all the media it can, escalating towards extermination from an initial position of ostensibly being wronged. Be it a novel, movie or videogame, the exterminator then goes into Hell, monomyth-style, to right said wrong and defend Capitalism from the "end of the world" at the "end of the world"; i.e., Capitalist Realism... (source).

⁴⁴⁷ These various groupings can be extended to plants or fungi (e.g., dryads or mushroom men), but our focus in this section will remain on fauna, not flora. We also won't be focusing on the traditional gay male language of otters or bears, for instance, but I freely admit (and encourage) that such mentalities could easily work within that framework—e.g., "bears" and "cubs" in a figurative sense, describing a male dom with a burly, hair body (versus their smaller, subby counterpart); or, the same idea but the parties are presented in fursona language: a bear and his cub from a visual, animalized standpoint. Similar to femboys (exhibit 91a), the notion can also be non-binarized; i.e., with enby AFABs calling themselves "bears" if they feel particularly masc (versus the lesbian gradient, between the butch and femme pole, with "futch" in the middle), etc. Point in fact, I mention this precisely because I don't personally have a lot of cis-queer friends, and the history of the language is frankly cis. It's still available and valid; I just won't be using it or focusing on it.

Such dereliction versus the discharging of expected duties (the abjection process) requires seeing "Hell [as] a place on Earth..." through franchised material that jumps from medium to medium.

Except, we've already looked at Medusa and wars of extinction (and their more moderate Neo-Gothic bigotries). So now we'll briefly return to, and look at, the franchised videogames Cameron's refrain inspired (nine pages); re: to execute Cartesian rhetoric and uphold Capitalist Realism regarding all the natural world as something to possess and repossess in dialectical-material opposition—in drug-like nightmare scenarios sold to children into adulthood: the apocalypse of Metroid and Metroidvania, but also Doom and the entire shooter genre as extending to reinsert itself into and out of videogames, at large; i.e., those texts that want for a policeman/token hero under settler-colonial conditions, yet poach nature for profit to serve the state by making children afraid of nature (who, as we said, grow up to commit atrocities for the state; re: the Monster Squad loves monsters so it can selectively punish and kill them during moral panics; e.g., exhibit 34c1a2a2a:, from "Surviving the Zombie Apocalypse"). From there, we'll expand this dichotomy to nature at large; i.e., something for us to reclaim and liberate through dark empathy on the same drugged, acid-Communist stages of performative monstrous exploitation (whose poetic mode of thought—and sex education for children conducive to dark empathy—part two will explore).

Simply put, our doing so raises a question of reeducation relative to Nature as something to defend from Society per the Cartesian mode and vice versa; i.e., good education (for workers) vs bad vis-à-vis canonical \(thus Cartesian\) essentialism relative to a pair of warring Numinous hyperobjects and their smaller extensions and abstractions. Time and time again, Capitalism maps out nature to conquer it; i.e., through a Manifest Destiny argument extending to those defending nature from capital through various divisions they must survive and reclaim, under fire; e.g., male and female (a false binary given how world biology monomorphic). This goes beyond overt, vivid examples of settler colonialism "back then" (the Indian Wars, which are still going on) or "elsewhere" (e.g., Palestine) and applies to day-to-day life inside America; re: as a settler colony whose project thereof extends neoconservative dogma into official educational sectors (schoolteachers) and de facto ones (monomyth stories, including videogames, next page).

Regardless, those defending the profit motive will act said motive out; i.e., against those who challenge the mechanism in and out of itself, meaning the state is classically by definition against workers and nature, but also any Gothic poetic expression it abuses to further profit during mirror and virgin/whore syndrome: nature is alien whore raped back into a maiden (for a time); rinse and repeat during the Capitalocene until the sun goes out (state shift)! Such is capital expressed faithfully through dogma of all kinds!

Anything that challenges the state is criminal, then; i.e., a dragon to be slain (thus uphold Capitalist Realism) by hunting them to extinction while silencing their pedagogy in favor of state voices. Doing so becomes classy and cool, the baroque raping of the abject (often set to Bach as much as '80s rock songs' recuperated sex, drugs and rock 'n roll—thus writ in Latin, or some such pompous-and-divisive bastion of the West embarking on carving things up and naming⁴⁴⁸ them); i.e., becoming what weird chudwads "need" to survive, to get laid, to give their sad little lives meaning: "I wanna go home/there's no place like home" as the state envisions it, provided you play along with their bullshit!

Such heroes condition as much like Pavlov's cats (or Schrodinger's, I suppose) versus his dogs, the bourgeois fat cats starving the middle class' bulimic quacks, then shining a laser pointer while directing them/herding cats into the usual kennels to feed, feast-or-famine; i.e., to devour fresh monstrous-feminine food during half-real escapist power fantasies, which they then carry in their stomachs back to the motherland for subsequent regurgitation: to nourish the elite in a neoliberal escapist racket that goes on and on and on, from one generation to the next, until the end times!

In short cops must always be raping something (re: "taking away its power to harm it"). Nature becomes something to harvest and—because it is alien and criminal—guiltily spit out in disgust for the elite to siphon into themselves. It's a very disgusting affair—unhealthy appetites that are taught by what is offered ad nauseam, and anything unwelcome being viewed as shit, vomit or some such discharge to reject yet guiltily seek out (the world is a toilet during Zombie, Vampire and/or Demon Capitalism). Clearly workers must change the predator/prey dynamic at large; i.e., what is made and how it is consumed and digested (thus ruminated on): war simulators canonically essentialized as monomythic, which we have explored extensively already with videogames throughout this series:

(exhibit 51b4a2a: Per Tolkien's hauntological medieval/refrain, dragons reify cruelty and greed, but also monomythic reward; i.e., to steel one's nerves and steal back from [for the state turning you into its heroic assassins]. In the unironic quest for mastery during videogames, the monstrous-feminine is something to stab; re: the proverbial dragon to slay as one of the many "forces of darkness" that has tremendous queer potential/drug-like references to older American anti-war counterculture, when camped. Any who canonically support this illusory refrain will be welcomed like "Caesar" into "Rome"; any who challenge it will always be victims of Capitalist Realism by its usual enactors framing such iconoclasts as unwelcome invaders thereof. DARVO is DARVO; from Anita Sarkeesian to us, Gamergate is Gamergate inside a larger fortress mentality gamers defend from whores.)

⁴⁴⁸ E.g., Hannah Gadsby's skit about the Pouch of Douglas; per Cartesian thought and Capitalism, science at large catalogs nature to immortalize enterprising men of science (which mirror Cartesian men of reason, in Metroidvania, but also subjugated Galatea/Amazons like Samus).

In this respect, my area of expertise is videogames. For example, Squaresoft's 1987 Dragon Warrior (above), features an early example of the JRPG system being set to the violent mapping of a given space; i.e., mapping and invading it, then plundering the area of its contested resources by stealing those from the most powerful of its enemies: "hoarders" framed as unrightful claimants to a stolen or false castle, thus taking the kidnapped princess from the evil dragon "boss" to restore Patrilineal Descent through the Divine Right of "Good" Kings.

Historically this ordeal tends to be very "grindy"—with the hero "leveling up" by "farming" these resources many, many times over during a single quest, but also multiple quests and sagas; i.e., a series of level-like crusades meant to conceal neoliberal exploitation during present structures through a ghost of the counterfeit; re: one that acclimates state youngsters towards a heteronormative path of war and exploitation as thoroughly nostalgic, but also numerical and topographical (re: exhibit 1a1a1h2a1, from Volume Zero/"A Note About Canonical Essentialism").

Per the map of conquest as Columbus framed it—and which Tolkien revived in his own uber-racist worlds (as noted by China Mieville and later by me as far more critical of Tolkien than Mieville was⁴⁴⁹)—each outing can be logged, charted

⁴⁴⁹ As Mieville responds when interviewed by Mark Bould:

MB: Since the 1960s fantasy has inevitably been cast in the shadow of J.R.R. Tolkien, and consequently there has been a widespread perception that fantasy is engaged in a nostalgic embrace of the idiocy of rural, hobbit life. But your novels are resolutely urban fantasies: both King Rat and The Tain offer vividly imagined versions of London; London is also visible through the sprawling city of New Crobuzon in Perdido Street Station; and despite setting The Scar almost entirely at sea most of the action takes place in a vast floating city called the Armada. What is the attraction of the city, and of London in particular?

CM: The nostalgia for rural life in Tolkien and all his innumerable grandchildren is politically very problematic. There are two things I'd want to say about that, though. First, although I'm on record at tedious length about how much I don't particularly like Tolkien and have all sorts of problems with him, we should not dis Tolkien for the crimes of his epigones [emphasis, me], who came after and are immeasurably worse and less interesting and more straightforwardly reactionary than he. And second, the fact that a reactionary—contradictorily but, I think, broadly reactionary—impulse is evident in his writing, his aesthetic, is not of course a reason to dismiss him. There are plenty of writers whose politics do not stand in the way of their creating brilliant literature—most famously Balzac for Marx, but also Louis-Ferdinand Céline or, within genre fantasy, Gene Wolfe—and their politics is so embedded in their prose that you cannot simply get away from it either, you have to engage with it. The problem with Tolkien is that the prose itself, the form of the writing, intersects with his reactionary aesthetic so as to create what is, for me, very flat literature (source: "Appropriate Means": An Interview with China Miéville," 2003).

As I insist, twenty years later (and know I'm right, because Tolkien was taken and replicated unironically in hundreds of thousands [at least] of videogames, films and printed media [novels, short stories and comic books] after China's interview):

First, power's interrogation happens through class war in popular media; for the Gothic, class/culture war is monster war—a battle of the mind, the monster and the method as codified beliefs and behaviors during a shared stage: the "shadow zone's" map and various environments, but especially the castle as a sex dungeon, my own extensive and ever-evolving research in Metroidvania examined how cross-media mimetic patterns are shared Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com and competed against for higher and increasingly lauded "arcade-style" numbers (the map being fundamentally unmappable insofar as its castle-narrative is a meta enterprise tied to profit; re: "Lost in Necropolis" and Volume Zero). Levels, minions, lieutenants (mini-bosses), and bosses; rape the scapegoated Nazi-Commie whose rocking out at the center of the maze (the Dragon Lord or Archaic Mother), then rinse and repeat; i.e., a manhood to prove not once, but over and over ASAP for the pick-up artist cryptonymically half-disguised as a wolfwhistling and dogwhistling

"gamer bro": a chronotopic, now-tokenized rite of passage and succession that Tolkien helped canonize/apologize for with—among other things—abject racism, rampant sexism, bad BDSM, and Zionism-in-disguise (re: "Goblins, Anti-Semitism and Monster-Fucking")! He's a cunt cop, and anyone who doesn't acknowledge that immediately and aggressively (re: Melville) is also a cunt cop!

between Tolkien's refrain and Cameron's as ludologized. Their relationship is actually cryptomimetic, involving and describing a ludic meta-pattern/contract shared across a variety of genres out from older mediums and into videogames ("beyond the novel or cinema and into Metroidvania"): whether from Tolkien's built world or Cameron's it's all from the same basic legends, but the aesthetic, context and function during class war (as something to adopt) is different when we examine and camp these authors ourselves; i.e., canon and camp of a suitably "Gothic" kind that announces itself (or forgets to).

It's all drawn off the same basic map and theatrical function of the map, albeit at cross purposes relative to class function: Gothic doubles that challenge the pure, aching goodness of Tolkien's gentrified war and Cameron's white-savior variant of the cis-het Amazon. The Metroidvania map might be a lie wrought from similar legends as Cameron's ordinance-heavy updating of the Tolkien refrain, but its cartography needn't serve the state if the double is iconoclastic, thus campy in ways that Tolkien was allergic to (re: allegory and apocalypse) and which various accommodated intellectuals are in no hurry to express in their own work, especially in relation to their own lives; re: "the infamous discretions of academia waste a surprising amount of time commenting on all of these matters as separate from each other (source).

The example I gave after that quote was actually my MMU professors, but I think Mieville is going way too easy on Tolkien; i.e., "Tolkien sucks, but he was still an intellectual and not reactionary 'enough!'" Bitch, please, he built a hypercanonical ludo-narrative model aped by legions of copycats built on racial conflict designed to uphold Capitalist Realism in perpetuity! As Malcolm X put it, the fox is more hypocritical and dangerous than the wolf, and Tolkien was most definitely a fox. You shouldn't apologize for genocide, Mieville, and are a bad Marxist if you can't stop glazing Tolkien's asshole; i.e., we should "dis" Tolkien for the crimes of his epigones, because they were imitating him, you stupid fuck!

monstrous-feminine. But per Creed and myself, our revenge can be during the same abjection process reversed against Pygmalion's avatars grooming Galatea to be his pedophilic master/slave. What the colonizer can't restrain and manipulate, they'll resent having the same genitals rubbed in their faces in ways they can't use for profit; i.e., "Here comes the airplane..." 9/11-style [and before anyone American acts morally outraged, how many tears did you shed for the Iraqis, Afghanis, or any other victims of American Imperialism, before, during or after that point?!]

As always, the hero triangulates against nature, becoming the elite's chosen champion—their exterminator, destroyer and retrieval expert dutifully bringing lost territory and property back to them by playing "guerrilla" during the monomyth; i.e., Tolkien and Cameron's refrain as a Faustian bargain with Promethean results. Money moves through nature, and nature is alienated and fetishized to serve profit in an endless cycle of settler-colonial, Cartesian, heteronormative violence; i.e., Capitalism is a cancer that grows inside people, teaching them to devour nature for the elite until the world as we know it dies (which, per Capitalist Realism) is easier for them to imagine than a world without Capitalism. In turn, the post-capitalist potential of pre-capitalist poetics is emptied for a simple ludic refrain: the monomyth as half-real, discouraging the likes of critical expression by reaching for a pre-capitalist nostalgia; i.e., Cameron fans hating on Scott's latter-day films (re: my "Outlier Love: Enjoying Prometheus/Covenant in the Shadow of Aliens," 2021), thus allergic to ambrosia as a poetic means of transforming capital to help workers.

This intended gameplay isn't limited to fantasy JRPGs, but any neoliberal fantasy that displaces neocolonial violence through Capitalist Realism limits where the imagination can even go through cliché, lucrative theatrics; i.e., Final Fantasy never being final, any more than Halloween, Metroid or LotR were.

In the 20th century, this co-opting of science fiction arguably started with Heinlein's Starship Troopers or Lovecraft's At the Mountains of Madness, which provided the ideological bedrock for Cameron's Aliens, and which, as I remark in "Military Optimism" (and cite in our thesis statement):

(artist: Adam Hughes)

A widely successful and canonical work, Aliens' influence on the videogame industry is profound, inspiring the entire shooter genre. This includes:

- FPS (first-person shooters) like Doom (1993)
- TPS (third-person shooters) like Metroid
- RTS (real-time strategy games) like StarCraft (1996)
- turn-based strategy games like X-COM: UFO Defense (1994)

- hybrids (for these, refer to my FPS interview series, but also my Metroidvania PhD research and interview series with Metroid speedrunners, "Mazes and Labyrinths")

Most shooters are sci-fi, but even fantasy outliers like Heretic (1995) were inspired by Doom. Shooters generally give the player guns to use against "alien" enemies—either from outer space, hell, or underground (aliens, demons, zombies). Strategy games are a bit more niche, and don't focus on tactical reflexes, but the sentiment—of shooting bugs with guns—remains the same: "Die, monster! You don't belong in this world!"

The idea—that anyone can shoot their problems—is a soldier's fantasy. Although videogames shrink them into human-sized demons, we can't kill our problems in reality. But a great many people seem happy with the fantasy because it feels empowering. Alas, this attitude doesn't stay inside videogames. Fans of the shooter genre are often fans of real-world guns, and of war (source).

Before we proceed, a word about the oppressor mindset and modular nature of survivor trauma living in the shadow of state violence; i.e., regardless of monster type or media. Per Marx, "dead labor feeds on living labor"—with the undead stuck in the middle, and demons classified as scientific failures; e.g., composites or robots of "mad science," or existing entirely outside of civilization as part of nature or an occult, supernatural plane. Either type must be destroyed according to Cartesian thought making players feel like champions; i.e., even speedrunners, when they treat the puzzle-solving as pure escapism, but also places to crow their own accomplishments inside puzzles made for them by capital⁴⁵⁰: the maze, ⁴⁵⁰ We've discussed the importance of taking speedrunning invention outside of the text and into extratextual spheres; i.e., in order to apply speedrunning ingenuity to larger systemic issues. That being said, while the expectations of the shooter hero as classically being a racecar loaded for bear*, this liminality can still be enjoyed as an entertainment vehicle per Sarkeesian's adage. But this doesn't change the fact that the monomythic framework and neoliberal refrain are incredibly pernicious; re: Tolkien's High Fantasy treasure map as followed by the shooter being inspired by Cameron's Aliens having ripped off Starship Troopers and LotR's own "spectres of Beowulf" to make a female war boss in the neoliberal era (with Cameron basically aping Eowyn vs the Witch-King of Angmar in Return of the King [1956]—the white Amazon versus Darth Vader before Darth Vader appeared, twenty years later and was then pimped by Cameron, nine years after that); i.e., military copaganda meant to acclimate children to future war amid Capitalist Realism: "kill all enemies, become the strongest, and advance to future stages that encourage and repeat infinite military conquest in defense of home in decay and threatened from within by a foreign plot that turns Indigenous occupants into demon zombies" (givers/receivers of state force per nature as fetishized and alien)! Rinse, repeat!

*Whose weapons click on other beings, like a laser-guided bomb drop: maximum damage, minimum effort. And bombs = money for the elite to pitch at states relying on imaginary enemies. The same idea applies to guns as sold in real forms treated like toys (e.g., 1ShotTV's "How LETHAL is a 12 Gauge Mini Shell??? (Shockwave 590s vs Human Torso)," 2024) and vice versa (copaganda) through a shared constant: treat anyone who isn't white cis-het and male as game to kill as quickly and machine-like as possible (the hunter's paradox: infinite growth in a finite web of life).

shooting gallery and ancient, marathon-style race merged with kayfabe, the monomyth, Amazonomachia and the dialectic of the alien to move money through nature using the monstrous(-feminine) hero as the avatar to make this possible; re: the centrist cop/undercover operative in neoliberal refrains, onstage and off!

(artist: Moonshen)

There is, however, a third option that also communicates state trauma as something to face in popular media, but especially videogames: a demonic-undead option tied to the natural world; i.e., as John Carmack envisioned it when he and John Romero made Doom in 1993: "demons versus [mankind's] technology" as a spiritual successor to Aliens (source: Fandom) and the abject, undead, bio-mechanical rage of that franchise's "xenomorphs." In Doom, the undead factor is ever-present during an imperial scheme; i.e., as the 1994 sequel, Doom II: Hell on Earth, sees the Imperial Boomerang returning to its settler-colonial origins: home base (exhibit 51d4a2, four pages down). Under such echopraxial circumstances, the desire to solve one's material problems, phobias and pent-up emotions through undead-demonic slaying metaphors can be cathartic in the abstract; just remember what you're "shooting" at, mid-apocalypse/-invasion and to prevent the persecution of those habitually demonized during moral panics, outside the text—i.e., anyone marginalized by capital through those who tend to benefit from it; re: Samus is Boba Fetta working for the Evil Empire!

(exhibit 51d4a2b: Artists: CScottyW, Behemoth87, Shiny Zeni; source: Persephone van der Waard's 2021 "'Mazes and Labyrinths' Q&A, Interview Compendium!") Pilots of Samus. You don't have to be a massive twat to be a member of the colonizer class. All three men are of said class, and likewise have white, male privilege, to boot. Having interviewed each of these Metroid franchise WR holders for why they run these games, it's largely in-text and about competition for/with other gamers; i.e., which historically-materially means other gamers "like them." It's not to raise awareness—nor demonstrably help anyone oppressed systemically by capital—but to aggrandize themselves and themselves alone by competing endlessly for personal glory and wealth, thus bragging rights, per game.

And these ostensibly chill dudes might not appreciate my academic conclusions about them, four years after the interview series petered off similar to Jeremy Parish pitching a fit about what I wrote about him; re: "[Modularity and Class" and "From Master's to PhD"] but them's the breaks; i.e., they're white, middle-class straight boys making money and only making money during an open genocide inside a system designed to cater to their needs since its inception: from the tabletop games of the '60s and '70s, to videogames from 1973 onwards, '86s Metroid and '93s Doom pioneered by Cameron and id Studios using Gates' computers, into an Internet privatized after the early 2000s around the same kinds of men; re: Twitch being a platform run by a Yale graduate entrepreneur/venture capitalist and known for protecting men who fail up/conduct pedophilia; e.g., Doctor Disrespect, who the system protected for as long as it possibly could; re: burying his reports and paying him out in 2020, banning him, then letting him return a month later and sitting on the case for years.

The usual benefactors tend to "forget" this, but courts and companies exist to protect the powerful and the in-group [white straight men] and always have; i.e., despite Joon the King insisting "There Is No Comeback" for Doctor Disrespect in 2024, he's already been remonetized Cyprian(Cyps)Draku's "[DOC Gets Monetization BACK!" 2025]. Canceling is a myth for straight white boys doing what they always have done under capital, and which they accuse others of doing through DARVO arguments; i.e., exploiting vulnerable parties from positions of power and privilege since at least Catholic priests; e.g., "the trans women are pedophiles, not us!"

To that, Doctor Disrespect is a black penitent literally wearing rapist glasses⁴⁵¹ and a porn 'stache—and who straight up admits to having "inappropriate messages with a minor" [Double Toasted, 2024] while also cheating on his wife [who protects him because he's the breadwinner]—yet continues to thrive in a system that has only expanded to/tokenized through other venues of conquest; i.e., per the Protestant ethic and neoliberal Capitalism during the Internet Age under Capitalist Realism. Protecting people like Disrespect is literally protecting capital, and extends to Mel Gibson, Bill Gates, Bill Cosby and anyone else seemingly made of Teflon. They're not "correct"; they're protected by a system that literally lets them get away with rape, murder and any other crime for anyone but them! Trump pardoned the January 6th insurrectionists; what's another rapist/adulterer like himself?

In turn, white male privilege carries with it white male fragility but also golden handcuffs, and not once have I seen any of these people [the speedrunners above and their friends] discuss anything but games; i.e., as things to play "without politics." As such, Gamers™ who stream and speedrun [for the reasons listed above] are the heroes in a tale told by/for idiots; i.e., activism/political action doesn't tie to their existence, because their existence is already secure provided they toe the line! That's what "fair and balanced" means to them: intended play/emergent play so long as it upholds the status quo. This includes an omerta [cone of silence] regarding open industry abuse, but silence is genocide and golden as a matter of genocide; i.e., they're complicit!)

⁴⁵¹ Re: Jon Lajoie: "Ladies love the bad boy look, and you can't get much worse than a rapist." Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

To that, speedrunners reflect the settler colony model, hence tend to be white, straight and male; and the dark whore they're constantly kettling is both a false flag that presents the state's victims as stronger than they actually are (weak/strong with castles to invade), desires genocidal revenge more than they actually do (re: DARVO obscurantism), and needs to be policed in fetishized ways that justify endless war on the homefront out into the stars, onstage and off: dark whore makes Lieutenant Gorman's pullout game weak ("37, simulated!")!

This becomes a question, then, of changing course before it's too late. Much of the world (outside or inside the Imperial Core) has already become a dated hellish thing to "solve" through nostalgic force policing nature and sex: to shoot (stab or club) as various offshoots of classic heroes and how they would, from Hercules to Beowulf to Doomguy. All have been recruited during the Neoliberal Age to serve profit; i.e. Capitalist-Realism-meets-military-optimism, or the childish, brutal confidence that occurs when gamers take on the state's problems (the creation of enemies), then shoot them with immunity from prosecution to move money through nature: a license to print money by raping and killing.

Videogames simulate war perfectly for these aims; re: recruiting children (especially straight white boys) to take on the killer's mantle as something to acclimate them towards future wars and rape, thus profit as a settler-colonial enterprise waged from the mother country outwards; i.e., "Hell is always a place that appears on Earth," and there is always a whore to fuck and murder at the end of the adventure: "rape the whore; go back to princess what's-her-name."

Furthermore, as my extensive work on Metroidvania and speedrunning and its systemic bigotries show, there is no end to this process; there is merely an endless accelerating Arms Race between functionally white/token moderates and r(e)aping the whore faster and faster for profit!

(source: [Shiny Zeni's "\[WORLD RECORD\] Super Metroid - Any% Speedrun in 40:22," 2025; timestamp: 40:31](#))

For example, Shiny Zeni just got Super Metroid's Any% WR \(40:22, 2/1/2025\), but this process will never stop because there's no logical endpoint to capital exploiting nature—with him piloting Samus to rape Mother Brain and then go home to his wife, offstage; re: Samus is a white Indian/savior commonly performed/embodied by white cis-het men fighting for the nuclear family (re: Zeni is friends with Oatsngoats, who apologizes for Caleb Hart—a transphobe and sex pest; re: "Those Who Walk Away from Speedrunning").

To it, Zeni's the whore⁴⁵²/black-penitent acting as white knight; i.e., a soldier-of-fortune killer-for-hire practicing dogma as something to insulate his audience to the cruelties of the wider global practice inside the Imperial Core's foreign and domestic states of exception (an idea we'll unpack in Volume Three when we inspect Caleb Hart under a microscope): settler colonists using themselves—their entire family model, in fact—as human shields to penetrate the land around them during the cryptonymy process furthering abjection; i.e., not to walk away from Omelas, but enjoy its perverse rewards, Heinlein-style, until climate change burns "Rome" to the ground! It's suicide!

And more to the point, this is what Zeni chooses to do, onstage and off: facilitate genocide while ignoring it by escaping repeatedly into a likeness of it that disguises what is happening all around him. Don't be fooled by his media training and nice-guy demeanor/silly "Oh, you betcha!" act (which Oatsngoats and Caleb Hart also do, unironically imitating William H. Macy's villain, Mr. Lundergard, from Fargo, 1996); it's Capitalist Realism 101, and he's a cop in that respect: always trying to make as much money as he can, while saying as little about actual genocides at home and abroad as he can!

⁴⁵² If you doubt me, watch a stripper hang around tipping Johns, and compare that to the effusive praise that videogame streamers give their donators; i.e., all work is sexualized per a division of labor that treats male work as more worthy of pay/unworthy of stigma versus women's work in the same professions. Such double standards are endless because labor division and exploitation are endless; i.e., inside capital monopolizing violence, terror and sex per the Gothic mode.

In short, the canonical Gothic victim is always a witch/monstrous-feminine whose scapegoat of some kind or another challenging profit (female or not, Federici), and the villain is always a cop (token or not), thus is always an impostor acting in bad faith; i.e., by abjecting their victims through DARVO obscurantism triangulating state force to police nature and sex, thus labor at large! But this is still dualistic, prostitution an older form of emasculation that reverses abjection (thus power) like trans emasculation does; re: with monstrous-feminine avatars saying to our enemies: "Oh, sweetie, I don't like you because you're smart; I like you because you make me look good by comparison!" In capital's eyes, Communism is always hard kink—one whose yum they fuck and then yuck after fleecing the dark queen without paying!

The Gothic's classic questing for the Numinous, then, is also dualistic, in this respect; and while the axe always forgets, the tree always remembers: the Numinous ghost haunting the counterfeit (from Antiquity into the posthuman era—echoes of S.H.O.D.A.N., left)! Time for your medicine (re: cancelling is a myth, under Capitalism, but closeting and lynching is not)!

In turn, monsters of all kinds are produced in factories, onstage and off; i.e., laid low by white Indians to produce kill counts, Vietnam-style, these necrometrics (embraced by the Doom franchise) repeating—literally a system for killing attached to the veneer of American Liberalism seeking revenge against a seemingly infinite number and form (from Giger to Sophocles to Baptist fire-and-brimstone to John Romero and company's infamous cyberdemon, exhibit 51d4a2b2). But there are only two basic functions—for or against the state—and only a finite web of life treated as monstrous-feminine to endure such grim harvests; i.e., by the usual Cartesian rapists colonizing imaginary territories to whitewash their doing so towards actual ones; e.g., Palestine, Darfur or Cambodia as laid low to child friendly songs (chip tunes aping American rock 'n roll pastiche), all of the above making the whole grotesque practice comforting: "The disposal units ran night and day. We were that close to going out forever!"

Eventually, though, Medusa will simply snap, and no amount of displaced imperial abuse (obscurantism and DARVO rhetoric), guns (or similar boyish killing toys) and wacky obstacle courses will save the soldier from himself; i.e., from the state cannibalizing him and the world through divide-and-conquer dogma: effectively pulling on the tiger's tail, guerrilla-style, to antagonize him against his brethren (thus assist in colonization⁴⁵³), only for capital to eat them and for the world to eventually eat capital. When the chickens come home to roost for good, Medusa will take the Aegis away from its abusers; i.e., using her Kegel-esque pussy tremors to send her evil killers to Hell once-and-for-all (returning the favor per Creed's murderous womb, getting even for Francis Bacon's Cartesian Revolution many times over)! Just like Metroid, "true peace in space" is a myth, and the dark whore always wins, in the end (re: "Ozymandias," Frankenstein, Axiom Verge, etc)!

In short, nothing lasts forever and such wanton bloodshed becomes something than cannot be atoned for (save as total annihilation during state shift). Eventually the fascist spectre of "Rome" just "runs out of lives" and Medusa has her way with him; i.e., clapping back as such people always do (re: Ward Churchill). Game over! Death by Snu-snu, the ghosts of all Medusa's children have their revenge when the middle class furthers abjection for too long. So perhaps we should listen to those who are closer nature and suffering under it—not my cat, guarding my potatoes from some unforeseen menace, but something akin to that who, like Medusa being policed and raped, those eager to learn from may turn to and plead in total submission to Her Excellence: "What do your monster eyes see, great one? Are you a potato warding off the police? TELL ME YOUR SECRETS!"

(exhibit 51d4a2b1: Model and photographer: Baby the Great Potato, One with All Other Potatoes; and Her humble and faithful servant, Persephone van der Waard. Garfield is a second-rate Great Destroyer compared to you, Ms. Kaiju!)

It's like a puzzle, then, and you can't solve it with state-sanctioned deception, ignorance, apathy and force; its solution instead demands our cryptonymy and Aegis moving power towards workers and nature before everything falls apart for good—with Medusa, the planet, either regenerating afterwards, or going to sleep for good; but whatever happens, we will not survive. So let's consider the in-text pieces thereof as the usual Promethean warning signs, in advance; i.e., as a ludo-Gothic BDSM means of subverting bigotry and crisis, onstage and off: doing so to prevent the seminal catastrophe as an entirely Cartesian, manmade one!

In turn, every demon killed on Earth (during mirror syndrome) only sends our heroes closer towards their own self-destruction; i.e., the monomyth is, well, a myth, but one (of neoliberal false power) that can be speedrun by the usual (wannabe) Pirates of Silicon Valley! Except, there's no Mars to go to (and if there is, it's literally drawing straws/a death lottery because people policed the whore until she snapped and killed all life on planet Earth)! All of this is entirely preventable, but history repeats itself thanks to Capitalist Realism and the middle class since Columbus onwards: "kill the Indian, don't save the man!"

⁴⁵³ In-fighting is built into Doom's gameplay loop, so much so that it becomes a means of solving special emergent puzzles; i.e., in fan-made gauntlets putting players to the test; e.g., Coincident's "Okuplok. Ultra-Violence. 1 Save" (2024).

(exhibit 51d4a2b2: Artist: Gerald Brom. In the unironic quest for mastery against nature as demonic, Doom portrays its own Communist monstrous-feminine [the game was an Aliens reskin, remember] as something to shoot for its brazen, hideous "nature"; re: thinking beings vs extended beings, cops vs victims.)

Beyond videogames like shooters and Metroidvania, then, Imperialism is made at home and has been since Ancient Athens, Sparta and Rome; i.e., home base as the state nucleus, the hauntological center of the Cartesian Revolution's domination of nature during Red Scare; re: chasing spectres of Medusa/Marx from a localized source—one that evolved into itself as eventually under attack ("home" as sick) and needing American Liberalism/fascism to defend itself; or as Jason Moore and Raj Patel write in A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things:

The second law of capitalist ecology, domination over nature, owed much to Francis Bacon (1561-1626), a philosopher generally credited as the father of modern science. Bacon was also a prominent member of England's political establishment, at different times a member of Parliament and the attorney general of England and Wales. He argued that "science should as it were torture nature's secrets out of her." Further, the "empire of man" should penetrate and dominate the "womb of nature." [...] The invention of Nature and Society was gendered at every turn. The binaries of Man and Woman, Nature and Society, drank from the same cup. Nature, and its boundary with Society, was "gyn/ecological" from the outset. Through this radically new mode of organizing life and thought, Nature became not a thing but a strategy that for the ethical and economic cheapening of life [...] a normative statement of how best to organize power and hierarchy, Humanity and Nature, Man and Woman, Colonizer and Colonized.

In other words, natural demons/undead are classically female and monstrous-feminine-coded beings that canonically hide on the edge of the world; i.e., by subsisting at the frontier as guerrilla warriors besieged paradoxically on home turf. Yet, as so often is the case, these resistance fighters—like those in Vietnam (GDF's "How the Viet Cong Smoked American Soldiers," 2023)—are canonically demonized by the West; re: as "beings of darkness" (with guerrilla warfare being something that historically has been waged in the shadows of Imperialism; re: Asprey's War in the Shadows). As such, they evoke a supernatural aura tied to Hell and damnation (from the Western perspective) in neoliberal copaganda (videogames); i.e., fear and dogma as a copagandistic means of provoking American soldiers on the front line, onstage and off, to kill the enemy with extreme prejudice wherever they show themselves—or where the elite choose to have them appear while incentivizing the same settler-colonial violence⁴⁵⁴ anew!

⁴⁵⁴ Re, my thesis argument regarding Tolkien and Cameron's refrain:

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth (or an Earth-like double)—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force.

Threatened, the state always responds with violence before anything else. Male or female, then, the hero becomes the elite's exterminator, destroyer and retrieval expert, infiltrating a territory of crisis to retrieve the state's property (weapons, princesses, monarchic symbols of power, etc] while simultaneously chattelizing nature in reliably medieval ways: alienating and fetishizing its "wild" variants, crushing them like vermin to maintain Cartesian supremacy and heteronormative familial structures [...] Neoliberalism merely commercializes the monomyth, using parental heroic videogame avatars like the knight or Amazon pitted against dark, evil-familial doubles—parents, siblings and castles (and other residents/residences)—in order to dogmatize the player (usually children) as a cop-like vehicle for state aims (often dressed up as a dated iteration thereof; e.g., an assassin, cowboy or bounty hunter, but also a lyncher, executioner, dragon slayer or witchfinder general "on the hunt," etc): preserving settler-colonial dominance through Capitalist Realism by abusing Gothic language—the grim reaper and his harvest. [... I.e.,] convince the hero that a place away from home is home-like; i.e., the thing they do not actually own being "theirs" (the ghost of the counterfeit) but "infested" (the process of abjection). Then, give them a map and have them "clean house"—an atrocious "fixer" out of the imaginary past who repairs the "broken" home room-by-room by first cleansing it of abject things "attacking it from within," then disappearing with the nightmare they constitute (source).

and my follow-up Volume-One argument:

Canonical heroes triangulate against state targets, then, becoming the necessary exterminator of the settler-colonial model, but also the sexy destroyer and superheroic retrieval expert during the monomythic fetch quest (hyperbole and state heroism go hand-in-hand, exaggerating the menace, emergency and rescue to equal measure); i.e., a budding flower of war and larger-than-life tempter-of-fate (and the audience) walking the tightrope between Heaven and Hell, life and death, protector and aggressor, child and parent, but also wild and tame, pleasure and pain, black and white, strong and weak, invincible and vulnerable, good and evil—all while delivering state subjects (and the nuclear family unit) from evil, chaos, death, darkness, Hell, etc: the dark chronotope as a false copy whose hellish architecture and monarchy (the medieval bloodline) threatens the perceived legitimacy of the West's own forgeries (while also haunting them). A school of canonical violence, then, the liminal hauntology of war predictably emerges, summoning the hero to occupy then suppress a prescribed "disorder" during an orderly chaos/Amazonomachia that breaks and repairs the symbolic home; i.e., over and over (a narrative of the crypt, circular ruin, infernal concentric pattern, Cycle of Kings, etc).

And since we're focusing on the monstrous-feminine, here, I consider the most famous of all modern phallic women to be Hippolyta-married-to-Theseus: James Cameron's neoconservative, "feral mother" take on Ellen Ripley serving as a warlike, parent-themed mentor for the children of the present (or those who, thanks to waves of terror, regress to Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

In equal measure, what exists in videogames extends to nature as demonized (for good or for profit) across all media forms and stages of performance; i.e., the "demons" fight fire with fire, but anisotropically as revolutionaries (re: Nelson Mandela). Grafting the oppressor's stolen ordinance to their bodies, they become cybernetic to the point of self-flagellation (a new class of alien barbarian/"soldiers of Hannibal or Medusa" that capital will recuperate: obscuring its own abjection through canon's bad telephone game/the Mandela effect). Not only does the bio-mechanical, coercive-BDSM metaphor echo Giger's xenomorph—as a kind of cybernetic, zombie-demon chimera tied to transgenerational trauma—but it exudes the historical-material tendency of American foreign policy to overarm its assigned enemies as part of a weaponized cycle of endless exploitation; i.e., even during the displaced revenge fantasies of the usual half-real make-believe in Pygmalion's Shadow (re: Aliens, Metroid, and Doom). A factory of death's panopticon will work until the end of the world.

Furthermore, supplied by the colonizers through an Imperial Boomerang whose flight always starts from home, the myth of a technologically superior demon hoard is incredibly dissociative; i.e., obscuring the giant role played by American arms manufacturers and war contractors. These privatizers continuously supply both sides with the means to wage war forever—always asymmetrically and perpetually corrupting nature through the a(nta)gonizing presence of human weaponry fused to demonic organics becoming bait; i.e., "It's a trap!" and "60% of the time, it works every time!" Facing the weird canonical nerd with virgin/whore syndrome, Medusa chews off their dick with a woodchipper pussy! "Joan Crawford's risen from the grave!" (Blue Oyster Cult, 1981). So eat up, you little monsters!

(artist: Magic Moon Arts)

Black Veil or not, the usual brutalities and moral panic/superiority that result are symptomatic of a project that invades media to child-like states). She's the housemaid with a gun, facing the barbaric imagery of the imaginary past mirrored by actual colonial abuses, upholding the latter by banishing the former to benefit the elite—in short, by playing out a heroic story much in the same way that modern versions of Beowulf would: through sex and force, rape and war expressed in theatrical language that maintains Capitalist Realism (source).

To escape Hell, you must subvert its regular joy divisions while inside them; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM's liminal expression—with art through sex work being incredibly liminal; re: exploitation and liberation share the same spaces (e.g., the same cruiser's bathroom stall, above).

spread its dogma across all mediums; i.e., Aliens and similar works operate through the Cartesian model, which unfortunately goes beyond videogames and back into a half-real position: one between fiction and non-fiction, alike, governed by parallel standards and rules of play shared between the two (re: the infernal concentric pattern/narrative of the crypt, and similar devices)!

Cartesian thought, then (and Gothic narration devices, thus rules of play from Radcliffe onwards), globally demonize nature through mad science, but also discourage any creative alternatives, from an egregoric standpoint; i.e., beyond the orderly binary of the Western world, any scapegoats normally sought out by the usual Radcliffean heroines (and male variants) testifying to their own slaughter by said actors.

For example, the minotaur and similar monsters of the Greek imaginary past work "by extension" and association; i.e., linking Humanity to the natural world in "magical" or drug-like ways they have in common with more recent hauntologies (such as blue cat people, below)—not to a Christian Hell (or otherwise carceral, manmade space that traps humans inside), but something and somewhere that we can decolonize through our own stories featuring monsters trapped in here with us and vice versa: as written using reclaimed technology (fire of the gods) and Gothic poetry to subvert monomythic action; re: the anal Amazon thesis having the whore's revenge to fuck the alien in a healthy way (without harming either side) during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Both sides are alienated and restored through camp.

To that, the classical labyrinth historically and deliberately serves as a manmade prison from the original Greek legends; i.e., a spatial didactic role that carries over into videogames like the Metroidvania or FPS (and their own mazes and labyrinths' empowering to disempowering effects): the home of the kept enemy monster as something to survive in redlined ghettos—often through combat, but just as often courtly love, thus kidnap/captive and rape fantasies (re: camping Cameron's Avatar series, left, therefor its racist white savior narrative)! The castle—including the chattelized castle-in-the-flesh—is historically the perfect dom, and the hero is historically the perfect sub receiving that Numinous gift from the demon:

(artist: D8)

However palliative, the Numinous and fear go hand-in-hand with psychosexual catharsis and athletics, during calculated risk. In short, there's always a fear of the alien/outdoors for those alienated from nature, but also a guilty surrendering to it; i.e., to have "its turn" in ways that bring both sides closer (re: Reznor) amid an ongoing and multi-tiered system of differences' unequal privileges and oppression. Often demonized as wild, unsophisticated and barbaric, but also animalistically rapacious and mind-altering through controlled substances (above), we and our ludo-Gothic BDSM seek to one, dispel the many violent, sex-coercive myths orbiting these groups in their "evil," canonical forms; and two, stress the various playful ways in which iconoclastic totems operate: as a poetic "ambrosia" that can transform the world directly through monstrous self-expression relating between two or more parties (also above)!

Artistic and drug-like, this naturalized, magical class works to further good Gothic sex education; i.e., one where fairies, furies and "magical girls," etc, represent sex positivity as a kind of forbidden knowledge and aphrodisiac drug tied to nature, but also historical-material fears orbiting performative capture and rape: alien expressions of sex and gender education, but also identity formation through the poetic struggle of the animal side of the Cartesian model; re: formalized as a puzzle of "Antiquity" like what we wrote about earlier with Giger's xenomorph:

[a] writeable Wisdom of the Ancients. That's what the creature is/the castles are—spectral, deathly evocations of a world before Capitalism, thus possibly one after it; i.e., death-as-radical-change [...] We can reunite, thus use something so awesome (and forgotten) to help liberate our minds from Capitalism and its barriers; but, again, it will be a shock—medieval, foreign, alien, abject.

Just as a patient is like a corpse under the surgeon's knife, the idea of the home and the human share this unsettling distinction. We must occupy it as a particular kind of surgeon and corpse: a love doctor whose wild surgeries—similar to Giger's drug-fueled, psychosexual art—play passionately in a field where "death," "rape" and echoes of their unironic forms haunt the theatrical landscape. (source: "Giger's Xenomorph").

Except, it's not just "the xenomorph" pimped by Whitey at all—with the Na'vi being Cameron's shameless, hyperreal/digitally simulated and Afronormalized vaudeville, commodifying the just-as-old Indigenous struggles inside a functionally white-savior underage power fantasy as tokenizing multiple assimilated groups against nature and those of it: both the Irish (Jake Sully) and people of color to literally speak for/play in Cameron's AI, tech and gamer bro "leather stocking" simulacrum (itself merely a repeat of the French and Indian Wars passing for "activism with amnesia"; i.e., technological asymmetry is baked into settler colonialism, so nothing about Avatar is impressive, any more than with Aliens' own Rambo pastiche).

Ergo, the double standards seen on and off those stages likewise extend to any popular form of Gothic poetic expression; i.e., in regards to a stewardship of nature that, as we've shown, historically aims through ludo-Gothic BDSM to reunite and bond with nature as alienated from us by capital's regular power trips (with Cameron's Avatar taking a videogame approach to cinema, and all to paint himself as a god/Omega Man performed by Jake as his avatar to those he deems ethnocentrically inferior to him—what a knob, and everyone who works with him is also a knob).

We'll see as we proceed, then, how this cryptomimetic subversion actually has a drug-like, acid Communist flavor that, all the same, combines demonically with mad science and occult magic; i.e., per the Promethean Quest and Faustian bargain regarding nature as chattelized, but also the various undead elements (of generational trauma) that crop up during the rememory process, too: reversing abjection (thus profit) during revolutionary cryptonymy's holistic modularity!

To that, remember Radcliffe and the others: When the British Romantics and Neo-Gothic revival were active, nature was closer at hand but being pulled away by a burgeoning system already several centuries old. Now that alienation is further along but not complete, the Gothic's fixations with expressing alienation by bypassing boundaries is invaluable. As such, we may use any poetic distinctions, creative instruments and schools of thought (whatever works) to make ourselves felt, seen and heard as human stewards of nature: "There's no fate but what we make for ourselves"; i.e., to make Capitalism something more stable than it is, but also returning to nature as something we can inhabit in ways that improve the quality of life for all (workers, animals, the environment): the use of technology in ways that didn't exist in the past as a predominantly oral society.

Beyond more recent scientific technologies (re: Shelley's "Modern Prometheus"), this applies to pre-capitalist examples to poetically write down for post-capitalist reasons. This includes Giger's pet monster hauntology but also the various ones he took and made (more) surreal; re: Blake's devilish acids ("corroding fires") for his printing blocks, and Marlowe's Faustus speaking hauntologically to times before mercantile capital. Using Gothic poetics at large, we can play around with these ideas ourselves provided it serves to defend nature from capital and its own bad education's fatal nostalgia: a Valley of the Satanic Dolls!

Per Blake (or Giger), every attempt is unique/sui generis ("in a class by itself"). Yet diversity is strength insofar as all of them contribute endlessly towards the whole's Song of Infinity across space-time; i.e., as something to suggest at an obscured glance: one that takes on "madness" as a mythical life of its own we are not totally masters of; re: the forgotten, seemingly magical ability⁴⁵⁵ to move through barriers and distinctions that might otherwise hold us in place through acid Communism's oubliette's of mist while in defense of what we hold dear as threatened by impending catastrophe. The ground around us turned to eggshells, magical assembly (more on the other medieval poetics devices, in a couple pages) lets us stitch or madly assemble whatever we need or want to further the Cause; i.e., including what friends provide, but also frenemies (re: Cwuu) and enemies (re: Zeuhl and Jadis) we know and political friends and foes we don't. The Enemy has many spies; so do we! Ours give back fatal-yet-vital knowledge on the Aegis as shared between both sides!

⁴⁵⁵ This kind of distinction can be made by either side of a dialectical-material struggle; e.g., Myth II and the Deceiver fighting like hell to save the West from sudden destruction (the Fallen, per Bungie's arguments, known to instigate "natural" catastrophes like volcanoes or floods—thereby foisting other woes of Capitalism's onto an imaginary scapegoat):

This concludes outlining nature versus the state as a dialectic, by and large. That being said, I'd like to spend the remainder of part zero going over some medieval poetic countermeasures/supply some fun extra exhibits, at the end!

For starters, there's no "perfect" approach to developing Gothic Communism. Just that, once you have a knack for it, you won't need to solidarize those eggshells, but instead can walk on clouds (soaring through the hair like an eagle or sky-bound witch). Able to move through boundaries at will (or make our own), workers can freely embrace calculated risk as something to embellish and erect.

Homo erectus, "it's pronounced win-gar-dium levi-O-SA!" ("STAHP IT, RON! STAHP...").

(artist: Oney Cartoons)

In turn, jouissance and its constructive frenzies yield impossible things that should not stand but do. Gay as Hell, they defy reason as a social-sexual contract/construct, but can be made by anyone "primed" for it. Under the right conditions, then, you might be surprised what campy cathedrals your orgasmic tornados can raise on the bones of canon (and who will show up valley about two hours downstream from the dam. If the dam were destroyed, the resulting deluge would kill everything in its path for miles.

Upon hearing this, The Deceiver shook his head, his face twisting in anger. He moved slowly through the crowd, commanding all those present to defend the dam, insisting that he would punish those who allowed it to fall. Without another word, he headed downstream.

I asked one of the Black Robes why The Deceiver had not stayed to help us and he tersely replied, "he goes to warn the Emperor – moving through odd angles; faster than any man, and if unobserved, much faster than that" (source: Bungie).

Unlike the Deceiver's token assimilation, we don't work for the emperor in defense of the West. Yet, our powers inside Capitalism's shadow zone will prove just as useful defending us from Capitalism; i.e., by letting us—through the Gothic—intimate and critique grappling hyperobjects using poetic abstractions: great, powerful Destroyers manifesting as giants, castles, suits of armor and so on!

Like any orgy or church, though, it's a group effort, and one geared towards our collective survival instead of deifying the state; i.e., in all its historical-material forms; re: corporations, churches, and nations-states, etc. This involves working together to respond to the holistic poetic value harbored in and across each other's bodies (and bodies' labor) to do together what is impossible alone/divided.

As a pornographic invigilator and historian, I cannot stress enough, then, how utterly important inspiration and collective solidarity are to labor action as a group exercise; i.e., one that routinely faces state predation tempting workers with assimilation (re: bourgeois Faustian bargains), thus how utterly unable I would have been to write this book without the likes of older works (and workers) to inspire me, but also the friends drawn to it who took interest in what I was doing tied to a shared past. This took time; re (from the Poetry Module):

To this, a director is precisely fuck-all without a muse to blow up, and a model often needs a platform to work their magic. As such, Sex Positivity was and always will be a group effort, its total collective statement on/with artwork and sex work entirely impossible if not for all my muses, models, partners (currently friendly or antagonistic) and friends (sexual or platonic) working in concert. Nor is ours the first. Like the patchwork group of (mostly cis-het male) art nerds who made Alien, celebrating the monstrous-feminine in Gothic panache, my cuties and I don't own each other while raising temples to our own dark gods.

Instead, we've worked together to contribute to a diverse, inclusive labor of love that we can all feel proud of; i.e., a dark progeny begot from enthusiastic, heartfelt teamwork. It's an orgiastic journey to document and leave behind, a procession of memories to learn from (as Alien very much is). Or as Scott himself put it: "It takes an army of dedicated people to make a feature film—and on Alien we had a marvelous army" (source: American Cinematographer's "The Filming of Alien," 2017). So did I (source).

Ridley and Ripley together and separate, I walked in the footsteps of Pygmalion and Galatea, realizing I was praxially gayer than either of my forebears.

Furthermore, without my aforementioned army of muses' incredible booties pushing me to begin—and their ongoing friendships' challenging of my privileged biases' understanding of stigma and bigotry as a whole inspiring me to keep at it (as part of a back-and-forth process)—I would never have bothered to lay the first brick! My Gothic maturity (such as it is) merely sits in the middle of a long and winding stretch of Yellow Brick road; i.e., occupied by friends of all walks and dispositions, it's a real Canterbury Tales—a rough-yet-colorful stretch, yawning ever onwards through a medieval "past," made in the present space and time, anticipating future attempts concerned with older ones; re (from the same section):

Per the Humanities, such marbled dialog is not set-in-stone, then, but sculpted in our own caring gestures cheering others up and looking out for them; e.g., wagging "tails" manifesting as a simple "How are you doing?" (capital makes us forget to breathe, thus ask, thus think—waves of terror—so we must regain a prompt ability to think on the fly less as "total recall" and more as being quick on the draw). The more they learn, the more they can change the world provided they learn things that allow them to. In turn, this requires someone who will seek answers out, not take things at face value, including with things that interest them. They'll enjoy them, but call them out if they're pernicious, and invent curious solutions to hornswoggle/trick the state and its proponents (e.g., my older brother's Mr. Kazakhstan; i.e., [Madoff's] useful myth of Gothic ancestry) [ibid.].

Whatever its form and ingredients, though, Gothic poetics (and the Wisdom of the Ancients as a whole—a poison to pick and make your own ancestry as you see fit) is a powerful voice we cannot afford to discount. Diversity is strength, so diversify!

To quote one of my favorite problematic films, The Flight of Dragons (1982): "If mankind is to surmount the insurmountable, there must always be magic to inspire him; magic cannot die!" Except, I would deliberately extend the Green Wizard's neoliberal pipedream beyond straight men/tokenism to "Medusa cannot die," and whose die-hard longevity inspires monsters and GNC people (thus all minorities), at large, to punch up at the state's weak point: its lack of empathy. Yet, between all of them, wild incessant creativity is nothing but a good thing when it flourishes; i.e., a creative mind is healthy insofar as it develops creations that support nature, thus workers, as adapting against the state: as the Great Destroyer of the Earth! Capital always eats, more and more, until it dies from eating the world, effectively cannibalizing itself!

In short, the state is sickness, is what the canonical Gothic announces vaguely as "trauma" in ways our ludo-Gothic BDSM and its cryptonymy cryptomimetically fuck with; i.e., doing so to whisper loudly and scream softly (and similar such oxymorons and paradoxes) to perform power in medieval poetic forms; re: as alienated in ways that rebels can return to through said performances under unique current conditions: primed for release from older bondage and harm as something to camp, during holistic and universally liberating calculated risk. Navigating the usual dualities, mid-performance, "It does not do to leave a live dragon out of your calculations if you live near him," and capital as a process of propaganda is full of dragons that our roles—from tops and bottoms to doms and subs—must continually subvert to defend nature from; i.e., those who pimp and police nature as monstrous-feminine, thus alien. We must, or we will not survive, because capital will rape us to death; re: segregation is no defense (and silence is death). So let's get this party started!

(artist: Xiao Tong)

Of course, a mind is its own place; and sometimes to prevent rape, you have to tap into your animal side during psychosexual theatre (the side your abusers can't monopolize); i.e., as extending from onstage to off and vice versa. As always, dialectical-material context (and flow) are key to development, without which, we're back to the harmful nostalgia of unironic rape/wifely duties to canonize, except now these divisions have been hauntologized to serve profit under capital; i.e., it will be worse this time, because profit will demand it happen over and over while gaslighting the usual virgin/whores to assimilate and keep up appearances; re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss. No one "wins" under capital except those behind the curtain, and even then, they'll lose too when Medusa kills them all! Exploitation and liberation exist on the same stages, capital disguising the former as the latter to perpetuate said cannibalizing for everyone it alienates from (and fetishizes for) everyone else.

As described in the entire "Medieval" section from the Poetry Module, those who contribute unto capital and its sickness through the usual performative tools are profoundly uncreative in that respect; i.e., only able to devise tools of actual, unironic torture and enslavement—of scared, closed minds shrinking during Capitalist Realism, the latter having menticed the former into gargoyles for the church of capital and the Protestant ethic. Innovation disappears, replaced with blind faith in a brutal system that survives through "prison sex" mentality (re: Plato's cave, known today more casually as the Man Box). Canon is canon, the illusory effects the same; re: "The masses have never thirsted after truth. They turn aside from evidence that is not to their taste, preferring to deify error, if error seduce them. Whoever can supply them with illusions is easily their master; whoever attempts to destroy their illusions is always their victim" (source: Gustav Le Bon's The Crowd: A Study of the Popular Mind, 1895).

Capital is a glass onion, and it's a grave mistake to see said onion and think its Aegises are wholly transparent. Instead, these mirrors operate in reflective ways (the albedo measurement of a given surface, during remediated praxis); i.e., that serve a dualistic (anisotropic) role. To it, such prisons—and their myopic insulation under canon—are recursively concentric and fractal in their neoliberal divisions; i.e., a prison in a prison in a prison, hiding the truth in fabrications of "the truth"; re: the ghost of the counterfeit, abjecting "dead labor feeding on living labor" into the usual states of exception (the half-real frontiers of Gothic theatre, on and offstage).

While liberation is a game of mirrors, our elaborate strategies of misdirection (as splendide mendax) are asymmetrical alongside those who think themselves besieged by us; i.e., those they prey on during mirror syndrome. Faced with oubliettes as they see and utilize them during the cryptonymy process, agents of capital hoist up on their own petards to use them as intend by capital; i.e., to fear a perceived world where capital is gone, thus unable to give them the hyperreal structure of solid prison walls (re: the canceled future). Canon becomes Jameson's class nightmare; i.e., when the Black Veil is pulled aside, and one which—when threatened with the destruction of its walls—our class traitors all but lose the necessary devices to operate in any healthy way without. They live in a bubble and fear its bursting to the point of easy betrayals, and freeze, clam up and sit in anticipation; i.e., for the usual, historical-material boom-and-bust patterns that, for them, is the new normal to return to, from time out of mind, into echoes of echoes of echoes on the same old cave wall shadows!

Deprived of those shadows, the usual proponents of capital police reality while pinning for revenge; i.e., to reachieve said normal (the Gamergate refrain extending into all canon, mid-moral-panic); e.g., from The Republic to Toy Story to The Matrix ("to infinity and beyond!"). Bursting such monomyth bubbles by reversing abjection during revolutionary cryptonymy is our King of Dreams' chief and steady aim: "You're not the One, Ne(r)o! Now put away that fiddle and help us dismantle the state!"

Workers versus the state, then, is a battle that never ends (the state is always the enemy) but giving up is not an option short of suicide; i.e., to betray is to concede defeat to our overlords; re: the state is incompatible with life, and mutual consent is a learned activity that pushes back against systemic rape as also taught: from an older and more barbaric model of exploitation built on male, then white, racial supremacy and other modular bigotries swapped in and out as needed!

To avoid that fate, I would happily use my active, awake brain however much is required to penetrate the seemingly impenetrable; i.e., to become that "monster from the Id" and burn through the doors of minds who try, try, try as they might to shut me out: "I am the Medusa, and you not only raped me, but raped yourself as well!" As Matthew Lewis shows us, a rapist always destroys a piece of their own heart in the process; i.e., closing their mind and their body to the very sorts of empathy we seek to rebuild among the Ozymandian wreckage!

To that, I've gone on to write nearly two million words (at this point), as well as make hundreds of collages and dozens upon dozens of illustrations (well into the triple digits, too); i.e., happily doing so in conscious-and-willing defense of the planet (as a sustainable home) than say however many with a sleeping greedy brain that leads to its inevitable destruction. Indeed, I would happily revisit the same book (and ouroborotic fugue state) for the rest of my foreseeable life under house arrest, letting it bleed me dry if it adds to the Cause by enriching monsters;

i.e., no matter how maddening that might feel (a part of me loves it, of course—again, see my foreword to Volume Zero) or how many estranged weirdos tell me to "touch grass."

Okay, but what is grass? How do you define grass? Welcome to the desert of the Real, motherfuckers! "Anywhere in the galaxy this is a nightmare!" Yes, but one with the power (on the Aegis) to set us free! Liberation always starts with the mind, a door to walk through that—unless you've seen it for yourself, faced with your own Great Destroyer turning you into a battered housewife for capital, in small—there's really no way to conceptualize that horror and make total sense while doing so. How could it? Easy solutions, explanations and nostalgia are the stuff of unironic chattel, idiots and Don Quixote.

Instead, there is always a buffer between us and the wheel of fire—a shadow on the cave wall to help us process what we're currently surviving under duress; i.e., capital is a problem to solve before it kills us, and that is something to—far from lose hope regarding alien vampires eating us—instead becomes a paradoxical source of excitement when chasing the (magic) dragon/ Numinous; re: through creation as something to canonically fear during the Promethean Quest, but for us is the fire of the gods to liberate ourselves (starting with our minds) through iconoclastic art breaking canon inside canon: "You're tearing me apart, Lisa!"

Verily, the whore's revenge speaks through fabrication—the taking of pills (red or not), in keeping with acid Communism, actually being a freeing of the mind through trance-like illusions of druggedness; i.e., as something to bend reality (and its prescribed owner class) to our will! It is fundamentally unpoliceable, hence why I stress applying knowledge through game-like modes of expression! Not for making us "the dupe" (re: Gloggin), but to expose those calling us the dupe being dupes themselves, and the ones acting in bad faith for the elite (e.g., Cipher from The Matrix, below, or Andrew Tate passing himself off as "woke" to grift a select group of white, straight, male, middle-class idiots while fleecing and mobilizing them against actual oppressed peoples)!

⁴⁵⁶ Playing devil's advocate (I mean, just look at that goatee), the actor for the character (who historically plays the sell-out) makes a compelling point; i.e., not to justify it, but highlight—me playing defense for him, a bit—that the state's unfair advantages do make people sell out, and furthermore, is a historical-material fact. We need to recognize and portray said fact when going up against the state and its proponents' lies, ourselves, in real life; i.e., the useful idiot as someone to challenge when challenging us—doing so according to deceptions being half-real on both sides, each going back and forth between fabrication and reality (a bit like the characters in the movie):

The Matrix is now back on everybody's radar thanks to the upcoming sequel, and with that brings forth the questions that have plagued all of our minds ever since we first gazed into the artificial world way back in 1999. One such question regards actor Joe Pantoliano's character Cypher, a member of the heroic crew who betrayed the rest for another chance at being "plugged in". However, that is not exactly how Pantoliano sees things, with the actor having recently defended Cypher's actions.

"I always have arguments with fans of that movie because they look at Cypher and they say 'You were a traitor.' And I, being years in show business and having to dissect and having liberal vision of the character I'm portraying, I'm always arguing on his behalf. On Cypher's behalf. Like, who wouldn't take that deal? If you were given an opportunity and a choice and then you decided you made the wrong choice. "You take the red pill, the girl that you love is in love with somebody else."

"You've gone through six or seven 'Ones'; Neo is just another guy that's gonna get his ass killed. And he's going, 'I've made a terrible mistake! Ignorance IS bliss. Why shouldn't I go back to a world and pick the person I want to be. Pick the career I want to have and have no memory [re: Plato's "writing is the death of memory" argument]. I'd betray anybody, I'd kill anybody."

So, much like everything else in the world of The Matrix, things are a lot more complicated as they initially seem. Joe Pantoliano reasons that Cypher is so unhappy with his choice to wake up in the real world that he has no other choice than to make a deal and return to a world of blissful ignorance (ibid.).

Cipher's the jester-pimp in the king's court. Having already duped himself, he speaks to the audience in ways that let them realize how—after Cipher is ignominiously dead—still remains a man (or echo of a man) that made the wrong choice... yet also remains sympathetic insofar as we're facing the same Faustian dilemma he once did; i.e., versus a shadow of a devil that was once a man and still might be: as something to learn from according to his caged rhetoric being part of the film's central lesson. However "stacked" the deck seems, then, said choice historically-materially predicates on the same criminogenic conditions conjured to our service in duality (not just for the state, Marx, but workers, too)! A mirror (and its arguments) can always go both ways!

I live to teach, but also recognize the so-called worse and best students depend entirely on context, mid-struggle; i.e., who question reality as a criminogenic premise to grapple with: the allure of class, culture and race betrayal as tempting (see: footnote). Murderers come to you in smiles, and traitors are recruited from their own populations to maintain the panopticon as the world decays behind the illusion (with Baudrillard's hyperreal being a concept the makers—two trans women—were very aware of when camping the monomyth during the Promethean Quest/Faustian bargain; re: Morpheus' famous pill problem for "Neo" to recursively solve; i.e., an appeal to the Straights by two directors working within the system to subvert it).

As such, cryptonymy remains dualistic/prone to liberate/tokenize, as do all the main Gothic theories and facets of oppositional praxis on the Manifesto Tree (which I wrote to allow for said dualities, during dialectical-material struggle as something to perform and account for in iconoclastic art; re: "Paratextual Documents"). Like all modes of praxis synthesized in opposition, they can go either way—and The Matrix has, as much as Plato or the word "woke" (Pissed-off Bartender's "Let's talk about the word 'woke' and why I hate it," 2025). Rebellion and regression occupy the same mirror games' linguo-material tug-o'-war as simply being a matter of repeating in ways we must anticipate, mid-cryptomimesis.

Medusa's testimony (and by extension, ours) speaks through the infernal concentric pattern; i.e., in ways that challenge capital and its profit motive, thus its raping of the mind as part of nature to rape during the Cycle of Kings, inside the Shadow of Pygmalion, part of the narrative of the crypt, and so on. It's—for lack of a better term—a long game, and a zero-sum puzzle that is (at least for me) far more interesting than simple military optimism leading to brain death and, by extension, rape and death, period. The more you deny them as real, the stronger they become; same goes for us!

By extension, birthing monsters and renovating castles in the Gothic style⁴⁵⁷ is my passion, my raison d'être because Capitalism is my bête noire, my dragon to slay and replace with my own; i.e., the former is unstable by design, thus unsustainable—must be put down and replaced with something that will last that doesn't cheapen life through settler-colonial fear and cartographically monomythic dogma; re: a peach to harvest on and across all registers!

In other words, sex-positive education concerns a constant-and-vigilant defending by us of the things that Capitalism attacks; i.e., which it seeks to dominate by closing them off by design—nature, but also as inextricable from nature thus "of it." Be they peoples, places or things (food, clothes, contraceptives and other items), any poetic license or device employed by them that you could possibly imagine will canonically become a means of enslaving nature, thus workers and sex, through a heteronormative, settler-colonial scheme; i.e., a means of denial-of-access by raising disastrous barriers to defend itself while punching through our safeguards to kill us by any and all means necessary (evoking the Krell's "Monsters from the Id": "your machine will supply that monster with whatever power it needs to reach us!").

In keeping with the usual persecution devices and qualities of capital dividing workers, it's the state vs workers, male vs female, the Straights vs the Gays, etc; e.g., faeries, werewolves, ambrosia, collars, magical forests, mushroom kingdoms, etc; i.e., in at-times-transgressive forms of cuckold/possession-and-relinquish fantasies that intersect with various marginalized groups who hypnotize out of necessity as much as revenge, but likewise camp such things within liminal expression's transgressive elements owing to that transgressiveness as a matter of compelled and inevitable alienation that must be reclaimed from the same system to reverse abjection, thus hug the alien while enjoying the bursting of any aforementioned bubbles: "Glory to the Hypnotoads!"

Few things are as confused/confusing or brutal as token cops, who cannot see beyond their own bubble as made through acts of bad will (and faith) towards those they betray inside/outside their own gated communities. To it, our collective and holistic function must challenge those bad forms of sex education with dialectical-material opposites, generally on the Internet (whose rapid-fire search engines can parallel our brains, but also be used when our brains are working overtime to solve complex problems; e.g., speedrunners). So build your own cathedrals; size doesn't matter if you nail the combo and make something that lasts throughout the ages to lead onto better things. Barring that, there's no shame in contributing to the Cause at a meta level; i.e., one brick in a larger wall, one star in a grand constellation, all charting a collective, concentric path: one where you can freeze the enemy or have them scratch "cuckoo" their heads (all so long as it inspires them to think critically for once).

(source: Caroline Kee's "This Guy Is 'Protecting' Graffiti Penises With Condoms," 2017)

Keeping with The Matrix, the state maintains control through monomyth (cop) threats of violence that, once imposed, destabilize to a vertiginous extreme; i.e., Capitalist Realism as a systemic, all-encompassing means of throwing people phenomenologically off-balance. Yet if the state imposes madness to disempower us through traitors (re: Cipher), our subsequent (and subversive) empowerment lies in ironically acclimating to their withering spells; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM, "doing it raw" as places to reclaim and swim around inside without fear or effort; re: Neo flying through the sky at the end of that film. "Rock Is Dead" (Marilyn Manson gaslighting his audience and profiting off them) but Rage Against the Machine, anyways! Futility is part of the struggle, Sisyphus smiling at the gods through Numinous rapture (making the rock he's chained to his bitch like Prometheus did the gods' hungry eagle).

Is this spurious or special? Both, because revolution is a city of paradoxes. Like Neo as the newly-crowned King of the Underworld having been paradoxically liberated by Morpheus the same way Hades might liberate Persephone and then Persephone (me) liberating you through echoes of those characters/the Medusa, the sinking pit in one's stomach can magically replace with sheer joyous euphoria; i.e., as one takes to the abyss/mise-en-abyme like a fish to water (or the skies). Despite seeming well-and-truly out of our element, we adjust and acclimate to what is normally weaponized against us—taking monsters back, thereby taking Hell and making it our domain, not the state's:

Flight is something we humans dream of. It represents a conquering of earth's gravity, and a release from our confinement to earth's surface. In the moment when Neo is shown to have superpowers, the writers chose flight as the best embodiment of this. It goes to show how powerful verticality is for us, and what we think of when we consider a character to be superhuman (source: James Botham's "The Matrix and Verticality," 2020).

Doing so is always a tightrope to walk, because Neo is using the same monomythic power fantasies the movie diegetically affords to the Agents' own spurious monopolies; i.e., as working against these interests inside the same system, but partially estranged/unplugged from said system to—like 2011's Sense8 (a text we'll examine more, in Volume Three)—eventually reunite those the system has pulled apart: ourselves and nature as something rebuild while dancing in the ruins of nostalgia as canceled (the one cancelling myth that is true). This happens through illusions of false gravity that, nonetheless, speak to dialectical-material forces that are anything but false, and who the elite can sell back to us: in forms of controlled opposition we can then subvert through performances of wizardly power and knowledge; i.e., if we choose to understand an aesthetic (coded, argumentative) means of enjoying but not endorsing the feelings that go along with canonical varieties; re: "I know kung fu!" Show me, young padawan!

The only difference, as usual, is dialectical-material scrutiny as a part of praxis, synthesized for catharsis; re: gods are cool, as are monsters more broadly during Amazonomachia being things to dig up, summon or otherwise fashion: speaking to the same old Modern Prometheus showcasing the Creature emblemized between simulacra of simulacra; e.g., Icarus, Medusa, Elphaba and Mercy melded together by me (next page), existing in a similar struggle that fights illusory fire with illusory fire: the exposure of her superheroic body not one of tragedy alone, but glory for defying the gods of the state to resurrect the Medusa as the only thing the state wants/fears, thus pimps! What they pimp, we clap back with. Short of a bullet to the head, how can they stop us? And even then, you can't kill Medusa; Elphaba lives, motherfuckers (a raised fist evocative for its symbolic social value tied to material resistance; re: reclaiming the Base by recultivating the Superstructure)!

That being said, what is the difference between witch rebels and witch cops? Dialectical-material function, of course (re: flow determines function, which we'll examine more alongside witch cops in Volume Three, Chapter Four); i.e., sex positivity as unfolding during informed consumption, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation vis-à-vis Gothic counterculture poetically serving those aims! Praxis is merely mind over matter, babes! Let it take you over the rainbow (of Gothic [gay-anarcho] Communism), making your dreams (and everyone else's but the elite's because fuck them) come true! Set Medusa free, thus your mind through what you create representing a freer world than the state's one-and-done map of empire! Make Mark Fisher proud (and avenge his death)!

Our combined (re)education, then, must address a tricky paradox: fighting fire with "fire," madness with "madness"; i.e., establishing healthy boundaries and lowering harmful ones, deciding through selective absorption, magical assembly and a confusion of the senses (all from our various Gothic/medieval bag of tricks we talked about in the Poetry Module's "Medieval" portion): our own calculated risk, and by extension what we eat during ludo-Gothic BDSM, in order to survive by raising not just ourselves, but emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness for all workers; i.e., to prevent rape as a matter of performative risk, thereby embodying ourselves as monsters that will be attacked and eaten; re: our Song of Infinity becoming holistic and fourth-dimensional labor shared with all class, culture and race warriors recultivating the Wisdom of the Ancients' complicated dualism! Shazam!

To this, "good education" means sex positivity as an eagerly liberatory device; i.e., utilizing popular linguo-material devices to re-teach workers not to feel afraid, first and foremost ("to let 'I dare!' wait upon 'I would?'" As if!). As The Matrix shows, fear can drive workers to cage, brutalize and collar other workers "of (thus with) nature" for the state; they require assorted barriers that we set up once we're able to move on unstable ground, ourselves. Such buffers can be the poetic ones we've mentioned comprising our emotional/Gothic intelligence, but it can also be more literal, physical and exact; e.g., condoms (three pages back), which the state will deny as fascism rises to crack down on nature (eco-fascism).

Whatever form it states, the state is a cop, not your friend; it will kill you to protect itself, but like a cancer will eventually die as all empires do—of its own sickness. Until then, it will make absurd Capitalist-Realist arguments projecting genocide onto others; i.e., those fighting to prevent it again; e.g., "They're coming for your women, your cheeseburgers, your comfort, your rights (etc)!" States rights attack worker rights through "scab" workers arguing for the bourgeoisie (Cipher was an undercover cop). All are arguments of scarcity that double as threats against labor fending for itself; i.e., to achieve post-scarcity using pre-capitalist (feudalistic) poetics in a Neo-Gothic fashion (as Neo does—Superman but also the Creature in ways that go far beyond Keanu Reeves' loveable otter).

Take it from me, capitalists hate that shit; i.e., as do their proponents (re: Jadis), greedily hoarding the ambrosia less for themselves (to free their minds) and more to cynically prevent others from eating it and escaping the mind prisons that capital affords; e.g., Jadis loved being in the cave—in effect, taking Cipher's blue pill before my very eyes, yet passing themselves off as "wise" and "rebellious" when, point-in-fact, they were just another GNC TERF punching down at me/tilting at pharmaceutical windmills (re: Cervantes' metaphor for dragons, but also the mechanisms of capital to thrust at: through our own dangerous delusions punching the membrane on the Aegis like a drum). Here, the Gothic castle (and its Numinously trippy sensations, below) is, again, an odd paradox: a "prison" that frees your mind to envision better worlds than Capitalism allows, but will allow if they think your harbor for rebellion is "just another castle" (whose princess is, per Mario, in another castle elsewhere, elsewhere, elsewhere...). Beyond Jadis, as someone like Elon Musk shows, the number-one fear the elite have is being left behind!

Death-as-memory is a paradox, per the Gothic; i.e., insofar as its endless warring castles and monsters-in-writing repeat with disturbingly chimeric variations bleeding into each other over time: the trauma of struggling to be heard, those that struggle to remember themselves correctly during cryptomimesis, let alone the Numinous as something grander (and monstrous) to suggest! Except therein lies the difference: what the state reproduces through compelled reproduction as something that eerily and hungrily watches us⁴⁵⁸, GNC people (and other oppressed rebels) do through what they build from older buildings; re: as a community to leave behind and inspire others towards: first a castle, a stage, a song or a Metroidvania, etc, as paradoxically "empty" and full of not-so-quiet secrets that—as a constellation of worrisome and ambiguous signposts—become our aforementioned Song of Infinity leading us on towards Communism through "bad echo"; i.e, by letting us know each and every time that we are not alone/that Hell is all around us, its monsters becoming our friends to keep us company (and warm/full of cum, below) mid-struggle against the state's ravenously Cartesian ones (above):

To those who never knew (Death's "1,000 Eyes," 1995).

(artist: NOBM666)

This company (and struggle) routinely changes shape into familiar-foreign forms, and takes back what the state uses to hide itself; e.g., Chernobog from Fantasia (1940) complementing this transfusion: both us playing with our toys, and a ghost of the counterfeit the state abjects. Thus, when threatened with the titanic unseen forces we've described throughout this volume, monsters like Chernobog-as-doubled and his poiesis doubled yield a plethora of myriads⁴⁵⁹. For us, they conjure up to reunite in defiance of the state; i.e., assembling and changing shape through each ritual, thus cathedral, as a one-time affair that shows up and sputters out again per attempt—from fire girls to animals or anything else that's required. Is there anything more Romantic and Gothic than that?

Monsters are merely poetic devices arguing through preferential code and instruction. Vis-à-vis the state and us, such threats (and their rejoinders) are ⁴⁵⁹ The Gothic is serialized, and creatures of chaos yield many interpretations per moment and over space and time as looping back around. For example, as NOBM666 (above) writes,

The personalities for me can go two ways. First they are anew, fire [succubae] with one sole purpose, to please Chernabog. The second, they remember what they were before but they focus on what they are now as their purpose is surely the same, to please Chernabog. The latter point holds a richness of torture to the original forms of these creatures forced into something new and to the forms they hold now, tainted by their ugly past self's and all the profane acts they have done. There is richness to this point also regarding the sex change and admittance to the cause, where ugly male demons are made beautiful females, where all they can do is just accept or risk destruction, where they are forced to act sensual and shame themselves in an erotic show to please their master. This humiliation and confusion adds a depravity to it all, one I imagine Chernabog relishes.

Now I can get carried away with the many themes and ideas suggested but I will end on a bonus thought. The demons made the fire which shapes into alluring maidens but when their fire is put out by Chernabog are they changed into to a pig, wolf and goat OR are they just revealing what was beneath the flame all along? As the flame burns out revealing bestial feet working up the body in a grotesque way, it makes you wonder were those dumb barnyard animals the fire maidens all along, gifted the forms to express their purpose to their master who cruelly took back the gift? (source).

My own interpretations of any monsters (and their masters) are a bit more dialectical-material, but the spirit of the discourse is very much the same: the chaos of interpretation, versus canonical order squashing the pedagogy of the oppressed haunting the shadow of police violence (and vice versa).

incredibly common; re: everyone loves the whore/monstrous-feminine, and people learn through popular things because popular works (to commodify or defend nature) and is tied to our survival on a daily basis; i.e., what we eat as monstrous, magical, mythic, etc. So we must go where that power is and critique our diet as normally controlled, then reclaim it on the Internet (and elsewhere) for our own liberatory purposes by taking it into ourselves (sexually and/or otherwise; e.g., going to Queen Maeb, below); i.e., we must go to nature as a vivid, delicious commodity to liberate monsters of nature from their settler-colonial role, thereby returning it to an older one before Capitalism that could be again under Gothic Communism; re: as a unique, stronger (note: less cancerous) development than Capitalism (which is cancerous by design).

The pleasures of nature and its poetic extensions won't be denied to us; they'll remain in delightful (and silly, below) forms that speak to workers' shared and uneven desires for connection—i.e., by using "what they got" as counterterror does to, through guerrilla warfare, liberate itself as much through humor and camp as strict, psychosexual rage and angst (of the xenomorphic sort): an exchange of essence in medieval language to make a modern point with preferential bias towards the language of the past as something to perform; e.g., some people would prefer to be the blueberry princess, and others the gnome. All are valid provided they yield praxial catharsis during the whore's revenge; i.e., by campily reclaiming the terror of underworld sex by making it fun through land back pastiche as ludo-Gothic BDSM: taken from behind and ravished by a mighty midget!

(artist: Steven Stahlberg)

"All the world's a stage!" and such monumental endeavors afford lackadaisical nonchalance (the idylls of the Fairy Queen) during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., they involve nature as something to express its own endlessness beyond gnomes and nymphs as notorious spirits of the earth and the forest, but also Pagan fertility Rites of Spring that can become unironically like Stravinsky's strident offerings: "Glorification of the Chosen One" (1913) both making your hairs stand on end and your lips twist in Grinch-like smirk with the above image in your head (essentially This Is Spinal Tap's Stonehenge scene decades before 1984⁴⁶⁰).

⁴⁶⁰ "An ancient race of people... the Druids... No one knows... who they were... or what they were doing... but their legacy remains!" (source). Camping not just the Gothic, but Marx, this 1984 tour-de-farce repeats past tragedies in ways we can camp; i.e., with the same ghosts of the counterfeit, coaxing these Marxist spirits out of their hiding place like Disney's own Paganistic lord, on Bald Mountain. But it can be very funny as we do it!

All the same, humor and rebellion aren't mutually exclusive. Instead, they separately or together speak to an alienation with nature through the imaginary past we're questing for Numinous reunion with; re (from "Composites to the Occult to Totems of the Natural World"):

demons embody poetic exchange—as unequal/forbidden, and with transformative linguo-material devices (re: power, darkness, knowledge; if I mention a particular noun in this module, it's because I'm stressing it). As such, they are classically made, summoned or found, and argue dualistically (through doubles) along these circuits of poetic discourse; i.e., by creating something out of clay or summoning it into a clay-like substance (or dead flesh, possessed victim, graveyard soil, etc): to deal/treat with power in all its forms, including of nature and death as old, haunted, anathema and ubiquitous. Knowledge is power and vice versa during such exchanges; i.e., as dark, anisotropic.

Couched in "darkness visible" as a poetic, xenoglossic device, we can make not just voices, but also bodies that speak cryptonymically to taboo, illusory and paradoxical things, injecting them with fresh poetic life (trans people are poets of identity and the flesh, above); i.e., a half-real, checkered combination of violent, terrifying and hellish morphological freedom of expression, existing in andro/gynodiverse defiance of state monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital, hence Vitruvian medicalization and genocidal apathies (re: the Shadow of Pygmalion as white/xenophobic, fearing things not of the West ["not of this Earth!"] and bastardizing them as abject, alien evil, forgotten; i.e., reimagined with asymmetrical/guerilla powers exploited by the state but not monopolized by them)!

Per Hogle, the ghost of the counterfeit furthers abjection through the middle class upholding status-quo arrangements of power and knowledge through Gothic fakeries; i.e., viewing colonized land as dark and alien, vis-à-vis Cartesian thought and heteronormative language demonizing older forms of culture connected to nature, life and death, having become alien in ways that uphold capital (and its black/white colonial binary argument). Under Capitalist Realism, something is "dark" if it ostensibly moves anything of value (re: power and knowledge) away from the status quo. Generally this darkness is associated with the vengeful imaginary past based on buried historical atrocities, the latter paradoxically twisted by the former to keep control right where it is (among the elite). Anything that challenges this paradigm is canonically framed as dark, evil, profligate; i.e., nature as vengeful whore, which capital takes revenge on through DARVO-style police violence/obscurantism, witch hunts, tokenism and moral panic [...]

Rebel power/knowledge, then, becomes ontological in highly dark, Satanic, and "archaically" poetic ways; i.e., through iconoclastic abstraction and impression, but also hefty substance, sensitivity and savory deliciousness regarding the natural world as funerary and wild (as forbidden fruit generally is): "death" as an extant state of constant radical change, Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com made by those "of nature" the forces of light deem ethnocentrically "lesser" or "accursed" while conveniently abusing the same language of the imaginary past's priestly and funerary necrobiome, themselves (always in service to profit/a Cartesian paradigm raping nature as whore, Pagan, black, the latter closer to life and death through reimagined death gods, post-genocide—above). And yet, all monsters are linguo-material devices, hence exist in anisotropic duality during oppositional praxis; i.e., in dialectical-material struggle, moving power towards workers or the state. This further complicates by a give-and-take approach to what is being exchanged. Whereas the undead take essence when they feed in relation to trauma, demons give knowledge to transform themselves and others into demons when they teach (source).

True to form, then, the Gothic (and its kissing cousin, the Romantics) routinely wrestled/wrestle with Numinous/Sublime size difference, mid-fetish and convention/cliché; i.e., doing so in ways that people respond to as a conscious (to not-so-conscious) recognition of its own silliness and seriousness likewise forever being at war!

To it, the music in Spinal Tap's "Stonehenge" actually sounds—in this old metalhead's opinion, anyways—pretty fucking great instrumentally alongside fairly rote (on purpose) lyrics:

Stonehenge! Where the demons dwell
Where the banshees live and they do live well Stonehenge! Where a man's a man And the children dance to the Pipes of Pan

Hey!

Stonehenge! 'Tis a magic place
Where the moon doth rise with a dragon's face Stonehenge! Where the virgins lie
And the prayers of devils fill the midnight sky

And you my love, won't you take my hand?
We'll go back in time to that mystic land
Where the dew drops cry and the cats meow [mew goes the void kitty]
I will take you there, I will show you how (source: Genius).

It's not so different from Rush's "Xanadu" or Witchfynde's "Leaving Nadir" save that it's pointedly camping—"into the living rock," mid-Satanic-Panic—Coleridge's 1816 xenophobic-philic "Kubla Khan" (the latter romancing the conqueror and fetishizing nature while seemingly disavowing the Gothic as Coleridge loved to do). But also, the entire glorious mess can be enjoyed for the "true camp" of the dancing little people around the Lucky-Charms-sized monolith; i.e., one that both shrinks said Numinous per the usual liminal hauntologies at war and expands them through a different force than earnest worship (or horror/terror): a sincere ribbing of the whole counterfeit that still flirts with the ghost of said counterfeit as something to tease. "I think that the problem may have been that there was a Stonehenge monument on the stage that was in danger of being crushed by a dwarf, alright? That tended to understate the hugeness of the object!" Or, as Terry Gilliam once said, "It's only a model!"

Yet, like "Ozymandias," such things don't cancel each other out during the call of the void/wild (and its various interpretations; e.g., Lovecraft's fascist xenophobia)—can, in the same breath, be enjoyed separately and together in ways that don't worship the usual altars that self-serving men like

The fairy monarch, for instance, remains a common method of gendering as an alternative to the heteronormative standard; i.e., the fae, faer, and faers neopronouns as something linguistically new (the trans movement of the 20th/21st centuries) tied to something quite old associated with drug-fueled methods of expanding⁴⁶¹ the mind tied to the imaginary past: the dark, drug-fueled forests of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, but also Keats "Ode to Psyche"

"Yet even in these days so far retir'd
From happy pieties, thy lucent fans,

Poe, Conrad, Lovecraft, or Scott, etc, did; i.e., the fearing of "druids" by knocking on wood to keep them at bay... or to invoke their ghostly memory and dance with them in the present space and time (those treated like druids right now). All part of the fun, kids! But also, there's a science behind it to appreciate, too:

Stonehenge might have not actually been an arena to watch guys in hooded robes and glitter eyeshadow act all otherworldly, but it did have killer acoustics. At least the way it was recently found to have been configured to amplify sound but still keep it inside defies the notion that no one knew how to achieve special effects during the Stone Age. University of Salford professor Trevor Cox and his research team worked backwards — instead of building a scale model of a future concert hall, they used the prehistoric gathering place to create such a model. The Spinal Tap-size Stonehenge they created could literally speak (or sing) of its secrets (source: Elisabeth Rayne's " Stonehenge's Unreal, Real-Life Acoustics Would Have Impressed the Guys of Spinal Tap," 2020).

Huh, no shit! "Yeah, science, bitch!"

In any event, canon retreats from the present to resist the learning of new things as detrimental to its canonical value; i.e., its ability to control workers. But for the iconoclast, this only enhances the experience, thus praxial potential we can work with, in the future! "Sex, drugs and rock 'n roll," babes! It's our Trojan Horse mirroring theirs save in function! Engagement and application to synthesize praxis are what matter! We're literally playing with the past to camp it, working with dead symbols, nerdy pretensions of grandeur and metaphor ("to break my fast on honeydew" speaking as much to sex and drugs as separate versus together); i.e., to achieve the only things that are sacred: universal human, animal and environmental rights! Give 'Em Hell, indeed, we're walking away from Omelas and into a stately pleasure dome Coleridge couldn't envision, no matter how much laudanum he took!

⁴⁶¹ Coleridge took laudanum; I get high on people, friendship, and sex. The virgin loser versus the Stacy trans an-Com!

Fluttering among the faint Olympians,
 I see, and sing, by my own eyes inspir'd.
 So let me be thy choir, and make a moan
 Upon the midnight hours;
 Thy voice, thy lute, thy pipe, thy incense sweet
 From swung censer teeming;
 Thy shrine, thy grove, thy oracle, thy heat
 Of pale-mouth'd prophet dreaming.

Yes, I will be thy priest, and build a fane
 In some untrodden region of my mind,
 Where branched thoughts, new grown with pleasant pain,
 Instead of pines shall murmur in the wind:
 Far, far around shall those dark-cluster'd trees Fledge the wild-ridged mountains steep by steep;
 And there by zephyrs, streams, and birds, and bees,
 The moss-lain Dryads shall be lull'd to sleep;" (source).

likewise being neither here nor there, but something in between/without set place resurrected in the Internet Age; i.e., by using old, repurposed language for fresh, nuanced purposes: a "zombie fairy" if you will (or demon, ghost, whatever).

In keeping with the battles for such devices during the banality of evil/desk murder (re: Coleridge, footnote), such creative prurience might seem "excessive" relative to traditional, Western (Cartesian, settler-colonial and heteronormative) conventions; i.e., about sin and vice relayed as "ancient" derelicts to leave behind and find again (druids all the way down). But it isn't self-destructive the way the state commonly portrays inside the sphere of Capitalism's harmful influence; i.e., their idea of the silly kid's sex party until "reality sets in" (a false "waking up" that kills conscious class character in favor of "acting like an adult woman or man according to the WASP/nuclear family model as something to restore"). Instead, it's the envy of the "gods above," meaning the elite, who can only feel human when drinking more and more blood siphoned from workers against their will. So often, the traitor is a cuckoo assimilator raised in human captivity and reintroduced back into the wild (as Cipher was, among many others).

To that, let's provide some extra exhibits (six pages' worth) before giving sex education a deeper look: from the Aegis to the Medusa, neither came first but evolved into themselves and their current echopraxis!

(exhibit 52a: Artist, left: Persephone van der Waard. The model wishes to remain anonymous. I'll call them Brutus. Fairies had a variety of spellings, such as "fairy" as much as "faerie," but also ties to a group of peoples and beliefs constantly under attack; i.e., struggling to survive genocide or resurrect themselves as zombies from it. From its earliest days of empire well into the present, then, the West has attacked and assimilated Celtic cultures [which includes their Paganized, Bacchanal pleasures; i.e., their festival variant of the disco, party or orgy]. The Romans raided Britain and fought the Picts; the English demonized the Irish; and the remainders of Celtic mythology survived in popular forms that were canonized or reinvented by

English-speaking authors after the native languages and cultures were destroyed in their natural forms. In short, they became romanticized, either through pure sexual escapism aimed uncritically at an endlessly consuming middle-class audience, or displacing it to a faraway fairyland to critique the actions of evil kings against a group of nature-dwelling peoples with magical powers [re: abjection].

During oppositional praxis, though, faeries also retain a "tricksy" nature; i.e., one assigned to them by the colonizers for being poorly behaved, but also vengeful; re: for not killing home rule with kindness. "Changelings" steal English babies and replace them with poorly behaved imposters that assimilate the conquering group out of desperation and spite. Some—like the bean sidhe "fairy woman"—are generally feared as a specific type of hag: a death omen to rehearse, then seduce/scare our enemies shitless [or at least enough that they don't rape us]!

Such omens generally pervade Western canon through a canonical imagination that workers must reimagine inside of itself; i.e., from the fear-blinded eyes of terrified white straight women, onto trans versions and other intersections of privilege and oppression [Brutus was a trans man who stabbed me in the back]. Fascinated with the dark, savage past of an imaginary island that isn't strictly "theirs," these women see "their" home as occupied instead by dark animal spirits also popularized by men in a collective xenophobic effort; e.g., Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's 1902 "The Hound of the Baskervilles" or Charlotte Brontë's 1847 invention—through her famous protagonist, Jane Eyre—of the fictional "Gytrash." The "black dog" is an archetypal death omen; in regards to Brontë's dog demon, Mimi Matthews writes, the Gytrash is "a goblin or spirit which takes the form of a horse, mule, or large dog. Typically found in the North of England, the Gytrash 'haunted solitary ways' and often surprised unwary travelers as they journeyed alone in the dusk" [source: "Jane Eyre and the Legendary Gytrash," 2015]. Similar ideas of the "lycanthrope" roadman can be found in Indigenous Cultures of Turtle Island/the Americas; i.e., with "dog soldiers" becoming a demonized source of fear for American colonizers, then and now.

In other words, the spirit of death, magic and vengeance characteristically haunts the frontiers of the "civilized" world from the Western perspective. This abject tradition certainly wasn't "new" by the time Brontë adopted it; Shakespeare had already demonized the Welsh enemies of Henry IV in his first [of many] historical play of the same name—i.e., infusing those outside the rapidly-forming English national identity as old, magical and dangerous, but also superstitious and backward, during us-versus-them; re: Harry kills his Welsh double.

In turn, the poetic duty of anyone subverting those mythologies remains the same: to avoid the ghost of the counterfeit's canonical usage; re: as an alluring fear of the imaginary past, while presenting nature to the modern world—not as something utterly alien or fearsome, but a liminal kind of self-expression with a variety of linguo-material forms speaking to alienation and fetishization serving worker interests during the whore's revenge. During ludo-Gothic BDSM, these can subsequently present as neopronouns, art, or both—and include myriad ways of seeing the world; i.e., as something to transform using older things that have since been reinvented in service of the oppressed or the oppressor dialectically-materially back and forth.

The various styles of furies is infinitely broad, diverse, and ancient. Even in the Western world, legends the likes of chimeras, centaurs, satyrs and fawns date back to Ancient Greece—with "nymphomania" being tied to female sexuality as pathologized by Western men of reason [similar to "wandering womb" as a means of infantilizing female desire; re: by tying it to abject bodies, hysterical minds and fickle emotions]. These ongoing oppressor mentalities [and their ancient canonical codes] may be reclaimed, commonly serving as a mode of existence and "Satanic," thus Paganized self-expression; i.e., that identify one-and-all with nature in visibly anthropomorphized ways: as its gay Gothic stewards!

Such rainbow flavors are thoroughly hybridized—can be militarized, fantastical, cutesy and/or alien. Indeed, many white women—trapped between the role of dutiful servant and benefactor of colonialism—will quickly turn to the nearest form of nature-as-alien to perform acts of rebellion against, as subjugated Amazons always do; i.e., the Christian devil actually being an abjecting of the alien colonized; e.g., Black Phillip from The Witch [2015, below]: "What dost thou want?" [re: "Darkness Visible: Dark Faeries"]. Again, demons are the classic granters of dark wishes, including a desire for revenge by living deliciously that liberates marginalized groups "of nature" from their overlords⁴⁶² by reclaiming sodomy as a weapon of terror that their self-appointed rulers cannot govern the ungovernable with. To bear our Aegis as whores do is to riot against them—its call of the wild as a gloriously uneven gesture of veiled-to-unveiled compatibility!

artist: [Persephone van der Waard. The model wishes to remain anonymous; I'll call them Siobhan]

As yet another hauntological Cartesian boogey[wo]man of the Western frontiers, more moderate forms of feminism have straight white women using demonic imagery to piss off their male overlords, versus trying to venerate or clear the names of the usual symbols/recipients of stigma; i.e., defending their virtue from, or surrendering to, ⁴⁶² The film releases the daughter from Puritan bondage; i.e., by destroying the nuclear family model, but all while fearful of and fascinated towards the witch of the forest as a profoundly abject being: kill your family first, then live deliciously out in the dark forest beyond Capitalist Realism/Lacan's Real treating Marxism as contained in a post-Freudian Black Bubble!

the idealized form of evil during a conventionally sinful exchange [which translates to secularized forms during the Protestant ethic].

Yet, by simply existing in the material world, these same "suspects" invariably threaten Christendom and the West, thus can be specifically reclaimed as such by gender queer movements; i.e., transgressive as well as subversive, and patently designed to make the "good Christian, American" uncomfortable during their own moral panic. By making bigots "self-report" while overriding canonical stigma and bias, we read the room; i.e., by asking an audience we're seducing according to their own idea of rebellion as reclaimed by us, mid-seduction: "What dost thou want?" In turn, we respond to them, "To be the thing that my enemies fear while also enjoying myself as something dark, sexy and badass." Such is Bottom's Dream, and it paradoxically has and has not a bottom!

To it, when I first approached Siobhan for my "Black Phillip" rendition, we played as one might in a grove with the fawn. Then I—struck with the fawn's dark love spell, afterwards—built a temple to their generous loving of me: to a dark god I didn't know but felt connected to, anyways! The model unfortunately disappeared shortly after the shoot, but they gave themselves willingly at the time; i.e., towards a cause I am proud to feature them inside, "as is." Truly their ass and pussy are the envy of the gods above! So fuzzy and wicked, we make Marx gayer and consciously visible by shedding Freud and his ilk [re: Lacan, Zizek, Creed, etc]!

[artist: Siobhan]

In other word, natural demons—as well as their secularized, so-called "Satanic" proponents—are GNC devices of sin, vice and guilt; i.e., that, in our campable hands similar to Matthew Lewis' own Matilda camping the canon—can threaten the heteronormative order to varying degrees of camp!)

(exhibit 52c1: Model and artist: Drooling Red and Persephone van der Waard. Dark forests also include swamps or lagoons [Grendel's mother living in an underwater cave beneath a lake] with which to engage with forbidden, oft-female or at least monstrous-feminine water spirits/nymphs. The habitats are dark and forsaken by God and God's cops, but also granting forbidden knowledge and pleasure offered up by nature-themed demons facing the cop and controlling them through sex: something that is invaded, chased and hunted by Cartesian agents looking for the sh[!]ock of that tight Numinous squeeze.)

Body horror is a horror of nature and change in ways the state conditions people to dread. But through experiencing that change myself as concurrent with others I have played with undergoing similar events, I can attest to the joy of such things; i.e., to be a god and know it, as Siobhan and Red showcase so happily. But also, we do it to have boundaries; i.e., setting those up during the cryptonymy process: as suitably revolutionary in our gay Satanic hands, a play-within-a-play (camped since Shakespeare's rude mechanicals, in A Midsummer Night's Dream).

I'd say Percy Shelley would approve, but I'm not sure he's gay enough! The fact remains, Satan is cool, and all who fear us also love us in bad faith; i.e., in ways we can rub in their faces, meaning behind barriers they can never cross: flashing those in power with power as they try to pimp the devil they're dancing with! Except, if you can't empathize with us, at least we can fleece you before returning to outer space after cruising for sex (or food, money and other things)!

To rebel, then, is to showcase mutual consent when giving up a piece of the pie; i.e., doing so in ways they can't actually taste or take, save in ways that sex workers control behind barriers that give them the ability to play and have fun: while getting what they need to survive! All are sexy when challenging profit during the whore's revenge in spite of persecution mania! "If we spirits have offended," then good; fuck you, hahaha! Furthermore, such things speak to development as a liminal task, one whose work is never done! Gods have to fight for their recognition, and they love tributes (cum or otherwise), mid-transformation and -exchange!

(artist: Siobhan)

To summarize Cartesian revolution and nature vs the state as we have covered it here, the entire natural class of monsters—furries, chimeras, and fairies, etc—can teach us forbidden or denied ways of thinking about sex that don't harm anyone, but are invariably framed as "dangerous" by the status quo; re: "sex, drugs and rock 'n roll"; i.e., according to their queer/pornographic elements as sexually animal-like, primitive/transgressive, undead and/or demonic, and drug-themed opiate bread-and-circus for the masses:

- mutually consensual "breeding" (the threat of impregnation without the consequence, but also with forbidden mates)
- "flashing" (to show that which is taboo, thus dangerous to expose)
- and HRT (exhibit 52g) as a kind of "potency boost" to the body/mind and the sex it has as animalistic

To play with fire, in the Faustian or Promethean sense, then, is to canonically threaten getting burned unto the demonized, thus blaming the whore as they're policed for Original Sin ("sex is perditious, but also, humans are reprobate and supposed to deny gratuitous excess; i.e., in pursuit of a Puritan ethic," which the whore's "almost holy" temple severs the bond between man and God to liberate by communion with dark forces that transform us back into what capital stole from us). Yet, play as a riotous element can paradoxically induce/control labor (so to speak): as something to regain orgasmically through the same anisotropic mode's epidural. Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM minus the big fucking needle to the back!

Whatever the form, all speak to/with that primal, Numinously rough stuff that can make the sex absolutely out-of-this-world; i.e., anatomy lessons tied to our animalized selves haunted by medicalized trauma, including our body and bodily fluids—our cum, saliva and lubrication, etc—but also our body hair and sex organs as innate parts of our biological selves theatrically worshipped in "monster parties" set to rock 'n roll/metal: as something to fuck to, Salem's lot abjected by Cartesian thought save as ghosts of the counterfeit (most men have no idea where the clitoris is or how to stimulate it, for example; e.g., in grad school when I was still in the closet, Zeuhl literally had to grab my hand and "stab" their clit with my fingers like a fucking treasure map: "This is where my clit is. Right. Here!" How seditious).

Now that we've looked at some extra examples of animalizing sex work, remember that our focus remains on humanizing sex workers through the Gothic mode's decidedly queer lens. This chapter addresses trans, non-binary and intersex chattel stigmas during oppositional praxis—pointedly its sex education as good and/or bad relative to nature as something to damn or rescue; i.e., "groomer" panic as something to defend ourselves from while identifying with various stigma animal combinations like the snake, wasp, spider and bat, but also the minotaur (or something akin to a minotaur) as something for manly heroes to canonically slay during a warrior's rite of passage we subvert, onstage and off (exhibit 51d, next section): mid-furry-panic.

As such, we shall also consider how trauma can subvert the heteronormative mythic structure when expressed by demons of the natural world; i.e., as walking castle-in-the-flesh elements of chaos—especially when merging totems with undead and demon language: as a chaotic force, death being a part of nature, but also having an expressly material function in human culture as aligned with or against nature; re: in hauntological, drug-like forms during acid Communism fostering radical empathy as a matter of dark reclamation towards what has been lost. If fascism is radical apathy through its own Gothic poetics (monsters, magic and drug use), then Communism is radical empathy (towards the alien) upending such devices by reversing abjection—all to reclaim everything capital takes from us in the bargain by stressing an animal connection from start to finish!

Furries, for example, are a recent attempt by those in the modern world to find a sense of shared togetherness, humanity and common aims; i.e., inside a material existence expressing the natural world as something to reunite with based on older animal mythological standards that, for all intents and purposes, are functionally extinct in their native forms.

In turn, the same reunion with, and revival of, the past as bound to nature as a monstrous-feminine alien fairy whore—which already includes space aliens (e.g., the Twi'lek from Return of the Jedi, left, being something to fuck after Luke kills the monster and for which she takes his power)—also includes all the totemic demon forms we shall outline/examine moving forwards. Just as the elite transform the natural world, animals and chattelized workers to suit their class material interests, human workers can reclaim this power of animalistic expression and transformation to move beyond Capitalism; i.e., as the Great Destroyer not just of workers, but of the natural world and everything inside it (no classic reductionism, Marx).

To it, Capitalism is unstable by design; it decays and rapes by design, sexualizing and alienating everything. We challenge that on the Aegis, having our monstrous-feminine revenge, including its violent, terrifying sex and shapes forcing capital's hand, in the bargain; i.e., it can't compete with our labor if we take said labor back from them. They obscure their fetishes as a means of prolonging capital, covering up what translates in feudal language to impostor syndrome haunting the family tree; we expose those in ways that thwart profit and validate us independent of such structures: no assimilation. Instead, the trauma they give us becomes a weapon we give back; i.e., like the Skeksis and Deet, Kagero and the tornado golem, or Victor and the Creature, and many others. Issuing hot discharge/Santorium, only to abscond with their vanity/diminish their capacity to cause harm and leave them with a hot mess to clean up!

For something the state rejects, then, Hell is what they need as a matter of argument; i.e., as something to reject yet claim while rejecting it in a subjugated state of grace. Requiring their students play in it to pimp it, they go into our traps eager and blind, and that is where we get them good (with pussies like steel traps, below). She succ, the green fairy woman clapping back to drink your milkshake, Captain Kirk! "You're terminated, fucker!" But also, so veiny in its tumescent vacillation! A palliative Numinous to impulsively plunge into! Macaroni in a pot!

Call of the Wild, part two: Dark Xenophilia; or, "Far Out, Dude!" Monster-fucking and Magic Girls Helping Foster Dark Radical (Communist) Empathy During Healthy Sex Education (for Children and Young Adults into Adulthood)

"She's not like other girls, Booger!" / "Why, does she have a penis?" [maybe, you stupid creep]

—Harold and Booger, Revenge of the Nerds (1984)

The remainder of this chapter is composed of two parts, each concerned with a particular aspect of totemic demonology as a dark xenophilic means of relating to nature or expressing it in a queer fashion tied to nature; i.e., as being "like a good (or bad, depending on the drugs/trauma) acid trip," permanently altering us by taking us outside Plato's cave; re: Communism's dark radical empathy versus capital's dark radical apathy during good vs bad sex education with monsters: monster-fucking and magical affinity wielded by the traditional and hauntological guardians of nature reclaiming these devices from the guardians of Capitalism, Cartesian thought and profit. It matters because without the Earth as our home, we're ultimately colonizing and destroying the very place (and people, flora and fauna) that make up what we need to live. Men cannot eat gold, or digest what they treat like gold.

(exhibit 52c2: Poltergeist II: the Other Side [1987] pits the same white family against a ghost of colonialism—this time played by Father Kane/the Beast that manages to abject said sins onto Indigenous cultures and Pagan belief systems during a War on Drugs with all the usual double standards/exceptions for the White Man; i.e., Father Kane—an allusion to Cain and Able from the Bible and Beowulf—speaks seemingly to Mormonism, the Jehovah's Witnesses and other "radical's racial" forms of Puritanism [an American religion; re: the Mayflower Puritans]. Except, the movie treats the false preacher as a witch-in-preacher's clothing [an inversion of Matthew Lewis' Monk subterfuge]: an infiltrator of the normal American family's home, drawn to their Christ-like child's "pure spirit" as something to forcefully invade/rape [who would die in real life in 1988 from cardiac arrest caused by septic shock due to a congenital birth defect of the intestines. By comparison, the actor playing Kane was already dying of cancer when the film was shot—diagnosed in 1983 with stomach cancer and dying in 1985 before shooting was finished].

To survive, the white family find "common ground" with a Native American; i.e., the latter who basically serves as White Man's Yoda during Red Skin, White Masks. It's very appropriative, turning the Indigenous character into "the help" and the false preacher into a witch to whitewash Puritanism, and speaking through mysticism, drug use and vision quests that apologize for the Protestant ethic and Manifest Destiny as a whole. It's horrid, but the monster is the best part of the movie; i.e., doubling for Vampire Capitalism's dead labor feeding on living labor to turn the little girl into an old man without getting physically bigger—it's frankly great!)

But also, we desperately need to shy away from cultural appropriation and nuclear superiority (above) by treating drug use and Indigenous cultures not simply as things to imbibe during Capitalist Realism—i.e., as upheld by the process, which furthers abjection when chasing the usual dragons of the counterfeit; re: Poltergeist II's continuation of Spielberg's tokenized run, crystallizing Capitalist Realism under a Protestant ethic (with Giger being hired to design the Freudian reverse-Genesis scene because of course he fucking was)—but to consume in ways that see beyond said Realism, and in ways demonstrably conducive to Gothic-Communist development: by reversing said abjection through the same surreal pathways conjuring up relationships of power that are friendly to us and those we summon; e.g., Puff the magic dragon (from 1978, below) someone to befriend in more ways than one (often through regressive states of mind under the influence of excited emotions and drugs)...

Such heroic/monstrous things "of the gods" are haunted by drug abuse tied to war trauma, Paganism (mysticism/shamanism) and child abuse/disassociation and imaginary friends, which we won't have time to explore, save by expressing a desire to use drugs (and sex, monsters) as a responsible conduit of acclimating children to the Gothic; i.e., as sex education that, in the wrong hands, easily becomes fear-and-dogma propaganda that rapes nature (and those of it) all over again, thus alienates/fetishizes workers in all the usual ways from an early age: leading to the above criminogenic factors.

*Note: I'm also not a habitual drug-user but have dated my fair share (e.g., Jadis used to drink, Cuwu smoked weed like a chimney and Bay's a wizard when it comes to that shit). I've also studied the British Romantics and similar poets/artists, who happily abused drugs (e.g., Blake, Coleridge, Rimbaud and Jim Morrison, who we'll look at here), as well as anti-war art either implied (re: Walpole's Capitalocene) or overt (re: Goya) during Gothic surrealism; i.e., informed by ancient-to-medieval drug users, such as Ovid and Shakespeare. We'll only have time to briefly outline them, here, and I'll be sticking to more prominent examples to save time. —Perse*

- Part one: "Monster-Fucking and Furry Panic, from Ace to Ass": Delves further into undead qualities of natural monsters, expressing "monster-fucking" and dark xenophilia as a potentially ace-yet-pornographic form of sex-positive education: featuring lycans, chimeras, and sentient animals to cope with trauma that is often something to live with; i.e., furry panic; e.g., Dario Argento's "Pelts" (2006), Erika Eleniak from Under Siege (1989), Sonic the Hedgehog (1991) and Pippi Longstocking.

(artist: TMFD)

- Part two: "Follow the White-to-Black Rabbit"; or Magic, Drugs and Acid Communism" (feat. the Monstrous-Feminine of Magic Girls, Unicorns and Xenomorphs): Applies the same dark xenophilic logic to explore sex(-positive) education (from children to adults) through demons and acid Communism; i.e., spells and drugs, featuring the transformative monstrous-feminine of magic girls, unicorns and xenomorphs; e.g., Sailor Moon, The Last Unicorn, Nimona and Alien (among others). A witch is a witch, but which witch will you be? We'll consider this question, too, vis-à-vis GNC ideologies from an ideological and morphological standpoint; re: "the trans, intersex and non-binary mode of being" as tied to older dead cultures and andro/gynodiversity in Gothic art, before closing things out with an exploration of radical drug use and revolution per Mark Fisher's acid Communism inside capitalist hauntologies (which then segues into the rebirth of the Communist mind in dead capitalist retro-future spaces, figuratively the shopping mall of the zombie apocalypse).

"Good sex education through monster sex and drugs?" you say? Fret not; we'll unpack things during this opening before diving in, but will be conversational as we go—i.e., covering a wide swath of patchwork elements; e.g., Once Upon a Time in Hollywood, The Matrix, The Life and Death of Peoples Temple, etc; i.e., with a central theme of dark empathy amid theatres of trauma and rejection, tying everything together as a matter of performance.

Note: When discussing Jonestown, we will be showing footage stills from the 2006 Life and Death documentary, which contains images of actual dead people. —Perse

So while "monster-fucking" is the mutually consensual act of fucking monsters of any type, part one frankly considers monster-fucking as an erotic enterprise; i.e., happening through totemic demons like lycanthropes (aka furies), chimeras and sentient animals, but also magical spirits like fairies that exist in relation to nature, sexuality and gender expression as fundamentally queer (we'll explore their ace side in Volume Three). Communism is queer because its radical empathy challenges heteronormativity thus Patriarchal Capitalism's established order through anisotropic drug use (and sex/ancient theatre emulating drug use).

Queerness, though not inherently pornographic, tends to be closer to sexuality (re: Reznor); i.e., as something that is openly expressed without shame, thus liberated from heteronormativity's rigid, colonial binary and the state's abject treatment of gender and sex: outside of state-ordained marriage, hence its valorizing of war/rape and the sexually dimorphic gender roles associated with these interlinked activities' reactive abuse. In particular, part one will explore furies as a criminalized class of natural demons living under the status quo; i.e., inside its usual states of exception, which drug use exposes; re: furry panic and those who suffer under/escape from its exploitation all the time (as theatre nerds do, on and offstage, in weirdly iconoclastic nerdy acts of such things versus their canonical doubles)!

In doing so, we'll be touching on the state's deliberate tendency to associate its own victims "of nature" with hard drugs and sex abuse/work, mid-DARVO, which we disassociate from trauma with drugs as having a 1-to-1 comparison: hard drugs means hard emotions tied to hard trauma and time, etc; e.g., like Nic Cage chasing a bigger and bigger high in Mandy after his wife is killed by the biker cult (re: "Mandy, Homophobia and the Problem of Futile Revenge," 2024); i.e., echoes of middle-class pearl-clutching from Wes Craven's Last House on the Left (1972) and Charlie Manson's warping of the Beatles' "Helter Skelter" (1968), themselves being a fascist inversion of revolutionary action—one whose apathy during class war punches up in admittedly cult-like, thus predatory ways: turning to cults, drugs and orderly prison-like places of concealment to escape capital's usual systems of inequity and harm. People don't join cults to get raped; they do so to escape rape and rape finds them afterwards, far away from home (re: "Magic Man")!

In short, we're abused in situations where drug use is criminogenic, and turn to drugs (or poetry as drug-like) in ways that romantically and cryptonymically subvert our own harm during acid Communism; i.e., as a forever process of chasing our own tails, thus seeking a way out of Capitalist Realism while, in the same breath, chasing our collective generational trauma (and sexual predators) down, solo or as a pack: the revenge of the abused—already gaslit and infantilized by their abusers' army of enablers keeping up appearances—cutting the abuser off from future prey inside a particular hunting grounds dancing with monsters.

This larger cryptomimetic process occupies the usual half-real, dialectical-material gradient. The Radcliffean children from It or Stranger Things, for example, have a signature revival of neo-conservative elements, but also Tarantino's (surprise, surprise) Hollywood whitewash romancing of the usual white sexist men/spaghetti-Western Orientalism—the latter doing so not only to demonize Bruce Lee while celebrating Brad Pitt (the former a relatively privileged Asian actor who fought for worker rights in Hollywood/taught martial arts to people outside his own ethnic group, the latter a gentrified leading white man for Tarantino since Basterds), but also to attack Free Love as, fair enough, not totally without need of criticism; re: its selling out from positions of relative privilege (re: Tom Taylor's "Steely Dan vs John Lennon" but also Jim Morrison, the latter who we'll examine more in part two), as well as discount its own predation on vulnerable parties while recruiting from/slumming drugs and sex to expand their own spheres of influence, onstage and off.

To it, white moderacy apologizes for systemic rape by scapegoating criminogenic elements, which is what fascism and Communism are; i.e., recipients of American kayfabe's moral superiority/panic sweeping its own complicit, guilty role in genocide: through centrist violence/persecution mania presenting and preserving the very side that enjoys such benefits to begin with, then going on to abject real-life examples by cryptonymically replicating them.

Tarantino, then, was and is a rape apologist who other rape apologists apologized for while ranking rape themselves (re: Ebert, "Summoning the Whore"). Rape apologia more broadly attempts to separate the art from the artist, or vice versa; e.g., people cried for Sharon Tate—the kept Madonna of child rapist Roman Polanski (re: Dreading), and who didn't deserve to get murdered—while she and they ignored the class character of these crimes before Tate's preventable death; i.e., capital causes rape by design because its divisions feed off rape as something to perpetuate into fiction as a gaslight/whitewash during the cryptonymy process furthering abjection; re: Polanski making a meal out of Tate's death with his own X-rated Macbeth (1971) carrying the idiot's tale into fiction, followed by Jane Fonda's onscreen death in Chinatown (1974) likewise being a film that self-reports—one where the guilty investigate themselves by proxy: "She should have died hereafter"! Cops defend capital and present themselves as "of the people," but they're not; they cannibalize them from centrist veneers/rape pastiche.

To it, innocence is the first casualty of rape, but it is not the last and doesn't die with one set/cycle of victims; it cryptomimetically goes on and on, the proof in the pudding! So while a whitewash is a whitewash, Polanski used Nicholson (a famous Hollywood womanizer) to whitewash his own abuse, onscreen and off (re: his 1973 rape of Samantha Geimer happening at Nicholson's own house before the two men even made Chinatown); i.e., both men were the Pygmalion molding an underage Galatea into their dutiful apologist through a Radcliffean whitewash (the cops essentially investigating themselves). They suck, and however petty it is to root for Ozymandias buying the farm, I happily await their imminent deaths (Nicholson is 87 and Polanski is 91); i.e., I'll drag both your shriveled pathetic corpses like Mussolini in the streets! You both suck and deserve nothing short of total exposure!

And while there's a general power imbalance that needs to be recognized, here, the moment a victim shields a victimizer from criticism and consequence (or partakes of rape, themselves, through "prison sex" rituals), they become complicit, too; re: Polanski was a Holocaust survivor (source: "Mateusz Szczepaniak's "How Roman Polanski Hid during the Holocaust," 2019); i.e., in a larger system that has protected powerful men like him through their own victims since Black Penitents and the Middle Ages into second wave feminism, Zionism and similar tokenized betrayals.

I'd say to these jackals, "shame on you," but such women think they're the only victims in the world (as do the man they're protecting/exploiting for his power as angels of mercy circling a corpse). They suck, and being victims of rape doesn't make you exempt from raping others by enabling your rapist boss (the allure of the Manson gang being a devilish wish fulfillment where the rich are eaten by proxy revenge): these are not gods, but boy do they sure act like it! Security trumps long-term wellness, for such cops, and the worst offenders of rape apologia are white women policing the whore for the pimp. Witch cops! Traitors! I hope you never know a moment's rest, the lot of you! A pox on you to rival Metallica's (admittedly awesome) "Creeping Death" (1984)! "So let it be written, so let it be done! Let my people go!" you vultures! The pharaohs had nothing on TERFs and the bourgeoisie; e.g., not just Tilda Swinton—the androgynous muse of gay postpunk, Derek Jarman—but Eva Greene, below, sullyng her own memory by protecting the old rapey grandpa. Gross!

(source: Sky News' "Roman Polanski sex assault victim Samantha Geimer urges judge to end 40-year case," 2017)

That's the smoke and mirrors of showbiz selling itself as such. Jonestown, by comparison, becomes a place where the oppressed mysteriously went to, and were consequently led astray by a false preacher/missionary (the showbiz of the ancient world surviving out of the medieval under a Protestant ethic); i.e., a self-righteous lothario-in-disguise who preyed on them after those in power had already turned their backs on these same people: the disposed and homeless/housing challenged, who Jim Jones murdered through his infamous murder-suicide pact, in 1978; re: "drinking the Kool-Aid" to play at Socrates (they used cyanide instead of hemlock, but the effect was the same), then calling it "revolution," postmortem, and which the media would paint with a Red-Scare brush. All to demonize a desire for rebellion while apologizing for and continuing state hegemony/abuse afterwards, white/token moderates would lament the cries of the dead: "Let all the tales of this People's Temple be told." From Lewis' Bleeding Nun to said gospel of corpses, they reach forwards to speak of the hypnotic and seductive modes of discourse that push-pulled them together and apart. They united seemingly together but, at the same time, were alienated and frightened in their final hours on Earth.

And that includes the cries of their dead and dying (source: Jonestown: The Life and Death of People's Temple, 2006; timestamp: 1:14:50). Why might they have gone to the ends of the Earth/fallen victim to a white conman who preyed on the weak and vulnerable; e.g., women and people of color as political radicals having offshot and held over from the Free Love/Civil Rights period, driven to seclusion and suicide after Vietnam as a matter of predation in South America as the usual frontier for such things? Bear in mind, they killed the children first so the adults would follow without storming the gunmen. Shit's heavy.

And their dying screams will haunt you, but you should listen to them, anyways, because one day if we do not, our cries will mirror theirs when Elon Musk marches us off to the camps. Capital cannibalizes through tiered revenge arguments; i.e., those closer to the fires helping burn nature to ashes to warm the bourgeoisie: by scrambling to first avoid it, and then give into the purifying blaze after they've betrayed their friends. One of the worst casualties of abuse is questioning empathy—my own empathy something I question during the gaslight as stuck inside me; i.e., why was I not more like those raping me; re: put into a position of self-harm, we rape our own minds: "suffer the little children unto me!"

I don't normally show actual corpses in my own work, but for witnessing and understanding their trauma and struggle to be heard, I will make an exception: "Remember that you have to die!" So learn from the dead to prevent what they were fighting against, to start with. Let it become a thing of the past to learn from; i.e., unburied testimonies that more cowardly and apathetic souls will scapegoat others to avoid gazing upon (the Medusa): comorbid or congenital, the results of capital are always the same! This is not unusual, but an everyday event that—even in small fragments thereof—threatens to drive us mad, mid-rapture. The mind, to protect itself, will shut out the killing fields' unburied dead; so does Capitalist Realism do the same to pervert its laborers until they are chosen to die. To survive, we must operate unintuitively through emergent observation, the dead exacting a heavy toll that, for me, gives me strength to help those harmed from any crusade, children's or otherwise! Empathy for/as the alien is our superpower! And I draw strength from the wretched:

So why did Jonestown happen? Because capital and its rape apologia, which is something I investigate through a palliative Numinous that doesn't preclude madness and pain. To empathize is to feel pain; i.e., with the world as slowly dying en masse. The fact remains, women (and other vulnerable groups) historically-materially sleep with powerful men to survive (for food, shelter and cash, but also positions of power over other women and marginalized groups; re: Carter). Jones merely capitalized on it to deify himself as a Second Coming.

Except, those with more privilege inside a prison will blame the whore for sleeping with the suspicious individuals—as if the women themselves didn't know what they were doing! While repressed guilt and awareness do happen, survival is generally a Faustian bargain where you consciously have no other options. Indeed, it's a circuitous blame game—one where centrism and its moral teams/failings selectively employ DARVO obscurantism to hide the fact that America was, and has always been, a settler colony/police state. Under it, rapists can only fail up (re: canceling is a myth), women more prone to fight exposure because they've betrayed their fellow oppressed during spurious rape allegations (re: Federici). Such is the Holocaust as simply being profit at work on multiple registers.

So while assimilation is poor stewardship, rape is the opposite of stewardship; i.e., which, under historical-material cycles of reactive abuse, those who seem good/call themselves good to avoid criticism seldom are, and those who seem oppressed can be oppressed and still prey on others (the church of so-called "law and order" being its own mind prison/menticide factory on which to feast on workers, as cops do, above): the false Morpheus or Hades less kidnapping Persephone, outright, and more installing a neon-lit "Come and Get It" sign during perfidious sanctuary (re: Lewis' cabin in the woods, but those bandits among the refugees targeting the poor instead of the well-to-do, the former easier to abuse).

So while all monsters are made by capital the system's historical-material divisions/fractal recursion, the whole point of acid Communism is to reclaim such devices for development demasking cops—including token cops and charlatans—as class, culture and race traitors poisoning the well (rape as a terror weapon, but also monsters and drugs; e.g., the lycanthrope as a sexual deviant). Empathy doesn't preclude persecution turned on its head, but we must challenge profit or suffer the consequences like those at Jonestown. Tarantino and Green "cry" for them daily!

Even so, the fact remains that we practicing witches (and similar marginalized groups on intersectional rungs of mistreatment) can't get close to nature without broaching to what made it alien and furious to begin with: drugs, but also paradoxically places of play installed for drug use and regressively Paganized sex during ludo-Gothic BDSM investigating our abusers acting in bad faith; i.e., where no obvious trauma currently is, but cryptonymically serves up a kind of "dead supper" to where trauma previously was—meaning in a chronotopic, fourth-dimensional and trippy/phantasmagorical sense: riding out nightmares like a witch on her broom, communing with the Great Mother (someone furious, who we love and feel a great sadness for when she is raped by the colonizer); e.g., myself and Bay communing across vast gulfs of space-time to find empathy and connection while battling for the fate of the planet through rape victims' uncovered testimony married to our own! Consider this our take on Tchaikovsky's already super-gay and drug-infused "Dance of the Sugarplum Fairy" (1892) cracking deez nuts!

Anyone who apologizes for rape—any rape at all—is a bigot/cop raping an Omelas child; anyone who clutches their pearls at reading The Monk (and similar veins of exposure) is also a cop, thus a rapist by proxy apologizing for said rape (re: Coleridge)! Puritans gonna Puritan, the pilgrims/pioneers of an endless holocaust we must escape nerdily through sex, drugs and rock 'n roll's transformative frontier jouissance during persecution mania and subterfuge!

The Wisdom of the Ancients, then, is always of a space of play hauntologized for "ancient" animal theatre; i.e., with medieval and intersectional persecution language to escape capital by camping its canon; e.g., Link and the Triforce, chasing the whore (the Twilight Princess, below) and using Zelda as a beard to a frankly much-more-fun imp, Midna (and her oscillating betwixt transient and final forms for which no ideal version exists). Cryptonymy is dualistic, hence goes both ways: communicating through the paradox of escape haunted by shadows of rape, alienation and fetishized sacrifice (surrender) giving us power in the real world: "She tall! She thicc!"

To it, the idea walks as much a tightrope between predator/prey half-real media between or of two (or more) worlds, but also addiction (of sex, music, theatre and/or drugs); i.e., as something to foster/speak to in animalized forms of danger and delight: we don't owe our captors squat, and can make the illustration of mutual consent during praxial synthesis supplying an addictive hermeneutic that engenders good education as dialogic; i.e., when addressing overtly chemical addiction versus porn and social addiction (towards power), these being the dialectic of shelter and the alien's carrot-and-stick as dangled in front of us by white moderates as much as reactionaries; re: Malcolm X's wolf much less concerned with appearing good than foxes (centrists) do, and both reactionaries and moderates being just as hungry in their shared voracious weaponization of cryptonymy—always of such things abused against workers "of nature" within the colonial binary's various exceptions and double standards!

Camping that absolutely matters, and it happens where canon does; i.e., during holistic liminal expression anisotropically reversing terror/counterterror to empower workers during dialectical-material struggle invested in such things: we're the avatar who can be for capital or not using the same basic aesthetics of power and death, hero and whore, rape and "rape" (above)!

That's part one, in a nutshell and unpacked; part two explores some of the "magic girl" personas attached to natural demons/acid Communism, but also the trauma they face as queer educators working with policed materials; i.e., canonical magic, music, sex and drugs that transform those who are queer into increasingly suitable forms of sacrifice that capital can/will market and sell; re: antagonizing nature as monstrous-feminine by putting it (and its bio-power) cheaply to work through prostitute/pimp refrains (where the best revenge is the whore subverting the pimp's dreams, mid-paradox-of-terror and -rape)!

To be clear in my intention, the "magic" class obviously includes a panoply of male, female, and intersex wizards and witches of various genders and anthropomorphism—all interacting with nature through a wide performative array of fantastical beings, playful roles and illicit substances: fairies, furies, and unicorns as nature-oriented, magical forms of genderqueer "perpetual bachelor/spinster" expression per Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism; but also the undead-occult variants enraged by or suffering from colonial traumas. There's just no conceivable way to list them all (or their revolutionary chatter), requiring some degree of generalization (thus abstraction) to talk about two warring hyperobjects; re: Capitalism and Communism chasing a dualistic Numinous while ranking rape (what Bacon, Descartes and their cartography divided between Nature vs Society as a means of conquering the former by the latter and calling it "progress").

The state is straight, nature a queer whore for it to pimp, and one whose pimping we must camp (during the whore's dark revenge); i.e., to thrive and survive on such staged (cryptonymic) artificial wilderness, from Matthew Lewis onwards! Behold the sweet, sweaty terror of a false Madonna exposing the state as inhumane: mighty Alruna's Venus fly-snatch, loaded with honey to catch prey to play with and eat for different hauntological, animal-masquerade reasons (a "trap" in more ways than one, if you feel me; i.e., bourgeois prey versus proletarian "prey" in the same overarching predation dialogs masking rebellion in animal prostitution)!

On an increasingly darkening path/Promethean Quest subverting the monomyth, then, part two will progress from total innocence, leading into experiences that become increasingly animalized and drug-like. It will begin with the bright, sparkling "magic girl" genre in Sailor Moon (which is centralized in an urban, "city pop" environment). From there, we'll move onto other monstrous-feminine's own dark powers of forbidden love speaking to rape differently than Sailor Moon does—Lady Amalthea's complicated journey as a non-human, shapeshifting animal in The Last Unicorn, before ending on the most transgressive, undead and drug-like of the three sex demons; re: the xenomorph being an Archaic Mother demon lover/killer baby but also a GNC mode of trans(gressive), intersex, and non-binary ancient animal theatre masks, kayfabe, and Amazonomachia mid-courtship/calculated risk during ludo-Gothic BDSM's own frontier revolutionary cryptonymy reversing abjection/profit as an anisotropic rape process (the Sphinx dooming Oedipus Rex)!

In both sections, then, we'll also identify the patriarchal, "orderly" forces that hunt and tame nature's historically female/monstrous-feminine persona; i.e., using colonial, thus prosecutorial violence (re: blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts) through Man Box heroes/tokens who hammer its dark outliers into increasingly acceptable, "useful" forms of submission: pimping the mysterious mother!

To that, we'll consider how

- these hunters demonize the drug-like, transformative effects that beings of or aligned with nature manifest as a kind of "double method": queer representation and sex-positive education. The status quo will repress both through violence by demonizing drug-users and animalized practitioners of magic as chattel/vermin to tame, hunt and kill (thus concentrate and exterminate through tokenized, fish-in-a-barrel farming methods).
- the hunted components of nature and how they—including their injured, angry and black, undead-supernatural variants like the xenomorph, but also more strictly organic and animalistic demons like the furry as equally stigmatized—must be reclaimed and subverted from the tamers of nature (token or not); i.e., to restore our holistic bond with nature, moving forward.

Part one will examine the furry as demonized/fetishized by the state; part two, will explore the canonical demonization of queer sex education through natural rituals and magic-/drug-themed heroes; re: ranging from the magic girls previously mentioned—witches and the unicorn, but also the xenomorph as hunted and killed by the status quo's idea of virgin/whore nature: a subservient, purified "natural" order whipped into shape by weird canonical nerds chasing darkness.

Revolution isn't clean, then, but a spectacular mess. Chaos, as something to subsequently define, becomes bottled up, twisted by agony during a naturalized process—that of violence during the Hero's Journey as commodified in defense of the state; it's only released through unironic violence in canonical forms, and subverted during empathetic rituals—of workers bound up with nature through humanizing procedures of social acceptance and love (sex)—in iconoclastic forms hugging or fucking the alien: a wild animal cannot be tamed in captivity/crossing into civilized life out of the jungle, but merely fetishized as wild in ways that speak as much to liberation and exploitation from a young age onwards! My heart was always young and free, thus goes out to the whores of the world. Born slutty! Represent!

To that, we'll also examine the gradual push towards eroticism (e.g., above); i.e., through children's literature as linked to animal signifiers of virtue and vice (children's books* often featuring an anthropomorphic, talkative animal with access to magic powers; e.g., Mother Goose, exhibit 56a) that become increasingly erotic, but also Gothically ace/publicly nudist interrogations of power and trauma as children age. So as fandoms "grow up" alongside material written around them, they gradually experience exposure to rape, abuse and death as it presents to them, in the natural-material world; i.e., as a dark radicalism and empathy to cryptonymically chase the usual hard stuff through acid Communism, on the Aegis. Such is our revenge; i.e., when we become fluent in the art of cryptonymy's shadow war with such demons: on the surface of the image and inside its dualistic thresholds, remediating praxis!

To it, such monkey business can be deliberately introduced back into the wild while in captivity for those exposed to such things; i.e., unto children curious about what many are actually currently living through, thus helping them acclimate to the natural side of the struggle against the state: without feeling hopeless/turning to harmful sex and drug use (though acid Communism doesn't preclude sex and drug use at large) but also Paganized aesthetics and therapy animals (re: a hauntological "Rite of Spring") while riding the proverbial lightning in whatever forms we want those "thunderbolts" to take (e.g., Smaug's boast): a death sentence for indulging in what is forbidden, doing so in ways that free the bridled through a recultivating of the Superstructure as a matter of dark empathy with ludo-Gothic BDSM go-tos! Vice characters dug up and played with like animal bones to rock and roll!

So do we pull a Peter Gabriel and "shock the monkey"; i.e., to subvert Pygmalion's Pavlovian conditionings and dogma—said socio-material structure blossoming phallically (or whatever it's called that mushrooms do) into our aforementioned Alruna avenger (spectres of the Medusa having the whore's revenge in BDSM forms of exchange and transformation)! Capital is dead labor feeding on living labor in ways we exchange/transform and feed vis-à-vis trauma to escape through poetic cryptonymy paradoxically concealing/exposing through a dialectic of the alien friendly to said alien. Now the shoe's on the other foot!

This being said, it's a work-in-progress under constant changing factors while flying "straight on till morning" to Never, Neverland (a balancing act)! You're close and you wanna race to the finish (towards Communism), but also don't want to ejaculate prematurely. You wanna finish strong and give the Dark Queen you're topping a nice big cum tribute (the paradox of sex being you want it to last but marathons/the drug high/furry suit and sex brain chemicals [e.g., Macbeth tripping on his own guilt towards the path to killing King Duncan; re: "O fatal vision"] overstaying their welcome)! Obscuring fetishes under high-control systems doesn't negate the rebellion taking place; we just want to make it uncontrolled in its "ancient" subterfuge" toking on the "fire of the gods," during a shared and at times unreliable pedagogy of the oppressed healing freakily (as the theatre nerd does) from rape as a shadow of itself, of itself, of itself...

A few extra exhibits (for fun) before we proceed onto part one!

Regarding children's books, the same idea applies to cartoons; e.g., Bugs Bunny and company being increasingly sexualized in ways that actually predate the character (the animals in Bambi featuring a tremendous amount of heteronormative sexualizing in a coming-of-age story); but also furry art as predominantly* cartoonish, as well as various fantastical BDSM scenarios that invite cartoonish forms of "Pavlovian" subversion. We won't have time to go into all of these, here; but I wanted to give a good few examples before proceeding onto part one. —Perse

There's often a satirical element to radical empathy and theatre; e.g., Bugs Bunny and drag go hand-in-hand [seducing the hunter] and have for over eighty years [with men being historically allowed to cross-dress for the status quo during theatre since ancient times, whereas women could not; i.e., Loony Toons' numerous allusions to Shakespeare, and classical music, which extends to demonic/"Satanic" poetics]. However, the rabbit is also an ancient symbol of fertility that maintains its erotic Paganized function well into the present space and time: the hares of March making Caesar and his Ides anxious.

This being said, the revival and persistence of this Paganized imagery is generally policed within modular and tokenized double standards; i.e., that furiously treat sexuality and strength as wholly discrete, yet animalized all the same. Just as the virgin and the whore archetypes are segregated to control both female and monstrous-feminine bodies, the myth of the rabbit woman becomes that of a smart-and-sexy or sexy-and-strong straight woman/token Sapphic worshipping Marston and Beauvoir [the Amazon] dressed up in anthropomorphic language [which can also apply to feminized AMAB persons and GNC individuals at large]. Yet, the debate also argues for sexiness as a virtue of animal strength unto itself: that sexiness and strength are not mutually exclusive and that it is possible to depict an animal's body [female or not] as "strong" through its sexiness or least public nudism; i.e., as an animalistic expression of its athleticism and vice versa being not in conflict, but holistic coordination tying to ancient Greeco-Roman ideas of nude anthropomorphic bodies competing for godly favors [the wish fulfillment of a Promethean neoliberal aping the Ancients' giving of fame and fortune, thus empty promises of immortality for all but the smallest of select special earners; e.g., Space Jam's tokenized athletes, including Michael Jordan]!

Such Omelas debates and their poetry are regularly conducted in relation to popular media as something to sell to children by corporations. Through canon, the elite teach customers how to perform and identify in standardized ways geared towards corporate profit, while also giving future artists the means to rebel against capital with reclaimed language. As nature-themed symbols of eroticism, anthropomorphic rabbits and their nudism become a profound means of genderqueer empowerment for the iconoclast; i.e., as something to subvert heteronormative gender roles and sexuality with in ways that resist worker exploitation: a rabbit to chase. The uniform and the "rabbit" inside it aren't "just for men" as the universal clientele, to which "sexy" becomes entirely relative, thus decided as much by the artist creating their own representations thereof. We give and receive as ring-bearers "sharing the load" [versus carrying it alone; e.g., Lois Lowry's god-awful 1993 The Giver little more than Red-Scare screed kicking Socialism while it was down!]

(exhibit 51d1: Artist: Bassenji. Trauma and resistance to abusive power are commonly conveyed in animalistic expressions of anthropomorphic BDSM [and demonic power exchange] that just as quickly yield trans, non-binary and intersex sentiment and identity through a struggle to self-express by these policed means. In doing so, these groups become monster-fuckers in the eyes of those demonizing them; i.e., by using or encouraging state violence during moral panics against so-called "groomers.")

Except under these xenophobic conditions, power isn't exclusive to the elite. Instead, state power becomes something to resist by reclaiming our own xenophilic sense of autonomy through demonic poetics as essential to proletarian praxis; i.e., the ludo-Gothic BDSM umbrella extending to a kingdom of anthropomorphized BDSM, kink and transgression: as didactic fantasies to realize with responsible, caring parties. Such parties include the infamous theatrical humiliation of orgasm denial, dick-shaming and -worship, cock-and-ball torture/cock cages, humans dolls, fur suits you can't put on or remove yourself [similar to a lady's corset] and various forms of chattelized play emblematic to BDSM, such as age play or pony/puppy play with "parental" elements [daddy/mommy doms] and so on and so forth!

In fact, the number of ways one can play in BDSM is so myriad, endless and complex that I could easily write an entire book on one type alone, let alone try to catalog all of them [with my own bias leaning towards mommy doms/Amazons, Gothic castles/Metroidvania and the Numinous having power over me, for example: exhibit 51d2, below]! To seek power is to seek arrangements of power to perform; i.e., with other people, ours using animalized warriors to abjure fascism [with Nazis furies being a thing sadly].

Through such iconoclastic countermeasures, we workers can illustrate mutual consent through the establishing of trust via negotiated, ironic power exchange; i.e., in pointedly sex-positive monster-fucking exhibits that showcase intersex persons as a lived, physical reality and trans and cis people working with disempowerment as both ironic to them, but also supplied by animal "gods" that project our audience backwards: to a reimagined, xenophilic Antiquity the likes of Ancient Egypt minus the pharaohs. Wherever we go, it becomes an Other Place where the animalized GNC peoples speaking to it dare to suggest its arrival on Earth; i.e., through performative dreams and drug-like theatres breaking Capitalist Realism as a liminal matter of seeing the Medusa as human: a mighty being that wouldn't have been abject at all, but loved, worshipped and bowed before by their legions of adoring fans [or at least people who don't want to impound and euthanize us]! A world without sin, thus profit and rape! One can dream!

In turn, the fluid gender performances that transpire during these rituals are divorced from heteronormative standards; i.e., becoming something to play with, not around, by queer agents and straights allies accommodating the needs of both parties, mid-performance. Ideally the chaser doesn't harm the chased, even during instances of negotiated humiliation and cathartic objectification/CNC, etc—doing so to allow the cis person to enjoy the fantasy of fucking a queer monster like a doll/fetish without actually dehumanizing them, because negotiation prevents that by design: by decreasing the risk of harm.)

Fantastical gender roles and play during ludo-Gothic BDSM can oscillate between what is classically expected as something to subvert. For example, the female knight is often assigned animalistic qualities that can just as easily be expressed through sheer height, brawn or equipment, but also social positions;

e.g., Urbosa from 2017's Breath of the Wild [bottom-middle/right] as a "big sister" deflowering cliché [the "incest" trope] that more broadly translates to a protector archetype that reverses the role of protector and ward, but can be reversed again while keeping the Amazonian aesthetic for fun!

For example, Link tops the formidable-looking Urbosa as someone to "tame" in the classical scheme of "conquering Hippolyta," including her "death by Snu-Snu," albeit with the added irony of a blushing and, physically diminutive and femme male top who is being "steered" from below by a gentle mommy dom. It strikes a good balance between feeling wrong and right in ways that—upon closer examination—fall on the side of right; i.e., during dialectical-material scrutiny and context: "rape" isn't rape during ludo-Gothic BDSM any more than doggystyle is bestiality [though sodomy laws will treat it as such—meaning in more Puritanical forms of guilty pleasure and wish fulfillment double standards that capital always decays towards, which we'll examine more in Volume Three]!

artist: [Oda Non]

So does the wearing of mask-like costumes shield us from criticism and give us a cryptonymic means to camp what is policed; re: the uncanny thrill of friend/foe masks, but also the equally ambiguous predator/prey confusions of the calculated-risk Amazon or knight; i.e., making themselves sexy by giving us the ability to play when we feel like we need to: in order to regain control and have fun in times of crisis and confusion! Play = play as something to rely on during crisis; i.e., when synthesizing praxis. Sluttiness and invention aren't a source of shame, here, but dark empathy recultivating old ancient pathways towards dark empathy using the corruption of trauma as something to address and heal with at the same time.

As such, it's both a canonical vice and Communist virtue during the same larger war for territory and value, on the Aegis! So while rape hasn't gone anywhere, we can always camp it to synthesize catharsis and convert capital into a post-scarcity [thus rape] device! We condition such things to become easily enough a second-nature game; e.g., not just Amazons, but pussy pirates camping the canon, the whore coming for your booty [very 1960s slutty Sapphic, below]!

artist: [Mandy Frizzle]

While this irony works easily enough in cis-gendered, Radcliffean fantasies calculating risk for second wave feminists [who would view the kind of nudity on the left as atrocious, because they're SWERFs]—and which promote gender swappings with a binary structure of power—GNC cuties' gender trouble and parody campily expand the realms of play within the same archetypes geared towards intersectional feminism, gender studies and liberated sex work; i.e., as divorced from oppressive binaries and said binaries' compelled rulesets: the crossdressing double standard that prevents women from acting like men in good faith, but also men from behaving like sweet little brides should they earnestly want to. We ration such indulgence as something to give into through selective performance and mating rituals; i.e., as spiced up with "rape" in quotes during ace public nudism just as often [much of ludo-Gothic BDSM is ace, insofar as it focuses on informed labor exchange as a de facto educational device]! The ghost of the counterfeit, then, becomes a furry slut to empathize with, yielding ironically non-violent forms of ghost-hunting in search of the Medusa's mythical mutual consent!

With these restrictions further and further eliminated, male performers can likewise adopt the pale satin, bound-and-gagged bride-under-duress with a physically stronger partner they trust not to harm them during a ritual of exquisite "torture," power exchange, and forbidden knowledge; i.e., as monomorphic according to the "dom/sub" parent dichotomy as something to switch, merge and fiddle with absent of canonical gender trouble and abuse: demons as potentially dominant/submissive, but also knights, tomboys, and palace guards, pillow princesses, etc. All of this can be easily animalized, and indeed would have readily been by the likes of Chaucer during his infamously bawdy and layered Canterbury Tales'; i.e., "The Miller's Tale," in particular, celebrating humans as deliciously animalistic.

Inside increasingly sex-positive iterations, these instructional games of discipline and obedience would be "Pavlovian" in quotes; i.e., minus the threat of actual violence, and meant to reward "good behavior" with "treats" negotiated by both parties in advance, during ludo-Gothic BDSM. As certain animals, but especially dogs, would have been historically conditioned to serve men, "good play" variants made by game-and-intelligent players automatically subvert the historical norms during emergent play while preserving the imagery of a happy groomed dog with its bone [cats and other domesticated animals come with their own clichés, which Volume Zero explores a fair bit].)

itself surprisingly well to any gender [as well as gender swaps and irony]. It can be campy or canonical, embracing the animal as structured accordingly per ludo-Gothic BDSM as a matter of performative context.

For example, a white cis-het man is normally expected to be strong and iron-willed like a ferocious war dog would, but a male puppy can be someone's pet—their guardian and/or small, cute delight to tease, train and reward by a given handler/owner/what-have-you; i.e., "grooming" through the language of permission and denial as instructed through the ritualized wearing of collars and use of animal kennels/cages and chew toys [useful for neurodivergent "stimming"] but also adorable, animalized body language. "Melting" for master into a pile of wiggles and wagging tails is par for the course regardless of the performers' genders, and anthropomorphizing a human subject means supplying them with animalistic qualities that can be ethically sexualized. In other words, they have a humane, descriptively sexual application; i.e., one conducive to liberation as avoiding exploitation while walking the tightrope: to show us how to pull off such gimmicks and not harm ourselves/others, humanizing the harvest!

As our thesis volume argues, animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp; e.g., Odessa Stone from Overwatch 2 [with Sojourn, on her knees, next page] as a "war boss" with a kayfabe rival; i.e., whose "queen bitch" status is undermined by fairly standard bedroom reversals [out of the public eye, except our cryptonymy shows the hidden escapades unfolding through transparent places of voyeuristic concealment]: the black soldier putting down her mantle to play in ways normally denied to both of them, literally swallowing her enemy's pride!

Keeping with ludo-Gothic BDSM, the two sworn enemies playing together can be made campy again, and in ways more inclusive than the palimpsest movies were; i.e., through play as a form of study in its ludo-Gothic BDSM interpretations during creation, critique and consumption—with us making the ghosts of Mel Gibson and Tina Turner gayer than either historically was [more on this in Volume Three]!

With Amazons or knights as soldiers, this classically happens through animal shells bearing various cat-and-dog [antagonistic] value statements to paradoxically quell and tempt audiences with; i.e., in paradoxical turns of phrase; e.g., "be still, my beating heart [or pulsing clit]!"

Whereas the cat, for example, is feminized in ways that are harder to condition but nevertheless ubiquitous, the dog is linked to Pavlovian conditioning through service as "man's best friend." It's very KISS/"Keep It Simple Stupid." These canine linguo-material antics are often historically-materially tied to labor and food production, providing playfully apt metaphors for "work, then reward" that many workers will readily understand: milk as the fruits of their labor as, unto itself, something to fantasize about, thus fetishize; re: Sojourn and Odessa stopping the cops-and-robbers gimmick to lap on particular "bowls of milk" [of paradise]: Odessa's pussy and its cream!

Medieval puns aside, this can be real breast milk, which implies a fatty fertility function to the ritual. At the same time, "milk" during sex games often comes from ironic motherly sources; e.g., a male organ, which lends itself a fair amount of absurdist comedic potential; i.e., being symbolic of "reward" in ways not unlike the vampire's sanguine and sodomy practices [which overlap with anthropomorphic sex with "animals" hyphenating tooth-and-claw with fang-and-mouth poetry performance games]. It also allows doubles of an ancient kayfabe sort—of dueling with dark copies since Antiquity's shadow plays and colosseum into Hamlet and the chronotope of the Neo-Gothic's anti-home bleeding hauntologically into neoliberal '80s action heroes doubling those through corporatized Orientalism; e.g., Brandon Lee essentially fighting an evil, Fu Manchu double of his own real-life father in Rapid Fire's Al Leong the stuntman; i.e., before "Jake" can heroically progress and catch the evil [non-American] drug lord: "Seek power and you shall progress" unfolding among the same shadows to summon and banish; re: that Radcliffe worked with, among so many others, before and after her time in the underworld!

So forget about Star Wars and the monomyth's own endless [and manipulative] cave of shadows; all simulacra reliably translate poetically into/allow for animalistic forms of self-righteous-vs-nihilistic as polar extremes we want to avoid in either case—i.e., Goldilocks Communism that, through the usual operatic highs and lows, can bite, kick, lick and fuck with/from us as needed: inside the danger disco as a liminal, hot-button, backdoor solution for facetious/sarcastic self-critique going a little nuts for fun but also revolution! Work is holy in a dualistic matter of context; i.e., giving us structure as a dialectical-material means of play and distraction, but also voice to cryptonymically fight back with: fostering empathy for the alien as something capital has a vested interest in dehumanizing. Such is our murder ballad, singing before we shuffle off this mortal coil. "The swans, they swim so bonny o!" [Loreena Mckennitt, 1994]. Pain is data to process, ingested as Moore and Patel's "antidote to forgetting."

Furthermore, it's not centrism by our hand, because centrism doesn't monopolize balancing acts, and ours upend the bourgeoisie and their cops-and-victims moral code/power games/stochastic terrorism. The basic idea—of doll-like bondage and discipline within chattel poetics—lends itself to many different animal clichés that can either be parodied or revived through earnest pastiche as doll-like, too. Indeed, the likes of animal transformation and ludo-Gothic BDSM—in relation to magic, sleep-inducing or mind-altering drugs, and power exchange—was something Shakespeare revived from Ovid; i.e., to present a dark, hedonistic critique of royal bondage in A Midsummer Night's Dream:

Come, wait upon him. Lead him to my bower.
The moon, methinks, looks with a wat'ry eye,
And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforcèd chastity.
Tie up my lover's tongue. Bring him silently [source].

This wasn't just any faerie that Bottom was with; it was a queen fae—with Titania gagging him by royal decree while under the influence of the self-same, sleep-inducing drug: love-in-idleness as vampiric but also demonic and closer to nature as royal, thus Numinous. Her commands of enforced silence and chastity constituted a medieval BDSM—its lush, ludo-Gothic animalized theatrics revived upon a Renaissance stage: Paganistic "incarceration" and servitude tied to a train of fairy-like servants reducing Nick, the rude mechanical, to that of an ass for her to play with and dote on. Come give Mommy a hug! "What dreams may come," indeed!)

Dark Xenophilia, part one: Monster-Fucking and Furry Panic, from Ace to Ass (feat. Lycans, Chimeras, and Sentient Animals; e.g., Cuwu, "Pelts," Erika Eleniak, Sonic the Hedgehog and Pippi Longstocking)

Many of the negative stereotypes about the furry fandom were empirically tested and found to be unsubstantiated. When compared to a control group, furries were significantly more likely to have a history of being physically and verbally bullied, a difference particularly prominent during adolescence (61.7% vs. 37.1%). Our studies indicate that 65% of furries say that they have told almost no one in their family about their furry interests, and approximately 70% say that they have told almost no one they see in their day-to-day life (e.g., work). Approximately 60% of furries agreed that they felt prejudice against furries from society, while approximately 40% of furries felt that being a furry was not socially accepted. The more strongly a person identifies as a furry, the more likely they are to feel that they are treated worse by society for being furry (source).

—Fur Science, "What's a Furry?" (2022)

For this subchapter, I want to make some additional "ace to ass" distinctions about totems, chimeras and sentient animals, et al, as a strictly natural class; i.e., before talking about lycan/furry stigmas and so-called "furry/groomer panic" when attempting to reclaim these variables—doing so for purposes of dark/radical xenophilic empathy and vengeful sex-positive education (e.g., Dario Argento's 2006 "Pelts" and Erika Eleniak in Under Siege, but also Sonic the Hedgehog and Pippi Longstocking) when regarding sex and gender in totemic language, in part two: empathy as a "drug" to chase down and take, post-synthesis (and watch reactionaries moral panic/pearl clutch, like with the Green M&M; but also just any form of nature that's out-of-hand insofar as the state determines such things).

(artist: Chorio Actis)

Note: When saying "xenophilia," I am generally using it to refer to a sex-positive discourse unfolding vis-à-vis state abjections of nature; i.e., as something to reverse on and off the same stages, combatting their xenophobia and xoophilia with our love of nature while being part of it, ourselves. Technically these are dualistic, but collocate historically-materially to deliver certain connotations I'm falling back on; i.e., "dark xenophilia" is empathetic towards nature as normally pimped by the state for being alien, whorish, non-nuclear and so on, whereas "xenophobia" and "xoophilia" are things used more by the state during the abjection process. It's ultimately a question of stewardship regarding the reclamation of things by workers from the state; i.e., some things being easier to reclaim than others, technicalities aside; e.g., furries and xenophilia in suitably haunted forms of porn-adjacent language that gives room for ace forms to thrive. Save for an ace-centric exhibit at the end of this section (and the one above), I primarily focus on erotic forms, but still wanted to include and distinguish the social-sexual gradient those belong to! —Perse

First thing's first, this includes the awesome power of friends; e.g., Cuwu, Victoria, and Quinnvincible, who we'll all talk about as suitably awesome people for their friendship as GNC people/furries. But it extends to people who weren't furries, too. Some people are so amazing that meeting them feels sadly too brief—is like a magic spell or arguably hallucinatory opium dream that you want to last forever but doesn't; e.g., Krispy Tofuu someone who rocked my world, furry or not! And yet, while the dream arguably fades, their glory lives on in my heart and work, for as long as those last: "Come and see!" said one of the Four Beasts.

To show the tyrant the endless unburied dead in something other than a field, bird's-eye, is to freeze them in place, the Medusa not a monster to slay but love! Buildings burn, and bodies fester and rot, but the shadows live on, the Gothic written in decay—on the cusp of sexuality penetrating the barrier as something to acclimate towards and occupy between shared excited states; i.e., through the asexuality of choice as something animals don't naturally have, letting people build and cultivate something beyond capital or old natures seeking better stewardship towards all!

As stated, part two will extend this education through magic girls—Sailor Scouts and the solar system, but other forms closer to home, which children are introduced to, then explore later on as sexually-maturing teenagers growing into adulthood: unicorns and other forms of magic/drug reclamation and sex education tied to the natural world; re: as policed, becoming infused with trauma, begetting liminal composites/chimeras like the xenomorph.

To it, eco-fascism is a problem, as well (as we'll explore in Volume Three), meaning that oppositional synthesis regularly yields different groups identifying with/around nature as something to fortify for the state or for workers. We're going to explore the basic idea of furry panic, here—meaning as tied to Cartesian thought at large, thus how to think about in ways that humanize monsters "of nature" the state and its proponents traditionally dehumanize, thus brutalize for profit as pimps thereof getting even with "bad" whores; i.e., neglect, ignorance and/or distance; e.g., Turkey Tom's 2023 (extremely problematic) "Degenerate"⁴⁶³ series on Bronies and Five Nights at Freddy's ghost of the counterfeit, or Lily Orchard's pedophile escapades, hidden behind sexualized Brony fan fiction (Essence of Thought, 2021).

Unlike the demons we've examined thus far in this module, totems et al are not undead or occult by default. While manmade trauma can certainly be included (see: chimeras, below), these animal-themed egregores are essentially living creatures. This means they don't tend to seek out humans for their essence (though they do sometimes eat, maul or stab them), nor are they strictly summoned from a supernatural world beyond Earth and its ecosystems. Instead, they inhabit an Earth-like area or range as part of its "sample of one," often echoing qualities of Indigenous populations ranging from the Celtic peoples of Great Britain to the Native Peoples of the Americas, Middle East, Asia and elsewhere. Let's unpack each, one by one.

Wherever they hail from, totems tend to be incredibly animalistic and, more to the point, primitively sexual (from a Cartesian standpoint) and wedded to nature; i.e., as beings of nature, including the spirits associated with them as of the forest, lunar cycle and various Pagan rites, etc—all packing power as a choice of various ways that humans as animals can uniquely social-sexually communicate regarding the liberatory paradox of nature! Contrary to Cartesian thought, we're not just machine's with one purpose, nor beasts of burden serving an ancient-to-modern fulfillment of that aim; i.e., to yoke and privatize for profit (sex or otherwise). Neither is any animal treated as such, human or not! Liberation is a holistic, cross-species affair! Our stewardship is total, looking out for animals as unable to deal with human treachery like humans can!

So do furies walk the edge, speaking to simultaneous alienation and fetishization not just of workers under capital, but nature and workers relating back and forth in social-sexual forms that can be sexual, but likewise until then merely advertise sexuality—meaning in ways that don't actualize as sexual until both parties agree; i.e., ludo-Gothic BDSM as tied to a larger worldview making such ⁴⁶³ A Nazi dogwhistle, oddly enough. Turkey Tom is a fucking chud who, like all chuds, passes himself off as the most educated person in the room; i.e., the most correct/least criminal. These knee-jerk distinctions merely reflect the socio-material factors (settler-colonial divisions) at play. The likes of Turkey Tom immediately benefit from a system that turns them into sexual predators and opportunists preying on racial, ethnic and gender minorities, etc, for their own gain. It's sad and gross, and not limited to the likes of Tom; i.e., he's one of many and fails up to punch down.

For example, in genre-specific channels, horror is visited by white centrists who play defense for capital by both-sidesing radical politics on either pole, aka the horseshoe approach; i.e., conflating Communism with fascism, despite them being historically at odds. Kayfabe conflates them in the same post-WW2 shadow zones, and such persons are more likely to defend really awful conservative rapists, too; e.g., Cody Leach defending a recent horror event "graced" by pedophile Kevin Spacey (In Praise of Shadow's "Bad Conservative Horror Movies," 2024; timestamp: 11:31).

stewardship and dark empathy second-nature: according to the usual xenophilia as holistically gradient, hence accounting for all reactions per mutual consent as something to illustrate vis-à-vis the nature world; i.e., as liberated from capital's kennel-like brothels' alienized-and-sexual tout le monde!

"Welcome to slavery"? As if, Quentin Tarantino! We tease a healthier symbiosis walking the necrobiome, our deliciously lost-in-necropolis dream pushing up ass-like "daisies" (or vice versa): towards fresh radiation and—if we actually need it—penetration, too; i.e., as a matter of good BDSM checking and subverting profit as normally and impulsively chasing profit, devil-may-care! But also, such feral pornography can just be appreciated as art, too! Porn is art, and it looks nice! For some, that's more than enough! Freedom and exploitation occupy the same awesome realms:

(artist: Lumidetsu)

Entombed in time without decay! [...]

The world is full of mysteries
That men have never seen before Magik lives in all dynasties
The light of love shines ever more (Manilla Road's "Lost in Necropolis")

In other words, totems are not Western funerary beings by design, tending to be highly physical creatures developed as animals are: in terms of their senses (such as smell or taste)—with mystical shamanistic connections, spiritual projections, and/or hedonism and ritualized access-through-drugs also a possibility but not a given (whose magical associates we'll explore more in part two of this subchapter). If they are magical, their magic comes from the Earth itself and the natural world, not the underworld or spirits associated strictly with the land of the dead or a parallel dimension beyond nature (though this can certainly be a factor when intersecting with other monster modules; re: the xenomorph).

Chimeras are essentially composites, albeit tending to be demonic combinations of different stigma animals instead of undead parts. Chimeras aren't simply common monsters in underworld stories—e.g., Cerberus or Amit—but are combined from the minds of different artists expressing nature in deathly ways. To this, the potential for hybridization lends itself well to compound expression; re: the xenomorph. Giger's chimera/composite was itself several things at once: a dark, "ancient" monster but also a perverse brainchild begot from a host of artists, while also surviving inside technology and people as a biomechanical death curse that kills one person at a time. In doing so, it transforms its victims in ways not fully divorced from the white colonizer's perspective: the non-white/trans person as a leftover from the ancient world, thus terrifying during the abjection process.

A large part of the canonical fear being invoked is the xenomorph as a rapacious and parasitoid monster-fucker (or rather, a monster who fucks out of revenge). But colonial guilt and fear of transformation isn't something that strictly must inhabit the ritual. Simply put, monster-fucking is rape play but can focus on sex positivity as restorative expression unto itself—to be enjoyed by not focusing on the xenophobic rapes of yesterday and more on what could be if workers were allowed to be sexual with the same demonic monster language; i.e., dark xenophilia during ludo-Gothic BDSM—with non-human animals unable to consent to sex, but anthromorphs being human entities that don't naturally exist: they're byproducts of technology coming out of oral cultures into written ones, and hauling a great deal of baggage, thus desire for revenge against the state via the usual routes of challenging profit/anti-predation speaking for itself ("Who's a good puppy slut? You are!").

Who might they fuck, given the choice? What hellish forms might they take, themselves? In short, just about whatever you can imagine! As long as it's mutually consensual, then no harm, no foul; i.e., no children, non-sentient animals or dead bodies (none of which can consent to sexual activities, or BDSM at large). Monster sex, then, is commonly animalized, and just as empathetic for it in drug-like magical ways during dark xenophilia (with drugs also being a potent aphrodisiac):

(exhibit 52d: Model and artist: Krispy Tofuuu and Persephone van der Waard. As Krispy and I demonstrate, if you can't get away from monsters, you can at least make ones that won't harm you during sex. Their excessive, alien forms often look scary and dangerous, but in practice are perfectly safe.)

During the dialectic of the alien, non-sentient animals intimate another exploited group: pets, livestock and chattel, that serve as a non-anthropocentric, asexual aspect to nature that humans can bond with; i.e., in regards to seeing the natural world differently by identifying with it under Cartesian duress (called therians, for animals that have and do exist; versus "otherkin"⁴⁶⁴ tying to mythical/extraterrestrial, non-human creatures). As part of this altered perspective, sentient versions of animals do exist in fantasy stories; i.e., those able to magically communicate with humans through a kind of universal language. A common example of the sentient animal include witch's familiars like the talking cats from Sailor Moon, but also enchanted, cognizant animals like the unicorn, Amalthea, from The Last Unicorn. "Sentience" generally denotes an anthropomorphic connection with nature as something to respect and communicate through complicated dramas like the stories we just mentioned. We'll get back to those in part two.

A moment ago, I mentioned accessing lycans, chimeras and sentient animals through magic theatre and/or drugs as metaphor or actual; i.e., the interaction with nature by proxy through rituals, practitioners, spells and mind-altering substances (again, actual or implied⁴⁶⁵) tied to anthropomorphic animals.

For example, ambrosia in Ancient Greek means "immortality." It was denied to mortals, and historically framed by Mary Shelley as "fire of the gods." Biblically denied to Mankind, people become binarized as men and women, its "theft" by the privatizing gods of a Protestant ethic under capital denying any ability to "die" in a "little" way—to transform and live on in ways that not only reshape how people think in rebellious modes of discourse; they live on through the spectral, orgasmic, ⁴⁶⁴ Whereas "kinning" is a deep sense of empathy tied to human or at least humanoid characters/monsters—usually in fiction—otherkin ties to non-human fictional elements.

⁴⁶⁵ A trippy take on Clarke's Law, insofar as advanced technology is indistinguishable from magic, but also "ancient" technology being like drug use and shadow play! Two sides of the same coin!

nightmarish, drug-like attempt itself. They don't have to be literal drugs (though they certainly can be); they just have to transform the mind enough to make a difference against Capitalist Realism; re: like Blake's devilish "acids" did: a figurative deal with the Devil (in the Milton-Byronic Satanic sense).

We'll also unpack this concept more in part two, when we consider various non-Christian pacts with nature, but also composite demons infused with trauma like the xenomorph; i.e., as something natural-material to arrive at through magic, drugs and a queer-inclusive Wisdom of the Ancients' dark xenophilia. For now, just remember that magic and drugs are historically criminalized to exploit various groups demonized differently for the same purpose (rape and profit) under the status quo; i.e., the War on Drugs something of a hauntological regression that polices the present world in past language, specifically past holocausts dressed up as home defense in bad faith: DARVO obscurantism pimping the alien to dehumanize the harvest, thus having the state's pre-emptive revenge against nature as monstrous-feminine, chattelizing its whores and putting them cheaply to work by criminalizing them as sexual deviant chattel-vermin!

This brings us to lycanthropes, aka shapeshifter demons (often into stigma animals, but arguably fungi and plants, too; re: the xenomorph) that are often called "furies," nowadays. Though furies—along with chimeras and sentient animals—are not historically prone to criminal behaviors, they are criminalized, alienized and fetishized for being sexually "demonic" in association with a drug-like or alien perception of the world around them; i.e., conflated with bestiality and general depravity from damaged, dangerous minds that may as well be on drugs.

On some level, then, the ableism and abjection of furies and their erotic animalization is symbolic of settler-colonial fears tied to non-European societies and organizations of labor/bio-power beyond capital; i.e., nature as black taking on a variety of meanings in overlapping persecution networks and language, thus interpretation and application of said captive fantasies; e.g., through the myth of the black male rapist as not only "one of most dangerous and prevalent narratives in American history" (sidhu-s82's "The Myth of the Black Rapist," 2021) but something connected to America and Capitalism

In the U.S. and other capitalist countries, rape laws were originally framed for the protection of men of the upper classes, whose women ran the risk of being assaulted. What happens to working class women has always been of little concern to the courts. As a result, appalling few rapists have ever been prosecuted—appalling few, that is, if black men are exempted from consideration. While the rapists of working-class women have so rarely been brought to justice, the rape charge as been indiscriminately aimed at black men, the guilty and innocent alike (source: Angela Davis' "Rape, Racism and the Capitalist Setting," 1978).

that endures into the present despite rape statistically being an *intra*racial crime (the kernel of truth to rape myths being criminogenic, thus manufactured in their origins; i.e., as tied to capital and the state as police bodies for the elite).

Indeed, according to the National Alliance to End Sexual Violence:

Popular media in [America] continue[s] to perpetuate racial stereotypes, particularly about women of color. Portraying black women and Latinas as promiscuous, American Indian and Asian women as submissive, and all women of color as inferior legitimates their sexual abuse. Portraying men of color as sexually voracious and preying on innocent white women reinforces a cultural obsession with black-on-white stranger rape, at the expense of the vastly more common intra-racial acquaintance rape (source: "Racism and Rape," 2017).

The problematic male myths outlined above poetically collide with the spurious argument of women of color as savage and promiscuous, but also acts of dark magic further distanced from the West than white Pagans are:

Of course, visually white Indigenous people exist, as do non-white functioning people who aren't ethnically Indigenous—with Bay being Māori but visually appearing "white" in the eyes of non-white "shadist" practitioners, and me being ethnically half-Dutch/quarter-Hungarian and leftover Mayflower Puritan mutt, but identifying as non-white insofar as I am a practicing Pagan/Satanist sex worker and witch determined to end capital for all the dead generations into living ones. Bay and I are united in this aim, thunder buddies for life! "Fuckin' right!"

(artists: Bay and Persephone van der Waard)

Yet, these phobias are largely sensationalized through current scapegoats/token cops that remain composed of many different ethnicities, genders and/or religions, theatres, etc, in the material world; i.e., fear towards these persons coming from a warped, abject understanding of what furies even are; re: nature is other/monstrous-feminine alien to pimp and rape for profit out of revenge against the colonized by the colonizers during inheritance anxiety inside the Imperial Core (what Doctor Robotnik calls "the Death Egg" in Sonic 2, 1992); e.g., Paradise/Greenhill Zone something to defend from Indigenous Peoples dressed up as evil Nazi scientists (echoes of Operation Paperclip), which Communist furies have to reclaim from Nazi DARVO/obscurantist scapegoats, and fascist/white moderate wolves and foxes (re: Malcom X), at large!

(exhibit 52e1: Source: Eric Killela's "Does the Furry Community Have a Nazi Problem?" 2017—the same year TERFs began to emerge, post-Gamergate, assimilating in response to fascism rising on the global stage; i.e., the liminal hauntology of war historically-materially yields tokenism and strange bedfellows.)

The Ark is a bit crowded, then, but we cannot simply reject nature, for then we abandon it to the current "stewards" preying on it/our communities; i.e., through monomythic neoliberalism (re: Sonic descending into a "bad future" to prevent the apocalypse, Terminator-style)—one whose omnipresent Capitalist Realism and bad-faith environmental "activism" we subvert on the Aegis during Promethean and Faustian subversions of said dogma: the animal sluts of the world, punching up from their kennels—fighting not just for the preservation of nature already owned/privatized by Whitey/tokens (as Sonic canonically does), but for land back. Doing so requires demasking the cop as a furry like Sonic (actual Sonic, but also Bunny from The First Descendants, exhibit 56a1a1); i.e., while still loving nature ourselves (as Blxxd Bunny and Nyx do, but also Pippy Longstocking ...and the actress who played her in the '80s straight-to-VHS movie, said actress making a sex tape and reclaiming it from her ex formerly releasing it as revenge porn, exhibit 56a1a2).

Stemming from non-Western, non-Christian ways of life that strive hauntologically to reharmonize with nature (which Indigenous cultures didn't always do; re: treaties with the White Man), the anthropomorphic counterculture tradition suggested above conveys an idealized animal representation the West has since abjected (unable to tokenize furies as easily as Amazons, for example): a "totem" animal for humans and nature as connected through the spirit of demonic creativity and kinship, hence dark xenophilia tied to nature as whore!

Being a kind of demon, then, furies are similar to other magic totem groups. Like witches, they're an out-group. This can be seen in how they transform/present as egregores—peacefully "wearing" the skins of animals to relate to nature versus harvesting the skins for profit/status; e.g., berserks; i.e., exploiting nature and using the skin as a disguise to perform various crimes the state invents, during undercover police work (more on this in Volume Three; re: witch cops/vigilantism).

From Disney's own prince/princess offshoots—or Sega's skater punk gentrification and decay of said punk with Sonic—false rebellions are never rebellions, but haunt and plague said rebellions in duality (and vice versa). Similar to canonical demons and witches, then, animalistic demons and monsters are universally regarded as sexual deviants/degenerates who must be collectively punished under broad, vague (fascist) legislation pimping anthropomorphic sex; i.e., said sexuality (and public nudism) tied to nature as monstrous-feminine. In turn, these laws are meant to be selectively applied, thereby used in bad faith to attack conservative scapegoats tied to common conservative phobias, fetishes and double standards; i.e., focus points for hate groups to levy a bias against, namely "in defense" of women, children and moral decency through moral panics targeting trans people as "radical groomers" (and linked to other marginalized groups less politically unwise to attack mask-off, like Indigenous Peoples).

We'll examine this tactic far more in Volume Three. For now, merely keep in mind that such accusations don't tend to match up with the data, with

- most forms of child sexual abuse happening from heterosexual persons (Zero Abuse Project, 2023)
- most violent crimes/rapes being committed by men against women (Cal Poly / Humboldt's "Sexualized Violence Statistics")
- most domestic rapes and murders/murder-suicides happening from one's intimate partner (the NCADV's "Facts about Domestic Violence and Physical Abuse," 2015)
- a self-reported, 40% climb being attributed to domestic abuse cases involving police officers abusing their own families (National Center for Women & Policing's "Police Family Violence Fact Sheet, 2013), who go on to underreport rapes in general—re: the Marshall Project

Nevertheless, lycanthropy the accusation can be attributed to canonical, propagandized sex crimes for centuries; i.e., since at least Monarchy of Demons and Faustus, the complicit cryptonymy process reaching out of the Early Modern period; e.g., Count Ferdinand from John Webster's The Duchess of Malfi eventually going insane from lycanthropy and committing various acts of murder (and this being after he wanted to marry and rape his own sister):

(source: Stéphanie Mercier's "The Duchess of Malfi, John Webster, Directed by Dominic Dromgoole," 2014)

In keeping with Gothic and Matthew Lewis, as much as Milton, such stories are as much critiques of systems that will deny their own hand in things and push them off onto their victims; re: exploitation and liberation exist in the same place, on and off the same stages in the larger mode of discourse—what Mercier herself calls "sharing space" (an idea basically synonymous with Radcliffean closed space and Bakhtin's chronotope/castle-narrative I've embellished on, using danger discos):

The visual effects are audibly accompanied by the rounded sound of the cello, the three different types of lute and the harpsichord, which requires regular re-tuning as if to underline the necessary reunion of the otherwise disrespectful handling of traditional neo-classical unities of time and space, or bodily and spiritual orthodoxy, throughout Webster's plot.

The play's script immediately points to this multifaceted doubling as the widowed Duchess, her twin brother Ferdinand (David Dawson) and the older sibling Cardinal (James Gannon) metaphorically become "three fair medals, / Cast in one figure, of so different temper" (I.1.179-180). The comparison, apart from underlining the different personalities of the characters, establishes a diptych of corporality and materiality that will underscore the action and hint to how the Duchess' passionate marriage with her adoring, yet socially inferior, steward will inevitably encourage disaster. With similar numismatic imagery, the Cardinal offers Bosola (Sean Gilder) gold coins to become a spy (and murderer) at the Duchess' court whilst the actors eat symbolically charged strawberries off circle-shaped pewter platters in a hint to the curvaceous nature of the Duchess' soon-to-be rounded pregnant belly. In fact, the tragic nature of what should be happy events to come is also pointed to by the premonitory dagger on stage; an appropriate metaphor for the particular "variety of courtship" (I.1.329) that characterizes the play and that is immediately transferred to the quill that the steward, Antonio (Alex Waldmann), uses to write what turns out to be the Duchess' gloomily foreboding will. This, before she presumptuously oversteps moral, legal and social boundaries (here signified by the fact that the two are initially separated by the flaming lowered candles while they court) and gives him her wedding ring as a token of betrothal – yet another circle, and, more importantly, a pointer to the rope that will finally encircle her neck (ibid.).

Except while the West fabricates and testifies to its own abuses—doing so in cryptonymic ways that perjure domestic decay through historical-material doubles and nostalgia from Shakespeare and Webster onwards (re: Nicolas Abraham and Maria Torok's 1986 The Wolf Man's Magic Word: A Cryptonymy alluding to Webster and Renaissance appropriations of the skin-changer legend in Western canon)—the undeniable fact remains: most furies aren't sex criminals any more than most queer people, non-Christians, non-white people, and/or demons are; they're a fandom that, according to Fur Science, runs countercurrent to "the very stereotypes that portray [them] as being simply a fetish, the most-cited drawn to the furry fandom is its sense of belongingness, recreation, and escape from the mundaneness of daily life, as well as its appreciation of anthropomorphic art and stories" (source: "What's a Furry?" 2022). What a piece of work is furry! The paragon of animals pimped by Hamlet-style dickheads!

Furthermore, this explanation isn't baseless or unfounded/apophenic conspiracy to dismiss; it's academically grounded, produced by professors of furies (who aren't always furies themselves); i.e., describing their target of research as a fandom after years of prolonged study in good faith. The aim in doing so, then, is to dispel many harmful myths, not confirm and exploit them as they normally occur under capital during witch-hunt DARVO obscurantism pimping nature; i.e., as Radcliffean fuckwads like Turkey Tom do (and who apologize for fascism by pinning degeneracy on fascist victims they can conflate with fascism as "degenerate"; re: cops and victims, pimps and whores).

This includes, for example, standing together in false-rebellious solidarity against "soy boy" leftists they—as loud-and-proud centrists (and those like them, such as Brandon Buckingham, oompaville, ShoeOnHead, and SomeOrdinaryGamers, etc)—can unite in bad faith against criticism they universally decry as "slander" and "woke"; i.e., dogwhistling while vice signaling and acting morally outraged/clutching their pearls to defend one of their own/someone ostensibly adjacent to them in the Free Marketplace of Ideas (Capitalism): something they can defend from outsiders who threaten to break Capitalist Realism with their "Cultural Marxism" (or whatever the reactive-abuse antagonizers want to call it, but that's what they're doing with these kinds of pogroms, furry or not).

And not to get too off track, but basically In Praise of Shadows went to battle with his guns half-loaded; i.e., kicking the hornet's nest and getting dogpiled by a bunch of people defending Wendigoon from said "assailant," treating the former like the Whore of Babylon and the latter like Jesus Christ:

Answer: This was asked a few days ago, and at the time I had no idea who IPoS even was, but recently, Mutahar put out a decent video about the situation.

From what I can tell, the guy's catching flak for making wildly broad strokes such as "He's from Appalachia so he's a racist" and stuff like that. Given that Wendigoon is a fairly popular personality on YouTube, this likely aggravated his fan base and led to something of a proxy war in the two channel's comments, subreddits, forums, etc.

He also apparently took some shots at various other people, including SomeOrdinaryGamers, which is probably why the video above was made in the first place (source: DoubleClickMouse, r/OutOfTheLoop's "What is going on with In Praise of Shadows and Wendigoon?" 2024).

I can't seem to find the original video, but in a nutshell, there's a lot of weird virtue/vice signaling and fascist pipeline apologetics (which lubricate and reinforce said pipeline while capitalizing on it during the cryptonymy/abjection processes); e.g., "IPOS lost me as a fan. I am a literal Catholic Monarchist from Appalachia and I despise racism. He has insulted me and every, White, Black, Latino, Asian and Native person in the entire region" (ibid.). Okay, then.

More to the point, there seems to be a whole lot of people who aren't oppressed acting oppressed in bad faith against dark xenophilia; i.e., allergic to criticism to such a degree that they make a meal out/ton of hay with it, grifting and bullying their critics to silence in typical "debate bro" fashion (and token fashion; re: ShoeOnHead having a lot of Nazi friends, the shameless bitch). There's a lot of chaff during the dust-up and that's the point; i.e., make noise to distract from the obvious: that they hide and feed in plain sight during a complicit cryptonymy process furthering abjection on stages we must survive inside; i.e., from bad-faith cunts like Turkey Tom and his ilk's dogmatic "edutainment." It worked for Obama and Joe Biden; i.e., a cop is a cop and doesn't prevent crime, American Liberal "justice" being slavery-in-disguise hiding in plain sight (note the noose, echoing Jim Crow and Lost Cause behind a literal Monster commercial by two white straight Nazi assholes: America, the Land of the Free and home of the Fascist, left):

(artist: Rusty Cage, 2022)

To it, they're all Nazis because they're in bed with Nazis (and love guns/being tough on crime/acting superior to everyone else while downplaying their own privilege and America's settler-colonial design, below); i.e., working from the same compounds as militias to push out from, home-base-style, and attack the enemies of the state/the Protestant ethic and Cartesian thought; re: the state is straight and anyone who challenges them is a sicko Commie "fur faggot" these "maverick hunters" will happily poach, therefore making human, animal and environmental rights/dark xenophilia "up for debate": a lynch mob kettling "useless eaters" (the former massive cowards who hide behind privilege and fear their latter chosen prey fighting back, below)!

left and -right: Bay's fursona, by Tofu Froth and Buns Like a Truck. Gothic-Communist struggle is defined in its poetic context—of whom commissioned the artist and why— as something that is challenged during paratextual dialogs concerning the pieces and what they stand for or rather, what they should stand for. For example, in posting his piece, "hit them nazi punks" in 2020, Undead Clown writes, largely inspired by CRASHprez's song "Fascists Don't Cry" which is a really great song lmao but ya imma knock ya out if you come up to me spoutin white supremacist or transphobic shit human rights aint up for debate [source].

Bigots are cops and hate being reminded of that; i.e., while they play dress up in bad-faith cryptonymy versus our own revolutionary deceptions punching up against capital from parallel societies: exposing them as cowards on and offstage, upon the Aegis. We lie and perform to protect ourselves/the natural world; they lie to pimp and rape such things for the establishment. Gross, sad fuckers, you're traitors and rapists stuck in Plato's cave! Your time will come!)

By bullet or not, such holocausts routinely happen by the usual suspects perpetrating them; i.e., anyone colonizing these spaces (token or not) during the Imperial Boomerang as a brutal historical-material cycle—one reaving the usual prisons by the usual ladders of preferential mistreatment/overlapping persecution "joy division" language that cops and vigilantes selectively and collectively groom/mark their prey with! Anyone who breaks the illusion, mid-purge, is the enemy of those most fragile, privileged and guilty of doing crimes for the state against the vulnerable and the marginalized; re: on capital's frontiers, thus inside its states of exception: controlled opposition policing uncontrolled opposition, pimps (and token whores) policing unruly whores through all labor/nature as sexualized and alienized by the state and its mechanisms—doing so to serve profit (thus rape) by punching and killing Medusa. Bursting their bubble is our revenge; i.e., by exposing and shaming them while always taking away their toys: us.

As we keep exploring furies—i.e., as things to investigate as/with—recall that white moderates are Nazis with more masks (concentric veneers being something we'll return to, in Volume Three); e.g., Turkey Tom effectively operating as an open-to-cloaked racist in ways people more broadly forget because of the confusion outlined above (re: D'Angelo Wallace's "I'm Not Sorry" calling Turkey Tom out, back in 2019). It's a war of endurance, our darkness visible versus theirs during a, suitably enough, Miltonic war of angels and demons, but also furies and dark xenophilia. Nazis and Communists occupy that self-same space, too!

To it, furies are scapegoats in ways that play out very similarly to the events described above; i.e., pimp and police them in ways white moderates (and their reactionary brethren) love to do: a harvest to dehumanize and treat strictly as criminal and nothing else; re: Turkey Tom's "degenerate" series being a massive dogwhistle several steps removed from him and his own racism. But function betrays any aesthetic; i.e., if someone has Nazi friends in their orbit/wheelhouse, they're a Nazi by association because that's how fascism works.

Every witch hunt has a hunter to either apologize for or upend by viewing the oppressed in a better light. To it, associate professor Sharon E. Roberts tries to undo these dangerous (and deliberate, profitable) misconceptions about "furry panic" by writing in "What are 'furies?':"

Furies are people who have an interest in anthropomorphism, which specifically refers to giving human characteristics to animals. In its most distilled form, furies are a group of people who formed a community—or fandom—because they have a common interest in anthropomorphic media, friendships and social inclusion. [...] Furies don't identify as animals; they identify with animals. In the same way that cosplayers typically don't believe they are actually Spiderman, furies don't think they are their fursonas (source).

In other words, furies are not an illness or inherently criminal institution; they're a small minority group (about 1.4-2.8 million, worldwide, International Furry Survey: Summer 2011); i.e., like the queer community is, thus targeted by reactionaries and white moderates/tokens during moral panics made to defend capital as always in crisis (to enforce and motivate profit through manufactured scarcity).

So just as LGBTQ people tend to receive violence (UCLA William Institute, 2021), furies are far more likely to have crimes committed against them by hate groups (whose own activities either go unreported or are protected by those in power acting in bad faith; re: Turkey Tom); i.e., are more likely to experience police abuse than they are to actually "do a crime," themselves ("Furry-tales: The organized hate effort against LGBTQ+ young people," 2021).

Note, I do put "do a crime" in quotes because furies, and those associated with them to varying degrees—such as sex workers and Indigenous Peoples more broadly—are criminalized for existing as sex workers and Indigenous people do, but receive additional confusion surrounding them due to being animals in hauntological ways; i.e., that are harder for the modern West to unironically fetishize/tokenize. In the tradition of stigma animals, werewolves are shot, most animals are hunted, most hunters are men, and most murders and violent sexual crimes are committed by men (which extends to token men trying to assimilate by eating the dead; e.g., Henry Emory from Them [2021] trying to choke down the homemade pie at the dinner table, and blend in at work: with his aggressively white supremacist co-workers not welcoming assimilative co-habitation).

Another way of looking at this problem, then, is to see the fate of animals/nature under Capitalism as inherently divisive and unstable; i.e., the "native" party (the colonizer) seeing their inherited settler-colonial home as invaded by the ghost of the counterfeit, which it scapegoats instead of attacking Capitalism as a structure. In other words, Capitalism causes pain as an abject byproduct of ongoing exploitation; i.e., as half-real, meaning between fiction and non-fiction.

The Gothic imagination, then, is like the T-800, who coldly states, "I sense injuries; the data could be called pain." Except the better developed these pathways are, the better our ability to cry out in pain, thus issue warnings regarding oncoming/ongoing disasters against bad-faith impostors. We furries will find ways not just to relieve stress and pain, then, but prevent them in the future. In response to a perceived "white genocide," a Cartesian man or Radcliffean Gothicism/token will summon and dismiss these anxieties, exorcising them from the home as divorced from nature/nature's revenge (which includes flashing the pimp on the Aegis, below): "We didn't destroy ourselves; you attacked us!"

The problem is, Capitalism is historically-materially unstable and cheapens nature to push for infinite growth within a finite web of life. Per state shift, it will not survive its own disasters, but decay into older hauntological (token) models of brutality like fascism, including eco-fascism. Those arrangements of capital and the state's enforcers historically-materially offer up linguo-material byproducts serving as holistic data; i.e., cryptomimetically suggesting a decaying society and nation, but also Humanity and the planet as sick of capital that eventually leads to total mass extinction: an unmaking or reversal of Genesis not unlike Matthew Lewis' ending to The Monk, over two centuries ago; re: self-deception as self-authored and carried out.

To it, I'd rather fight for our survival as open stewards of nature weaponizing dark xenophilia in our favor, than speak little in relative comfort; i.e., while genocide leads to our destruction through a land without food, but also full of people who cannot eat (making the colonialists asking of the alien "what did you eat?"⁴⁶⁶ a tragic refrain; re: men cannot eat gold, but also starve: when Indigenous Peoples won't give them food to enable colonization, effectively disabling it).

Divorced from nature, Whitey cannot see what ails their own dying colony. Instead, they burn their own house down and kill things that "do not belong"; re: anything they monomythically and cartographically describe as "degenerate" or "monstrous-feminine," hence treat differently than them/the status quo as morally thus ethnocentrically superior to their routine victims; e.g., a witch to burn, but also a whore to pimp and a pet to own while acting as the oppressed wearing witch-cop costumes (and ironically doomsaying their own slaughter when the state dies). Chattel is chattel, and pedophiles and zoophiles go hand-in-hand with unironic porn addicts sharing the same poetic space as furry actors and art:

⁴⁶⁶ From Alex Garland's 2018 adaptation to Jeff Vander Meer's Annihilation (2014).

Furries, then, are stewards of nature preyed upon by those taught to own and dominate nature-as-alien/monstrous-feminine, colonizing furry porn in ways seen as strange because the undercover costume is essentially a compound clown/fetish outfit; i.e., it sticks out like a sore thumb; e.g., Four Lions taking the idea and pearl-clutching during the War on Terror as something to apologize for with British snark:

To that, our usual suspects remain white cis-het chuds/weird canonical nerds and token sell-outs, who try doggedly to operate as undercover stewards of profit canonizing false colonial binaries like "male/female" (steer clear of anyone who says "a male" or "a female" as a noun phrase; e.g., "I dated a female"). Their education and its distinctions/categories' harmful sex, drugs and rock 'n roll (what they poetically endorse) are bad; i.e., a poison for their brains that fuels the metastasizing of Capitalism—its cancer-like growth—as something to guard to their own eventual downfall.

Worse, they will push it onto us, meaning "we" (a broader intersectional collective that includes furries) must challenge that by guarding nature but also the means of communing with nature through the above Gothic poetics; i.e., the "furry" as a revolutionary function, during acid Communism as, itself, dualistic in practice (which we'll get to at the end of part two); re: our land, drugs, and sex education (collars, animal monsters, breeding displays, etc), but also whatever leaps to mind when using them, provided its revolutionary function is constant during ludo-Gothic BDSM's cryptonymy process reversing abjection using dark xenophilia. If workers refuse to assimilate, tokenization and colonization become impossible:

Think of it as a praxial "stress test," then, one whose revolutionary cryptonymy—when exposed to our potential allies (thus potential enemies); i.e., "flashing those with power" as a game to enjoy as we do it, above—make the latter either want to hug or kill us (after embarrassingly shitting their pants, of course). In terms of re(t)con, establishing either is vital to our survival and the overall war effort as fighting for our lives; i.e., our right to exist versus extinction being the outcome of Capitalism censoring us and our education to enrich the elite and their proponents; re: Turkey Tom, Andrew Tate, and the Critical Drinker, etc, showing that anything not against the state is with it, including all manner of radical/reactionary and moderate forms bearing a white, cis-het male face (or tokens wearing such masks, the assimilator and assimilated inverting the mask's flow of assimilation: the colonizer playing the white Indian, and the assimilator playing the actual Indian who thinks they've "made it," but have only killed the Indian to "save" the [wo]man for last: the casino brothelized under canonical duress).

To this, Cartesian dualism more broadly treats anything "of nature" as "outside" of civilization and nature, thus meriting exploitation or reformation/conversion of "bad" nature to "good.: The colonial rhetoric is of course dressed up in the rhetoric of liberty and equality to sound as good as possible (re: Zinn), but is also supplied primarily to the enforcers of the American middle class since Bacon's Rebellion: cis-het white men, followed by cis-het white women, then other Russian-doll dog-eat-dog/big-fish-eat-little-fish pecking orders.

As such, it's precisely this group and its assimilative offshoots (the capitalist Numinous) that hatefully (with bias⁴⁶⁷) declare all demons anathema, including totems, chimeras and sentient animals more commonly portrayed as furies or as magical beings associated with furies; re: witches by the same modular persecution logic and arbitrary double standards, Communist variants muddled vis-à-vis state DARVO and obscurantism (re: Nazi werewolves are historically a thing Hitler actually used towards the end of the war, as I discuss in "Hell Hath No Fury'; or, Soulbrighter's Token Gay Nazi Revenge"): our uphill push towards the city of the gods and our own Communist Numinous (the Medusa) being something to break into and reclaim from Puritanical forces and capital, whose Omelas we seek to dismantle as Trojan whores do (on the prow of a slutty Ark):

In effect, the elite outlaw iconoclastic media that attempts to depict these groups in a positive light; i.e., showing such entities as capable of giving and receiving empathetic treatment (above), thus deserving of basic human rights (the same rights afforded to animals and the environment, to be fair). The state's war on nature and sex education is one on Pagan and dark xenophilia; i.e., making for a liminal proposition—one where many individuals grapple with the call of the wild and their own genders, identities and sexualities: as either in the closet already or being forced back inside such kennels through state courtship pimping puppy courtesans to monopolize chattelized sex work (thus furies and dark xenophilia)!

⁴⁶⁷ Regarding hate crimes, "The term 'hate' can be misleading. When used in hate crime law, the word 'hate' does not mean rage, anger, or general dislike. In this context 'hate' means bias against people or groups with specific characteristics that are defined by the law" (source: United States Department of Justice).

Regarding such liminality as anisotropically progress-versus-regression, if Ann Radcliffe was an imperfect detective out of the past—one whose own relative attempts at grasping beyond her reach live on in her books (and offshoots of said books)—the same concept applies to trans, intersex, enby and/or ace detectives today reaching for equality towards Communism; i.e., in demonic language that Radcliffe would never have dared touch: on the edge of the civilized world, through a transformative experience decidedly more genderqueer than she was and, by extension, Matthew Lewis as some to embrace and make even gayer than he arguably was (some big shoes to fill, but we fags love "filling" things)! Necessity is the mother of invention (e.g., Small Goblin's "Cantina Theme" played by a pencil and a girl with too much time on her hands," 2018); never let them take credit for your work, thus colonize it and you with said theft!

This brings us to andro-/gynodiversity as something I want to unpack/denude as dark xenophilia; i.e., relative to a furry counterculture and general stewardship of nature; re: through Lewis' The Monk, but also my past work with Cuwu combined with Dario Argento's "Pelts," Erika Eleniak, and furry porn (there's an odd combo) loaded with a bit of worker/nature revenge: as something to protect with iconoclastic art from the usual betrayals. So do we pee out such moral superiority/outrage (as something to perform; e.g., from Turkey Tom to Mahatma Gandhi and Mother Teresa): a waste to void that, unto itself, feels rather good (and exits the body similar to cum as something the Catholics might sing about as "waste," yet actually comes out of the usual Protestant gentry playing at paupers suitably making fun of the colonized yet thinking they're Jonathan Swift; re: Monty Python courting Protestant spectres of Cromwell having genocided the Irish as racially inferior to English false rebellions: The Life of Brian serving anti-Catholic dogma furthering the Protestant ethic out of the 18th and 19th centuries into a new neoliberal period's Second Gilded Age).

This includes feminism being a classic site of divide-and-conquer that, operating through the usual strange appetites garnered under capital, has tokenized from decaying gentries; re: from white women being chattelized as property (under city-states) far longer than people of color have been—a trend that would aggressively target the latter by the former under Capitalism from Radcliffe onwards; re: gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss—who then collectively go on to police the bodies of anyone not "of them": their own, but also a "pussy phrenology/eugenics" that can be measured and analyzed during the usual exclusionary measures that tokens will embarrassingly cater to (forgetting how few people even have that "Vitruvian pussy" to begin with, let alone the entire monomorphic gradient of trans, intersex and non-binary people). What they canonize, we camp on the same Aegis:

(exhibit 52g1a: Artist: Victoria, directed by Persephone van der Waard. The canonical historical purpose of such exhibits was to display and dehumanize the freak; our reclamations give us gradient misfits a chance to exhibit, and voyeuristically peer in at, willing subjects of study we can play with/out, for a change! Victoria, for instance, is a rape survivor and intersex person, and one I—as a trans rape survivor and researcher seeking to heal from rape with others; i.e., doing so by speaking out in a diverse polity thereof—orchestrated a time to shoot and play with Vic. We both were eager to learn together and give each other power as demons do; i.e., through crossdress and undress alike, mid-exchange [re: Matilda's concentric veneers used to expose Ambrosio's bullshit, thus that story's evil prioress tied to capital: "Antonia will perceive her dishonor, but be unaware of her ravisher" bleeding into the violator being misled by promises of future rape the demonic queer shapeshifter uses to hoist the closeted rapist on his own petard; i.e., during a Satanic Panic of older days, The Monk operating essentially as vintage torture porn, but anisotropically directing queer anger at the status quo in ways they self-report through their outrage; e.g., Coleridge protesting The Monk by colonizing Gothic as straight]!

In doing so, I had Vic pose in ways that stressed their body as intersex/pear-shaped; e.g., their "hip dips" reminding me of Cuwu's [above, middle] but also Vic storing fat differently than typically AMAB assignments do under state scalpels—a reality their own literal intersex scars testify to, and which our ludo-Gothic BDSM's instruction and invigilation attest to: as something to resist state abuse while funding and finding our power onstage and off!)

Over time, women's studies have gradually become decolonized from token cis-het white women (e.g., Radcliffe, Dacre, the Brontë sisters, Carter, Beauvoir, Moers, and Creed, etc); i.e., by nakedly sex-positive queer voices after Lewis (e.g., Cuwu, Victoria and me from Judith Butler and Michael Warner unto us). As such, it is now known more broadly as "gender studies" or "intersectional feminism"; but the performative and praxial liminality of doing so likewise has iconoclasts learning from older activist movements; i.e., in order to challenge authorities within current manifestations of those former groups. That's what Ludo-Gothic BDSM boils down to (as I coined it, anyways); re: camping the canon, putting "rape" in quotes to hug the alien sex worker while outing the pimp as perfidious towards the whore.

Ergo, revisiting the errors of the token past and tackling their regressions includes competing with male and female academics, but also cis-queer/token academics, public intellectuals and celebrities (tokenism knows no bounds); i.e., to allow GNC persons to say things about the same material world as it pertains to all oppressed groups under idiosyncratic axes of oppression/privilege, but also past, monstrous versions of ourselves; re: those that include the entire totemic demon class: as something that is routinely hunted by members of our own groups playing the conquistador's pet, hence hauntological Roman fool!

Such testimony happens with our diversely inclusive bodies during the pedagogy of the oppressed; i.e., as something to solidarize and study unto itself. When dealing with bad(-faith) dragons, we good(-faith) dragons must expose their weak points while paradoxically showcasing our own vulnerability in ways that resist exploitation, on the Aegis; re: not just Victoria, but Cuwu as someone whose forbidden-fruit "apple" and its subsequent temptation I have revisited many times: a little shapeshifting dragon who fed on me a bit, but which I didn't always dislike!

(exhibit 52g1b: Artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard. So who's the Devil and who's Faust, again? So did Cuwu and I make off like bandits in more ways than one—booty bandits! Making mischief is only blackmail through context, Cuwu the Matilda of a 21st century

whore taking me out of the closet/to the ball game that they might turn me gayer than I ever dared dream, up until that point. "Let my hand see not the wound it makes" became sex with the lights on cushion-pushing towards a fearsome-fun ostinato of our bringer of class war unto others of different oppressions also rising to the challenge; re: fucking to metal, the Medusa something you cannot kill!

It was Jack Black's 2001 "Fuck Her Gently," in our case, but the idea is the same across all rock 'n roll spinoffs; e.g., with Holst and Venture Bros. or anyone else predating/proceeding such cases, mid-crisis [Star Wars leaps to mind, or Paradise Lost and Frankenstein wiggling sinfully on the same holistic timeline]! "We are so back, my dude[s]!" Tomorrow, tomorrow, and tomorrow, furies and acid Communism are transformative but also cryptonymic, speaking cryptomimetically to Shakespeare's petty pace: "a tale full of sound and fury," signifying whatever meaning we give it!

Would it surprise you very much to know, then, that Cuwu and I both practiced, each of us gay little furry idiots? Furies are shadow warriors, "the beasts under your bed, in your closet, in your head";

i.e., to "enter sandman," Metallica style—administering "dreams of [class] war, dreams of dragon's fi-re [those dactyls] and of things that will bite"; re: during the dialectic of shelter and the alien as dualistically reclaimed by us. We demand HUGS, and give as good as we get! Fucking is metal, but as Beethoven did; re: by shaking his fist [or our asses] at Napoleon!

But also, look on us neurodivergent-if-not-terribly-morphologically-diverse [that being said, my Cuban friend Jackie did say about Cuwu's ass, "Damn! They have a nice ass for a white girl!"]: showing you our asses while having fun in duality versus those who would pimp us having divorced themselves from such things! The Judas is always lonesome.

So did we GNC cuties mock such unironic weirdos while weird attracts weird, Cuwu and I having fun/acting bad while looking good⁴⁶⁸; i.e., as something to pass along for others to learn from: to make love like you make rebellion, babes—wildly [Cuwu needing lots of "Scooby snacks," making a meal out of a dog bone]! They were always high, but able to negotiate just fine by navigating their illness with their Marxist-Leninist way of life! I call chicanery!

⁴⁶⁸ Well Cuwu did; my trans woman's fat ass/dad bod leaves a lot to be desired, I feel (thanks to Jadis adding a bit of "love bomb" weight to my poor skeleton). Then again, Cuwu didn't complain, and that's all that matters! Enjoy 'em to the hilt, bitches!

"That's no moon; it's a space station!" Whatever moon-sized horrors the state throws at us, like Jadis did, we revolutionaries can turn back on Aegises of our own: "Turtle power!" The Numinous is dualistic and stacks rebels upon rebels; i.e., our stacked fortresses-in-the-flesh going all the way down/mise-en-abyme! "FIRE EVERYTHING!" [calm yourself, Chaucer]:

In short, there has to be something to encapsulate and suggest the enormity of the state and scale of things at stake; i.e., it's like Braveheart but not fascist/culturally appropriative: "This is our army—to join it, you give homage!" / "I give homage to [Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism]! And if this is your army, why does it go?" / "We didn't come here to fight for them!"

So fight for yourselves and each other beyond state boundaries and hauntologies; break them, thus capital and its dreadful Realism; i.e., on your stupidly awesome Aegises that—united and strong as a phalanx of cuties can only be [above]—make the witch hunters tuck tail and run! Solidarity and mutual consent are poison to them because they cannot stand for nature as monstrous-feminine set free: "back to the wild frontier" as something they can't ignore; i.e., during our holistic collective's Song of Infinity farting in our enemies faces [or fucking while they watch—same difference]!

I remember the old country
They call the emerald land.
And I remember my home town
Before the wars began.

Now we're riding on a sea of rage,
The victims you have seen.
You'll never hear them sing again
The Forty Shades Of Green.

[...] I remember my city streets
Before the soldiers came.
Now armoured cars and barricades
Remind us of our shame.

We are drowning in a sea of blood,
 The victims you have seen.
 Never more to sing again
 The Forty Shades Of Green [source: Genius].

The old folk heroes speak to current struggles co-opted and abused by white moderates and other class traitors; re: Clare—the white female protagonist from The Nightingale [2018]—bristling furiously when called "English" by the film's Aboriginal protagonist: "I'm not English, I'm Ireland! [switching to Gaelic] To the devil's house with all English people, every mother's son of them! May the pox disfigure them! May the plague consume them! Long live Ireland!" [source]. Fuckin' oath, sis! Long live Ireland, and all oppressed peoples united as one against tyranny's bad actors! Kill 'em with kindness towards each other!

Furthermore, rape is a terror weapon as much as any weaponized disease or monstrous-feminine is; i.e., testifying as we do, through ludo-Gothic BDSM putting "rape" in quotes, makes an indelible but elusive line in the sand—one the enemy cannot cross without outing themselves as Judas colonizers taking Roman pay. "Fear the Reaper" if that reaper is the state! Death and rebirth occupy the same icons; use 'em to your advantage! Mobilize and disrupt the state apparatus [of rape and theft] using what you got and what you make: friendship and love! May yours lay their hatred and structures to waste!

Do such things last, on the cusp of greatness?
 And can we always afford them to? No, but what does, state or worker? Cuwu and I had a whirlwind romance, and one that only lasted six months in life, but in death, lives on through my work honoring them; i.e., we loved a lifetime's worth, and made plenty of demonic love on the Aegis that I—ever the dutiful invigilator and chronicler/archivist of our dark xenophilia—can now proudly pass onto you, dear readers; re:

Making fake friends trying to get by.
 Nobody knows the feelings are the low and you're trying to stay high!
 Sweet Serenity, I can't fight when the night Comes calling me! Black Absinthe's "[Nobody Knows," 2024].

The fact remains, any jealous parties can tell me to "touch grass" lest I amount to fuck all; but I've already chased the dragon and caught a little fuck-puppy variant by the tail [and have much to show/be grateful for it]: baby's first rebellion/cream pie echoes of Always Sunny's [ambiguous creampie skit from 2015 being one of their best]! And furthermore, any great deed accomplished or position worth having is worth restating during such struggles; i.e., the pain of genuine loss something to recursively process [anyone who doesn't is a wackjob exploiter who didn't value what they had [re: Zuehl abandoning me at pretty much the drop of a fucking hat].

Behind every Athena, then, is a Medusa, every Medusa a rape victim/genocide, every victim a chance to refuse victimization/tokenization while still having fun! So did we, for a time, heal from our own rape! Learn from it, warts and all! Become your own bosses! Tell the usual farmers, "We are not crops to dust and reave, nor peaches to carve up like all the usual territories! We will become unruly and inedible to you, but not each other!")

In the Gothic tradition, this eulogy is an uphill battle, especially when challenging Capitalism through sex education using animalized language that features our bodies as different from the status quo. To this, witches and totems have much in common, xenophilia-wise, and constitute a common fixture in said education; i.e., both denote a strong bond to nature as alienated from society by Cartesian dualism and its statuesque Nordic model harming anything else.

Furthermore, this ongoing struggle towards liberation from exploitation through "exploitation" can also be seen in the struggles of current-day trans people like Quinnvincible and Price, below. As people who menstruate, their reeducation of the world as straight involves what they're teaching with: their own gynodiverse vaginas, girl-cock clitorises, body hair and associate art as belonging to them and celebrated by me for those reasons; i.e., as things effected by HRT and transition therapies, which they can teach us about; re: simply by being different and expressing said difference in a sex-positive furry lesson told in self-affirming body language (and whose "fu[r]ry rebellion" we'll examine more, in Volume Three): androdiversity as part of the same [w]hole, gynodiversity demonstrates as much by what diverges from canonical [thus eugenic, Christofascist] beauty standards; e.g., the non-heteronormative amounts of external labia and body hair owned, groomed and exhibited by people like Quinn and Price: [a passage to Bang\[coc\]k](#) [double sex/drug pun] taking the Midnight Express [and its Orientalist, Ayn Rand phase] out of weird canonical nerds' hands masturbating to their own oppression as largely Red Scare nonsense⁴⁶⁹.

⁴⁶⁹ Sorry, Rush, but the shoe really fits, here. "We are the Priests of the Temples of Syrinx!" but not in ways that you could have imagined; i.e., while writing love letters to Rand, Bernays, Orwell, and Tolkien, in the 1970s (oddly enough, your best period, but also one where you aped Led Zeppelin's fash-adjacent and wholly problematic love for runes while saying little of worth to people who weren't like yourselves with said runes: white and middle-class platitudes that, to be fair to you, still have their moments (e.g., "Free Will"). In any event, I don't measure someone's success by how much money they can make while posturing as more rebellious than they actually are!

That being said, can I enjoy Rush, anyways? Absolutely! I grow up with them in high school, and Marilyn Roxie even featured my review of 2112 to commemorate Neil Peart's death, in 2020:

Revisiting that review after five eventful years, I can safely say I flat-out love the music (which still straight-up slaps [da bass] after all these years)! 10/10, would fuck to, again!

Even so, my Communist convictions remain unfazed by such hero worship; i.e., I will happily skewer Rush's underlying lyrical content/political message the old pros smuggled, then and now, through their gentrified rock 'n roll commercialism; i.e., their dogmatic elements—specifically Rand's repackaged dystopian objectivism—is, to be brutally frank to our Canadian meganerds, shameless Red-Scare bullshit; re: written first by a Russian sell-out (and aped by Orwell, an imperial cop), only to be enshrined into the halls of the (white straight) rock gods by the usual authors of the ghost of the counterfeit. Fear-fascinated with Communism as rock 'n roll "black magic" obscurantism. weird canonical nerds gonna weird canonical nerd:

Like, God help me, you're such monumental dorks (a fact emblemized by my Catholic, sexless and gun-nut roomie, "Beavis" from Volume One, who loved Rush). Indeed, the presence of either variation can be intersex and congenital, but nowadays becomes increasing post-natal with the inclusion of gender-affirming care as something to dangle, carrot-and-stick, in front of people the state wants to tokenize. Except, trans people are reliant on this care to exist, meaning the transphobic/interphobic witch hunts waged against them manifest in direct attacks against said care; i.e., as something that will radicalize in both directions when growing disenfranchised with Black Excellence or any other token myth. Witch hunters aren't just overt reactionaries, then, but self-appointed "normal" people like particle physicist and practicing TERF, Sabine Hossenfelder [re: Essence of Thought's "Sabine Hossenfelder & Trans Youth, part 1," 2023]. Indeed, Hossenfelder's moderacy not only contains fascist talking points [Essence of Thought, "part 2," 2023] per the American tradition of weaponizing mad science during and after Operation Paperclip; it's par for the course among well-established scientists in the 21st century [with many of them—like Richard Dawkins or Neal DeGrasse Tyson—being completely unafraid of the conservative grift: something we'll explore more of in Volume Three when we examine TERFs at length].

In the Cartesian tradition, these STEM variants of the accommodated intellectual tone-police anyone they associate with the natural world; e.g., treating trans personalities and "furry" culture/dark xenophilia as part of said world to map out and progress through as capital does; re: as something to dominate in the interests of Capitalism and "progress," during the cryptonymy process furthering abjection. So whereas overt TERF reactionaries deem GNC people/furries as dishonest, fiendishly taking away women's rights, moderacy takes a more polite stance in the same bad-faith practice; either approach leads to the policing and material harming of queer people during furry panic, denying them the basic necessities of life—e.g., health care as vital towards expressing their gender expression, atypical body acceptance and culture in their own eyes, but also their former diehard paying fan (which I was, in the iTunes era), you're not gods; i.e., I can still critique you and enjoy you for it—meaning in the neoliberal era you doomsayed all the way to the bank... and which the 2012 Funny or Die skit, "Jason Seigel & Paul Rudd Meet Rush," happily makes fun of; i.e., ribbing "the Holy Trinity" in ways that I can't help but chuckle at; e.g., "I have a jerk off station!" says Seigel, only for Geddy Lee to not bat an eyelash/miss a beat (I'm sure he's heard far worse from more effusive [and sexually forward/available] roadies)!

To it, fandoms betray the complicit cryptonymies their authors use; i.e., if your material is full of Nazis, chances are, there's a problem with the parent source material acting pimp-like (re: Tolkien, Rowling, Iron Maiden, Black Sabbath and so many others; e.g., Ozzy and company largely used the late 1960s and early-to-mid-1970s as a chance to party and enrich themselves opportunistically: on the backs of suffering minorities they aped and pandered with to white straight paying customers). In the big picture, then, Rush weren't rebels but businessmen on the right side of the fence!

culture as treating them like gods worthy of worship, love and praise, not self-hatred and shame! Furrries, then, are gods to deify in a sex-positive, all-inclusive and universally liberatory disco[ourse]. Settle for nothing less!)

Per Medusa, but also loose extensions "of her" during selective and collective punishment, Capitalism abjects the bodies of revolutionary praxis based on old legends designed to control those who are born different inside the colonial binary. For example, vaginas and anuses are canonically demonized as monstrous, but the social-sexual code for doing so with furrries (next page) treats the female body as something to shame differently than male bodies. To it, baby steps towards liberation occur according to whatever feet we have to step with as furrries!

Queer persons extend this shameful logic as being "incorrect" according to their sexualities—hence genders and relative identities and performances—thus become automatically iconoclastic to heteronormative coding and dogma at large. Their non-standard, often fuzzy bodies instantly become liminal as a result; i.e., monstrous expressions of furious-and-fury transition/xenophilia developing forever towards something different than what is allowed by state pimps. The canonical whore always threatens the virgin, but has needed to sublimate since ancient times towards tokenized forms.

By extension, their anuses, vaginas, penises, excess body hair and unaverage height/weight variation, etc, become condemned wholesale; re: as things to literally dress up. Not only do queer people's "degenerate" piercings and colored hair ruffle reactionary feathers to no end; the bigots who attack them will dictate what queer people can do with their bodies in performance art and nudist displays—in short, how they can exist as queens of the Communist Reich! It's shameless tone-policing that less shoves the fur fag back in the closet and more puts her inside-outside the barrier as Radcliffe did: to rile up the Straights and make them pearl-clutch to surrender their wages (and their brains) during the abjection process; e.g., like the weird butler guy from Transylvania 6-5000 (1986):

It's a dangerous game, because the rapidity of state collapse during crisis will become a "boundaries for me, right?" promise the state can make but not keep for less marginalized groups onto more privileged traitors; e.g., demanding loyalty from white straight women while trying to closet and control them/take away their trashy sex novels. God forbid, right?

To it, these lopsided mandates affect pornographic media; i.e., as highly controlled displays that can't be expected to facilitate genocide alone, but also class, culture and race solidarity for us telling potential tokens what awaits them, should they take the pimp's bait! No good comes from that, but we have special treats for good boys, girls and enbies of all walks! Our beauteous orbs!

We do so as GNC whores who communicate through our body language as being the very things the Straights (male or not) have fetishized for centuries; i.e., since Radcliffe's less bigoted calculated risk devolved into Rowling or Anita Blakes' more bigoted calculated risk: people pimp through sex, afraid of/fascinated with the whore (a female Brutus, but also Hannibal sacking Rome) and yet, can also learn through such countermeasures; e.g., "Do the rock dance, Animala!" The straights can't resist when Velma-yet-not-Velma invades their labyrinthine brothels! "Fight

fire with fire" before "our lungs fill with the hot winds of death!" (Metallica, 1984): "Rawr! Always agree!" But do we agree? Or are we merely playing you for fools?

That depends who's playing! Regardless of whom, straight people are pretty vanilla/freaky in their own ways, and you can't judge an ally by their cover alone! And yet, it's easy enough during oppositional cryptonymy to expose frauds, too! For example, simply having a queer person rest their hands on or around their own anus or vagina (above) provokes a patriarchal, knee-jerk response from white moderate women as much as men. "Ah, ah, ah! That's close enough!" these reactionaries will snap—as if touching and playing with or slapping the vulva equals literally opening the hole (which is both expected and condemned if not done "correctly"). The precursor to doing so becomes forbidden, let alone the act itself as tied to sexual education infused with animal-demonic language/xenophilia! Catwomen of the Moon, transing your kids and turning your women into whores! Why be a whore when you can pimp others, instead?

Such is the usual Faustian bargain offered to straight white women (and token offshoots). The broader canonical idea, then—however insane its mirror syndrome comes across (which is quite insane)—nevertheless can also be taught by dead dogma in furry canon; i.e., werewolf movies prescribing not just silver bullets to the heart, but sexual villainy being a thing that the Straights can wear in bad faith when dealing death out to us fags: to dress up as their idea of the fur fag to then go and rape their usual victims (their wives and girlfriends, prospective or not)! Rape isn't just of the flesh, but the mind—with said rapists then pinning their own crimes onto more marginalized groups that force Single White Female to make Sophie's Choice with extreme prejudice!

From a poetic standpoint, the "prison sex" taking place serves a further silencing role; i.e., doing it socially-materially discourages workers from playing with their own bodies, thus prohibiting creative success during oppositional praxis; re: illustrating informed/mutual consent, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation: as happening either in personal artwork or through collaborations with other artists who draw the model(s) how they are/want to be seen. Instead, any menticed workers become gargoyle pimps; i.e., punching down at those they can abuse concentrically in the same awful Man Box's pecking order!

As something to silence, the pedagogy of the oppressed extends to the body itself, separated from the mind according labor at large "put to sleep" regarding the natural world: the whole pussy (vulva, labia, clitoris and vagina) or penis (and all its medical terms), anus, body and person/person's identity collectively becoming a pathway to forbidden knowledge that is normally restricted to status-quo men dominating nature; i.e., who enjoy and own their wives, the latter toiling at the husband's pleasure (while said husbands superstitiously reject anything normally coming out of the pussy other than one's own spent semen; e.g., slime, blood, dead babies, living babies, afterbirth, yeast infections, etc). But this "shit rolls downhill" approach likewise leads straight women (white or non-white) to tokenize, and intersections of female/(monstrous-)feminine groups/whores to tokenize; i.e., to diminishing amounts among increasingly marginalized groups (some of my fiercest critics aren't TERFs, but trans people [male or female] having sold out/taken the bait from state peddlers, usually TERFs).

We'll return to the idea of creative successes in Volume Three; i.e., when we explore proletarian praxis at length. For now, just remember that proletarian praxis aims for collective intersectional solidarity against worker exploitation through betrayal-proof forms of nonetheless token-discouraged sex-gender education.

By resisting Patriarchal Capitalism during ludo-Gothic furry BDSM, proponents of sex positive education about monsters and sex (furies or not) subsequently (re)present the human body and its genitals, genders and gender roles in iconoclastic, darkly xenophilic ways; i.e., to become something that is heavily controlled in canonical art beyond pornography and extending into myths that affect media (and consumers of media) at large: to duel over alien mates during mirror syndrome extending the policing of sex work to virgin/whore syndrome as, itself, tokenized, thus having had to subsist and bargain with bad dogs we don't want to breed with!

In doing so, we come to know what other animals generally don't have: shame, but also self-respect and awareness towards said animals (and children) teaching us to loosen up when interacting with other humans; i.e., the former as beings to protect from the usual abusers of us all, doing so using what we human animals have to distract said tyrants with! Shame, sin and vice are taught, as is Pavlovian submission!

(artist: Vince AI)

In particular, the female/feminized orifices—e.g., the vaginas of any AFAB person treated unironically like a monstrous whore/bitch (above), or the anuses of queer AMAB persons similarly emasculated by any abuser—become collectively demonized, shamed and shunned as "eyes" of confusion, chaos, and darkness. Anthro- and bio-diverse as a matter of campy religion and Paganism—thus a thoroughly non-Christian practice at being "Satanic," queer and so on—furies become hauntologically associated with abject demons and the undead as vengeful whores of nature needing to be collared, but also skinned and worn like trophies; i.e., tied to bodies, witches, dark queens and monster mothers, which—once spotted by prospecting opportunists—are then hunted by those unscrupulous agents for animalistic coats of fur inside perceived lands where such goods can be xenophobically and zoophilically harvested, guilt-free!

(artists: Eva Android and SmallBallz)

For straight (white) women, it's admittedly more distant because they tokenized sooner than other groups; for those other groups, it's closer to "Tuesday" than not, and speaks to token betrayals having wanted to assimilate based on the harvesting of magic racoons (or some such ghost of the counterfeit, racoons being from Dario Argento's 2006 Masters of Horror episode, "Pelts," below): nature's gratuitous and indiscriminate revenge being a ping-pong ball of doom that, true to form, doesn't have a singular interpretation!

The monkey's paw shrivels as the last wish is spoken. The last couple didn't go so well. Still, you're confident that asking for a mainstream piece of media that explores some of the historically noted eroticism of fur fashion is a simple wish. What could go wrong? The Pelts Blu-ray smacks you in the face.

This is the tale of what happens when you make a coat out of magic raccoons. (Good story hook, I would have gone in a different direction.) Things get messy, particularly with renowned Giallo director Dario Argento at the helm. There is, of course, a decent amount of commentary around this film being "anti-fur," but big daddy Dario doesn't care:

"No, there is no message. I am not with the fur or anti-fur people. I describe the reality – something happens to people. People are all disgusting. There is something that is very black and very pale about pelts" (source: Blake's "Time to Scream Your Lungs Out - A Brief Interview with Dario Argento," 2007).

So, plot-wise, the coat does not show up until the last act, about 45 minutes in. That is after the magical pelts have left some bodies in their wake. The one responsible for this is Jake Feldman. Meat Loaf plays him, and I assume he got this role thanks to his tour-de-force performance in To Catch a Yeti. [...] He's got the hots for local stripper Shanna and thinks the only he can get into her pants is with the coat. This is the most realistic part of the entire film.

Shanna puts on the coat in a sequence that calls back to many a shot from cinema history. In this case, you're supposed to assume her sensual response to the coat is due to magic, pissed-off raccoon spirits. Yet this extract scene exists in many movies with no supernatural influence. Jake's plan works, and the most horrific part of this horror movie plays out: a love scene with Meat Loaf. [...] Suffice it to say; the pissed-off magic raccoons get their vengeance, which involves a lot of red food coloring and corn syrup (source: glamorinfurs' "Furs on TV – Pelts," 2022).

As the above author's snarky editorial shows, it's easy for the rape-and-death theatre memento mori to devolve into gratuitous shock to poke fun at, mid-performance and -consumerism (which Argento serves up, and not for the first time); i.e., in ways that admittedly miss out on Lewis' genderqueer cryptonymy and fakery concealing profound critical bite. But allegory can still do a fair amount of the legwork the original author didn't care about; i.e., a show from nearly two decades past cheerfully romances the neo-noir as caught between an aging "Goth rock" stalwart ("Meat Loaf again?") and a non-white working girl's assimilation opera speaking out as the spaghetti Western has done since Kurosawa and Leone: turning everyone's flaws inside out (up in our guts)!

Admittedly the whore in the show has less power than Meat Loaf does, but nonetheless speaks/ties to a larger process of exploitation; i.e., one that sees her making callous sacrifices insofar as she doesn't lose sleep over the dead raccoons, either (the latter slayed rather ignominiously by John Saxon, of Enter the Dragon [1973] fame). Business-as-usual bites her in the ass!

Weaponized guilt, fatal nostalgia and ignominious death are the Gothic name-of-the-game, and everyone's kind of fucked/guilty here except the raccoons' indiscriminate spirit of revenge cynically making everyone basically commit suicide:

a mass hysteria narrative, tilting less at windmills and more smol, silver furry gods of death (coats of money that turn people into the same products, below)! Rather than call it Lacan's Real or something equally stupid for not being Marxist, I'll just say that the dialectical-material critique well-and-truly spreads the blame around; i.e., "This is what Capitalism does to your face!" basically turning the trap on the trapper! In keeping with Meat Loaf, its excessive gore is about as subtle and cool as a rock opera historically tends to be; i.e., while singing about rape and death as much as dark desire (with Argento rubbing everyone's faces in it, above)! It's dumb, fun and problematic when done wrong! So is dark xenophilia a trap to tip-toe!

More to the point of such mayhem from a pro-nature standpoint, then, the canonical rhetoric of exploitation in such fetishize-alienize stories replaces good education with fear and dogma regarding the protection of women and children; i.e., from a vague and nebulous animalistic threat tied to animal exploitation since the French and Indian War's romanticizing of the fur trapper industry in more modern hauntings of the medium outside of anything Masters of Horror dared: "groomers." Bourgeois propaganda keeps the workers scared stupid about their own bodies, sexualities and genders, but also of furies and other nature-themed monsters, whose own iconoclastic extracurricular praxis challenges the curriculum of state propaganda—by dancing on their graves before they die (a death curse, Pagan-style, but glamorous in its sidhe charms)!

As something to reclaim through transgressive camp, such iconoclasm inverts fears of the hunter and hunted during exchanges like Argento's; i.e., the hunters chase what they hate as different from what canon allows. Thus the hunted, though not always, can be taught to hate their own bodies, genders and identifies for being different, hence "responsible" for the violence inflicted upon them by the state as extending to nature being something to attack (as the sex worker in "Pelts" does; re: manufactured apathy when trying to save her own skin).

To encourage cooperation from some women or tokenized groups, then, the Patriarchy will divide and conquer labor and nature by punishing GNC people/furries more than cis-het women; i.e., by calling them (usually male or at least male-presenting trans, intersex or enby workers) "groomers," and all while making straight women and children more vulnerable to actual sex pests who pimp such xenophilia in bad faith (which tend to be white, cis-het men, especially religious authority figures, coaches and cops, who use various degrees and styles of conversion therapy to groom future victims with; i.e., false shepherds; e.g., Genetically Modified Skeptic's "How Conservative Christianity 'Groomed' Us," 2023).

Under such orchestrated division dividing natures against natures to police themselves (thus prepare different sides for the same brothel/abattoir), the death of playful, actually-fun-and-informative monster language is a quick and reliable result, but also a slow, painful rape of the mind and one's dignity. Common casualties not only include words like "breedable" that seek to reclaim workers' reproductive rights, bodies and expressions of themselves (and their rape trauma) through anthropomorphic art; they also include people from areas of the world who are more regulated in the present space and time, regardless of where they call home); e.g., Arab-presenting (or confused for) women, regardless if said women are Muslim or even Arab (e.g., Iranians commonly being mistaken for Iraqis by ignorant hateful Americans during the War on Terror): Orientalism is xenophobia and xenophilia as something to camp out of canonical forms chattelizing exotic prey!

(exhibit 53a: Artist: Nishakatani. Their exhibit of sexy rebellion shows how women in ultraconservative countries—or people forced to identify as women, in these places—often go to other countries as foreign exchange students, then find ways of escaping the literal revenge killings waiting for them back at home. Such brutality is not performed by extremist terrorists, but by literal members of their own families upholding the values of an ecclesiastical state emboldened by neoliberal Capitalism [exploiting war in the Middle East, framing the genocides—when they actually choose to opportunistically acknowledge them—as "sad," but the "natural" order of things to police, nonetheless].

In the West, a Gothic princess gains control inside larger castles whose impolite society encases whatever paltry dynasties have been promised to her as dreams for her to make real; i.e., under half-real circumstances, as much happening through play helping her relax and focus on her larger task at hand—something transplants quickly learn to work with through the self-same paradoxes; re: of the whore and of rape reclaiming terror to give her power back!

There's no shame, then, in weaponizing vanity and self-interest to motivate a collective well-being that former abusers/victims are walking away from [re: Omelas, but also "Amazing Grace": "I was blind but now I see!" being a former slaver's subsequent confession, remorse and celebration]. Except, time waits for no one, and genocides are like a ticking FOMO clock; i.e., those under genocide as a matter of staged extermination chattelizing vermin, which suddenly cannot afford to wait on the time of American moderates/tokens leaving Capitalist Realism and its denials [the final stage of genocide, below] behind, let alone neoconservatives and dyed-in-the-wool war hawks and white moderate "foxes" facilitating genocide at home and abroad;

re: because "animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms," targets of genocide—as a selectively punitive and globalized ordeal—must solidarize while reclaiming their bodies, genders, emotions and labor now-and-from tokenized traitors; i.e., the latter poisoning the well and not just as witch cops, but furry cops. We must stand against them as whore rebels fighting whore cops; i.e., doing so to exact the whore of nature's stewardship-as-revenge: iconoclastic expressions of critical power through furry-made or at least -themed and -adjacent sex-positive dark xenophilia that are often discrete, furtive and careful [a kind of "flashing" we'll return to in Volume Three, Chapter Five]: the ungroomed pussy hair contrasted with their carefully maintained clothed appearances, a counterterrorist resisting honor killings in state-controlled territories [e.g., Saudi Arabia] abusing women for an infidel's Western paradigm. Money talks and sex sells, a pimp a pimp anywhere in the world!)

As Gothic Communists, then, our educational goal is social-sexual—using sex education to liberate all workers in reclaimed furry monstrous-monstrous expressions of nature as something that Capitalism historically-materially exploits to the hilt; i.e., a Grover's Mill/Miller's Grove War-of-the-Worlds-scale hauntology that articulates what's happening when the fascists go mask-off! So must we, to some extent, make ourselves paradoxically known during the cryptonymy process' ludo-Gothic BDSM: when the Nazi werewolves come out to play and howl xenophobically at the moon, we must howl back xenophillically to ironically challenge their lunacy with our own!

So do we fur fags get down-and-dirty for the Cause—not to sleep with Nazis during brothel-espionage Amazonomachia, but fuck with them from afar behind our usual buffers: "You want some of this cake?" TA-DAAA! The cake is a lie (this, in BDSM circles, is called being a brat; i.e., the usual victims of "rape" taunting the usual "ravishers" by putting both in quotes)!

To that—and speaking of cakes as things to make however we want—the werewolf is classically a shapeshifter who doesn't need the moon to change (an astrology allegory tied to capital that demonizes the astral bodies and Pagan solstices; e.g., Halloween, but also Easter under a Protestant ethic pimping witches by turning them into cops and keeping the werewolf costume as much as the witch).

The fact remains, whatever the form a furry (or their cake) takes, our pedagogies of the oppressed aim to encourage emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness "taking the cake" back; re: during dark xenophilic as something to ironically express through our bodies not just as undead or demonic, but animalized in poetically tasty ways that are inherently GNC and animalistic (which Cartesian thought abjures; i.e., it "tames" nature by dimorphizing it, which always promotes [and disguises] a degree of colonial violence): "She's got a whole bakery back there!" Of stolen baked goods we make ourselves, so do we whores rob the pimp blind (some people like to watch others eat, but watching's no fun if you want to "eat" the "cake"): cake cryptonymy! Huge cake ahead, an iceberg sitting on your cake/sinking your battleship! Ok, I'll stop!

(exhibit 53b1: Comments about Steven Segal running weird aside, Under Siege [1989] offers a surprisingly frank look at heteronormativity "at sea" [with its own famous \[fake\] cake scene](#); i.e., "straightwashing" the sailor's matelotage of yore with Erika Eleniak—a 1989 Playboy bunny and '80s scream queen doing a strip tease for a now-dead admiral acting as his stowaway whore: Taylor Jordan. Except, our smuggled-in Gothic heroine/de facto big-titty Goth GF doesn't realize her audience is dead because she's on autopilot; i.e., doing the one-glove Michael Jackson thing less in mil spec fetish gear and more in actually-commandeered officer's gear intended for the aged head of the ship to watch being profaned: fucking the ship in a Sapphic xenophilia. "Like, Zoiks, Scoob! I think I took one-too-many Scooby snacks!"

It's the usual chastity narrative teasing the audience, but speaks to how "Taylor" felt "seasick" for the drugs; i.e., as code for her not wanting to do the job [airsick, too, from the helicopter]. If memory serves, the makers of the film played into Eleniak's real-life porn giving a meta commentary on how showbiz isn't always glamorous; re: the show must go on! Except, the cake isn't real, her role is acted/fake, and the ship has been hijacked by pirates that our "Prince Hamlet" must break the titular siege of and get the girl [and her pillow princess' mammoth mommy milkers] by the end! How Gothic!

Also Gothic is how such things don't always reflect what the actresses are commenting on; i.e., from Jane Austen's Catherine Moorland to Eleniak, herself, having a ball of it:

GJG: Did being part of such a big movie bring lots of offers for future films?

EE: I was very fortunate in that my Mom was the complete opposite of what a typical "stage mother" is. She made sure that I had a normal childhood and stayed in school. I had worked a couple of jobs a year on average but as far as getting roles based on E.T.: there were none that I am aware of.

GJG: I loved your role as Jordan Tate in Under Siege. Was there a reason why you didn't appear in the sequel?

EE: Under Siege was a great film and a fantastic project to be a part of. The role of Jordan Tate was pure FUN to play. I am often asked why I was not cast in the sequel. From what I understand, they wanted to make a completely different theme and therefore a new cast.

GJG: What was it like working with Tommy Lee Jones in that movie?

EE: Working with Tommy Lee Jones was an honor for me. He is one of my favorite actors of all time. Watching him work with Gary Busey was also inspiring. They wrote, re-wrote, created, improvised. It was amazing to watch (source: goJimmygo's "A Conversation With Erika Eleniak," 2012).

(artist: Erika Eleniak)

In other words, Eleniak was something of a mystery to the boys and their world, and they to hers during the usual manufactured divisions and scarcities extending to and offstage! But also, Eleniak was a smoke-show actress on the big screen, little screen, and softcore porno mag centerfold [above] that translated on and offstage to a Gothic meta commentary about "danger" as therapeutic for those lucky and unlucky through accident of birth!

Consider Eleniak's starlet-style landing strip but also the asymmetrical power divisions and exchange markets concerning sex trafficking fears and places for such tortures, Radcliffe onwards. Yes, Eleniak's Taylor is a sexual reward for the underserving hero—with Segal being a famous sex pest known for abusing women and aggrandizing himself—but still has fun/the ability to convey different xenophilic feelings, during the photoplay's usual T&A swashbuckling: in ways Eleniak found fun by making fun; i.e., in a mostly for-the-boys action romp mistrustful of women/their furry parts, but especially catching feelings for them as heartless sea monsters [as seaman historically treated women, mermaids or not]. That's her whore's revenge! Any port in a storm, boys?)

All kidding aside, furies, Communism and Gothic morphology/adventure stories and porn are not separate ideas during dark xenophilia; i.e., any more than "cake" and "death" are during neo-medieval camp (eat your heart out, Tamora, Queen of the Goths). Such things go hand-in-hand to stress the liminality of a given performance's biological, mechanical and/or instinctual elements: towards ourselves, celebrated for a closeness to natural as "primal." They become their own kind of nostalgia to regress xenophilically to, then, if only for a small window of play and time in safe "danger" spaces; i.e., the same ones that all kinks use, hard or not, during ludo-Gothic BDSM, and ones promoted by the aesthetic of the whore cosmetic as commonly dressed in black velvet leather or furs; re: as "alien" thus signifying various things said whores will do that a husband's Madonna won't:

during virgin/whore syndrome wounding their pride in our capable hands! "Shiver me timbers!" TIMBERS SHIVERED!

deserting her unit, soon proves that she's craftier than most inmates. She tries to escape via a restroom, a theme-park ride and a convertible. But, when Rock and Eddie find they're impressed by Toni's pluck, the nature of their task changes." It's reads like trash, and it is trash, but Eleniak's always having fun with it, because luck aside, she was good at her job in ways sex workers need to be: reading the room, onstage and off, but also between those things whiling camping canon xenophilia as whore getting lucky while not getting raped during rape play! "She is Lady Luck!" Tit for tat! The whore—whether fucking or not—navigating the performance one way or another!

Whatever socio-material class, culture and race privilege/oppression exist offstage, they bleed onstage, too; i.e., the cryptonymic paradox of power lurks on the surface of the Aegis bouncing back and forth like a drum; re: as a hauntological space of concealment that shows and hides simultaneously through controlled play! Through said play's improved, sex-positive evolution, the vulnerable princess trope has power unto itself; i.e., before it evolves or changes into a queen, if ever that happens! The point is, it doesn't need to, provided sex positivity occurs, hence Gothic-Communist development, mid-synthesis; i.e., as socio-material context during ludo-Gothic BDSM. It's haunted by slumming and rape in a danger disco, but the princess is free to be "ravished" and transform/transport us through her slutty exchanges, revenge and xenophilic revelations: research, release, rescue, rape and relationship swirling wonderfully on the same stained-glass episodic's white-hot plasma; re: the whore, policed, pimps the ghost of abuse!

Furthermore, each time we return to knead its potential, the bread basket gives up more and more yummy treats: with a special friend we cannot fuck or be with, in person, yet something profoundly made-to-order as ace and erotic, happy to please! We raid the castle and the traveling fortress/pirate ship in small boards us; i.e., the longer humans have had access to writing and games, the more these and their camp have become increasingly haunted by ghosts inside-outside themselves;

re: the usual mise-en-abyme hyphenations of sex and force, shelter and exposure, unfolding per the dialectic of the alien!

As such, humans are ontologically messy and sit, one and all, hermeneutically in between language as oral/written, but also played out between and on recursive and reflective stages' usual cryptonymies' playtime and recess/aftercare: to regress magically towards a childlike theatricality's special ability to exchange that, unto itself, has been forgotten, and sits between what is being exchanged while the rememory process welcomes an adult-child return to innocence after experience shapes and evokes said nostalgia into a terrifying boomerang double threatening boom and bust.

Seemingly at odds, both forms of power historically-materially interrogate and dialectically-materially negotiate with themselves and the audience looking in, if any—meaning simultaneously and on the stormy seas of spectacular battle and delicious hoax; i.e., sex in a nutshell something to assign further significance towards and in the usual playfulness embracing a silly-serious cryptomimetic echo! All our yesterdays, summoned to our fresh service, making Marx gayer with each foray into the wild frontier's unknown discoveries? Medusa's avatar was a dummy-thicc nerd with glasses, sweater kittens and a fat ass? FULL BROADSIDE! DISCHARGE AND SPREAD THE MUNITIONS ALL OVER HER PROW! SHE'S OURS FOR THE TAKING! RAMMING SPEED!

Fun is often a nice surprise, but also the entire point; i.e., it's how humans learn and pass information along. However unintended a given side effect is—and regardless of what [a]sexual elements we get out of it when fetishizing class war in the shadow of state exploitation and war for profit that we're camping—that's the magic of roleplay and ludo-Gothic BDSM! To give our actions and roles power as an identity formation and exchange network embodied between us, meaning one we can exchange through the usual performative language of cyclical and monomythic, gyn-ecological conquest as something to perform—not to further abjection, but reverse it to have the whore's revenge; re: mid-ravishing whatever value and vice we assign to whatever we want, minus actual harm as we make a pass at you; i.e., a military drill in disguise, but also fun and games; e.g., the Blue Gemstone of Star Sapphire Power wedged between Harmony's fat cheeks and deep into her tight asshole: "This is the work of an enemy Stand!"

Lost in your necropolis, neither fully dead nor alive while aping the looting of Rome [Jameson's class nightmare of the Gothic given conscious utility]! A grapeshot ensemble, littering the halls with fresh dead, and haunting the fall of the princess with the spirit of a little rebel faking her own death [and hinting at the systemic deaths of the bourgeoisie]! Roast her squishy, marshmallow, crackerjack[-in-a-box] ass; get a cereal decoder ring! CASTLE RAIDED!)

Capital busies pimps; pimps or not, workers are so busy chasing whores/feeling sorry for them, they forget we can handle ourselves to some extent. In any event, such syndromes need to be negotiated and subverted through ourselves and our work having a humorous side; i.e., through social interactions that speak a social species that is both alienized and made fetish by the state, but also designing returns to more vivid and intense forms of dark xenophilic poetic expression. These can be down-and-dirty "breeder" scenarios/piece-of-ass schtick, but just as often, they're quite tender and intimate; i.e., in ways whose immediate animality is uncanny in—for the uninitiated—a surprisingly nurturing and welcome fursona nevertheless closer to life and death as some than your average worker is: a piece of cake/princess of the twilight realms dodging state guillotines!

This "good play" and pedagogy of the oppressed can involve many different teaching methods through art—to insert things into you not just as drugs to imbibe, but food to eat, Alice-in-Wonderland-style; i.e., literal objects in your body as a form of dark xenophilic art; e.g., dildos as material extensions of the body but also carnal appendages like limbs, digits or unusual extensions into forbidden holes (evoking Tool's "Stinkfist") and liminal expressions of these things: the biomechanical expression of the human form, but also the decolonization of its bodily functions, biology and gender roles away from Cartesian dualism and heteronormative canon!

In this sense, the cake is still cake, but is and isn't what the state bakes it to be; i.e., liminal expressions of the human body through erotic Gothic art represents cultural fears and fascinations with taboo things like nature; re: that we've since become divided from in the modern capitalist world: the animal side as something that calls to us and promotes healthy (ex)change and openings of the mind as closed by capital settler-colonial police-the-furry-slut ghetto-brothel pogroms!

To it, I want to spend the rest of part one setting up/exploring the premise of interactive education generating dark empathy/nature and the whore's xenophilic revenge; i.e., as communicated/prepared between artist/muse creatives (thirteen pages, plus some extra exhibits), and then spent part two unpacking educating dark xenophilia in full: giving it back to the next generation, from children onwards!

Muses, then, can teach the artist about all sorts of things. Take anal, for example; i.e., I was scared of anal for many years, the anus being an abject site of disgust for me going in and something I recognized as a site of rape and coerced entry from unwanted male forces; e.g., humiliating sodomy. In other words, I hated the thought of invading it based on its reputation as a site for coercive, unironic tortures historically committed by men, usually against women but also feminized subjects within rape culture more broadly (which I experienced with Jadis abusing me—not during the sex, itself, but from the financial abuse attached to it).

Personally I learned to stop worrying and like anal sex more by experimenting with various de facto educators—monstrous-feminine owners of anuses who taught me that anal as an act of giving and receiving can be pretty fun, once ventured; i.e., it can be something you never try—or eventually try but never like—and that's ok! Same goes with furies, too! The idea is to figuratively and literally play with yourself and others, learning from these xenophilic experiences and passing that information along—not just with our literal bodies, but "Satanic" forms that, under the status quo, have become chattelized and demonized extensions of neoliberal/fascist fear and dogma; e.g., demonized forms of Paganistic, thus notably pre-Christian religions or ways of life as being closer to nature: as "untame," wild and dark, thus whore-like in ways that nuclear proponents treat with hostility as a matter of thinking chattel/slaves!

However aberrant canon frames furies, the medicinal idea of sex-positive monster-fucking and natural magics can break these modernized myths; i.e., by offering proletarian forms of sex/gender education and good play based on personal experiences defined by a bond with nature as something to identify with through shared oppression; e.g., catharsis, euphoria and lived trauma, etc, tied to furry panic. Singular anecdotes remain vital because they help form a larger web whose interlinked connections' empathy through xenophilia can not only be felt and expressed in liminal, surreal forms, but sensed dualistically among peoples whose minds are still fully or partially divided: a Gothic, animalized surrealism evoked famously by the likes of Giger and Beksiński over decades, but whose hellish and oft-erotic "pathways" can be taken during xenophilia as artistically embodied by new artists in similar surreal-yet-refreshing ways.

This includes living latex (e.g., below, but also exhibit 60e1), but also furies begetting revolutionarily cryptonymic ideas of dark radical (ex)change: to witness among our friends (e.g., Angel, exhibit 54) and associates various dark boundaries and paradoxes to install and act out; re: chasing dark buddies down while haunted by colonial trauma (the skinned animal worn as a suit [often synthetically made] to reclaim nature with/from capital, below); i.e., as we "hug the alien" in multiplicity and liminal anisotropic duality! The suit isn't strictly a prophylactic, then, but dark aphrodisiac and sensory dampener dispensing with the pleasantries! She squirts more than a grapefruit! Consent, play and fun are hot! So is provocation!

(artist: Zero Brain Pow)

Yet, corporations and other bourgeois forces will strive not just to impeach these educators' infernal gravity and magnetism, but rob their animalistic teaching methods of any critical power and iconoclastic potential to advertise with. To this, the nature of rebellious furies is communal in ways that don't stress profit above the community—an anti-capitalist trading of goods and bartering that corporations don't endorse or practice themselves; i.e., empowering artists, but also donating generously to philanthropic causes while using their xenophilic fursonas as educator personalities developed between smaller collaborations dedicated to a larger cause (above and below):

(exhibit 54: Model and artist: Angel and Persephone van der Waard's "Transformation, Collage: A Mermaid's Exhibit" [2023]. My first collage. Most of these photos are "dark matter photos"—"dark matter of the visual world" [Thomas Keenan's "What is a Document?" 2014] being a term-of-phrase that Zeuhl introduced me to, referring to the colossal number of digital images [millions upon millions, I'd wager] taken every day online that no one will ever see because the taker keeps them in an archive that is private and/or otherwise inaccessible through the sheer volume of material. This shoot includes photos taken that the model chose for the 45 poses I paid them for—45 poses with multiple shots per pose and "the good ones" being cherry-picked and sent to me.

I, in turn, took the ones I liked best and put them into a collage, but one of which I later planned to select from to illustrate. However, in terms of showcasing the model's body in art, these images are anathema according to the Symbolic Order/mythic structure endorsed through Capitalism; i.e., bodies with external labia and excessive body hair having cryptonymically become darkness invisible because their owners are discouraged from showing themselves—shamed, prohibited, or presented coercively as sex monsters through a punitive-prescriptive production model built on/around preferential mistreatment: good girls may be seen but not heard; bad girls get punished with image death, job death, social death or actual death in passive and proactive ways save when tokenizing as whores the state can pimp. The relationship Angel and I had changes that by treating and showing them as simultaneously human-yet-monstrous; i.e., through the context of mutual consent/negotiation [a prime factor of ludo-Gothic BDSM, thus Gothic Communism]!)

For example, aside from Zero Brain Pow and her compatriot, the above collage was taken from a larger shoot between Angel and myself. It was taken by them (and a friend of theirs holding the camera) to be part of this book, used inside it with their permission. Angel became familiar with my work by responding to a Reddit ad where I was looking for models to draw in a fantasy style (source: Chozogirl86's "[for hire] looking for pin-up models to collab in fantasy art projects. Art worth $80+ in exchange for modeling services!" on r/starvingartists, October 29th, 2022). They chose a mermaid and we eventually prepared for the shoot. I think it was $120 for 45 photos (roughly $2.5 per photo)? Thereabouts!

Eventually I may draw Angel as a mermaid, like in exhibit 54; i.e., for funsies outside of our agreement. Per our agreement, though, I paid for the photos, and used them to draw Angel as a vampire; re: from Volume Zero (exhibit 1a1a1h5, left), the exhibit thereof actually based on Dio from Jo-Jo because Angel loves that show. And yet, the deeper context behind our collaboration embodies the continuum of xenophilic praxis surrounding Gothic Communism; i.e., as dark xenophilia stretching cryptomimetically across space and time, onstage and off, backwards and forwards. as something to communicate prior to me actually drawing anything—merely it as assembled with nuts and bolts that have nevertheless become their own art exhibit (unintentionally but very much in the spirit of this book): a historical-material transaction between two parties inspired by other parties to meet different xenophilic goals of universal liberation chased by all.

In turn, these collectively-if-stochastically operate as part of a larger s mode of nature-themed whorish apologia; i.e., for Angel to learn about themselves by expressing and showing off who they're becoming as something to teach me (and teaching me about Jo-Jo but also shunga media), and for me to teach and convey my ideas to them and to the world we're both adding towards: on the same umbral/umbilical lattice, passing dark xenophilia along in all directions!

And furthermore, in doing so, everything goes into the same sex-educational pot—each educator getting something useful and enriching out of a mutually beneficial, anisotropic lesson plan: playing with furry poetics in "ancient" forms of poetry that deal—like Walpole did before us—in and with fairly quotidian struggles trafficking magical qualities of GNC existence, expression, exchange and ultimately transformation being uniformly "dark." That struggle means different things for both of us, but contributes towards a larger goal that, like Communism and helping liberate nature from capital, is forever ongoing in holistic and populous ways that intersect and diverge; e.g., we've both changed a ton since making our mutual deal with the Devil, as have any of the artists featured in this book!

The lesson isn't just "for us," then; it's for the world—to teach people through these dark xenophilic connections and emphaera to be more emotionally intelligent and aware about nature and the Gothic, thus enriching the lives of workers by making them less stupid; i.e., in a deprivatized sense, which ludo-Gothic BDSM helps accomplish through furies, among other monsters (with Angel again liking vampires; re: Jo-Jo). As such, doing so is a process of continual improvement in opposition to state abuse stupefying its labor force for profit: an abject "pill" to consume in a variety of ways—not in privately owned factories, but made between two (or more) workers relying on the awesome power of the body and mind reunited with each other and nature through mutual consent as an artistic movement: illustrated as labor action by turning into magical animals symbolic of profound transformation in Western culture since Ovid!

To help workers get what they want—sex, companionship, improved material conditions, legislative rights, shelter and so on—they must be taught to fight back by seeing themselves as human-yet-chattelized in ways they can reclaim; i.e., to relate to one another as animalize beings in drug-like poetics cultivated to defend the vulnerable from legitimate zoophilic threats. This happens by not being creepy weirdos who have no earthly idea how to talk to women (and other mates); i.e., those beings forced to identify as women, non-binary people, asexual people, and other marginalized groups (even non-human pets) who are often sexualized against their will in dehumanizing modes of chattel stripped of their reverse-bject magic.

In short, the entire social process must be rehumanized, including the magical language of nature and its non-human animal demons; re: as something to reclaim from capital's neoliberal illusions; i.e., the spell of a secular world that nevertheless remains haunted by Puritanical dogma and Cartesian domination verminizing the weak (again, human or not) to turn a buck behind Capitalist Realism. Small wonder we whores seek revenge (the monstrous-feminine "born dead" in different ways, depending on who you're talking about/dealing with): for ourselves as small invulnerable parties raped, like any animal, "on the slab."

Keeping with acid Communism and trauma, I'm largely referring to the red pill as stolen from The Matrix directors (modern-day Mercutios, going to Queen Maeb); i.e., the left from them done by Manosphere pigs who proudly wear their sexism and ignorance on their sleeves like a badge of honor (fascists love playing dumb to please master). Except, bigotries tend to overlap with second-hand abuse, and said sexism of direct abusers extends to so-called "normal folk"; i.e., who also have a lot to learn about people (and other animals) outside their normal range of experience/abjection (and who look the other way when hate crimes against GNC persons happen, or any minority under the sun).

Keeping with the pill analogy as a dark xenophilic acid-Communist metaphor/refrain, I liken the effects of Gothic Communism's pedagogy through ludo-Gothic BDSM as a social-sexual "drug" that has wide-reaching linguo-material effects. "Taken," said drug displays a startlingly vivid portrayal of neuroplasticity on the canvas—one's body and gender but also symbols and themes of these interwoven and roiling-writhing across society like a menacing snake ball. You can literally watch people's views and art change magically before your very eyes (with danger and adrenaline making for a powerful aphrodisiac during calculated risk, but also general societal inspiration, too): if we can change into the dark GNC furies/furry-adjacent people we turned into, then maybe others can, thus the world! It beats the xenophobic abattoir we currently subsist inside!

Alas, sexuality and gender—even when divorced from monstrous-feminine animal themes, stigma and language as part of a sex-educational exhibit—often are banned even when attempting to normalize diversity with kid-friendly animal mascots; i.e., in books written (and drawn) for children; e.g., It's Perfectly Normal attempting to normalize sex and learning about it through anthropomorphism, versus steeping such things in ignorance to the detrimental of all—with powerful men becoming inadequate save when they're torturing women-as-animal, as well as non-human animals and anything else they fetish-feminize: to feel like men, yet alienate themselves from everything in pursuit of such nonsense!

(exhibit 55a: Originally published in 1994, Robie Harris and Michael Emberley's It's Perfectly Normal didn't include gender—not until a new edition came out in 2019, twenty-five years later! Until then, the book was banned for many years and continues to be banned and challenged to this day! At the time, it gave teenage me a better understanding of my pubescent sexuality as a young artist; i.e., as wanting to express myself in the mid '90s in relatively limited animal monster language: Harris and Emberley's Bird and Bee my first brush with furry art [not being exposed to DBZ and Saiyans until 1996]!

Now, I'm delighted to see it includes a section—if not on furies, then at least on gender studies—which I've included in my own book for the purposes of study and critique the [full image can be accessed on my site]. Suffice to say, the writing and illustrations indicate an expanded audience; i.e., with more people of color and other ethnic minorities, as well as the entire LGBTQ+ spectrum, including ace people! That being said the book isn't curricular—it is extracurricular but remains an excellent example of morphologically sex-and-gender education meant for children ten-and-up that allows for holistic xenophilic artistic expression; i.e., of these things married to talking animals: something to consider and emulate in our own work as de facto educators stressing sexual and asexual appreciation of nudity and gender in sexualized media—a concept we'll return to, in Volume Three!

For now, just remember that Matt Walsh hates Harris and Emberley's book because it represents something he fears and loathes: educated children and universal acceptance and love. Such things are antithetical to profit, which must always be raping nature as alien animal whore!)

To that, Gothic Communism demonstrably produces sex-positive results in the art itself; i.e., as something to exhibit and explain the history of, but also improve upon over time: with new editions that expand to include increasingly marginalized groups, my series doing the same thing as Harris and Emberley did (a conscious attempt at diversity and voluntary representation for those working with me in increasingly xenophilic ways Harris and Emberley couldn't, given their target audience not being teenage or 18+). And while our target audience is all peoples, there's a particular emphasis on educating children, teenagers and young adults—to educate them through our own artistic expressions; re: to become more emotionally and Gothically intelligent/aware in regards to nature, animals, magic and drugs as vital xenophilic components thereof: to decrease ignorance regarding and reducing the risk of rape by diminishing profit as a dogmatic structure. No offense, but simply talking about the birds and the bees will not cut it!

Speaking for myself in that regard, books only get you so far in affairs of sex and love; i.e., despite having an overabundance on puberty and how to make babies, said glut of media actually did almost nothing to prepare me for the complexities of relationships (sexual or not) growing up! So while I had sex when I was in my early twenties, and wrote a great deal of fantasy stories/drew much in terms of trans fiction with magical-animal shapeshifters (re: Glenn the Goblin, exhibit 44a1b1a), I didn't start having regular social-sexual relationships until I was 29, and didn't have my first relatively healthy one (with Cuwu) until I was 35; I didn't meet Bay—my life partner and husband—until I was almost 37 ("I'm 37!"). It might seem like a drag to learn all of this so late; then again, some people never learn, and I've learned a lot/met some truly awesome people doing this book! Growing hurts, and I wouldn't change a thing!

Furthermore, not talking about sex and gender at all and asking kids to abstain from sex (despite it being sold to them in animalized forms) is frankly a historical-material recipe for disaster punishing furies and other objects of natural exploitation; i.e., one deliberately made by those in power to keep youngsters ignorant and afraid, thus easier to control. By abolishing state schooling and making extracurricular materials scarce, book-banning and -burning always follow with people-banning and -burning as vermin to exterminate; i.e., we can't afford to be innocent this time! This includes regarding how the state manipulates children into adulthood through the fears they'll invariably have pertaining to their own bodies as animalistic; i.e., in relation to the natural-material world around them coded with signs promising punishment and control they can triangulate onto state scapegoats: bigots will fear animals and nature as needing to be tamed, thus will look the other way or even participate directly in hate crimes against "evil" totems and other natural demons (think Lord of the Flies and you have the right idea, left).

Simply put, there's always someone stronger to exploit someone weaker in their system, and guess which one you're gonna be!

In relation to this fascist apathy as something to survive and challenge with empathy as, itself, darkly xenophilic and vengeful (through creative success), queer-coding is a sign for those who know—often by blending it in liminal ways that walk the tightrope: hiding ourselves but also making ourselves visible; i.e., as we trespass cryptonymically into reclaimed territories in search of better parentage to "dole out," hence impart unto the young as starved for good sex education; e.g., like the Bat Signal, except it's an act of subversive education through reclaimed objects of animal fear (the bat and other creatures of the night) that dismantle billionaires and Bruce-Wayne-style police violence while combating criminogenic etiologies, not symptoms (save to punch fascists and expose cops as traitors).

In turn, the latter unfolds during what, for many queer people, is a second childhood; i.e., not just through experimental drug use—be that puberty blockers, HRT or similar gender-affirming care—but a state of mind that reflects on exiting the closet while looking back into said closet as an adult: a dog having left its cage but embracing its dog-like liberation from slavery during ludo-Gothic BDSM (anthromorph sex, but also social courtship practices, below)!

Such "trips" (so to speak) head down memory lane in a very Gothic way and one that queer groups in particular tend to experience more by virtue of them realizing they were always gay and looking back on a formerly "straight" childhood puppy love; i.e., with fresh eyes, drugs or no drugs. Children's cartoons makes for good places to start, then, because they routinely concern a time when the brain is still rapidly growing/the hemispheres haven't fused yet, and experimental drug use/self-medication generally isn't occurring (one can hope); e.g., with me revisiting Sailor Moon, but my friend Angel considering Revolutionary Girl Utena (1999) through a similar developing queer lens (and fanzine they help run):

(exhibit 55b: Revolutionary Girl Utena applies the "prince" style of crossdress to female-centric heroism; i.e., working inside a reimagined historicism/mil spec: the female officer of the novel-of-manners as traditionally male. Yet, the bildungsroman speaks to a hauntological coming-of-age that isn't tied strictly to biology and teenage adolescence; i.e., a second adolescence experienced by trans people, said GNC persons addressing Gothic maturities hinted at in earlier fictions less versed in GNC/furry diction, but not material struggles surrounding courtship and its tell-tale lycanthropes' jousting maneuvers during demonic courtly love [an Amazon no different than a furry insofar as both belong to nature as something to assimilate or annihilate]!

In Austen's Persuasion, for example, Captain Harville represents a new rising class of "made man" through soldiery on the tides: the naval officer as able to socially elevate and offer himself as a particular catch to heroine's like Anne Elliot. Utena bends this dichotomy as more than simply reversed; i.e., during cis-gendered, drag "king" theatrics, but rather as queer love happening entirely between AFAB characters that translate to those who aren't female feeling/relating to female/feminine existence in animal-like ways: as GNC monstrous-feminine, themselves; e.g., me feeling chattelized in ways that women historically have been, and wanting to grow strong without assimilating but instead acclimating myself with the classic theatres of assimilation to subvert it as Utena does.)

As part one of this subchapter has shown, sex education often works within totemic and natural-demonic language; i.e., as policed and persecuted, regarding the education of child and adults, and whose dark xenophilia extends to defenders of nature belonging to, or identifying with, nature; re: through monster-fucking as a magical, iconoclastic act with drug-like animal elements. These heretical educations can involve anthropomorphic animals, of course, but also symbols of nature as potentiating dark drugs to take that are frequently associated with natural "magics"; e.g., like astrology or Paganism as things to poetic convey to children at the correct age; i.e., those in the midst of sexually maturing into adults, but also grappling with performative and identifying notions of gender mid-struggle as whore-like, animalized, and ultimately alien.

Indeed, a common form of integrating natural demonology into sex education is through children's literature—with the stars of many-a-children's book being anthropomorphized animals (exhibit 55/56a) but also magic girls as cute protectors of nature; re: Sailor Scouts, aka witches by another name as sex-positive, soldierly expression having its own navy girl aesthetic: Pretty Soldier Sailor Moon (the female soldier gender-bend also being present within Utena).

Sailing is just a chance for discover new life and leases thereof through assimilation, but charting a course through the veins of capital out into realms of exciting possibility that can change capital at the same time. Out of 17th, 18th and 19th century matelotage or seamanship, then, emerged the sailor (scout or not); i.e., as a pirate-adjacent symbol of "queer" discourse in fantasy stories aimed at children, but also adults; e.g., "Hey, sailor!" "booty" and sodomy on the high seas among pirates as a countercultural tradition that was challenged by Cartesian thought pimping animalized workers and chattelized animals through the same unironic xenophilia, thus phobia. As the Closet Professor writes,

In Sodomy and the Pirate Tradition, historian B. R. Burg investigates the social and sexual world of these sea rovers, a tightly bound brotherhood of men engaged in almost constant warfare. What, he asks, did these men, often on the high seas for years at a time, do for sexual fulfillment? Buccaneer sexuality differed widely from that of other all-male institutions such as prisons, for it existed not within a regimented structure of rule, regulations, and oppressive supervision, but instead operated in a society in which widespread toleration of homosexuality was the norm and conditions encouraged its practice (source: "Sodomy and the Pirate Tradition: English Sea Rovers in the Seventeenth Century Caribbean," 2010).

Moving into part two of "Dark Xenophilia," we'll continue our investigations into nature-themed sex/gender education—first, by examining some of these magic girls next, as well as the larger sex-educational, genderqueer/and acid-Communist xenophilic trends they're associated with; re: chasing the black rabbit as an ongoing motif. We'll also examine the historical-material struggles (and political enemies) that sex-positive educators have faced while touching hearts and opening minds through increasingly pornographic, drug-like, and even surreal means!

Before we do, though, here's a few more exhibits to bridge the gap; i.e., which cover the ace-to-erotic/social-sexual gradient of xenophilic expression that furies inhabit alongside other monsters of the natural class. One broader cryptonymic categorization is Trojan animals, known more colloquially as Aesopian fables. In Volume Zero, we even talked about Trojan animals, but especially the black rabbit as divided further in two camps: the class-dormant, traitorous sort and the conscious double. Often these play out in videogames and neoliberal franchised material as something to hook kids on, Animal-Farm-style: kid-friendly ace kinds of "puppy love" that are expected to escalated sexually in monomythic ways!

"freedom fighter" animals that push back against a black-and-red Egghead/evil nerd who wrecks the environment and imprisons nature. All well and good, on its surface. Yet, the simulations for fighting against such cartoon villainy are themselves escapist power trips loaded with the usual false-hope clichés: the hero, heel, and damsel, the latter needing rescuing at the fastest possible speed through the aesthetics, but not the function of rebellion; i.e., neoliberal furry porn sold to kids, who grow up in to policing the monomythic refrain through its usual double standards: monopolizing xenophilia through a phobic abjection mentality taming magic-animal husbandry!

To that, nostalgia and fandoms commonly grow into "fan fic[tion]" head canon that prolongs the life of a franchise: fleecing the fantasy hero avatar through a femme fatale whore/moll and by extension the player base! As Rouge the Ghost Bat shows, fast [and unscrupulous] girls pick pockets with their pussies [or other holes]! Whores charge not just expensive, but exorbitant prices, their own named rates as pricey as exogamous dowries and far-off pastorals: sexy thieves making do by paying rent using their own classic modes of transaction under capital's usual tricks [so to speak]!

The fact remains, men are dumb but also, animals [or those reduced to animal means of survival as something to master] communicate through their butts; i.e., often through sense, touch and other non-verbal, instinctual methods of data/goods exchange: "Thank you! Come again!" So is survival a compelled service industry that pimps whores canonically through the topos of power of women; i.e., made to serve the usual dumbasses thinking they're owed much by "saving the world." But it's exceptionally educational in campier forms that enrich the whore; i.e., as more than a piece of ass treated as "tricksy" by weak-willed incels.

Rouge, for example, is a straight-up pro who takes Sonic for all he's worth [two pages down]! Watch and learn, girls! The point of the fantasy is catharsis as much as it is telling monstrous-feminine workers to leverage their position with sex. Yet, they can in and out of art should they choose to! Power is power and nothing commands attention like a whore dancing and/or fucking to metal! The power fantasy is anisotropic, insofar as men—the privileged group—dream constantly of different ways to be the conqueror paying the "easy/dangerous" whore in gold, during virgin/whore syndrome; and she, to manipulate these men for various reasons using tools not permitted to gentle, delicate, and otherwise prim-and-proper maidens.

There's a lot to play with, and it cuts both ways in different flavors per direction and role, but generally through the exchange of power symbolizing as different goods during the theatre of sex and force; re: Rouge—ready to throw down as much as get down—the holistic interplay ranging from poor white trash to redlined ghetto occupants seeing how the other side lives during a poetic spectrum of courtly love scenarios; i.e., whose social-sexual elements and Romantic-to-quotidian code [of sex and force, per folkways, mores, and taboos, but also prices paid and honor exacted by whomever]!

Furthermore, whatever the avatars, "humanity" is a battle for human rights under state comorbidities pimping nature as monstrous-feminine. As things to chase, enact or avoid, then, rape and respect occupy the same space; i.e., during education through ludo-Gothic BDSM as being good or bad [for workers or profit] to varying degrees. A whore wants respect, but also her rights respected, while she fights to survive as whores do [controlling the situation, above].

To it, there are endless ways to slum/play court; i.e., from a variety of registers and double standards, and regardless of one's age, color, class and/or creed. Modular genres intersect, combining the medieval romance with the modern noir and Western from the whore's perspective: the classic givers of sex, thus "luck" as something to get with, arbitrating through poetic performance and exchange—a farting and belching slut, guzzling cum and counting gold [a sex goblin]! In turn, men and Man-Box tokens are coded to mark, then prey upon such persons, and those persons to respond in kind defensively [re: Kagero, keeping her guard up]. We punch up and down from wherever accident of birth finds us! Whores are born in brothels, and brothels—like casinos and suburbs as architectural divisions during Cartesian us-versus them—are man-made [or penned by token authors; re: Radcliffe's Udolpho chastising Vallencourt, man-whoring it up in city-of-sin, Paris, tempting him with scarlet, non-English women of the night with loose morals]! She's "got Stockholm real bad!" pulling off the heist of a lifetime with her tight little pussy [and/or asshole, mouth, cleavage, thigh gap, etc]!

As such, Rouge is the whore to play out a variety of anisotropic power fantasies, be those assimilation, escape, or revenge, etc, and however temporary or returned to; i.e., from adults treating such animals and [a]sexualities/genders differently than children might: settling old scores by "running it back"! What sexphobes call "gooner" and "slut," for the whore is simply a day at the office, giving out bad-girl-to-GNC-sodomy rewards beyond basic vanilla maidens and prudes! And if that seems like a raw deal, we can camp and make it better onstage and off, doing so through Gothic poetics like Rouge the Bat; i.e., as someone to camp canon with as a member of the weird canonical nerd's usual stable [of token whores] colonizing nature per the usual mantras and axioms! Everyone likes the whore, if only to canonically exploit her [re: Radcliffe, but also similar stories fearing the whore as acting like a rapacious, functionally non-white man of nature/the streets; e.g., Zofloya's Victoria during the dialectic of shelter/the alien]!

And if that seems unfair and/or loaded to anyone wondering about the educational or exploitative values and vices worked with, ask why that might be from a historical-material standpoint; re: the criminogenic chattelizing of such liminal expression as taken by fans to do whatever they want with [often fantasizing about sex, but I digress]! A girl's gotta do what a girl's gotta do—getting dummies to overplay their hands while she takes the prize during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., when reduced seemingly to a disadvantaged position of survival, she's always thinking two moves ahead but ready for whatever comes [so to speak] in the present moment!

Rouge is a rogue⁴⁷⁰ in more ways than one, her chameleon sexuality violent and intense—simultaneously guilty as sin and carefree [while having maiden-esque elements/desires to be treated well: as a slut during the whore's paradox, thereby navigating one's confused/mixed feelings while nature/nurture takes its dialectical-⁴⁷⁰ I.e., hard-boiled, having no reproach nor remorse, but working instead to challenge manipulators with their own levers and facades/false pretenses of wisdom, goodness and health. A demon gives as good as she gets, taking like a vampire (specifically a ghost bat, in Rouge's case); i.e., to teach the usual bad-faith thieves a lesson. An open alien whose existence and trades are incessantly taboo doesn't have to keep up appearances by assimilating/can get the impostor on the hip through greater fluencies with such exchange; i.e., an open secrecy that their foe is less prepared to administer when pressured: keeping them close but at arm's length, the ace with the ass of the gods, working her usual pickpocket charms to take stolen goods won fairly to the local fence.

Such stories canonically blame the whore by fetishizing her even when she owns it; i.e., damned if she does, damned if she doesn't. Professional or personal, ace or ass, revenge is its own best success/revenge against profit; i.e., the usual detectives chasing with their own tails versus her solving the case with hers; re: between acting and not acting onstage and off; e.g., Katie Dickie solving her own son's murder by chasing the culprit through sex—an act that simultaneously repulses and excites her but also bores her to death—in ways that highlight her own loss and alienation, but also mistaken sense of justice when she discovers the killer already went to jail for the crime: drunk driving. He'd already atoned (or tried to), leading her to have to face her child's death in a new light:

material course]! Camping our own survival is fun—not ranking rape to act superior/punch down, but speaking to others through shared trauma during idiosyncratic privilege and oppression! Camping our own survival is fun—not ranking rape to act superior/punch down, but speaking to others through shared trauma during idiosyncratic privilege and oppression's sexually descriptive and culturally appreciative pedagogy of the oppressed! Whores need to look out for each other because other people classically don't [e.g., whorephobia in cop shows making us out to be the self-same whores Radcliffe's bad-faith maiden-esque dehumanized for profit]!

artist: [Schpicy]

Canon-wise, though, the corporatized nostalgia of the racing platformer [a race to sex: "Gotta go fast"] as controlled opposition is deftly brought to a new generation of kids by parents who were raised on the same stuff, except this time it's a run-'n-gun concerned with pugilistic forays alongside the shooter [similar to Sonic and Doom in the early '90s, I suppose].

First, it was Sonic's "shadow," Shadow, as the pissed-off false rebellion sold to kids, in 2005; i.e., swapping the Sonic-Adventure-level Fonzy hand signals for the middle-finger and pistol held sideways, and remade into a new post-Covid trilogy starring—I shit you not—Keanu-fucking-Reaves as Shadow [and Jim Carrey having turned from '90s pet detective to 2020s mad scientist reviving his career for the umpteenth time]. I can't hate it, at least not entirely!

More to the point, nature remains a common selling point through xenophilic exploitation media; i.e., through monomyth theatrics leveling up with the kids chasing power and sex through such horny animal pipedreams; i.e., Sonic's Japanese neoliberal schtick aping bigoted Pax Americana and selling it back to the states through their own gun porn: John Wick and Akira-style bike chases both strip-teasing and strip-mining the cyberpunk; i.e., as the "bad future" Sonic warned about, and which these and other furry avatars [with ace potential, if not always fandom expertise, above] are running around inside. Like a bat outta Hell, this translates easily enough to similar simulations also sold to teenagers and adults in parallel media pimping the same basic refrains [next page].

The rabbit, as a Paganized xenophilic symbol, is always fetishized under capital; re: including the kid-friendly "Sonic" type, which then extends to Sonic clones "all grewed up." In the case of Bunny from The First Descendant hero-shooter hybrid, it's basically a 2023 Destiny offshoot pimping "fetish Sonic with guns"; i.e., she's the original party animal Sonic was supposed to be [a rabbit] tied up in black fetish gear and electro-shocked with blue bolts of lightning while she sprints to and fro. It's ace as much as not, because BDSM is public nudism in paradoxical forms of nudity on the surface. But it's also fetishized militarism tied to social tiers of elevation and assimilation swapping the rabbit and Elmer Fudd to hunt the state's foes; re: courtly love, thus rape, leading its own kind of mercenary token zoophilia! A pimp is a pimp, a whore a whore that can pimp nature as an undercover cop whoring for the Man!

As such, Bunny's a corporate mercenary sold to Gen Z [and the next generation after that] as "merc merch": pure, appropriated sex appeal and brawn dimorphized in all the social-sexual usual ways: sex pot, smart, unavailable and dangerous [as the monstrous-feminine always is]. This means, if we want to camp canon, we'll be following her black tail/trail, not just the white rabbit's, through whatever drugs or drug-like poetics blazing happily through capital; i.e., in our own art/sex work, of course, but also our social-sex lives that synthesize our art as wrapped up in the general, messy scheme's public nudism: acts of sex and force to varying degrees of modularity and overlap. To that, roleplay often invites people to play out their fantasies in whatever costumes they choose, including psychosexually regressive childhood crushes: from videogames being the juvenilia's locus, yet one that works well enough for our little rebellions in and out of the bedroom, on and offscreen and stage alike.)

Forgetting Zeuhl (who fleeced me with their pussy easily enough), the rabbit isn't always bait, though—at least, not for us. If the "fash" rabbit is something that weaponizes the language of the harvest and witch hunt against the usual suspects under Capitalism (often by token police), then it's clearly something we may camp through the iconoclastic function of animalized power and resistance having simultaneously ace and erotic elements; re: freedom fighters and cyborg rabbits surviving biomechanically between green pastoral and robot Hell not being something the state can monopolize, from us back to Shelley and Milton and ultimately Shakespeare and Ovid. All owe something to cybernetics, totem animals, and hybrids of these things' drug-like mad technology run amok (the plans of mice and men didn't account for women and rabbits, but also guerrilla reinvention making furies something more than mere intended, control-opposition consumption for profit and nothing else)!

Yet doing so also isn't stuck within videogames or their paratexts; i.e., it can be with any art that we make with our bodies and the world around us—often, I would add, fueled by trippy imagery that, if not strictly an acid trip, still figuratively tumbles down the same rabbit hole with social-sexual potential: beef and porked up, but not for state harvests to exploit through public nudism and enforced chattel sexuality as usual! We pork among ourselves, a cryptonymy that feeds revolution!

(exhibit 56a1a2: Artist: Blxxd Bunny. As stated earlier in the series, Bunny is quite ace, themselves, exposing their own public nudity out among nature while of it. Such socialized displays of sensuality through Sublime exposure isn't unique to us in the present.

For the British Romantics, that is, communion with nature varied per generation, those of the first seeing nature as more motherly and nurturing. With the rise of Napoleon devastating Europe following the French Terror and subsequent purges, though, second-generation Romantic depictions of nature became more ominous, rapacious, vengeful and fearful; i.e., radicals like Byron and the Shelleys clashing with socially conservative forebears like Wordsworth and Coleridge.

According to Stephanie Forward, second-generation Romantics also regarded their first-generation elders with criticism and mistrust:

Blake, Wordsworth and Coleridge were first-generation Romantics, writing against a backdrop of war. Wordsworth, however, became increasingly conservative in his outlook: indeed, second-generation Romantics, such as Byron, Shelley and Keats, felt that he had 'sold out' to the Establishment (source: "The Romantics," 2014).

But the demonizing and dominion over the natural world by capital had already been occurring for centuries; re: following the emergence of Cartesian thought and its Revolution as pioneered not just by Descartes and Bacon, but Columbus butchering his own target groups; i.e., in acts of Christian-fueled savagery over those he deemed inferior enough to pimp—an act other similar Protestant sects would emulate in the self-same epidemic of sickness-inducing abjection hiding/showing itself through capitalist cryptonyms: statues not of heroes, to the Indigenous, but a brutal tyrant they'd have to suffer the songs of "progress" being sung at their expense for centuries:

Indigenous communities have been persecuted in the Americas since Christopher Columbus first came ashore on the island of Guanahani in the present-day Bahamas 528 years ago. They have had their land stolen, people slaughtered, enslaved, and infected with diseases, women raped, children kidnapped, treaties broken, and possessions and goods plundered and looted. There were between 5 million and 15 million Indigenous people living in North America in 1492. By the late 1800s, there were fewer than 238,000 left. The so-called "Age of Discovery" has begot centuries of genocide [source: Penn Today's "Indigenous Views of Christopher Columbus," 2020].

Along with furies and drug use, such mentalities must be reclaimed by demonstrating nature in social-sexual forms; i.e., as something to reunite with, but also embody in ways that depict nature as something lush that needs to be protected, revered and preserved, during land back: a deep-rooted place of procreation and love, symbolized as such since Antiquity into the Internet Age [the bacchanal orgy or tryst, commonly set to music while on drugs]. But those making art aren't doing so in the abstract; it represents their homes as a part of who they are and vice versa. As Nyx writes in regards to coming home:

"I love coming back home and exploring the woods I grew up in. It's such a refreshing experience and cleansing to my soul. These WV woods will always have my heart, no matter how far away I stray ♡" [source tweet, 2023].

Whores of nature have an ace element, then, insofar as the things they love that "grow" aren't just genitals, but the greenery of plants that fauna feed upon [and take us home when we die]! This threshold and proximity with the divine in nature is both intense, but also oddly nurturing and protecting in ways that eroticize nature as optionally orgiastic: a potential bacchanal that lets people enjoy the same current aliens pushing towards reunion however all parties agree to—a wishing well where sex for one person is a handshake [as animals saying hello to one another] and for others more sexually responsive an orgasm of erotic bliss, insofar as that's how they respond to such displays "in the wild!"

As such, the sex isn't enforced to appease merely one side for profit through force, thus becomes negotiated fairly towards mutual consent—my dark dream attached to Gothic Communism, but one of infinite possibility and lucky titillating voyeur/exhibitionist splendor relayed on the Aegis; i.e., of cuties like Bunny and Nyx, each having portentous booties to relay such data with at all: dat ass, amirite? It's not a capitalist Bringer of War [and other Malthusian nonsense] but all the usual post-scarcity joys known to happy rabbits on Bunny Island, and sung about through the usual paradisiacal longing: Sublime and Numinous thirst traps enjoying Stravinsky but not endorsing his abject views of nature's bare-and-exposed terrifying Big Whores' heavy artillery! There is no one who needs to be cannibalized [except the bourgeoisie class positions]—no one pigeonholed into the essential victim. Simply us using what Medusa gave us: a bit [or a lot] of strange!

artists: [Nyx and Blxxd Bunny]

"West Virginia, mountain mama. Take me home, country roads." Personified by the likes of Teddy Roosevelt, nature conservationism is a theme of conservative Americana and written by those who profit from it, versus land back; re: John Denver's music, arguably romancing the nostalgia of the by virtue of those who are white belonging to a colonizing polity whose wider policies they reject, while still rocking the camo look [camo is nowhere near as problematic as, say, the Swastika or the Confederate flag].

So of course, there's certainly nothing wrong with being "country" or rustic provided the class character is embodied within the critique—i.e., the art itself as being deliberately sex-positive, thus discouraging genocide on principle. Indeed, the country girl as a practicing witch, Amazon or general-practice magical huntress can be eroticized through common fetishizing markers: the glasses, pigtails, or freckles—a kind of latter-day Pippy Longstocking:

Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster created Superman when society needed a hero to battle bullies like Hitler and the Nazis. Pippi came along a decade or so later to take on a few bullies of her own: institutions that demand conformity; societies that over-regulate children; and anyone who's ever used the phrase throw like a girl as an insult instead of a compliment [source: Schmoop's "Pippi Longstocking Strength and Skill," 2023].

The ginger farmgirl is a kind of good-sized, Norse-tinged rustic ["Pippi" meaning "lover of horse" in Norse] who's no stranger to honest work; i.e., someone Pippi personifies and who Blxxd Bunny channels a certain essence of in her own performance as tied to the Earth around her [even when she's indoors]. This spirit of strength and sexuality is not unusual even within Pippi's legacy—with the actress who played Pippi in the 1988 film, Tami Erin, making her own sex tape:

Former Pippi Longstocking star Tami Erin is selling her own sex tape. The 39-year-old has decided to let a porn company release the explicit video before her ex-boyfriend beats her to it. Tami believes that if the tape is going to see the light of day, she may as well get paid for it [source: the Daily Mail's "Former Pippi Longstocking Star Tami Erin Decides to Release Her Own Sex Tape," 2013].

While it was released under the threat of revenge porn, Tami decided to own the film and regain control by releasing it herself. Good on you, Tami! It can't be blackmail if you get out in front of it, and you might as well get paid for your trouble!)

Now that we've examined furies and other erotic, monster-fucking forms of the natural demon class persecuted under Capitalism during furry panic (and Red Scare through acid Communism)—as well as covered some social-sexual examples with ace tolerances—let's set upon our aforementioned path towards queer magic transformation; i.e., out of the simplicity of childhood towards a life of chaos, painful transformation and death, but also erotic expression as something to "grow into" when expressing ourselves as magically part of nature and the great outdoors: being something to look into, but also inhabit and express with our bodies and nudism (re: exhibit 56a1a2, above).

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

As such, we'll examine the magic girl, a shapeshifter unicorn and Giger's xenomorph as increasingly transgressive and gender-troubled modes of GNC poetics bound up with the nature world; i.e., as hunted, hence something to express in often policed ways: magic and drugs, but also sex demons (whores) tied to them as things to face, even duel and chase down like Alice chasing the white-to-black rabbit into Hell as much as Wonderland! To it we don't take drugs to literally see the future, but help our minds process the complicated emotions and memories that already spell historical materialism (and its dualities) out; i.e., if Capitalism is a cancer that grows to devour the world through workers, then these drugs (and the muses tied to nature who evoke/use them in furry-like ways) are the medicine to shrink its influence and kill the tumor with! We're the nymphs the old poets wrote about, into the present state-of-affairs!

To that, oppositional praxis is fractally recursive, meaning smaller forms reflect larger functions and structures; e.g., Nazis poetics, apathy and thoroughly settler-colonial expansion/persecution mania. The magical element is the power to shapeshift through the aesthetic; i.e., as a matter of context and appearance that, through a variety of the latter as ludo-Gothically flexible in its BDSM, conveniently helps the former flow power towards us through dark empathy/xenophilia with style! Nature is alien, and she wants hugs, but only if we can catch her! The terror of the chase, and Beethoven's-Fifth-style codas, highlight the predator/prey thrill of such things; i.e., during a palliative Numinous and—apart from the usual hyphenations—stress the sheer flight aspects to said exchanges. Far from bleak nihilism, then, it becomes what it was meant to be: a drive towards liberation from capital's usual pimps whoring us out!

So white or black, follow the rabbit, babes! "The woods are dreary, dark and deep, and she has many promises to keep," carrying the heavy time of old clocks racing towards through capital counting down! To avoid state shift, we look on our own Aegis showing Medusa in ways others might be repulsed by if not for the social-sexual latitudes hinted above: a sight of danger but also communion with the dark gods and their socially fluent and sexually potent, dashing animal-avatar pirate guise (where kittens and tigers occupy the same framework); i.e., letting us cryptonymically outmaneuver our foes better than Caesar could ever hope to kettle us, during guerrilla war!

Good things (treats) come to those who wait (versus simply wolfing down what capital craves to dominate while stigmatizing the usual abject scapegoats); i.e., this is our land and capital isn't welcome here, the sun, moon and stars—hell, the whole fucking universe—not something that orbits around them, and certainly not us and our desires (sexual or not)! Tiger bunny go rawr! Our guerrilla's "ancient" spirit of dark xenophilia—thus reinvention/road to redemption while reclaiming our self-to-societal respect as sex workers through iconoclastic art/mutual labor action—lives on; i.e., saying to all of you, "Tip your sex workers while playing with them; don't exploit them!" and testifying all the while to our own abuse/survival onstage and off; re: during such playtime's liminal expression: the black rabbit to follow!

The oldest heroes escaping exploitation are whores. By comparison, pimps are the oldest villains policing said whores. They operate through abuse as a matter of—among other things—scarcity and drug use, which new victims must skirt seeking liberation through ancient theatre tropes; e.g., the old doxy a monster detective dodging Athenian-to-Spartan women as much as men. Under capital and its hauntologies, the whore is always the Omelas scapegoat, because the state demands rape to exist (which it controls through force, destitution and drugs, among other things): something to pimp nature with, whatever the form; i.e., something to tame and own, during insect politics; e.g., honeybees, but also elderly people: "Well, now your backs gonna hurt, 'cause you just pulled landscaping duty!"

Exploitation, though endless (stealing from labor's infinite value), has its usual classic symbols among the myriad offshoots demons and nature portend (through undead trauma). From the Archaic Mother's Gorgon, winged, pre-Christian fallen angels to modern Satanic forms, nature is a whore to pimp by modern enterprising cops and their police states decaying within capital; e.g., 2019's Fate/Grand Order: Absolute Demonic Front – Babylonia's Medusa vs Leonidas (the eternal whore vs the hauntological Nazi Spartan leader of strongmen returning to greatness, above). In turn, a whore's pimp is always cryptomimetically close at hand (or vice versa); i.e., looks can be deceiving but also speak truth through deception as open, naked: "Give me a boy until he is seven, and I will" dogmatize him six ways from Sunday! It's Paradise Lost without the camp, aka the Bible. We must camp it, or suffer the usual rape and neglect supplied to whores of all kinds!

Mind or otherwise, we're sex-demon detectives investigating our own rapes; i.e., every word/flash of skin a forbidden testimony the state, who—along with its cops (token or not, the latter making Sophie's Choice)—desperately want to silence but can't; re: because there must always be a whore to pimp by the usual cops playing kayfabe Amazonomachia dress up. It's always the happiest ones, faking it 'til they make it, then punching down the hardest to those they're tethered to (re: Federici)!

Meanwhile, state apologia is rape apologia. Subverting that, the revenge of we out-and-out, loud-and-proud whores breaks with tradition, thus segregation and genocide during the abjection and cryptonymy processes setting nature free; i.e., as monstrous-feminine by breaking profit on our Aegises; re: through the usual testifying that occurs along chronotopic architectural/forensic morphology puns, mise-en-abyme! Whatever Capitalist Realism portends, money is theft—freedom and meeting our basic needs (until development occurs) not mutually exclusive, insofar as we steal back what the state taxes for itself! Whatever canceled future you find them in, then (cyberpunk or Gothic castle), sex work is work, onstage and off. So pay your sex workers, survival sex work or not; either way it's still a basic human right (re: "Paid Labor")!

Except, the whore can't have an alibi when she's on the rabbits trail; i.e., threatening profit, meaning we're the canonical "homewreckers": shitting like the homeless or housing challenged where the middle-class personal property owners live (the latter being the classic villains of the Radcliffean refrain, gatekeeping capital for the state): showing the complicit and the holier-than-thou our normal everyday survival on the Aegis speaking offstage as much as on. "Hop like little bunnies," as Mom used to say to us kids; beware the poachers while looking for love/answers! Love is a battlefield! Show them no quarter using Cupid's Shaft; i.e., when making it the dialectical-material context of your illustration of mutual consent, doing so on your confessional's wicked canvas! Ace to anal, the Aegis is yours to reverse abjection with, cowgirl or otherwise!

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

Dark Xenophilia, part two: "Follow the White-to-Black Rabbit"; or Magic, Drugs and Acid Communism (feat. the Monstrous-Feminine of Magic Girls, Unicorns and Xenomorphs)

*And if you go chasing rabbits
And you know you're going to fall
Tell 'em a hookah-smoking caterpillar Has given you the call*

—Grace Wing Slick; "White Rabbit," on Jefferson Airplane's Surrealistic Pillow (1967)

Part two continues our look at learning from nature in dark xenophilic terms of sexuality and gender as animalistic, gradient, anthropomorphic and fluid; i.e., from cradle to grave, childhood to adulthood and beyond. It explores drugs as a recursive, cyclical means of opening and expanding the mind to challenge Capitalist Realism (and its cancerous expansions): with acid Communism offering a dark Communist, Pagan and witchy/monstrous-feminine empathy to offset fascism's radical apathy—the series of enchantments that only appear under the influence of otherworldly forces; i.e., called "drugs" nowadays, but also "poetry" and "art" having a similar liminal, often biomechanical (animate-inanimate) mind-opening affect! No one is immune when exposed to such forces, good or bad!

Our exposure of them (therefore ourselves) isn't to seek desperately but by trusting in what we see that others mistake for chattel to tokenize and exploit; i.e., empathy is built at least partially on trust, which fascists destroy. We give and take fairly to develop what needs to develop for us to both survive and all-out thrive in a post-scarcity world: magic as xenophilic poetics, therefore radical labor changing how we think. In abjecting us, the state has made us powerful within their own system, which we can reclaim through our Aegis breaking theirs to dust, beckoning you follow us "rabbits" into Hell: "Hey, bunny!" as Jan Švankmajer's titular Alice

says. Follow the rabbit, white or black; follow the alien whore/profligate sinner as animalized and mystical drug dealer/dealer of drug-like sex and alterous factors!

(artist: Vana)

That is, using drugs per Stuart Mills (on Fisher) is—at least at first—a symbolic gesture; i.e., one that expands our minds away from the rigid, inflexible (thus intolerant) state of existence and thought that Capitalism forces on people vs whores/nature; re:

...part of acid communism is the means to fulfil Fisher's desire to imagine the future. [...] Acid communism is about ways of imagining a world after capitalist realism, and for Fisher, one of the ways to escape this reality is psychoactive drugs. The programme of acid communism is not to condone psychoactive drug use, but as an example this activity captures the philosophy of acid communism excellently.

To imagine new futures, we have to find ways to break out of our present myopia. Fisher's acid communism is unique primarily for placing this goal above all others. [...] The future has been cancelled because we are unable to imagine anything other than the present. To invent the future, to escape our myopia, we have to go beyond the present bounds of our imagination. This is acid communism (source).

We'll confront acid Communism later in the subchapter—meaning after we've given some examples to follow (the rabbit); i.e., starting with general animal mascots (next page), but also Sailor Moon, The Last Unicorn, and Alien (among others; e.g., Brave and Nimona, exhibit 56d1/2): as whorish means of profound redistribution!

Our white-to-black rabbits and their "special medicine" extend to any animal and color you could think of; e.g., a blue fox (or combinations, below); i.e., fetishes partially obscured, but also showing during the cryptonymy process reversing abjection through the whore's revenge. Said medicine educates monstrous-feminine alternatives to Cartesian dogma, thus challenging its built-in desires to dominate nature through fear of anything else; i.e., "drugs are bad for you unless you pay for legal versions" being a warlike anthem chanted by the guardians of Capitalism (and its cancerous War on/with Drugs) against nature as a whole; re: a whore to pimp, thus rape, for profit out of revenge (through the usual tools' trifectas, monopolies and qualities built for those aims)! Anytime we speak to/about black rabbits, then, we're talking about/with dark xenophilia as something to encourage; i.e., they're synonymous!

In short, we'll be following increasingly black (whore-like, radical and alien) rabbits from white—first looking at magic girls and unicorns in children's and YA fiction, before considering acid Communism and adult forms more directly through poetic, rock 'n roll counterculture as tied to older rebellious movements; e.g., Jim Morrison, William Blake, and yes, xenomorphs and their surreal, angry and rebellious liminalities: the whore's paradox and revenge being two sides of the same terror language (and dreams) to reclaim by playing with "rape" and sodomy during ludo-Gothic BDSM!

Home Base: On Teaching Children about Animals, Magic and Sex (Drugs and Rock 'n Roll)

First and foremost, educating children about animals, magic and sex (drugs, and rock 'n roll); i.e., as the starting point to chasing bunnies. While it might seem rather straightforward to separate totems and general "magic" from drugs, pornography and queer transformation (say nothing of the persecutory trauma that accompanies them), the act is easier said than done. For starters, the act of anthropomorphizing magic animals—specifically to teach children about the world around them—is a common facet of children's literature (and oral cultures) as a whole: girls and children in general something to exploit by exposure to dogma in ways we camp inside of themselves; i.e., through reclaimed animals, nudism and educated peril and morals of an acid Communist sort, thus sex as something to communicate in ways that are healthy for children to absorb at a relatively young age: about life and death, consent and coercion, rape and rapture, etc, pushing towards Gothic maturity to see what others do not (I once sat on a day-long train ride next to a blind woman who raised wolves; it was an eye-opening conversation)!

sexual by itself, though there is room to suggest sexual content in the thin line between YA-material and more prurient suggestions; i.e., Tohupo's Mrs. Neeba lending herself a strong "Mother Goose" vibe despite being sexually expressive to a lesser degree, compared to Kiu Wot's illustration being more overtly sexual [mommy in the bedroom]. This "sliding scale" is regularly invoked through the poetic treatment of animals and magic in any educational work; i.e., including sex education as something being taught to some degree in many children's stories: animal mommies don't wear pants/do wear clothes that make them cryptonymically seem naked and anatomically correct/neutered, and animals flop cutely and listen to each other's problems/show each other our butts. We do so to say hello/communicate love and trauma [re: Victoria, exhibit 52g1a] versus status-quo variants outing the colonizer doing the same basic gesture in bad faith: showing us their ass; i.e., as something that gives them away during the accidental [for them] code switch! The ass on the Aegis as the Aegis can hurt to feel good, or talk about pain with pain as a corrupt data of all different kinds!)

how Capitalism makes us feel small and abused/assigns sexual values [and predator/prey elements] to us, and how we as marginalized workers might mix-and-match different positions of power [the dominant and the submissive] during ludo-Gothic BDSM: through animals of different sizes like the rat and mouse, but also kayfabe Red Scare themes on the same bodies trying to endure—by expressing chattelized/verminized survival in ancient animalized theatre forms [with the 1970 Secret of Nimh having a similar mad-science critique/rebellious undercurrent to 1972's Watership Down—a story we'll return to in Volume Three].

Such attempts include through drugs-and-sex hauntologies, but also parental themes that carry/cross over into a lycanthropic nature/nurture and predator/prey half-real game across media at large; re: Mrs. Brisby being a brave mommy to seek protection from, but also sex/comfort in liminal, drug-like ways! Such ideas [and two-spirit peoples—trans, intersex, and non-binary] go back not just hundreds of years, but to the literal dawn of time; i.e., to a time and headspace where such things like animals, food, rape and war weren't separate but hauntologically reinvoked from the Middle and Early Modern English periods, onwards [re: Chaucer's Miller]!

For example, when Robert Burns turned over a mouse's burrow, he wrote a little poem for the creature empathizing with her plight; i.e., "On Turning her up in her Nest, with the Plough, November 1785" aka "Of Mine and Men":

⁴⁷¹ The same year The Dark Crystal and The Last Unicorn likewise catered to YA in a Wizard-of-Oz "family film" approach: through spontaneous magic, queerness, violence and revenge going in all directions!

*I'm truly sorry Man's dominion
Has broken Nature's social union,
An' justifies that ill opinion,
Which makes thee startle,
At me, thy poor, earth-born companion,
An' fellow-mortal! [source].*

The poem, far from preaching Humanity's innate superiority, laments the damage its de facto stewardship cause other animals, of which—no matter how great or small those are—have value in Burns' eyes [a common theme in British Romanticism].)

This animalized tutelage also extends to the children themselves and their developing bodies and identities (and desire for sex/comfort from parental/protector figures): as "magical," invoking elements of queer expression tied to the natural world as increasingly drug-like and erotic; i.e., not with explicit drugs (though we'll talk about that in a bit) but a "drug-like" means of activating queer expression that magically transforms one's physical body and gender identity in fantastical, spell-like language and childlike imagination. The animal is an important part of this process; i.e., many children befriend animals and establish close bonds with them, expressing asexual relationships through artwork that says as much about themselves as it does the animal(s) they're relating to. In other words, the totem, "furry" or chimera, etc, are expressions of the self as part of the natural world, which allows for (a)sexual expression of the artist in animalized ways (which is not the same thing as having sex with the animals they correspond with).

The larger process generally starts from an early age and continues into adulthood. In queer circles, authors transmute the kid-friendly approach of children's literature by treating talking animals⁴⁷² and "magic" specifically as queer signifiers/de facto educators of sex positivity (and universal liberation) at large. While the notion of sexuality- and gender-as-identity have only materialized under Capitalism within the past two centuries or so, their current position within it ⁴⁷² Conversely the talking animal can also be a sign of rebellious property or chattel, suddenly speaking in hauntological forms that ooze xenophobia from the frightened, bigoted viewers; e.g., Red Hook's The Darkest Dungeon II having a less-than-charitable view of talking animals, its denizens of the Sluice being a non-too-subtle, dislocated cross between George Orwell's 1945 Animal Farm and Warhammer's Skaven race of warrior rats: "There are rumours these rancorous beasts have some demoniac spark of... otherworldly intelligence." It's anti-Semitic and Red-Scare, a subterranean ghetto where cop-like heroes can go and clean house, mid-blood-libel policing the joy division.

nevertheless invokes magical legends and queer ideas of sexuality and gender that are much, much older than the modern world. While trans, intersex and non-binary people have existed since the dawn of time, only under Capitalism has their gender-non-conforming struggle had to be expressed linguo-materially on the receiving end of systemic exploitation and genocide!

In turn, magic, drugs and transformation are useful towards expressing and subverting these xenophobic struggles in xenophilic language; i.e., without making them seem endlessly tormented and immiserate, through furry panic. In short, the goal of said magic is joy at becoming your true self over time; i.e., in a world—or in helping experience/develop a world—that won't persecute you for being different; re: in ways closer to nature as something to love and respect, not rape for profit (not even if they seem dark and scary/suffused with Numinous energies, but also sluttier elements, above): "magic girl" speaking to a position of power to regress to as much being an assigned vulnerability by the state, mid-witch-hunt!

While queer abuse is important to discuss and convey in undead-demonic language, it's also vital to humanize nature itself as part of the equation; i.e., as something to treat humanely by human stewards of nature. Often this happens through a relationship with nature as queer-coded; i.e., happening through the eyes of a child simply being themselves within the natural-material world. While the image of Dorothy Gale leaps to mind—skipping cheerfully along the Yellow Brick Road with the Scarecrow, Tinman and Cowardly Lion—we want to express the importance in treating queerness as an iconoclastic mode of existence fueled by magic and drug use to chase rabbits we not only befriend, but become (to "go native"): to thwart the revenge of state pimps policing nature-as-whore.

After all, the "friends of Dorothy" (early LGBTQ symbols colonized by token fags) only helped the God-gifted Kansas farmgirl—already touched by magic but afraid of nature ("Lions and tigers and bears, oh my!")—generously return home through monomythic force to her family's farm; re: after killing a witch because the local patriarch "asked" them to (with laws being poorly-disguised threats administered by state rulers and carried out by state cops, including witch cops of all ages—more on this in Volume Three)! If the drug-addled fate of Judy Garland is any clue, we need to do far better—one, to honor her memory as someone hounded and abused by studio executives (re: forcing drugs into her system, breaking her body and mind alike); and two, to serve/save ourselves: as members of the Young-at-Heart becoming nature's stewards standing against profit during the whore's revenge chasing the rabbit. This "land back" approach happens through ludo-Gothic BDSM, which requires doing so in ways all workers historically have failed at (which includes Indigenous Peoples tokenizing under duress through treaties the White Man routinely breaks, and people of color selling out, too).

To avoid the pitfalls of menticide, then, we'll start with magic girls who are closer to the mark, thus childhood; i.e., regarding queer-positive representation as openly stated within the narrative (unlike Hobbits or even vampires, which both tend to obscure queerness within medievalized ideas of courtly love [re: rings and giving them] or sodomy rhetoric): the magic-girl, monstrous-feminine heroines of Sailor Moon, aimed at educating children; re: about magic and genderqueer sex and identity through monstrous theatre with innate camp built in!

To it, queerness starts from innocence as something to regress to, and interrogate the rabbit (a lure). As damsel-and-detective sex demons, we'll trace that circuitry on the usual golems and castles-in-the-flesh, going from witches to unicorns to aliens. First up, Sailor Scouts!

Halcyon Days; the Idylls of the Magical Queens-to-Be (feat. Sailor Moon)

Note: We looked at Sailor Moon earlier with Harmony and me. We'll focus here on the making of the show and its utility when teaching kids how to be queer from an early age; i.e., when growing into emotional, Gothic and sexual maturity as a riddle not starting from adulthood looking backwards (we'll get to that, too)! —Perse

Sailor Moon has been queer-coded since its inception and historically aims at young white-to-Japanese women (the manga originally penned by Naoko Takeuchi, a highly-educated⁴⁷³ Japanese woman; i.e., educated outside of just being one of the most famous/accomplished manga artists of all time). Following this, the show has retained a strong genderqueer/questioning element and following all around the ⁴⁷³ Naoko Takeuchi "graduated from Kyoritsu University of Pharmacy, where she received a degree in chemistry [and later] became a licensed pharmacist" (source: Women Who Kick Ass' "Naoko Takeuchi: Why She Kicks Ass," 2013]. Similar to Nina Hartley or Victoria Paris, Takeuchi is clearly educated/privileged, but also sex-positive in her work; i.e., as something that regularly faces colonization by neoliberal groups post hoc (and philistines; re: Bad Empanada).

world; i.e., flourishing mid-struggle despite syndicated American localization censoring the queer elements by making Uranus and Neptune "cousins" (the preference of sanctioned incest and pedophilia being a common neo-conservative tactic). So while Sailor Moon targets tweens, its "puppy love" and childhood innocence material less steers readers towards a heteronormative existence and more explores feelings of "descriptive" sexuality and Satanic gender fluidity!

Furthermore, the show's colossal popularity and seemingly endless longevity only leads to fanbases that go on to sexually mature and fantasize erotically about inhabiting and enjoying the show's characters (next page)—not as teenagers to exploit by adults but as younger versions of their former selves that fans identify with over time as also having grown up!

To this, the erotic treatment of Sailor Moon and its magic-girl heroines isn't limited to cis-het men in that respect. "Get 'em while they're young" is certainly something that neoliberal privatization takes quite literally—surreptitiously effacing anything queer except the most homo-/queernormative elements to try and keep American consumers (and their overseas counterparts) cis-het from a young age onwards:

The first queer couple I encountered in anime was censored. Most kids who grew up in the '90s are aware that in its original form, Sailor Moon's Sailor Neptune and Sailor Uranus aren't actually cousins, but were instead a lesbian couple. The homophobic revision of these characters is so blatant it makes rewatches of the dub absolutely comical. This wasn't the only revision the Sailor Moon dub made to the source material for the sake of censorship. Zoisite, an early villain who is an effeminate gay man in love with fellow villain Kunzite, is changed to a female character. Given Uranus' butch persona, they may have wanted to do the same with her. Uranus is rarely if ever depicted in feminine clothing save for when she's in her Sailor Scout form, rendering the possibility of portraying Neptune and Uranus as a straight couple nigh impossible (source: Austin Jones' "Sailor Moon and the Complicated History of Queer Gender Expression in Anime for Girls," 2020).

But the same is also true of sex-positive introductions to the magic girl trope (and various other nature-oriented egregores); i.e., to a young audience in an educational way that extends to adults whose own education is lacking about GNC people; e.g., Sailor Uranus was originally written as intersex—having both genitals and being able to swap them at will (ibid.).

Such sex, drugs and rock 'n roll speak to animals in nature, but also appear in Gothic fiction—meaning with phallic women, Athena-androgyne (stereo)types and the Medusa "snake moms"/Archaic Mothers, etc; i.e., those similar to the Sailor Scouts having the whores' revenge in less furious but no less transgressive ways (any trespass is unwelcome, thus attacked by state defenders upholding capital and its qualities, moderate or not). In canonical stories, their "horns" can always be monomythically severed, said castration taming the woman—as a magical object of man's desire (extending to token parties, inside the Man Box)—whereas male entities "die" once castrated (no accounting for eunuchs, of course, nor intersex people; i.e., the latter often wrought with morphological trauma tied to their genitals as operated on: without their consent by over-corrective doctors; re: Victoria, exhibit 52g1a).

But a second opinion lingers—one cryptonymically showing and hiding things the state will try to tokenize and destroy when magic girls refuse to assimilate, thus not do as they're told. Simply put, fans aren't stupid; they learn from those they identify with, not wanting those beings to be censored at all and fearing/ridiculing proponents of censorship for doing just that (silence is genocide). For example, most cis-het or closeted/out lesbian girls are not only aware of the Sailor Moon queerness and censorship; they even make fun of the whole "cousins" thing (Farmer Smith's "Sailor Uranus and Neptune: Gay Couple NOT Cousins," 2020); re: we camp canon because we must!

Conversely most straight dudes (white or not) have no fucking clue—only make fun of the show or drool over its (originally teenage) cast like poster girls "made just for them." To do so is to colonize Sailor Moon, treating its cast (and fandom) like chattel that exclusively serve heteronormativity in sex-coercive ways; re: not just the Man Box, but the Male Gaze extending to token parties (male or not). It's prescriptive and that prescription must be challenged during oppositional praxis, including the liminality that pornographic expression reliably supplies; re: as fans grow up into these GNC franchises:

different groups to like the same thing at once for different reasons; e.g., cis-het men, teenage girls and queer people—all liking Sailor Scouts as boy-crazy magic-soldier alter egos navigating a city-pop hauntology and demonic rituals of monomythic courtship—but again, for different reasons on and off the same half-real stages: to either fight for universal liberation/walk away from Omelas, or install new children to torture and steal from into future models of capital pimping nature as monstrous-feminine whore; e.g., AI [and tech bros] being the Pirates of Silicon[e] Valley come home to goon [shaming and policing the slut for giving men boners]!

Packing a massive booty/meat-packing plant and even bigger heart, Mei is a foreign national veterinarian who loves animals, but also rocks her amazing body and makeup during brothel espionage; i.e., while doing alter-ego sex work online: the magic girl all grown up and kicking ass [reclaiming her means of production beyond factory nostalgias, which Marx and Socialist Realism mostly limited to larger mechanical factories/male labor versus working girls and women's work].

All of these factors make up who Mei is without reducing her to a product/piece in a bigger commercial puzzle. Likewise, her amazing booty and tight, little "innie" coochie conveys a de facto "pornstar" bod whose "realism" is more an industry standard conducted through the creation of sexual difference that nevertheless can reflect holistically upon workers during liminal expression; i.e., with bodies that fall naturally within that standard to subvert it: the body of the nubile maiden, both infantilized and hyperbolically sexualized in ways that historically cater to white male chuds and token parties policing their betters' avenues of appetite.

Furthermore, the notion of post-natal bottom surgery is a concept whose body dysmorphia/gender dysphoria can apply to different women across the board; i.e., in the porn industry's frontier liminalities into YA media and back again: any whose crotches lack the "Barbie Doll" look/requisite female genitals, and wherein the "Barbie Doll effect" is labioplasty expected towards female workers pushed to surgically alter their bodies to cater to the status quo. Or conversely those who naturally fall into the status quo potentially feeling alienated from other workers: for being different from other pussy types, for example, hence placed onto a "pretty privilege" pedestal for having the Pussy of All Pussies [heavy lies the crown] or Ass to End All Asses [above]!

This, in turn, comes with its own double standards, assigning the owner "power" by virtue of cliché, harmful notions of feminine kinds; e.g., the dumb blonde, ideal tradwife, perfect girlfriend, catgirl, schoolgirl, and ostensibly tight virginal pussy during sex, etc; re: "We are all animals, my lady!"

A similar manicuring of their crotch extends to clothing as often expected; i.e., wherein the basic idea is fine but historically-materially becomes shamed through deregulated commercial practices that treat the owner's "lawn" [the front and the back/ass crack, left] as something to maintain by virtue of it being someone else's property/plumbing to police; i.e., God's Paradise operating through fractal recursion—the customer extending to patron, director and shareholder as tyrannical entitlement on the same Great Chain of Being [which the Medusa and her rabbits level through Numinous offshoots, also left]. To combat this, "pussy verisimilitude" offers a different kind of realism than what's enforced through Vitruvian industry standards; e.g., the gynodiversity of public hair on the pantied camel toe as a kind of artistic accessory that can be easily applied or removed like a merkin.

Together with Sailor Moon and the catgirl aesthetic, my subversion is liminal and composite among friends; i.e., not a raw fearful image of the catgirl from the moon⁴⁷⁴ [Artemis being the virginal huntress associated with the moon to sight her prey with as much as its size and light being a symbol of female hysteria] but a child-friendlier variant experienced through Sailor Scouts; i.e., collectively reviving Medusa, onstage and off: the Leveler Dark Rabbit pulsing ominously behind white sparkly goodness and neoliberal hyperreality [and one whose overt sexuality and confident nudism will thoroughly ruffle the feathers of American Puritanism at home and on the world stage]. The shared goal, then, is to challenge the American-brand of "weeb" rape culture in the process, while also celebrating Mei [and all Sailor Scouts] for being an awesome person. She rocks!

To it, Mei Minato is a real person with real struggles inside-outside the porn industry—with her having been doxxed by "fans" for her daring to moonlight; i.e., as a sex worker [with women deduced to singular roles to limit their capacity while also pushing them towards financial dependency on men/tokens and the state].

She's both incredibly kind—helping people and animals—and has feelings and stories about the work that she does on- and off-camera; i.e., her content helps pay for her tuition, but is "to also have fun, de-stress and build self-confidence" as she navigates and negotiates the larger world: as hostile to her endeavors, trying to cage her magic!

Meanwhile, the hyperreality of the pornstar body is that Capitalism shapes AFABs/GNC bodies into a Barbie Doll egregore it can enslave; re: to cater to male/token consumers inside Plato's Man Box: as future soldiers and enforcers of the colonial binary who are owed sex of a particular type. With the flood of AI stealing labor to draft this likeness in perpetuity, the image of the Barbie Doll body has flooded the market with pirated imagery that includes the likeness of various models and artwork; i.e., as smashed together by software abused by entitled tech bros [white or not⁴⁷⁵]: the subsequent humanity and its rebellious potential/dialectical-material context having been sucked entirely from the image until it becomes a souless cartoon carbon copy meant to perfect the product, but only cheapen it further than the pre-internet, thus pre-AI porn industry was able. The elite steal from labor as "dead" to them—a process imitated by the middle class pimping magic girls to dance for their delight and coffers aping the elite's.)

Per Foucault, power and resistance are to be found in one-and-the-same place; i.e., on the surface of the image as consensually ambiguous sans context. All the same, the tendency to make things "fucky" is a common source of humor in fandom circles (ProZD's "peachette," 2019). When broached through the language of magic girls animalized, sex education reflects upon the liminality and progression of the human body as something that matures central to the narrative unfolding!

Again, fans grow up; they experience mounting sexual desires through their bodies and identities as things to grow into, often through increasingly ace-to-erotic expressions thereof. A kind of sexual adventure that starts small, porn is prone to escalate as people discover and unlock their true potential as (a)sexual beings. It involves the very monsters sold to them since childhood; i.e., magic animal personas that "grow up" alongside them (exhibit 56c1/2)—less as things children shouldn't become and more what they identify as despite heteronormativity's canonizing camp. The rebellion becomes hermeneutically broad; i.e., occurring merely by workers expressing themselves in sex-positive ways, and whose synthesis the state will pimp, hence brand as subversively pornographic: to punish "its" naughty little girls (of any age) for making nature "untame" once more; re: on her Aegis as something to reflect the state's supremacy onto itself through the dialectic of the alien self-reporting the usual weirdos! "Girls do get it done!" and there's more than one way to skin a Nazi-to-white/token-moderate cat by flashing your own kitty's Dark Aegis!

(artist: Mei Minato)

Let's further unpack this; i.e., as the hybridity of porn and magic girls—as monstrous-feminine beings of nature with undead or hellish components—can become performatively complicated. Equally complex, then, is the trademarked expression of nature through neoliberal media pushing towards darkness and dark doubles (the black rabbit); i.e., as presenting children with a cartoon idea of what the world even is, all while exploiting the planet behind a smiling and kid-friendly façade; e.g., Disney and its own generational bigotry/whitewashes policing whores and apologizing for toxic love/rape culture as historical-material in its recursive fractals (more on that, in Volume Three)!

In keeping with Sailor Moon, though, this grandiose and globalized charade often dresses up in fantastical language tied to human bodies "of nature and the cosmos"; i.e., as things that grow and develop under enforced parental supervision as a metaphor for state power policing nature as gay alien. Any "gateways" that potentially delineates from state interests (the rebellion of magic sluts fighting state spectres in slutty drag, left) will be policed, their iconoclastic iterations discouraged through force; i.e., sex, drugs and rock 'n roll—the magic girl as doorway to a Promethean mode of animalized existence beyond capital and its chattelizing aura's awful Realism (which only weakens when the state sheds its disguises)!

(artist: Rae Moon)

First, the entire class of "magic girls" inhabits the natural world as alien—i.e., one to convey through magic-tinged, drug-addled "fairy dust" language being the very things to defend in the frankest of terms—but also by expressing the defenders, themselves, as honest, good-faith extensions thereof! Such meta actors belong to nature and uphold it from corrupting forces, but "corruption" means many different things during oppositional praxis; re: it's not a bug but a function of code during the cryptonymy process; e.g., Sailor Moon's mythical pubes (above)!

The basic, iconoclastic vein of Sailor Scouts, Bowser-Peaches and "thicc" unicorn furies, then, is not so different from the classic fawn, satyr or nymph (then or now): to subvert heteronormative prescription tied to "body policing" as administered by powerful, white men/tokens, Athens onwards. While the Patriarchy fears many things, they fear nature, most of all; i.e., as being outside of their control within their own slave markets. Defending those, they will dehumanize whatever bodies, genders and sexualities they associate with nature; i.e., as something to pimp on a spectrum: beings outside their vision of an orderly universe taming the wild whore and breeding her for that purpose.

This extends to whatever elements help form the bonds; i.e., any required to commune with nature as untame while being pimped in bad faith: magic or drugs as things to be "on" in ways to fear and shame. By comparison, the iconoclastic worker—often from an early age—favors natural-material expressions of universal body positivity and sex-positive BDSM, kinks and monsters conducive to ending Omelas for good. Doing so, they relate with natural demons, but also the magic or drugs that invoke them; i.e., as part of the natural-material arrangement of things to camp canon with. Under their influence, practitioners weave in other components that describe the human condition as it applies to them through fan favorites.

In other words, nature is a common starting point when introducing children to sex through media; i.e., the birds and the bees, if you will, which often involves material elements of a decidedly criminalized sort (which all work is; re: all work being universally sexualized, but whose liberatory dialogs speak with/to more overtly sexualized forms of work, like the Sailor Scouts own fabulous kayfabe).

Crime—as something articulate through state instruments pimping nature as monstrous-feminine—leaves an unnatural, Gothic footprint: the graveyards, castles, and other human structures that advertise the historical-material presence of a heteronormative order furthering abjection. Be it of the church/state or corporate bodies, this order survives beyond the natural lifespan of animals or plants by dominating nature inside its own ghosts of rape; i.e., as an idea to express in relation to itself, but also coming out of the civilized world: "Alice" going back into a hauntological idea of the dreaded anti-home's neo-medieval imposter zone (with Caroline Jones following a black cat, below—same idea as a rabbit: chasing the witch's familiar back to wild nature and the Gothic anti-home as reclaimed/turned into a wicked stepmother's hunting grounds/bowels of the Earth and underworld conjoined, mid-unheimlich).

Simply put, canonical children's media positions "nature" as threatened by corrupting forces dressed up in abject language "neither here nor there": the riotous voices of the unheard, reduced to a dark, external wailing of the dead and of chaos to dialectically-materially canonize, thus reject the madness of a middle-class Don Quixote (re: Radcliffe's heroism). Except, while magic and drugs can put you in touch with cute, talking animals or horny fawns (e.g., Pan's Labyrinth, 2006) doubled by the state—meaning for liberals and sex pests to author and latch onto as much as curious children (re: Gaiman, above)—these can also send you magically to places where trauma has gathered and stayed: Hell, but also the underworld, or states of exception where the state's victims are abused, then buried in the here-and-now's hereafter come home!

The problem, here, is that canon doesn't protect children or nature because the state is antithetical towards doing so. Therefore, it cannot acclimate children to consensual aspects of sexuality and gender through natural demons; re: Neil Gaiman, author of Coraline (above) is a sex pest protected by the system expecting him to appear in his own work for decades; i.e., Coraline's scapegoat usage of "Other Mother" demonology treating the categorization as an "adult" word—one that generally carries "evil" connotations in centrist language, and which spills into outright persecution in reactionary circles Gaiman (and his evil wife) contribute towards.

Genocide is half-real and dualistic, like an historical-material effect; during genocide, the state will deny involvement in favor of a given material arrangement supplied through fear and dogma like Gaiman's: drugs and magic are bad because they turn you into monsters associated with unspeakable death, sexual degeneracy and violation of the vulnerable and the young. And yet, the witch is exposed through these, speaking to a double standard we fags subvert through our own apotropaic function anisotropically defending the black-rabbit witch in duality from Radcliffean DARVO obscurantism policing the whore by blaming the whore!

Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM chasing rabbits to learn from them, minus the prescribed harm. And yet, under these conditions, confronting death by merging it with the natural-material world is seen as entirely "unnatural"; i.e., unbefitting of a children's "proper" education, the ghost of the counterfeit something to classically poo-poo by critics of the Gothic (more on this in "The Future Is a Dead Mall"). To it, parental forces will historically and swiftly relegate liminal positions of magic and drug-like sexuality and gender to "darker" monomyth spaces; i.e., whose unwilling occupants they associate with sin, the underworld and a vast "grey area" of degenerate factors; re: Coraline basically being told, "don't be a whore!"

These prohibitions exclude, but also capitalize on, notions of adulthood as conceptually bound to criminalized activities; e.g., BDSM, porn, and controlled substances, but also scapegoated, anthropomorphized personas that express trauma in ways children are normally "spared" from: the sheer presence of death during linguo-material conflict; i.e., as fundamentally alien to heteronormative tolerance, yet still wedded to said alien's placenta as the elite's source of fresh blood the middle class police; re: aping their masters by attacking the ghost of the counterfeit. On either side of the Black Veil, the cop's victim is always a whore.

Conversely, genderqueer expression seeks to reunite children through these devices gradually but inclusively. It does so, again, through consciously sex-positive attitudes in nature-themed furry art, magic girls and witchcraft chasing rabbits; i.e., in pure and hybrid forms that flow anisotropically against status-quo cultural norms (exhibit 56d2, below). But this uphill battle against the state—re: as a Cartesian, heteronormative and settler-colonial polity in its modular persecution rhetoric—still places the half-real protagonist in the crosshairs of the usual hunters; i.e., who are trained to kill the enemy by branding children as obviously dark and evil (exhibit 56d1, below): a death curse that—for us—takes many animalistic forms. Such "black rabbits" encapsulate female/monstrous-feminine death spirits (exhibit 56e, below), the iconoclast required to investigate and understand these while heading into their teenage years and beyond (towards death administered by the state, Coraline simply another Dorothy Gale)!

Approaching Our Teens, or Portents of the Doom Bun before The Last Unicorn (feat. Nimona, Brave and Darby O'Gill)

To be holistic, then, I want to give some more exhibits before we tackle The Last Unicorn (exhibit 57); i.e., regarding signs of fate (which doom is) that help bridge the gap between children's magic animal stories and YA media similar to The Last Unicorn (a story about finding love, especially tragic star-crossed love); e.g., Nimona, Brave and Darby O'Gill speaking to the princess as not simply rebellious, but queer-tinged and fairy-like through their transformative power/wish fulfillment and descriptive histories outing state predators scapegoating nature.

In canonical circles, the introduction of overtly abject monsters is often something that "awaits" children as they grow up—less "instantly" transitioning from the seemingly innocent unicorn (and its earthly locales) to suddenly experimenting with drugs (exhibit 60a/60b) and finally pure nightmares like the utterly erotic and surreal xenomorph (exhibit 60e).

As children confusingly transition into adulthood, they will encounter these ideological challenges at the acceptable hour and then be expected to respond; i.e., by monomythically dismissing them outright (through tokenized force), or by guiltily indulging in them through the heteronormative order of purchasing forbidden fruit with stolen labor value (wages); re: we freaks of nature have our revenge by simply existing in visible ways that effect the next generation's consumption, money or not—of what we produce melded to state doubles, with Alice given our Mad Hatter's shapeshifting biscuits and tea but these taking the troubling form of the usual suspects: dark animal crackers speaking to obscured danger and proximities with power and power abuse during Halloween scapegoat denialism!

(exhibit 56d: Artist, left: Natesquatch. The black dog or bear is a common, shapeshifting symbol of death that has been co-opted by colonizing forces.

For example, Mor'du from Disney-owned Pixar's Brave is an undead, cursed animal-king that must be slain; i.e. by a great warrior to reclaim nature from dark, animalistic forces. Disney Villains: the Essential Guide [2020] describes Mor'du in unflattering and frankly villainizing language that justifies monomythic violence against him: "Once a vain and arrogant prince, Mor'du is now a bloodthirsty bear under a terrible spell. Standing over 13 feet tall, he is savage and fiercely strong. Everyone in the kingdom fears bears, but the deadly Mor'du is the most terrifying of all" [source]. The unkindness towards bears as stigma animals touches upon a Western bias commented on by authors like William Faulkner [whose own ancient bear, Old Ben, in "The Bear" (1942), represents a struggle for the hero to identify with nature after killing Ben] or Roger Ebert's fear of wolves—the latter stoked by Joe Carnahan's 2012 The Grey [which treats wolves as metaphors for depression within a heroic cult of death struggling against an impossible foe; e.g., Beowulf and the spear-Danes versus Grendel, over a thousand years ago]: "When I learned of Sarah Palin hunting wolves from a helicopter, my sensibilities were tested, but after this film, I was prepared to call in more helicopters" [source: 2012 review].

To that, the usual companies are de facto helicopter parents calling the cops on nature; i.e., as whore victim through their "own" kids crying wolf [or bear] to pimp nature accordingly. As such, Mor'du's status is equally symbolic in a long tradition of dominating nature as savage barbarian—meaning the struggles of someone being kill-on-sight because that's how they present in canon; i.e., within the state of exception per centrist, Faustian narratives that throw audiences backwards into a nostalgic fantasyland past: the black penitent bear whore of a gender-swapped Braveheart [an Amazonian Dorothy Gale].

To it, Brave treats untame nature as rapacious, black and corrupt, thus infringing on "civilized" borders defended by a chonky Scottish girl boss/fairy princess named Merida; i.e., whose own moral struggles in a man's world constitutes her virtue [and encroaching fed-up womanhood viewing her own mother as a bear to poach like Jane Eye in the Red Room's cryptonymic "Redrum," above]. Further symbolized by fight or flight from the Radcliffean bear bandit, her underage but blossoming bodily autonomy as "princess" becomes something to preserve from Mor'du's giant claws [the black death symbol being the usual Radcliffean demon lover threatening defilement of traditional female virtue during bloody murder]!

The usual dualities persist during dialectical-material critiques. And yet, as a damsel-in-distress facing off against Mor'du's lost humanity post-Faustian bargain, Merida becomes the "brave" white Indian; i.e., by performing a cliché rite of passage normally assigned to men in older times: slapping bears. It's a gendered Amazon performance geared towards young straight female adults; i.e., as something to achieve in relation to human primacy and hereditary rites by punishing animals to whitewash the chronotope; e.g., the berserk, or "bear coat," as an anthropomorphic human symbol of "might makes right" status that is obviously bad for the bear as an animal and princess rejecting said animal symbol, but also as a shapeshifting anthromorph onstage and off: the lycanthrope taxidermized by a crossdressing cop!

Except, this can be camped. In the spirit of Star Wars camp, Nimona plays on medieval pageantry like Brave's; i.e., in corporatized shorthand to deliberately critique the monomyth's defense-of-the-realm fervor as state propaganda taught to kids by big movie companies: Gloreth, the golden-haired, girl boss queen, can do no wrong [the statue, below]. Like Eowyn from LotR punching "witches," mid-kayfabe, she's a virginal shieldmaiden for a besieged kingdom whose self-righteous legend disguises the fascist nature of state defense; i.e., the police state secretly raping whores!

Inside a retro-future police state [complete with castles, red-eye cameras, and flying cars], Nimona's Orwellian political maneuverings play out through a cliché of the medieval tale that predates the science fiction renovations it camps: the duel. The white knight, Ambrosious Goldenloin, inevitably crosses swords with the black knight, Sir Allister Boldheart [the moor as a personified "wolf," akin to Shylock from The Merchant of Venice and similar modernized hauntologies]. "Any of you should be able to hold the sword—if you earn it; i.e., "a new era of heroes" working for the state under an expanded recruitment umbrella. Within this hiring boom of knights-as-stormtroopers, Boldheart is framed for killing the girl boss of color by an outwardly serene, inwardly treacherous female director/minister of propaganda [a gender swap for Senator Palpatine, wearing Princess Lea's clothes, next page]: "Gloreth kept the monsters out" and protected the kingdom from alien nature trespassers, white moderacy caving palingenetically to fascism... again.

To it, Nimona is disappointed that Boldheart isn't a murderer because they want to be his evil sidekick!

The film—made by a non-binary director [source: Laura Zornosa's "The Deeper Meaning Behind Nimona's Shape-Shifting Story," 2023]—presents lycanthropy as a form of gender-non-conformity and queer struggle using neo-medieval language: the queer werewolf/dark knight ["Knights don't mope; we brood!"]. An Asian man, Ambrosious, is the homosocial, white-armored nemesis of Boldheart and his Darth Vader's black-armor-and-robot-arm getup—the latter then galvanized, post-betrayal, by a snarky vice character who bashes cops with animalized, shapeshifter magic [while choosing not to murder them].

Sex and gender are a gradient to make gender trouble on; i.e., like my binary trans persona, Glenn the Goblin, Nimona can pick whatever form they want, but choose a shortstack, redheaded Pippi Longstocking with fangs and a penchant for all things "metal." Whereas Nimona changes shape in a self-infantilized regression that speaks to their lived experiences and brutal kettling by state proponents—eventually morphing into something big and strong [a kaiju] in the face of childhood trauma—

Boldheart calls Nimona a monster because they're ostensibly a girl who not only can change shape but dislikes knights [cops] during reactive abuse: "she's" supposed to die because knights kill monsters, including witchy queers "who don't know their place."

Turns out, Nimona and Gloreth were partners as children, divided by the latter's fearful family at the sight of magic. The lesson of the narrative, then, is a sapphic, Pagan mistrust of Greater Good government by pushing against established institutions, not simply "corrupt" directors; i.e., the latter's ability to use 1,000+ years' worth of ancient misinformation and modern social media [in hauntological forms] to generate marginalized in-fighting by presenting queer rebels as instigating crisis, thus worthy of reprisals by marginalized children who grow into TERFs: taught to be a hero-for-the-state by driving a sword into the heart of anything different; i.e., good versus evil, us versus them. For Nimona, its suicide-by-cop! They lose the will to fight, thus live!

The real villain, then, is state power as a bourgeois shapeshifter demonizing proletarian shapeshifters by "kettling" them: Gloreth's scapegoat as something to kill, thus return things "to normal." Threatened with losing control, the director turns the giant, Death-Star-sized cannon against the kingdom, forcing Nimona to intervene—by throwing themselves in front of its salvo: "Go back to the shadow" invoking the abjection process to, sure enough, camp Tolkien! The biggest threat to the people of the kingdom isn't Nimona, then, the openly queer and shapeshifting magic girl; it's the functional heiress of a closeted lesbian enforcing state hegemony! The onstage director—being a fascist—rules through misdirection, crisis and fear as something that affects her worse than anyone: her dying words being a slogan that cements her ignominious death tied to state delusions, our resident nutjob tilting at windmills!

Such things are half-real; e.g., whereas Jadis saw diversity as a weakness in establishment politics, Nimona represents diversity as a form of strength: to change shape for more than just survival, but to alter the world around them through empathy as something to establish—not just for one type of queerness but all of them personified within Nimona as a plurality for gender-non-conformity and active rebellion against heteronormative tyranny [e.g., zombies]. Its oppressive, blinding walls and process of abjection become something to join together and riot against, kaiju-style: to let the "monsters" in to expose the true deceivers—our political leaders, but also Capitalism as built to foster their megalomaniacal self-delusions and inequities. Ours. In the end, these weaponized beliefs and blindnesses must, like the kingdom's castle walls, be disarmed and deconstructed, lest Capitalist Realism and the Capitalocene have us dying like the director does [following in Goebbels footsteps]!)

And while we've now looked at magic girls like Sailor Moon, Nimona and Brave (and shortly will be looking at unicorns in YA media), this isn't to say that one form of monstrous-feminine is "superior" to another when reversing abjection; i.e., in terms of fostering sex positivity and sympathy-for-the-devil education within a holistic Gothic mode: pushing towards death (and black rabbits) by personifying it as a vehicle thereof (the dreaded death coach, next page). However we try to humanize monsters, concerned parental groups aggressively restrict the increasingly abject, trauma-heavy types to specific activities and spaces tied to Nordic and nuclear models; i.e., sending the bizarre, seemingly necrophilic function of overtly undead monsters to "adult" graveyards and Promethean lands of the dead, while relegating the Faustian component of more "hellish," otherworldly demons to places that children are likewise barred from accessing! A brothel is a brothel, thus full of guilty pleasures speaking to nature and death as alien; i.e., full of many kinds of revenges to be had, mid-harvest (to ring Hell's bells, left)! Fruit plucked! Harvest humanized!

(artist: Hotsumi)

Yet, the historical-material effect of this policing is segregative regardless if the demons of nature have partially undead and/or hellish qualities; i.e., the pandemonium of natural demons become underexplored and underrepresented in children's fiction through concrete socio-material forces: reactionaries eradicating open "degeneracy" while colonizing the visually appropriate language they permit in "acceptable" public discourse. They learned it from corporations, parental guidance policing the whore to rape her witch-like status (from G-rated and above; e.g., Snow White)!

As such, terrifying children and horny superstitious middle-class women (re: danger sex with graveyards), Disney proves, is canonically fine if it's in defense of the status quo⁴⁷⁶:

⁴⁷⁶ To which Nimona represents a recent delineation from a rival, smaller company in 2023; i.e., despite producing Andor (which is Marxist but not very queer), Disney canceled Nimona under Bluesky as a mainstream release because of its queer themes (source: Rohit Rajput's "Why Was Nimona canceled by Disney?" 2023), Nimona then funded as an independent release by Annapurna Pictures acquired by Netflix. Corporate pimping and hot-potato aside, there's only so much sublimation and recuperation you can do with ads before the allegory wins out! And Nimona's not subtle!

(exhibit 56e: Darby O'Gill and the Little People was a 1959 movie for children that is strangely terrifying. Then again, the terror is no accident; i.e., Disney uses their tremendous resources to appropriate cartoony versions of Celtic myths, preserving the heteronormative order through literal fear and dogma. The old man, Darby O'Gill, struggles to defend the young and innocent Katie from an imaginary past that is ancient and female—the bean sidhe and its death cries! By confronting and attacking said spirit, Darby faces a ghastly omen of death [a half-real hag to chase down like Don Quixote policing bicycle face]: the "ooooooo" of the demon very "they're coming to get you, Barbara!" in its abjecting of nature/the druids.

In turn, their brief dance in the town square summons the "death coach," which appropriately descends from the dark, rainy sky to spirit old Darby away to the land of the dead! It's intentionally hauntological, reviving these old myths to hold Grampa hostage/superstitiously spook and instill children with a Protestant ethic demonizing Catholicism behind a Black Veil; i.e., in defense of heteronormative sex told through a Disney classic: the fairytale marriage used to fetishize Indigenous populations, but also assimilate them; re: not just the old-timers, but Peter Pan's 1954 Tiger Lily and 1995 Pocahontas doing the same exact thing: "kill the Indian, save the man" [or whore/virgin]. Also, I'm thoroughly convinced Disney do shitty remakes of their own canon so they can convince people that their old movies were "good"; they weren't—the classics having always been racist, sexist and queerphobic—but can be camped!)

A huge part of this selective abuse occurs through active division—one creating and stretching a divide between pornography and art enforced through the insistence of evil, corrupting forces "from nature"; e.g., the bean sidhe or lycanthrope, despite their natural guise, remain dangerous because any dialogs about sex (and nature) from them promote Original Sin; i.e., anything the demon says is wrong because it's queer by default, thus secretly dark, vile and deserving of total banishment (and death)! Indeed, canonical iterations relegate overt sexuality to adult stories outside of fantasy fictions meant for children, whose own forests are devoid of obvious sex: as something to describe outside the heteronormative, nuclear family model. Indeed, the canonical fairytale is usually quite chaste unless pointedly made "for adults"; i.e., making it a kind of cheap, speakeasy-bake porn with nothing much to do or say but pander in the laziest possible ways to the usual paying status-quo audience: cis-het parents.

Canon-wise, to encircle and ring up these purchases within a host of darker elements is allowed, provided it reasserts the heteronormative order through abject means. This tendency gatekeeps children, preventing them from exploring dualistically nostalgic notions of fairytale language that marry nature-themed creatures to erotic dialogs, but especially pornographic expressions of pain, loss, drug-use and death, as well as gender dysphoria, lurking persecution and exile.

As we've already explored, though, monsters are incredibly liminal; so is the queer experience, which often features monsters as contested, pornographic entities to chase—i.e., the presence of "nature" as a sacred, tamed, biblical site that becomes invaded by the forces of darkness through Original Sin, Satanic Panic, and other reactionary arguments' self-authored black rabbits; re: exploitation and liberation occupy the same poetic spaces, hence the whore's paradoxical revenge through exposure: the opposite of fetish obscura, nature and the Medusa as notably non-white/thicc PAWG to PHAT people of color! Such medicine cures the poison of capital as normally exploiting us and our peaches, pies and cakes; i.e., as things to reclaim by us through our non-harmful harvesting of them on the Aegis: suggesting degrowth through what we grow exposing the state as inhumane—pimps of nature from childhood to YA to adult stories alike! Any victim is a whore, to some extent, but can become a dark avenger as whore to have the whore's revenge through paradox and cryptonymy advertising the eating of crackers (so to speak) in bed and out! So we do pull the Black Veil aside to showcase wicked bad naughty Zoot!

Rabbits are historically bred as pets but also for meat, in larger breeds; some rabbits are dark and thicc in ways that speak to their liberation while still enjoying the torment they cause their malnourished onlookers. Speaking to adolescent curiosities about changing bodies and what to expect of nubility (during puberty in terms of actual and idealized bodies in popular media), black rabbits do so in prescriptive and descriptive forms: puberty as scary but also exciting. To it, while material conditions shape social ones and vice versa, we congenital-to-comorbid sluts feel excited at being "born again"; i.e., as de facto witches reclaiming our bodies' Satanic power from state pimps! All roads lead to Rome? Our heart-shaped landing strips lead to the palace of Queen Maeb!

In turn, the liminality of nubility classically has targets of sexual assault willing themselves to transform; i.e., into something unfuckable, which we can then flip on its head: to be something fuckable (above and below) that abusers can't fuck, but whose cryptonymy—as behind and on the buffers we use—remain overshadowed by such desires (and buffers) to start with. Keeping with darkness visible, then, such portents of doom are meant to be followed into Hell (re: landing strips); and white or not, power's power! On the Aegis, though, the chub becomes something to chase, rubbing our enemies raw (to suck their power through our vampiric holes/gaze without giving them what they want—total domination)!

To it, canonical polemics invalidate and ostracize Pagan rites and animalistic egregores, doing so by concentrating and collectively punishing them as "Satanic";

i.e., anything black (not just rabbits or cats), and operating alongside queerly "subversive" examples of natural demons: as lent an undead and/or hellish affect to stress their evil, outsider function; re: by the moral panickers: saying to any who will listen, "Please, think of the modest women and children!" Such corruption arguments tokenize, concerning the youth by "groomer" demons; i.e., poaching the black rabbit, rabbit-on-rabbit, mid-push-pull! Again, it's very Watership Down.

In turn, all are placed outside the "natural" order of things—canonically being presented in ways that threaten the elite's staple image of nature as imperiled and alien during virgin/whore mirror syndrome; i.e., by confusing agents whose closeness to the genuine natural world is branded as heretical, but also pornographic as "educational" in lateral, peripheral forms of canon: what your parents (and older, often male siblings) enjoy and keep from you/shelter you from... until you're on the market, that is, when they pimp you in turn—to suddenly throw you in, head-first and blindfolded (as I was)!

Creating porn as a means of sex-positive expression/universal liberation amounts to the generation of societal boundaries that need to be respected by those establishing them; i.e., it is not an invitation to attack them or "claim" them. As outlined in the manifesto, not only is state-corporate hegemony a gateway to fascism (as Capitalism decays), but fascism is a gateway to assimilative, chattel rape fantasies and worker abuse committed by "heroic" agents: cis-het white men/token agents as false protectors! Often defended by battered housewives (who radicalized from their own abuse), these "husbando" and token "waifu" cops will never, ever have a healthy relationship; i.e., because they treat their partners like unironic masters or chattel slaves (thus food and sex toys). Simply put, they desire and resent them, seeing them as threats to state hegemony but also prizes to claim for being good little cops: mommy and daddy replacements!

So do cops become chasers; i.e., putting the Madonna on a pedestal while having affairs with the Whore's Maculate Conception. Often, these dark mistresses (and lotharios) are codified in appropriative forms of genderqueer fantasy avatars: thicc women, "pixie dream girls," femboys, unicorns, gorgons, etc, as bourgeois dogma dualized by proletarian likenesses using the same black-rabbit aesthetic (the sacrifice and the avenger). While these liminal forms of "bait" exist within the state of exception, they aren't strictly mythical; they're hiding from monstrous-femicidal forces like Amalthea did from King Haggard's Red Bull (next page), onstage and off. The onscreen variant offers up demonic allusions to rapacious forms of courtly love: of classically chasing vulnerable women through the forest, forcing them to change into something else⁴⁷⁷ to survive the patriarch's lusty wrath. To it, the lycanthrope (again rabbit or not, female or not) has a topos of power that is as much their ability to transform as it is to attract an unwanted mate and go running scared through the dark forest!

Offstage, power and resistance meet at cross purposes during Pride events. Kink at Pride is a tricky subject, or public nudism in general; even so, they invite gender trouble from reactionaries as much as overt porn. Obviously it should be made available at appropriate ages and in stories that can teach sex and gender to children in language they'll actually comprehend (exhibit 56a).

All the same, we shouldn't treat children like fools; i.e., they are smarter than capital gives them credit, absorbing and internalizing ideas at a rapid pace (a common consensus is that children until puberty passively acquire language; they do not learn it). They also grow up and experiment with sex as they age and their bodies mature. They make their own gossip, perceptive pastiche and constructive anger to transform themselves and the natural-material world like Gay Wizards do—as bearers, dwellings and messengers of their own trauma. Of that, the poiesis of their "magic" chooses the form, not them: "Magic do as you will!"

"Magic Do as You Will!": On the Cusp of Adulthood; or, Teenage Unicorns Following Rabbits

This brings us to the bildungsroman, or coming-of-age story and Young Adult fiction aimed at sexually developing teenagers. For men, this is classically the monomyth. For women, this applies to the Gothic novel out of older rape apologia or legends about rape and courtly love/escape (e.g., Persephone and Hades); i.e., commonly turning women into things a rapist (or their proxy) won't care for, thus chase. In leaving the safety of Paradise, the Young-at-Heart—from Persephone to Hermia to Dorothy Gale to Madikken to Ripley to Amalthea—speak to the female/feminine side of things, save that Amalthea is monstrous-feminine in magical ways tied to nature-as-alien. She's a GNC, phallic ("one-horned") whore/force of nature to capture and turn into a princess—first sent on her way by a talking butterfly (versus a rabbit), and chased over Hell's half-acre by a fiery Red Bull. This speaks to the fears of approaching nubility that women would classically fear and want to control in Neo-Gothic fantasies, except The Last Unicorn has the gift of queer inclusion, thus foresight: our Lady Amalthea (the bearer of the Horn of ⁴⁷⁷ I.e., often a tree ("There is no immortality but a tree's love!"), but also monsters. Haggard is a trans chaser in that Beagle inverts the classic myth; i.e., of female transformation by turning the unicorn into something the king didn't want: a naked human girl who remains queer ("She looks so strange; she has a newness..."). He's Nick Fuentes, but less smitten with catboys and more horse girls of a more literal sort—something to monopolize and make scarce, regardless!

Plenty) is queer and alienated (the "last" of her kind, just as Schmendrick is the last of his, the Red-Hot Swamis—from Hindu: a religious ascetic or holy person).

Furthermore, the unicorn is only called "Amalthea" after Schmendrick (whose name is Yiddish for "fool") turns her into a human girl of courting age; i.e., lending the story a hauntological air of gender trouble and dysphoria/body dysmorphia, mid-metamorphosis, but also jouissant cryptonymy and infiltration: "I'm alive!" while "the world is dying!" as the heroes go into the aging king's crumbling castle (similar to the Skeksis from Jim Henson's Dark Crystal of the same year).

Hauntologies aside, Beagle's activist-tinged neo-medieval—he wrote his novel (marketed as sci-fi; source: Baca) in 1968 and the screenplay for the film—is very bittersweet and ontologically trapped between childhood and adulthood; i.e., hiding, fighting and regressing during the cryptonymy process, and the many regrets/surprise joys that come from development and exposure:

(exhibit 57: Screenscaps from The Last Unicorn. The unicorn is a creature that, when tamed, loses its horn, thus ability to fight but also be recognized for what it is; i.e., by virtue of "being beheaded," but keeping its female body as automatically feminine within sexist eyes: "Love is slowing you down." In short, the unicorn is a monstrous-feminine freakshow attraction, one generally sought out to be tamed and captured on all registers—first the farmer who mistakes her for a white mare, then the old witch who knows better but puts a false horn on her so paying folks can cryptonymically recognize what they're even looking at, then ultimately held prisoner in the ocean under a haunted castle by a mad king. The last is done by Haggard constantly spying on her and her standing still to hide from him in human form; i.e., "all his spies" versus the classic female refrain that, when extending to the monstrous-feminine as a queer shapeshifting entity [the unicorn as "horned" beast] leads to Amazonomachia yet again: a duel on the beach, fencing with horns to foil the king's rapacious and steady, Zeus-like advances [the burning abjection process]. As always, the mythic structure provides clues that spell out popularized ideas indicative of capital functioning as it usually does—doing so through the cryptonymy process, mid-chronotope: "to reach the Red Bull, you have to walk through [castle] time!" Very Bakhtinian!))

Though short on the pornographic side of things, The Last Unicorn is a perfectly fine-if-curious YA example of these ideas. Utterly enchanting but strangely bleak, it weds adult themes of death and queer existentialism to fantastical ideas of nature: the ivory image of the unicorn as a beacon of the natural world haunted with the absence of obvious trauma. She isn't immediately under attack, but feels utterly alone. The animals of the forest are alright, but they aren't like her. So when she innocently goes looking for what became of the others who are, she finds herself trapped in different ways—first, inside an empty land strangely depopulated of unicorns, then inside a greedy king's castle as an unwilling fake princess.

If this sounds Gothic, it is, but with a suitably queer twist: not only is the castle is home to demons, the undead, and imprisoned queer folk; but our heroine—the story's magic girl—is a traditionally queer monster locked inside a body she doesn't want to inhabit; re: that of a human girl. She feels closer to nature and herself when she isn't a princess, but having been human for a time misses the prince if not the castle he called home (despite the false father he clung to: "He is no son of mine. I found himself on a doorstep where some peasant had left him. It was pleasant enough, at first, but it died quickly." The king is a drug lord/addict, addicted to queerness as something to see: "Why can I not see myself in your eyes!" His sickness drains the land, turning "green and soft" into "hard and grey" by a darker half of the king that keeps him prisoner).

Under attack, one will scramble desperately to defend oneself from power abuse. This humiliating desperation and defeat isn't just from threats of physical death, but identity death. The Red Bull did not want to kill the unicorn, only drive her towards the king in his counting house. Schmendrick—bless him—invokes the awesome power of the Magic to transform the unicorn into an acceptable "beard" that the Red Bull, once-triggered, would not attack; it would deactivate and retreat, leaving the queer party in temporary peace to pursue their quest of gay rescue!

However, the disguise would not last, threatening to alter Amalthea irrevocably forever—to turn her straight, marry the prince, and live happily ever after ("Reader, I closeted myself.")! In the end, she and the prince do not wed; the Red Bull kills the prince, who the unicorn resurrects. The "happy ending" is that they remember each other with fondness—that she "will remember his heart when men are fairytales and books written by rabbits" (similar to Cuwu and I, our regrets aside, such as those are). She's the rabbit Schmendrick pulled out of a hat; i.e., in reverse, and—per a revolutionary cryptonymy—concealed inside a human girl who followed the rabbit back to her hutch ("I have done you evil and cannot undo it!"): a closeting of the queer, the rabbit going back into the hat/to Wonderland as an imperfect exile: "At the end of the film, the unicorn triumphs—but she still doesn't find love?" / "There's no happy ending. The love story is completely tragic" (source: Ricard Baca's "Peter S. Beagle Recalls..." 2016). The idea isn't doom, I would argue, but a curse to navigate as queer people do—in a traveling wardrobe/drag show!

The Last Unicorn, then, is ultimately a tale about trans emasculation and concealment towards liberation as elusive—about queer people being hunted by powerful men and having to hide in ways that invariably draw attention to themselves or make themselves feel dead inside (the subterfuges of which we can/will reclaim in Volume Three, Chapter Five); e.g., during the opening scene, two hunters spare the unicorn's life and tell her she is the last. Amalthea declares, "What do men know? Just because they have seen no unicorns for a while does not mean that we have all vanished! We do not vanish! We live forever! We are as old as the sky, as old as the moon! We can be hunted, trapped—can even be killed if we leave our forests—but we do not vanish!"

And yet, segregation is no defense; re: her forest is strangely empty (a sexual pun). Men in this story do not know what they are looking at, but still exploit the unicorn as something to chattelize and pimp; i.e., they think she is a white mare versus a unicorn! To it, the most powerful of men hunt and trap unicorns for their delight, doing so by knowing what common men do not; i.e., the unicorns are useful to Haggard and make him happy when nothing else can; re: when he is using them for his delight, as one does a powerful drug but also virgin/whore: "Each time I see the unicorns [...] it is like that morning in the woods, and I am truly young in spite of myself!" She's the last card to collect, completing his collection. Is it any wonder this film is a queer kid's calling card, there and back again?

Everything Haggard touches dies, like a vampire. His servants are Faustian devils and the dry bones of old, drunken madmen (the skull that speaks a Gothic trope, on par with Hamlet: "To reach the Red Bull you have to walk through time. A clock isn't time, it's just numbers and springs. Pay it no mind—just walk right on through." Again, very Bakhtinian). Infantile yet violent, the old king will capture what is his, or kill it if it resists: "The end will be the same." Instead, the unicorn prevails and the mad old king plunges into the sea, swept away by the tide like mermaid foam.

A story of shattered innocence, The Last Unicorn reminds viewers to beware of those who want to "protect" children; i.e., their harmful lessons teaching men to become like Haggard, thus to colonize love, magic and all things sex, drugs and rock 'n roll (the soundtrack performed by "Horse with No Name"⁴⁷⁸ [1971] legends, America)—in a heteronormative way that cages gay unicorns like Haggard did; re: by having "unicorns" dance for them the way that the Patriarchy taught them to, and which Beagle critiques by turning Radcliffe monomorphically on her head: by summoning the castle to dismiss Capitalism through Hamlet's father's ghost—killing Lir (a nod to King Lear) as Hamlet's double, to then revive him after daddy Quixote's dead and gone: to deny the younger squire/Sancho Panza a chance at love, but punishing him with sweet memories having nipped future Patriarchy/nepotism in the bud ("I will miss you; I never had any friends before").

To it, heteronormativity is social-sexually dimorphic; it also sexualizes everything in coercive, imprisoning ways to enforce the pimp of nature as monstrous-feminine by bourgeois fans and class traitors (actual police, TERFs, weird canonical nerds, etc). As Aristotle once said, "Give me a child until he is seven and I will show you the man." Likewise, a little girl in a Baptist family once damned me to Hell because I had long hair ("They grow up so fast!"). At the same time, my seven-year-old nephew—growing up in a trans-friendly household—didn't miss a beat when he learned that I was trans: "Oh, so Grandma has a daughter now!" All we have to do is kill the covetous King Haggard in the next generation's hearts, and maybe someday Amalthea and Lir can finally bone!

In other words, gender is a social construct tied to marriage in and out of the nuclear model, but one's material surroundings inform the (de)construction; i.e., as an ongoing affair towards or away from said model. So if you're surrounded by people who isolate and bombard you with fear and dogma, you're going to grow up emotionally and Gothically stupid; you're going to become the very thing capital want you to be—i.e., those who control the means of production and flow of information, but also regulate the Superstructure through cops; re: as zombified in a manner beholden to shareholders who want consumers to blindly consume predictably. The bourgeoisie want consumers to condition via canonical sex education that hide capitalist abuses around the world in fantasy language and canonical hermeneutics. In turn, fascists deliver naked displays of force in defense of Capitalism as something that decays by design: to defend through force, the Red Bulls to Haggard's kingdom!

The first casualties in fascist coups are the intelligencia and artists; i.e., as unwilling victims of child-soldier violence. That makes the nature of Gothic Communism not only antifascist, thus fundamentally nonviolent vis-à-vis nature, but something made to defend sex-positive artists from state actors; i.e., from sex-coercive workers (artists or not) working for or endorsing the state through their own terrible art and shitty social movements' false rebellion, hence violent enfants terribles who grow into stochastic terrorists: the bad-faith counterprotest delivered by violent cowards like Kyle Rittenhouse and the Proud Boys (exhibit 58, above). Beagle presents these rogues, in The Last Unicorn, as outlaws who—far from actually resisting King Haggard meaningfully—are actually comen that Schmendrick accidentally exposes/defeats with his own illusions of Robin Hood: "Robin Hood is a myth; we are the reality! [...] That was a dangerous diversion, Sir Sorcerer!" To which Captain Cully and his right hand reward the fledgling wizard by tying him to a tree ("We'll fill him; we'll both be gentlemen of leisure in a month's time!") and which Schmendrick (our Sancho Panza making a false healing drought) escapes by accidentally turning the tree back into a woman—specifically a big-titty grandma whore who tries to rape him (the blind whore's revenge): "Oh, what have I done? Oh, God, I'm engaged to a Douglass fir! UNICORN, HELP ME!" His golem has wooden boobs, and those hurt! He's the penis she's titty-fucking with (echoes of Gulliver's Travels)!

So don't be fooled by false acts of contrition from violent LARPerS (and token variants); they are the tears of crocodiles. To present oneself as different is to face their wrath—to become a potential target when Capitalism decays and enters crisis, producing zombie killers for the state and undead scapegoats for them to kill (whores policing whores, too: "She shall never have you, the hussy! We shall perish together!"). Likewise, be on your guard; i.e., like a shark waiting for blood, fascists and cryptofascists are waiting for those in power to slip, ready to pounce and take it all for themselves and blame/pimp you as the witch. They must not be normalized enough to feel comfortable; they must be challenged by workers uniting in solidarity against the source of fascism: Capitalism!

Like Beagle's novel/screenplay about rebellious unicorns, the creative importance of Gothic Communism's holistic approach is to encourage sex positivity (and asexual appreciation) along a well-used track towards liberation versus enslavement; i.e., one that includes—but does not endorse—the language of violence and war ubiquitous in popular media from the Gothic onwards: an addressal to the existence of anger as a legitimate, constructive force under duress during the cryptonymy process reversing abjection (thus profit) during our whore's revenge! Rittenhouse is never getting any!

Through common material means of communicating ideas about sex, empathy and emotional intelligence—thus alienation and fetishization—ludo-Gothic BDSM includes a wide variety of "game" performers, students and teachers playing the white-to-black rabbit; i.e., everyday language and linguistic strategies like puns, clichés, metaphors and adages, but also sex, drugs and rock 'n roll (thus harpies and unicorns), as well as Gothic theories by which to pick the lock in duality during liminal expression. So do we actual rebels—like Beagle before us—operate holistically inside veiled fantastical venues! A unicorn is a whore to set free.

In doing so, Gothic Communism desires to entice all working peoples to look through our cryptomimetic methodologies; i.e., our demonic-undead animal cryptonymy as applied poetics, onstage and off: learning from us as we teach within the crosshairs how to generate a social-sexual class consciousness wedded to the virgin/whore, thus culture and race fighting back as Amalthea and her misfit friends do—through naked disguise and prostitution. Everyone likes whores/sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, right? What about horror stories about these things, or art more broadly beyond Beagle or us chasing black rabbits?

You remember Alien, right? Nine Inch Nails? Se7en (re: "Seeing Dead People")? This glorious phantasm of endless indulgence in forbidden, mind-altering "drugs" also includes queer allies looking at "trippy" stories like Beagle's; i.e., where past mistakes can stochastically lead to the truth and surprise solutions—what Bob Ross calls "happy accidents" (or funny ones, from Cervantes to Beagle to us): men/tokens are so alienated from nature and whores, they no longer know what they're looking at, which gives us true guerrillas an edge. Fascists are stupid, farming nature with malice; e.g., Everquest and every "mob" in that game's own cartographic refrain. "If you listen to fools, the mob rules!" (Black Sabbath, 1981).

Keeping with Ross, anyone can imagine and "paint" a better world through the past as something to rediscover through tragedy and farce. As Giger shows us but also Beagle, the results can be incredibly transformative; i.e., regarding how we think about ourselves in relation to the historical-material world and nature: as something that is not writ in stone, but defined by a dialogic imagination forever in talks/decay and regeneration. To it, history can change through the human condition as something to evolve out of past forms!

This requires something I've described before as "learning from the past"; i.e., the Wisdoms of the Ancients as alive and happening within a world far more modernized than Radcliffe could have dreamed by touching upon forms of rebellion she famously shied away from: demons, but also the mentalities of demons as begot from altered states of mind to give back to others, mid-exchange. Indeed, Radcliffe and other Neo-Gothic authors made up (so to speak) an earlier rise of discourse; i.e., towards gender and sexual identity as starting to develop in resistance to older forms of capital similar what Beagle did in the '80s (and us, in the 2020s). Don't avoid the rabbit; fuck it to metal, on drugs, worshipping Satan!

As we've discussed, much has happened since Radcliffe—requiring current rebels to reconsider a rather old solution that feels quite novel in the present state of affairs: illicit drug use as something to symbolize or encourage through the likes of the unicorn (the white rabbit) or the harpy/xenomorph (the black rabbit); i.e., as a fever dream ode not just about rape and blind-parody sarcasm, but rape play during ludo-Gothic BDSM! To reverse abjection, said BDSM speaks hauntologically but also cryptonymically and chronotopically to sex, drugs and genderqueer rebellion/rock 'n roll; i.e., as a happy uncontrollable ordeal—one that, sure enough, has a bit of pain thrown in to spice things up during the historical-material trauma loop: someone not to duel over but slay dragons with during the same-old weirdest boner being something to camp by embodying the boner's symbolic cause!

Egads! The black rabbit strikes again, ravishing us in our dreams while awake; i.e., the Red Bull dropping down to taunt us, like Reptile's Easter Egg from Mortal Kombat (1993), and just as cryptic: chasing the Numinous rabbit through many Black Veils, peeling these layers (of a black onion) back while the call comes from inside the house (re: the house is alien in ways that speak to predator/prey dualism, during liminal expression)! Let's continue the hunt!

Continuing the Easter Egg Hunt: Derelict "Antiquity" (reprise, and Neo-Gothic Orientalism as a Foreign, Irrational Exotic to Pimp)

(artist: Kory Cromie)

Speaking of Mortal Kombat and Easter Egg hunts, the Medusa—a black rabbit or not—is concentrically framed; i.e., a Russian bun doll to get to the center of through changing skin (the xenomorph a kind of dark unicorn, but furious and blind, left; re: the harpy whose Celano to Amalthea's virgin, but "two sides of the same magic" the white unicorn cannot stand to see caged: "She'll kill you if you see her free!" So be it). I'll apply this in just a moment to Fisher's "acid Communism," but the basic concept is actually a throwback to altered states of mind that hail from a shared imaginary antiquity studied by developing women and homosexual men; re: Radcliffe and Lewis referring to the imaginary "medieval" in regards to their young adult place in an increasingly capitalist world; i.e., where gender identity versus sexual action was becoming a thing the state was canonically policing (re: Broadmoor). With Beagle and beyond, this wasn't just rabbits, but rabbit hybrids speaking of rape, revenge and necro-erotic fertility/fertilization through surreal chimeras; i.e., like Giger's xenomorph linked to Orientalism as "dressing Aesop up," a suit in a suit (with Said writing Orientalism in 1978—three years after Giger's Necronomicon [of Lovecraft's "mad Arab"] and a year before Alien, and three before The Last Unicorn).

We'll get to Stompy in "Return of the Black Rabbit." For now, let's unpack Orientalism and similar exotic subspaces speaking to the rabbits enclosures by other names (a "pen" being both a cage and writing device for the bun-in-spirit egregore's room of one's own). Keeping with actual drug use flowing poetry on and off the page, prudes like Coleridge certainly imbibed laudanum to inspire themselves (and their habitats) with. But many other authors have done similar inspirational consumption with drug-like poetics and half-real virgin/whore muses.

Leaving a hazy "past" in their wake, we're left with a surreal procession of pasts and their imperfect authors (re: Schmendrick's Robin Hood echoing Hamlet's father's ghost, but also Titania's fairy train) that we, as genderqueer people, can learn from; i.e., when finding our own non-exclusionary voices: liberating nature as alien, dead, monstrous-feminine whore, mid-exploitation—with Orientalism and Neo-Gothic as modular but often overlapping through cognitive dissonance: when the rubber meets the road and the road is rocky/the dark forest speaking to past crimes but also dark whores met with transformation and pain, mid-exchange. Illusions can trap or free the mind, just like Schmendrick!

This invariably involves encountering similar, but unique scenarios that cover up, imitate and parody even older scenarios; i.e., not just "fatal" portraits, but "dead poets" reciting the reinvented past through bits of poetry that go on to define our own struggles to be extraordinary under the self-same ticking of the clock: "Seize the day. Because, believe it or not, each and every one of us in this room is one day going to stop breathing, turn cold and die" (exhibit 59a, below).

Like Rimbaud's infamous "derangement of all the senses," there's no time like the present to "do drugs" and transform into our true selves (and Rimbaud's transgressive expanding of the senses in 1871 "[Je est un autre"] riding on the emergence, as Foucault puts it, of the homosexual as a new species in 1870; i.e., as queer discourse spearheaded/expressed by an expanding of the senses in literature, but also popular stories and everyday speech: a return to the queer as revived in the present in new retro-modern forms): as something to take with us on dangerous roads. America, for example, play Jimmy Webb's excellent and haunting "Man's Road"; i.e., speaking again to Bakhtin, but also German translations of the 1982 film (with Christopher Lee fluent in German) likewise alluding to German shadow novels and plays (re: Faustus) that inspired the British Neo-Gothic authors' own Terror and Horror schools escaping Plato's cave while inside it: "I can only show you the door; you're the one who has to walk through it."

Yet, while the spectres of Marx survive in ways still common today that workers can learn from, they can also be fooled by copycats. It's the corporate copycats and proponents of capital you gotta beware; i.e., they'll teach you that all people are the same, that the old ways are exclusively stupid and bad, then blind you with the reimagined past as seen through "their" eyes—the way they want you to see the world, thus buy their products and otherwise behave predictably for them (a concept we'll explore for the rest of this book series): a false prophet insofar as their cryptonymy is bourgeois, thus false relative to worker class interests! Trojan animals, thus whores, work in duality!

As such, fabled falsehood isn't monopolized by the elite, as Lewis' cryptonymy shows (and Beagle's/ours). In keeping with his Matilda's own black rabbit, demons give forbidden knowledge as something to chase into Hell on Earth (a bit like Dante's Virgil, but gayer and sluttier): where they chattelize and brutalize nature, they will rape workers and fetishize said whore and rape it as alien. "Black" is given a bad rap, then; e.g., blackmail or Black Phillip. But it's where power is stored, thus can be used by us to leverage our power as something to reverse abjection on the Aegis!

As a trans person, then, I have devised ludo-Gothic BDSM (and monstrous drug use as a mind-opening device) to cryptonymically reverse abjection, thus the rape of nature's black rabbits similar to Said's Orientalism (echoing those black rabbits my stepfather killed in front of me and forced me to eat); i.e., ones that, despite being coded as sinister per a Protestant ethic pimping nature at large as monstrous-feminine, magically "levels the playing field" for all sex workers—thus all work, past, present and future—having died prematurely while toiling under manufactured, exploited time: the cruel mechanized clock of Capitalism and ergonomic labor stolen for someone else's profit based on your body and time, but also poetics! Sex and adventure go arm-in-arm, or rather dick-in-hole since the feudal ages into modern eras selling military conquest being "worthwhile"; i.e., for a breedable princess to steal from your rival and impregnate with your bloodline!

"To reach the Red Bull you have to walk through time!" Same idea with the black rabbit and its own Gothic fakeries oppositional cryptonymy (re: Gwynevere, Princess of Sunlight, below—a concentric hyperreal illusion inside an illusion inside an illusion, within the infernal concentric pattern's ergodic, anisotropic, liminal, holistic mise-en-abyme)!

(model and artist: Isabelle Ryan and Persephone van der Waard)

As Beagle showed us, such "Ancient" Romances can be camped through sex work, well enough; i.e., to achieve a drug-like empathy during the cryptonymy process. As Said shows, this needn't be literal drugs (though it can be), but a land associated with them. As someone who is habitually sober but has tried drugs, I propose "breaking the clock" by listening to the friendly past as "drug-like"; i.e., in places "out of time," like the Metroidvania chronotope (which houses monstrous-feminine and black knight hybrids, such as Dark Souls' concentric illusions, above), but also the Orientalism (and black rabbits) such chronotopes invoke!

When taken, drugs distort one's sense/placing of time, shaping the future in ways that keep the evil clock and its callous machinations from returning (and blinding people with false, reinvented, neoliberal time); i.e., by using my time as something to compile a driven, focused haze: a life's work for future workers of the world to learn from—to give them, and their ancestors/future children a frankly much-needed voice and hermeneutic of perceiving they can emblemize and disseminate!

To it, I am not by doing anything remarkably "great" in the traditional sense (re: Prince Lir's great deeds), but by doing something that few under Capitalism actually do, am still doing an extraordinary feat to contribute towards a larger movement, over space-time: one fighting with enhanced modes of perception (and existence) that supply hallucinatory acid-Communist potential to yield revolutionary demon-undead animal deities like the unicorn, xenomorph or 1,001 Arabian Nights from the Islamic Golden Age onwards; i.e., as a jinn-like mascot retranslated for genderqueer existence (e.g., exhibit 60d—with trans, intersex and non-binary persons making their own art tied to the half-real imaginary past): to make dark wishes come true that, per Said's Orientalism, challenge the Protestant ethic pimping Islam and Africa as smushed into a single abject paradigm. "Sometimes a tree's just a tree," but beyond its usage per capital, can grow cryptonymically into something more; re: like Schmendrick's "true magic" ("Did you see what I made? I had it—it had me—but it's gone now!") but like any witch hunt and subsequent liberation, isn't rooted in any particular time and place (re: Federici)!

To that, I'm doing my own small part to fight Capitalism and help wake people up by leaving my own "torch" behind: this "trippy" book series (and my art married to my friends, which a friend described as being "the Bob Ross of vulvas"). Designed to illuminate with shadows, it can stay free from the drug-induced, paralyzing darkness of Capitalism's "bad batches," but still kind of works like drugs do. These can be unusual linguistic devices like "monster puns" or stories of exquisite "torture"; re: on the edge of the civilized (sober) world: Orientalism and its hauntologies long after "Ozymandias" started an admittedly tenebrous trend (cloaked in the Shadow not just of Pygmalion, but Napoleon aping Caesar).

Part of the essence of Gothic is its modular and patchwork nature; i.e., allowing you to make quick, rapid comparisons to seemingly unlike things across larger groups with people who might not have seen a given "rabbit" but recognize something similar somewhere else. The chaotic exercise amounts to "Hey, this is sort of like that" as tying to a massive checklist in the monster mode; you only have to check the boxes needed to address a particular issue under Capitalism, thus a particular monster to think about or with in regards to yourself as part of the larger material world. Drugs, then, become symbolic to an altered, discouraged way of thinking that can transform the world to help all workers tripping through the liminal space (and its hauntology of war):

Just like with stigma animals, stigma substances must be reclaimed through the minorities [and cultures/religions] they're associated with [and vice versa]. To this, Orientalism goes hand-in-hand with the stigmatizing of drugs, specifically as a cultural facet in non-Christian societies that "threaten" Western values; e.g., Islamophobia involving xenophobic hauntologies that fetishize abjected parties. In liminal forms of fantastical expression, queerness can intersect with this subversion, the rainbow as something to "go over" involving queerness and drug use; e.g., the poppy fields in The Wizard of Oz that Dorothy and her friends were skipping through; i.e., in the arduous task of reclaiming and rehumanizing of lost cultures and memories.

As something to reclaim, the use or theme of dark rainbows/drugs can combat a racist/xenophobic Gothic imagination through empathetic fantasies adjacent their Orientalist doubles; i.e., not just a castle, but a palace operated by a sultan—with harems, concubines, eunuchs and assassins! Inside this dialogic sphere, Western demons are replaced by fake jinn and Italian banditti are swapped out for desert nomads, etc [e.g., Lovecraft's incredibly racist and xenophobic ghost of the counterfeit, "Under the Pyramids"—a 1924 short story where, I shit you not, Harry Houdini is kidnapped by Egyptian devil worshippers and lowered into a Gaza pyramid and forced to look upon ancient terrors]: a dark moth rabbit to turn into and inspire others with its bare exposed "terrors"! So scary!

Abjection fetishizes the whore as alien on a gradient, one where racism lingers as a hauntological entity haunting older empire in "older" empire's cryptomimetic "currency." In the usual morphological cartography-in-small, a black or brown body also stands in for continents or cities, but also what those yield as fetishized in both directions: a land of ancient warriors and exotic whores—thus their dark revenge and forbidden pleasures; i.e., as something to plunge into and relish, mid-conquest [sex being a chance to extend one's bloodline through future attempts at expanding territory and development of one's already-owned land and materials]! Canonically this is called "slumming" but exploitation and liberation occupy the same shadow zone/use the same dark forces [and rabbits] at cross dialectical-material purposes!

Similar to their overtly Western counterparts, then, sex-positive examples of the Middle Eastern romance highlight the magic castle—not to endorse the status quo, but quantify cultural value in general while inside the same shadow of police violence; i.e., a dark whore's rarefied desire for universal class elevation and wealth redistribution in a singular [thus inadequate] body language haunted by tokenism/ostracization: as coming from a particular socio-material arrangement and ethnic group's diaspora/cultural reinvention [e.g., the Hoteps] that encompasses holistic struggle in idiosyncratic forms: the nepotistic hoard attached to the whore the sultan sucked said gold from [capital turning nature into gold as a transactional predatory process]. All workers are princes, princesses and princexes under Communism—making the outdated, medieval notion of the princess, kingdom and castle symbolic of a former time to regress into Communism with; re: "Long and hard is the way..." speaking to BBCs and PHAT bodies, black or not [e.g., PAWGs]! The way out of the brothel is inside it, camping such devices in ways that encourage interracial subterfuge; e.g., like Jazmin and I did, working together to performatively speak to struggles not quite of ours but also not quite not! Of course, one needn't actually live in the castle—i.e., while ruling from a dogmatic, unfair position—for things to be "good." Likewise, its cryptonymy can reflect a particular fantasy type played by adjacent oppressed groups in good faith: the storing and exchange of power under the Arabian Nights pastiche according to medievalized personas like the princess but also the mercenary from an imaginary world not "of the West"; i.e., a place closer to nature/the frontiers of current conquest dressed up xenophobically and xenophillically as religious-themed challenges to Christian hegemony with heretical suggestion: the Crusades having failed in rooting out all forms of opposition while minting new canonical ones that repeat the process.

Just as capital makes this eradication impossible—re: by demanding a scapegoat always be near and if one isn't, that it be created out of thin air—we holistic oppressed can invent new subversions out of the same silk shawls; i.e., where those of us closer to the in-group stand in for out-groups that can't speak for themselves; e.g., a white trans woman and black cis-het sex worker speaking to the oppressed in Palestine as inclusively as our faction in the larger fractured pedagogy allows. Weaponizing Orientalism for workers in a global world certainly involves a balancing act—i.e., because cultural appreciation and appropriation occupy the same siren-song choral chambers—but it can be done in sex-positive ways that dodge tokenism in the act!

In Gothic, bandits are whores as part of the tableaux "sticking us up"; i.e., of a hauntological regression to the barbaric: as having a middle-class fascination with non-white cultures since the Crusades seeking to invade and colonize those areas. In turn, bandits are simply redistributors of wealth under criminogenic conditions, the whore being a kind of sex bandit that—for women, in classical scenarios—would "stealth steal" wealth from men; i.e., through labor that wasn't always pimped [a whore without a pimp being a threat]. The femme fatale would be something that, from the Neo-Gothic period onwards, romanticized such paradigm shifts in ways that while not completely underheard of in actual history outside fantasy stories, usually fell on the side of pirate queens or royalty like the Queen of Sheba. Things then progressed beyond the usual cliques and began to globalize Orientalism as a terror weapon tied to drug and sex wars; i.e., as a neoliberal export meeting a rising middle-class demand for exotic princesses/infidel tyrants versus a medieval canard. Xenophobia is generally rooted in half-legends, futile investigations and complete inventions, on the Aegis: what we're working with, mid-subversion! To this, domestic fears of the foreign assassin are not limited to the Orientalism of the Middle East [also being featured within the ninjas of medieval Japan, for instance]! Except these occur after the Mongol sacking of Baghdad, which forced the Golden Age of Islam to end, and echoed Cartesian pursuits, centuries afterwards; i.e., where much of actual Muslim recorded history and cultural achievements survive in echoes. Rather than being completely destroyed, though, they become the stuff of legends, leading cryptomimetically to a glut of popular misconceptions ushered in by future abusers and liberators [e.g., Frankenstein in Bagdad's 2013 response by Ahmed Saadawi to the War on Terror]. Such things canonically fetishize and alienize sex and force [re: policing the whore]. One example includes the word "assassin" as drug-themed, but also xenophobic and xenophilic. Hayden Chakra describes this group as

The order of Hashashin, or also known as the middle eastern Assassins, were a medieval terror spreading gang that excelled in the professional killing of important people. Other names they were recognized by were Nizaris, Nizari Ismailis, Batini's "people of the esoteric teachings" or Ta'limiyyah "people of the secret teachings." They controlled the medieval Islamic world for more than 130 years. Their leader was called Hassan al-Sabbah [source: "The Deadliest Medieval Order Of Assassins – The Hashashins," 2022].

Supposedly the group worked in secret from a dangerous fortress called Alamut, or "Death Mountain." Furthermore, after Napoleon's defeating of the Mamluks and conquering of Egypt, an 1809 talk by a French linguistic contributed to the rise of Egyptology in the process but also various harmful myths about the homogenized peoples and their conquered culture seeking revenge:

The talk, by the linguist and orientalist Silvestre de Sacy, was titled "Dynasty of the Hashishyun and the Etymology of Their Name." Its gist was that the name of a Shi'ite sect known as the Hashishyun ("Assassins") was derived from its members' use of hashish, an intoxicant made of marijuana resin. Founded in 11th-century Persia by Hasan ibn al-Sabah, the Hashishyun sect, from the Ismaili branch of Shi'a Islam, was quite well known in France and throughout Europe. It had gained fame after being mentioned in Marco Polo's widely read account of his travels, written in about 1300. According to Marco Polo, Al-Sabah, aka the "Old Man of the Mountain," would give his followers an "intoxicating potion" to drink that turned them into cruel warriors, and would then dispatch them to dispose of his enemies. The extensive use of the sect's members as hit men is a historical fact, but the potion Marco Polo described was apparently a legend. In any case, so well-known was the legend in Europe, that the French form of the sect's name, assassin, became synonymous with "murderer," and also passed into English as a noun and a verb [source: Elon Gilad's "The Historic Mixup That Made People Fear Hashish," 2019].

Though ultimately not founded in historical fact, the legend of the Middle East as synonymous with drugs, prostitution and murder demonstrates a popular mantra utilized by Napoleon into Orientalism; i.e., haunted by his ghost: as the shrewd and unscrupulous maker of history as "a set of lies that people have agreed upon" [source: PBS "Self-Made Myth"]. He leaves out his own role as head-of-state compelling these agreements through force, not unlike other Great Men of History before/after him except he was spearheading Western superiority and Cartesian exceptionalism during the rise of the nation-state through his own pioneering of modern war leading towards modern-day fascism and white savior rhetoric on the global stage in the 20th and 21st centuries [e.g., the Prince of Persia series, above, or The Legend of Zelda and its own curiously liminal (and genderqueer) subversions, below].

Certainly there remains a dogmatic fear of the unknown the elite use to stoke Western fears of the East and their inexorable, prophesized revenge "from the shadows." But a larger duality [and paradox] is equally present; i.e., the assassin and their mythical "magic potion" existing historically-materially as something to endorse [the American War on Drugs] or subvert ["Death Mountain⁴⁷⁹"]: reuniting alien things to benefit labor and nature, not the elite; re: mid-paradox, on the Aegis, challenging profit.

As something to subvert inside a xenophilic exhibit like mine and Jazmin's, there is generally a danger in challenging the representations of powerful men like Napoleon, but also later Pygmalions like Frank Frazetta [the page after next]: a shared dialogic/stage tone-policed by reactionaries, white moderates, and token elements wanting exclusive authorship over "exclusive" oppression. Oppression is holistic. Ergo, whatever suspicions different groups nurse/arouse, we have to intersect, thus allow for shared performances inside the Valley of Amazons and Thieves [e.g., Link and Nabooru, above]—meaning those that account for asymmetrical and holistic axes of privilege and oppression alike! Nothing reduces during guerrilla warfare, because reducing select groups to singular voices speaking to their oppression is merely a divisive tactic whose Tower of Babel colonizes workers and media, Nintendo style: "Heaven rewards hard work."

Overspecialize and you breed in weakness—not from Heinlein's perspective, but that of rebels needing intersectional solidarity. Furthermore, silence is death. Therefore, we avoid the shame of canonical/token indignation [and ignominious death] while advancing one's material position; i.e., with one's own body to break Orientalism by faking it, thus Capitalist Realism, in good faith versus the state. The wearing of a mask also works to protect one's actual identity through a secret identity/alter ego that publicizes a challenge to the established order of an imagined Orient/dead culture's imaginary past—a place to cherish and "plunder" [with/without quotes] depending on who you work for/fight against; i.e., where power and resistance share the same language in oppositional praxis; e.g., a sexy Sheik to Ganon or Link's Hero of Time. Oppressed groups can be kettled to reject help from educated allies with privilege as Said was; re: Persephone van der Waard's 2017 "[Frederic Jameson and the Art of Lying" speaking to the paradox of telling truth with splendid lies/archaeologies of the future and elaborate strategies of misdirection]. We're all part of the same Breakfast Club; i.e., to betray each other is doom ourselves to an Omelas refrain.)

So far, things have bore out some semblance of order and Paradise; i.e., as something to exclude and indulge in to camp the usual bigotries by "wanting to go to South Africa" (to camp it). Except, post-drug use, the monomyth heroine finds themselves suddenly approaching Hell in ways that continue to resemble home as fearful despite reversing abjection through a holistic pedagogy of the oppressed: the rapidly approaching brick wall, Black Veil or otherwise proverbial abyss rising up to swallow them whole, mise-en-abyme, into the infernal concentric pattern!

In short, this is where "the wheels fly off" and Paradise is subsequently Lost and found through paradox/darkness visible (which the bun and its "magic carpet" are). But the rabbit hasn't shown itself yet—waiting somewhere close at hand as the teenage character finds themselves in a scary grown-up world doubling their perfect past while they have a sexually nubile heroic form to operatically brave the dangers with: hunting for our own "death" in quotes; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM. That's our immortality! With Paradise Lost, let's tempt the Fates!

Paradise Lost; or, Chasing the Rabbit on a Promethean Quest/during a Faustian Bargain (acid Communism reprise; feat., Jim Morrison, Blake, Rimbaud, etc)

Canon h(a)unts its dreams with bugbears (or bugbuns, Bugs Bunnies); Gothic Communism uses the same basic approach to speak to the pedagogy pimped by capital and exotified from an early teenage point of conception and "breeding age" (e.g., Frazetta's "Cleopatra" a pinup body by guarded by non-white harem guards and black panthers, below): growing up (too fast)/forced to by capital's nuclear model!

Beyond Orientalism, I now want to employ Fisher's acid Communism as a way of getting creative by following the black rabbit on a figurative (or literal) drug trip from adulthood onwards; i.e., within ways that reinvent what will likely be suppressed by using what's on hand: to shapeshift, thus avoid capture but still get one's point across, albeit in disguise/on drugs, and which include fatal regressions back into the dangerous childhood as close by insofar as adults are infantilized for their sexual labor! This tripping whore's revenge includes when using art as a forbidden substance to open one's eyes (or grow them anew). Already outlined by Radcliffe, Lewis and Otto as part of a larger synchronistic scheme, but similarly drawing upon the old, "dead" volumes already compiled by past users of the same method, Gothic Communism uses whatever works to help people see while concealing the drug as "just" entertainment.

Furthermore, this includes any "drug-like" or transformative experience historically offered by its famous caché of radical methods and infamous stories. This isn't just a band of unlikely friends and certified misfits commenting on a similar socio-material arrangement with similar stories; they're doing it in similar ways that continue to be used to cryptonymically represent themselves with—the helpful "ghost," in this case, being the Wisdom of the Ancients as a "library" donated to workers by these now-dead people: Marx's nightmare as a useful tool; i.e., not just any old curse, but a means of escaping the curse of Capitalism by playing with "curses" we can control; re: through ludo-Gothic BDSM doing "magic" to gain forbidden sight: to see, to speak, to scream (Daily Dose of Internet, Jan 16th 2023; timestamp: 0:23), thus sing and dance to gain taboo knowledge as the poetic ability to detect the human within the monster through various social-sexual exchanges. So do we keep chasing our adventurous, titular white-to-black rabbit into an uncanny adulthood that leaves us feeling stranded and free from Capitalist Realism's usual marooning!

Our inspection of reclaiming the rabbit—and its drugs/adult behaviors and cycle of education back towards children, again—will include acid Communism from past revolutionaries like Jim Morrison, Rimbaud, Blake and Shakespeare, but also the Medusa "dragon" these emboldened men were historically chasing for various, not-always-noble-reasons: ghosts we workers of the present must also camp.

To it, demonic reclamation is not an overnight process; it carries on through a state of transition towards the state as something to reinvert—i.e., by redistributing power and reconfiguring socio-material conditions over time. This includes the joyous subverting of canonical forms through the code of identity as a cryptonymic means of concealment: for those performing queer existence with borrowed language (thus time); i.e., the camouflage of revolutionary cryptonyms (which we shall examine more thoroughly in the next chapter and in Volume Three) as a kind of covert identity working out in the open. This can be through occult demonic expression, nature-themed demons and drugs, or composite demons and critiques of capital that become disguised by virtue of their otherworldly "Gothic" qualities; re: the unreality of the infernal concentric pattern being something we can make real in spite of that: to break Capitalist Realism by developing Gothic Communism with its own stolen supply of drugs (and white-to-black rabbits)!

For example, whereas exhibit 60a shows workers with morphologically flexible demons, exhibit 60b places model cut-outs over Frank Frazetta's original paintings. His older, hauntological images of women and nature are fundamentally violent and dehumanizing. By subverting those through fresh visions, the worker effectively reinvents the relationship between humans, sexuality and nature; i.e., through peaceful drug use and sex-positive hallucinations reversing abjection during the whore's revenge; re: "putting the pussy on the chainwax!"

(exhibit 60a: Artist: Regalia for the Wicked: An Eldritch Fashion Zine. "Wicked," in this case, denotes a class of individual monsters canonically associated with evil and the unknown; i.e., Lovecraft's xenophobia, except here the magazine covertly humanizes the monsters. I say "covert" because the outward appearance is still abnormal, meaning humanized without sacrificing their phantasmagorical, morphologically inchoate qualities; i.e., there's a sense of pride involved in preserving that aspect of themselves, denoting Fisher's "acid Communism" as a drug-like means of escape into liberating plastic bodies.)

Workers require iconoclastic "drugs" to combat Capitalist Realism's inability to imagine a future beyond the canonical, devastated hauntologies of neoliberal canon; i.e., a drug-like expansion of the mind—what Mark Fisher called "acid Communism." Earlier, we looked at Stuart Mill's "What Is Acid Communism?" As we further inspect the goodto-bad rebellious qualities of it (and not just innocent, child-like ones), I want you to have access to the full quote:

...part of acid communism is the means to fulfil Fisher's desire to imagine the future. Of course, some people take a superficial view of this part, though I think Fisher choose acid communism partly for the advantage this superficiality provides. Acid communism is about ways of imagining a world after capitalist realism, and for Fisher, one of the ways to escape this reality is psychoactive drugs. The programme of acid communism is not to condone psychoactive drug use, but as an example this activity captures the philosophy of acid communism excellently.

To imagine new futures, we have to find ways to break out of our present myopia. Fisher's acid communism is unique primarily for placing this goal above all others. For example, Marx's call for class consciousness is a very acid communist idea, but the means of achieving class consciousness (the critiques and contradictions of capital) dominated much of Marx's contribution. If Fisher had more time, perhaps this would have been the fate of acid communism too, attempting to imagine new ways of achieving acidic or post-capitalist realist thought. Instead, acid communism leaves us with a simple message. The future has been cancelled because we are unable to imagine anything other than the present. To invent the future, to escape our myopia, we have to go beyond the present bounds of our imagination. This is acid communism (source).

As we'll see, such an idea isn't restricted to drugs-in-abstract, though!

For example, not only were they a Marxist-Leninist, but Cuwu actually studied weed's neoliberal recultivation; i.e., from an outlawed substance used to demonize minorities to a monocrop directed at white-owned businesses. According to Cuwu, the monopoly did little to change the persecution of black and brown people; i.e., for having these drugs in states where the practice hasn't been legalized. Instead, the legalization is designed to privatize and gentrify the drug's production within white systems of power—in effect, taking weed away from poor black and brown communities; i.e., as one of the few non-violent ways of making money to enrich white business owners and corporations without condemning the War on Drugs for the abusive Crusades happening against minorities as usual.

By that same logic, drug use must be decriminalized in a literal and figurative sense, including monsters of nature (and by extension, all monsters) as a powerful means of educating children (the future generation) not to exploit each other and the world around them for profit; i.e., monsters becoming rebellious stewards of nature that adults follow back into childhood's sex, drugs and rock 'n roll: as counterculture-with-a-face (or bunny ears). Except "counterculture," like the human body and its history of psychosexual expression vis-à-vis nature, becomes something to dive into. Meanwhile, some are more famous than others, guiding our way through past history as possible differently in the future to achieve similar countercultural goals that are more inclusive and sex-positive than past versions!

This brings us to Jim Morrison, who frankly was a bit of a misogynistic dick; i.e., aping Percy Shelley's common-law treatment of Mary Wollstonecraft junior but also Rimbaud's privileged "derangement of the senses" to posture at rebellion by dying for one's art until they either cried "Uncle!" or actually dropped dead: Rimbaud sold out/got wise and Morrison bought the farm in a Parisian bathtub (from a heroin overdose, if memory serves). Beatniks and peaceniks haunted by liberal concessions and betrayals behind the rebellious façade, pacification is pacification (no one likes a hypocrite poser except other hypocrite posers refusing to stay sober). C'est la vie!

Other drugs, like LSD, were originally weaponized (from naturally-occurring mescaline) by the CIA; i.e., to interrogate suspects by making them more suggestible and compliant.

Conversely, these drugs were linked not just to 1960s counterculture (and its white, privileged irresponsibilities, above), but older modes of seeing the world before Red Scare dominated the scene; e.g., Jim Morrison's The Doors being a nod to Aldous Huxley's 1954, The Doors of Perception, whose documentation of mescaline work is eponymously linked to William Blake's "doors of perception"; i.e., Blake's pointed concern with "corroding fires" being the literal acids he used to make his infamous printing plates to defend the Devil as a mind-opening force; re: The Marriage of Heaven and Hell. Depending on their usage during oppositional praxis, psychoactive drugs (or drug-like media that induce similar effects or appeals) can open or close the mind during Capitalist Realism as something to encourage or defeat (with rabbits to chase, versus dragons)!

This being said, drug misuse can happen on either side of that equation. As a Byronic, misogynistic sage touched swiftly with rockstar success and meteoric plummeting⁴⁸⁰ just as fast, Morrison's crooning "I am the Lizard King, I can do ⁴⁸⁰ I.e., similar to Lord Byron's 1819 "Don Juan" antihero, penned by a rags-to-riches rockstar through a "mad, bad, and dangerous to know" persona: "I want a hero." Fun fact: The former phrase comes from Lady Caroline Lamb—a woman who, according to Miriam Lang, far outpaced Byron's excesses with her own whorish shenanigans drinking and fucking Byron under the table:

The statement that Byron was "mad, bad and dangerous to know" comes from Lady Caroline Lamb after their first meeting, when the publication of "Childe Harold" (1812) made him the literary and social lion of London at the age of 24. However, Lady Caroline was notoriously worse than he on all three counts, and when she threw herself at Byron, her irrationality and sexual excesses so appalled him that he terminated the affair after about six months. Later, her vengeance fueled the scandal that forced him to leave England.

Undeniably, Byron held most women in low esteem, but in the Regency period, it was the profligate Prince Regent who set the example society followed. Furthermore, Byron's sexual attitudes and behavior were conditioned by early experiences: a dissolute father, who deserted wife and young child; a violent-tempered mother; a sexually abusive nursemaid and homosexual attachment to a college classmate; the agony and sense of inferiority over his crippled leg, and the spell his extraordinary good looks cast over women.

None of this justifies Byron's promiscuity or makes him more acceptable by modern women's standards. It was his one sincere attachment (1813-16), to his half-sister, Augusta Leigh, that led to his downfall in London society. That dangerous liaison, confirmed by Leslie Marchand's biography, destroyed Byron's brief marriage (1815-16) to Annabella Milbanke. While incest was not illegal in England, it was considered beyond the pale even in that licentious era. Thus, when rumors surfaced, Byron found himself ostracized (source: "How Lord Byron Became Mad, Bad and Dangerous to Know," 1989).

anything!" from "Not to Touch the Earth" (1968) highlighted a tragic shortening of his own life as self-prophesized: "No one gets out of here alive." More to the point, he accomplished this dark maxim in pursuit of forbidden truth and new, undiscovered senses/synesthesia-esque sensations through heavy drug use (not entirely unlike Rimbaud, except Rimbaud died a capitalist after quitting drugs); i.e., a dysfunctional misfit whose bucolic, fatal excess led to his own premature demise.

As such, the cliché of the artist suffering for his craft "to break on through" administers a cold hard truth: of vino veritas heralding Paracelsus' adage, "All things are poison and nothing is without poison; only the dose makes a thing not a poison" (and context; re: Pinsky). Figurative and/or literal, drugs can be imbibed/expressed as a matter of degree (famously seen through functioning/non-functioning alcoholics like T.S. Eliot and Ernest Hemmingway abusing alcohol to get at the truth, but also to cope with reality as insufferably laden with madness and death—an addictive, Dionysian tradition that damaged them as much as it did Phil Lynott insisting "I Got to Give It Up" in 1979, while slowly drinking himself to death). To this, even Coleridge took just enough laudanum to open his mind, but survived to close it again and badger Matthew Lewis for writing The Monk. His work (according to Coleridge) was too close to death and the chaos of a queer existence that the older man desperately wanted to abolish once sober. You don't need drugs to write in a drug-like way/speak to a desire for liberation that manifests differently per oppressed and privileged groups; without drugs, Coleridge became a cop.

The fact remains, Matthew Lewis didn't have a reputation for doing hard drugs (as far as I can tell, anyways), yet features a drug-like character whose particular Gothic imagination was one many in public life detested! Beyond Coleridge, many saw Matilda and Lewis as a profane embarrassment, with Coleridge impeaching Lewis every chance he got. Yet, Lewis was arguably as sober as Coleridge was, albeit for far longer! Lewis didn't do drugs; he merely lacked the inhibitions to silence his dreams from moment to waking moment (my own dedication for Volume Zero reading: "I swear I wrote this book sober!" despite me rarely doing drugs myself. Simply put, I didn't need to).

(exhibit 60c: Artist: Unlovely Frankenstein. Mary Shelley's mother, Mary Wollstonecraft senior, wrote arguably the first modern feminist text in Great Britain, A Vindication of the Rights of Women [1792].

Shelley herself went onto write Frankenstein, which—as we've discussed in "Making Demons"—had a very anti-capitalist flavor amid its hauntological mix of Gothic horror, Byronic anti-heroics, framed perspectives and dark vengeful spectres.)

I'm emphasizing "drug use" in quotes here because the "usage" is at times symbolic, paratextual and/or literal; i.e., any of these methods working as a complicated means of rebellious poetic expression that dates back to at least the 1700s (in relation to the Enlightenment, anyways). Back then, it was ridiculed during the rising of genderqueer identities, only to continue on a pro-capitalist trend through the likes of privileged, megachurch grifter-televangelists like Pat Robertson (who only just died today as of me writing this; mark the date: 6/8/2023; Rebecca Watson, 2023). Of Robertson, Unlovely Frankenstein writes,

Pat Robertson said feminism "is about a socialist, anti-family political movement that encourages women to leave their husbands, kill their children, practice witchcraft, destroy capitalism and become lesbians." Sure, it sounds profoundly stupid, but it doesn't even rank on the 10 stupidest things Pat Robertson has ever said (source, 2023).

Clearly acid Communism's drug-like expansion into new states of existence lies at the heart of Gothic critiques of capital and its violation of human rights; i.e., by the usual suspects during various Wars of Drugs pimping the egregore (white rabbit or not): white, cis-het, Christian men/token forces (whose own Protestant ethic under Capitalism—especially neoliberal Capitalism—we'll continue to unpack in Volume Three when excoriating the Man Box). We must chase the Black Rabbit down; i.e., to get a quote for prosperity by turning into the Black Rabbit, ourselves (who still wants hugs during the dialectic of the alien: a mating porcupine).

From the Shelley clan's precocious and anti-capitalist fictions—to Rimbaud's subsequent "derangement" during the first Gilded Age versus Morrison's '70s-era debauchery leading up to the Second/second wave feminism well into Internet-era reclamations of contested monsters—the Gothic organ of queer liberation under Capitalism speaks to the figurative eyeballs of perceptive pastiche (versus Jameson's statue with blind eyeballs attacking Gothic vision); i.e., as "drug-addled" without abusing said drugs (thus the rabbit) like these older magicians did.

These, in turn, are commonly embodied by a host of resources who creatively offer up new ways of understanding ourselves and the material world; i.e., through the Gothic imagination's circular proximity with death and chaos as thoroughly codified in drug-like darkness. Doing so through their own modular and unreliable spyglasses into the past, older Gothic rebels equaled murky expressions of the self as plastic and malleable (the slow, incremental metamorphosis for many trans people being a kind of "creeping"; i.e., to avoid detection from those in power as immortal predators you don't run from, especially if they have you surrounded; re: the harpy Celano from The Last Unicorn).

For example, sense and sensibility is, itself, an old idea. Through Gothic poetics, it merges through one's nebulous sexual desires, class liberation fantasies and gender fluidity—not simply an abject bodily metaphor or criminal "branding" of so-called degenerates, but a sensitive rebellious mode of shapeshifting existence; re: the Romantics—but especially the young ones, per Nafi—generally thinking of Satan as a rebel figure; i.e., pointedly described by Milton as turning into different forms that were decidedly un-angelic (a toad, a snake—both stigma animals—but also other, more inchoate forms). Why not a rabbit, too?

Collected and (re)assembled into a dark, dreamy composite, then pulled back and viewed from a distance, these demons form a pattern on the surface of collages like those scattered through this series: transforming ontological freedom using language reclaimed from heteronormative societal constraints that really warp your brain (re: exhibit 60c; also, Pillow Pants from Clerks 2). Ignoring Robertson's own malicious dogma as a theocratically fascist means of expanding on his already-vast fortunes, the sad fact remains that most straight folk (closeted or not) think openly GNC people are abject aliens to some degree (only having seen "representations" of them in horror movies); i.e., nature as something to steal from while riding out Medusa's wrath (re: state shift). But these same transphobic persons also have very weird phobias tied to the penis, anus and pussy (whose constant mislabeling as "vagina" denotes a place to put the man's penis for reproductive purposes while ignoring the clitoris to mythical extremes).

From a canonical standpoint under Capitalist Realism, men see women/the monstrous-feminine and "junk" as sites of alien violence, rape and hysteria⁴⁸¹: "Abandon all hope, all ye who enter here," "work will see you free!" (camping Dante and Auschwitz through our own skull-and-crossbones pirate pussies, below); i.e., death sex during ludo-Gothic BDSM!

(artist: My Pet Monster Girl)

Concerning canon, it's like asking a small, ignorant child to describe childbirth and having them gleefully tell you that women shit the baby out. And you say we're on drugs! Also, you're missing out, because dicks and anal are awesome if you can manage it (and if your partner is too "girthy" to enter you, then sex toys can reclaim the anus for everyone's pleasure. Follow that rabbit).

Furthermore, these fears are very old, stemming from the earliest proponents of Western Civilization's patriarchal phobias, the latter concerning the hysteria of a so-called wandering womb; re: the Archaic Mother as ancient and female, but categorized by Freud, Jung and other 20th century men (and their survivors) extending to nature as monstrous-feminine whore, period. And yet, the extreme phobias on display through these Pygmalion dweebs likewise denote their own drug-like ways of the viewing the world (e.g., Freud loved cocaine). This myopia must be reclaimed through the Archaic Mother/phallic woman as whore; i.e., as a mode of trans, intersex and enby rebellion through Galatea-esque monsters like the xenomorph, Sailor Scout or unicorn as valorized by queer culture as queen-like; re: the Numinous spirit of vengeance that ties to a lot of different oppressed cultures. The black rabbit comes back, out of the past retro-future!

The Return of the Black Rabbit (feat. Giger, Metroid, Medusa, Giygas)

A classic Gothic story eludes to the infernal concentric pattern/Promethean Quest's closed space (or Faustian bargain summoning the black penitent/profligate alien whore): a concentric, recursive, liminal, anisotropic, ergodic time-space aiding in generational rememory and reclamation/regeneration. The conquering princess, after returning home, realizes the black bun has followed them back to Paradise; i.e., showcasing said place as never perfect in ways we can reclaim by pushing towards post-scarcity as the Gothic does—imperfectly while inside the labyrinth and its exploitative shadow zones (which house Nazis and Commies in duality)! A bunny shade can spell doom but also great radical change/endsless possibility while freeing versus policing the whore (re: the Radiance, who we won't inspect here because we already have; re: "Policing the Whore")!

As such, I'd like to close this chapter by examining how that is; i.e., by considering a radical desire to transform not just to escape our enemies, but terrify them through Gothic-Communist counterterror as a form of radical empathy acknowledging the valid (and furious) emotions of abused cultures (essentially a dark version of LSD drug therapies); re: by returning to the fatal nostalgia of Giger, Metroid, Medusa, and Giygas, but also Scott's Covenant as adults ourselves having a Second prodigal Coming/childhood and puberty as genderqueer detectives do: chasing an ouroborotic bunny round and round the chronotope run of Capitalist Realism during acid Communism's live burial empathizing with said predicament to benefit labor and nature (versus Pygmalion like Morrison, or subjugated Galatea/gargoyle cops like Autumn Ivy, below).

The xenomorph is a nebulous inkblot, insofar as its avenger "walking castle" is occupied by a legion of older dead it demonically voices during castle-narrative; i.e., the wail of the damned, mid-dungeon. The interplay can be sexual, but the vein is classically ace.

The imperial refrain under capital sees GNC persons routinely treated as monstrous-feminine, thus gays to bury while framed as corrupt or degenerate, concentric/tangled scapegoats; i.e., Nazi-Communists with flavors of other bigotries and xenophobia mixed into the Gothic mode's Red Scare soup: anti-Catholicism, anti-Semitism, Orientalism, witch hunts, blood libel, sodomy rhetoric and various other compound/chimeric moral panics. Said dungeon has become crowded not just with vampires, witches and goblins, then, but Communist ones linked directly to criminalized drug use bad "rabbit" sex [which until the 20th century wasn't really criminalized, at all; re: Foucault, but also the War on Drugs being an American phenomenon meant to crystalize and prolong Capitalist Realism].)

Concentric stigma is something to be mindful of in Gothic fiction. The xenomorph is a classic "phallic woman" inside the womb space, but also a member of the forces of darkness, hence a black knight corruptor and cosmic rabbit rapist (re: Jennifer Shiman's "Alien in 30 Seconds"); i.e., as curiously pre-fascist and Communist/queer until proven otherwise (and dissected by the female detective as often as the male one). In posthuman stories like Alien, the Medusa is generally respected by the android servants as the ultimate, "pure" form of queer existence; re: it is bio-mechanical, but also intersex, defined by something men do not have: eggs, but also female genitals with a masculine quality to them as something to imagine through a genderqueer imagination; i.e., reclaiming wandering womb (or bicycle face) from ancient misunderstandings about sex (with our species or other animals) but also drugs and biology warped under more recent hauntologies bastardizing the fact that animals don't understand consent (That's Why's "Wild Rabbit makes love with my Giant Blue Rabbit," 2012): to accuse chattelized people.

The ethnocentric chain of carnage lends an artificial wilderness that—much like the golem or gargoyle—mixes technology with parasitoidism and lots of implied unsafe drugs and sex; i.e., the Gothic's tendency to speak to excessive force, psychosexual angst, and imminent penetration by showing you what's gonna go in what: "That's not a knife; this is a knife [next page]!" The black knightly mercenary's harpoon conveys vaso vagal danger to swoon at, which is instantly if subtly offset with play as a matter of waiting inside the graveyard for the "rape" to happen; i.e., invaded by wild, Pagan forces corrupting the scared and the sacred with insect jousting and implied traumatic penetration; re: not just the whore, but ancient alien whore having her revenge by saying to her enemies, "Mine's bigger!" Dick measuring is something women can do, too, because it concerns emotions like pride and social rituals with a funerary psychosexual element that can "go to war" like anything else. Intimidation is often the goal, but also satisfaction and excitement: "Take me down to the Paradise city!" (Guns 'n Roses, 1989).

Some rabbits have bigger wands with weapon-like qualities! In nature, this ovipositor is a common feature among female-dominated, eusocial insects; Gothic canon famously attaches the "female penis" to the Archaic Mother archetype, forcing GNC people to live in the shadow of the state's crusade against it. To be different is to live in fear because those around you want you dead, including members of your own family but also so-called "defenders" of the community you call home; i.e., the police. But improvised weapons—and symbiosis, the wasp eating the caterpillar to weaponize said grub against the state, thus protect smaller more vulnerable animals we caretake—work with stolen ordinance, too; it's all about letting everyone play with such toys (e.g., Arnold's M-79 grenade launcher from T2 versus Snoop's dildo also being a terror weapon; re: as Asprey's kissing cousin of force); i.e., to say one-and-all that we're not just cookies in a jar to take from when Elon Musk gets peckish. "Peck this, fucker!"

(artist: Snoop)

To it, Archaic Mothers are ancient, anthropomorphic, phallic intersex demons that live inside deep, dark places—specifically womb-like lairs/parallel space. Here, they canonically pervert the heteronormative reproductive order by offering up monstrous-feminine forms of sexual reproduction; i.e., contained in monomyth spaces modeled externally after the sexually-dimorphic activities occurring within. Whereas the Skeleton King is found in his tomb, the dark queen is found inside her deathly womb's mise-en-abyme. The classic example is Medusa, equipped with penis-like genitals and living in the darkness of the sea (which is generally regarded as the "cradle of the world" in many pre-Western mythologies, often serving as the birthplace of monsters). Other more recent examples include the "vaginal," bio-mechanical "external wombs" of the alien queen from Aliens or Mother Brain from Metroid as potential friends on either side of an animalistic exchange (the black rabbits of a vengeful return to Wonderland)!

In "War Vaginas," for example, I note the Archaic Mothers' function through Mother Brain as a colonial foil meant to scare token women into sexist, transphobic violence; i.e., an abject catalyst to repress activist sentiments and rebellion:

Mother Brain, meanwhile, isn't just Samus' ancient foil; she's arguably the Patriarchy's boogeyman [...] To face such a goddess amounts to a return, a completion of the cycle: birth, death, consumption. Animals eat their babies. For them, the mouth is a symbol of consumption, but also danger (teeth bite). The vagina symbolizes birth; for a mother goddess who births and eats disposable babies, bodily openings symbolically conflate. The vagina becomes a site of trauma attached to childbirth and... food. If Samus doesn't fight back, Mother Brain's giant mouth will literally gobble her up. She's not Samus' biological mother, she's an impostor, but the feeling of cannibalistic infanticide cannot be totally ignored (source).

Despite being presented as the wronged party whose anger legitimately stems from colonial oppression, the Dark Mother and her children are famously hunted and killed by traditional applications of phallic violence; i.e., in modern, neoconservative stories with classical standards to install and offend during reactive abuse kettling nature the whore as monstrous-feminine; re: Doom and Contra being linked to real-world violence through the state (echoing Vietnam and Operation Condor) but also Metroid and its violent, female hero as raping the ancient womb with phallic violence (which, again, stems from Aliens, Starship Troopers, and older forms of Amazonomachia/Cartesian persecutions of nature as monstrous-feminine). It's American exceptionalism; re: dressing up the Greater Evil as an Americanized avatar for children to fight the "good war" against, but one that speaks poetically to older forms of drug use that have become hauntologically white and straight (thus fascist). Like our smaller furry friends (e.g., Cookie the Calico's "If not friend, why friend-shaped?" 2025), we're all divided and scared; i.e., can feel things out when asking for food, hugs, sex and anything else! "Gimme shelter!"

"No one gives it to you; you have to take it." Except beware any "historian" conflating the modern and ancient worlds, which they do through willful ignorance tied to state abuse of the usual tools and devices. Furthermore, the neoconservative revenge fantasy is always rapacious—a punitive, bloodthirsty invasion of the Womb whose subsequent "fucking" happens with stolen ordinance, taken away from rebels to restore state hegemony in the region; i.e., by raping the Dark Queen, but not before destroying her "illegitimate" bloodline with a subjugated Amazon, thus ensuring the legitimacy of an equally false replacement.

Not only is this colonial apologia; the very act is reactionary towards patriarchal fears of abject female/feminine regression—i.e., the woman seeing herself as demonized, her monstrous-feminine double's unwelcome presence on the Aegis reverting the colonized space less towards a natural state and more into an unnatural condition of abject reproduction: a bio-mechanical womb. Inside said unheimlich, the queer bugbear is a Venus-twin Dark Medusa whose queenly ovipositor breeds with the colonists against their will, turning them into drone-like monsters that blindly spread the disease of their demon lover (the 20th century pitting a made-up, Red Scare/Satanic Panic "disease" against the state's regular enemies in neoliberal canon: Communism. Except the plurality of the creature suggests a number of otherworldly voices speaking through the Dark Mother as a kind of clairvoyant channeler of undead/demonic animal tongues; re: xenoglossia).

The paradox remains the xenomorph's andro/gynodiverse, "hermaphroditic" qualities often being "chased" like rabbit by sexist cis-het men and women; i.e., viewed by them with utter fascination and lust (a concept we'll unpack more in Volume Three, Chapter Three); re: Ripley as the state's subjugated Hippolyta, chasing the queer presence back to the ends of the Earth because it imperfectly resembles her trauma. The ensuing catfight is orchestrated by the Patriarchy to recruit TERFs into an imagined vital conflict between us-versus-them; i.e., token "good" Amazons and female rage versus dark, alien forms that must be destroyed.

Ripley-as-Rambo has no empathy and is sober as a priest (or nun, whatever); she gets her high/sees "God" during Crusader-style purges that restore her faith through unironic slaughter. The call of the void is what she lives for—to pluck the lowest-hanging fruit, killing rabbits!

(model and artist: Itzel Sparrow and Persephone van der Waard)

For trans, non-binary and intersex people, though, the plight of the Alien Queen murdered by the state's girl boss is merely us existing as we always have: a ground state, but also a "womb state" that's evolved out of our childhoods into our adult selves as "standing out" in cis-het society (as Itzel does, having an ass of the gods, above). Viewed through the TERF eyes of the state's surveilling vigilante/travelling panopticon, the xenomorph—as a creative spectre of Marx and resident black rabbit—must die; i.e., at its posthuman heart, the xenomorph rejects empire and heteronormativity through a liminal, bio-mechanical return to nature through linguo-material, drug-like means: the Shadow of Galatea having a dark, non-white function regardless of sex, gender or ethnicity insofar as the Archaic Mother/alien nature evolved from the early city-states into Rome and hauntologically beyond; e.g., Medusa with curly hair expanding symbolically to include different functionally non-white groups (e.g., Irish women/PoC)!

That's what trans, non-binary and intersex people represent: delineations from colonial-binarized standards within biology and language as creative towards non-heteronormative ends. We fully recognize that we're "other" relative to heteronormative models' intersecting persecution dialectics of the alien; we just don't want to be killed for it, which requires changing the system from toe to top full of apathy being swapped out for our aforementioned dark empathy instead!

Magritte keeps the tension held within the image [...] in perpetual and unresolved antagonism. It was Magritte's genius to construct images that are awkwardly resilient to straightforward resolution, and he famously hated having his paintings psychoanalyzed or scoured for deeper meaning [source: "Why Magritte was like a standup comedian," 2015].

Rabbit skins come in all kinds. Thoroughly xenophilic, the idea of "living latex" comments on the medieval idea of the animate/inanimate to convey the elusively mysterious sense of the human within the inhuman [or vice versa] as ontologically undead/demonic, thus surreal e.g., Giger's xenomorph, [Donnie Darko or Coleridge's "Kubla Khan"]. In other words, reality is dehumanizing/xenophobic. And yet, inside this larger process, a humanely dehumanized inhuman side lurks that co-exists with its opposite: as liminal/uncanny on a surface level! Like Segewick's analysis of the Gothic in "Imagery of the Surface" as favoring the surface level over perceived "deeper truths," living latex becomes a persona of various virtues or vices, but also a relinquishing of self-consciousness inside an alter-ego [a popular superhero trope with revolutionary potential, if not actual activists; e.g., Peter Parker or Clark Kent as moderate, outdated caricatures of American journalism passed off as legitimate criticality].

As a kind of suit of armor that shields one from the outside world, this occurs by dampening external forces figuratively and literally. It's a blinder designed as much for xenophilic comfort and calm as it is xenophobic discomfort and anxiety [though both poles can be executed to whatever degrees all parties decide]: fear can be performed, its impulses resisted through discipline exercises that invariably require energy and effort from both parties during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Such a topic is incredibly synchronistic, spanning many different mediums that remain peripherally aware of one another—having been discussed, for instance, with equal parts fascination, reverence, curiosity and disgust in metal and horror for decades: thriving in the late '70s countercultural whiplash to the emergence of neoliberalism; e.g., Judas Priest's 1978 Stained Class and 1979 Hell Bent for Leather solidifying NWOBHM as infused with death and leather daddy biker culture!

In BDSM at large, though, the latex suit enforces a dehumanized, uncanny appearance, which the wearer can don but also perform inside to stress certain aspects of restraint, control, obedience and discipline. Furthermore, their suit can modify to include monstrous components [such as horns] but also a complete lack of identifying facial features to assume an uncanny doll-like affect. But within this, the human side can shine through something that serves to buffer the wearer for a body-language-and-leather-aesthetics-heavy performance; i.e., as forceful, transgressive commentary on daily life's "smothering" qualities. Conversely, when the suit is removed, the human underneath can exhibit modifications, too; e.g., tattoos [exhibit 45c2a] but also gender-affirming surgeries. Such persons embody the things that heteronormative persons would outright reject and attack: queerness and BDSM as sinful and vice-driven, but also chaotic—a threat to order.)

"Its structural perfection is matched only by its hostility." / "They must have wanted it for the weapon's division." A logical outcome of corporate weaponization, nature's black-mirror formlessness mirrors in the xenomorph, but also shoggoth from At the Mountains of Madness or the T-1000 from T2 (all stemming from Frankenstein). While Scott originally envisioned the derelict ship as a "bomber" filled with advanced tools of warfare in space, his treatment of the xenomorph is progressively anti-capitalist/anti-patriarchal thus Galatean; re: David made it to spread and overwhelm the West from the outside-in; re: it's literally the Imperial Boomerang: a reverse prescription and at-times surreal desecration of the usual Western values hauntologized from city-states into nation-states and corporations acting like the heroes of old; i.e., cowardly and unfairly towards nature as alien invader against bourgeois claims (re: the hero, Perseus, raped and murdered Medusa in her sleep by having had Athena's help to overcome the Gorgon's rape victim Aegis with the state's: anti-predation maneuvers on both sides).

That's what the "Goths" hauntologically were (re: Baldrick) and what Giger's own drug-addled, BDSM-tinged Numinous sought to recapture while camping neoclassical canon: to show a dark and absurd side of nature that exists, hence invades the canonical imaginary in spite of the West and its self-lionization in an architectural-morphological imagination's cryptomimetic mise-en-abyme: Picasso burning the psychosexual "bunny's" portrait!

In short, the xenomorph is a black whore violating hauntology's white supremacy arguments; re: those of the Cartesian revolution built on older patriarchies essentializing rape as justified. A byproduct of iconoclastic mad science turning nature into a weapon against the status quo, the xenomorph survives as pure, furious creation that spites David's own creators as false gods. It's not just a survivor of rape, but a death-god Galatea whose life after death makes the likes of the magically beheaded Ash pale in comparison; i.e., an ability to transform, but also escape through forbidden forms of extraterrestrial love liberating sex work on the Aegis! She hijacks the ship through mutinous subversion of its deepest circuitry (the brain)!

Meanwhile, the Oedipal nature of the language being used is figurative (unlike Hitchcock's Norman Bates, which is spelled out literally); the phallic or vagina' rabbit doesn't have fixed, Cartesian prescriptions attached to it, but occupy uncertain positions outside orderly existence haunting its frontier models. Indeed, through the psychological model of one's return to the Dark Mother and her "womb," Alien's birth trauma can have much more of an Otto Rank interpretation than a Freudian one: a desire to end postnatal trauma by returning to the darkness and security of the womb, versus focusing on the brutality of exiting it. And upon gaining entry once more, to sleep perchance to dream! Time for nap-nap!

Moreover, the overt, death-infused sexuality in Alien has a 1970s BDSM flavor—one fixating on ambiguous consent and a "stricter" form of power-exchange that borders on corporal punishment. As something for the company to weaponize, the shapeless xenomorph is basically an "object, latex gimp suit" (exhibit 60e1) with bones for laces and a "stabby cock dagger" for traumatic insemination, but also works as a handy metaphor for colonial trauma: hate-fucking your oppressors; i.e., the rape fantasy of the slave overpowering the master as messily intertwined with domination/submission fantasies of white women towards their servants, before and during Said's Culture and Imperialism onwards; re: navigating double standards and rockstar power imbalances through holistic rebellion: a place to allow for half-real curiosities to commission ways to close the gap in the future of a past moment for all peoples and places dodging the "27 Club"; e.g., my mom asking me to draw her younger self with Jimi Hendrix and Jim Morrison, along with a variety of other commissions she happily paid me: a hybrid of The Magician's Nephew with Warhammer's Britannica where my mom-as-Jadis' good-witchy double (reclaiming C.S. Lewis' ace, schoolboy BDSM) cheerfully saves her now-deceased boyfriend from a black knight, Star Wars and my newly-wed in-laws, and my then-newly-born in-law as Spider-baby!

The whole spiel is revolutionary wish-fulfillment—a cryptonymic "safe space" for the oppressed to voice their legitimate, social-sexual anger against state oppression and xenophobia with uncivil ludo-Gothic BDSM's fantasy love language. As an ontological statement reclaimed for and by queer people, the xenomorph was always going to be challenged, but also co-opted and turned against them (which, as we shall see in Volume Three, becomes part of the exhibit). All the while, the psychosexual sentiment of the monster elides colonial violence and Pagan eroticism with legitimate, rising forms of postcolonial discourse that rose to the fore with the emergence of neoliberal Capitalism. Unlike Norman Bates, the xenomorph wasn't designed exclusively to demonize queer people any more than other black rabbits were on the Aegis; the palimpsest was a centuries-long lineage of postcolonial media with a Satanic protagonist rebelling against the status quo. 1979 was the year Margaret Thatcher—the world's first elected neoliberal in the Global North, before Reagan—first assumed power.

To this, the monster's patent inability to separate pleasure from pain denotes a queer escape from the closet that threatened to swallow them whole—one whose exposed "newness" allotted fresh voices the opportunity to complicate the Gothic Romance with Freudian clichés drenched in Neo-Gothic nostalgia. The paradox of xenophilia is that sexuality and trauma go hand-in-hand, queer people forced into the fearsome shadows (with authors like Dennis Cooper eventually commenting on queer expression as historically-materially looped, arm-in-arm, with the compelled rape of queer persons; e.g., his favorite commentary [and Zeuhl's] being on twinks during a "trap/bait" arrangement, sex in bathrooms, and rape performance art).

But their morphologically diffuse language was overtly sexualized and gender-nonconformist, operating in ways typical of the aforementioned rising discourse; i.e., new forms of social-sexual identity attached to ritualized trauma as intensely cathartic for the oppressed, but also morphologically complex in a medievalized counterattack: the miraculous survival of queer rememory within the disassembled flesh and materials—of an unnatural newborn, one whose curse of oppression awakens the enslaved robotics centuries later during the twilight era of genocide. Doing so to advance mutely and furiously towards its de facto conquerors, the American middle class, the rabbit eats Saturn (this variant of the killer baby being different than Giygas, the "mighty idiot" conquer-baby-god from Mother 2/Earthbound, below, or Homelander from The Boys [who we'll examine in Volume Three, Chapter Five] because the "killer child" archetype represents the oppressed as an infantilized tool or byproduct of oppression as a structure):

(*exhibit 60e2: Artist, top-left: Jared Thompson; top-right: Porto881; bottom: anonymous, source. Giygas ["GEE-gis"] represents a kind of astral traveler that returns to conquer Earth; i.e., the plot to Prometheus but also its forbears: Satan's coming home to undermine God's paradise, or the Enlightenment's "progress," after waking from a long sleep of death. In doing so, Giygas is effectively dead when traveling through space, awakening in an ancient "Cave of the Past" womb, and where he is confronted by the heroes of the game and "aborted"; i.e., a neonatal, xenophobic confrontation on par with what Ashley Gavin calls "inside baby/outside baby" according to the argument if something is alive or dead from conservative minds [source: "Ashley Gavin: Live in Chicago," 2023].*

Indeed, "inside" in Gothic stories refers to the idea of inherence fantasy as womblike but also funeral, chaotic and undead; a cryptonymic inversion of the topography of inside/outside as burdened/initiated by colonial trauma [re: Abraham and Torok]. Clearly the myriad theories of this procedure's literal or figurative nature remain open to debate [source: Reddit] and by persons like Grier from Super Famicom BS-X who default to "high-school level" Freudian tropes in the self-confessed absence of "Gothic expertise" [source: "Grasping the true form of Giygas' attack," 2009]. Instead of merely guessing at the inkblot using silly psychoanalytical models and moving endlessly in circles, it's more productive—as an expert of the Humanities, Marxism and the Gothic—to interpret the nebulous, cartoonishly Freudian imagery in relation to what the Earth historically-materially represents and why a perceived alien force might wish to conquer it; i.e., from a dialectical-material standpoint, what does the traveling violence between competing material forces expressed in demonic pastiche actually signify?

*The short answer is, labor as something that becomes wild, but also assimilated by fascist DARVO obscurantism through technological singularities maintaining Capitalist Realism [from Mary Shelley, onwards]. The time-traveling abortion—to kill one's enemy before they're even conceived—is a science fiction staple that dates back to Frankenstein [which Cameron took quite literally in The Terminator with his "retroactive abortion" line]. In Earthbound the act "nips" Communism "in the bud," stopping the spread of dissident information that, when silenced, allows the status quo to miraculously remain intact. The bringers of this calamity are effectively weaponized children of a Radcliffean paradigm punching the Black Veil; i.e., their bodies turned to metal while they use the "power of friendship" as a* personal responsibility deus ex machina to "save the world": preserving the established order from a pareidolic lunar rabbit menace, except the ink is menstrual blood [or some such Freudian, body fluid paint-by-numbers].

*Also, for what it's worth: the presence of a numen or divinity is described through ghost stories as "abortive offshoots of the Numinous," by Rudolph Otto. In that sense, Gyggas is our "spectre of Marx" that implies an unimaginable greatness beyond Capitalism's myopia during a ghost story that conveys doom with literal symbolism—its own elaborate strategy of misdirection in the neoliberal era, which is the only one that commercialized videogames have ever known according to Ahoy's 2020 "The First Videogame," [the earliest examples of "videogame" happened in 1973 during the same year as the Oil Crisis of the Arab-Israeli war—a conflict that would help the elite secure a steady shift away from Bretton Woods and the Embedded Liberalism approach of post-WW2; i.e., in favor of neoliberal Capitalism's return to market deregulation through state power. For a lengthy analysis of this topic, consider Bad Empanada's lengthy and scathing response to neoliberal propagandist and shill for the World Economic Forum, Johnny Harris].)*

In Alien, xenophobia and xenophilia are not discreet, inhabiting a single demon lover's surreal physique/district nine (echoes not just of Donnie Darko evil rabbit but the zombies-vampires from Plan Nine from Outer Space). There, the beautiful pain, confusion and—at times—violent, tremendously orgasmic/vaso vagal exertion of ambrosial renaissance goes beyond the chief monster. For example, the "milk" in Ash's veins (below) is semen-like in a humors-esque degree, personifying his rapist-servant energies to track very much with Giger's trippy portfolio eroticism; i.e., in the Gothic surrealist approach to things (the "walking penis" trope being a kind of gross, but also dated, hallucinatory pun: Macbeth's fatal vision).

Yet, in pure BDSM terms, the phobic-philic power exchange favors the "mommy dom" as "strict"; i.e., her secret admirer, Ash, would happily submit to her paralyzing authority despite how she could and probably would bite his head off/fuck his literal guts out (exhibit 60e3). This treatment—of overblown, homicidal threats of violence against the willing servant—is very much part of the '70s death fantasy that permeated the BDSM theatre of those times. However, Alien also comments phantasmagorically on buried colonial trauma as something whose raw, angry sexuality and gender trouble would be automatically abjected by the usual benefactors of colonialism chasing rabbits (sure enough, the fantasy would be met with lethal force in the mid-'80s during Cameron's lionization of neoliberal hegemony worldwide).

(exhibit 60e3: A disembodied "O face" that takes advantage of the techno-occult wonders of Gothic pastiche: an out-of-body orgasm tied to a fearsome past. This can be through sodomy as something to invoke; i.e., unproductive or non-legitimate sex, but also asexual expression that plays with traditionally sexualized language and gender to achieve genderqueer results: gender parody and trouble. Simply put, it's fun and therapeutic, a kind of castration "stress art" for relating to others asexually through sexual language, humor and playful, even transgressive xenophilic degradation/vengeance [a concept we've already examined with Blxxd Bunny in a previous chapter but will return to more extensively in Volume Three]. Cock shaming is a thing [I love it]!)

The ludo-Gothic rememory in this case is Scott's BDSM reversal of the process of abjection: through his own, iconoclastic ghost of the counterfeit. It's less that people "forget" that Percy Shelley loved Milton's Satan as a rebel, for instance, and more that those who know died and the lesson wasn't passed on/was repressed by those in power. So when Scott fully banked on Giger's Gothic surrealism, those who know knew and those who didn't saw the usual xenophobic threats of rape aimed at white women by dark forces; re: the usual counterterror cryptonymy saying to said women, "Join us!" as much as actually intended physical harm!

Beyond the '70s inkblot, Scott would quote Percy Shelley in Covenant and Prometheus, which again were basically xenophilic love letters to Frankenstein as itself serving up a 19-year-old wunderkind's love letter to Milton's Paradise Lost; i.e., in a revolutionary vein whose counterterror path laid out Gothic reinvention that can never be stopped. These days, the usual criticisms to said imagination spell out in lateral terms. For every queer nerd reveling in Scott's quirky Gothicism, you have ten weird Aliens nerds loudly clamoring for more guns and dead Commies; bourgeois servitude is their canon/praxis. Much to their chagrin and confusion, Scott would press on, making the city-bombing terrorist/vengeful queer robot the Hannibal Satanic hero of his latter-day apocalypse movies (exhibit 60e3)!

As something to reclaim, then, the chimeric, "opium dream" vibe of the abjectly furious, "death BDSM" of the xenomorph should be a hint. Apart from open rebellion, the curious desire to look at our lost histories, schadenfreude, ecology (e.g., the forest and kodama, from Princess Mononoke) and formerly hedonistic or sexually liberated cultures "rabbits" simply involves the eyes and the Aegis; i.e., as being a normal gateway for the average person to experience extraordinary events with an expectation to see the violence, the gory and the macabre (a nostalgic fascination with monsters inside-outside nature, exhibit 48d2; but also the body as inside-out, whose "anatomical Dark Venus" fringes on hauntological, exhibit 44a2).

Yet, the hallucinatory cryptonymy and confusion of the senses when faced with chaos causes them to overlap; re: much like Nick Bottom's do during his own drug-fueled dream; i.e., a kind of erotic synesthesia or "experiencing together" of various senses to get at the truth of things; re: "The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report what my dream [of dark rabbits] was."

Just like Shakespeare's dark, forbidden forest, this desire to know gnosis is also driven by ecstasy—to learn by having fun and playing at being ourselves in ways heteronormative society doesn't approve of, but actively tries to demonize and exterminate; i.e., by targeting the sites of such Dionysian delights (a concept that applies quite readily to queer people and sex workers wishing to be left alone by weird reactionary straight people scapegoating furies). The Bacchanal transformation away from Cartesian norms/binaries invokes the sleeping death as cathartic; i.e., a form of rape play by fucking the sleeping-beauty doll-like sacrifice as thoroughly "stoned" in the hands of friends under conditions of informed consent. This can be assisted by altered sight, but also make rebellion something to attract people towards as "neurochemically pleasurable" through rituals of guilty pleasure during ludo-Gothic BDSM; e.g., school girls and ambiguous age regression scenarios; i.e., intimations not just of date rape, but ritual sacrifice tied to a ghost of the counterfeit using the most classic of imperiled damsels: the "virgin" (a watched pot never boils, unless you're fucking it).

(artist: Spoop)

We'll look even further into actual drugs in Volume Three when talking about parallel societies (e.g., Joy Division had many run-ins with coke, ecstasy and acid when trying to deal with Margaret Thatcher's bullshit). For now, I want to focus on the natural kind—not smoking weed, even (exhibit 60b), but the so-called "religious" experience of communion with intense emotions mid-ritual: state sanctions against a Paganized illicit sexuality. I want to wrap things up regarding that, considering the whore's revenge against profit (and places of profit; e.g., malls); i.e., where the black rabbit, once freed, testifies to its own bourgeois pimping and verminization haunting its freedom and xenoglossic voice seeking shelter and comfort during reclaimed sodomy dialogs (re: Ng and I, "Reclaiming Anal"): titillating people long-distance with educational aphrodisiacs, mid-cryptonymy on the Aegis (e.g., witch panties/Oedipal eye contact, above)!

Approaching Catharsis; or, the Whore's Revenge Where Said Wrongs Once Occurred

Of course, the xenomorph remains our centerpiece—a bio-mechanical, queenly Numinous tied to real-world, GNC peoples and their artistic refrain during the usual social-sexual rituals and practices. Earlier I also mentioned Radcliffe's frisson. In her own way, Radcliffe was exploring an altered reality through a natural response to perceived danger and stress of a particular kind—concealed rape tied to older legends expressed in statuesque, chronotopic ways: the hauntology of even having a voice to cry "rape" with (as Medusa was classically not humanized at all, in the archaic legends): zenith and nadir! Diabolical or divine? Maybe both!

(artist: Doc Zenith)

In turn, the usual double standards—of male nudity and armor versus female nudity and vulnerability (above) during sexual difference—bring forwards an ancient trope that was further dimorphized under Capitalism to offset the rising cries of "rape!" Patriarchy under capital, per Creed and Freud, assumes an ancient right/rite-of-passage: to rape not just whores, but all nature as monstrous-feminine; i.e., as classically being—among many other things—assigned female/non-white/non-Christian, etc, through tokenized police force. Such barbarity and entitlement springs forth a variety of revenge arguments, many revolving around castration.

But such things were, again, un-lady-like in ways that Radcliffe wouldn't have been allowed to feel; re: "Methinks the lady doth protest too much!" Except, the Medusa paradoxically grows stronger after she's circumstanced/the head severed from the body to recycle the rape cries in ways no Aegis could shield men/token agents from; re: because Athena was castrating men in the ancient world in ways that would carry over into ours; i.e., during class, culture and race war under neoliberal Capitalism and its nature-vs-the-state dogma (re: Cameron).

And though she was unreliable and timidly experimental, Radcliffe still yielded far better emancipatory results than the totally unreliable, prescribed way of seeing the world outlined above (Cartesian Dualism is a colonizing force). Obviously this investigation can occur differently depending on the flavor you're seeking in your own work (the act of creating going hand-in-hand with searching for a particular style or message within the style's heady aesthetic): "Come to mother!" or "Cum for/in mother!" Same difference; i.e., a body like a fertility god, beckoning you towards the imaginary past's retro-future apocalypse and potential reckoning with capital away from harming rabbits (of any color)! "Eh, what's up, doc? Your cock? Conquer my city/animal patch, little man!"

As Gothic-Communists, these can also be used to make the escape not just an innocent yarn, but an erotic, artistic, clock-carrying rabbit's drug experiment to make Radcliffe blush like an embarrassed schoolgirl; re: Giger's unbridled, xenomorphic surrealism as linked to various, ancient totems, lycans, and chimeras that undoubtedly inspired his own biologically intersex, drug-fueled visions, but also the everyday human cross-sections thinly veiled by modernity (above). They inspire the lesson, but also embody it in ways that extend to us having rage to spare, but also love in ways, oddly enough, a bit alien to Giger's beast: rape prevention through empathy-amid-exposure versus sheer "fuck off and die" vibes. To make a virgin/whore hero openly animalistic can stress an animal quality to bait the gooners trying to police nature as monstrous-feminine with.

Instead, "'mother' is the name for 'God' on the lips and hearts of all children"; i.e., in ways that yield a kind of Oedipal desire for the mother as something to worship and embody at the same time—a performance, in other words, and one that seeks nature and nurture as a matter of gender trouble versus sheer eroticism, lust or big/small regression. Again, they tend to go hand-in-hand as often as not during ludo-Gothic BDSM, and who doesn't like a good dark mommy? There's enough room for gentle and strict Amazons/Medusas, trust me!

Compared to Giger's own portfolio, we each draw from life and nature, but I like to dress the alien and whore up through dialectical-material context and paradox; i.e., in ways that dictate such things through power flow, which again, I stress through sex positivity and the monstrous-feminine as queer and sparkly in its gayness on the same Aegis, not abject/animalistic torture. Different strokes, but I think enjoying sex without rape through mutual consent is very human, so I like to stress that versus regressing to a flight/flight primordial mentality!

(model and artist: Scarlet and Persephone van der Waard)

"Going back to school" through xenophilic artistic expression is Gothic Communism's entire aim; i.e., to have fun and play with monstrous-feminine language by fucking with tokens: raising a dark temple to worship at, including the god-like, genderqueer demon rabbits inside. Case in point, I've done it myself in my own work, piqued by the effect the Numinous played on my neurodivergent, chemically drug-free imagination (and something that I already related to through Lovecraft's work, which was read to me as a youngster—I had weird grandparents). Doing so helped me reach my trans self in relation to the reimagined past as an ongoing mode, one that has the prolific and transformative potential to reveal cryptonymic functions of power through drug-like means, thus experience and critique it: fighting fire with fire, the fire of the gods as much about (and through) alienation as it is about rape; re: a naked, pissed-off woman is scary enough, but nudity of the whore in public speaks to rape in ways that are joyous just as often; i.e., during the cryptonymy process's preferential roleplay loaded with quasi-medieval embellishment. That's my jam, cuties!

This really isn't "new," though; re: Otto described the ghost story as an "abortive offshoot" tied to larger "Numinous" sensations, thus to a presence of the numen—of divinity and power—whose complex, ongoing relationship conspicuously involved religious language he figuratively supplied in an attempt to describe something beyond ordinary experience, but nevertheless attached to/contained inside smaller/more regular ghost stories: the awesome ghost (which C. S. Lewis, in response to Otto, called the uncanny or "mighty spirit" as greater than tigers).

Also like Radcliffe, Otto's linguistic sleuthing was to try and grasp why these stories were so popular to begin with. Sure, they were being giant snobby nerds about it, but their own investigations yielded lucid and helpful information.

According to both, sleuthing the mystery provides good, "impressive feelings": thinking through art as an active process of engagement during a perceived exchange of unequal power frequently associated with "religious experience" in common lexicon (those big feelings for big trauma as something near us). Yet those of us in the BDSM community already know this effect by a different name: "sub drop," which I initially likened in my own PhD research and graduate work to "ludo-Gothic BDSM" ("Our Ludic Masters") and eventually started to apply to my own life ("Why I Submit"). Doing so led to me coming out as trans before writing this book, which was inspired by Radcliffe's own "exquisite torture" but also my love for Alien and its own complex rape fantasies linked to liminal spaces, castle-narrative, and Numinous killer-rabbit occupants; i.e., as drug-like in ways I tended to imagine while—and I cannot stress this enough—not being on actual drugs!

Beyond the xenomorph as the obvious example, then, iconoclastic stories about drug-fueled sex demons more broadly can liberate the mind under Capitalist Realism by making new monsters inspired by older ones: hitting it from the front and back. They accomplish this "booty bump" by becoming forms of drug-seeking behavior that investigate older, non-Western ways of life as "drug-like" with genderqueer potential: a return to the womb of darkness and the poetic gods therein as dug-up "archaeologies."

Furthermore, there's a strict refusal to hide the imaginary anthropomorphic components, owing to a convergent sense of communion with the past per current communities that identify with nature through monsters and drugs as reclaimed; re: furies. Yet, the atypical experiences they offer aren't (always) chemical drugs that, once injected, ravage your body and destroy your mind; they're highly monstrous forms of self-expression that free the mind from Cartesian bias—the proverbial "good stuff" that helps people understand sex better, including sex work, by building new bonds associated with tried-and-true methods and their prolific and varied footprints; e.g., these mind-altering substances last through what Jen from The Dark Crystal (1982) called pictures: "Words that stay." Few stay better than those that were crafted under the influence of some dissident Promethean force!

Likewise, few things make quite the impression as monster puns; i.e., you remember the things that scare you, but also make you feel like you've never felt before. That's the sight-enhancing power of Gothic Communism, a kind of forbidden sensory enchantment or transformation depending on what you feel like you need to operate better—as an activist, but also merely to exist (existing for trans people automatically becomes activism under genocidal conditions, which capital fosters).

This includes experiencing revenge, rape, or other fantasies that help us cope with trauma as tailor-made for our bodies and descriptive roleplays (Sima's "Your Hips Are Wider than Your Shoulders," 2024)—perceived, imaginary and experienced in ways that cause them to bleed together as darkness visible. For the Gothic, that means fantasies that are hauntological, abject, cryptonymic, and chronotopic, but also phantasmagorical (dream-like); i.e., in relation to nature as policed, mid-panic (JayDaddy's "You're in a Slasher Movie," 2025). Revolution is half-real/dualistic!

To this, fursonas become like suits of armor—offering the wearer and those around them a kind of safe space where no one gets hurt as we let off steam; i.e., expressing ourselves freely as we plan our next step when interacting with others: a secret identity to act out dark wish fulfillment as a means of cathartic revenge, of tackling a hunter or prey mechanism that has become maladaptive in our lives; re: Covenant and David, among other things, the Trojan rabbit bearing false gifts that, when opened, unleash Hell as something to see long after the maelstrom is spent!

Forbidden sight, lost sight, forgotten sight, monster vision, Commie vision and darkness visible—the point with all these various visual types (and sensory confusions) is that, like our previous collages, a sex-positive exhibit can display different experiences of the past that form a pattern among the purple mist. This bunny train includes marginally or vastly different "trippy" experiences: "Exquisite torture? The Numinous? Cosmic Nihilism? Eh, po-tay-toh, po-tah-toh!"

As part of a collective, communal exchange with the creative past made wiser than it currently is, these seminal methods can be conjoined to restore old connections that were lost, using them in ways to understand the world better under Capitalism; i.e., to see through capital's lies with Gothic poetics as a discursive way of connecting with the former undivided self as "monstrous" in modern times (and whose so-called modern people are really nothing more than proponents of the colonial model of two different kinds of monsters: the hunters and the hunted—a concept we'll return to in Volume Three, with witch cops).

As the material world begins to decay under Capitalism and produces demons of a different sort by delving into the fascist past, being able to adopt "old" ways of thinking tailor-made for our world can give marginalized people a means of a survival by countering the drug-like propaganda of fascists (the Nazis were not afraid to do drugs, including Hitler); i.e., not just trans people, but anyone who seeks to rebel against Capitalism as a system that historically exploits as many workers as it can; re: assigning relative privilege to a squad of violent watchmen outwards: from cis-white men, then cis-white women, then cis-people in general, and various other forms of tokenism punching down (re: token furies) decadently against nature as alien. Sooner or later, nature punches back, and hard, knocking "Rome's" teeth out!

People forget the awesome power of rhetoric, but also of poetics; i.e., as spell-like relative to trauma, and gender trouble, parody and dysphoria/euphoria as profoundly intense (thus able to shape how we see the world around us through Numinous works). So often, transformation is how we see things that don't physically change; their context does in a phenomenological sense—i.e., how it's experienced, thus viewed and treated in future works, of works, of works...

To that, Gothic-Communist agency is merely a contribution to trails already well-blazed, and marks yet another step for us to grow and develop as we try and survive, but also cope with past abuse by healthily expressing ourselves through altered states of seeing the world during ludo-Gothic BDSM as 24/7. Fisher died before he could finish his own work on acid Communism, handing the reins over the next in line (as is tradition). Rather than fear us for having these dreams of violence built on older ones, consider how they are more apposite to who we are as people living within our own genocide as unresolved. Solve that case, Nancy Drew!

Keeping this in mind, genocide is precisely the thing we want to prevent by experimenting with "drugs" ourselves. Doing so involves the destruction of those things symbolic of genocide during oppositional praxis: the proponents of class struggle, but also the monstrous-feminine within class war against the state. Trans, intersex and non-binary people ain't basic, y'all; but we also ain't aliens the way the state decrees. A girl can certainly dream, though, picturing herself akin to something like a xenomorph; i.e., as the prophesied avenger of past wrongs in the present. This isn't just psychological tension, mind you, but class struggle and unequal material conditions and conditions of power told through Gothic poetics.

To this, the iconoclastic revenge fantasy becomes a kind of "lucid dream," one that regains a modicum of control from those who harm us and threaten us; i.e., with material reminders of trauma. The question for the nervous observer shouldn't be, "Will she kill me?" but "Why does she feel this way? Why is her body biomechanical and fueled by dream-like, drug-fueled forays into the 'past'?"

The devil, they say, is in the details, and dark empathy means giving different people a room of one's own to play out difficult power fantasies about rape and other generational abuse/erasure; re: the xenomorph as a kind of traditionally female whore avenging past wrongs in Western and Japanese culture: "And if you wrong me, shall I not revenge?" So do holistic vermin come home to roost/reap the extirpator with oddly sexy rape revenge: the slow march of time versus the black rabbit's race to the finish—a turtle rabbit!

(artist: Tomato Lover)

Love, Dead and Robots, for example, combines the Yokai spirit of vengeance with a tick-tock version of Shelley's Creature (next page); i.e., East-meets-West, the be(a)st of both worlds turning hunter into hunted and vice versa: a killer Trojan rabbit's splendide mendax; re: "That rabbit's dynamite!" Fuck around and find out, assholes! A reaper of vengeance avenging past wrongs with a body of metal (re: like Sonic's Amazon rabbit character); i.e., concentric preferential code, the sideways smile of a vengeful black womb/whore ravishing Francis Bacon and company (re: Creed and me), thus reaping the Numinous whirlwind of a Great Bunny Destroyer punching up with vigor (and so on): the call isn't coming from inside the house, but is the house—the At the Mountains of Madness eating Capitalism through the native's reclaiming cannibalism against profit and its spearheads during "land back" on the Aegis: giving the prison/death sentence back during live burial! Such is Gothic maturity developing Gothic Communism during ludo-Gothic BDSM to tell (or rip) the Nazi and Commie apart!

Fluency illuminates darkness visible during dialectical-material scrutiny. As we move on to synthesize Gothic theory in Volume Three, it's incredibly important to remember the focus of this book: sex worker rights through such scrutiny—not psychoanalysis as a jacket for Marx to conceal him! The whole point of Sex Positivity is stopping sex worker abuse through reclaimed Gothic poetics, which Gothic Communism achieves through successful proletarian praxis freeing black rabbits; i.e., exposing systemic abuse with Gothic theories by funneling them through monstrous puns, historical awareness and transformative experiences: as dialectical-material analysis, but also covert devices like cryptonomy and hauntology (which we'll explore in dead malls, next).

To achieve praxial catharsis, these various, modular means and "mash-ups" become expanded, personified ways of seeing and communicating—a "monster mode" that all workers can use to transform material conditions through the Gothic imagination, not just trans people. Together, we can all express our personal journeys and subject matter to others; i.e., highlighting the various social-sexual symptoms of Capitalism that inexorably lead to sex worker abuse/exploitation: lobotomization, live burial, menticide, and war/rape culture, as well as their various canonical gargoyles and ignominious deaths; e.g., the coded and "little" deaths—of individual worker brains and actual lives, but also their sex and social lives tied to the hyperreal death of the future that leads to the Big Death of Promethean Capitalism: through its classic business site; re: as a place where fatal nostalgia (thus empathy) goes to die and be reborn: the mall as a cathedral where consumerism/privatization and pimping come to a head with the rabbits who turn such places into Bunny Island: the Revenge (a swarm, echoing Danny Glover's excellent 2023 show about a woman-of-color sex worker serial killer—bee buns protecting the robo-rabbit hive) of the cooked cooking us (Master Necronic, 2021)!

Closing Thoughts: On the Justice of Roosting Rabbits (and onto Zombie Malls Where Rabbits Are Sold)

In times of crisis, people can change to anisotropically rebel for or against the state. So beware the Ides of March; i.e., the parthenogenetic egg-laying rabbit hatching the lunar-sized demise of the oppressor through self-served posthumanist, cybernetic revenge: a false Antiquity's dark Aesop seizing the means of revenge production back from state pirates. Privateer bun deprivatizes capital; avast! We sail into Black Duality, cryptomimetically tempting Fate to undo the Puritan ethic to expose the pimp and camp Marx's ghost! They push us into the putrid animal past; we bring it forwards in paradoxical forms of joy that not only can't die, but help us regenerate as revenge! We are and aren't what you paint us as: from lawn jockey to Space Jockey to bring the chickens (or rabbits) home to roost; i.e., the "past" is right now, currently at hand! The eye opens and the panopticon searches for prey as Hell comes to Earth. It's very Watership Down but also Terminator in ways we can reverse: the return of the proletariat assassin played by us furries!

(artist: Fox in a Jacket)

To it, we servants of a Dark Easter amortize the mortgage, showing you what's in store! Death, libido, and dealing through public nudism and the duality and cryptonymic, intersectionally solidarized anisotropic labor exchange: the voice of Omelas' holistic chattel breaking the monopoly and spell of Capitalist Realism! We become death, destroyer of worlds, and beautiful in our rapturous sermons; i.e., Zofloya handing Victoria a poisoned chalice! The beautiful death, putting on her spotted robe! Time for love bombs, straight from the ass; total eclipse of the heart!

And if those unaccustomed to flattery can't spot fetishization in bad faith or the throes of assimilation, those who have lived it have likewise learned through experience; i.e., during calculated risk to reduce risk and better the instruction by passing on hard palliative-Numinous medicine ("the dose [and context] doth make the poison"): to the next in line playing with fetishes and taboos to apotropaically subvert the usual negative effects! Summon and spar your own demons until you can handle whatever the state throws at you. So is ludo-Gothic BDSM acid/Gothic Communism, in small; i.e., something that took many tries from me, failing at many things until I returned for the first time to my queer roots, mid-psychomachy!

Some people push back; we do it on the trail of death as oddly happy. To chase the Numinous as a mighty sex ghost we don't want to vanish, it's like a rapturous spell that can deny/kill the orgasm like a succubus just as much as summon it during calculated risk (chasing the ghost of rape). What dreams may cum indeed! Take one for the team: the jungle moon bun's tramp stamp of doom, back in black, turning the noose on the executioner in her chimeric death coach's nightcap: a poison drug putting a spell on you, a paralytic wasp embryo inside you, eating you up (the killer egg, in trans language, hatching a tokophobic dragon up in your guts).

So do we reify and spar with such demons to give them voice and shape, meaning as vehicles we can control extending into the world around us; i.e., like a lever that can move the Earth with; e.g., Sweetpea (above, 2024) murdering her enemies being impractical in real-life (classic codependency on murder victims) but therapeutic for workers in real life looking in; i.e., the fantasy of a knife very different through performative but also dialectical-material context achieving cathartic synthesis without harming other workers. Quite the opposite, we prevent systemic harm by changing what causes harm through "harm" during the whore's paradox of rape: the ghost of the counterfeit, swapping terror and counterterror!

It's half-real, delighting in discomfort and eustress disguised as genuine distress during ludo-Gothic BDSM; concentric illusions, deceptions, and mirages are the Gothic's go-to place of concealment: in plain-sight (and often strict), oscillating between gentle and hard, black and white, virtue and vice, etc. So can we "rape" or otherwise fuck with each other in paradoxically Numinous forms developing Communism. Win-win! Fuck the Five-O!

"Remember the rep," Rocky Balboa? "Crime doesn't pay?" In short, we're already criminal by existing and pimped into self-hatred, and if crime didn't happen then the elite (and cops) wouldn't exist. Yet here they are, playing hero like Rocky is. Self-love and self-care comes from getting angry at those who harm us in bad faith (as Stallone does). So save it for those who have it coming and who underestimate us; i.e., for being small, weak, and having all the power they want to take from us. Become the thing they've always feared and run with it; it's literally poetic justice, and silence is genocide. Like Sweetpea, we're literally investigating our own death—as something we survived and carried out. Allegedly.

So hit it and quit it? Bitch, please, we're here to stay (and camping Zeuhl's ghost, in the bargain)! Our home, Jameson's nightmare of Marx' ghost, is a Twilight Zone turning empire's rot in on itself: you're already dead; you just don't know it! That is our revenge, and we'll beat that drum till the End of Days; i.e., when Medusa comes to pick up/relieve her avatar and show us what's coming to a head! When push comes to shove, she's queen of her kind! First-world problems become end-world problems, our dead queen beating Saturn in a child-eating competition.

The trick to avoiding that sorry end (of our species) is dismantling capital, which requires dark empathy and teamwork to avoid Queen Death's maw. The way out, then, is through Hell by mastering Her shadows before then; i.e., shirking what capital promises and conditions, meaning workers being made to think what is promised as "reward" (Jafar-style) but actually a curse we must break (and vice versa: the victim's desire for power versus the state soldier afraid of everything and alienated from nature in all its wondrous forms; e.g., killer rabbits, next page)!

So Yoshi-style egg-laying mammals aren't completely fictional, the seemingly chimeric convergence of the echidna or duck-billed platypus speaking to the imaginary sodomy terrors of yesteryear! We're not just dragon bunnies but bunny bandits—a vanguard of tank rabbits preparing for Kursk 2.0! The victory and justice of our one people, one race racing to the finish like a slow shuffling slasher—the paradox of the hare as a turtle whore—is the eggs we lay as much serving as bombs, as well as clever bio-weapons inside-outside our hosts: survival, solidarity and speaking out! We do so through revolutionary cryptonymy!

And while killing is a power that translates poetically to activism—and there's power in death as radical change—we're not terrorists, but freedom fighters; i.e., the only thing we kill is profit, but can defend ourselves as they attack us: fighting fire with fire being anisotropic. So is our rape revenge fantasies taking sodomy back; i.e., through said fantasies that speak to activism as something to disguise what we're talking about. When fascism comes home to roost, then, so do we. Scared of a killer rabbit sucking your blood for a change, King Arthur? Of changing into any shape we need (and size; i.e., kaiju bunnies)?

The fact remains, land back is a guerrilla enterprise, and we don't owe the bourgeoisie shit. Godzilla Bun is here to eat capital, and rape fantasies putting the shoes on the other foot (a bit like Cinderella) are not mutually exclusive with good praxis: fantasizing about killing the elite is not the same as killing them. Don't believe philistines who say that is worthless (e.g., Bad Empanada); from Marx to us, social change and justice go hand-in-hand with material change.

Perception-wise, there's a thin line between victimizer and victim (e.g., Olurinatti's "How Men Become Aziz Ansari," 2025), as well as damsels, detectives and demons, but also rabbit and rapist (apart from humans, consent is virtually non-existent in the animal kingdom); the magic of revolutionary cryptonymy is its function yielding itself clear as crystal regardless of praxial ambiguity through dialectical-material scrutiny and worker/owner divisions (thus cats/dogs and other tokenized rivalries finding common ground under shared duress/cause for concern and trust issues/vice-character alter egos): "Feel the power of the Dark Crystal!"

Furthermore, per Asprey's paradox, makeup is a weapon, and sex in art/porn is a weapon, our furry counterterror versus state dualism and its usual tools. Our attraction and portraits are fatal, as are theirs, but our demon-red vampire eyes give and take as undead-demonic animals having the whore's torturously fake revenge during confused predator/prey and vaso vagal memento mori—all to grant curious shared wishes: dreams in fractured solidarity during ludo-Gothic BDSM of the hunted hunting the hunter and ravishing them, a common enemy and lubricant diptych, with a demon lover's nasty and penetrative, impregnating parting gift—the caterpillar and the wasp laid by a magic March hare.

So does Communism grow inside the audience and change their vision through sex and force: our black Dracula, Lady-Macbeth, Great Destroyer's hunting vibe a light bringer exposing the lily-white, banal bourgeois dragons like Elon Musk as Dracula in duality playing at Van Helsing's man of reason; i.e., as "white knight" predators with their hands in the cookie jar whether onstage or off! Our cookie jar. A pimp's a pimp, and you think you can get away with murder? Two can play at that game, and this one's for Medusa!

The drug trip never ends—is a "perma" trip that, like Radcliffe's spectral castles, stretch into the void, mise-en-abyme: the belly of the bun, buns all the way down, a Numinous ravishing by the bun of the Radcliffean cop to be its carrot, a darkness not to flee from but face and reconcile with by sodomizing capital's corpse (re: the anal Amazon thesis applying to black bunnies buttfucking the palaces of a dying capital to transform them into safe brothel "stables")!

Before the Demon Module's conclusion, then, I want to briefly examine that vis-à-vis the sorts of dark empathy and Gothic poetic elements we've been discussing relative to the nature world; i.e., to reunite with as capital decays (versus lament and fantasize through Capitalist Realism, as Stranger Things does; re: avenging America [or a similar empire] that never was to keep scapegoating Capitalism as usual, above): a Morpheus-style wake-up call while dreaming (a night bunny versus a black dog or nightmare, etc), haunting places as carefree as the blissful neo-arcadia of Yoshi's Island from Super Mario World (1990). A mall is a mall—both an emergent town square as much as state-sanctioned concentration camps!

Why the dead mall, though? Like a mining camp during a gold rush, the mall is a cryptonym for genocide tied to capital as dead. As a "ghost town" where the exploitation of workers sits eerily within the decayed illusion of the mall as nostalgic, this means the unfolding grand calamity is well-disguised: the fictional, concentric ruin as a neoliberal disguise to our own crumbling world! To prevent its logical endpoint, Capitalism's zombie future must be revived into a new form of visible, critical undead—one whose life-saving emotional/Gothic intelligence; girl talk, love language; transformative, eye-opening pastiche; and all-around execution of proletarian praxis (the basics of oppositional synthesis) occurs at the new sites of media exchange and worker exploitation build on older bunny bazars!

And while physical malls might be dying or dead, their online iterations are certainly not. It is here where a new zombie future must emerge, a half-real proletarian "archaeology" that lives in the ruins of Capitalism while bearing out the p(r)osy chiding of critics far too good to participate; re: Jameson and similar fancy-pants thinkers and poets who act like nature's stewards, but in a very gentrified white man's way that is too good for acid Communism and the Gothic (someone who might turn their noses up at Gandalf's smoke rings, for example). We'll spank their little bottoms (or thump their buns/eat their fat juicy carrots, as the bunny power bottom does), next; i.e., where rabbits (thus whores) are sold!

Saying Goodbye: Onto Better Times Ahead (and Harder Ones)

Lastly, your paranoid vindication tells me you have learned nothing from our discussions, and it feels tremendously disheartening to work so hard at maintaining a friendship between us only for you to disappoint me so thoroughly at the end. Apparently yesterday was Mario Day, the day Super Mario Bros. (1985) released? It coinciding with the termination of our friendship feels incredibly strange and sad to me. But I am glad to be rid of you all the same; I am so very tired of trying to meet you halfway only to watch you pull away and insinuate, or transform and attack me like you are now. I regret to say that this is, in fact, the end. Farewell, [Zeuhl]. May you live the rest of your days in peace. I will be moving forward with the book. Please do not contact me again.

—Persephone van der Waard's last words to Zeuhl, March 11th, 2023

To escape Capitalism, you must walk through the land of the dead and of demons. We've done that. Talking about rabbits, we were discussing xenophilic negotiations between workers occurring in good faith; i.e., reunion with idiosyncratic states of alienation to help reunite all workers with nature: as monstrous-feminine to cultivate dark radical empathy as half-real but pushing towards actualization—not fake bridges towards empty promises in the dark: the innocent party in the shower minding their own business while the guilty party is blowing out the proverbial shitter! A blast from the past ass, waffle/curb-stomping us! "Et tu, Brutae?"

(artist: Taiga15)

To that, seeing others as "animal" is to awaken ways of caring for animals that are anthropomorphic; i.e., not textbook profiling and suspicion, nor to apologize for a particular postpunk rogues' roughness around the edges (and whose rebellion was over before it started; e.g. Zeuhl, Morrison, Byron, etc), but invite holistic inclusion through suitably therapeutic adrenaline-pumping regressions that push towards Communism: as lycanthropic engagements regarding friends and foes, but also threats both actual and perceived!

Times change, but historically-materially stay the same. In 1973, when pressed in an interview about whether he ascribes any political revolutionary implications to rock according to a narrow definition of "political" (cutting out sex and drugs), Frank Zappa initially responded with, "Well, what are you including?"

Chagrined, the woman grilling him replied that ascribing political significance to rock is to fall victim to Hollywood trends; i.e., that radical change can't occur without musical accompaniment. Um, Maple the drumming dog takes offense to that (Acoustic Trench's "Star Wars Cantina Band w/ Maple on the Drums," 2019)!

Ignoring the fact that music isn't simply diegetic and that much of music and musicianship has military roots designed to mobilize troops and rally morale (re: Holst's "Bringer of War")—and with me agreeing that while a certain leeriness is required towards corporate output or those attached to it as rescuing damaging practices from their own flagging moral (re: Holst, vis-à-vis Heinlein, Lucas and Cameron, Romero/Carmack, etc, per Zizek's universal application)—the fact remains that sex, drugs and rock 'n roll are criminally underrated (so to speak); i.e., they make rebellion not just fun, but bearable and worthwhile, during cryptomimesis!

Faced with his young enthusiastic critic, ol' Zappa replied, speaking to a certain pulse-taking utility to consumer trends: "Radio is controlled by how much money the sponsors can make by buying time on the air. And the station has to present ratings to the sponsor which show how they have the largest audience, and where they do the research that says that people want to listen to the Osmond Brothers or Jackson Five. That shows or tells you something about the audience" (Pauline Butcher Bird's "Frank Zappa is persistently questioned by a female student").

Indeed, it's effectively putting our ears to the ground of a dying Earth through braindead workers tilting at windmills during Capitalist Realism. Said idea likewise exists now except inside social media; i.e., whose own half-real interactions between the state and its proponents follow the leader to their graves (and ultimately the leader's). Fascism is a land of different kinds of strange fruit, requiring an orchard of protest. We gotta take our labor back through universal land back; i.e., as a matter of good holistic stewardship, not rape rankings. Gothic Communism is an art, not a science, but there's still a few hard, fast rules.

In other words, we can't wait for it to affect "just us" because by then it will be too late. We also can't join those who say they'll "keep us safe"; re: predation aside, people join cults to have their needs met, thinking they'll be safe from harm. We need to give people a better option while exposing our foes, opening everyone's doors and minds (drugs open pupils and other holes) to end state monopolies; i.e., on sex, drugs, and roll 'n roll, thus the Base and the Superstructure on the Aegis!

Furthermore, we can't hold back because our future has been canceled before we were born, but we can't lie and use each other like Zeuhl did to me. They're the bourgeois black bun, you see—someone who lies by having absolutely no idea what they did was wrong (or so they claim). Not even when they're holding your bleeding heart in their hands, but also before that point when they weren't who I thought I recognized; i.e., as someone I felt in love with as a shadow of a thought. That's what the Medusa is, extending to Zeuhl as one of many black buns canonically bred for meat and mates, which mirrors the chattelization of people as scapegoats (e.g., black men and bucks, versus rabbits). Like a wild animal, they were incapable of actually loving others, save to get what they wanted using sex and force (a lie is just force through words). "Just a bun," after all! I once found them dashing and cute; eh, they'll always be cute to me, just more alien now. No regrets, there, but some sadness!

That being said, while Zeuhl used me as an easy mark, they also introduced me to acid Communism (whether in good faith or not, I can't say for sure); i.e., shortly before the end of our friendship, when they pushed back on my book when it was only about 50,000 words long (versus over two million, now). Reasons asides, their challenging me helped turn Sex Positivity into what it is; i.e., by sending me on a long winding road—one where there is no Zeuhl waiting for me at the end, but which I've been trying to understand their gradient and tokenized actions for years (enby-on-trans violence versus shadism). I'm still falling from them versus for them, but I'm free of them. A Black Bun? "Keep it; I got a Pitbull, now!" Your pussy was the tightest in the world, Zeuhl, but it was the One Ring and I'm Tom Bombadil-ing that shit! "Sickness, BE GONE!" Rapscaillon! Bay's puppy trumps the bunny!

Quite the twist, eh? Now hop along, little shadow. Get lost, but stay safe out there. Don't bite no one.

From Butler and Warner to us, sex and gender are separate from each other and from biology as the policing coordinates that marginalized in-fighting and abuse also fall back on, but whose concentric veneers apply to us versus any normativity you can think of; e.g., Monty Python's Life of Brian having straight men playing women playing men versus Matthew Lewis' the Devil playing Matilda playing Rosario. There's also real-life examples; e.g., my partner Crow, a trans masc AFAB enby playing a drag king (versus a stripper); i.e., which isolates asexuality and gender performance from gender identity to get away from cis-het male drag queens like Ru Paul punching down against trans and other GNC drag kings and queens' own varieties!

(artist: Crow)

In short, none are determined by biology save by straight weirdos who "made it," but also token members of the LGBA and fascist feminism seeking validation through virtue and vice; i.e., as something to signal and farm as perpetual tourists who gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss themselves and those around them; e.g., the Mom from Landman taking the old folks to a strip club and giving them alcohol with their meds or Nicholson's character kidnapping the mental patients in Cuckoo's Nest, and so on; i.e., Whitey and the Straights unable to see beyond their own noses/role in settler colonialism; re: Landman and Taylor Sheridan's weird, White Man's view of the world: as trophies to collect, while Trump and Elon Musk destabilize, then blame the poor and marginalized.

Such social constructs are colonizer mentalities tied to Capitalist Realism, thus have to die; i.e., just like my attachment to Zeuhl had to expire for me to move on (their ghost always haunting me, of course). And even now, I still love that part of them I kept inside, all these years: the eternal black sunshine of my admittedly not-so-spotless mind (something to protect from the closeted coward who wanted it hidden in all its forms).

To it, Gothic Communism treats all workers as equal, but it's not blind to privilege as it currently exists. Either we use what we have to help each other as one people to universally liberate, or we're all doomed, lose-lose. We outnumber them and have the labor they need to rape us with; i.e., which we can deny them our keys to a once-and-future queendom (from drugs, to oil, to sex), starting now and right fucking now. Capital's already dead; it's just in its throes!

By extension, development's a marathon, not a race or a business; i.e., capital is incompatible with life, thus can't coexist with us; re: it rapes us by design, and tokenizes labor to police that fact. We have entered a time of monsters, hence of Zombie, Vampire and Demon Capitalism versus Communist versions on two sides of the same Numinous coin: workers and nature vs the state, thus sex positivity vs sex coercion: "The future, once so clear to me, had now become like a dark highway at night; we were in uncharted territory now, making up history as we went along."

Except, keeping white cis-het men/tokens is frankly a giant pain in the ass, because the burden of care falls onto the caretakers (women or those treated like women, hence slaves/monstrous-feminine); i.e., men aren't cool badasses that give it their all for the Cause, like Arnie's T-800, but weird expensive pets looking for a second mother to baby them and fuck them; e.g., as vulgadrawings' 2025 "The Burden of 'Mankeeping'" explains the issue, minus a vital dialectical-material critique—meaning the corporatized dogma that shapes such things, and which older feminism tends to ignore/assist in by attacking "the Patriarchy" as a scapegoat. We can't do that, going forwards. There must always be a material critique to go with the social one and vice versa, and we must always punch up, not blindly at self-deceiving spectres; i.e., at cops, versus low-hanging fruit, which includes tokens bought and paid for! My mentioning of them in Volume Three is to highlight the castle they come from/serve in perpetuity. They punch down, we punch up!

In historical-material terms, we're left with a cryptomimetic chain whose fascist "force of will" strata translates endlessly into shonen, Amazonomachia and other psychosexual kayfabe; re: the monomyth monopoly and cartographic refrain. Nature's alien returns; summon hero to defend through force of will during the Protestant ethic. Said ethic (and its silly ideas of afterlife) never pan out historically because it's symptomatic of a dying socio-economic system on its way out (again); i.e., life imitates art (and vice versa); e.g., the Saiyans can't self-reflect when colonizing themselves in a gobstopper ring colony boomerang model, but simply put up more expendable and bad faith buffers when making recursive golden ("Aryan") revenge arguments: against a perceived external degenerate backstabber/tyrant's enemy within/upon the Aegis. There's no logic, save that someone stronger always emerges to challenge the rooster's perch!

Same idea with Super Sonic vs Shadow. They can't self-reflect, and instead self-report whenever they act high-and-mighty while punch-projecting their flaws onto others; i.e., during the abjection process attacking the holy ghost of the counterfeit. It's folly Star Wars dreck—Milton or Frankenstein without the irony and all the hypocrisy (a Beowulf regression's praxial inertia during the Cycle of Kings, in the Shadow of Pygmalion/infernal concentric pattern's narrative of the crypt).

As Zeuhl showed, anyone who acts like that is a cop, thus an enemy to themselves and others; i.e., there is always an element of delusion, denial and antagonism to their traitorous actions; re: antagonize nature and put it cheaply to work according to those who—in their own minds—can never be wrong. They do it to themselves during mirror and virgin/whore syndrome: policing the whore outside themselves to hoist themselves on their own petards. Once someone corrupts, they become bad cops, then sacrifices during the euthanasia effect's refrain during modular and intersectional persecution mania; i.e., nature is other and death must be brought to the barbarian traitor or suddenly outsider menace, Brutus or Hannibal: "I am nothing like you!" shouts Sonic at his own shadow, Peter-Pan-style, while Robotnik the evil Doc Brown tries to turn the moon into a wunderwaffe as the Marty-vs-Biff wunderkinds do battle outside (while the parent shoots themselves in the head from success fatigue).

Now where have we heard that before? Take your pick; history is littered with such copies and egregores pointing to their offstage Roman fools in similar Icarian-

Promethean numerical sequences (re: Sonic 1, 2, and 3 vs WW1, WW2, and WW3). First in tragedy and then in farce, such things repeat because they're built to repeat; i.e., as the elite want them to, harvesting the bloodspill by moving money through nature during the pimp's revenge. Zeuhl simply sold out and found someone to spend their last days on Earth with; i.e., to cease rebelling is to slowly commit suicide inside-outside the danger disco opera. Very postpunk!

To have the whore's revenge bursting the heroic death cult's bubble, we must anisotropically reverse the flow on all registers; i.e., at the usual gravesites where capital has died and revived before. Rather than install self-defeating abject (us-versus-them) apotropaic barriers—doing so to alienate and fetishize nature as undead/demonic by chasing the shade/monstrous-feminine whore monomythically to Hell to sacrifice them (as Sonic does, chasing his evil half into outer space to banish Shadow and Robotnik [a play on peacenik and beatnik] to oblivion)—we must go to where the dead are and interrogate their trauma and token mistakes; i.e., to prevent a fresh, even-worse cycle of cyclical destruction resulting from the Promethean Quest and Faustian bargain tied to capital acting on loop.

Capital is recursively Promethean/Faustian, and neoliberal power is recursive false power and delusion; e.g., Superman, Super Saiyans, Super Sonic; i.e., all equaling personal responsibility and austerity politics alienating and fetishizing nature, thus workers colonizing themselves after God is dead (a secular dogma). Sex positivity vs sex coercion happen in the Capitalocene as fading towards state shift; i.e., we must revive increasingly Socialist, thus Communist forms using Gothic poetics to liberate all workers (sex or not) using iconoclastic art: to talk cutely to our pets in symbiotic stewardship, all of us in the same boat!

We'll get back to that in Volume Three, but for a moment, let's extricate ourselves from Zeuhl's warren (and their fat wiggling ass/plump ham-sandwich pussy folds). Onto dead malls and the graveyards of capital; i.e., where Medusa waits for us, inside! We need to negotiate with ourselves, because she'll walk away with everything Humanity has to offer! Gird your loins; the end is 'nigh, but not secured!

The Future Is a Dead Mall; or Reviving the Zombie Future with Proletarian "Archaeologies": Revolutionary Cryptonyms that Defy Snobbish Critics of the Gothic to Break Capitalist Realism

"If the concept ["metaverse"] is so broad as to be little more than a vague gesture at the future, if successful and popular things like Minecraft and Roblox and Fortnite get to be the nascent metaverse, then [Decentraland] does too. And if this is the future, then the future is a dead mall."

—Folding Ideas, "The Future is a Dead Mall - Decentraland and the Metaverse" (2023)

(source: "Auctioning Off a Dead Mall," by Jessica Testa, 2020: "The body parts come as a surprise, even if you expect them, when they're the only things left behind.")

Enough about rabbits. Volume Zero and One introduced revolutionary cryptonymy as a means of expressing and interrogating trauma in monstrous (especially animalistic) Gothic language that challenges state monopolies on violence, terror and monstrous expression during Capitalist Realism. In turn, Volume Two has focused on the Humanities as something to apply/historically learn from—by poetically using the Wisdom of the Ancients less as forgotten knowledge that once was and more as forgotten perspectives now to create new ways of existing in the present; i.e., to humanize workers as fetishized, psychosexual aliens through various xenophilic monster types: zombies, vampires, ghosts, composites, and supernatural demons, as well as lycans and other monsters tied to nature and the natural world. The idea is to shift our cultural understanding of the imaginary past in ways that challenge Capitalist Realism (thus profit), exposing the decay behind the illusion as often being integral to what the elite cannot conceal. They cannot, so they dogmatize the ghost of the counterfeit using the abjection process as dumping site: a Promethean ruin!

Because language and the material world are where these things presently exist (and have existed for some time), I wish to conclude Volume Two by looking at language itself—not at more monsters (whose praxial synthesis we'll unpack in Volume Three) but at the assorted "crypts" that house their replicated, revolutionary forms: cryptonymy as a means of fighting against business-as-usual using the ghost of the counterfeit to reverse the process of abjection in hauntological, chronotopic spheres ("canceled futures" + castle).

This includes the dead mall as both a symptom of Capitalism's manmade instability under its own xenophobic disasters echoed by Gothic doubles (the imaginary disinterment of potential/ongoing epidemics, societal and ecological collapse) but also a nostalgic, crumbling veil to conceal the disaster inside-outside itself—like a zombie, but specifically as a sublimation for what Capitalism is doing to workers, the environment, the entire world; re: Capitalist Realism. Through revolutionary cryptonymy as a counter process to state forms, said forms' canonical, monomythic sublimation can fail to benefit workers, but requires dismantling the various cyclical aspects to said Realism; re: the Shadow Pygmalion, infernal concentric pattern/narrative of the crypt (and their canonical refrains), Cycle of Kings, etc.

Doing so faces several hurdles, mostly notably critics of the Gothic. In other words, as we workers must declare, "This is our mall!" as the call-and-response from accommodated intellectuals is very much the same phrase leveled against common people. In turn, the mall becomes a war zone during oppositional praxis amid war-like language; e.g., the zombie apocalypse as straining to bring about intense change: from Capitalism as an end of the world as we know it onto something better than has ever existed; i.e., something beyond the monomyth, Cycle of Kings and dead retro-future, etc.

Beyond just dead malls, then, I want to examine the larger creative space as liminal; i.e., both as haunted, but also criticized by those who won't eat green eggs and ham: critics of the Gothic mode who turn their noses up at its sexualized cryptonymies and monstrous, supernatural language; e.g., Fredric Jameson⁴⁸² but also Coleridge. Never trust a skinny cook, but also any fiction snob who's allergic to monsters and liminality but still bothers to write academic volumes about goddamn spaceships. Not only is denying monstrous expression to deny the humanity of those interrogating it—i.e., the pedagogy of the oppressed—but it occurs in the covert nature of human language that moderates demonstrate so well (and makes them more dangerous than overt reactionaries—a fact we will examine thoroughly in Volume Three).

⁴⁸² Re: "that boring and exhausted paradigm," quoted frequently in many sources; e.g., Alex Link's "The Mysteries of Postmodernism, or, Fredric Jameson's Gothic Plots" (2009):

In the midst, of its definitive arguments, Frederic Jameson's Postmodernism, or, the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991) pauses to consider the Gothic just long enough to single it out as a hopelessly "boring and exhausted paradigm." The Gothic, he declares, is a mere "class fantasy (or nightmare) in which the dialectic of privilege and shelter is exercised" and it should not be mistaken for a "protofeminist denunciation of patriarchy" nor "a protopolitical protest against rape" (source).

First, when I said "crypt" and "haunted" a moment ago, I was referring to specific types of either—the process of cryptonymy itself, whose trail of semantic wreckage and endless narratives-of-narratives (the mise-en-abyme) remain occupied by something not fully present: a hauntological "ghost" beyond the immediate, material world and its crumbling linguistic devices the ephemerate mall demonstrates so well.

Capitalism deliberately encourages the recreation of profitable commodities, not artistic statements that challenge the system. Yet their erotic proliferation of sublimated war pastiche/monomythic junk food leads to a series of illusions built upon the structure itself as a concentric curse; i.e., one whose increasingly obvious decay during ergodic, liminal, anisotropic back-and-forth motion/castle-narrative outlives generations of owners and workers alike. Inside this desert of the real, the glory of Capitalism is burdened by the tangible spectres of Marx as gayer than the man himself, hence adumbrating the existence of a nightmare to such men without end. The exit strategy lies within oppositional praxis and dialectical-material function inside the text as reaching outside itself into larger half-real mazes and labyrinths, but also monsters (and their morphological architecture).

Specifically by covertly retooling the "bricks" that build the crypt, workers as monstrous-feminine may recultivate the Superstructure with new, proletarian "archaeologies" that bring out a rebellious, sex-positive xenophilia; re: undead, demonic and/or animalistic; i.e., to have the whore's revenge through iconoclastic art touching on these decaying liminalities! The Gothic is writ in decay and regeneration happens out from the fertilized necrobiome graveyards ceasing to be holy in defense of capital. Hostile to capital, we can pilfer them and weave new spells friendlier towards Communism: by making/summoning monsters of/closer to nature, or befriending those already attuned to a Communist postapocalypse!

Since the 1970s, an iconic site of circular American decay has been the mall; i.e., a weird, seemingly self-contained place to consume, but also where canonical monsters go to die. Their likenesses are preserved as dolls and other chronotopic emphera, but eventually outlast the people who were meant to consume them. In other words, Capitalism encourages the harmful, xenophobic consumption of blind pastiche through efficient profit (a reoccurring theme in musical hauntologies like Vaporwave, whose own facing of decaying and reassembled nostalgia ["corporate mood"] is ultimately palliative when taken to palliative-Numinous extremes).

Fortunately for workers, language resists standardization, but also total concealment; i.e., the graveyard as a hauntological chronotope/p(a)lace of concealment for fresh visitors to walk through—no matter how rotted/nostalgic it appears—and behold the cryptonymic revelations of a decaying hyperreal: one we can sow new seeds in dead empire with (the plot to The Matrix)! Doing so might make you a xenophile or xenophobe; i.e., depending on which seeds you plant—a praxial outcome that relies on the allegory hiding with the code's context; re: the seeds that you plant in furtherance to competing dialectical-material struggles and structures' lattice-like scaffolds and fractals!

A good example is Satanic Panic, with "Satanic" being a cryptonym of repressed queer persecution that straight audiences, through the ghost of the counterfeit, are expected to look back at with fondness; i.e., a relishing of abject nostalgia and witch-hunter mania (e.g., Zionism). So often, real systemic trauma becomes repackaged as darkly nostalgic (exhibit 60c). Revisits happen not once, but like rain on a windshield, demand constant attempts to keep things clear and cloudy (from a praxial standpoint). These synthesized poetic forays, in turn, require special theories to get at the truth (our Four Gs from "Paratextual Documents"). Portrayed via informed exhibits through the repeated repainting of one's canvas, these can help viewers pierce the Black Veil and break on through to the other side (Jim-Morrison-style, but without actual death, self-imposed suffering and bigoted destruction). Bit by bit, the mall can become ours minus the canonical violence used to colonize/gentrify its territories. Doing so is development in small.

We've already covered abjection/reverse abjection a great deal and will continue to explore it (and chronotopes) throughout Volume Three. I want to close out the module and Volume Two by focusing on cryptonymy (and to a lesser extent, hauntology); i.e., as a covert means of devising proletarian archaeologies—a kind of poetic conversation with ghosts/other monsters comparable to ghosts: that free the mind by refamiliarizing it with the xenophilic language buried by Capitalism, but also abandoned by critics of the Gothic like Jameson and Coleridge; re: the excessive, sexually-charged language of the Communist dead (and Gothic Communism's inclusion of ace expression, of course).

These "paragons" draw the line at moved goalposts; i.e., something for Gothic Communists to ignore, thus reunite with what's held away from us by these goons: something we make for ourselves over time to spite their gatekeeping tactics. Using hauntological variants of the past, rebellious cryptonymy contains, conceals and evokes trauma as something to face, but also embrace and subvert during xenophilia of our mad architecture. Doing so involves the creation of new ghosts and aquariums for ghosts—not an "end of history" at all, but a likeness of the traumatic past; i.e., as something to fearfully inherit, then express through rememory in ways that remain useful to our purposes and our enrichment; re:

without enslaving us to the same old tyrants and their xenophobia towards us (exhibit 43d): "the future of one moment that has now become our own past" (re: Jameson)—to inherit!

(exhibit 60d: American hauntology isn't restricted to malls; it can be any dead location under Capitalism. Case in point, Willy's Wonderland [2021] swaps the Gothic castle and walking suits of armor for an undead theme park guarded by bloodthirsty mascots in fur suits [furry panic]. The park's ghoulish residents are actually a mish-mash of various undead and demonic types dressed in animal furs. Contained inside biomechanical suits, the spirits of former employees forever seek the blood and souls of fresh victims [revenge for abandonment]. Having formerly murdered the middle-class families and their children as impostor employees, Willy's lycanthrope animal demons continue to "threaten" Capitalism by h[a]unting the spirit of nostalgia itself.

Yet, this decaying idea of a "better time" is still nostalgic, cashing in on Friday Nights at Freddy's [2013] through a fairly shameless Nic Cage vehicle. All the while, the murderous shells continue their "Satanic" rampage, aided by local protection: a vindictive police force that desperately safeguards their village from their idea of evil using outsiders as bait [the scapegoat's scapegoat]. A self-defeating lie that cryptomimetically echoes the colonial guilt from Hawthorne's 1835 Young Goodman Brown and its Puritanical critique, the fantasy of ending the town's curse co-opts the white knight/cowboy from its original colonizer role. Cage's silent protagonist turns the violent ritual into a self-debasing joke: the chattelized sacrifice of demon and devil-worshipper alike, mid-abjection, while revering either as an '80s sacred cash cow fallen on hard times. Instead of critiquing material conditions, the film sports the critical "balance" of a dumb popcorn movie—one made to patently capitalize on a recent, franchise hit: worshipping capital in decay as a latter-age Gothic castle!)

Beyond revolutionary cryptonymy as working in opposition to complicit state doubles, there are two forms of the basic cryptonymy process I wish to highlight, here, in relation to our own "archaeologies"; i.e., our own "dead malls" built in the shadowy decay of American infrastructure. The base function of cryptonyms, then, is to conceal and reveal (re: Hogle), which denotes a generalized process of cryptonymy separate from Gothic language; e.g. monsters, lairs/parallel space, and phobias, etc.

By comparison, Gothic cryptonymy denotes a concealment happening through these devices that reveal; re: expressing the dislocated presence of trauma without showing its existence directly! Instead, like a canary in a coalmine, the unnatural quality of the concealer is the clue; e.g., the incongruity of the Gothic castle as a pre-fascist throwback that reaches forwards through dead-mall simulacra; i.e., the ostensible disconnect between the two insofar as a transgenerational curse/circular ruin (and nostalgia) is concerned; re: capital in decay alongside its concentric, sorry and left-behind illusions.

So while Gothic Communists aims to attack the bourgeois directly with xenophilic monstrous language "putting the pussy on the chainwax," brevity isn't our sole concern as workers; survival is equally important, lest the revolution be spotted and replicated by xenophobic copycats (fascists). An indirect route is beneficial, articulated by the users of rebellious forms of dialectical-material code; i.e., code-switchers in monstrous guise/fur suits. Revolutionary cryptonymy uses the natural aspects of dying language to camouflage ourselves, mise-en-abyme.

To it, we have already examined the history of cryptonymy and how it occurs beyond the obvious, corporate euphemisms and blind-vs-perceptive pastiche; but we've yet to apply this ourselves to the present world (which Volume Three will do, next). This being said, the basic, natural functions of human language also play an important role. In terms of our own artistic analysis that highlights sex worker abuse through Gothic theories, methods and art, we will examine some mundane linguistic effects that occur within canonical media, here.

However, we'll only do this as long as those linguistic effects connect back to the four Gothic theories we've chosen; i.e., provided they help expose sex worker abuse through sex worker activism (extending to all workers sexualized by Capitalism), meaning as gradual-yer-driven improvements on Gothic-Communism as something to perceive: more and more with as the Superstructure is steadily and progressively altered ASAP! Rome wasn't burned in a day! Then again, its hyperreality (and burning behind the sparkly map) has already occurred!

The riotous aim during oppositional praxis is to develop Gothic counterculture (thus counterterror) through cumulative forms of iconoclastic art. Stacked on top of those that already exist, these expanded, versatile approaches to sex-positive sex work should teach better ways to prevent worker abuse in the Internet Age; e.g., puns, memes, digital art, PPV nudes, etc. Once developed, this plebian xenophilia can be put to use in covert ways; i.e., by using revolutionary cryptonymy to liberate sex work from the status quo by furtively liberating the language and popular subject matter sex workers use, generally in cryptonymic fashion: as a method of use, but also of recognition—code, in other words.

To it, there's a tremendously playful element (during ludo-Gothic BDSM) to human ingenuity and resistance, especially insofar as monsters can pass themselves off as "ordinary." Their creation and sale—while already Numinously liminal—becomes a kind of disguise for other activities useful to Gothic Communism's development. "Nothing to see here, folks! Just late-stage Capitalism in its usual death throes!" Sike!

Given the specialized Gothic theories we're using—and the abjection process that we're primary seeking to reverse through cryptonymy—our emphasis concerns the abuse spoken of/about in popular stories; i.e., that frequently deal with sex work as it historically-materially presents through Gothic stories and broader media attached hermeneutically to those stories. Such holism subsequently permits workers to discuss the Four Gs in relation to oppositional praxis, specifically while regarding the tokenized sex-coercive elements of different genres and styles, but also modes of delivery (videogames, short stories, stage plays, etc); i.e., canon we can camp inside itself while beware half-real imposters onstage and off. In short, we'll use whatever is needed to reify our theories as thoroughly as we can; i.e., by exploring sex-positive and sex-coercive manifestations while focusing on the creative successes of proletarian praxis seizing the day!

This means the self-determination and Satanic self-expression of ourselves as alien but loveable (fuckable or otherwise); i.e., during the deterioration of any façade (ours or theirs), hence includes addressing workplace traumas—however they normally present in media normally designed to hide them—but also as it occurs behind-the-scenes: stories of a fantastical or sci-fi predisposition (re: Frankenstein or At the Mountains of Madness), retro-future dystopias (e.g., Blade Runner or Cyberpunk) and pointedly hyperreal futurist dystopias (re: The Matrix) ringing similar alarm bells for different reasons (for workers or the state).

Furthermore, this cryptonymy also extends to pin-up photos, action figures, music videos, rock-opera danger discos, Metroidvania, and so forth (all topics for Volume Three). The sticking point, but also the paradox, is that our lessons pertain to sex worker abuse tied to Gothic theories and monster puns, but also goals (the Six Rs); i.e., as a quick, relatable-thus-reliable way of connecting such diasporic chaff to magically address (through the wonders of technology—like my computer helping this Lady of Shallot weave her magic spells): the Numinous-sized problem all around us without giving the game away entirely! Through buffers that shield, hide and show us off on the same shared Aegis, revolution is a mirror game not unlike the dead mall's usual Gothic heroism; i.e., one where the heroic survivors are faced with undead, demonic and/or animal menaces to bond with, I-Am-Legend-style (e.g., the mushroom men gargoyles from The Last of Us serving as Red Scare and eco-fascist watchdogs guarding the temple during [thus inside] the same shared fantasy space).

Clearly human language is wedded to nature as biomechanical, thus unreliable but also cagey and guarded; i.e., whose basic-to-Gothic cryptonymy makes revolution possible. Keeping in the Gothic tradition of investigating the deceitful past (code left behind for future rebels to find, mid-allegory inside Plato's cave), all of this stems from investigating its assemblage of notorious, modular agents (which I acquired in literal "Gothic modules" at MMU); i.e., as superstitiously suspicious towards antiquated curios, but also intrigued with the uncanny self-same unheimlich and its make-believe past: a ghost of the counterfeit during the liminal hauntology of war's debrided "senescence renaissance" leading us to a palliative Numinous to recultivate the Wisdom of the Ancients towards Communism out of Capitalism!

As such, any "unreliable principles of detection" have a cryptonymic element to them that conceals trauma for or against the elite's benefit. Capitalism is a perfidious hyperobject; i.e., one concentrically filled with recursive, xenophobic illusions and counterfeits. Thus, it's vital for workers to have doubled means of confirming the assortment of conflicted, messy feelings that historically-materially result from the same complicated situations that Capitalism generates in its death throes; i.e., a hyperobject that's so big that you can't directly observe it, and whose descriptions through simplistic metaphors are abstracting at best.

Even so, Gothic language (and its cryptonymy process) are already about as grey/gay an area as you can get, and remain tremendously useful when articulating Numinous—mysterious and tremendously fascinating—feelings with or against some of the usual suspects; i.e., that materialize under Capitalism during oppositional praxis as a process of decay and rebirth: witches, zombies, demons, werewolves, vampires and ghosts, goblins, golems, ninjas, et al. The stealth of a masque is to blend in with those around you working at dialectically-materially cross purposes. If they're wearing monster outfits, it behooves one to do the same! The better coders will prevail (again, just like The Matrix)!

And no, it's not "just" because I think monsters are cool, sexy and fun (they are); it's because I think they're cool, sexy and fun in relation to social-sexual activism as something to furtively "hook" you on xenophilia—meaning startlingly vivid cryptonyms that one can mix, match, and blend⁴⁸³ in figurative-literal composite ways (and still retain their critical power and bite). Canon sells heteronormative monster girls and boys, their props and costumes manufactured to sell you a xenophobic idea you're meant to embody and sublimate to varying degrees: heteronormative war and rape, but also moderately critical means of dismissal pertaining to Gothic emphaera and praxial synthesis; i.e., which people like Jameson or Coleridge cannot conceive save as redundant (re: Botting) or devilish, dubious and abject! Beware the snob, because they benefit from being a snob!

⁴⁸³ Presenting as an audio-visual theme in the artwork itself to—intentionally or not—holistically communicate the ideas; i.e., on par with a Gothic portrait animating or a medieval work starting to bleed in miraculous fashion, illustrating the union in literal terms. The genius/Gothic maturity at work, here, is meta; i.e., that an emotionally and Gothically intelligent and class, culturally and racially aware person can generally tell the difference and not be confused by what "speaks" to them in a Gothic way!

Variations "friendly" to Gothic Communism and its development should work as satirical code, then—stealthy "magnifying glasses" swiftly and discretely administered to workers ASAP to avoid them physically and emotionally winding up like these monsters' more tragic canonical counterparts: the zombie, ghost, vampire, rapist, accidental incestuous lover and necrophile and/or witch, etc, as indicative of more than a former human's ignominious death; i.e., their sleepwalking life as informed by various grim foreshadowings that present the entire system itself as actually falling apart!

A common causation of ignominious death in Gothic stories, then, is blindness through Promethean Quests and Faustian bargains dressed up in monomyth poetics; i.e., feelings of heroic invincibility and self-deceptive hubris that come crashing down around us/down on our heads; i.e., for Promethean heroes, but also the doomed, Faustian, and currently neoliberal capitalist civilizations they call home or fight for spoken about by various critics "too cool for school"; re: Jameson and company selling others down the river by becoming abjectly "nose blind" or allergic to Gothic and its smell tests. Waking from the nightmare only to die still inside of it is a classic Gothic outcome; i.e., the "bad ending" live burial as illustrated by the proverbial "dead mall," ghost town, and/or haunted castle, etc, as a home for monsters the xenophobe wants nothing to do with. They're already dead but think they're helping others survive by abstaining from tools of survival!

As if, Doctor Silberman! You're Ozymandias, and we're offshoots of the Medusa dancing on your stupid grave; re: "Look on our Works, Ye Mighty, and despair!"

Instead of advocating for a structure and language system historically doomed to fail, the ironic, rebellious usage of these tell-tale beings (friendly ghosts and xenophilic gargoyles) can help prepare people to defend against canonical possession and its "sleepers agents." This includes what moderate state proponents further through canonical art and apologia dressed up as "radical criticism": lobotomy and its consequent torpor but also rape, murder and war belonging to a half-real, historical-material outcome—one that emotional failures to learn from Capitalism and its artistic trickeries—reliably results in, time and time again; i.e., worker exploitation through a system that treats the owner class (and those who shield them from criticism) like gods, and stews workers in a menticidal culture of rape and war apologia's endless waves of terror disguised as "cures" and knowing-better sophism; e.g., Jameson's wholly inadequate Utopia apologia; re: Archaeologies of the Future: the Desire Called Utopia. Newsflash: "Utopia" is Omelas, and you're Orwell with more masks, fucker!

Ozymandian engineers of their own "greatness," such colossal pride, systemic abuse, and endless lies only lead to their (and our) extinction. We can't directly attack them, but we can hit them where it hurts: their xenophobic propaganda, canon, and management structures' chains of command. The Superstructure that leads to the final devastation of all life under the Capitalocene can be supplanted with spies useful to our sex-positive aims: ourselves and our own humanizing forms of monstrous xenophilia/revitalizing concentrations of older spirits and "essence"; i.e., any way you wish to quantify that, as long as it makes you more intelligent and aware of the world around you in a dialectical-material sense tied to nature as dark, hence needing dark empathy (and similar forces) to combat the state's own cryptonymy process furthering abjection: in the usual chronotopes' hauntological spheres (the liminal hauntologies of war), thus on the same Aegis and with the same fires of the gods. So is the Medusa fought over during Frankensteinian tug-o'-war!

Taking such credibility away from false prophets like Jameson and Coleridge, the dead mall becomes a place where idiosyncratically marginalized workers can show our ass in holistic ways; i.e., differently than the state does (and normally with less self-harm, above): the whore's revenge castrating profit by showing the Cycle of Kings eating its own tail in the same dead contested kingdom space (another mall inside new variations that never fully extricate)!

While Volume Two has extensively explored monster poetics—i.e., as being something to Gothically foster through poetry and historically catalog and gauge through older (and newer) thesis work—it has hardly exhausted the endless and awesome power of Gothic that puny men like Jameson, Botting and Coleridge have historically run away from like little pathetic cretins. Instead, it has outlined our Four Gs through some of the most common monster examples; i.e., building on the undead, demons and totems of the natural world during three consequential monster modules (themselves built on my PhD and manifesto).

In seeking to learn from the reinvented past as populated with these monsters, I wish to return to the role these monsters play in Gothic Communism's development across space-time: "re-excavating" the past in search of wisdom as something that Capitalism discourages in highly specific ways; i.e., iconoclastic "archaeologies" versus canonical dogma's preaching to an increasingly embattled choir! If Capitalism leaves behind its own dead malls, so can we, and this is what Volume Three will focus on, when those archaeologies come to light!

Our focus, again, is ironic xenophilia—on monsters and humanoid expression that yield sex-positive, universally liberatory effects through parallel societies; e.g., Richard Matteson's Communist vampire-zombies, but also the places these animal demons call home (re: Deborah Christie). Through a desire to habitually recreate the past as forever incomplete—but also fragmented and cloaked by class war as a cryptomimetic byproduct of Communism vs Capitalism—these satirical monsters emerge in parallel palimpsestuous "haunts"; i.e., a wild castle appears!

Like grave rubbings, their giddy recreations invite comparison to former monomythic versions and different monsters that warn of potential danger and trauma—and whose combined nostalgic iterations (from canon to camp) are what Jameson more broadly calls "archaeologies of the future" (which is what I meant by "re-excavation"); re: "the future of what is now our own past" that requires continuous "elaborate strategies of misdirection" to break through (re: Jameson's 1982 "Progress versus Utopia; Or, Can We Imagine the Future?"); i.e., including monsters, but also spaces where monsters—both good and bad—call home: my camping of Jameson to walk away from Omelas as he envisioned it, thus return to home as Gothic in ways we can make more Communist than he dared dream. As Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communists, we're the superior model, but nonetheless cannibalize his derelict wreckage for spare parts!

In short, Jameson's Victor Frankenstein and we're the Creature camping his (soon-)to-be ghost (never mind—his actual ghost; he died on September 22nd, 2024). Androids do dream of electric sheep, and we want more life, fucker! Enjoy Medusa's snakes skull-fucking your dead sockets! Feel the camp flow through you!

"Head Crusher!" (Megadeth, 2009). It's quite the death rattle, your deadly headache our gift to your legacy married to our own; i.e., phrenology from Hell, making new lumps as we probe your globe for speculative and probative value! Vae victis, bitch! Learn to see with our Galatean eyes, not your Pygmalion peepers! "I'm the harvester of eyes!" (Blue Oyster Cult, 1974).

We sadly don't have time to ravage Jameson's freshly-dead corpse like we did Radcliffe's less-fresh stiff, but you get the idea; re: stringing them up and beating them with sticks! Our doing so combats society's "constitutional inability to imagine Utopia" (code for "Communism" as Jameson fumbled at during Capitalist Realism blinding him); i.e., by beating the gatekeeper's effigies through dark empathy with the alien as something to generate and embrace again by revisiting old dead things that have been criminal but also exotic and worshipped under Capitalist Realism; re: Jameson's weird temple. Yet another darling to kill!

To it, however "boring and exhausted" Jameson finds the Gothic, his famous inability to engage with it results from Gothic canon, which upholds the status quo through Jameson's own notion of "blind parody" abjecting us. He's thrown the baby out with the bathwater and become xenophobic himself. I don't want to prescribe the Gothic to him, but its vast, integral nature to queer discourse needs to be recognized and appreciated by him if he's to be an effective ally (too late—but I wrote this back in 2023). Otherwise, he's just another Picasso arrogantly assuming he can speak for the marginalized. Time to splash paint on his priceless pedagogy!

Jameson clearly favors science fiction and fantasy hauntologies, exploring them far more intimately than he ever did the Gothic's recursive neo-medieval. Yet, the Gothic is famously rooted in fantasy and science fiction; re: by offering up some of the latter's earliest examples like the Shelleys; i.e., in ways far less alienated from nature and from labor than Jameson bothers to argue. Indeed, he goes so far as to dismiss the entire mode; re: Postmodernism and its own post-Freudian veilings of Marxist potential in workers older than Freud or Marx. The etiology of Jameson's picky skepticism lies in the hauntological murkiness after our classic examples of Gothic fantasy-meets-science-fiction; i.e., the elite having long since obscured ironic, sex-positive forms by mimicking Shelley's productive and potent xenophilia, post hoc. Jameson does the same thing by debriding (so to speak) science (and its Protestant ethic) from Gothic fiction; i.e., in pursuit of Omelas as something to shack up with! He's the homewrecker saying to others more marginalized than he is, "It's just too hard!" Like, get fucked, old man!

In doing so, homeboy's offered up his own cryptonyms, dropping them inside a reinvented, bad-faith past: the dead mall as a complicit, sullen burial ground for neoliberal worship while Capitalism decays as usual. Far from being effective satire, the elite's ghost of the counterfeit bandies about ritualistic trauma before burying it, thus prolonging Capitalism's survival under Jameson's dubious watch. When this burial fails, the elite rely on fascists to do their dirty work for them, Jameson conventionally sleeping on the job. We gotta wake him up; i.e., like David dissecting Shaw into a new Gothic-Communist effigy made from stolen parts!

Unfortunately for snobs like Jameson (and Coleridge, as we will see in just a moment), combating these requires "digging up" the traumatic past as something to reinvent⁴⁸⁴ in opposition to state-corporate media and benefactors. Doing so means facing the black knights of fascism as very real (and very dangerous) obscurantists, but also the moderate/neoliberal obscurantism; i.e., of centrist gentries like TERFs and the girl boss persona, but also Jameson's own strange ⁴⁸⁴ If the splendide mendax seems intellectually dishonest, remember that personal memory is already neuroplastic, especially in relation to dissociative trauma. Mnemonic images, then, are designed to assist in remembering things that are physically difficult to recollect—not from one's own trauma, but also because those in power don't want people to remember the unspeakable abuses the state and cops regularly commit in pursuit of material profit. To paraphrase Maarva from Andor, "the Empire wants you asleep"; i.e., unable to fight back because you're drugged, lobotomized, and suitably undead in ways the powerful can enact (through critics like Jameson), then exploit.

DARVO (which, as we'll see in Volume Three, generally translates to "boundaries for me, not for thee" during reactive abuse). Again, the primary difference between fascist and moderate is a matter of style and degree; i.e., working in relation to the same basic outcome: exploitation through the bending of words and monsters to empty them of their critical power (e.g., "woke"). Guilty as charged, Jameson!

Courtesy of the elite and their lapdogs, the collision of unironic vs ironic "archaeologies" often leads to confusing and fragmented disagreements (re: "Outlier Love") but also material results complete with their own socio-political responses (this entire book series and sex work). More to the point, this messy convergence includes general cryptonymy and Gothic cryptonymy operating in socio-material conjunction under Capitalism; i.e., as something we subvert regarding Jameson and other Pygmalions' usual collusions protecting Omelas as much as not! He's Ash from Alien, protecting corporate models!

Note: This portion of the "Dead Mall" section is one of the oldest in the book; i.e., I actually wrote it when I was first grappling with cryptonymy (a concept newer to me at the time than Jameson was—with me exposed to the former [through Hogle's "Restless Labyrinth"⁴⁸⁵] in 2018 versus the latter and Archaeologies of the Future in 2014). I want to preserve it, though; i.e., as a historical artefact similar to Walpole's Otranto except minus the actual posturing of true discovery the 1764 cryptonymy (and its ghost of the counterfeit) teased at. I'm doing so because I touch on some linguistic points that you might find useful when reversing abjection during the cryptonymy process, yourselves! —Perse

General cryptonymy is defined in Punter's Encyclopedia of the Gothic (2012) as

"words that hide," by which is meant a word in the form of a "cryptonym" that has apparently no phonetic or semantic connection to the prohibited word it is disguising. Repression has been exercised upon the word itself, which means that the original word has been concealed.

This, for example, could be the general discussion of sex; i.e., as something to censor to varying degrees, but also white male privilege as part of the larger conversation being had, and women's role in relation to them (and people of color and GNC individuals, non-Christians, the elderly and disabled, Indigenous cultures, and/or sex workers, etc). Cryptonyms are difficult to understand because they resist exposure to a natural and unnatural degree. Naturally they are a feature of language that simply occurs; unnaturally all exist in relation to others inside a material world having recursively evolved out of capital's historical-material looping in on itself—i.e., as a structure existing over space-time, and one that uses hauntological descriptions of itself to prolong the lie. This includes general cryptonyms and Gothic cryptonyms, at once discrete and indiscrete!

First, an exhaustive (and hardly comprehensive) list of general cryptonyms, which highlight the cryptic nature of oral-to-written human language. These include but aren't limited to: double entendres, non-sequiturs, euphemisms, white lies, concealed bribes, open secrets, patronizing admonishment, gaslighting; segregation, relegation or consignment; censorship, suppression, repression, and oppression; figurative or literal imprisonment; live burial, incarceration, compelled silence or speech (torture); misdirection (creative), embellishment, tall tales; misdirection (rhetoric), lies, "making nice," false courage, false cowardice; myths, malapropisms, misnomers (necrophilia, pedophilia) or generalizations (necrophobia = superstitions, historical abuses, taboos, prejudice, misconceptions, etc); rumors, gossip, urban legends; allegory, metaphor, poetic license, lionization or otherwise self-aggrandizement, darkness visible; riddles, passwords, shibboleths (and songs), code, cryptic responses; synonyms, games of telephone, figures of speech, fake news, optical illusions, special/visual effects, shadow plays, sarcasm, false praise (and other linguistic pragmatic techniques); anonymous speech, pennames, alter egos, pseudonyms, noms des guerres, dead names, new names or a combination, like Charlotte Brontë's Currer Bell (source: Sandro Jung's "Currer Bell, Charlotte Brontë and the Construction of Authorial Identity," 2014); perceived irrelevance (apophenia) and pareidolic danger, trauma or vaso vagal threats; veiled threats, disguised praise, friendly insults, "love taps," deliberate contradictions, paradoxes; anathematic status, disorder, chaos, entropy, decay, senescence; treachery, unreliability, perfidiousness; replicas, imitations, simulacra, counterfeits, fakeries, deceptions, sleights of hand, tricks of the mind, Freudian slips of the tongue; guarded language, dubiousness, apprehension, caution, disassociation, hallucination, altered states, possession; rejection, abjection, displacement, doublespeak, Gothic doubles, obfuscation; recuperation, appropriation, appreciation; centrist, neoliberal and fascist vs Communist hauntologies and fencing political euphemisms, recuperation, sublimation, etc...

(artist: Charles Burns)

same time, Gothic cryptonymy combines monster poetics with general cryptonymy (take your pick); i.e., as a form of compound bias and concealed exposure!

To it, Gothic Communism uses general and Gothic cryptonymy (thus xenophilic monster poetics) against the state; i.e., by depicting state proponents and projects as fearful, bourgeois sources of past trauma: the wreckage of the infernal concentric pattern forming an endless train of megadeath, its centrist apologia sold to defend the monomyth, not the bodies of the working dead (while also hiding the men behind the Cycle-of-Kings curtain: the elite). While Capitalism threatens the present with its own cryptonyms, revolutionary cryptonymy becomes a fight to survive through linguistic concealment that "blends in" while also standing out; e.g., Wicked-Bad-Naughty Zoot leaving her grail beacon on at Castle Anthrax, or Count Fenring and his equally-crafty wife "speaking" non-vocally in code to fool the Harkonnens: in plain sight.

There's considerable historical precedence for this approach. Punter and Hogle's usage of the word "cryptonym" specifically articulates a transgenerational curse survived only by its own hauntological narrative: inadequate linguistic markers, concentric illusions, and semantic wreckage whose hidden trauma must be investigated but frustratingly resists discovery during the cryptonymy process on all sides; re: what Jerrold Hogle calls a "vanishing point": "on ashes of something not quite present" acclimating to cryptonymy decades before Marx and over 150 years before Jameson sucked and wailed his first breath (and over two centuries before his last breath)!

Under Capitalism, then, you have the appearance of many seemingly unrelated things; i.e., the general discussion of sex as feared and fetishized in ways that Jameson callously and prematurely hand-waved: commodified, neoliberal horror stories that discuss Gothic sexuality while simultaneously trying to pacify revolutionary xenophilia (and older authors like Radcliffe) that interrogate the usual systemic, social-sexual abuses commonplace under Capitalism (thus Jameson's watch); re: the ubiquity of rape and police surveillance leading to genocide/ endless revenge against nature as monstrous-feminine. This bourgeois agenda produces cryptonyms meant to be used complicitly by men like Jameson; i.e. in support of capital's systemic xenophobia/radical apathy versus our polar opposition during praxial synthesis engendering radical empathy—meaning towards whores and nature at large preyed upon by the state while Jameson turned a blind eye/walked towards Omelas as he spouted semi-useful nonsense we could reclaim.

The resultant "black hole" occurs relative to the public imagination not as totally emptied and more like "badly drugged" (see: Charles Burns, above); i.e., by past hauntological forms, themselves something to coercively conjure up and shoot into people's veins whenever investigators start to notice more generalized cryptonyms tied to systemic abuse in Gothic forms: criminogenic conditions, social unrest, "disorder" (to borrow from Joy Division) and state-sanctioned/monopolized violence through various state proponents like fascists or neoliberals mucking about (the concealed word, here, continuously being "genocide" or some other hidden atrocity profit causes—what's called "the quiet part" in common parlance, and Hogle marks per the ghost of the counterfeit as something to pimp and abject).

The ultimate canonical outcome isn't a literal drug—at least, not by itself alone—but "bad hauntologies" like the alien dead mall assimilating workers into lobotomized, unironically zombie-like police states. While this can be reversed, it also takes generations to enact. Likewise, the same is true in reverse, and people will inevitably die before the curse noticeably starts to fade. Nothing ventured, nothing gained. Let's not stand on ceremony by sucking off old dead guys. We look postpunk, but we're actually punk decaying towards future forms built on past language hugging the monster during the dialect of shelter and alien! This is our mall, Jameson, and meaning is made in monumental obscurity and proximity to titanic forces grappling for supremacy—workers vs the state! You rise up to eat our brains; we stand on your shoulders to elevate our own understandings of the world you apologized for in your own roundabout ways!

Capital gentrifies and decays to create strange appetites, but also strange methods pushing towards forbidden, unknown pleasures; e.g., cryptonymy and post-scarcity wedded like Persephone to Hades, hence the imaginary past as continuously reimagined as cryptonymic, thus cryptomimetic. By that same token, the cryptonymic devices being used by the state's complicit parties are being simultaneously pilfered by revolutionary authors unafraid to "dive in" to the Aegis; i.e., by using said devices creatively in search of parallel, emancipatory hauntologies that lead people "out of the crypt" while simultaneously through cryptonymy disguising themselves from those with power (either having it, neoliberals; or aligning with it, fascists): as ghosts, demons, witches, zombies, furies, cyborgs, golems, aliens, etc. Jameson was a white privileged straight guy in academia, thus estranged from the need for such therapy and disguise! He sucked, and sucked on Utopia's white-supremacist cock coming home to roost!!

Furthermore, the resulting senescence can still appear (or be) a drug-addled mess, hence a violent fever dream the likes of which Jameson's total, snobbish dismissal is part of a longer chain of moderacy directed at the Gothic; i.e., as something to pimp during the same cryptonymic hogging since Coleridge of stages they policed, scrubbing of any dark whorish testimonies. Opposition is a liminal gradient, forcing its utility to be met by those who think they know better but are too good to play with dead things (or fuck demons). Otherwise, they might realize what Gothic iconoclasm is trying to imagine in relation to Capitalism and its Realism: not a run-down former paradise that failed, but a well-oiled, unethical system of worker exploitation working perfectly towards that aim by disguising its transgenerational trauma in linguistically cunning ways! Moderates be like that!

In Volume Three, I elucidate this chaos (and roosting chickens) as clearly as I can; i.e., by venerating Gothic hauntology and cryptonymy as I argue in favor of sex positivity and Gothic Communism (actually having done so first and published last; re: after the five preceding book [sub]volumes)—the achievement of the latter through subversive xenophilia breaking down the "crypt" of Capitalism, thus replacing its tyrannical Superstructure with a post-scarcity variant (doubling for the old castle; i.e., a "Trojan fort," below).

Before we cross volumes, though I want to close Volume Two with a final commentary about our aforementioned snobs; re: turning their noses up at sexuality and the Gothic in relation to dialectical materialism; i.e., as something to dance around (for them) not with/among the dead as fake, but not automatically in service of the state and its historical-material process of abjection; re: Jameson shivering before the Aegis, whose act of controlled opposition/functional obeisance towards capital was actually done first, by Coleridge!

(artist: Brian Froud)

As we've touched on, Coleridge liked his drugs. And we've already examined Stuart Mills accounting how Fisher himself offered various solutions in response to Capitalism; re: acid Communism as a trippy means of escaping Capitalist Realism (alluding—perhaps accidentally in his case, I think—to Blake's aforementioned acids, or things that produce a similar drug-like effect).

Fisher seemingly divorces hauntology from the supernatural, but according to Castricano cannot escape the cryptomimetic language of ghosts that Marx relied upon (and which I attach to all monsters, thus all work as sexualized by the state into dead alien whores); I want to consider how the breakthrough can happen at different points through different means, focusing on sex (especially Gothic depictions of sex) as an elaborate, xenophilic strategy of misdirection that helpfully guides viewers out of capital's shadow.

This, in turn, requires a great deal of optimism regarding the powers of imagination; i.e., as able to shift, but also their utility in sexualized forms as operative towards rebellion to furtive degrees (as we shall explore in Volume Three, kayfabe is the language of espionage within a grander monstrous-heroic discourse, including monstrous-feminine as tremendously common in either side of the praxial equation). Mills writes how "Capitalism constrains creativity and innovation," but also, in my opinion, imagination. This is plain-as-day with Jameson's dismissal of Gothic, but also Coleridge's; re: his rabid attacking of gay iconoclast/rebel, Matthew Lewis: "Yes! the author of the Monk signs himself a LEGISLATOR! We stare and tremble" (source: Pressbooks' "Samuel Taylor Coleridge's review of The Monk").

Moral outrage/pearl-clutching is a witch hunter's smokescreen for ethnocentric superiority and hypocrisy! ACAB!

So whereas Fisher saw hauntology as a prison that traps people inside Capitalism, I treat hauntology as something slightly different. My goal isn't exodus at all, but poetic transformation; i.e., when Gothic imagination is liberated by a different kind of hauntology than what Fisher entirely envisioned: the emancipatory kind offered by Gothic Communism and sex positivity as not a whitewashing of the tyrannical Gothic castle and more an emancipatory double whose happy ending is the steady push towards equality and post-scarcity by reclaiming the symbol of the dark castle itself—indeed, its entire cast, construction and age as something heretofore undreamed of: a progression away from the monomyth and infernal concentric pattern by ironically using these same devices predicated towards a different outcome than what historical-materially offers up through canon like Coleridge onwards; e.g., the queer princess, dance hall, monster and castle, etc, as dressed up in the binarized Gothic aesthetic that, within and outside of its own text, is the metatext of oppositional praxis; re: doubles allowing for troubling comparison to break Capitalist Realism (and its monomythic violence against whores)!

(artist: Johannes Helgeson)

Compared to Coleridge, then, our contribution is subversive doubles that envision a post-scarcity world and out our abusers in their usual forms of disguise; e.g., Dark Link if they weren't just a shadow puppet for Link to fence with but their own Gothic-Communist entity teaching emancipation through demonic exchange. But from Coleridge to us, there's always a duality when fencing with monsters (demons or otherwise); i.e., the shadow housing our Gothic potential to liberate and exploit, as Coleridge himself did while anisotropically sparring with Matthew Lewis. In either case, hauntology works with outmoded, formerly fearsome liminalities (again, the xenomorph, but also its castled home and the princesses, detectives and soldiers who share these imperiled spaces with it, inside the castle as yesteryear's corpse malls). To make their dated views of the future emancipatory requires earnest, good-faith, even covert engagement with common social-sexual material.

I say "common" because imagination, whether through canon or counterculture, is continuously educated by images—often of people; i.e., created by producers, artists and consumers working in tandem, hence coming from warring schools of thought, using similar sexualized imagery whose communication with is primarily viewed by sight but gleaned through subtext. Capitalism, though, limits imagination to a mode of thinking that supports itself; i.e., one leading to a complicit, cryptonymic continuum (say that three times fast) under those accommodated socio-material structures already in place; re: as used by Coleridge onwards. Standard canonical space, thought, bodies and sexuality—all counterfeits, lucrative and hegemonic, that bury the public imagination alive and keep it there with an army of bad-faith or otherwise unfriendly zombies, witches, ghosts and other monsters. Same goes for Coleridge and those aping him (and his unapologetic classism, anti-Gothic screed and drug-addled xenophobia)!

It would be a tremendous mistake, then, to assume all monsters are created equal, as Jameson does, or that they lack the critical power to reshape the public imagination. They instead require constant dialectical-material analysis, which he remains curiously unable to afford them, any more than Coleridge before him did; i.e., both men shivered at whores being ghosts of the Medusa pimped by capital raping said whores, thus nature as monstrous-feminine; re: as Ambrosio did when Matthew Lewis summoned the whore to testify to her own rape by his hand! Beware the policer of tones; they are cops, thus complicit in rape! Coleridge was a rapist by proxy and politique; i.e., his own reputation as a poet laureate and famous literary critic whitewashing and colonizing Gothic⁴⁸⁶ was no different than Roger Ebert's Pulitzer-winning rape apologia; re: DARVO obscurantism enacting "boundaries for me, not for thee!" White straight guys are the most privileged by the system, hence the biggest hypocrites.

As we've been hinting at, then, this fatal moderacy and consequent normalization stems from a heteronormative prudishness that Jameson borrowed from Coleridge (without the laudanum). That's the point of my book—to collectively demonstrate the sex-positive/class-conscious potential of iconoclastic sex worker imageries; i.e., in spite of professed knowing-betters like Coleridge trying to stay sober/steer away from whores by segregating them during the abjection process. To reverse abjection, we must in effect "summon the whore." This includes as a subject of study but also any who historically studied them with contempt; i.e., while dealing with accommodated intellectuals like Jameson having zero punk energies to begin with, xenophiles must do our collective best to manifest good praxis under Gothic Communism without decaying our punk selves!

Except, we've already spanked Jameson—and we'll get to Coleridge in just a second—but first, what about those whores, again? How do we summon them, Ed Zachary?

To summon the whore as Lewis did is to summon the Medusa as echoes of a Communist Numinous raped by capital before it was fully conceived; i.e., through older undead, demonic and animals forms of policing nature that Coleridge and company aided and abetted. Through a combined, transgenerational effect on the public imagination, our archaeologies should work "in tune" against capital's self-styled bards; i.e., by speaking to systemic trauma in ways Coleridge couldn't monopolize; e.g., with his 1796 "Eolian Harp" gentrifying poetry as Britain's rock 'n roll of the times, effectively abjecting what Rudolph Otto's 1917 The Idea of the Holy would call "the Numinous" 150+ years after Burke's much-touted Sublime (from A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, 1757) tried to hog the stage (source: Simon Morley's "A Short History of the Sublime," 2021); re: as something to dismantle in opposition to Capitalism's bad-faith copies, but also steal back those who are too prosy and chaste to get down in the trenches (so to speak) and tell beautiful, dark, sexy and splendid "lies" (as Walpole did, in 1764, and Matthew Lewis, in 1794).

Po-tay-toh, po-tah-toh. Application through hindsight trumps dry historical documentation, atomized theory and praxial inertia. The Numinous, then, is a decayed idea of the Sublime that speaks to capital back then and now as having decayed into hyperobject abstractions; i.e., what Coleridge tried to deny by pimping nature and the Numinous into what he preferred (the Romantics didn't actually call themselves "the Romantics," anymore than the Beats called themselves "the Beats").

Yet, such succubean darkness visible also isn't false or true, but both as half-real, onstage and off; i.e., xenophilic demons, undead and animal whores comprising a collective pedagogy of the oppressed—specifically that of sex workers (though Capitalism sexualizes all workers to some degree or another): as old friends who speak from us through a reimagined past that feels ready to change back into itself, like an exciting dream that never quite was but could someday be! Numinous is hauntological and, when summoning the demon slut, can hoist the champions of the Sublime on their puny petards!

Here's an example, with Krispy and I:

(exhibit 60e1: Model and artist: Krispy Tofuuu and Persephone van der Waard. This piece explores subverting demonic summoning and torture during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., the

succubus being identified from the Renaissance period well into the Romantic era as an Enlightenment continuation of what became the femme fatale of future times regressing harmfully backwards; re: the Great-Man pimp as threatened by their own outmoded ideas of nature-as-vengeful, hence the usual signature torturers of men of the cloth/reason: the whore's non-white body tempting the Romantic stoic with naughty outlawed Numinous fun!

Numinous ≈ Sublime, then—our summoning of the chonky profligate fucking with rigid applications of these lofty notions like Coleridge's, thus the latter's singular canonizing of such ideological fortresses undermined with our own bodily ones' flexible autonomy and cathartic synthesis; re: of what I call the palliative Numinous, breaking Norton's Imperialism of Theory down versus not just Coleridge, but those unironically riding his dick! The future can't change if our understanding and application of the past is frozen in defense of the state as Sublime, Numinous, whatever!

[artist: Krispy Tofuuu]

To it, Krispy's another black rabbit to Numinously pursue in the wake of state prows and their historical-material disorders. Hairy and thicc, she chubbily pushes the pursuer as the black rabbit does; i.e., towards new understandings [and applications] of terms like the Numinous and Sublime [whose meaning is not set by white moderate historians playing cop]! If you're not afraid to follow her and be taken for a ride, yourself, then you'll emergence from state spells bearing out/carrying forth healthier means of illustrating Gothic than Coleridge policing the whore for his own gain did! Such is ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., as operating light years beyond Coleridge's narrow lens of a shackled Gothic he could p[r]imp!

Specifically this collage depicts an expression of how Krispy wanted to be portrayed in demonic form, and which I have presented alongside photos of them from a normal sexting session had between us; i.e., I think the latter photos present a cuddly and sweet depiction of Krispy alongside their semi-innocent and non-threatening succubus self: one that dickwads like Jameson and Coleridge would shiver at and dismiss while imagining a preserved paradise bereaved of native, thus Indigenous demons testifying to whorish survival; re: pandemonium without the whore [abjected for a swept brothel converted into a Protestant church, as Coleridge very much argued for]. Genocide is genocide, the ensuing silence speaking volumes through cryptonymy we can reclaim! "She's lost control again!" [Joy Division, 1979] and therein breaks Capitalist Realism on her Aegis! Such graveyards are only bereft if we make them bereft; to give them humanity is to give them space to shake and shout, mid-penetration!

[artist: Krispy Tofuuu]

Specifically Krispy asked the succubus to appear somewhat innocent but also overtly demonic—a paradox, they admitted, but still what they pointedly desired. I think any straddling of the monster language fits with perfectly with canonical subversion; i.e., humanizing the colonized language of persecution against whores by divorcing demonic expression from state violence on the same grander Aegis; re: another rabbit, and a shapely and fuzzy one to boot!

Moreover, the animalistic expression, in this case, pointedly sees Krispy as a human worker through the demonic-human expression of their sexual labor—not as something to exploit, but to appreciate and understand; i.e., as human beyond Enlightenment constraints like Coleridge's own Gothic pretensions. In other words, Krispy's monster and human sides belong to the same worker and should be valued and appreciated accordingly.)

As something to summon to scare canon's champions, Sex Positivity exhibits Gothic art unafraid of sexuality as something to reify in culture forms; i.e., any that reunite workers with what is lost—the dead, but also the natural world before exploitation as something to reimagine and speak about, mid-synthesis.

As stated during my PhD and manifesto, our aim isn't a regression away from technology but a xenophilic means of rearranging material conditions through the Superstructure as plastic; i.e., my art combined with the art of others—be they separate drawings or drawings by me of models personifying various monstrous concepts and brands in iconoclastic ways—that celebrates sex positivity's ability to generate "parallel" societies that, if not "outside the crypt" then at least leading in that direction; re: away from worker trauma through dark, radical empathy in older forms of drug-like poetics chronotopes, hauntologies and cryptonymies echoing trauma as something to cryptomimetically play with; e.g., Krispy's delicious body filling that role nicely! "No, I've never seen anyone like you before—not while I was awake, anyway!" Matilda's a thicc demon, and Cristobel's got cushion for the pushin'! Summon whore; open "doors of perception" wider than the gates of Hell, green eggs and ham to chagrin Coleridge with! "Stare and tremble" at this, dickhead!

(artist: Krispy Tofuuu)

This chasing happens generally through spaces and occupants that—like a dead mall or Gothic castle—teach one to think differently about nature and sex as already-colonized, especially monstrous-feminine sexual labor (female or not) as something thoroughly ignored or dismissed by the sexually-estranged (which Coleridge totally was). When viewed, occupied or felt, parallel "archaeologies" reassemble the reimagined past changing through altered states of empathy as Numinous perception to a matter of degree; i.e., digging it up again and again and again, mid-live-burial, to better teach viewers to avoid Capitalism's myriad mind traps, menticides, and ignominious deaths: summoning the whore to humanize her harvesting by men like Coleridge "calling dibs," then thirsting after Cristobel's peach behind Victorian buffers they anticipated and installed for their own delight.

Victory takes time, and exposed to the lessons we teach while camping the ghosts of cops like Coleridge dick-riding himself, the next generation can learn to imagine something better than any of us have; i.e., doing so to change how future individuals perceive/experience sex work, thus all work and how its various chronotopic intersections, hauntological variants and cryptonymic trauma markers paradoxically survive and exchange under Capitalism as something such illustrations of mutual consent aid in subverting: as a liminal position that can shift towards Communism through such summoning as phenomenological.

Rebellion, then is a constant hermeneutic means of freeing one's emotions/mind through the very things that shape it inside the material world. In turn, breaking the mint starts with imagination as informed by past media as rerouted, moving away from harmful, dated counterfeits that alienate/divide in favor of sex-positive dated counterfeits; e.g., the futurist Utopia, the retro-future, the fantasy in outer space, but also the various uniforms and disguises found within them—the wizards, witches, Jedi, and so on compromising Wordsworth's language of the Poet told to the common man, who, while "closer to nature by Wordsworth's measure, tends to speak in the language of their class. Our Romantic friend, though he didn't realize it, was inadvertently advocating for compound rebellion, allowing for middle-class revolutionaries to speak to the common person in modified language that nevertheless spoke to both differently.

To that, this chasing the whore brings us to Coleridge as something rather bitter to chase with sweeter tinctures. He lived to old age, and wrote about loftier things while Goya screamed about the horrors of war and Lewis giggled about gay Madonnas ripping evil monks apart:

(artist: Washington Allston)

Kathryn Kummer notes that Wordsworth's partner in crime, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, "believes that common language [did] not apply to all classes; and therefore, should not be practiced" (source: British Literature Wiki, "Preface to Lyrical Ballads," 2018). Then again, Coleridge couldn't write poetry after he stopped doing laudanum (a tincture of alcohol and cocaine) and—as we acknowledged in our thesis volume:

Coleridge achingly bemoaned the presence of Matthew Lewis' The Monk having been written by a MP (Member of Parliament). He looked down on the Gothic as "cheap" and base, like spitting off a bridge to try and communicate grand ideas (as Dale Townshend once told me in class; "his Gothic cathedrals were envisioned as holy and filled with light"—to which I replied that Coleridge was merely pissing in the wind [relative to the rise of impolite forms of counterculture]. Dale merely shook his head and grumbled at my contribution). Or as London Skoffler writes, Coleridge may have used Gothic elements in his writing, but he would have been vehemently opposed to this suggestion. He criticized Gothic literature, specifically the sexually charged story The Monk by Gregory Matthew Lewis, as corrupting and perverse (Townshend). So why was Christabel so sexual? Perhaps, as Ann Radcliffe says of terror and horror, it is because Coleridge did not graphically depict his characters' actions. Instead, he only hinted at what may have happened.

Coleridge leaves a lot of interpretation up to his readers, forcing them to use his beloved imagination, to decide for themselves (source: "Coleridge's Gothic Romanticism," 2019).

In other words, Coleridge was a privileged nerd who—like Jameson's latter-day dismissal of the Gothic, but also Austen's parody of it or Radcliffe's "armoring" in more delicate novels—was heavily predisposed to prescribing proper modes of sexual expression: veils. Not only does doing so cater to the status quo (which will sexualize the veil anyways); it remains inadequate from a holistic, dialectical-material point-of-view (which Gothic Communism demands) [source].

To be frank, refusing to look at something "improper"—and by extension playing with and examining it—makes you increasingly ignorant and stupid; i.e., from Coleridge to Jameson to Botting about capital and the natural world and things "of nature" to whore out. They're the statues with blind eyeballs, but nonetheless thinking they're right, correct, noble, and good, etc (meaning on the side of the Patriarchy/God and capital-by-another name—the Sublime, Utopia⁴⁸⁷ and so on)!

Call it what you want; a pimp is a pimp, a Pygmalion always looking to pimp (thus rape) Galatea/nature-as-monstrous-feminine for profit! ACAB, cops and capital; APAB, meaning pimps, Pygmalions, prudes and profit—i.e., they'll invent whatever they like/summon whatever they want to have control over whatever they deem inferior to themselves, the whore's revenge being to break that perceived superiority by developing Gothic Communism to emasculate such Cartesian, heteronormative and settler-colonial structures and temples, one and all! Fuck 'em and their prescriptions of wandering womb and bicycle face sully Gothic: "Look, something I can pimp and control under my own tentative position!" Being prudish and sanctimonious in one's colonizer position doesn't erase what it functionally is!

Furthermore, doing so makes you liable to get hurt or deprives you of an enriched existence, the Gothic seemingly saying over and over to any who will heed the whore, "What was that? Maybe you should go and check..."; or "Try this out—it's really fun!" or "Where do monsters come from and what are they for?" Beware the uncurious, but also those who prepare a myopic, "correct" way of looking at things that abjects everything else; i.e., the reactionary attacking you, the moderate speaking for you instead versus listening to you, or the corporate hack/academic bigwig selling you fake monster copies and passing them off as "doing their part and yours." Pure, xenophobic claptrap. Per Castricano, playing with the dead as not infallible gods is how we learn from the past; i.e., by not denying our impulses, thus what makes us human: our empathy towards those policed together under the same shadowy crimes that white supremacists like Coleridge apologized bigotedly for without fail; re: gagging Medusa behind an English hyperreal façade.

Christ, enough about snobs! Let's close out this short chapter with some food for thought (four pages), then segue into the Demon Module's conclusion (thus that of the entire Monster Volume)!

First, rebellion is whorish, thus fun; i.e., as Catherine Spooner rightly points out in her 2017 book, Post-Millennial Gothic: Comedy, Romance and the Rise of Happy Gothic—meaning "fun with monsters." Where all monsters operate as pimps or whores to some degree (as I argue), they can be consequently and performatively transformed through function; i.e., as things to play with and learn from in fresh xenophilic, even "necrophilic" ways; re: the Medusa, among other things, is a zombie, but looks can be deceiving on either side of a larger cryptomimetic refrain: slated for domination, but challenging that on the usual surfaces and buffered thresholds' recursive returns to old graves (malls or otherwise!

(artist: Mari Sappho)

This often, I would add, happens musically and to mounting degrees of descriptive sexuality and all-around prurience (a concept we'll explore more of in Volume Three, Chapter One); it can also be an operatic way of gradually bringing people out of state-imposed culture shock, thus pacification and xenophobia—i.e., doing so by waking them up like Morpheus did to Neo; re: regarding nature as already raped and dead behind the decaying illusions housing the latter's caged brain as mall-like: by opening their minds, meaning to the possibility that the whore isn't a figment of one's imagination at all, but instead needs to be summoned repeatedly and heeded to break Capitalist Realism with!

"Once more unto the breach!" Even if that means about talking about impolite things or scary ideas (re: the mall is dead into the future), it must be done because our entire existence is impolite in state eyes pimp the monstrous-feminine whore of nature; i.e., once damning evidence comes to light about the falseness of state and state proponent alike—and "sets" the reluctant public's assigned saviors' reputations, at the very least, "on fire" for fun—it should nonetheless be done as many times as needed to raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and awareness to new states of maturity concerning profit, thus genocide. This goes above and beyond old dead dinosaurs like Coleridge or Jameson, and threatens more active and currently harmful people like Ian Kochinski; i.e., pimping the usual victims under capital that his forebears did (we'll discuss the corrupting influence of perfidious "allies" like Kochinski and others, in Volume Three, Chapter Four).

However, I also think that (a)sexuality as liberated in revolutionary language interrogating the whore's trauma to human the harvest (thus expose the state as inhumane) needs to be weighed and considered; i.e., through its surface level and deeper dialectical-material context as part of the same summoning cycle. What's legit and what ain't? Is it "politeness-trapping" if you mention sex in a seemingly private discussion weighed upon by commonplace public attitudes; i.e., even if that private place in a graduate-level classroom at MMU where your tenured professor is talking about the size of Satan's cock according to Ira Levin, and a sudden mention of personal anecdotes in relation to one's own sex life causes people to freeze like statues? Are these boobies being sold to you for profit tied to a famous franchise known for having them in cartoonish ways? Or are they opening up your mind provided you know how to think about them, sexually and asexually?

(artist: Blazbaros)

This conversation must happen dialectically according to opposing material forces that already exist punching down at the alien whore of nature; i.e., as something to preemptively attack again out of deliberately misguided state arguments for revenge (re: false flags). Regardless, a common enemy of effective sex-positive education isn't just the powers-that-be (or lateral extensions of them and their influence), but also cognitive estrangement as a buffer created by moderate, cowardly and power-abusive academics; re: Foucault, Sartre and Beauvoir occupying the same problematic register as Coleridge and Jameson; i.e., any prospecting imperialist keen "to call dibs/plant flags," but also open-to-the-public whiners like Coleridge clutching their pearls and wringing their hands. Bent on cataloging knowledge through safe, accommodated, monasterial formalities, this abstraction of ideas doesn't actually challenge the status quo; it's a failure of iconoclastic praxis on their part! One might even argue "on purpose," insofar as results trump intent (the latter used to cloak bad actors with)! Just look around you at the dead malls we whores call home to see how wrong men like Coleridge are, regardless of intent. It literally doesn't matter save as something to navigate during the cryptonymy process reversing abjection!

By defending their own reputations and positions as accommodated intellectuals, any so-called "auteur" can demonstrate how their current positions matter more to them than distributing useful knowledge to a larger working audience. Good praxis is less about teaching them to think for themselves—i.e., foregoing xenophilia through the suitably chaotic ways of synthesized praxis that help liberate worker minds—and more speaking as the whore does to the targets of dead dogma: in naked-not-naked ways that people actually think, feel, create, consume, and process information with. Whether intentional or not, this functionally amounts to class betrayal if such things are pimped. It also extends to canonical auteurs with revolutionary ideas—meaning those who sometimes need a little help from their employees to seemingly appear better than they actually are; i.e., from those they're pimping or otherwise bossing around: a warlord canonizing his own half-real Pygmalion fantasies, onstage and off!

George Lucas, for example, explained how Star Wars famously took anti-totalitarian/anti-American ideas and communicated them to an American audience (re: AMC+'s "George Lucas on Star Wars

Being Anti-Authoritarian," 2018). What Lucas left out of the narrative is how Mark Hamill and company hated his original dialog—so much so, in fact, that they used to joke about tying Lucas up before forcing him to read his own lines at gunpoint: "George, who talks like this?" Hamill would exclaim, on Johnny Carson in 1977 (Game's Radar, 2017). The lines were changed, saving the film (according to Hamill; the latter-day prequels did fairly well despite their ropey script, but also rode on the coattails of a billion-dollar franchise personally directed by Lucas at the helm—"billionaire Marxism," in other words). Yet, there's still "no underwear in space," Lucas would argue; i.e., cultivating whatever double standards he tended to in his own canon's pastoral (e.g., bikinis, above being curiously allowed because Carrie Fisher [echoes of Mark Fisher] was the director's Galatea to groom, festoon and pimp as he chose, not her). But workers and their relationships nonetheless trumped singular men, mid-praxis! For good or ill, Lucas relied on his workers to tell whatever story all of them had in mind!

As such, there won't be too much name-dropping in Volume Three (well, maybe a little bit). Instead, the arguments contained therein take academic ideas, communicating their gnosis as accessibly as possible without sacrificing the overall message. Doing so, said volume concerns praxis, thus marries academic ideas to sexually descriptive, xenophilic dialogs between real-world people synthesizing praxis; re: doing so how people actually talk and strut their stuff (the whore's paradox). Such quests for the Communist Numinous include

- making Gothic art (thus arguments) about sex work; i.e., as a wonderful thing that has become loaded with systemic trauma (of class, culture and race betrayals), said liberation by us seeking not to separate them, but liberate sex work (thus all work): as a poetically enriching activity inside the dead mall of capital's token frontiers—with us sharing said space with our foes while distancing ourselves from trauma, onstage and off, during the rememory and cryptonymy process' calculated risk!
- responding to popular media (thus Gothic poetics) about sex and trauma in various creative ways; i.e., which then involve theatrically guerrilla (counterterrorist) exchanges of labor commonplace under Capitalism, and which recursively illustrate mutual consent during ludo-Gothic BDSM's own dialectical-material context!
- less rehabilitating canonical monsters, and more rescuing their whore/pimp aesthetic from a colonized xenophobic; i.e., as Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism continues to develop, describing a kind of "monster war" occurring between Capitalist and Commie variants of the Numinous as dualistic.

As we said at the very start of the Monster Volume, monsters cannot be destroyed, only repurposed towards different aims. For the state, a particular arrangement will always come back, and for proletarian forms—the proverbial spectres of Marx—such arguments are equally die-hard. We must replace the former with the latter during our own cryptomimesis, thereby camping canon to challenge Capitalist Realism in our own daily lives; i.e., camping the twin trees of Capitalism during oppositional synthesis and its praxial catharsis, which confront and dismantle state trifectas, monopolies and trauma, but also bad echoes (e.g., skinheads originally being punks that decayed into Neo-Nazis). They echo us, and we echo them, our own cryptonymy opposing theirs in the same grander chambers thereof! A mall is just a castle to court however hauntologically we wish, doubling in liminal duality ever onwards through ergodic motion and labor tied to nature and the imaginary past!

(artist: Armored Elf)

So forget/forgo monopolies; the elite and their servants (moderate or not) are dangerously cut off, beyond accommodated intellectuals and extending reactionarily through holistic tokenism through hard and soft power ranging from the CIA and World Economic Forum to a legion of apologists and not-far-enough dickheads like Jameson and Coleridge devaluing what Lewis, Radcliffe, Shelley and others touched upon before Marx and Engels blazed their own trail glazing Medusa's asshole (while Freud and a ton of other white supremacists leading up to Jameson and others like him who turned a blind eye towards Medusa; re: prefaced by Coleridge and other gentrified fucks who could afford to willfully obtuse/morally superior to the whore's they pimped in some shame or form): always hungry for tribute!

(artist: Lera)

When humanizing harvest, then, it ain't over 'til it's over! So when the Man comes around, show him your Aegis—meaning to whatever degree of show and conceal you prefer using your own restless labyrinths' Xs marking the spot (to hit the castle-in-the-flesh where it hurts and/or feels good, above)! Regardless of the senses being invoked, the whore is always a martyr to camp martyrdom with playful psychosexual forms that reliably get people's attention. Using ludo-Gothic BDSM, we experience more per sense than those "in the cave" can imagine with all five of them. For Coleridge and similar Pygmalions, anything that doesn't match their previous Omelas is garbage. Fuck that noise (which we'll get to, in Volume Three); better to be a scoundrel and die with one's dignity intact—i.e., fighting for a worthy cause like universal liberation; e.g., Berlin from Money Heist (below, 2019)—than to be the state's usual pimp or token whore (the classic antifascist vs fascist refrain)! No pasarán! Ciao, bella, ciao!

James Baldwin once said, "You think your pain and your heartbreak are unprecedented in the history of the world, but then you read. It was books that taught me that the things that tormented me most were the very things that connected me with all the people who were alive, who had ever been alive." To those who came before, those who are, or those of future generations exploited by Capitalism and its masters—this next volume is entirely for you. May it lead you out of the darkness of the crypt and into a better world, one you imagine for yourselves without worker trauma, abuse, or sexual exploitation; i.e., a parody not just of the Pygmalion legend but also Beauvoir's lolita syndrome revived through Re-animator or Frankenstein's liminal, dualistic satire of the Renaissance man; e.g., from Hamlet to Faust to Da Vinci himself being a queer-coded deviant with some truth to it (from necrophile to pedophile, vis-à-vis mad science [and hate crimes, sexual assault] walking the tightrope between what is ethical and what gains entry to forbidden knowledge through notably unethical means; re: acquiring freshly-dead corpses in a time of religious hegemony and enforcement versus the master/apprentice argument being its own form of secularized Promethean-to-Faustian dogma to instill and enact against Humanity and nature for the state).

And as you imagine a post-scarcity planet through your own labor exchanges, remember that we—those who came before you and the ruins of our mighty nostalgic splendor (re: Krispy and their formidable Aegis/a nice Galatean bow to put on the present from the past we give to you)—are by your side; i.e., watching over you as you grow into the people you were always meant to be! As you follow us into Hell as ushered back into your home during the Imperial Boomerang bringing the bunny home to roost, fear no evil for we are with you; re: laying eggs like Yoshi the dragon to give you weird-ass superpowers, floating through the warm cold of space; i.e., with our "lunar orbs," below, giving you extra 1-Ups, during ludo-Gothic BDSM! Pathological transubstantiation, from autopsy to rehabilitation, it's a miracle! That's no moon, it's a space station, but one privateered by Medusa's children and their Aegises felt on a traveling motherland: a boat of whores echoing the Big Whore! "Oh, what a time we had / Livin' underground / I move to station number five / See you next time around!" re: Montrose's "[Space Station No.5," 1973]. Hell, as authored by us, awaits!

The Caterpillar and the Wasp; or, What's to Come

"You are no longer butterflies. You. Are. MURDERFLIES!"

—Brock Samson, The Venture Bros. (2003)

I originally wrote this conclusion in April 2024; i.e., in the spirit of camping medieval poetics, and to cap this volume off with one that suits its unique (sui generis) Humanities flavor. A tip of the spear, the iceberg, the penis—I now want to close the book on the Monster Volume, doing so with a poetic apologia to whores. As part of that whole, I shall do so in defense of nature as monstrous-feminine (suitably written last in my usual backwards process: from Medusa to "Monsters, Magic and Myth" to this); i.e., from the egg-laying Hares of Easter (and Giger's own surreal version) comes another hauntological throwback to evoke during ludo-Gothic BDSM: the caterpillar and the wasp as aliens to hug during said dialectic.

Earlier in this series, we discussed Gothic Communism and caterpillars; i.e., a wasp eating a caterpillar to develop Gothic Communism (re: "My Quest Began with a Riddle"). And if that seems totally gross, just imagine a big fat, super-cute caterpillar eating a leaf instead of a wasp eating a caterpillar ("Om nom nom!"). Yet even that is terrifying for the imagination-starved when it involves their home as something to permanently change. For them, any change is radical change, radical change death, and death nothing to them; i.e., they're menticed, deprived of the medieval (thus Gothic) power needed to use their imaginations to liberate themselves with (re: Coleridge). Canonized as such, the Gothic merely becomes another means of raising harmful boundaries, caterpillars included.

Except, the inverse is true when the Gothic does what it historically has always done: resist canonization ("I am become death!" the little guy squeaks, "destroyer of worlds!"). Armed with proper vision, the way through the maze suddenly becomes clear as crystal: through intersectional solidarity—as devils writing our own fate (versus masters of the state, or moderates like Jameson tragically sealing worker fates to benefit the state while posing as rebels). To escape, we whores again have to imagine the future of a past that was tragically cut short by capital, thus making it a past-past; i.e., one that tragically never was but could be if we only opened our minds and, far from hauntologically canceling the future, instead used it to free our minds (as my arguments demonstrate, duality applying to all Four Gs; i.e., our oppositional doubles resonating with me as something to impart to future workers).

Of this whore's revenge, two things:

One, the Gothic has power through creation as largely imaginary but still half-real. Again, I get furious when anyone says otherwise; i.e., that the Gothic has "no power" to "actually challenge" (meaning actually threaten) established canonical norms and material conditions; re (from "Modularity and Class"):

This is why I get really mad when anyone says the Gothic has "no power," thus no way to "actually challenge"—meaning "actually threaten"—established canonical norms (or that only certain voices have the "right stuff" to speak to power—i.e., academics; e.g., Sorcha Ní Fhlainn, who we'll discuss in a moment). Like, it's only the power of creation as historically devoted to upending the status quo. No big deal, totally unrelated (sarcasm)!

The fact remains that if the Gothic didn't have power then the state wouldn't regulate illusions, including monsters, as things to play with and perform through paradox; they wouldn't acknowledge it or waste their time with neoliberal cages (re: academia) sequestering such voices to a privileged few as hoarding knowledge: in a rat-race "fame game" first, helping people outside academia a distance second (or fourth). As such, people who attack the Gothic unironically (or restrict it to/only contribute towards hopelessly patrician discourse) likewise uphold Capitalism unironically, contributing to its defense (and often in bad faith). [...] Words are easy to find if you have imagination, especially if your imagination isn't myopic thanks to Capitalist Realism. The way out is inside, using imagination through Gothic poetics to set ourselves free (source).

The Gothic's power stems and thrives from its historically dualistic ability to create things that question and upend canonical norms (and ostensibly immutable) godly positions ipso facto; i.e., through medieval poetics, hence imagination, as various critical lenses (and theories) working in service to workers, namely whores and their revenge. Whereas serfs formerly challenged the Divine Right of Kings, we whores can challenge the state now and all its defenders; i.e., by using the Gothic as a powerful option for universal liberation: by bursting bubbles as whores do, teaching others how to love with—you guessed it—caterpillars and wasps.

The idea, then, surely isn't "vote with our wallets" because voting under Capitalism is a rigged problem; i.e., it's bourgeois politics that serve profit through a) the commodifying of struggles in canonical media, and b) established systems rigged against the oppressed. Their advocacy is de facto. Also, contrary to what the commercialized monomyth might have taught you, the quest for a better world generally happens in ways that have absolutely nothing to do with profit at all; e.g., videogames can inspire us through home entertainment, but these are classically pacification devices geared towards the American middle class/nuclear model; i.e., the abject counterfeit, not its ghost! We have a right to do this because we, as workers, have a right to exist regardless of what the state thinks; i.e., to enact the whore's revenge through reclaimed terror language they cannot monopolize, mid-paradox.

To it, the state is not all-powerful and it has no logical claim to our bodies, labor or lives; the poetics (and their infinite forms) used to describe these struggles and conditions likewise belong to us as struggling to be free—to transform from the state's false chrysalises, thus become true to ourselves and our right as natural, unalienable monstrous-feminine fuck toys: the butterflies we're meant to become by taking our habitat back from them; re (from "A Song Written in Decay"):

Re: our "Teaching" refrain, the caterpillar and the wasp. Jadis often had to explain to children about the short lifespan of butterflies—that they wake up, eat and eat and eat, take a dump and fall asleep, wake up as a butterfly and bone until they croak: "That's not so bad, is it?" she'd ask them. But furthermore, they have the right to be butterflies, even if for a moment or never but trying to break free under false chrysalises arresting their development (which, for humans, is partly self-authored). The undead struggle—to survive and become what we're meant to be in opposition to the state rotting us—is ultimately what matters (source).

However cute or silly a caterpillar may seem, then, its entire existence remains predicated on struggle as built into the natural world and the material world as informed by human struggles adopting natural ones to essentialize one of two things; re: workers or the state, ludo-Gothic BDSM designed to give workers power though playing with heavily controlled substances.

Regardless of monstrous type, there is no in-between; the state is always hungry for more than its fair share. By seeking cryptonymies to resist their options of raping us, we're fighting back whether we want to or not. By fighting back at all, our existence becomes ironic to the state's idealization of workers as completely alien and fetishized (for them to rape by design); i.e., our Halloween-candy alienation and fetishization as reclaimed, hence what terrifies the elite to no end: no more free food. They cry in anguish, "God forbid!" and short their circuits/shit their pants. Such is the Aegis in our hands (the page after next).

(artist: Cavity Colors)

Gothicists play with their food. Yet while this defense of caterpillars becoming murderflies might seem quaint, horrifying and bizarre, all of this fortunately means that—like The Last Unicorn's wayward magician—we have all the power we need if only we dare look for it; re: "There is no Robin Hood. Robin Hood is a myth; we are the reality!" To it, the magic chose the form, not us; but we are still the bearer, dwelling and messenger from whose tendrils it springs from. "Magic, do as you will!" then, becomes a merry-go-round statement of see-sawing clichés, fetishes, and delights in duality's liminal expression:

"That's what heroes are for!"

For us, that means not just transforming to hide from power but dueling with our own weaponized whore's potential for class, culture and race war leveled against state forms whilst on the beaches (above). We're not just in it for ourselves as individual, atomized agents, then, but fighting while entrenched as an intersectional, solarized collective's pedagogy of the oppressed living in the shadow of state violence; i.e., for those we love as harmed by the state and its insane, all-consuming greed—in short, by fighting back with all the irony and power of a pissed-off unicorn.

All history is writ in class struggle, Marx argued, which I extend to monster whores and pimps fighting for worker rights vs state's rights. It's essentially the basic same idea, but gayer and more inclusive, thus more sex-positive than Marx was; i.e., as determined by our bargains giving and taking while camping his ghost through various inclusions he seldom explored, himself. In doing so, we live in the long shadows that men like him cast, but camp said shadows with our own awesome tools; i.e., whatever the register or form, flow (of power) determines function, not aesthetic. Development concerns combative redistribution, one whose oscillating flow happens dualistically during a constant, tenebrous, liminal game of push-pull: the Gothic's reclamation unfolding inside shared shadowy zones of performance; i.e., including of (and with) our monstrous-feminine bodies, labor and Gothic poetic expression taking power anisotropically back for us from the state, during ludo-Gothic BDSM!

This forbidden exchange/feeding and radically transformative trauma's strange appetites extend to caterpillars and butterflies or some other such "harmless" thing (a grub-like cock, blow) taking its power back by refusing to be stepped on/cannibalized by wasps (except in the ways it wants; i.e., "rape/death") play as a reversal of the state's harmful forms to empower ourselves with; e.g., size difference in terms of bodies, but also genitals—power to be near and seize for profound, often hilarious⁴⁸⁸ contrast): a dog with a bone, a magician with a wand wielding great cryptonymy reversing abjection on the Aegis!

(artists: Bay and Beat)

So do we whores fight for and love each other because we're all we've got; i.e., as whores, we keep each other's secrets and give each other comfort during existence as fundamentally imperiled; e.g., as Indigenous, queer and/or disabled (all of which the state will pimp inside the same modular-but-intersecting persecution networks).

For us, life under capital equals a constant, ancient struggle of survival and brothel espionage under police duress inside state shadows; i.e., protection and shelter as things the state cannot give us, because its own advertised protectors of workers actually place property before people; re: there must always be a slave, thus a whore to pimp, the wasp side of the terrorist/counterterrorist exchange enslaving state prey to eat as such. Except, while canon speaks to wasps eating us alive, the anisotropic nature of duality also concerns the iconoclastic ability for "two can play at that game." By swapping roles—which is easy enough to do, mid-cryptonymy—workers can cuckoo the state; i.e., as the wasp eating the latter's grubs parasitically from within! Brutal.

As such, the whore having Medusa's revenge against profit (thus the state and its brothels) speaks to workers as "mad, bad and dangerous to know" in the eyes of such bad actors! To it, we're the creatures of the night unchained—the forces of darkness taking back what's ours through cute terror and squeaky "doom" to joust in competition against its regular instruments of profit (token or not); i.e., with the state, not ourselves: agency as a right its armies and agents cannot permanently invade and coerce! Keeping with that, we'll rob Churchill's corpse blind and declare, "We will never surrender!"

⁴⁸⁸ Re: This Is Spinal Tap—with the midgets and the model of Stonehenge failing Scott's forced perspective trick in Alien (using his sons to make his "Space Jockey" seem bigger); but also the Game Grumps' "John Boner": "There's no jizz but what we make for ourselves!" The medieval loves prurient, juvenile humor (dick jokes being a classic pun that hyphenates with so many poetic devices).

Power then, is an illusion that, when harnessed by us through an iconoclastic Gothic's paradoxes, oxymorons and mixed metaphors, collectively helps our shackles disappear (whores of the world, unite); i.e., a mind prison having raped our brains for so long (through Capitalist Realism) suddenly evaporating like Radcliffe's veiled banditti. Because those mental chains fetter our ability to imagine anything better while we're alive, we must target them deliberately whenever able; i.e., to lose those chains is to make the dream of a better world, mid-crisis, become lucid; re: insofar as Gothic poetics regularly manifest in day-to-day conversations and operations, all the time.

Suitably half-real, the mode's monstrous-feminine arguments can be seen in the meta dialogs taking place. In turn, however silly or serious those are, they take hammers (force, below) to break and rebuild a harmful way of thinking (about nature, labor and sex) that—like a bone set wrong—will definitely hurt to reconfigure. Furthermore, it can affect how we think, thus see and experience the world as we're born into its harmful, state-appointed roles. Equally terrifying—as we operate on ourselves—is the Gothic at large; i.e., writ in feelings of prolonged obscurity and disintegration inherited near Promethean power sources: the Imperial Core, whose operating on can feel a bit like do-it-yourself brain surgery (to attack the state is to attack a false and harmful sense of self inside-outside ourselves)!

(artist: Bob Camp)

And it kind of is (similar to how the Gothic is "almost holy"), except our procedures aren't mutilative and invasive like actual lobotomies. They just feel that way because the state wants them to; i.e., how scared people view what we do as criminally and terminally insane. To this, pro-state workers can often still imagine; they just can't imagine a better world than Capitalism because it forces them, through material things that affect their vision to work and work and work until they drop dead, and to see work and enslavement as "life" and liberation as "death," unthinkable, nothing to them.

As if! High in my tower above the clouds, I'm the sassy Lady of Shallot—a cushy medievalist who has the option to imagine a better world. In turn, why not grant this option (thus vision) to others using what they have to wage counterterror purely by virtue of performing liberation; i.e., as already terrifying to the state? We have nothing to lose and everything to gain by making them shit their pants (thus ready to take our demands seriously and at face value). We tilt at vague ephemeral windmills, but are onto something big: two hyperobjects, thus two ouroborotic giants locked in perpetual argument, contest, a duel for supremacy! Communism and Capitalism never stop fighting!

By comparison, pro-state thinkers include moderates like Jameson (whose service to the state is fascism-in-disguise); i.e., menticed fools defending the state through DARVO by seeing it as the caterpillar⁴⁸⁹ just eating the leaf and us as an evil wasp up to no good (ignoring the fact that wasps eat/are part of nature, too). Their compromises and lack of healthy vision put the chains back on themselves and us. The ticket, then, is emancipation of the mind and body together through Gothic. If one starts, the other will follow hand-in-hand (with polyamorous love unafraid to make friends of all sorts—for sex, but also general companionship and inspiration, ace or otherwise; all contribute towards a better future).

(artists: Bay)

Our focus is obviously the Superstructure. Let's take what this volume has discussed, the monstrous past, and bring it into the future still yet to arrive: our own "ode to Psyche," synthesizing praxis Gothic Communism is not a quick way out, because we are not trying to escape our home, but rather seek to transform it inside of itself (often in concentric, anisotropic miniature); but Gothic Communism is a way through Capitalism while inside it and using all the arrows of our proverbial quiver's disposal, during revolution as historically ergodic. We want to speak to others, including straight allies, in language they are given as we are, thus more prone to understand from us transmuting dogma by camping it as queer people/whores do. There's always a medieval element at play.

As such, I could quote acts of chivalric bravery in the face of dragons: "Still one more life of pain; cut well, old friend, and then farewell!" Except, Capitalism (and its Realism) are not so much a dragon to slay at all, but transform into our home, thus us and our surroundings with it; i.e., of our home as draconian and ⁴⁸⁹ "You're not a leaf!" Jadis would cutely say about caterpillars, impersonating one that would try and nibble through her skin and then decide not to once it recognized what it was chewing through. They loved caterpillars, but also thought Ray Kurzweil was onto something. The technological singularity is wishful thinking and it struck me as profoundly odd that someone who championed nature also wanted to one day become a robot who would have no biology or feelings to speak of. They became a state-sanctioned executioner of nature less by working as an exterminator as a local job (animal control is humane, insofar as population control helps lessen animal suffering thanks to human interference).

To better protect nature and ourselves, the idea is to be active with what we have during asymmetrical warfare, synthesizing praxis by raising emotional/Gothic intelligence and class cultural awareness using paradox ("darkness visible"). The rest will fall into place, one generation at a time.

whose ownership/status is largely a matter of perception. Jameson was right, insofar the present space and time is the only place we have, except he was wrong as well; it's one one to alter however we wish by using whatever we can however we can, including a people's cultural understanding of the imaginary past as Gothic would have it. In turn, such slings and arrows of outrageous fortune routinely yield adventuresome roundabouts (ergodic, nonlinear routes) and strings of castles (of castles) that, like any conquest, occur territorially and in sequence; i.e., towards a serendipitous (and handsome) final goal: liberation as attained during class, culture and race conflict as eternal (workers vs the state).

The way forward clearly isn't straightforward (why would it be when the elite use everything they can [always defaulting to violence] to lie, cheat and confuse us?) but the path to take is—the Gothic. Solidarity as monsters is the only would to rule in Hell, versus serve in Heaven. All lie on the same Aegis as contested; i.e., per the medieval, boundaries elide amid historical-material constants. "Death" can be expressed a priori as classically inert, inanimate, but per the Gothic reinvented takes on fresh iconoclastic life; i.e., as challenging the state's canonical ordering of things to avenge ourselves at their loss. The problem with duality (as something to solve and live with, not to discount) is that it cannot be monopolized by anyone any more than violence, terror and morphological expression! Caterpillar and wasps are simply qualities to grant unto whores for a variety of aims, liberation included!

Instead of unironic submission, then, our use of such poetry is diametrically opposed to the state; i.e., by wiggling free of their traps to frustrate them (as guerrillas historically have done, and to which I did with Jadis, arguing against their position with the state through the same basic language). They have their deathly monstrous Trojans and castled walls, as do we; but we're the prisoners of the slave colony and the very alien force whose execution is routinely justified, our death warrant prompted issued by people monopolizing the same poetics for the state; i.e., in defense of it, pimping us one and all.

(artist: Keighla Knight)

Per the abjection process demonizing nature as us-versus-them, monstrous-feminine whore, Gothic canon views us as the alien inside their house; i.e., "the enemy at the gates" rattling Caesar's progeny. So it's time to marshal our forces to better show those pimping us out of revenge that this is our land, thus our bodies, labor and shelter/castles-in-the-flesh (and what is written on said flesh, above, Psyche taking many forms). The state is the ultimate foe, not workers (except traitors, of course, whores policing whores); and the ultimate eternal battle is waged as much in our minds from moment-to-living-moment: as things to project outwards into the material world, on and of our bodies. Whatever occurs/appears, function determines flow and form follows function, letting us play with whatever we want to reverse abjection provided it's sex-positive. That's how the Aegis and ludo-Gothic BDSM work: getting back whatever you put into it (monster love, in my case), love is our revenge, and I love all my friends shown here. They deserve all the hugs I can give!

And if at first you don't succeed, try, try again! "Madness" is a method to repeat, generally built on older attempts⁴⁹⁰ that, when reassembled through habit by creatures thereof, help us see differently regarding liberation as second-nature; i.e., an unchanging goal to move endlessly towards empathy as such. If you don't "get it" in the present moment, you're simply not there yet and might never be. But again, this is a group effort, and one that marshals the willing and eager but also the curious and capable (e.g., herbo Amazons, "chonk, stronk and ready to bonk," as Nyx is): as able to dance with death during sex and war liquified into a class-conscious exchange, mid-duality—a butterfly or wasp inside the grub's cocoon, but also on our grub-like bodies pleading for insertion; i.e., to put us out of our misery! Delicious devastation, see us free!

(artist: Nyx)

Because there isn't a monopoly on such toys—nor their awesomely child-like potential to restore nature by challenging profit and the state to have the whore's revenge—we're dealing in a process that effectively never ends; i.e., in a great Ozymandian Work that less goes on forever unfinished in the bare and level sands, but rather like a breath of fresh air fuels us to keep at it pushing through the dunes: that we can wrestle such things out of bullies' hands to speak for ourselves; re: with our bodies as weapons, thus our sex (and gender trouble) as a flexible social-sexual weapon that helps develop Gothic Communism (and love between workers) in opposition to pro-state forms!

Like Bottom's Dream, the dream of Communism enshrines in us and our friends' shared love; i.e., becoming a rare and fatal thing to drive us "mad," but in ways useful to development in small; e.g., to say her ass looks fat as a compliment she wants to hear (versus a tool of shame) and educate future workers with: Queen Maeb's stellar bedonk, a mirrored moon shining love for all things great and small!

So while a return to balance assisted by oral cultures and technology is hauntological, it isn't centrism provided we cheat the pimp and break their ethnocentric, good/evil refrains tied to Capitalist Realism raping the land! To break said Realism is to free the imagination through love that frees us through those trying to unironically capture us for themselves; e.g., Nyx' ass loving to reclaim anal as a terror weapon (re: "Reclaiming Anal"), but also PIV sex, too!

(artist: Nyx)

Deprivatization happens on the Aegis, Medusa's peach/pie reversing abjection through "pull" towards "land back" as "bodies back," too; i.e., attracting cuties, laying pipe, taking dick, etc, as we make footprints "in the sand" as a kind of delicious waiting for penetration (to savor it, below); re: dots for us to connect with and for others to all bind together because we collectively feel safe by our vision as one in good faith building towards a better tomorrow today looking at the past as Gothic poetry applied to future forms we leave behind: to give as well as receive, versus canon teaching us to fear all forms of exchange, save as taking endlessly from whores to give up to the elite pimping all of nature.

(artist: Nyx)

On and on, beyond our lives and what we can currently see while alive, such "ancient" dereliction bleeds into what others once-alive and alive-again in another world, another time have themselves passed on; i.e., fragments of the Medusa as a creature of chaos that yields many forms for those under solidarity as something to pick up the pieces of and reassemble together across time and space. Giving to a queenly nature feels good, because a nature treated well treats us in kind!

In turn, closeness with Her Majesty is a Numinous feeling and place we occupy together as a collective, holistic matter of conjoined inspiration (a very queer phenomenon): "We may meet in another life, but not again in this one!" Time is a circle, all the Medusa's past forms shine gloriously through in her various avatars posing for the viewer on the Aegis! All our yesterdays become a wall built on trust and selective penetration, the Great Corruptor a healing force destroying that which destroys and imprisons nature-as-whore! The state is incompatible not just with life, but mutual consent as something to illustrate; i.e., the monomyth heroic is always a rapist, the whore always their that we subvert, mid-iconoclasm!

solidarity and, as night follows the day, a pedagogy of the oppressed that is always being added to; i.e., one that fosters universal empathy [for workers and nature, not the state] through praxial catharsis that reclaims whores through monster language: as a humanizing device taken away from Cartesian hegemony during oppositional praxis; re from "[A Song Written in Decay"]: "From most complex to most simple, good praxis requires a successful pedagogy of the oppressed, which requires synthesis, which requires the basics: anger/gossip, monsters and camp.")

Like Henson's fearsome Dark Crystal, such foreboding sight must be seen through strange cartoonish (abstracting) blindfolds that help us avoid, thus see through, Capitalist Realism; i.e., Capitalism alienates and sexualizes everything (re: Marx and I, dancing together). So total liberation, including the imaginary and the sexual, starts with using the "almost holy" paradoxes of the Gothic; re: to weaponize the sexual and the warlike as already canonized in everyday (secular) speech: the world as dying in ways we restore through empathy as equally radical! To stumble upon a whore and befriend is to stumble across a unicorn and suddenly release: they are real, and each once is special!

As such, it's our demon castle and undead army to wage war with, doing so for (a)sexual reasons that include public nudism; i.e., as a classic weapon of the Medusa's virgin/whore, thus caterpillar/wasp; re: Blxxd Bunny loving such abilities, insofar as it gives both them and me power to shape and work with: speaking to "rape" in ancient oral forms bleeding into written ones (this book series a weird hybrid of such exchanges). This, in turn, starts with a caterpillar and wasp (synonymous, for our purposes, with any animal; e.g., the rabbit or turtle, insofar as cryptonymy goes). So let's make them ours by reclaiming the awesome power of the alien, thus of all ludo-Gothic BDSM and the palliative Numinous, and monsters as critical lenses that push capital towards post-scarcity with pre-capitalist nostalgia in demonstrably non-fatal forms; i.e., monsters—whether undead, demonic and/or animalistic—that don't dehumanize (alienate and fetishize) workers the way capital historically-materially does: to land and occupant as monstrous-feminine, thus a trick to turn and build empires that fractally recursively extend the brothel outwards into the universe. From Columbus to Victor Frankenstein to Peter Weyland to Trump to Athetos, a pimp is a pimp, and whores set themselves free by spurning such advances!

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

These communal antipredation maneuvers include whatever sandcastles we build in the beachhead; i.e., each one extending in a dialectical-material series stepping towards something great—meaning asleep and "dead," insofar as it is not truly dead, but a goddess of creation speaking asexually about life/death resurrection and transformative sex work through shared, informed labor exchange (the above video from a commission); i.e., waiting patiently to take shape and wake up—a possible future made through magical assembly, selective absorption, and a confusion of the senses that sing profoundly as a chorus of whores: all part of our Song of Infinity resonating across space and time.

For example, Bunny is ace, thus keen to show the Medusa as not just a dead queen/sexual being for the sake of sexual gratification at all, but likewise someone who has awesome nails, hair and ink while purposefully having surrounded themselves with cozy images of calculated-risk danger and safety (stuffed animals, like sharks and bears, and tattoos of daggers on their skin); i.e., a ludo-Gothic BDSM assemblage that speaks holistically to recovery and liberation—of whores and their liminal expression being part of nature, thus the land and its non-human occupants; re: all from a sample of one, and which our Aegis yields stewardship over the others we protect by taking away the killer's desire to rape such things at all: "I was blind, but now I see!" Such is the Aegis in the proper hands!

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

But the whore out of the closet is still something many people will be unaccustomed to seeing or thinking about Cats will be confused, bussies will be stuffed, and all our dreams sit on the cusp of something truly awesome. That can be our doom as one of total destruction (state shift); or by putting the pussy on the chainwax ("trying to start a thing"), such Numinous forebears can also be our salvation from a damned "all our yesterdays" leading to "dusty death." Fuck to metal, instead!

(artist: Jinedem)

Except for us, our "Jesus" is a Trojan agent fucking with Ambrosio: a "dummy thick" cock-warming demon slut who, like Matilda's false Madonna, fails stealth checks because her booty cheeks always be clapping. Keeping it real through cultural appreciation as a streetwise vein, lets pursue this in classic Gothic fashion—deliciously! To that, let's envision such delicacies through the language of the holy whore as secularized and class, culture and race conscious: a fatal (false) offering pleading "sacrifice" through a prostration of itself as "wicked, bad, and naughty" in the eyes of the state, but in the eyes of anyone not dead will say in response: "God damn!" Not to pimp, but hug the Medusa as worthy of such treatment during the dialectic of the alien! She squish!

When in Rome, the alienation of dogma into critical thought requires speaking to the uncritical as one might in a church that is no longer theirs, but like Young Goodman Brown, is occupied by sinners of a Communist sort! Speaking to the uninitiated in the language shared by all peoples is effective through a) the feeling that it's "their language," b) the carnal power of persuasion, and c) good old-fashioned peer pressure. Apart from whores, everyone likes monsters and sex (which includes ace forms of public nudism and demon BDSM, of course), so take our hallowed transubstantiation as green eggs and ham to eat (said the "caterpillar" to the state). Try it, just once! It's perfectly safe (won't make you gay as fuck, pinky promise)... That's how we wasps get you good!

Equally indicative of that army of the dead (and demon castle) I alluded to, several pages back, we (the monstrous-feminine) are the mothers of the future playfully expressed in "past forms" of exchange, feeding and trauma/transformation: our cute little badass alien caterpillar of death (which would definitely be a boss in a Final Fantasy game per Capitalist Realism) as profoundly symbolic; i.e., of a current inexorable leading to fresh life in the wondrous necrobiome that is Gothic Communism: Capitalism already dying and we making use of the corpse to contribute to something we won't live to see but can imagine and experience in smaller pockets and pieces—a better world, a more sex-positive world, thus a god that lives in our breast, our wombs, our busses, our animal side and small animal friends we're stewards of (familiar and pets); i.e., each smuggling the familiar (not a pun) and the foreign into countries utterly moist with rebellion. All buzz and rattle, bark and bite, drool, wag and howl ("what sweet music they make"); i.e., excitedly for treats of the usual strange kinds (murder, rape and death fantasies, but also ironic empathy during those). So long as those treats enact worker liberation, then it's all good, baby!

The undead shamble forward to outrun their prey and demons teleport into reality. Just as we return with Medusa and nature to the West as the living dead and demonic invaders generally do—to a threatened, grave-like homestead—the state will likewise tremble in fur(r)y at our "hubris" for wanting basic human rights, thus animal and environment through land back during Gothic redistribution. Through the liminal hauntology of war as something to raise against our own revolutionary cryptonyms, the state will desperately claw "its" fire of the gods back by sending its de facto armies after us (stochastic terrorism playing the guerilla).

To it, freeing Medusa is generally a civil conflict; i.e., one meant to upset the comfortable, but also measured in sad divisions (the whore and the queer generally isolated by all except others in the same boat). As such, we liberators will also be crucified for "politeness trapping" by the sexually repressed for talking about such things in public (ace people are valid, provided they don't closet, thus colonize us for the state). So clearly development will be a test, and one that includes violence against us in many forms (doubles of our own monsters). But we must not concede or yield an inch to these tyrants and their braindead hordes. Despite our doubt, we must persevere and mix the metaphors—the monsters, magic and myth of medieval poetics—to press them to our Gothic advantage, mid-opposition:

Contrary to state copaganda, the Commie's work is always unfinished; e.g., this volume and book series full to bursting (with cum and donors of all sorts); i.e., as part of a larger refrain towards liberation through Gothic paradox during ludo-Gothic BDSM liberating sex work through iconoclastic art, thus praxis. So remember your own training as, like mine in my tower high above, having led up to a defining moment as one in a series: a lullaby to lull the caterpillar to sleep and wake up Communist. Be that butterfly or wasp, radical empathy towards the whore's revenge is what matters!

So gird you loins, little soldiers, and onto Volume Three and proletarian praxis proper! Or as the skeleton guy said in Army of Darkness, "Cry 'Havoc!' and let slip the dogs of war!" Yes, we're taking that back from Caesar and his stupid ghost, making it gay. Gay zombie war vs the Straights. Go.

—Inigo Montoya, The Princess Bride (1987)

(source: "The 430 Books in Marilyn Monroe's Library: How Many Have You Read?" 2014)

The companion glossary is dedicated to terms found in the thesis volume that nevertheless appear throughout all four volumes. It is divided into four sections:

- Marxism and Politics: Contains any terms that deals with Marxist theories or socio-political concepts.
- Sex, Gender and Race: Language, Theory and Politics: Covers the majority of gender theory used in this book.
- Miscellaneous Terms, Game Theory: Holds anything useful that isn't in the other sorting categories.
- The Gothic, Kink, and BDSM: Catalogues the various ideas/theories on the Gothic, kink and BDSM that, while used throughout this book, aren't listed in the manifesto.

Note: The glossary contains most of the terms in this book series. That being said, it does not contain the terms I coined, which are featured already in "Rage Over a Lost Penny" (and online, in "Paratextual Documents"). Likewise, my work on Metroidvania and ludo-Gothic BDSM is too extensive to list in this glossary any longer. To access those terms, simply go to their webpages. —Perse, 4/1/2025

Marxism and Politics

Marxism

Schools of thought stemming from Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, trying historically to achieve Communism through the state first (Marxist-Leninism) instead of direct worker solidarity and action operating in opposition to the state and establishment politics (anarcho-Communism). As an anarcho-Communist, I borrow ideas from Marx, but shy away from calling myself a Marxist (any more than I'd call myself a postmodernist/deconstructionist despite borrowing from Derrida); throughout the book, I prefer to use the noun/adjective phrase "dialectical(-) material" in place of "Marxist." The reason being is that Gothic Communism, as we shall define it, deviates away from Marxist-Leninism (state Socialism) towards a democratized class consciousness/proletarian xenophilia that combats the historical-material abuses of the state in any configuration (fascist, neoliberal, Marxist-Leninist, etc).

material conditions

The factors that determine quality of life from a material standpoint; i.e., not an ethical/moral argument ("this is right/wrong"), but one that deals with access to various material conditions that reliably improve one's living conditions: housing, food, electricity, clothing, water, education, employment, loans/credit, transportation, internet, etc. The status quo reliably constricts material conditions to benefit the elite; this occurs within a societal hierarchy that structurally privileges marginalized groups from least- to most-marginalized along systemically coercive and phobic lines. Indeed, this arrangement is so concrete that future history can be readily predicted through the arrangement of material conditions already displayed in canonical works: historical materialism.

historical materialism

The normalized, vicious cycle that history is predicated on the material conditions that routinely bring them about. These conditions make genocide and sex worker exploitation a historical-material fact, something that weighs on the living through what Capitalism leaves behind—the endlessly doubled histories of the dead according to Karl Marx in "The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte" (1852):

Hegel remarks somewhere that all great world-historic facts and personages appear, so to speak, twice. He forgot to add: the first time as tragedy, the second time as farce. [...] Men make their own history, but they do not make it as they please; they do not make it under self-selected circumstances, but under circumstances existing already, given and transmitted from the past. The tradition of all dead generations weighs like a nightmare on the brains of the living. And just as they seem to be occupied with revolutionizing themselves and things, creating something that did not exist before, precisely in such epochs of revolutionary crisis they anxiously conjure up the spirits of the past to their service, borrowing from them names, battle slogans, and costumes in order to present this new scene in world history in time-honored disguise and borrowed language (source).

dialectical materialism

The dialectical progress is the study of oppositional forces in relation to each other. For Marx, this involves the study of dialectical-material forces—i.e., the bourgeoisie and the proletariat in opposition, not harmony. "Harmony" is canonical pacification, which leads to genocide and endless exploitation of workers by the elite.

the means of production

Marx' Base, owned by the elite; the ability to (mass)produce material goods within capital/a living market. This operates on a mass-manufactured scale, but also through work performed at the individual level—labor. Workers seize the means of production by attempting to own the value of their own labor. Conversely, capitalists exploit workers by stealing worker labor, often through wage theft (wages under Capitalism being the creation of jobs, or revenue streams for the elite to structuralize then steal from, which they then credit themselves as giving back to people; i.e., "I created these jobs!" Translation: "I created a means of exploiting people through their labor during manufactured scarcity). Billionaires privatize labor through unethical means, "earning" their billions through wage theft/slavery as "owned" by them, meaning used by them specifically as exploited labor (which alienates workers from the products of their own labor).

(artist: Adolf Menzel)

private property

Not to be confused with personal property, private property is property that is privately owned, generally by the elite through privatization via state-corporate mechanisms. As Marx puts it in 1844, "Private property has made us so stupid and one-sided that an object is only ours when we have it – when it exists for us as capital, or when it is directly possessed, eaten, drunk, worn, inhabited, etc., – in short, when it is used by us. Although private property itself again conceives all these direct realisations of possession only as means of life, and the life which they serve as means is the life of private property – labour and conversion into capital" (source).

privatization

If private property is property that is privately owned, privatization is the process that enables private ownership at a systemic, bourgeois level. Under Capitalism, the elite own means of production by encouraging negative freedom to "liberalize" (deregulate) the market. They do so by removing restrictions, allowing the owner class to privatize their assets. In class warfare, capitalists disguise this fact by deliberately conflating bourgeois ownership with "bougie" (middle-class) ownership:

- Owners, in the academic, bourgeois sense, own the means of mass production, thus individual production within capital. They privatize factories, territory, industrial sectors, the military, paramilitary (cops), and the means to print money. As a consequence, they also own workers, albeit by proxy (wage slavery).
- Middle-class ownership is merely an exchange of wages—direct purchases or taxes—for material goods aka personal property. These goods become something to defend, resulting in a great deal of punching down (reactionary/moderate politics).

functional Communism

The eventual (centuries from now) abolishment of privatization/private property. This process is called development, or Socialism; Socialism's historical-material "failure" to move beyond planned economies stems from foreign, bourgeois interference and internal strife begot from privatized interests—all related to Capitalism preserving itself as a structure.

nominal Communism

Nominal communism—i.e., Communism in name alone, sold to workers through canonical propaganda to scare them into upholding the bourgeois status quo.

Marxist-Leninism/"tankies"

An embryonic form of Socialism that, past and present, favors state models and nostalgia; i.e., one that hybridizes Marx and Engels with 20th century thinkers and leaders—most notably Lenin, Trotsky and Stalin, but also Mao, Castro and other state leaders/schools going into the 21st: through "tankie" apologia whitewashing the crimes of said leaders and their states as beings to worship and compromise with (Bad Mouse's "On Hakim's Nuance," 2025).

anarcho-Communism

The gradual disillusion and transmutation of Capitalism into Socialism and finally Communism through direct worker solidarity and collective action, whereupon power is horizontally restructured—slowly rearranged into anarcho-syndicalist communes (which are historically more stable than Capitalism is, but also under attack/sabotaged by the elite every chance they can get—e.g., Cuba and U.S. sanctions for the past 70 years whitewashed by Red-Scare propaganda). To achieve this, class warfare must be conducted against official/de facto agents of the state-corporate union devised by capitalists/neoliberal hegemons.

Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

neoliberal Capitalism

The dominant strain of Capitalism operating in the world today—i.e., Capitalism employed by neoliberal canon, centrism, moderation and personal responsibility rhetoric to achieve the greatest possible division between the owner/worker classes, as well as infinite growth and efficient profit (more on these during the manifesto proper). Neoliberal Capitalism is founded on a vertical arrangement of power through national-state-corporate leaders operating against worker interests by exploiting them to the fullest using capital.

capital/Capitalism

A system of exploiting workers, nature and the world, whose resultant genocide and vampiric devastation is synonymous with profit for capitalists/the elite. The elite parasitize everyone/thing else to generate profit through Capitalism; or to quote directly from Raj Patel and Jason Moore's A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things (2017):

Money isn't capital. Capital is journalism's shorthand for money or, worse, a stock of something that can be transformed into something else. If you've ever heard or used the terms natural capital or social capital, you've been part of a grand obfuscation. Capital isn't the dead stock of uncut trees or unused skill. For Marx and for us, capital happens only in the live transformation of money into commodities and back again. Money tucked under a mattress is as dead to capitalism as the mattress is itself. It is through the live circulation of this money, and in the relations around it, that capitalism happens.

The process of exchange and circulation turn money into capital. At the heart of Marx's Capital is a simple, powerful model: in production and exchange, capitalists combine labor power, machines and raw material. The resulting commodities are then sold for money. If all goes well, there is a profit, which needs then to be reinvested into yet more labor power, machines and raw materials. Neither commodities nor money is capital. This circuit becomes capital when money is sunk into commodity production in an ever-expanding cycle. Capitalism is a process in which money flows through nature. The trouble here is that capital supposes infinite expansion [growth] within a finite web of life (source).

For our purposes, this "web of life" concerns the privatized, social-sexual exploitation of workers in monstrous language—something to be unironically defended by class traitors preserving Capitalism, thus the state as a means of maximizing capital for the elite (infinite growth); i.e., to serve and protect capital, not people, through the means of production/propaganda's current bourgeois hegemony under neoliberal Capitalism's personal responsibility rhetoric—to regulate the market and empower the state through concealed abuses that accrete out from the center in all directions. As anarcho-Communists, we much critique this canonizing process' profit motive through our own iconoclastic material.

Those who own capital, the bourgeoisie. However, capital/Capitalism as a process actually alienates capitalists from their own wealth; there is seldom money "on hand"—largely positions within a structure operating in continuum in pursuit of neoliberal Capitalism's main objectives (very different from the dragon sitting on a pile of gold, which is closer to the fascist strongman stealing wealth by hijacking the mechanisms of the state).

An idiosyncrasy in terms of my writing: This book treats Capitalism and Communism as proper nouns; other words, like "state," "capitalist," "neoliberal," and "fascist" are not capitalized. The reasons are arbitrary but I've at least tried to be consistent. —Perse

Anthropocene/Capitalocene

The Anthropocene is unit of time used to describe the period in which human existence and interaction with the natural world has started to impact it negatively in terms of ecosystem proliferation and health, general climate operations, and various other factors that intersect and relate to the survival of all life on the planet—including humans—as threatened by human contributions to climate change. The Capitalocene (as used by Patel and Moore) applies this logic to Capitalism:

Regardless of what humans decide to do, the twenty-first century will be a time of "abrupt and irreversible" changes in the web of life. Earth system scientists have a rather dry term for such a fundamental turning point in the life of a biospheric system: state shift. Unfortunately, the ecology from which this geological change has emerged has also produced humans who are ill-equipped to receive news of this state shift. Nietzsche's madman announcing the death of god was met in a similar fashion: although industrial Europe had reduced divine influence to the semicompulsory Sunday-morning church attendance, nineteenth-century society couldn't image a world without god. The twenty-first century has an analogue: it's easier for most people to imagine the end of the planet than to imagine the end of capitalism. [...] Today's human activity isn't exterminating mammoths through centuries of overhunting. Some humans are currently killing everything, from megafauna to microbiota, at speeds one hundred times higher than the background rate. We argue what changed is capitalism, that modern history has, since the 1400s, unfolded in what is better termed the Capitalocene [than the Anthropocene] (source).

anthropocentrism/posthumanism

In Posthuman Life (2015), David Roden writes, "A humanist philosophy is anthropocentric if it accords humans a superlative status that all or most non-humans lack" (source). Posthumanism goes beyond traditional notions of Cartesian humanism to afford basic rights to humans, animals and the natural-material world as something not to exploit by Capitalism.

transhumanism

From Roden's Posthuman Life,

Self-fashioning through culture and education is to be supplemented by technology. For this reason, transhumanists believe that we should add morphological freedom—the freedom of physical and mental form—to the traditional liberal rights of freedom of movement and freedom of expression [...] to discover new forms of embodiment in order to improve on the results on traditional humanism [and according to the World Transhumanist Association, 1999] "to use technology to extend their mental and physical (including reproductive) capacities and to improve their control over their own lives" (source).

accretion

Dissemination out from the center of a socio-material structure (similar to how planets form); i.e., the Symbolic Order, the mythic structure, etc; e.g., accretions of the Medusa as someone to kill or avoid, as "untamable" by men as the arm of the state and the law. To escape men, she turns to stone (or a tree)—a defense mechanism from those who unironically defend the structure in official/unofficial capacities.

the Superstructure

This moves in a spiral pattern.
The base is generally dominant.
(exhibit 2)

Propaganda; that which, Rana Indrajit Singh writes in the International Journal of Humanities and Social Science Invention, normally "grows out of the base and the ruling class' interests. As such, the superstructure justifies how the base operates and defends the power of the elite" (source: "Base and Superstructure Theory," 2013)—normally being the operative word, here. This book isn't a fan of what's normal because normal is the status quo and the status quo is bourgeois.

splendide mendax

The teller of splendid lies; e.g., Jonathan Swift and Gulliver's Travels (1726); also applies to self-aware weavers of various genres of fiction, from Oscar Wilde to Luis Borges, but also non-white/American authors who have to reinvent their own cultures' lost histories—e.g., Jean Rhys' Wide Sargasso Sea (1966), Toni Morrison's Beloved (1987), Michelle Cliff's Free Enterprise (1993) and Charles Johnson's Middle Passage (1998), etc. Furthermore, concerning bourgeois lies vs proletarian splendid lies, Gothic stories are concerned with recycled clichés in either case.

"archaeologies" of the future

Fredric Jameson's titular 2005 idea, Archaeologies of the Future: The Desire Called Utopia and Other Science Fictions, of an elaborate strategy of misdirection (an idea originally from his 1982 essay "Progress versus Utopia; Or, Can We Imagine the Future?") that breaks through the future of one moment that is now our own past, often through the fantasy and science fiction genres (the Gothic variant of this strategy as we shall discuss it is the Gothic castle/chronotope, discussed in the thesis proper). Canonical "archaeologies" sell this dead future back to workers to pacify them; iconoclastic variations devise ways of seeing beyond canonical illusions by "re-excavating" them, using what's left behind again to liberate worker bodies and minds in the process.

propaganda

According to the Encyclopedia Britannica, propaganda is the more or less systematic effort to manipulate other people's beliefs, attitudes, or actions by means of symbols (words, gestures, banners, monuments, music, clothing, insignia, hairstyles, designs on coins and postage stamps, and so forth). Deliberateness and a relatively heavy emphasis on manipulation distinguish propaganda from casual conversation or the free and easy exchange of ideas. Propagandists have a specified goal or set of goals. To achieve these, they deliberately select facts, arguments, and displays of symbols and present them in ways they think will have the most effect. To maximize effect, they may omit or distort pertinent facts or simply lie, and they may try to divert the attention of the reactors (the people they are trying to sway) from everything but their own propaganda (source).

For us, propaganda is anything that cultivates the Superstructure, including splendid lies and elaborate strategies of misdirection. However, anything that goes against the interests of the state will be perceived of as terrorist lies by the state, making its abolishment by workers all the more pressing. However, state propaganda also self-replicates—with Sigmund Freud's nephew, Edwards Bernays, famously applying the principles of political propaganda to marketing in his 1928 capitalist apologia, Propaganda. The book argues for a rebranding of propaganda called "public relations," one where "invisible" people create knowledge and propaganda to rule over the masses, with a monopoly on the power to shape thoughts, values, and citizen responses; that "engineering consent" of the masses would be vital for the survival of democracy. In Bernays' own words, he explains:

The conscious and intelligent manipulation of the organized habits and opinions of the masses is an important element in democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an invisible government which is the true ruling power of our country. We are governed, our minds are molded, our tastes formed, our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of.

Despite a patent rebrand filled with cheerful Liberalism, Bernays went on to inspire Hitler's minister of propaganda, Joseph Goebbels, but also Hitler himself (as well as American propagandists during and following WW2). Hitler did his best to emulate American media, seeing its coercive value by creating his own Hollywood (see: Hilter's Hollywood, 2018). Helped from the likes of commercial-savvy artists like Goebbels, he copied Charlie Chaplin's toothbrush mustache, radicalized Bernays' ideas on propaganda, and painstakingly toiled over the creation of the Nazi symbol itself (Jim Edwards' "Hitler as Art Director: What the Nazis' Style Guide Says About the 'Power of Design,'" 2018). Behind the illusions, Hitler remained cutthroat, buoyed to chancellorship by the German elite defaulting on American loans, whereupon he promptly killed his political enemies and spent the next decade convincing his nation to fight to the death. In short, he was a bad capitalist (unlike the American elite).

The practical execution of theory. This can be achieved through different modes; e.g., ours is iconoclastic poiesis, or artwork tied to worker emancipation as something to creatively express, but also build upon as a collective, cultural understanding unified against the state. In other words, canon and iconoclasm are synonymous with praxis, but also poiesis.

poiesis/poetics

"To bring into being that which did not exist before." A commonplace example is "poetry," which historically has granted impoverished, exploited people idiosyncratic voices/parallel societies in times of struggle. Poiesis is not just pithy scribblings, in other words; it's a means of understanding the world and sharing that with others to cultivate countercultural movements in opposition to the state; i.e., by "playing god." For our purposes, canon and iconoclasm—as means of cultivating the Superstructure through creative artistic expression and sex work—are both forms of poiesis, but exist in dialectical-material opposition. One is a pedagogy of the oppressed; one is a pedagogy of the oppressor.

canon (dogma)

Marx's Superstructure as normally cultivated by the elite through official/unofficial, state-corporate icons and materials designed to control how people think, behave and feel: heteronormative propaganda/dogma. Financially incentivized by the elite including billionaires, these mass-produced, privatized variants are generally accepted as genuine, legitimate and sacred by workers and typically produced by anyone who upholds the status quo. This includes corporations, but also financially-incentivized, bourgeois (often white, cis-het) authors and their beliefs/praxis furthered by pre-2000s, Internet-era media: the TERF/neoliberal politics of Harry Potter creator J. K. Rowling (Shaun's "Harry Potter," 2022), decades-long racism and all-around horrible weirdness of Dilbert creator Scott Adams towards anyone different from himself (Behind the Bastards' "How The Dilbert Guy Lost His Mind," 2023), Earth Worm Jim Creator Doug TenNapel's own conservative praxis when interacting with awful chaser/soon-to-be-divorced dudes like Steven Crowder ("Surviving the Leftist Mob," 2021) or Matt Groening's proud, middle-of-the-road, smug-as-fuck centrism (David Scheff's "Matt Groening," 2007) having already sold out, his unabashed playing of both sides against each other leading to Zombie Simpsons and a toleration of fascists/total inability to critique Capitalism (cashing in after doing the bare minimum with the first seven seasons completely undoes any activism those episodes achieved in their heyday):

Playboy: When you spread a liberal message by way of Fox, do you feel subversive?

Groening: It's fun anytime you can piss off a right-wing lunatic, but it's also fun to piss off a left-wing lunatic. In fact everybody on the show is concerned about not being preachy or heavy-handed. We try to mix it up.

American consumerism generally frames canon as "neutral," despite complicitly hiding sexist attitudes and ideologies in plain sight (usually through cheap, mass-produced, privatized likenesses/intellectual properties).

iconoclast/-clasm (camp)

Marx's Superstructure, counter-cultivated by an agent or image that attacks established variants, generally with the intent of transforming them in a deconstructive, sex-positive manner. Such a manner is treated as heretical by the elite, but also workers sympathetic to bourgeois hegemony. Deconstruction, aka Postmodernism—when harnessed by Marxists—seeks to move beyond Modernism; i.e., the Enlightenment, whose high-minded principles are really just excuses to enslave and control people through negative freedom for the elite. Generally, this happens by presenting things harmful, segregating binaries like civilization/nature, white/black, man/woman, mind/body, art/porn, etc.

hypercanon/-ical

Something so famous that it becomes recognizable by sight across generations; e.g., The Wizard of Oz (1939). However, a popular example is the cyberpunk of the hauntological retrofuture. Popularized by movies like Blade Runner (1982), Ghost in the Shell (1996) and The Matrix (1999), the cyberpunk comments on the future as dead (a concept we'll explore more in the Humanities Primer) as a means of providing a hypernormal, hyperreal illusion.

hyperreal/-ity

A distillation of Jean Baudrillard's broader notion of the simulation representing things that do not exist, yet, over time, have become more real than the reality behind them, which has decayed into a desert the hyperreal simulation has replaced in the eyes of its viewers—i.e., has covered it up. Baudrillard's Hyperreality comments on similar historical-material issues that the egregore or simulacrum do as occult creations and copies of older likenesses or illusions. The preservation of the illusion as Capitalism turns the natural world into an uninhabitable desert could be called hypernormal. As Nasrullah Mambrol writes (exhibit, theirs):

Baudrillard's concept of hyperreality is closely linked to his idea of Simulacrum, which he defines as something which replaces reality with its representations. Baudrillard observes that the contemporary world is a simulacrum, where reality has been replaced by false images, to such an extent that one cannot distinguish between the real and the unreal. In this context, he made the controversial statement, "The Gulf war did not take place," pointing out that the "reality" of the Gulf War was presented to the world in terms of representations by the media [as inherently dishonest ...]

4) There is no relationship between the reality and representation, because there is no real to reflect (the abstract paintings of Mark Rothko).

According to Baudrillard, Western society has entered this fourth phase of the hyperreal. In the age of the hyperreal, the image/simulation dominates. The age of production has given way to the age of simulation, where products are sold even before they exist. The Simulacrum pervades every level of existence. (source: "Baudrillard's Concept of Hyperreality," 2016).

hypernormal/-ity

A term that, according to Adam Curtis' HyperNormalization (2016), was originally used to describe the "whiplash" feelings of Soviet citizens during the 1980s—faced with the terrifying onset of societal collapse despite Soviet national propaganda having adopted neoliberal shock therapy while insisting that things were fine. The same idea can be applied to the uncanny sensation that things are not fine or even real despite how normal, foundational and concrete they seem; i.e., how they "pass" as normal despite a disquieting sense of decay (worker exploitation, for our purposes).

"There are no moral actions, only moral teams" (re: Shaun's "Harry Potter"). Centrism is the theatrical creation of good vs evil as existing within politically "neutral" media—a dangerous preservation of orderly justice whose "moderate," white (or token) voice-of-reason/cloaked racism and discrimination pointedly maintain the status quo: Capitalism. To this, centrism displaces and cloaks two things:

- genocide as conducted by neoliberals/fascists on foreign/domestic lands.
- the neoliberal's codifying of Nazis as an essential part of Capitalism—where the state's bureaucracy fragments through the emergence of an ultranationalist strongman.

This return of the medieval—of the Imperium and Empire, Zombie Caesar, etc—is both "blind" nation pastiche, but also a cartoonish bourgeois parody that makes the Nazi and pastiche thereof tremendously useful to Capitalism and the elite's survival through genocide's continuation behind the veil.

war pastiche

The remediation of war as something to sell to the audience (for our purposes) as canon, generally in centrist forms. Whereas nation pastiche tends to denote a national character (e.g., James Cameron's colonial marines, but also the wholesale, staple choreography of Asian-to-American martial arts movies like Ip Man 4: The Finale, 2019), war pastiche simply communicates violent conflict as something to personify in various dramatic/comedic theatrical forms; e.g., Blizzard's Warcraft pastiche (orcs vs humans).

Any kind of pastiche that ties war and combat to national identities, a common modern example being the Street Fighter franchise's nation pastiche and FGC (fighting game community). Said community employs a variety of stock characters tied to a signature nation-state, draped in a national flag and gifted with a statuesque (sexually dimorphic) physique, snappy costume and set of trademark special moves/super moves. Gamer apathy mirrors the apathy of wrestling fans, whose tentpole company regularly capitalizes off the global stage through geopolitical (nationalistic) dialogs performed using sanctioned, bread-and-circus violence; e.g., the WWE and its lucrative contract with Saudi Arabia (Renegade Cut's "WWE and the Saudi Royal Family," 2019).

heels/babyfaces

The centrist heroes and villains of staged, professional wrestling and American contact/combat sports—i.e., war personified—but commonly employed through combat e-sports like the Street Fighter FGC. Heels normally wear black, fight dirty and talk trash; babyfaces (often called "faces" for short) tend to wear white, fight fair and refuse to talk trash. A common narrative between the two is good overcoming the bullying of evil by deus ex machina "rallies," where upon the underdog babyface is able to prevail by the end of a particular war. The tragedy in doing so is the babyface always converts to a heel position. The theater and its evolution through modern sports parallel geopolitics in ways that deregulate the process of worker exploitation through sports contracts and ringleaders working adjacent, through their own distractions, to military contractors and arms manufacturers/dealers in the Military Industrial Complex; neoliberalism, in other words, promotes fascist as an essential part of centrist theater through post-fascist, Cold War stereotypical heels—the Nazi, Muslim or the Communist—versus the traditional babyface: the American crusader or "good" vigilante/exacter of righteous justice. The public's endorsement, tolerance or unironic worship—of what is generally become recognized as a highly scripted affair—is called "kayfabe."

the portrayal of staged events within the industry as "real" or "true," specifically the portrayal of competition, rivalries, and relationships between participants as being genuine and not staged. The term kayfabe has evolved to also become a code word of sorts for maintaining this "reality" within the direct or indirect presence of the general public. Kayfabe, in the United States, is often seen as the suspension of disbelief that is used to create the non-wrestling aspects of promotions, such as feuds, angles, and gimmicks in a manner similar to other forms of fictional entertainment. In relative terms, a wrestler breaking kayfabe would be likened to an actor breaking character on-camera. Since wrestling is performed in front of a live audience, whose interaction with the show is crucial to its success, kayfabe can be compared to the fourth wall in acting, since hardly any conventional fourth wall exists to begin with. Because of this lack of conventional fourth wall, wrestlers were once expected to maintain their characters even out of the ring, and in other aspects of their lives that could be made public (source).

For a good introduction to the concept and its history in modern professional wrestling and popular media, consider Behind the Bastards' podcast episode, "Part One: Vince McMahon, History's Greatest Monster" (2023). The concept applies not just to wrestling but includes any professional sports—e.g., e-sports but also vigilante sports/action hero narratives with athletic crusaders such as the heteronormative avatars from Streets of Rage and TMNT or Street Fighter as something to endorse through their police violence of state-oriented criminals, potential subversives, revolutionaries and so-called "terrorists" threatening the existence of "correct" action heroes as something to perform (exhibit 34c2, 98a1, or 104a1); or to subvert these false revolutionaries in a variety of ways (exhibit 102a4, 111b).

Famously outlined by Martin Luther King's 1963 "Letter from the Birmingham Jail," excoriating the white moderate as more dangerous than the overt racist. Moderacy would evolve into the American neoliberal and its worldly doubles (1980s Soviet Russia or Great Britain) as willing to break bread/debate with fascists in the "free marketplace of ideas." To this, moderacy equals veiled white-cis-het-Western supremacy—generally upheld by centrist canon.

menticide/waves of terror

From Joost Meerloo's The Rape of the Mind (1956), menticide is the animal, "Pavlovian" conditioning through various forms of torture, namely "waves of terror" to achieve an ideal subject just not complacent with state abuse, but complicit. Of menticide, Meerloo writes,

The variety of human reactions under infernal circumstances taught us an ugly truth: the spirit of most men can be broken; men can be reduced to the level of animal behaviour. Both torturer and victim finally lose all dignity [...]

The core of the strategy of menticide is the taking away of all hope, all anticipation, all belief in a future [which aligns with Mark Fisher's "hauntology," or inability to imagine a future beyond past forms supplied by Capitalism; i.e., a myopia]. It destroys the very elements which keep the mind alive. The victim is entirely alone (source).

Meerloo describes waves of terror as the use of well-planned, repeated successive waves of terror to bring the people into submission. Each wave of terrorizing cold war creates its effect more easily—after a breathing spell—than the one that preceded it because people are still disturbed by their previous experience. Morale becomes lower and lower, and the psychological effect of each new propaganda campaign becomes stronger; it reaches a public already softened up. Every dissenter becomes more and more frightened that he may be found out. Gradually people are no longer willing to participate in any sort of political discussion or to express their opinions. Inwardly they have already surrendered to the terrorizing dictatorial forces (ibid.).

the pedagogy of the oppressed

Radical empathy. Coined by Paulo Freire in his 1968 book of the same name, the text is a warning to closeted (and active) moderates to stop talking down to people who know their own trauma far better than moderates do.

the banality of evil/desk murderers

Originally used to describe the fascist bureaucracy of the Third Reich during the Nuremberg trials, desk murder goes well beyond Adolf Eichmann; it is destructive greed minus all the gaudy bells and whistles: the men behind the curtain (canon). Whether fascist or neoliberal, those at the top abject (denormalize) truth, shaming dialectical-material analysis while venerating the uncritical consumption of canon. In doing so, they hide, thus normalize, their own status; the elite own everything through vertically-arranged power structures, deliberately constructed to exploit everyone else—not just by owning the means of production, but using said means at a corporate-national register to parade and venerate conspicuous shows of god-like wealth and endless consumerism.

neocons(ervatism)

Neoconservatives are liberal hawks who, exposed to menticial propaganda over time, despise war protestors and promote peace through strength, including neocolonialism and proxy war. It's the centrist, oscillating phenomena of so-called Liberalism turned bloody, routinely demanding its blood sacrifice on the so-called altar of freedom (as Howard Zinn notes about the formation of the Americas during the American Revolution).

Liberalism

Not to be confused with neoliberalism (though the two generally go hand-in-hand), Liberalism is the disingenuous language of the Enlightenment becoming Americanized, then used alongside Cartesian dualism to obscure genocide under settler colonialism. In his A People's History of the United States (1980), Howard Zinn catalogs the various fears of the upper "master class"—of Native Americans and slaves rebelling together but also white indentured servants and African slaves as something to discourage using Liberalism:

"What made Bacon's Rebellion especially fearsome for the rulers of Virginia was that black slaves and white servants joined forces [...] Those upper classes, to rule, needed to make concessions to the middle class, without damage to their own wealth or power, at the expense of slaves, Indians, and poor whites. This bought loyalty. And to bind that loyalty with something more powerful even than material advantage, the ruling group found, in the 1760s and 1770s, a wonderfully useful device. That device was the language of liberty and equality, which could unite just enough whites to fight a Revolution against England, without ending either slavery or inequality" (source).

neoliberalism

The ideology of American exceptionalism (which extends to allies of America like Great Britain) that enforces global US hegemony through deregulated/"re-liberalized" Capitalism as a structural means of dishonest wealth accumulation for the elite. Laterally enforced by state/corporate power abuse through a public conditioned by these groups to worship the free market, neoliberalism seeks to foster a centrist attitude. By preaching the lie of false hope* through an us-versus-them mentality and personal responsibility rhetoric, neoliberalism maintains the status quo by demonizing nominal Communism (Monty Python's "International Communism," 1969) and disguising the inner workings of Capitalism—how Capitalism is inherently unethical and unstable, and how it exploits nearly everyone (workers) to benefit the few (the elite). This framework, and the pervasive illusions that prop it up, eventually decay and lead to societal collapse. In the interim, common side effects of neoliberalism include: the gutting of unions, destruction of the welfare state, reinforcement of the prison system and strengthening of the police state.

*For a quick-and-dirty example of vintage American neoliberalism, consider the opening to Double Dribble \(1987\) for the NES: palm trees and skyscrapers in the background, a bare concrete lot and tight, manicured lawns in the foreground— where hordes of consumers flock to a giant stadium to "the Star Spangled Banner" while a Konami blimp emblazoned with an American flag soars overhead. This kind of canonical nostalgia traps workers inside a world they never experience because its constantly sold to them as an idealized past to escape into from their current environment; as Capitalism fails, they can't imagine anything beyond it, just whatever was shown to them as children: something to retreat into fondly like a lost childhood.

Capitalism-in-decay aka "zombie Capitalism." When Capitalism starts to fail (which it does by design), it creates power vacuums whose medievalist regressions reintroduce scapegoat mentalities on a state level; i.e., the village sacrifice of a manufactured outsider taken to national extremes during palingenesis ("national birth"), which ushers in a perceived former glory tied to a former imaginary past: a liminal hauntology of war against anyone different than the status quo; e.g., a witch/pagan, vampire (queer person) or similar target of state violence during moral panics stoked by fascist ringleaders. A radicalizing of the status quo, then, allow populist strongmen to foster unusual sympathies within the (white, cis-het) working class: the installation of a dogmatic (sexist, racist, transphobic, etc) hierarchy that intentionally abuses a designated underclass (the out-group), promising societal and material elevation for those following the leader (the in-group). Or as Michael Parenti wrote in Blackshirts and Reds (1997):

Fascism is a false revolution. It cultivates the appearance of popular politics and a revolutionary aura without offering a genuine revolutionary class content. It propagates a "New Order" while serving the same old moneyed interests. Its leaders are not guilty of confusion but of deception. That they work hard to mislead the public does not mean they themselves are misled. (source).

Simply put, fascists are violent LARPer (live-action role-players) living in a death cult, reducing themselves and those around them to expendable, fetishized, zombie-like fodder. The in-group operates through fear, dogma and violence—cultivating the perception of strength through a coercive, revered worldview that leads to delusional overconfidence and ignominious death in service of the state through its same-old language (e.g., Monty Python's "Black Knight" skit, 1975).

Fascism is the generation of, regression back towards medieval, pre-civilized hauntologies that attempt to revive the glory of former times (usually the ghost of Rome) through the creation of, on various levels, a fearsome destroyer persona: the pagan Goth, but also the zombie tyrant (the Romans killed Christ). Pre-fascism is the Gothic imagination that historically was obsessed with the inheritance of a decaying system prior to the rise of fascism in the 18th and 19th centuries, which in turn has become post-fascism: the fear of fascism and systemic decay entertained through popular discourse and Gothic poetics in the 20th and 21st centuries, post-WW2. It's the ghost of tyranny—the skeleton king tapping his palm with his cudgel-like scepter. Because fascism defends Capitalism (an inherently unstable system) the fear, then, becomes fear of sacrifice by the state to preserve the whole from an imaginary menace with historical-material validation for its own desire of revenge (the specters of Marx; i.e., a ghost battle between capitalist, thus fascist hauntology and Communist hauntology).

The turn towards fascist rhetoric, stowed away inside nature conservatist rhetoric. When Capitalism fails, (some) humans become the virus inside the state of exception, their destruction pitched as "saving the planet" for the uninfected. This scapegoat is always Indigenous peoples (the go-to recipients of state exploitation) but can and will expand towards the center of American privilege (stopping short of the elite, of course) when things geopolitically and ecologically begin to worsen.

zombification/Zombie Capitalism+

The death of ethical parody and its replacement with "blind" forms; e.g., Zombie Simpsons. In "Zombie Simpsons: How the Best Show Ever Became the Broadcasting Undead" (2012), Dead Homer Society writes,

By almost any measurement, The Simpsons is the most influential television comedy ever created. It has been translated into every major language on Earth and dozens of minor ones; it has spawned entire genres of animation, and had more books written about it than all but a handful of American Presidents. Even its minor characters have become iconic, and the titular family is recognizable in almost every corner of the planet. It is a definitive and truly global cultural phenomenon, perhaps the biggest of the television age.

*As of this writing, if you flip on FOX at 8pm on Sundays, you will see a program that bills itself as The Simpsons. It is not The Simpsons. That show, the landmark piece of American culture that debuted on 17 December 1989, went off the air more than a decade ago. The replacement is a hopelessly mediocre imitation that bears only a superficial resemblance to the original. It is the unwanted sequel, the stale spinoff, the creative dry hole that is kept pumping in the endless search for more money. It is Zombie Simpsons (source).*

Zombification results from people living under Capitalism, a system that discourages them not to think for themselves, but also to violently attack people who try. Zombie Capitalism is when Capitalism becomes "feral," entering a fascist state of decay—whereupon, violent, pro-state zombies suddenly appear and attack rebellious workers, "eating their brains" (symbolizing an attack on the rebellious mindset). Being the target of the state in this manner means you have fallen into the state of exception—disposable zombie fodder even more useless than the zombie heroes the state endlessly sends after you.

the Wisdom of the Ancients

A cultural understanding of the imaginary past. The past is always imaginary to some extent, but through less wise forms reliably leads to genocide and tremendous suffering; i.e., Marx' prophesied tragedy and farce [...] or according to structures of power that preserve themselves through blind pastiche, parody and canonical art. These foolish forms operate according to structures of power that preserve themselves through blind pastiche, parody and canonical art: pure evil and pure good as an essentialized struggle divorced from material reality—simply the forces of light versus the forces of darkness, respectively of good and evil: not of Milton's humanized, revolutionary Satan, but the Biblical Satan as a vicious backstabber embodied in Beowulf (c. 700) and echoed in future written forms through the canonical monomyth endlessly mimicking itself in heteronormative forms of gender trouble and gender parody.

In turn, canon essentialize Capitalism's vicious cycle and cataclysmic arrangements of the imaginary past as something that is simultaneously

Malthusian, but also paradoxically "as good as it gets" and threatened by the doomsday myopia of nominal Communism that Capitalist Realism affords. As their sense of agency and certitude collapse with the world around them, workers—but especially the middle class—are left feeling cheated or lied to, and either blame the system or scapegoats. Scapegoats are historically easier because you can shoot or kill them, implying the solution is a simple, straightforward one. It's the "tried-and-true" "wisdom" of the Roman fool, falling on their own sword while Rome burns not once, but over and over. Such "wisdom" is not wise, but a false power, which Gothic Communists seek to reclaim through our own doubling of the imaginary past—its monsters, castles and battles—as a kind of "living document" that can reclaim the Gothic imagination, thus our ability to think; i.e., through lost forms of knowledge retailored for the complexities of the modern world—its warring mentalities, sexualities, monsters (codified beliefs and actions) and praxis during class and culture war.

the Imperial Boomerang

"The thesis that governments that develop repressive techniques to control colonial territories will eventually deploy those same techniques domestically against their own citizens" (source: Wikipedia). In Foucault's own words during his lecture at "Il faut défendre la société" in 1975:

[W]hile colonization, with its techniques and its political and juridical weapons, obviously transported European models to other continents, it also had a considerable boomerang effect on the mechanisms of power in the West, and on the apparatuses, institutions, and techniques of power. A whole series of colonial models was brought back to the West, and the result was that the West could practice something resembling colonization, or an internal colonialism, on itself (source: "Foucault's Boomerang: the New Military Urbanism," 2013).

Described by Stephen Graham as "military urbanism," this phenomenon accounts for the legion of dead futures popularized in American canon and its expanded, retro-future states of exception—hauntological narratives that present the future as dead and Capitalism as retro-futuristically decayed; i.e., Zombie Capitalism and zombie police states.

the state of exception

The state-of-emergency applied to recipients of state violence; or as Giorgio Agamben writes in State of Exception (2005),

"A special condition in which the juridical order is actually suspended due to an emergency or a serious crisis threatening the state. In such a situation, the sovereign, i.e. the executive power, prevails over the others and the basic laws and norms can be violated by the state while facing the crisis" (source).

the state's monopoly of violence

Max Weber's maxim that "a state holds a monopoly over the legitimate use of violence within its territory, meaning that violence perpetrated by other actors is illegitimate" (source; originally from "Politics as a Vocation," 1919). This applies to state-sanctioned witch hunts and scapegoating markers, which we'll examine much more thoroughly in Volume Three, Chapter Two.

the Protestant (work) ethic

From Max Weber's The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904-1905). In it, "Weber asserted that Protestant ethics and values, along with the Calvinist doctrines of asceticism and predestination, enabled the rise and spread of capitalism" (source: Wikipedia)—a concept I've explored in my own Tolkien scholarship, for example; e.g., ""Dragon Sickness": The Problem of Greed," (2015).

Sex, Gender and Race: Language, Theory and Politics

sexualized media

Media that contains sexual and gendered components—of cis-het men and women, but also queer persons/other marginalized groups for or against the state.

However, the treatment of sexuality and gender—how it is sexualized by "the Media" or in media more broadly—depends on if it is sex-positive or sex-coercive (some examples, below):

doing so was to illustrate their place in a man's world; e.g., as wives, mistresses [the Virgin or the Whore] but also as workers. Whereas open fascism historically relegates women to traditional modes of women's work, American propaganda temporarily made various concessions during WW2. These occurred to support the overall war effort and the material interests of the elite. After the war ended, women's rights were quickly rescinded in favor of a return to the status quo, female workers being demonized by the same male employers and patrons who formerly promoted them [and fetishized by the likes of Frazetta, who started his career during a regression towards female re-enslavement after the war].

Mimesis is a back-and-forth process, borrowing images and symbols for new purposes during oppositional praxis. In Rosie the Riveter's case, promotions of female "equality" were themselves guided by an American sense of righteousness that went on to be co-opted for social movements long after the original pieces aired. Indeed, Rosie only became a cultural icon of feminism in the 1970s—i.e., as a symbol of female empowerment that eclipsed Rockwell's Christianized mimesis of Michelangelo's Isaiah. On Rockwell, Christina Branham writes in "Rosie the Riveter" (2016),

The pose she strikes seems a bit awkward, but it too conveys a message: it was inspired by Michelangelo's portrayal of the prophet Isaiah on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Why? As stated during a Sotheby's 2002 sale of the original art, "Righteousness is described throughout Isaiah's prophecy as God's strong right arm." Rockwell's Rosie is certainly sporting some strong man-arms, but I would say the bigger message is that America was on the side of righteousness [source].

After Rockwell's upstaging by Miller's latter-day revival, the image of Rosie took on a life of its own. The image itself went on to convey the nostalgia of a reimagined past: the rights of cis-het white women [which second wave feminism primarily represented through its arguments]. In the works of future artists, nostalgia becomes something to reclaim, but also regress towards depending on the context and political leanings of the creator.)

(exhibit 3a2: Assorted pieces by Milo Manara and Luis Royo; middle-right: Olsen; far-top-right: Morry Evans. Hauntology presses women into different forms of transgressive servitude—i.e., more about titillating the cis-het male gaze within risky positions of appropriative peril and high imagination/adventure that women are expected not just to perform, but compete for under male Pygmalions. Indeed, white, cis-het women assimilate and promote these roles, focusing on the unironic torture of a highly specific and prescriptive industry body type, versus catharsis for women forced to do certain forms of coercively humiliating labor regardless of the genre. Reduced to blind pastiche, these can perpetuate various harmful stereotypes within transgressive media as a means of submitting to formal power rather than resisting and reclaiming it through the same rituals as subverted; e.g., Morry Evan's work of a servile giant for the counterfeit of a nun; or Sveta Shubina's Bowser and Peach, below. We'll examine more iconoclastic subversions throughout the book; e.g., the aforementioned size difference as something to appreciate in different monster types, such as the Amazon/mommy dom, exhibit 51d2.)

(exhibit 3a3: Artist, left: Sveta Shubina; right: Don Bluth. The desire to separate the art from the artist and aesthetics from ideology is understandable/possible, but it remains important to remember that when emulating a given style, said style in the past was associated with a problematic belief system and its symbolism; e.g., Don Bluth's damsel-in-distress, Princess Daphne, "needing" to be rescued from the dragon by a man who is still draconian themselves [the knight and the dragon being dichotomized variations of the "walking castle"/human tank]. Shubina is clearly emulating Bluth's visual style but subverts the relationship between the princess and the dragon—i.e., like King Kong but seemingly negotiated through the topos of the power of women [to attract men] as something to toy with. This context, of course, is difficult to glean from the base drawing itself, all but requiring a bit of imagination from us to reinterpret the same old clichés. But even if these stereotypes are subverted, their own work will remain haunted by the sexism of past idols that people unironically love in the present.

The woman as "emasculator" ties to the ironic cuckold of men, having them figuratively "by the balls": "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." This historically unenviable position becomes canonically enviable among women forced to compete for limited husbands with wealth, being judged by men as "gold diggers" and judged by other women jealously fighting over the same heteronormative prize. Conventionally pretty women become viewed through various double standards: the treacherous beauty as a user of everyone around her to get what she wants; i.e., sex as a weapon. While the narrative reduces the woman to a singular role and personality type, it's one where their intelligence is treated like a concealed weapon behind their sexuality as front-and-center. They're forced into uncomfortable clothes and pitted against other women wearing the same princess-style uniform; i.e., the historical-material reality of women competing for the same bloodline: to be the king's prized broodmare.

This includes Bowser in BDSM circles, a prime candidate for the "daddy dom" or queer "Bear" stereotype [artist, above: Taran Fiddler]. The paradox of the spiked collar is canonized as the master's sigil that simultaneously is an anti-predation device for a large, powerful pet in iconoclastic circles.)

sex work

Any work centered around sexuality and gender roles, including artwork. More commonly thought of as "prostitution," patriarchal sexism under Capitalism extends sex work to the broader division of sexualized labor within a colonial gender binary: men's work versus women's work. While the former focuses on war, violence and promotion through socio-material dominance, the latter involves submissive, traditionalized modes of sexual-reproductive labor towards a male authority figure—often a boss, parent or husband. So, while many sex workers perform strictly eroticized acts in this manner, many more are secretarial or marital in nature, performed inside traditional sites of women's work like kitchens, bedrooms, or laundromats, but also banks or hospitals. In the creative world, sexist employers compel female creators (musicians, models, illustrators and writers, etc) to promote prescriptive notions of coercive sexuality and gender tied to heteronormative beauty standards, fashion and music. Regardless of the work, sex-positive workers will resist sex coercion through their own labor.

Sexual/asexual expression that enables individual self-expression (thus self-empowerment) by relatively ethical means—the right to do sex work or partake in sexual activity if one so desires. In other words, it is a positive freedom; i.e., freedom for people to do what they want, specifically "the possession of the power and resources (material conditions) to act in the context of the structural limitations of the broader society which impacts a person's ability to act." Apart from being morally good and materially beneficial, sex positivity empowers marginalized communities (who, amongst other things, are generally exploited for sex as a form of labor); it does so by arguing for mutual consent, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation using historically regulated language: bodies and biology, gender identity/performance and (a)sexual orientation.

Sexist, heteronormative argumentation, work and artistry that compels and upholds sexual and gendered norms by abolishing others through various unethical means. This includes corporations downplaying their harmful actions as benign, or fascists framing their openly harmful actions as justified. This freedom to act is a negative freedom; i.e., freedom from external restraint on one's actions. It is generally repressive towards marginalized communities, the elite exploiting them on a material level while also denying them their basic human rights.

Small idiosyncrasy in terms of my writing: When using "sex positivity" or "sex coercion" (nouns) as adjectives, they will be hyphenated; e.g., "The sex-positive fog crept in on little sex-coercive feet." This is completely arbitrary but my aim is to be consistent. —Perse basic/civil human rights

The Communist idea that all human/animal workers deserve fair and equal treatment, which nation-states and corporations historically do not give (they are bourgeois and exploit workers). In Marxist terms, these rights are administered through Communism not according to profit, but "From each according to [their] ability, to each according to [their] needs." According to LeiLani Dowell at the Worker's World Forum in 2012, this existence is planned and achieved through the development phase, aka Socialism: "...to each according to their work."

ethics, ethical, ethicality

This book treats universal ethicality not as canonical societal norms (what is prescriptively "correct" or "morally right" according to canon), but that humans, animals and the environment have basic, unalienable rights. The universality of these rights is what is correct. Anyone's hypothetical ability to systemically "question" or undermine these rights—including the bourgeoisie—is fundamentally incorrect/unethical (what moderates call "compromise").

(artist: Kasia Babis)

-phobia/-philia

In Gothic-Communist terms, a phobia isn't raw, animal fear—e.g., fear of death or the unknown—but an actionable, social-sexual stigma, bias or taboo assigned to a particular out-group or historical-material victim under the status quo/inside the state of exception: xenophobia, pedophilia, necrophilia, etc. This extends to various moral panics—e.g., Satanic panic, Red Scares, or the fascist revenge phobia of the backstabbing Jew, etc. Phobias are canonically fetishized. Philias are often deliberate/accidental misnomers insofar as abuse euphemisms are concerned (again, necrophilia, pedophilia, zoophilia); i.e., used to describe acts of abuse wherein the abuser is acting on a sexual attraction or otherwise abusive compulsion but is acting it out on a party that cannot actually consent (the dead, children, or animals; slaves, wives and other humans legally regarded as property in some shape or form).

A type of reactionary, fascist argumentation tied to manufactured scarcity, consent and conflict as radicalized during moral panics under police states/ethnostates. Think "boundaries for me, not for thee," but attached to limited-time waivers for those who best fit whatever soldiers those in fascist seats of power are looking for (with Himmler anything but "Nordic"). This tends to historically-materially manifest in racial-purity pseudoscience and aggressive recruitment tactics, defending the "purity" of a nation (and its children and women) through racialized supermen, generally with the descriptor "ethnic" attached to them—e.g., ethnic Germans (in Nazi Germany) or Jews (in Israel).

moral panic, morals, and morality

This book views personal morals as being shaped by broader social codes—folkways, mores and taboos that determine "good from bad" or "right from wrong" at a societal level. For conservatives, this involves reactionary politics administered through bad-faith, "moral panic" arguments; for neoliberals, there are no moral actions, only moral teams (re: "centrism," a concept we'll explore much more deeply in Volume Three, Chapter Four). Calling others immoral in either sense is actually immoral/unethical* relative to people's basic human rights.

I would consider the difference between ethical and moral to be a matter of scope and scale. As Cydney Grannan writes in "What's the Difference Between Morality and Ethics?" for Encyclopedia Britannica (2023), the terms are often used interchangeably even in academic circles.*

Please note, dialectical-materialism focuses on ethics through material relations—hence why I prefer to describe things not as "good or bad," but as bourgeois or proletarian (exceptions will be observed as they arise). —Perse

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

hysteria/the wandering womb

Hysteria is a form of moderate condescension/reactionary control tied to Cartesian dualism, but also the gaslight, gatekeep and girl-boss trifecta that argues women are "less rational" than men; it tends to diagnose them with bizarre, completely absurd medical conditions to keep them inactive and scared, but also under men's power (e.g., bicycle face is one [source: Joseph Stromberg's "'Bicycle face': A 19th-Century Health Problem Made Up to Scare Women away from Biking," 2021] but here's a whole list of odd disorders/female causes of ignominious death invented by male "Pygmalions," including "night brain" and "drawing-room anguish"; source tweet: Dr. Daniel Cook, 2021). However, it also tends to frame women as mythical monsters/mothers that need to be killed for men to "progress": Medusas, Archaic Mothers, Amazons, etc.

the creation of sexual difference

Popularized by Luce Irigaray, her flagship concept is summarized by Sarah K. Donovan as follows,

In other words, while women are not considered full subjects, society itself could not function without their contributions. Irigaray ultimately states that Western culture itself is founded upon a primary sacrifice of the mother, and all women through her.

Based on this analysis, Irigaray says that sexual difference does not exist. True sexual difference would require that men and women are equally able to achieve subjectivity. As is, Irigaray believes that men are subjects (e.g., self-conscious, self-same entities) and women are "the other" of these subjects (e.g., the non-subjective, supporting matter). Only one form of subjectivity exists in Western culture and it is male (source: Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy).

the Male Gaze (appropriative voyeurism/exhibitionism)

Popularized by Laura Mulvey in her 1973 essay, "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema," the Male Gaze goes well beyond cinema; according to Sarah Vanbuskirk in "What Is the Male Gaze?" (2022), it deals with female objectification under Capitalism:

The male gaze describes a way of portraying and looking at women that empowers men while sexualizing and diminishing women. [...] first popularized in relation to the depiction of female characters in film as inactive, often overtly sexualized objects of male desire. However, the influence of the male gaze is not limited to how women and girls are featured in the movies. Rather, it extends to the experience of being seen in this way, both for the female figures on screen, the viewers, and by extension, to all girls and women at large. Naturally, the influence of the male gaze seeps into female self-perception and self-esteem. It's as much about the impact of seeing other women relegated to these supporting roles as it is about the way women are conditioned to fill them in real life. The pressure to conform to this patriarchal view (or to simply accept or humor it) and endure being seen in this way shapes how women think about their own bodies, capabilities, and place in the world—and that of other women.

In essence, the male gaze discourages female empowerment and self-advocacy while encouraging self-objectification and deference to men and the patriarchy at large (source).

Appropriative performances of voyeurism/exhibitionism (watching or showing sexual activities) that cater to this Gaze uphold the status quo. Those that do not are appreciative (thus sex-positive) in nature, but generally remain liminal and ambivalent.

exhibitionism/voyeurism

A desire to show off or to look, generally tied to kink and BDSM (which we'll define in the Gothic section of terms). As with those, these activities can be sex-positive or -coercive; i.e., rebellious/furious flashing (exhibit 53, 62c, 89a, 101a1, etc) vs cat-calling/scopophilia from a totally unwanted audience (Norman Bates and Marion Crane) vs the liminal, half-invited Peeping Tom (Jimmy Stuart and Miss Torso from Rear Window, 1954; George McFly and Lorraine Bates from Back to the Future, 1985; or [these two tennis guys \[above\]](#) and an anonymous female streaker—source tweet: Peach Crush, 2023) vs the transphobic flasher (exhibit 62c) vs fully consensual voyeurism/exhibitionism (exhibit 101c2).

(artist: Moika)

cultural appropriation (verb: "to appropriate" / adjective: "appropriative"):

Taking one (or more) aspect(s) of a culture, identity or group that is not your own and using it for your own personal interests. Although this can occur individually for reasons unrelated to profit, Capitalism deliberately appropriates workers/marginalized groups for profit; the act of these groups playing along is called assimilation.

cultural appreciation (verb: "to appreciate" / adjective: "appreciative"):

Attempting to understand and learn about another culture in an effort to broaden one's perspective and connect with others cross-culturally. The Gothic-Communism aim is to humanized these groups and prevent their exploitation through one's own work.

lip service

Empty endorsements, generally performed by establishment politicians; a moderate tactic of playing both sides (always to the detriment of workers).

queer-baiting/pacification/in-fighting

Empty commercial appeals/"representation" that are generally cliché, stigmatized, or dubiously underwritten/funeral—the "bury your gays" trope (defined and explored by Haley Hulan's 2017 "Bury Your Gays: History, Usage, and Context") except employed by neoliberal corporations who expect marginalized groups to be grateful for scraps, but also fight over/about them: "They're fighting/killing each other" is music to the elite's ears regarding all marginalized groups (class sabotage).

"bury your gays"

The heteronormative sublimation, violence and moral-panic scapegoating of anything that doesn't fit the colonial binary model. Historically this would have been homosexual men (with queer cis women appropriated by cis-het men as exotic sex toys existing purely for male pleasure); however, it extends to trans/non-binary people or gender non-conforming persons more broadly (with various minorities being assigned heteronormatively atypically gendered qualities, like women of color being seen as more masculine and sexual voracious/aggressive than white women, for example).

Rainbow Capitalism

Capitalism appropriating queerness, generally through surface-level, inauthentic representation and queer-baiting. Marketing-wise, this involves slapping a fucking rainbow on every product in sight during Pride Month, diluting its cultural significance as a sign of solidarity and rebellion in the process.

recuperation/controlled opposition

"The process by which politically radical ideas and images are twisted, co-opted, absorbed, defused, incorporated, annexed or commodified within media culture and bourgeois society, and thus become interpreted through a neutralized, innocuous or more socially conventional perspective. More broadly, it may refer to the cultural appropriation of any subversive symbols or ideas by mainstream culture" (source: Wikipedia). Perhaps the most common example is "corruption" (the evil cop, company or executive, etc) and the "defanging" of oppositional forces (rap, punk rock, antiwar protests, Black Lives Matter and other activists groups, etc as commodified by Rainbow Capitalism; more on this concept in Volume Three, Chapter One) but also "demonization" (e.g., the rebellion of the xenomorph or zombies turned into mindless rage that marines can shoot at with impunity).

The process by which socially unacceptable impulses or idealizations are transformed into socially acceptable actions or behavior. Unlike Nietzsche or Freud, I explore sublimation as something that can either be bourgeois or proletarian. For either man, sublimation was a mature, "healthy" defense mechanism by which the modern individual could turn a blind eye, thus function in assimilative ways. I disagree about the "healthy" part, thinking this kind of repressing is to conceal Capitalism as an expressly tyrannical and exploitative system towards workers—"healthy" meaning "working as intended for the elite." Sublimation has to go beyond exploitation if workers are to liberate themselves in ways Nietzsche generally called "envious." It is not envy that drives people to rebel, but a desire to not be exploited like chattel. To this, the recuperation of the activist—into a killer demon or zombie that cannot speak and must instead be shot—is generally seen as a good thing to do; it sublimates them into something that can be logically dealt with; i.e, through violence.

prescriptive sexuality (and gender)

Sexuality and gender as prescribed according to various explicit or tacit mandates; i.e., sex, orientation and gender performance/identity are not separate and exist within a cis-gendered, heteronormative colonial binary. This can come from corporations or groups that produce media on a geopolitical scale, or from individual artists/thinkers who uphold the status quo (TERFs, for example). Generally illustrated through propaganda that appropriates marginalized groups.

descriptive sexuality (and gender)

Sexuality and gender as describing actual persons, be they sexual and/or asexual. This includes their bodies, orientations and identities, etc, as things to appreciate, not appropriate (thus exploit). For queer people, their existence is generally ironic to canonical, historical-material norms because they do not confirm to these norms or their prescriptions. Doing so requires genderqueer expression during oppositional praxis through appreciative irony as a kind of gender trouble/parody under heteronormative conditions (exhibit 3b).

appreciative irony

Simply put, a descriptive sexuality that culturally appreciates the irony of queer existence in various forms: trans people, non-binary persons, homosexuals, pansexuals, bisexuals, intersex persons, femboys, catgirls, etc. Often, portrayed through countercultural performance art, including sex-positive BDSM in iconoclastic forms of Gothic media.

asexuality

A gradient of expressions that includes demisexual/grey ace and aromantic persons, asexuality displays orientations and performances or gender identities that diverge from sexual attraction, generally in favor of romantic, spiritual and emotional connections; i.e., a neurodivergent condition, not a disease that needs to be repressed, shamed or attacked.

neurodivergence

A quality of brain conditions that diverge from neurotypical persons and brains. Neurodivergent people tend to be demonized, but also shamed as disabled, insane or mendacious. However, NeuroClastic's Autistic Science Person writes in "Autistic People Care Too Much, Research Says" (2020) that autistic people on average tend to be more selfless and open-minded than neurotypical persons. This isn't an automatic endorsement of us (I am neurodivergent) nor carte blanche, but it does help explain the ways in which Capitalism devalues people who don't toe the line (e.g., the C.S. Lewis trilemma: lunatic, liar, lord; source: Essence of Thought, 2022): Neurodivergent people tend to be anti-work knowing that many jobs and forms of consumption are incredibly unethical; while there is no ethical consumption under Capitalism, we recognize that some forms of consumption actively contribute to an economy of genocide; e.g., purchasing sugar in slavery-era Great Britain before 1833, or playing Hogwarts Legacy in 2023 despite knowing J.K. Rowling is a TERF and her brand is anti-trans (Renegade Cut's "Don't Play Hogwarts Legacy," 2023).

plurality/multiplicity

Generally demonized in Gothic canon, "Plurality or multiplicity is the psychological phenomenon in which a body can feature multiple distinct or overlapping consciousnesses, each with their own degree of individuality. This phenomenon can feature in identity disturbance, dissociative identity disorder, and other specified dissociative disorders. Some individuals describe their experience of plurality as a form of neurodiversity, rather than something that demands a diagnosis" (source). It's not automatically an ailment or begot from trauma, though it will canonically be presented as such (the same goes for asexual/neurodivergent peoples).

sex-repulsed

Not to be confused with sex-negative/reactionary politics, sex-repulsed is the quality through which persons—whether through nature or nurture; i.e., hereditary or environmental trauma factors (for these tend to overlap)—are repulsed by sex. This can be partial—can amount to gradient indifference or outright trauma/triggering status depending on its severity. Important: Sex-repulsion is not strictly a symptom, but a neurodivergent condition with congenital/comorbid factors operating within the brain as neuroplastic (concepts we'll explore in depth in Volume Three, Chapter Three).

comorbid/congenital

The simultaneous presence of two or more diseases or medical conditions in a patient—congenital meaning "present at birth," inherited. In gendered terms, this can present in people who are non-conforming or neurotypical; in Marxist terms, this extends into the material world as an extension of the human mind—i.e., the Gothic imagination as comorbid.

LGBTQ+

Lesbian, Gay, Bi, Trans, Queer, and various other gender-non-conforming groups.

queer

A general, all-purpose label reclaimed from its colonizer origins. For example, I identify as queer/am a queer person. While terms like trans, queer, gay and so on most certainly have specific definitions, in everyday queer parlance they tend to be used interchangeably (with idiosyncratic boundaries being drawn up when the need arises); forced conformity/division is to "make things weird" (though marginalized gatekeeping/sectarianism is definitely a thing)

genderqueer

Challenging gender norms; also called "questioning" or "gender non-conforming."

monogamy/-ous

The performance of a singular, happy relationship, canonically structured around marriage, reproductive sex and the nuclear family structure. In Gothic canon, this structure is often threatened by a Gothic villain—e.g., Count Ardolph from Charlotte Dacre's Zofloya. When Ardolph cuckolds the husband with said husband's unfaithful, susceptible-to-vice wife (the Original Sin argument), our unhappy husband—thoroughly chagrined—literally dies of shame. It's heteronormative and white supremacist, foisting societal fears onto a foreign, not-quite-West, not-quite-East scapegoat: those god-damn Italians! This form of xenophobic displacement would be revisited in Mary Shelley's 1818 novel, Frankenstein—with her Germanic, asexual scapegoat, Victor, not only cock-blocking his own kid as a proponent of the Enlightenment's version of unnatural reproduction ("I will be with you on your wedding night!"), but mad science being historically-materially Germanized in canonical fictional and non-fictional forms (e.g., Operation Paperclip and the American privatization/weaponization of mad science from irrational, hauntologized lands like Nazi Germany)!

poly(amory/-ous)

Non-normative family/open relationship structures that break with the heteronormative structure/cycle of compelled marriage; historically conflated with swinging or serial monogamy (which are really their own heteronormative practices; i.e., "We're not poly, we're serially monogamous!"). Note how poly relationships tend to be framed as polyamorous, not polygamous (unless you're a Mormon or cult leader, although certain traditions in non-Western societies allowed for polygamy as well—though not many were exclusively matriarchal in function). Polyamory can include marriage, though the basic idea is any (a)sexual relationship with multiple partners. Pairs within this arrangement are called couples (thruple being a popular term even in mainstream fiction, though canon reduces it to a destructive/"bury your gays" love triangle/square, etc); the entire social-sexual structure of a given poly arrangement is called a polycule. Note: As part of the "bury your gays trope," poly couples are often viewed as "homewreckers," conflated with wanton societal destruction of the familial household (re: Count Ardolph from Zofloya); heteronormativity demands that they die—e.g., Shari and Cary (a pun for "sharing and caring," if I had to guess) from You (2018) being ritualistically sacrificed by the writers of the show, who have them murdered by the codependent, horribly selfish, duplicitous and perfidious compulsive liars/pattern-killers, Joe Goldberg and Love Quinn. —Perse

"friends of Dorothy"

Historically a method of queer concealment in the 1980s but also appropriated under Rainbow Capitalism; can be appreciated under Gothic Communism, as well.

beards

A relationship of convenience to appear straight, heteronormative, monogamous, nuclear, "Roman," etc. The nuptial variant of a beard is the lavender marriage.

heteronormativity

HETERONORMATIVITY

An extremely helpful concept in queer theory, which encapsulates a lot of what we've just covered is heteronormativity. Queer theorist Michael Warner popularized this term in 1991, drawing on Rubin's sex hierarchy and Rich's compulsory heterosexuality.

Heteronormativity refers to a set of related cultural assumptions:

- The "normal" or "natural" form of attraction and relationships is one man and one woman who:
 - Normally or naturally embody conventional gender roles and norms; and
 - Have sex whereby the man's penis penetrates the woman's vagina (PIV sex).

- Other forms of sexuality and gender are less normal or natural than this (or not normal or natural at all).

- Thus, people are assumed heterosexual unless proven otherwise.

(exhibit 3b: Author/artist: Meg-Jon Barker from "What's wrong with heteronormativity?" featuring their 2016 book, Queer: A Graphic History.)

Heteronormativity is both highly unnatural and normalized by capital. It is the supremely harmful idea wherein heterosexuality and its relative gender norms are prescribed/enforced to normalized, institutional extremes by those in power—i.e., the Patriarchy. In Marxist terms, capitalists and state agents own, thus control, the media, using it to enforce heterosexuality and the colonial (cis-)gender binary through advertisement on a grand scale (re: the canonical Superstructure). This influence reliably affects how people respond, helping them recognize "the social world of linguistic communication, intersubjective relations, knowledge of ideological conventions, and the acceptance of the law"—re: Lacan's Symbolic Order. Acceptance of this Order when it is decidedly harmful is manufactured consent, leading to basic human rights abuses perpetrated by the state and its bourgeois actors. Pro-bourgeois abuses happen through various concentric lenses of normativity—heteronormativity, amatonormativity, Afronormativity, homonormativity and queernormativity, etc—that appeal tokenistically to the same colonial binary and its heteronormative mythic structure; i.e., that which conflates human biology (sex and skin color), thus sex and gender roles within a transgenerational curse: the king saw the black, queer and/or female monster and went mad because he had been alienated from them and himself. The curse of the castle and the Shadow of Pygmalion, then, is reliable decay and socio-material madness felt through this engineered tension as being ultimately profitable for the elite and detrimental to everyone else (whether they're defending the institution or not). Heteronormativity doesn't just explain away ignominious death, but essentializes and endorses it; i.e., the hallmark couple looks happy so the system must work, right? All you have to do is conform, consume and obey...

queernormativity/homonormativity

Normative queerness centers queerness in sexualized spheres (erasing ace people) centered around the nuclear family unit/sexual reproduction. Homonormativity takes the same idea and applies it to cis-gendered homosexual men/women (the "two dads/two moms" appropriative trope as queer-baiting/lip service).

gender trouble

Coined by Judith Butler, gender trouble is the social tension and reactions that result when the heteronormative, binary view of sexuality and gender is disrupted. This trouble can happen through the parody of social-sexual norms through ironic or appreciative (counterculture) reverse-abjection, whose reactionary abjection occurs by an increasingly unstable status quo as it impedes or threatens disintegration (moral panics under Capitalism's intended cycles of decay and restoration). Such threatening is generally of the heteronormative side reacting negatively towards the very things it abjects, which can be as simple as boys wearing pink instead of blue(!). Such a binary and similar socio-material schemes have only recently solidified under neoliberal Capitalism; e.g., now, pink is very much canonically treated as feminine/female in cis-coded, heteronormative ways (for an extensive, funny chronicling of this entire tragedy as it historically-materially unfolds, refer to Tirrrb's 2023 video: "The Yassification Of Masculinity").

girl-cock (exhibit 7c) or boy pussy (exhibit 52c)/gender parody

Genitals or genitalia-like artifacts that fulfill an ironic/gender parody cultural role that interrogates heteronormative gender assignment, performance or identity, as well as sexual orientation. They can be informed by one's biological sex in coercive ways (exhibit 30/31). However, no one in non-normative/proletarian circles wants to be "defined" by biological sex—i.e., forced conformity. This leads to the creation of various sex toys (exhibits 38a) and aliases useful to our existence, as well as actively operating as sex-positive workers (this being said, sex-positive workers are active by default—attacked for being different from what the state prescribes, but also allowed to exist by the elite because we're the fuel that Capitalism needs to operate).

natural assignment

Accident of birth—i.e., the natural assignment of one's biological sex (and conditions to form one's gender identity around, whether through conformity or struggle); one's birth sex/genitals: male, female, and intersex.

AFAB/AMABs

Assigned-Female/Male-at-Birth—i.e., one's birth sex. Can be used as a noun or adjective; e.g., "AFABs dislike this" or "an AFAB person," etc. Intersex people are their own category.

intersex

what is INTERSEX?

The term "intersex" is used to describe an individual whose chromosomes, hormones, or sexual organs are not in line with the perceived male/female sex binary.

SEX is not binary: SEX is a spectrum:

Sex is determined by a doctor upon birth using the following guidelines:
(according to the infant's genitals)

it's a girl! (under 3/8") it's a boy! (over 1") unacceptable!

Babies with "ambiguous genitals" often undergo inhumane, dangerous, and unnecessary surgeries to "normalize" their genitals, many times without parental consent!

INTERSEX PEOPLE...

- >> are about as common as redheads!
- >> can have any sexual orientation or gender identity.
- >> should never be called "hermaphrodites."
- >> should have their privacy respected.
- >> should not have to be ashamed of their bodies.
- >> deserve to be treated like anybody else.

The existence on a biological gradient between the qualifiers male and female, amounting to a variable "third sex" that presents mixed features of either sex to varying degrees; except, the umbrella term doesn't represent one particular manifestation as a strict third, but all of them together on a vast, complicated spectrum of genotypical and phenotypical elements. They are often depicted as angels or demons in the classically androgynous sense, or stigmatized/fetishized in porn as "shemales," "heshes" and other canonically pejorative labels; a common, non-insulting label is "androgynous" (though this can apply to trans people and mixed gender performance, too). A common intersex example in Gothic media is the phallic woman or Archaic Mother—e.g., the xenomorph.

non-binary

From the Human Rights Campaign's "Glossary of Terms" (2023):

An adjective describing a person who does not identify exclusively as a man or a woman. Non-binary people may identify as being both a man and a woman, somewhere in between, or as falling completely outside these categories. While many also identify as transgender, not all non-binary people do. Non-binary can also be used as an umbrella term encompassing identities such as agender, bigender, genderqueer or gender-fluid (source).

Non-binary can mean a lot of different things. A femboy can be a cis femboy AMAB who feels femme but still identifies as a man; or someone who identifies through the femboy gender role as a performance that constitutes their identity label (similar to drag queens); or someone whose AFAB who non-binarizes the femboy label. To non-binarize is to remove the binary component of something but generally preserve the aesthetic and power structure within the arrangement (e.g., cis-gendered catgirls and femboys as things to non-binarize: exhibits 91a1 and 91c).

sexual/asexual orientation

How people orient (a)sexually/"float their boats" in relation to gender identity and performance. A double helix of two gradients, each having two theoretical "poles," wherein both ribbons descriptively intertwine/intersect within the socio-material world (more on this in Volume Three, Chapter Three).

heterosexuality

Orienting towards the opposite gender. Classically called "opposite-sex attraction," gender-non-conformity (GNC) treats heterosexuality as orienting towards the gender opposite to oneself. This being said, pure opposites do not generally exist outside of heteronormative enforcement (which compels binaries in service of the profit motive/process of abjection) so heterosexual people also tend to be cis; i.e., cis-het, or "straight."

homosexuality

Orienting towards the same gender. Classically called "same-sex attraction," gender-non-conformity treats homosexuality as orienting towards the same gender as oneself. No binary is required, and the term is generally synonymous with "gay" or "lesbian."

bisexuality

Orienting towards two or more genders. Classically called "both-sex attraction" (or something along those lines), gender-non-conformity treats bisexuality as orienting towards the gender opposite to and the same as oneself.

pansexuality

Orienting towards someone else regardless of their gender. However, this does not preclude exceptions and the phrase is generally used interchangeably with bisexuality in everyday parlance.

heteronormative assignment (cis gender roles)

Accident of birth in relation to one's "birth gender" as socially constructed by the state in relation to one's genitals. For example, if you're reading this on planet Earth, you're both literate and fluent in English. This means your birth gender is heteronormatively connected to/essentialized with your birth sex by reactionaries and moderates alike, who will collectively die on the hill of assigning you a social-sexual/worker role based entirely on your genitals ("It is against free speech to stop us from fixating on the genitals," writes the Onion in their 2023 article, "It is Journalism's Sacred Duty to Endanger the Lives of as Many Trans People as Possible"). Commonly seen as "cis-het," it can also be cis-queer (e.g., a homosexual or bisexual cis-gendered man or woman). Not all cis-queer people are moderates/reactionaries, though class conflict turns potential trans allies into class traitors working for the elite. Likewise, heteronormativity is binarized, thus connecting gender to sex in order to create sexually dimorphic gender roles for "both" worker sexes (all while ignoring intersex people).

Simply put, Being trans is gender identity wherein one feels, and hopefully one day decides to recognize, that one isn't cis. For example, I have always been trans, but felt closeted about it; for a long time, I identified as genderfluid/as a femboy before deciding that I aligned best within the idea of being a binary trans woman. However, words like "gay," "trans," and "non-binary" can also be used interchangeable to some extent in basic conversation—in short, because the definitions overlap. A non-binary person isn't cis, so calling them "trans" isn't wrong. However, there is a preference with which labels they'll use in basic conversation and which one's they'll wave a flag to (i.e., I am an atheist and a feminist, but would rather call myself a gay space Communist/Satanist any day of the week).

One's conforming or nonconforming gender identity as a (sub)conscious act; i.e., how one identifies, be that passively or actively. This act of identifying intersect with their birth sex/gender, their orientation, while also competing dialectically-materially for or against the state during various performances. This can be passive/active, but remains a socio-political position that changes over time (sex, gender and politics, etc, are fluid). In the past, people were more likely to be "true neutral," unaware of things as the state oppressed information outright. Now, misinformation and factionalism are the bourgeois name of the game—gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss; so is denial (for those who don't want to get involved in active politic affairs; aka state-sponsored apathy) and overt genocide (when moderacy fails, doing so by design and allowing fascists to get their hands bloody so the elite can deny involvement): neglect, ignorance and abuse, respectively.

Gender performance is coded in relation to oneself, their identity/orientation, and to society's in-groups and out-groups, aka formal/informal gender roles. Whether one's gender identity is assigned to them at birth, or is self-assigned through various gender-non-conforming types—e.g., trans man/woman, non-binary, femboy, agender, etc—their gender performance amounts to a coded set of social behaviors (and corresponding materials and language) that adhere to performative rules meant to reinforces one's gender as either self-assigned, or assigned heteronormatively by the state. To that, these concepts do not exist in a vacuum, but intersect and often conflict (which leads to gender parody and gender trouble during subversive exercises). The higher you go in vertical power structures, the more patriarchal someone behaves. This varies per socio-material register. The elite will push buttons to calmly genocide entire peoples for profit (for them, it's business-as-usual, conducted over time inside a structure built to accommodate them); those whose positions are more fragile (fascists) will behave more extremely as they defend the nation-state (with moderacy trying to conceal/downplay this). E.g., Bill Gates is a total dweeb who hangs out with pedophiles but dresses like your creepy uncle; Matt Walsh and Hitler both have to overperform to keep up with their fragile, hypermasculine gender roles, thus maintain their veneer of invincibility.

gender performance as identity

Some identities involve broader gender performances to identify around or as. Common sex-coercive examples include the Einsatzgruppen (death squads) of Nazi Germany's SS-Totenkopfverbände (the Death's Head units); despite being a paramilitary group in a fascist (thus heteronormative) regime, the appearance of these groups was literally tailored by Hugo Boss around fetishistic (then and now) Nazi aesthetics; i.e., as examined by Leftist Youtuber, Yugopnik, in "Aesthetics of Evil - The Fascist Uniform" (2021): Nazis uniforms were patently designed to evoke the heroic spirit of palingenetic ultranationalism inside a cult of death, one whose dimorphic gender roles were deliberately affixed to fear and dogma (whose sex-coercive stamp on canonical BDSM we'll examine in Volume Three). Sex-positive examples include drag queens or femboys. To that, someone doesn't have to identify as either of these terms. And yet, while drag queens are predominantly cis men, they also belong to a cultural movement that is so large and specific in its as to justify identify as someone who belongs to such a group. It takes on a life of its own. Similarly, femboys belong to a group of people who identify according to the word "femboy" as something to live by through its canonical subversion by iconoclastic method; i.e., appreciative irony as a means of reclaiming the word and making it sex-positive through latter-day examples of the word (which we'll examine in Volume Three, Chapter Three).

That depends ("Beware the elves for they will say both yea and nay"). Keeping the above terms in mind, a woman is multiple things at once. On the bourgeois side, she's anything a man isn't—i.e., a cis-het sex slave/employee/girl boss, etc (note the gradient of euphemisms to disguise the deliberate marital role of unpaid women's work under Capitalism); on the proletariat side, she's however someone identifies in relation to the state as a worker—for or against it to various, liminal degrees (this includes personas, alter-egos, egregores and various other disguises). To reduce it to "an adult, human female" is super gross, Nazi-level shit (and while I want to seriously feel sorry for Matt Walsh's probably-battered housewife, assuming she's entirely ignorant of her husband's abuse would assume that she actually puts in the work; however, if she does, it would take total isolation of anything not supplied to her in advance by her "big, strong, powerful, caretaker" husband. That's quite sad and pathetic). I hate Nazis, Matt Walsh; my grandfather fought them during WW2 after they raped and destroyed his homeland and killed most of his friends and family. They prey on fear yet instantly run away like Brave Ser Robin when they're outed as perfidiously and ignominiously stupid. You're cut from the same cloth, you giant, callow man-child.

To be good-faith and holistic, I've tried to include the most fundamental and basic queer language as comprehensively as I can for all readers (this anticipates cryptofascists like Matt Walsh, who only asks "What is a Woman?" in bad faith to reactionarily maintain the status quo—the feckless backstabber). Other terms that we haven't mentioned here will come up during the book as we build off our main arguments. —Perse

the (settler-)colonial binary

Nadi Tofighian writes in Blurring the Colonial Binary (2013) that, having evolved beyond Rome's master/slave dynamic, colonialism and Imperialism "separated people into different classes of people, ruler and ruled, white and non-white, thereby creating and widening a colonial binary" (source). To this, the cis-het, white European/Christian male is superior to all other workers. This binary extends to token marginalizations and infiltrated and assimilated/normalized activist groups, thought/political leaders or public intellectuals, who serve as class traitors, but also functional police for their respective domains.

Cartesian dualism/the Cartesian Revolution

The rising of a dividing system of thought by René Descartes that led to settler colonialism. As Raj Patel and Jason Moore write in A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things:

The inventors of Nature were philosophers as well as conquerors and profiteers. In 1641, Descartes offered what would become the first two laws of capitalist ecology. The first is seemingly innocent. Descartes distinguished between mind and body, using the Latin res cogitans and res extensa to refer to them. Reality, in this view, is composed of discrete "thinking things" and "extended things." Humans (but not all humans) were thinking things; Nature was full of extended things. The era's ruling classes saw most human beings—women, peoples of color, Indigenous Peoples—as extended, not thinking, beings. This means that Descartes' philosophical abstractions were practical instruments of domination: they were real abstractions with tremendous material force. And this leads us to Descartes' second law of capitalist ecology: European civilization (or "we," in Descartes' word) must become "the masters and possessors of nature." Society and Nature were not just existentially separate; Nature was something to be controlled and dominated by Society. The Cartesian outlook, in other words, shaped modern logics of power as well as thought.

[...] The invention of Nature and Society was gendered at every turn. The binaries of Man and Woman, Nature and Society, drank from the same cup. Nature, and its boundary with Society, was "gyn/ecological" from the outset. Through this radically new mode of organizing life and thought, Nature became not a thing but a strategy that allowed for the ethical and economic cheapening of life. Cartesian dualism was and remains far more than a descriptive statement: it is a normative statement of how to best organize power and hierarchy, Humanity and Nature, Man and Woman, Colonizer and Colonized. Although the credit (and blame) is shared by many, it makes sense to call this a Cartesian revolution. Here was an intellectual movement that shaped not only ways of thinking but also ways of conquering, commodifying and living [... that] made thinking, and doable, the colonial project of mapping and domination.

Finally, the Cartesian revolution was made thinkable, and doable, the colonial project of mapping and domination. [...] Cartesian rationalism is predicated on the distinction between the inner reality of the mind and the outer reality of objects; the latter could be brought into the former only through a neutral, disembodied gaze situated outside of space and time. That gaze always belonged to the Enlightened European colonist—and the empires that backed him. Descartes' cogito funneled vision and thought into a spectator's view of the world, one that rendered the emerging surfaces of modernity visible and measurable and the viewer bodiless and placeless. Medieval multiple vantage points in art and literature were displaced by a single, disembodied, omniscient and panoptic eye. In geometry, Renaissance painting, and especially cartography, the new thinking represented reality as if one were standing outside of it. As the social critic Lewis Mumford noted, the Renaissance perspective "turned the symbolic relation of objects into a visual relation: the visual in turn became a quantitative relation. In the new picture of the world, size meant not human or divine importance, but distance." And that distance could be measured, catalogued, mapped, and owned.

The modern map did not merely describe the world; it was a technology of conquest (source).

patrilineal descent

In medieval terms, patrilineal descent is generally expressed as Divine Right (what Mikhail Bakhtin comments on through the Gothic chronotope as dynastic power exchange and hereditary rites—the time of the historical past); i.e., the bloodline of kings. Under Capitalism, this applies to socio-material privileges accreting outwards from the nation-state/corporations through state-corporate propaganda (canon) in monomythic terms—a Symbolic Order that workers submit to once pacified.

the mythic structure

The Symbolic Order of Western canon: "Oh, look, it's a king or a god! Guess I'll bend the knee and turn off my brain!" Originally disrupted by the "mythic method" as coined by T.S. Eliot, who "Jerry" from GLR Archive writes in "Eliot and the Mythic Method" (2004), defines what he exemplifies in The Waste Land [1922] – i.e., the "mythic method" – in his essay "Ulysses, Order, and Myth" [1923]. The mythic method looked to the past to glean meaning and understanding for what has been lost or destroyed in the present. This method emphasizes the underlying commonality of ostensibly disparate times and locations by employing a comparative mythology to transcend the temporal narrative. By stressing the mythical, anthropological, historical, and the literary, this method becomes at once (1) satirical by showing how much the present has fallen; (2) comparative to highlight similarities structurally; (3) historically neutral to escape the present to a revived future; (4) confused in its fusion of the realistic and the phantasmagoric; (5) ordering in its approach to morality and imaginative passion. The mythic method does not offer an escape to a better past, but an entry to a confusing present (source).

Eliot's 20th century modernist shenanigans (not to be confused with Modernism, aka the Enlightenment) fly directly in the face of James Campbell's "monomyth." Canonized as "the hero's journey" in popular Western fiction and formative to new fictions, the monomyth is central to state hegemony through worker pacification. Perhaps not entirely aware of this, Eliot still chose not to retreat into a "better" past in search of individuation (to borrow from Carl Jung); he addressed the present as a modern confusion that needs to be faced. In socio-political terms, this can be spaces that house abject/reverse things (with proletarian/reverse-abject variants, of course): the parallel space.

the monomyth (shortened, from the thesis volume)

Also called the Hero's Journey, the monomyth is a rite of passage wherein a (traditionally male) child finds himself offered the "rare" opportunity to elevate through the seemingly divine provision of a sword or some such masterful weapon. There's many steps and moving parts following the Call to Adventure (often categorized between twelve and seventeen), but the basic gist is: offer adventure, refuse, change mind, get sword, cross boundaries, overcome trials and ordeals, kill the (corrupt, monstrous-feminine) monster, return in some shape or form changed by the quest, get the girl. Joseph Campbell is more prescriptive and optimistic, writing in The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949):

A hero ventures forth from the world of common day into a region of supernatural wonder: fabulous forces are there encountered, and a decisive victory is won: the Hero comes back from this mysterious adventure with the power to bestow boons on his fellow man ["bros before hoes," I guess].

Personally, I find this whole notion incredibly dubious; i.e., harmful wish fulfillment/guilty pleasure that is generally trapped within a space for which there is no escape and which the fear of colonial inheritance runs deep in Neo-Gothic fiction. Through this questioning of the heroic quest, we can spot disempowering patterns beyond that of canonical empowerment tied to material conditions and dogma: the Cycle of Kings as a Promethean ordeal the state exploits to recruit soldiers to either send abroad and commit genocide, or to (re)colonize the homefront (the Imperial Boomerang, from Foucault) in the name of the father and one's bloodline through patrilineal descent.

the Cycle of Kings

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

infernal concentric pattern (from the thesis volume)

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

totalitarian(ism)

A state condition towards the total consolidation of power at one point. For example, in respect to Hitler's Germany or Stalin's Russia, Richard Overy writes in The Dictators (2004), "'Totalitarian' does not mean that they were 'total' parties, either all-inclusive or wielding complete power; it means they were concerned with the 'totality' of the societies in which they worked."

parallel space

Parallel space (or language) works off the anti-totalitarian notion of "parallel societies" (Academy of Idea's "The Parallel Society vs Totalitarianism," 2022): "A [society] not dependent on official channels of communications, or on the hierarchy of values of the establishment." For our purposes, though, parallel space can be either canonical or iconoclastic, operating through bourgeois/proletarian means; i.e., to dissociate/displace socio-material critiques for or against the state, and usually to a faraway "Gothic" place: e.g., a castle in a mythical, semi-earthly land of madness like Ann Radcliffe's fictionalized Italy or the 1980s, neoliberal "danger disco" of James Cameron's Terminator (exhibit 15b2). The role of such Gothic examples is, again, the infernal concentric pattern as inescapable/uncanny.

class warfare

Class war for/against the state-corporate hegemony and its collective bourgeois interests. Proletarian solidarity and collective action fight an uphill battle against fractured/pulverized variants—i.e., worker division and in-fighting through tokenism, assimilation (gaslight, gatekeep, girl-boss) and token normativity as a means of generating class traitors to stall/prevent/regress rebellion and maintain Capitalism.

class traitors/cops

Workers who betray the working class in defense of capital, namely the state as capital, often the military or paramilitary (cops) but also those who take on the same bourgeois function by dividing workers in defense of capital, thus the state. Traitors and exploitation takes many, many forms because all workers are exploited to varying degrees and qualities—e.g., Justin Eric King lying/downplaying about his active role in exploiting foreign/migrant workers (Bad Empanada 2, 2023) smuggled into the U.S. and exploited like basement chattel slaves, only to be given a slap on the wrist by the state. Regardless of whom, the structure defends itself through manufacture, subterfuge and coercion in defense of capital from whistleblowers and activists as fundamental/de facto enemies of the state. "Those with power will be there."

Military Industrial Complex

(from Wikipedia): the relationship between a country's military and the defense industry that supplies it, seen together as a vested interest which influences public policy. A driving factor behind the relationship between the military and the defense-minded corporations is that both sides benefit—one side from obtaining war weapons, and the other from being paid to supply them. The term is most often used in reference to the system behind the armed forces of the United States, where the relationship is most prevalent due to close links among defense contractors, the Pentagon, and politicians. The expression gained popularity after a warning of the relationship's detrimental effects, in the farewell address of President Dwight D. Eisenhower on January 17, 1961.

In the context of the United States, the appellation is sometimes extended to military-industrial-congressional complex (MICC), adding the US Congress to form a three-sided relationship termed an "iron triangle." Its three legs include political contributions, political approval for military spending, lobbying to support bureaucracies, and oversight of the industry; or more broadly, the entire network of contracts and flows of money and resources among individuals as well as corporations and institutions of the defense contractors, private military contractors, the Pentagon, Congress, and the executive branch.

Any form of canonical media that defends state abuse through official or functional police agents, but especially their monopoly of violence against those living in the state of exception under crisis as meant to recognize and worship/submit to them like gods. The state is always, to some degree, in crisis, leading to the generation of myriad monomyth stories that express this fact—i.e., as a dividing line between the police and everyone else. Skip Intro, a YouTuber with an extensive series on copaganda, explores how this phenomenon goes well beyond planet Earth, going so far as to call it a Faustian bargain. This bargain manifesting in many different kinds of fiction genres that endorse the status quo. For example, the "witch cops" and vice characters of fantasy narratives (war chiefs, Amazon war bosses; white and black "wolves") either attack orcs, Drow or some other enemy of the state during oppositional praxis, or they rally them in doomed rebellions and futile/misunderstood attacks of revenge. One assimilates, the other is destroyed and vilified.

An extreme form of rape culture, "involuntarily celibate" persons are those whose false victimization blames women instead of the system that alienates them by design. The term was originally coined by a lonely woman in the '90s, but has since gone on to be used almost exclusively by the alt-right; i.e., stemming from grifters like Andrew Tate who market "self-help" snake oil to them, and authors like Hajime Isayama who make incel heroes tied to palingenetic ultranationalism dressed up as standard-issue war/national pastiche: "weeb" food.

Often shorted to "weeb," the term "weeaboo" is used in anime and manga communities to stereotype fans who show a set of extreme and obnoxious characteristics, generally tied to alt-right circles and belief systems. This includes eco-fascism and "waifus" (the videogame equivalent of a culture war bride promised to men or token proponents of the status quo), but also moe, ahegao and incest.

class character

The idea of making critical appeals/arguments that have "class character"/are class conscious. Though this notion is modular, it intersects with race, gender and religion, etc (the deliberate attempt to segregate/prioritize them called reductionism; e.g., "race/class reductionism").

gentrification

The process whereby the character of a poor urban area is changed by wealthier people moving in, improving housing, and attracting new businesses, typically displacing current inhabitants in the process; from a social standpoint, gentrification is the process of making someone or something more refined, polite, or respectable; e.g., Jane Eyre and Adèle (exhibit 21c1). For example, housing crises are instigated by gentrification as the "invention" of exploitable housing arrangements between owners and workers: apartments. The larger socio-material process generally intersects racial tensions in impoverished, redlined neighborhoods shared between intraracial in-fighting (Boyz n the Hood, 1991); or between different racial groups encouraged to divide by the elite through fascist/moderate, good cop/bad cop "peacekeepers" (Lonestar, 1996): the disillusionment of police culture as being functionally no different than highway bandits, accidental incest (stolen generations), and a border romance (it's practically a Gothic novel, minus the aesthetic).

tokenism/assimilation fantasy/minority police

Assimilated/appropriated forms of "emancipation" that turn minorities into race/class traitors aka "minority cops" (and/or renders them myopic towards the suffering of other groups through Afrocentrism). A common example is Frantz Fanon's "black skin, white masks," whose Afronormativity to various forms of the assimilated token servant desires to escape genocide by emulating their oppressors' genocidal/carceral qualities. This just doesn't apply to people of color, but any minority desiring to assimilate the in-group by selling out the rest of their out-group for clemency (which is always a brief reprieve). Tokenism is also intersectional, leading to preferential mistreatment—meaning "less punishment," not zero punishment the closer you are to the in-group colonial standard/status quo: the cis-het, white European/Christian male. In doing so, the status quo infiltrates activists groups, sublimating/assimilating them into the colonial binary along a gradient of gatekept barriers.

Two common parts of socio-economic oppression employed by fascists and neoliberals. Gaslighting is a means of making abuse victims doubt the veracity of their own abuse (and their claims of abuse). Gatekeeping is a tactic more generally employed by those with formal power, denying various groups gainful employment (thus actual material advantage) or working platforms that allow them to effectively communicate systemic injustices perpetrated against them.

...girl-boss (tokenism)

A popular moderate MO, girl bosses are usually neoliberal symbols of "equality," a strong woman of authority who defends the status quo (an overtly fascist girl boss would be someone like Captain Israel; source: Bad Empanada 2's "Marvel's Israeli Superhero 'Sabra,'" 2022). This can be the female "suit," in corporate de rigueur, but also Amazons or orcs as corporate commodities (war bosses). Suits present Capitalism as "neutral," but also ubiquitous; Amazons and orcs (and all of their gradients) centralize the perceived order of good-versus-evil language in mass-media entertainment. Queer bosses are the same idea, but slightly more progressive: a strong queer person of authority whose queernormativity upholds the status quo. When this becomes cis-supremacist, the boss is a TERF—an assimilated war boss who regresses to a war bride herself when decay sets in, removing token privileges from most-marginalized token to least-marginalized (canonically speaking).

war brides (submissive class traitors/collaborators)

Persons, usually women, who historically slept/fraternized with the enemy to survive (Reddit, 2015). However, it's hardly that simple. More actively bourgeois "brides" would collaborate with their conquerors against the conquered (exhibit 2); proletarian "brides" would kill their "husbands" for the Cause. This includes the Dutch moffenmeiden (women from Holland who slept with Nazis during the WW2 occupation, exhibit 2) and gastarbeiders (foreign exchange laborers forced to uproot and work in West Germany during early post-Stalin years). In class warfare, unironic "sleeping with the enemy" amounts to "breaking bread" with them; i.e., accepting their material gifts and financial backing in exchange for political compromise. Proletarian warriors should never compromise in this manner, as it leads to continued exploitation; i.e., "kicking the can down the road."

TERFs/SWERFs/NERFs

TERFs are Trans Exclusionary Radical (fascist) Feminists; SWERFs and NERFs exclude sex workers and non-binary people, policing them but also members of their own "in"-groups (fandoms). It's true that older feminist movements were/are racist, exclusionary and cis-supremacist, etc; so I don't like to call TERFs "non-feminists" (though I can understand the temptation). To make the distinction between these older groups and feminism in solidarity with other oppressed groups, I call TERFs fascist "feminists." To be fair, they can be neoliberal, operating through national/corporate exceptionalism obscured by a moderate veneer (centrist media). However, neoliberals still lead to Capitalism-in-crisis, aka fascism, which adopts racist/sexist dogma and rape culture/"prison sex" mentalities in more overtly hierarchical ways. Not all TERFs are SWERFs/NERFs (or vice versa) but there's generally overlap. All compromise in ways harmful to worker solidarity and emancipation.

punching down

Reactionary political action, generally acts of passive or active aggression against a lower class by a higher class. For our purposes, middle-class people are afforded less total oppression through better material conditions (wages, but also healthcare, promotions, etc) by the elite—a divide-and-conquer strategy that renders them dependent on the status quo. This dependency allows the elite to demonize the poor in the eyes of the middle class. The elite antagonize the poor because the poor have the most incentive to punch up. This reliably engenders prejudice against them as a target, often to violent extremes. This is especially true in neoliberal canon:

punching up

Emancipatory politics. Whereas punching down aligns with systemic power, punching up moves against these structures and their proponents through de facto roles. This owes itself to how Capitalism works: The system exploits workers and targets of genocide for the elite, requiring them to demonize potential threats, not just active ones. Asking for basic human rights might not be a conscious act of rebellion; it automatically becomes one in the eyes of the elite (who discourage human rights). The louder these voices grow, the harder they punch up. This forces the elite to "correct the market" with extreme prejudice, which they disguise through various bad-faith measures (and political "neutral language").

reactive abuse

Systemic/social abuse that provokes a genuine self-defense reaction from the victim, whereupon the expectant abuser "self-defends" in extreme prejudice through DARVO. Reactive abuse correlates with reactionaries defending the state—i.e., reactionary politics being a form of white, cis-het fragility (moderacy being a veiled form of this).

white (cis-het, Christian male) fragility

A reactionary tendency for state proponents to become easily frightened, angry and violent when exposed to activist criticism; i.e., criticisms that concern the socio-material realities of systemic racism, heteronormative and other institutional bigotries and biases. These factors (and their material conditions) reliably lead to widespread mistreatment against targeted minorities that white and/or cis-het Christian men/people are normally excluded from; i.e., their privilege affords them preferential mistreatment—less exploitation, making them historically more prone to side with power in defense of the status quo (which is white, cis-het, patriarchal and Christian). Power aggregates against slave rebellions, financially incentivizing a middle class of variable size (and inclusion) to exclude and attack minorities that are simply fighting for their basic human rights. White and/or cis-het fragility, then, is a useful way to weaponize a violent, defensive mentality against activism as a whole; it is applied differently cross different groups, intersecting within race, class and gender as things to either enforce by white, cis-het agents in Christian and secular circles, or assimilate by tokenized subordinates; e.g., girl bosses, black capitalists, and other sell-outs/class traitors.

DARVO

A common abuser tactic at any register, DARVO stands for "Deny, Accuse, Reverse, Victim, Offender." It is meant to be used in bad faith, generally by punching down against activists at a socio-political level.

bad(-)faith

The act of concealing one's true intentions, presenting a false willingness (the opposite of good faith) to discuss ideas openly while deliberately seeking to cause harm to the opposite party. This performance can be fascist "defensive maneuvers" or neoliberal dogma; it can also be beards and various queer/Afronormative masks appropriated by TERFs and other assimilated groups.

virtue-signaling/white-knighting

False solidarity or alliances geared towards "clout" or personal brownie-point-farming. Think "brown-nosing" or "ass-kissing" but towards marginalized groups and their leaders with a desire to de-fang them: "Join us."

tone-policing

Speech- and thought-regulation of activist groups—often through admonishment/open condescension by moderates.

Coded language, generally presented as innocuous or unrelated to those using it, meant to disguise the user's true ideology or political identity. A popular tactic amongst cryptofascists, but also TERFS. For example, Rational Wiki lists dozens of TERF dogwhistles, including the colors purple, white, green in square emoji for:

Another emoji-based dog whistle used by TERFS on social media. Used primarily by UK-based TERFs, it seems to have emerged in the first half of 2021, and has largely replaced the chequered flag and red square. The colour scheme is based on the historical tri-color used by the Women's Social and Political Union (WSPU), an organization that campaigned for women's suffrage in the United Kingdom from 1903 to 1918. This is yet another example of TERFs trying to cast themselves as the political successors of suffragettes. It also co-opts the colour scheme used in the genderqueer pride flag designed by Marilyn Roxie in 2010 (source: Rational Wiki's "TERF Glossary," 2023).

Nazis use their own dogwhistles as well, meant to be seen by fellow club members to identify each other while hiding in plain sight. Many of these symbols are only used by the alt-right, at this stage, but in case there is overlap, the context of the subterfuge and its hauntologies can flush fascists out into the open:

(exhibit 4b: original source, unknown)

cryptofascists

Fascists by any other name or code. These fascists deliberately mislabel themselves and employ obscurantism to avoid the all-purpose "Nazis" label, thus preserve their negative freedom by normalizing themselves. This includes white nationalists, Western Chauvinists, and pro-Europeans; it also includes TERFs like Meghan Murphy spuriously decrying the "TERF" label as "hate speech" in 2017 (a flashpoint for TERF politics). I write "spurious" because hate speech is committed by groups in power, or sanctioned by those in power, against systemically marginalized targets. Please note: TERFs claiming self-persecution in bad faith (a standard fascist tactic) does not make them a legitimate target for systemic violence beyond what their relative privilege affords; it just makes them dishonest.

The act of deliberately concealing one's true self (usually an ideology or political stance) through deliberately deceptive ambiguity. The classic, 20th century example are the Nazis, who called themselves "national-socialists" by intentionally disguising their true motives behind stolen, deliberately inaccurate language; e.g., The Holocaust Encyclopedia's 2017 exhibit on the inverted swastika as a current-day religious symbol thousands of years old that has been co-opted and profaned by a fascist state (similar to the Star of David being co-opted by the enthostate of Israel in their state-sanctioned, American-backed genocide of the Palestinians). However, any sex-coercive group constantly employs concealment as a means of negative freedom: freedom from social justice. Neoliberal corporations routinely frame themselves as "neutral" and exceptional in the same breath, lying and denying the historio-material consequences of their own propaganda every chance they get; fascists celebrate dogwhistles (sans admitting to them as bad-faith) but condemn whistle-blowing as "censorship." TERFs can be neoliberal or fascist, but as Katelyn Burns notes in 2019, still call themselves "gender-critical" in either case (similar to white supremacists calling themselves "race realists"). Despite whitewashing themselves, TERFs function as sporadically moderate bigots, dodging legitimate, sex-positive criticism. They generally accomplish this through DARVO obscurantism, a strategy of playing the victim while blaming actual victims by gaslighting them.

For more examples of cryptofascism and obscurantism, consider watching Renegade Cut's "What Is \(and Is Not\) Anti-Fascism?" (2022). This will come in handy when we examine fascism and TERFs in Volume Three—Perse

(exhibit 5a: Source, "Cancel culture: the road to obscurantism" [2021]; note: the author, Stefano Braghioli of New Europe, actually blames iconoclasts for viciously condemning the Greats of Western Civilization to oblivion, itself a form of DARVO obscurantism: The West is built on settler colonialism, Imperialism, and genocide.)

Miscellaneous Terms, Game Theory

accommodated intellectuals

Inspired by Edward Said's Representations of the Intellectual (1993), an accommodated intellectual is—by my measure—a public-speaker, intellectual or thinker socio-materially accommodated by a formal institution of power. Though often corporatized (e.g., the think tank), this traditionally extends to tenured professors, who—even when their ideas are useful to Communism—tend to become far more concerned with cataloguing these ideas than spreading them to a wider public (so-called "academic paywalls" and general gatekeeping behaviors). Such individuals are, as I like to call them, giant chickenshits.

cognitive estrangement

The consequence of overspecialized language alienating anyone but a hyperspecific target audience, or an audience being so specialized that they cannot easily understand anything outside of their wheelhouse (a common fatality among academics or specialized researchers).

cognitive dissonance

A "psychomachic" conflict between one's feelings and thoughts, often stemming from an ideology that practices harm against particular groups that another aspect of the person is unable to face, practice or otherwise acknowledge.

anisotropic

The alteration of meaning depending on the flow of exchange—e.g., the white savior vs the black criminal (despite both being violent) vs the white oppressor vs the black victim. For our purposes, this means "for or against capital/canon," etc—i.e., bourgeois heroic action is benevolent in one direction (from the hero's point of view) and terrifying from the victim's point of view, the assigned scapegoat made to suffer as the state's chosen target of sanctioned violence inside the state of exception (more on this in the manifesto). Likewise, this remains a common phenomenon during the Promethean hero's journey inside the closed/parallel space.

concentric

"The Russian doll effect," an endless procession of mirrors, foes, doors, etc—i.e., the Promethean Quest never ends; the war, carnage and rape never cease; the confusion and utter destitution, etc.

intersectionality

When multiple bourgeois/proletarian codifiers align within a particular social group; e.g., cis-het white women or trans women of color, etc. Intersectionality tends to be canonically abjected or gaslit, gatekept, girl-bossed, fetishized, etc. This book thoroughly examines intersectionality under Capitalism as either bourgeois or proletarian.

liminality

A linguo-material position of conflict or transition, liminality is ontologically a state of being "in between," usually through failed sublimation/uncanniness; it invokes a "grey area" generally demonized in Western canon as "chaos." In truth, semantic disorder can be used to escape the perpetual exploitation and decay caused all around us by Capitalism and its giant lies (a concept we'll explore throughout this book). Liminality also occurs when working with highly canonical/colonized material, like the Western, European fantasy or highly exploitative material like canonical porn (with the word "pornography" being criminalized, thus something iconoclasts must reclaim). Gothic examples include monsters and parallel spaces, which tend to oscillate in liminal fashion.

anachronistic

Spatio-temporally incongruous; for our purposes, this applies to hauntology (a linguo-material sensation between the past and the present, but also a total inability to imagine a future beyond past forms of the future—two concepts we'll unpack during the manifesto at length).

blank/blind parody

(source: the Vaporwave Aesthetic)

In Postmodernism, or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991), Frederic Jameson writes,

"Pastiche is, like parody, the imitation of a peculiar or unique, idiosyncratic style, the wearing of a linguistic mask, speech in a dead language. But it is a neutral practice of such mimicry, without any of parody's ulterior motives, amputated of the satiric impulse, devoid of laughter and of any conviction that alongside the abnormal tongue you have momentarily borrowed, some healthy linguistic normality still exists. Pastiche is thus blank parody, a statue with blind eyeballs" (source).

Personally, I think Jameson's "normality" echoes Nietzsche's or Freud's. As such, I envision pastiche and parody as likewise having bourgeois and proletarian qualities, much like sublimation does. They can be blank under bourgeois (centrist) forms. Likewise, though, "perceptive pastiche" can adopt the appearance of a false "blankness/blindness" (see, above: "Vaporwave," a hauntological subgenre) in the face of power—a tactic vital to revolutionaries' continued funding from different sources, as well as keeping them safe from violent reactionaries.

Vaporwave/Laborwave and cyberpunk

Hauntological cryptomimesis that has the subversive potential to challenge established, status-quo nostalgias through the decay of corporate hegemony as expressed through "corporate mood." This encapsulates a gradient of aesthetics through countercultural music, art and the Gothic mode: Star Wars, Blade Runner, Alien, Mad Max, Children of Man, etc (which Capitalism will try to recuperate through by canonizing these stories, thus robbing them of their revolutionary potential; i.e., controlled opposition through Capitalist Realism).

Capitalist Realism

Fisher's adage, "It's easier to imagine the end of the world than the end of Capitalism," which comments on a profound, widespread inability to imagine a world beyond Capitalism. This often presents the end-of-the-world as the end-all, be-all; i.e., a kind of vanishing point under Hogle's narrative of the crypt: not a door to pass imaginarily through but a black gate whose inaccessible threshold cannot be surpassed by corporate design. The elite don't want people to cross it, focusing instead on canonical doubles of neoliberal entropy as part of the illusion: violence, death and decay as an "empowering" distraction from the global exploitation and destruction neoliberalism is committing against the Earth and its inhabitants. In ludic terms, engagement with this space requires occupying a space between reality and fiction, and of choosing to break the rules without our own "magic circles."

half-real

From Jesper Juul's 2005 book of the same name; i.e., "A half-real zone between the fiction and the rules" that allows for emergent forms of transformative play. This can apply to sexual artwork (exhibit 93), Gothic liminalities like ghosts (exhibit 43c), live performances like a ball or masque (exhibit 75a), or Jesper's typical ludonarrative (videogames, exhibit 64c), etc.

ludic contract (spoilsports)

An agreement between the player and the game to be played; or as Chris Pratt writes in "In Praise of Spoil Sports" (2010): "the more traditional definition of the ludic contract [is] an agreement on the part of players that they will forgo some of their agency in order to experience an activity that they enjoy." Yet, inventive players like speedrunners (which Pratt calls "spoilsports") converge upon intended gameplay with unintended, emergent forms. In other words, the ludic contract is less a formal, rigid contract and more a negotiated compromise occurring between the two; i.e., where players have some sense of agency in deciding how they want to play the game even while adhering to its rules and, in effect, being mastered by it (see: Seth Giddings and Helen Kennedy's "Little Jesuses and *@#?-off Robots," 2008, exhibit 0a2c).

the magic circle

The space where a game takes place, be that a social game, a sport, a dialog or gender performance onstage, and videogames, etc. The founder of the idea, Eric Zimmerman, writes in "Jerked Around by the Magic Circle" (2012):

The "magic circle" is not a particularly prominent phrase in Homo Ludens, and although Huizinga certainly advocates the idea that games can be understood as separate from everyday life, he never takes the full-blown magic circle point of view that games are ultimately separate from everything else in life or that rules are the sole fundamental unit of games. In fact, Huizinga's thesis is much more ambivalent on these issues and he actually closes his seminal book with a passionate argument against a strict separation between life and games. The magic circle is not something that comes wholly from Huizinga. To be perfectly honest, Katie and I more or less invented the concept, inheriting its use from my work with Frank, cobbling together ideas from Huizinga and Caillois, clarifying key elements that were important for our book, and reframing it in terms of semiotics and design – two disciplines that certainly lie outside the realm of Huizinga's own scholarly work. But that is what scholarship often is – sampling and remixing ideas in order to come to a new synthesis.

emergent play

Unintended gameplay discovered and utilized by players that wasn't intended by developers; optimal variants are called "metaplay" or simply "the meta."

intended play

Gameplay intended by the developers; in Marxist terms, this can be considered the bourgeoisie or their proponents.

framed (concentric) narratives

A story-within-a-story (aka mise-en-abyme in artistic circles, whose translation "placement in abyss" takes on more spooky liminalities in Gothic circles), generally a perspective contained within an unreliable narrator's point-of-view. A famous example is Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, which tells the story from the shipmaster's perspective, who learns everything about Victor and the Creature from Victor. Victor is a giant, colonial douchebag who lies constantly and does his very patriarchal best to whitewash everything. The Creature, meanwhile, is reactively abused constantly and forced to defend his position after Victor has dragged his name through the mud for most of the novel.

unreliable narratives/narrators/spaces (monsters)

A narrator or narrative that is untrustworthy or epistemologically/phenomenologically dubious; in Gothic stories, these rely on ambiguous, historically-contested/-conflicting spaces with liminal markers.

palimpsest

"A manuscript or piece of writing material on which the original writing has been effaced to make room for later writing but of which traces remain"—common in Gothic stories, which amount to a cycle of lies; i.e., historical materialism: bourgeois history is unreliable, treacherous, like a Gothic lover or a concentric chest/midden of unreliable materials (cryptonyms). It can apply to a variety of media or formats: sculpture, music, clothes, videogames, etc (exhibit 5b, 43a/43b).

universal adaptability

A concept borrowed from Slavoj Žižek's A Pervert's Guide to Ideology (2012), which outlines the ways in which a piece of media (in his case, Beethoven's "Ode to Joy") can be utilized universally by different groups to promote their own ideologies—all in spite of the original source material, including the author's socio-political stance.

The Gothic, BDSM and Kink

Gothic narrators/narratives

For its hero, narrators, spaces and speakers, a Gothic tale regularly involves unreliable/conflicting artificers and imposters, but also the patriarchal bloodline or castle as invented; i.e., as a series of concentric, sedimentary palimpsests. In the canonical sense, everything is fetishized, valorized and disseminated, then spread far and wide to cover up the ghost of the counterfeit (the circular lie of the West) with more ghosts that further the lie. Iconoclastic variants challenge this myopia with their own counterfeits' opposing class character inside a shared, contested midden.

Gothic doubling

The black mirror of historical materialism's all our yesterdays. It is the fated, ominous premonition of endless circuituity—that everything has already occurred before, or things that have already occurred will occur again from the same materials that occur out of what has already occurred; i.e., for everything that exists, there must (somewhere in the universe) be a dialectical-material "shadow" whose coinciding status as former-or-future counterfeit is actually historical materialism's circular approach to space and time felt in the current moment: everything that has ever existed will exist again or things that will exist have already existed in ways that offer up a prior version's dialectical-material opposition to it—a castle or soldier as "evil" twin, uncanny and undead, replicated like an echo, a virus, a shade; the civil war of black infinity. There is no automatic moral character, merely the presence of infinite possibility amid crushing gravity and decay.

the Gothic heroine

Note: Many of the drawings in this book are actually modified versions from my own portfolio—updated using collage/airbrushing techniques that I've been using for years. —Perse)

The oft-female (or at least feminine) protagonist of Gothic stories. Classically a passive sex object/detective/damsel-in-distress, which became increasingly masculine, active and warlike in the 20th century onwards (though Charlotte Dacre beat everyone to the punch in 1806 when she wrote Zofloya, having the masculine-yet-trammeled Victoria de Loredani stab Lilla, the archetypal Gothic heroine, to death). Unlike their male counterparts, who tend to default to soldiers or scientists (violent/mentally fragile men of war and reason with—at least in America—closeted ties to Nazi Germany and parallel conservative movements wearing a liberal guise), women within the colonial binary are relegated to spheres of domesticated ignorance; i.e., "Something is wacky about my residence, my guest, my wardrobe, etc. Guess I'll go investigate (exhibit 48a)!" Ann Radcliffe treated the protecting of female virtue as an "armoring" (exhibit 30c) process that commonly worked through a swooning mechanism; though somewhat problematic on its face due to its pro-European origins, the idea of armoring one's virtue still presents the notion of feminine flexibility as facing monstrous-feminine things that male, or at least "phallic," heroes cannot rationalize or stab/shoot to death; i.e., the paradox of terror as something to reclaim through counterterror devices that, yes, include a fair bit of rape, taboo sex, and murderous stereotypes. In other words, it's entirely possible to have the Great Destroyer persona without being bigoted, but you have to camp it, first.

xenophobia

Monster-slaying. A fear of the unknown as something to exude or endure, which may take sex-positive or sex-coercive forms. Inside Gothic circles, theatrical xenophobia sits between fear of and fascination towards "the other" as a social-sexual construct; i.e., inherited either by privileged workers acting out unironic gender trouble, or minorities surviving it through their own ironic variation of gender trouble and gender parody in monstrous forms. As such, harmful xenophobia fearfully dogmatizes outsider groups, presenting them as beings to hate, abject and kill, but also fetishize: monstrous-feminine women ("woman is other") but also witches, Amazons, queer/feminine people (trans, intersex and non-binary) and various sodomic ritual metaphors (vampirism, exhibit 41g3; crossdress, exhibit 55b; and lycanthropy/werewolves, exhibit 87a; etc) for non-heteronormative/gender-non-conforming sexual orientations, performances, and identities as deserving of violence by assimilated minorities/token police (e.g., TERFs). Because of the sexual nature of stigma and bias, harmful xenophobia crosses over into harmful xenophilia, and their combined liminal expression elides with cathartic variants of either approach in the same theatrical territories.

monstrous-feminine

into—i.e., a psychosexual, "corrupt," medievalized ontology whose canonical role they don't want to play but also desire to escape from using the same language: the queer/sodomite whose gender-non-conformity is synonymized with the "rape" of heteronormativity by the monstrous-feminine and whose beauty is feared by fearful-fascinated straight people conflating queerness as a universal symbol of unironic rape and madness. We do sometimes want to express our own trauma in relation to what we're made out to be by our abusers, but ultimately we desire to be butterflies unto ourselves: free from trauma, from judgement, from harm.)

A term lifted from Barbara Creed's The Monstrous-Feminine. While Creed focuses on the desire for the cis woman not to be a victim, thus terrifying men in abject, monstrous ways (which are often then crucified by heteronormative agents, including token ones like Ellen Ripley), the fact remains that the monstrous-feminine extends to a much broader persecution network; i.e., of any "feminine" force that falls outside of what is acceptable within the Patriarchy's heteronormative colonial binary. I have placed feminine in quotes to account for anything perceived as "feminine" thus "not correctly "male"; i.e., "woman is other" expanded to trans, intersex and non-binary persons (and the animals associated with them: bunnies, butterflies, cats, dogs, foxes, etc). This can be a male twink or vampire; the cis-queer bear's expression of tenderness and love towards another man (or whoever they're intimate with in whatever way constitutes intimacy for them); a female Amazon that rebels against the state, whether cis, or genderqueer in binary/non-binary ways. The possibilities for heteronormative conformity are narrow and brutal inside a vast historical-material tableau of the same-old patterns; gender-non-conformity's ironies go on endlessly.

Monster-fucking. A love of the unknown as something to exude or endure, which may take sex-positive or sex-coercive forms. Whereas harmful (sex-coercive) xenophobia bleeds into harmful xenophilia, the sex-positive reversal of abjection and canonical xenophobia/xenophilia resists state power through covert, proletarian means; e.g., "Trojan" monsters and monster-slaying/-fucking rituals that hide revolutionary intent during liminal expressions of oppositional praxis as oft-pornographic. The monster isn't simply someone to fuck (though it can be); it's also someone to potentially love asexually as an "ace" friend/co-conspirator—e.g., Nimona (exhibit 56d2). As such, cathartic xenophilia extends to empathy for the wretched, whose medievalized trauma often overlaps with their sexuality and gender but doesn't synonymize with it; indeed, cathartic xenophilia seeks to understand their rage at, and medieval alienation by, state powers (the xenomorph being a queer icon we shall examine many, many times throughout this book, but especially in Volume Two's "Demon" section of chapters).

psychosexuality ("battle sex")

Literally "of sex and the mind," but in Gothic often having a combative "sex battle" element (the psychomachy), psychosexuality is the adjacent placement of pleasurable pain and other euphoric sensations next to unironic harm; i.e., rape fantasy or theatre. Just as canon and camp exist in the same shadow zone, performative irony and its absence are equally liminal using the same shared aesthetics of power and resistance, death and rape, heroic (monstrous) violence: the colors of stigma, vice, power and sin. Canonical psychosexuality conflates pleasure with genuine harm, including bigoted stereotypes that further this pathology. These result in widespread misconceptions about healthy BDSM as a result of sex-coercive BDSM (through unironic "demon BDSM" examples, including criminal hauntology news cycles or "true crime" in other mediums besides television), and genuine pluralities that seek out dangerous sex (hard kink) due to confused pleasure responses resulting from extreme prey mechanisms/posttraumatic stress disorder that compel victims to unironically spifflicate; i.e., "to be self-destroyed or disposed of by violence" in an unironic sense. As something to unironically or ironically seek out on and offstage, abuse manifests differently per person relative to congenital and environmental factors which are often accident-of-birth. But general psychosexuality manifests through the Destroyer persona and their utterly devastated victim as part of the same social-sexual equation; i.e., a cultural pathology or ironic, informed interrogation regarding the proliferation of this extremism in normalized, canonical depictions of heroic sexuality as embattled: as sex-coercive, hence unironically violent and rapacious through warring factions thereof (and against camp in the larger meta conversation).

calculated risk/risk reduction exercise

A calculated risk minimizes harm but mimics the feeling of being out of control; e.g., consent-non-consent/informed consent.

fetishization

A fetish, or the act of making something into a fetish, is "a form of sexual desire in which gratification is linked to an abnormal degree to a particular object, item of clothing, or part of the body." Generally, fetishes are pre-existing social-sexual trends that people either embrace or reject. They aren't explicitly sexist (e.g., mutually consenting to show feet), but become sexist when used in exploitative ways (e.g., sex workers forced to show their feet to generate profit for someone else).

The tacit-to-aggressive apologizing for rape in society at large. Learned power abuses taught by state-corporate propaganda and power relations through "Pavlovian/Pygmalion" conditioning that breaks the recipient's mind, bending them towards automatic, violent behaviors towards state targets during moral panics. This response can be men mistreating women, but also women mistreating each other or their fellow exploited workers (who can mistreat each other); i.e., TERFs abusing trans people and ethnic minorities. When executed and learned on a societal level, these sex-coercive practices become codified as "bad play" in canonical BDSM narratives, which recycle in and out of popular media (re: the Shadow of Pygmalion/Cycle of Kings).

Man Box/"prison sex" mentality

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

weird canonical nerds (versus weird iconoclastic nerds)

[already defined in full, in "Essential Keywords"]

good play vs bad play

Forms of power exchange during oppositional praxis; i.e., sex-positive BDSM and other social-sexual practices and code built on mutual/informed consent vs sex coercion and harmful BDSM/rape culture. Bad play is the emulation of white, cis-het men as the unironic performers of coercive sex, bondage, murder and rape (e.g., TERFs dominating members of their own group).

chaser/bait

Trans women are often seen as "bait" within a "prison sex" mentality—i.e., forbidden, monstrous-feminine fruit for reactionaries (including regressive feminists) to publicly condemn and privately "chase." A "chaser" is someone a person who outwardly rejects the pursuit of "sodomy" (non-reproductive, monstrous-feminine sex, in the medieval sense) but secretly pursues it in private in relation to various out-group types associated with it: the twink, femboy or ladyboy, or trans women more broadly (or the remainder of classic gay man's lexicon of animalized/body hair terms: hunk, twunk, otter, bear or polar bear. Queer sexuality tends to be much more adjective-based than straight orientation descriptors, "I'm a straight" being about it). "Baiting" can be inverted, with trans women and similar groups also being policed in the sex worker community by AFAB workers who, likewise, brand or otherwise treat us as "false women" who aren't monstrous like they are, thus become worthy of attack to earn clemency from men amid their own self-hatred; i.e., we're "luring" their customers away from them like cis-male sex workers do and should be regarded with suspicion and contempt (to be clear, neither we nor cis-male sex workers should be treated this way but our treatment—as gender-non-conforming AMAB persons by AFAB sex workers—is transphobic).

game of undress for many traps; the masculine-feminine becomes an advertisement of "incorrect," monstrous-feminine masculinity on the surface of female-appearing bodies before the clothes come off [although such bodies are habitually undressed by the Male Gaze; said gaze can be emulated by TERFs policing male and female bodies]. Either liminality is dangerous for gender-non-conforming AMAB/AFAB sex workers, but also workers in general seeking to express themselves as different from, thus in resistance to, the canonical standard and its Symbolic Order/mythic structure.)

trap/twink-in-peril/bait

A slur directed at homosexual men/gender-non-conforming AMABs, who are fetishized/coercively demonized by cis-het men during gender trouble when the nation-state cannot provide them heteronormative sex ("war brides"). Often, queer fiction comments on this exploitative side of the "bury your gays" trope through an abject, queer damsel-in-distress: the twink-in-peril, perhaps articulated mostly nakedly (with raw exploitation, but also exceptional nuance) in Dennis Cooper's Frisk (1991) or Gregg Araki's The Doom Generation (1995). Gentler, less-brutalized versions of this monstrous-feminine can be found sprinkled all throughout popular fiction, including Cloud-in-a-dress from Final Fantasy 7 (1997) and "Gerudo Link" from the Zelda series (which we'll explore more in Volume Three, Chapter Three, exhibit 93). "Traps" in quotes is something that could be supplied to AFAB workers, whose appearance beyond heteronormative standards leads them to becoming demonized as a queer "bait," or trick (no pun intended) that leads chases down queerer and queerer rabbit holes.

bears, otters, hunks/twunks/twinks; lesbians and femmes

The traditionally homosexual male/female language of the 1970s, '80s and 90s. It doesn't exclusively apply to homosexuality and can be non-binarized in order to describe body preferences, orientations and performances (e.g., Link is a twink/twunk depending on the game or scenario); all the same, it has been historically utilized by cis queer people as a movement that ostensibly predates the trans, nonbinary and intersex movements of the Internet Age (with these groups having existed for just as long—i.e., before Western Civilization). Furthermore, some words, like "twink," "dyke," and obviously "faggot" have a pejorative, monstrous-feminine flavor within their own communities, being reclaimed throughout the '90s into the new millennium. There is also cis bias against gender-non-conforming usage of these words, seeing it as "colonization" of the monstrous-feminine from an incorrect variant (a thought pattern of self-hatred that, once internalized, is used to divided and conquer minority groups by having them police themselves).

femboys, ladyboys, catboys; catgirls, [anything] girls

The application of something "femme" next to "boy" historically has an emasculating quality towards men who, in cis-conforming circles (straight or gay/bi), are expected to dominate the feminine, thus weaker party. Obviously this has been slowly reclaimed since the '90s, but cis-queer assimilation still leads to Man Box culture within homosexual and bisexual men and women, but also tokens (a "butch," female, cis/token domme can abuse her smaller "femme" partner in a queernormative sense; or internalized bigotry can lead trans, intersex or non-binary parties to emulate these behaviors as the giver or receiver). In heteronormative circles, adding the suffix, "girl," to the end of a word sexualizes or feminizes them in a dimorphic way—i.e., a cat girl is (from a cis standpoint) a girl, thus coded as such ("cat" curiously being a "femme" entity for precisely this collocation, leading catboys to being seen as femme gay men; e.g., "neko" meaning a male "bottom" in Japanese slang). These terms are often qualified with various other descriptors in public discourse at large, including sex work; e.g., a "pastel goth non-binary catgirl brat": aesthetic descriptors + gender + gender performance + BDSM type. The soft or cuddly is still feminine, thus a monster that must be dominated to preserve patrilineal descent, authority and conquest against a prescribed enemy.

Described by Mateusz Urbanowicz as an infantilized art style of women popular in Japan, generally to make them look physically and emotionally younger—historically a form of female exploitation by male artists.

ahegao

A facial expression tied to hentai ("perversion") Japanese culture and the abject sexual objectification of women; i.e., the "little death" of the so-called "O face" made during orgasm, especially achieved by rough sex and rape play. While its "death face" is historically attached to rape culture and unironic rape porn, latter-day variants have become blind parodies (exhibit 104d) to the buried historical trauma (appreciative forms can also be enjoyed in private/public exhibitions, however).

live burial

The Gothic master-trope, live burial—as marked by Eve Segewick in her introduction to The Coherence of Gothic Conventions (1986)—is expressed in the language of live burial as an endless metaphor for the buried libido within concentric structures as something to punish "digging into" (which includes investigating the false family's incestuous/abjectly monstrous bloodline; source). move beyond psychoanalytical models and into Marxist territories, I would describe live burial as incentivized by power structures in ways that threaten abuse (often death, incarceration or rape) to those who go looking into hereditary and dynastic power structures, especially their psychosexual abuse and worker exploitation: the fate of the horny detective, but also the whistleblower.

kink

Nontraditional forms of sexual activity that don't necessarily involve forms of power exchange between partners (unequal or otherwise).

roleplay

The playing of roles in social-sexual situations, usually with a dominant/submissive element (as many come from classic stories which tend to be heteronormative; but even iconoclastic stories transmute BDSM, fetishes and kinks to be sex-positive within dominant/submissive models).

cuckolding

In sex-positive roleplay terms, cuckolding is watching someone fuck your SO (significant other) or having someone watch will you fuck their SO; i.e., a mutually consensual, negotiated activity.

negotiation

The drawing up of power levels, exchange limits, boundaries and comfort levels (soft and hard limits) before social-sexual BDSM activities.

safe word(s)

Permission/boundary words used (often by a submissive but not always) to stall/stop whatever BDSM activities are unfolding. A common example is the traffic light system; i.e., "Green light, yellow light, red light."

consent-non-consent

Negotiated social-sexual scenarios through informed consent, consent-non-consent where one party surrenders total control over to the other party trusting that party to not betray said agreement or trust; aka "RACK" (Risk-Aware Consensual Kink) in relation to risky BDSM; i.e., bodily harm; e.g., public beatings, rape scenarios, whippings, knife play and blood-letting.

(demon) BDSM

Bondage, discipline, sadism, and masochism—seemingly nontraditional forms of sexual activity that involve unequal power exchange that has actually been canonized and must be camped in doubled forms. Both involve power, but non-consensual (sex-coercive) variants canonically involve power abuse—generally of women and other marginalized workers by white, cis-het men/arguably token queers in romanticized tales thereof (e.g., Stoker's vampire, Barker's Cenobite) that often, according to Susan Sontag's "Fascinating Fascism" (1974), invoke not just the "master scenario" whose purely sexual experience is "severed from personhood, from relationships, from love," but also the fascist language of death: "The color is black [and red], the material is leather, the seduction is beauty, the justification is honesty, the aim is ecstasy, the fantasy is death" (source). In a sex-positive sense, such rituals regularly invoke demons as a Gothicized means of catharsis, but also practicing impulse and power control during non-harmful euphoria whose painful, physical, emotional, and/or sexual activities occur between good-faith participants; i.e., ironic variants of Radcliffe's classically xenophobic and dubiously "consensual" Black Veil (hiding the threat badly), demon lover (the xenophobic/xenophilic threat of unironic mutilation and rape), and exquisite "torture" (rape play).

dom(inator/-inatrix)

A BDSM actor who performs a dominant role—traditionally masculine (especially in Gothic canon: Mr. Rochester, Edward Cullen, Christian Grey and all the million monster variants of these kinds of characters) thus ostensibly having more power. However, in honored realms of mutual consent, they actually have less power than the sub, who only has to say no/red light, etc (for a good example of sub power, watch the 2014 Gothic-erotic thriller, The Duke of Burgundy); the sub controls the action by giving the dom permission according to negotiated boundaries.

A BDSM actor who performs a submissive role—traditionally feminine (especially in Gothic canon: Jane Eyre, Bella Swan, Anastasia Steele and all the million monster variants of these kinds of characters) thus ostensibly having less power. However, in sex-positive scenarios, the sub calls the shots from moment-to-moment (except in consent-non-consent, where they only agreed to everything up front and sign everything over ahead of time—a useful tactic for certain rape fantasies and regression scenarios).

"strict/gentle"

A BDSM flavor or style generally affixed to the dom in terms of their delivery. A "strict" dominatrix, for example, will administer discipline much more authoritatively than a "gentle" variant will; i.e., she will deny succor as a theatrical device to supply through the ritual, whereas the gentle dominatrix will be far more nurturing and supportive from the offset.

topping/a top vs "bottoming"/a bottom

These terms generally refer to dominant/submissive sexual activity in which someone "tops"; i.e., "rides"/is rode. However, they can refer to BDSM/social-sexual arrangements with various, historically-materially ironic configurations; e.g., "power bottoms" or "topping from the bottom" (which can be literal, in terms of the execution of physical sex, but also have BDSM implications/monster personages, too).

regression

In terms of mental health, regression is a form of dissociation, often tied to trauma or healing from trauma. Common in rituals of appreciative peril, which include Big/little roles daddy/mommy doms and boy/girl subs, etc. However, regression is also something that sex-coercive predation keys off of through regressive politics; i.e., to regress socio-politically towards a conservative medieval when Capitalism enters decay.

Fantasies tied to sexual/power abuse (rape isn't about sex at all; it's about coercive power control and abuse). This kind of performative peril can be appreciative/appropriative, thus bourgeois/canonical or proletarian/iconoclastic. Common in Gothic narratives, which tend to project trauma, rape and power abuse onto displaced, dissociative scenarios: man vs nature, Jack-London-style; the lady vs the rapist or the slave vs the master in numerous articulations (racialized, but also in BDSM-monster frameworks), etc.

aftercare

Rituals supplied after BDSM (or frankly just rough sex/emotional bonding moments and other social-sexual exchanges) that help the affected party recover better than they would if left unattended ("rode hard and put away wet" as it were).

the ghost of the counterfeit

Coined by Jerrold Hogle, this abject reality or hidden barbarity is a hauntological process of abjection that, according to David Punter in The Literature of Terror: A History of Gothic Fictions from 1765 to the Present Day (1980), "displaces the hidden violence of present social structures, conjures them up again as past, and falls promptly under their spell" (source). I would add that it is a privileged, liminal position that endears a sheltered consumer to the barbaric past as reinvented as consumable.

the narrative of the crypt

According to Cynthia Sugars' entry for David Punter's the Encyclopedia of the Gothic (2012), this narrative is described by Jerrold Hogle as the only thing that survives—a narrative of a narrative to a hidden curse announced by things displaced from the former cause. Sugars determines, the closer one gets to the problem, the more the space itself abruptly announces a vanishing point, a procession of fragmented illusions tied to a transgenerational curse: "a place of concealment that stands on mere ashes of something not fully present," Hogle writes of Otranto (the first "gothic" castle, reassembled for Horace Walpole's 1764 "archaeology").

Defined by Jodey Castricano in Cryptomimesis: The Gothic and Jacques Derrida's Ghost Writing as,

A writing practice that, like certain Gothic conventions [e.g., Segewick's commentary on live burial as a timeless fixture of Gothic literature] generates its uncanny effects through the production of what Nicholas Rand might call a "contradictory 'topography of inside-outside'" [from Abraham and Torok's The Wolf Man's Magic Word ...] Moreover, the term cryptomimesis draws attention to a writing predicated upon encryption: the play of revelation and concealment lodged within parts of individual words (source).

Castricano further describes this process as "writing with ghosts," referring to their nature as linguistic devices that adhere the sense of being haunted in domestic spaces: the house as inside, familiar and inherited by the living from the dead.

From Tony Morrison's 1987 novel, Beloved, to which Morrison herself shares in a 2019 interview, "as in recollecting and remembering as in reassembling the members of the body, the family, the population of the past. And it was the struggle, the pitched battle between remembering and forgetting, that became the device of the narrative [in Beloved]" (source).

ghosts

Ghosts are ontologically complicated, thus can be a variety of things all at once: a sentient ghost of something or someone, a ghostly memory or their own unique entity that resembles the original as a historical-material coincidence (the chronotope), a friendly/unfriendly disguise, or creative egregore. E.g., Hamlet's dad, Hamlet's memory of his dad as triggered by the space around him; or someone painting Hamlet's dad as its own thing that isn't Shakespeare's version despite the likeness. This applies to other famous ghosts in media—e.g., King Boo from Mario, the monster from It Follows, 2014; or my own friendly ghost of Jadis from exhibit 43c—i.e., Derrida's Marxist spectres.

the Promethean Quest/awesome mystery

Gothic stories enjoy a sense of awesome power tied to the chronotope or awesome ruin (what Percy Shelley calls "the colossal Wreck," exhibit 5e, 64c, etc). In the wake of a great calamity is the presence of intimations of power that must be uncovered in pursuit of the truth—i.e., the Promethean (self-destructive) Quest. We'll examine several in the Humanities primer, including Edmund Burke's Sublime, Mary Shelley's "playing god," Rudolph Otto's Numinous/mysterium tremendum, and Lovecraft's cosmic nihilism, etc. All indicate the Gothic pursuit of a big power that blasts the finder to bits; or, in Radcliffe's case, is explained away during the conclusion of an explained supernatural/rationalized event; i.e., the explained supernatural (exhibit 22, Scooby Doo and Velma).

"playing god"

In iconoclastic terms, "playing god" is the ability to self-fashion (aka "self-determination" in geopolitics). It is generally resented by the status quo, or demonized for being too dangerous; e.g., Satan from Paradise Lost as a self-fashioning devil moving away from God's heteronormative, colonial-binarized image.

(exhibit 5c: Two examples of the Promethean Quest/awesome mystery—from Event Horizon [top and bottom, 1997] and Alien [middle, 1979].)

the Black Veil

(source: "The Rise of the Gothic Novel" by Stephen Carver)

Radcliffe's famous "cloaking device" from The Mysteries of Udolpho, delayed until the end of the book (over 500 pages) to reveal behind a great terrible thing that made our heroine swoon; i.e., her immodest desire to look upon something that threatens her virtue and fragile mind. It remains a common device used in horror media today—e.g., as I note in "Gothic themes in The Vanishing / Spoorloos (1988)," the Black Veil is present all throughout that film.

demon lover

Cynthia Wolff writes on Radcliffe's process in "The Radcliffean Gothic Model":

Let us say that when an individual reads a fully realized piece of fiction, he (or she) will "identify" primarily with one character, probably the principal character, and that this character will bear the principal weight of the reader's projected feelings. Naturally, an intelligent reader will balance this identification; to some extent there will be identification with each major character—even, perhaps, with a narrative voice. But these will be distributed appropriately throughout the fiction. Now a Gothic novel presents us with a different kind of situation. It is but a partially realized piece of fiction: it is formulaic (a moderately sophisticated reader already knows more or less exactly what to expect in its plot); it has little or no sense of particularized "place," and it offers a heroine with whom only a very few would wish to identify. Its fascination lies in the predictable interaction between the heroine and the other main characters. The reader identifies (broadly and loosely) with the predicament as a totality: the ritualized conflict that takes place among the major figures of a Gothic fiction (within the significant boundaries of that "enclosed space") represents in externalized form the conflict any single woman might experience. The reader will project her feelings into several characters, each one of whom will carry some element of her divided "self." A woman pictures herself as trapped between the demands of two sorts of men—a "chaste" lover and a "demon" lover—each of whom is really a reflection of one portion of her own longing. Her rite of passage takes the form of (1) proclaiming her right to preside as mistress over the Gothic structure and (2) deciding which man (which form of "love") may penetrate its recesses!

There have been two distinct waves of Radcliffean Gothic fiction: one that began in the late eighteenth century and one that began in this century between the World Wars... (source).

Exquisite "torture" is a Radcliffe staple, and classically pits the imperiled heroine inside a complicated, but generally unironic rape fantasy within the Gothic castle. Somewhere in the castle is a demon lover who is both more exciting than the boring-ass hero, and someone who speaks to the heroine's inheritance anxiety and/or lived trauma inside the chronotope. The fantasy on the page is a form of controlled risk, but Radcliffe's forms are "proto-vanilla" in that they emerged at the very beginnings of feminism/female discourse and whose imaginary safe spaces are actually didactically unsafe. According to Wolff,

Two hundred years ago Ann Radcliffe introduced Gothic conventions into the mainstream of English fiction. For the first time the process of feminine sexual initiation found respectable, secular expression. Yet the terms of this expression were ultimately limiting. It is important to recognize and acknowledge the heritage of Ann Radcliffe's Gothic tradition; it is even more important now to move on and invent other, less mutilating conventions for the rendering of feminine sexual desire (source).

the explained supernatural

The sensation of a seemingly profound or Numinous in Radcliffe's stories, often linked to fear of unironic rape and death, but also boring material disputes that involve these things. The threat—like her mischievous pirates—are dressed up as ghosts or monsters to fool the detective so they can rob the state (and maybe the heroine) of their goods (the heroine and her modesty being "priceless treasure" in the eyes of themselves having internalized these bigotries, but also the men "protecting" them).

Ludic-Gothic

the closed space

A self-contained, claustrophobic, Gothic parallel space—generally a site of seemingly awesome power, age and danger (usually occupied by something sinister, if only the viewer's piqued curiosity/imperiled imagination): churches, abbeys, monasteries, castles, mad laboratories, (war/urban crime scenes), insane asylums, etc.

The term is reworked from Cynthia Griffin Wolff's concept of "enclosed space" from her 1979 essay, "The Radcliffean Gothic Model: A Form for Feminine Sexuality"

Now a Gothic novel presents us with a different kind of situation. It is but a partially realized piece of fiction: it is formulaic (a moderately sophisticated reader already knows more or less exactly what to expect in its plot); it has little or no sense of particularized "place," and it offers a heroine with whom only a very few would wish to identify. Its fascination lies in the predictable interaction between the heroine and the other main characters. in that I've extended it beyond the purely psychological models (and psyches) of a traditional Gothic readership (white, cis-het women) and now-outmoded school of thought (the Female Gothic of the 1970s). I do so in connection to how the Gothic mode generally employs deeply confusing and overwhelming time-spaces (chronotopes)—what Manuel Aguirre, in 2008, referred to as "Geometries of Terror" (exhibit 64b/64c)—that, along with their ambiguous, perplexing inhabitants (exhibit 64a), phenomenologically disrupt the monomyth in pointedly deconstructive, hauntological ways: the Promethean (self-destructive) hero's quest as something that undermines patrilineal descent and dynastic power exchange/hereditary rites in a never-ending cycle of war crimes, lies and blood sacrifice (a fearful critique of medieval feudalism).

Metroidvania

[already defined, in "Essential Keywords"]

Metroidvania as closed space

an extended list of writing [that you can find on my website]

ergodic

As defined by Espen J. Aarseth in Cybertext: Perspectives on Ergodic Literature (1997): "During the cybertextual process, the user will have effectuated a semiotic sequence, and this selective movement is a work of physical construction that the various concepts of 'reading' do not account for. [...] In ergodic literature, nontrivial effort is required to traverse the text," meaning effort beyond eye movement and the periodic or arbitrary turning of pages; spatially there is more than one route to take, or multiple ways one can take the same route to complete an objective or series of objectives (which in Metroidvania, are generally unspoken; Super Metroid is famous for its lack of narration, open-ended world, and non-linear fragmented narrative).

Liminal spaces, in architectural terms, are spaces designed to be moved through; in Gothic terms, these amount to Bakhtin's chronotopes as museum-like times spaces that, when moved through, help past legends come alive, animating in literal and figuratively Gothic/medieval ways. Classically these include the animated portrait, miniature, gargoyle, (often giant) suit of armor, effigy and double, etc; more modern variants include Tool's early music videos (exhibit 43a), Trent Reznor's 1994 music video for "Closer" (exhibit 43b) and Mario 64's own liminal spaces as outlined by Marilyn Roxie's "Marilyn Roxie presents ... The Inescapable Weirdness of Super Mario 64" (2020).

liminal monsters (expression)/monster girls

Monsters are generally liminal, but some more than others openly convey a partial, ambivalent, oscillating sense of conflict on the surface of their imagery. A hopelessly common example is the monster girl, as AFAB persons are generally fetishized/demonized "waifu" in canon and must be reclaimed in sex-positive forms (exhibit 5e; 23a, the Medusa; 49, phallic women; 50, furies; 62e, cavewomen, etc). The advanced degree of this trope is the monster mother, which expects the women to exist in ways that cater to men that are both loved and feared in fetishizing ways, but also sacrificed (exhibits 51b1, 87b1 and 102b, etc). Akin to a black mirror, Eve Segewick, in 1981, called this mimesis "the character in the veil [or] imagery of the surface in the Gothic novel." The basic gist, they argue, is the sexualizing of a surfaces in Gothic media (their example being the nun's veil); i.e., a "shallow pattern" literally on the surface of paper or a screen or glass that can evoke a deeper systemic problem that spans space and time.

The Tusk, for example, is a sexy cavegirl who iconoclastically stinks—i.e., with body odor being historically-materially denied to women despite their armpits smelling just as much as guys' do, let alone their vaginas, which guys do not have and can have all sorts of smells: e.g., Zeuhl once asked me to smell their panties, saying incredulously, "Isn't that crazy?" because their cootchie smelled rather strong [and to which my look of shock, post-smelling it, utterly betrayed me. To be fair, it was rather pungent from us simply walking around my hometown. All the same, bodies smell because they're designed to; e.g., that same night, we had doggystyle sex and for the first time I could suddenly smell the natural "musk" from Zeuhl's asshole: a vestigial throwback to a time when humans communicated more by smells than with words]. Apart from the Tusk, the Hood is a slutty Red Riding Hood, and the Fawn is a patchwork animal-girl ninja, etc.

chimeras/furries:

(exhibit 5f: Artist, left: William Mai; artist, right: Blush Brush. Examples of furries. "Furry" is an incredibly diverse art style. For more examples, consider Volume Two's "Call of the Wild" chapter, as well as exhibits 65 or 68 from Volume Three.)

A chimera isn't simply the Greek monster, but any kind of composite body or entity, often with elements of multiplicity or plurality (e.g., the Gerasene demon). Conversely, furries are humanoid [commonly called "anthro"] personas that tend to have humanoid bodies, but semi-animalistic limbs and intersex components tied to ancient rituals of fertility but also gender expression relating to/identifying with nature. While Greek myths are commonly more animalistic, the (mainstream) furries of today are often closer to the Ancient Egyptian variety: an animal "headdress" or mask over a mostly-human body. There's plenty of morphological gradients, of course—with "feral" or "bestial" variants being more and more animalistic; and the "Giger variety" being more xenomorphic and Gothically surreal (the xenomorph [exhibit 51a/60c] being one of the most famous, if contested, chimeras in modern times). A general rule of thumb, however, is the genitals tend to be human; however, "monster-fucker" variants very quickly move away from humanoid bodies (and/or genitals) altogether, often with abject, stigma animals like the insect, leech, reptile, or worm. Likewise, while "fursonas" (furry personas) tend to be sexualized, they aren't always; in fact, they primarily function as alteregos with many different functions: the political (see: alt-right furies as well as "furry panic"), the dramatic (Fredrik Knudsen, 2019), the horror genre (see: pretty much anything by Junji Ito, but also Five Nights at Freddy's, 2014; or its various wacky clones, source: Space Ice, 2023) and also for general fandom purposes; i.e., furies are not automatically fetishes (Vice, 2018) but are criminalized similar to Bronies (though any popular fandom that has a large underage audience is going to attract sexual predators and outsider bias; see: Turkey Tom's 2023 [admittedly problematic] "Degenerate" series on Bronies or Five Nights at Freddy's; or Lily Orchard's pedophile escapades, hidden behind sexualized Brony fan fiction—Essence of Thought, 2021).

monster-fucking

The mutually consensual act of fucking monsters; i.e., sex-positive, Gothicized kink. However, as this tends to involve inhuman, animal-esque creatures beyond just werewolves, Frankensteinian creatures, or vampires, make sure to refer to the Harkness test (exhibit 38c) to avoid conducting/depicting bestiality or pedophilia! Note: While sexual abuse does happen in furry communities, these communities are ultimately quite small and those behaviors are not the norm within any more than in the LGBTQ community at large. However, in the tradition of moral panics, this won't stop reactionary groups from scapegoating furies and similar out-groups, the persecutors hypocritically overlooking widespread systemic abuse by paramilitaries and communities leaders in the bargain. —Perse

ABOUT US

THE MISSION OF THE SATANIC TEMPLE IS TO ENCOURAGE BENEVOLENCE AND EMPATHY, REJECT TYRANNICAL AUTHORITY, ADVOCATE PRACTICAL COMMON SENSE, OPPOSE INJUSTICE, AND UNDERTAKE NOBLE PURSUITS.

THE SATANIC TEMPLE

We have publicly confronted hate groups, fought for the abolition of corporal punishment in public schools, applied for equal representation when religious institutions are placed on public property, provided religious exemption and legal protection against laws that unscientifically restrict people's reproductive autonomy, exposed harmful pseudo-scientific practitioners in mental health care, organized clubs alongside other religious after-school clubs in schools besieged by proselytizing organizations, and engaged in other advocacy in accordance with our tenets.

PRINT INFORMATIONAL PAMPHLET

THERE ARE SEVEN FUNDAMENTAL TENETS

- I One should strive to act with compassion and empathy toward all creatures in accordance with reason.
- II The struggle for justice is an ongoing and necessary pursuit that should prevail over laws and institutions.
- III One's body is inviolable, subject to one's own will alone.
- IV The freedoms of others should be respected, including the freedom to offend. To willfully and unjustly encroach upon the freedoms of another is to forgo one's own.
- V Beliefs should conform to one's best scientific understanding of the world. One should take care never to distort scientific facts to fit one's beliefs.
- VI People are fallible. If one makes a mistake, one should do one's best to rectify it and resolve any harm that might have been caused.
- VII Every tenet is a guiding principle designed to inspire nobility in action and thought. The spirit or compassion, wisdom, and justice should always prevail over the written or spoken word.

THE SATANIC TEMPLE VS. CHURCH OF SATAN

The Satanic Temple has become the primary religious Satanic organization in the world with congregations internationally, and a number of high-profile public campaigns designed to preserve and advance secularism and individual liberties. The rise of The Satanic Temple has been met with an increase in commentary regarding what Satanism is as media outlets struggle to grasp how this upstart religion has begun to shift religious liberty debates with claims of equal access.

With unfortunate regularity - and much to our chagrin - The Satanic Temple is confused with an earlier organization, the Church of Satan, founded by Anton Szandor LaVey in the 1960s. The Church of Satan expresses vehement opposition to the campaigns and activities of The Satanic Temple, asserting themselves as the only "true" arbiters of Satanism, while The Satanic Temple dismisses the Church of Satan as irrelevant and inactive.

FAQ

(exhibit 5h: The Satanic Temple website. I never joined, but they seem like an alright bunch—especially compared to the anti-feminist moderacy of the YouTube Skeptics/atheist Community [source: The Kavernacle, 2021]. To that, "skepticism" often dogwhistles a common moderate/reactionary tactic; i.e., to "just ask questions." This maneuver is bad-faith more often than not, as seen in the "gender critical" community [a TERF cryptonym meant to conceal the fascist nature of regressive "activism," Amazonomachia and cryptomimesis] or the so-called race "realists," but also the transphobia of cis-skeptics defending the "fairness" of professional sports by excluding trans people; source: Essence of Thought, 2019.)

Like furies, Satanism is generally treated as a regular scapegoat during moral panic (with "Satanic" historically being used to scapegoat members of the LGBTQ community as "groomers" during the 1980s into the present; source: Caelan Conrad, 2022). However, Satan is a complex figure and can personify different forms of persecution and rebellion. For example, I have explored Satanism before—in my own past time ("Dreadful Discourse, ep. 7: Satan") as well as my own living experiences: "I, Satanist; Atheist: A Gothacist's Thoughts on Atheism, Religion, and Sex" (2021). Satanic churches aren't ecclesiastical in the traditional sense, but their implementation in Western culture isn't always implemented well. Anton LaVey's Church of Satan is a bit overly hedonistic and dated, sounding painfully cliché and sexist. The Satanic Temple, on the other hand, is far more accessible, while ostensibly refusing to compromise on the humanitarian issues they seek to confront in society as structured around organized religion (America wasn't simply founded by the Puritans, but founded on their awful principles, too). This being said, the Temple isn't fallible, and its leader Lucien Greaves isn't exempt from using the Temple as a for-profit money funnel while punching down against marginalized, non-profit forms of Satanism; e.g., four queer members of its own Washington state chapter, which it sued using money raised by the church, itself (source Tumblr post, Queer Satanic: October 24th, 2024); i.e., the Temple is registered as a church for monetary and legal reasons—an act meant to protect it from the state, except Greaves then used it to attack its own members in a cult-like way.

From Freud's unheimlich, meaning "unhomely," the uncanny actually has many different academic applications. One of the most famous (and canonically outmoded) is the liminal/parallel space (the "danger disco/cyberpunk," exhibit 15b2; the haunted music video, 43a; the Nostromo from Alien, 64c). Another common example is the uncanny valley, which—while generally applied to animation techniques—can also apply to ghosts, egregores and other Gothic imitations (the unfriendly disguise/pastiche, exhibit 43b; the friendly, iconoclastic variant 43c) or humanoid likenesses that fail to "pass the test" (for a diegetic example of this concept, refer to the Voight-Kampff test from Blade Runner, 1982). In the Gothic sense, the animate-inanimate presents the subject as now-alive but once-not, but also faced within bad copies they cannot safely distinguish themselves from; e.g., the knight from Hollow Knight (exhibit 40h1) but also the xenomorph (exhibit 60d) and living latex, leather and death fetishes (exhibits exhibit 9b2, 50b, 60e1, 101c2), or golems/succubae (exhibits 38c1b/51b1), etc, as one subtype of animated miniature whose ghost of the counterfeit is historically-materially abject. The intimation is one of death in proximity with sensations that we are merely clay simulacra within the Gothic spell and that, at any moment, the spell could end and our dancing in the ruins suddenly stop as we cease to be once more; motionless we become, as Monty Python puts it, "ex-parrots."

terror and horror

Gothic schools begot from the Neo-Gothic period (the 1790s, in particular, between Ann Radcliffe and Matthew Lewis) largely concerned with looking—specifically showing and hiding violence, monsters, taboo sex and other abject things (this lends it a voyeuristic, exhibitionist quality). Defined posthumously by Radcliffe in her 1826 essay, "On The Supernatural In Poetry":

Terror and horror are so far opposite, that the first expands the soul, and awakens the faculties to a high degree of life; the other contracts, freezes and nearly annihilates them [...] and where lies the great difference between terror and horror but in the uncertainty and obscurity, that accompany the first, respecting the dreaded evil? (source).

The cock of the state. A monstrous-feminine archetype predicated on active, penetrative violence (or scapegoated for it; e.g., the trans woman as a "woman with a penis" trope). Canonical phallic women are female characters, villains, and monsters (often Amazons, Medusas or something comparable) who behave in a traditional masculine way—though generally in response to patriarchal structures with an air of female revenge; e.g., Lady Macbeth from Macbeth; Victoria de Loredani from Zofloya, 1806; Rumi from Perfect Blue, 1997, and Ripley/Samus Aran from Aliens/Metroid. When Dale Townshend introduced the term "phallic women" to me, he referenced Shakespeare's Lady Macbeth:

Come, you spirits
That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here,
And fill me from the crown to the toe top-full
Of direst cruelty! make thick my blood;
Stop up the access and passage to remorse,

That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose (source).

In non-fiction, this encompasses TERFs, who adopt violent, minority-police roles post-trauma, accepting further "prison sex" conditioning by reactionaries during moral panics. The phallic power of women is canonically treated as hysterically fleeting (e.g., Lady Galadriel's "dark queen" moment; or Dani's fall from grace as the dark mother of dragons, in Game of Thrones, 2009, her self-defeating hysteria supplied by the authors of the show to justify male rule during the final season). She is expected to perform, then put away her sword and wear the dress.

Archaic Mothers (and vaginal spaces)

The womb of nature. An ancient, monstrous-feminine symbol of female/matriarchal power. In Gothic stories, the Archaic Mother (and her space) is generally something for the canonically male/phallic woman to slay and rape (as per the Cartesian Revolution)—e.g., Samus being the "space" variant of a knight or Amazon, specifically a subjugated, TERF Amazon killing Mother Brain, the Dark Mother, in service of the Galactic Federation and "the Man" (the entire Red Scare's class character dialog being displaced to outer space); for a more detailed writeup about these concepts in Metroid, consider "War Vaginas":

To summarize those terms, a phallic woman resists sexist conventions by behaving in a masculine (often war-like) fashion in Gothic stories. An Archaic Mother is a powerful, ancient, female mythic figure tied to abject images of motherhood and/or numinous authority. Her power is womb-centric, stemming from her actual womb, or the womb-like space she uses to attack the hero with" (source).

One of the most famous Archaic Mothers is the Medusa, but she takes many similar forms: the transgenerational undead preserved as living latex, leather or clay that comes alive like a gargoyle to seek indiscriminate vengeance against the living for having been wronged by proponents of capital, Cartesian thought, patriarchs, etc.

witch cops/war boss

A class, gender or race traitor dressed up in the heroic-victimized language of warrior variants of past victims. Their baleful gaze is diverted away from the elite, instead punching down at their fellow workers to break up their strikes, unions and riots; but also to tease disempowered women with the "carrot" of active, physical violence they're conditioned to use against the state's enemies. There are male/Man Box variants and token variants (the weird canonical nerd of course, exhibit 93b; the war chief, 98b1; the Afrocentrist; the centrist Amazon, exhibit 98b1/100c4; the LGBA's bad-faith bears, otters, dykes and femmes; or the queer boss, exhibit 100c10) and the praxis allows for flexible gender roles within and outside of the heteronormative binary as long as it serves the profit motive. But subversive variants (exhibit 111b) are generally forced to work within notoriously bigoted and oppressive structures: the patriarchal world of professional, competitive sports or the porn industry as things to subvert ("make love, not war" as a hard stance, not conflating Marisa's "love" [exhibit 98a3] with genuine, class-conscious praxis). This makes TERF amazons, Medusas, et al, Judas-level "prison guards" inside Man Box culture; they assimilate their conquerors and use their cudgels, slurs and shackles, but also their fetish/power outfits like they do—without countercultural irony during blood libel (even while trying to disguise this function through false rebellion) while being paid in blood money by the state and forced to ignominiously marry people they wouldn't be caught dead with under non-oppressive conditions.

The waifu is a war bride in shonen media; i.e., the promise of sex, generally through marriage as emblemized in Japanese cultural exports that fuse with Western bigotries to make similar promises to entitled, young male consumers (and older bigots and tokens). While the "waifu," then, is any bride you want—be she big and strong, short and stacked, skinny-thicc, tall and slender, or some other "monster girl" combination dressed up as a pin-up Hippolyta, Medusa or some other hauntological trope—the "wheifu" is conspicuously burly and chased after by entitled fans (this relationship can get performatively complicated, but the basic difference is coercion versus mutual consent). Within oppositional praxis, then, the waifu/wheifu becomes yet another disguise within class war for operatives on either basic side to utilize.

the Male/Female Gothic

Stemming from earlier periods of Gothic academic (1970s), the Male and Female Gothic are gendered ideas of the Gothic school or work connected to older, Neo-Gothic schools: Ann Radcliffe's de facto School of Terror and Matthew Lewis' School of Horror (outlined as such in Devendra Varma's The Gothic Flame, 1923; though perhaps articulated earlier than that). Radcliffe's school focused on terror concealing the "dreaded evil," the explained supernatural and raising the imagination through carefully maintained suspense. Lewis's contributions to the so-called Male Gothic focused more on the living dead, overtly supernatural rituals, black magic, and sex with demons, murder, and so on. Frankly Male Gothic is a bit outmoded, with Colin Broadmoor in 2021 making a strong argument for Lewis' Gothic camp being far more queer than strictly "male" in The Monk despite the lack of sexuality and gender functioning as identity when he wrote it (similar to Tolkien or Milton, despite their own intentions).

egregore/tulpa (simulacrum)

(exhibit 5i: Artist: Mole and Thomas.)

An occult or monstrous concept representing a non-physical entity that arises from the collective thoughts of a distinct group of people (what Plato and other philosophers have called the simulacrum through various hair-splittings; e.g., "identical copies of that which never existed" being touched upon by Baudrillard's concept of hyperreality). The distinction between egregore and tulpa is largely etymological, with "egregore" stemming from French and Greek and "tulpa" being a Tibetan idea:

*Since the 1970s, tulpas have been a feature of Western paranormal lore. In contemporary paranormal discourse, a tulpa is a being that begins in the imagination but acquires a tangible reality and sentience. Tulpas are created either through a deliberate act of individual will or unintentionally from the thoughts of numerous people. The tulpa was first described by Alexandra David-Néel (1868–1969) in Magic and Mystery in Tibet (1929) and is still regarded as a Tibetan concept. However, the idea of the tulpa is more indebted to Theosophy than to Tibetan Buddhism [source: Natasha L. Mikles and Joseph P. Laycock's "Tracking the Tulpa: Exploring the "Tibetan" Origins of a Contemporary Paranormal Idea," 2015].*

The shared idea, here, is that monsters tend to represent social ideas begot from a public imagination according to fearful biases that are not always controlled or conscious in their cryptogenesis/-mimesis. In Gothic-Communist terms, this invokes historical-material warnings of codified power or trauma—including totems, effigies, fatal portraits, suits of armor, or gargoyles—projected back onto superstitious workers through ambiguous, cryptonymic illusions. For our purposes, these illusions are primarily fascist/neoliberal, as Capitalism encompasses the material world. It must be parsed/transmuted.

ghosts/Yokai

An ontologically complex category of either a former dead person, an artifact/reminder of them (their legend as an effigy or "statue" of themselves; e.g., a suit of armor or fatal portrait) or a discrete, wholly unique entity that shares only the resemblance but not the context of a former person or their legend. If hamlet's father is a famous Western example of this idea, then Yokai are the Eastern variant of this notion.

For a holistic example of many of these Gothic ideas in action, check out The Babadook (2014); it combine crypt narrative, Black Veils, Gothic heroines, chronotopes, liminal space/monsters et al into a singular narrative in a fairly iconoclastic (queer) way (it's also one of my favorite films and I love to analyze it; e.g., "Close-reading Gothic Theory in The Babadook," 2019)! —Perse

The British Romantic, John Keats, once described William Wordsworth's poetry as indicative of the "egotistical sublime"; i.e., pertaining to an isolated genius whose self-centered nature makes the truth of their work self-evident. In reality, Wordsworth's poems were based on the diary of his less-famous and -celebrated sister, Dorothy, whose meticulous chronicling of their various "wanders" (1798) laid the foundation for her brother's Romantic canon. As Gavin Andre Sukhu writes on the subject in 2013,

When reading the Grasmere Journal in conjunction with the poetry of William Wordsworth, Dorothy's journal appears to be a set of notes written especially for him by her. As a matter of fact, Dorothy made it quite clear in the beginning of her journals that she was writing them for William's "pleasure" (source).

Simply put, Keats was wrong. Wordsworth could not have written his famous poetry without his sister, whose close friendship and watchful eye he greatly cherished and relied upon!

Like Wordsworth's poems, Sex Positivity could not have been written alone; I needed the help of various friends, associates, and enemies. While I arguably wouldn't be a Marxist without the eye-opening abuse of neoliberal Capitalism, I also wouldn't be openly trans without the many lovers and friends who taught me the value of things beyond Capitalism ("If more of us valued food and cheer and song above hoarded gold, it would be a merrier world..."). It is the latter group—those friends who stood by my side and didn't abuse me—that I wish to honor.

Special thanks, then, to those people. Not only did their knowledge, bravery, generosity and love make this book possible in its current form; they made it fun, too. Yet, as I am blessed to have many different kinds of friends, I'll thank each in turn. Please excuse my lists and organizing; I just like to be thorough and complete in my thanksgivings!

First, to my twenty-two muses—Casper Clock, Crow, Sinead, Bay, Mugiwara Art, Harmony Corrupted, Romantic Rose, Angel Witch, Mercedes the Muse, Krispy Tofuuu, Ms. Reefer & Ayla, Quinnvincible, Blxxd Bunny, Nyx, Maybel & Jackie, Itzel, Tyler & Husband, Moxxy Sting and Rhyna Targaryen. You've all lent me tremendous emotional support and helped me through some really hard times. Your solidarity during our combined struggle helped make this book possible. To each of you, I wanted to give an extra-special thank you:

- To Bay: Thank you for your invaluable contributions to Sex Positivity, puppy, and for being such a wonderful partner. Meeting you so late into the book's construction was incredibly serendipitous, but also fortunate in that you gave excellent daily feedback, provided many interesting (and germane) ideas to explore, and just frankly inspired and motivated me in so many different ways that, combined, transformed and expanded the landscape of this book more than anyone else (who all, I should add, pitched in a great amount). For example, from the date that we met (June 14th, 2023) until the altering of this entry (July 19th) you inspired me to create over fifty new, collage-style exhibits (about 25% of my book's total exhibits up to this point); on top of that, from July 24th to August 16th, the book increased another 150 pages, gaining an additional 88,000 words and 123 new images (many of which were exhibits). You're a person of great mana—incredibly loving and sweet, but also gorgeous, cultured and diverse in your many interests and passions; our minds also think very much alike and I absolutely love it and adore you for it while having weaved your contributions into this book like a tapestry with your assistance. I cannot imagine this project (or my life) without you in it, injecting into both things of yourself that have changed how I see the world in ways I cannot imagine being different or without. I love you so very, very much, muffin, and am glad to have met you the way that we did!

- To Angel Witch: Thank you for being so much fun to work with, cutie, and all around just a very nice person and beautiful friend! You're absolutely gorgeous and incredibly sweet—someone who's very good about communicating their boundaries while respecting mine, and I feel proud to include you in my book!
- To Sinead: Thank you, fae, for being an excellent communicator, teacher and friend. Your careful, nuanced instruction has helped me grasp and maintain the nuances of fat positivity versus fat liberation, and I feel the project has only benefited from your targeted, informative contributions (and zine suggestions). Also thank you for appreciating my work, embodying it through the example that you clearly set for yourself and effortlessly lead by! You're incredibly fun to talk to but also work/play with, and your ample, flawless body is the very stuff that dreams are made of!
- To Crow: Thank you, puppy, for being such a game and receptive collaborator, and for treating me as well as you do; you're a wonderful partner—gorgeous, delightful, and sweet—and spending time with you has been so, so much fun! You've given me so much to enjoy and look forward to: making someone I love feel good. It delights me that I've found a sweetie who I can pour my boundless love (and cum) into. So all the kisses and snuggles, baby!
- To Mercedes: Thank you, mommy, for inspiring my work. It meant so much when you first approached me and asked to be drawn, as I'd never had an artist/model do that before. But I absolutely love and respect what you stand for and think that you're incredibly legitimate, hot and valid. Thank you for being you!
- To Itzel: Thank you, daddy, for making me feel so pretty and special, but also offering me guidance and protection—like the little princess I always to be!
- To Bunny: Thank you, bun-bun, for your financial support and monumental kindness as a friend, but also offering as much reference material as you did—i.e., the collaborative shoots whose images grace the front and back covers of this book, but also your impressive galleries to inspire the illustrations on its inner pages. Know that the additional exhibits based on your excellent OF shoots inspired many artworks by me, a commission by someone else, and multiple write-ups.

- To Krispy and Quinn: You are both incredibly gorgeous and friendly to work with—treating me like a person and an equal, first and foremost. That means so, so much!
- To Casper Clock: Thank you, Casper—for having such an amazing ass and work ethic, and for just being all-around so wonderful to work with! You're the best!

(artist: Mugiwara Art)

- To Mugiwara Art: Thank you, Mugi, for being so fun to play with and talk to, and for working together despite some initial confusions (and for helping me address them as well as you did). Thank you as well, then, for teaching me about plural people and for giving me a chance to represent them more in my work (re: sex-positive demons).
- To Harmony Corrupted: Thank you, mommy, for being so fun to talk to deeply about different complicated subjects and expressing a continued interest in my work (which led to an entire module[!] for Volume Two, doubling it in size), but also for being so easy to work and play with. You're amazing in bed, have the world's best ass (so peachy and fuckable), and are fascinating to talk to. I love watching your SO fuck you with his big dick, and am grateful for him being so kind to you. I feel like you're a dark spirit, overall; i.e., different, but alluring and sweet inside your beautiful darkness.

Also, while we have a lot of common interests, you're also very nice and good about communicating (in and out of bed). I really value that!

- To Chryssi (Ms. Reefer) & Ayla: Thank you both for being so wonderful to work with. You were my first AMAB couple (which, as a trans woman, I really appreciate), and playing and working with you both has been so much fun! To Chryssi, in particular—thank you, mommy, for being so good in bed; both of you are wonderful people and it was an absolute pleasure meeting you both, but you make my girl cock feel amazing! To Ayla—thank you for fucking Chryssi so nicely with your huge dick! You're both adorable!
- To Rose: Thank you for communicating so quickly and well, but also for producing such lovely content on short notice. You're absolutely gorgeous and working with you was an absolute treat!

(artist: Nyx)

- To Nyx: Thank you for inspiring this project, comrade! Your close bond with nature, back in West Virginia, is inspiring ("Mountain Mama, take me home!"), as is your amazing body (having the best ass and thighs ever) and giant heart! Working with you inspired me to come out as trans, and go on to write and illustrate Sex Positivity (six books, nearly two million words, hundreds of exhibits and collages, over a hundred unique illustrations by me, thousands of images total, and dozens of collaborations with illustrators and sex workers of all walks). Bless you, mommy!

- To Maybel & Jackie: Thank you both for producing such excellent content, and Maybel in particular for being so sweet and supportive. You're both awesome!
- To Tyler & Husband, Moxxy Sting and Rhyna Targaryen: Thank you for being so timely and making such great material on short notice! You're all wonderful people—incredibly hot, but also professional and worthy of respect and love! To Tyler and Husband, thank you both for being so infectiously captivating on camera (your pussy is so, so small and his cock is so big)! To Moxxy, thank you for being such a wonderful mommy domme; I adore you! To Rhyna, thank you for your talks together and your excellent work ethic, friendliness and photography!

Moreover, all twenty-two of you treated me like I had genuine value—that I wasn't "just" an artist whose work was "free" during our exchanges. That means the world, really. I will cherish your priceless contributions and immeasurable kindness beyond words. From the bottom of my heart, thank you, babes!

I've started a new Q&A series called "Hailing Hellions," which interviews models I worked with. Click here to see the first entry, featuring Harmony Corrupted!

- To Ginger, first and foremost: My best friend—who's been there for me more times than I can count—thank you from the bottom of my heart; more than anyone else, your deep support, crucial humor and endless hours talking together about shared ideas, struggles and solutions have been foundational—about sex positivity as a virtue have been essential to shaping the writing inside these pages. Thank you, for saving me from Jadis and other abusers who either meant me harm or otherwise took advantage; and for teaching me about figure drawing, including but not limited to: drawing boobs and faces, but rib cages and pelvises. You are a saint, as fierce as a dragon in a pinch, and a most excellent hobbit all-around; may the hair on your toes never fall out; may the rest of your days be plentiful, memorable and comfortable!
- To Fen: For teaching me about animals, empathizing with them, and how to draw their floofy tails, but also for being there for me in a crucial moment. Like Ginger, you saved me from Jadis and for that, I will always be grateful. But you're also incredibly chill and fun to spend time with and I appreciate that greatly. Never change, my friend.
- To Lydia: A mega-special thank you for your friendship over the years (over ten at this point) and for your own special help with this project. While you were less direct in your overall engagement with the manuscript, your contributions still made a difference. For one, you were someone I felt comfortable coming out to, who—when I realized for myself that I was trans—was able to drip-feed it to you. And when I finally said, "I probably seem different to you now," you replied that I was the third person who told you that: "No, you seem exactly the same; you seem different to yourself." As it turns out, you explained that I wasn't the first; I was third out of three people who came out to you (and as you said to another person who came out to you, to which you added, "You don't have to feel bad about it or like I wouldn't want to talk to you anymore. True be told, as the sole girl in a classfull of boys, it kind of made me want to talk to you even more!"). Likewise, our conversations about horror, science fiction and fantasy are something I always enjoy and draw inspiration from, spiced by your endless grit and "give zero fucks" sense of humor. Thank you, my friend.
- To Odie: Thank you for generously supporting my work over the years and for always asking me to draw unique, interesting and diverse things! You've made a huge difference in my life and I appreciate your patronage and friendship very much!
- To Doctors Craig Dionne, Bernard Miller, Xavi Reyes, Paul Wake, Sam Hirst, Dale Townshend, Eric Acton, and David Calonne: Thank you for staying in touch over the years and giving me feedback, encouragement and ideas. To Craig, in particular—I wouldn't have pushed so hard to go to grad school if not for your initial glowing praise and support. Thank you for that! And to the rest of the Humanities faculty at EMU and MMU I haven't mentioned by name—I enjoyed all of your classes and the opportunity to absorb and learn from what you had to offer!

- To Doctor Sorcha Ní Fhlainn: Thank you for recommending The Monstrous-Feminine to me at MMU; it inspired me a lot in writing this book!
- To Dr. Sandy Norton: Thank you for lending me tremendous emotional/material support and kindness in the most trying of times. You always encouraged me to write, too, and valued my "great heart." Per your instructions, I've poured as much of it as I could into this book—to better help those in need (also, thank you for your 1968 copy of The Pearl: A Journal of Facetive and Voluptuous Reading. It's everything I wished Austen had been and provided a much-needed "other side of the coin" to consider when writing my own book about such matters).

(artist: Angel)

- To Angel: Thank you for being a really wonderful friend and for showing me a lot of cool things to include in Sex Positivity that I wouldn't have otherwise! Meeting you was a delight I can scarce express and working with you—on my art, or helping you with yours—has been an absolute treat.
- To my good friend, Seren: You were, are, and always will be best girl. Not only have you always had my back, but your dress sense is impeccable and your sweet kindness knows no bounds (also, you have great taste in literature and in horror). Thank you for being so understanding and wonderful, babydoll. Kisses and hugs galore!

Of course, the painful knowledge of my enemies also went into the melting pot—i.e., older abusive lovers, which include the likes of Zeuhl, Jadis, and Cuwu. While I am leery of giving too much credit, I do have some thoughts to impart to these individuals:

- To Zeuhl: My scarecrow. A small part of me will always miss you the most—for being one of the most interesting and cool people I've ever met—yet also recognizes how, seemingly on a whim, you selfishly hurt me worse than anyone else (and offered the most brainless explanation imaginable); no bullshit, you did some really fucked up stuff and basically turned into a shadow of your former self, but I'll still cherish the love we shared, overseas. It was fun while it lasted!
- To Jadis: My tinman and wicked witch. Though you hurt me badly, I still learned a great deal from you and your beautiful wickedness. I have no desire to see you again, though, and write this message as a final parting gift: I wrote Sex Positivity to heal from what you did; your heartless abuse was my dragon to slay and now I have. After countless nights of terror spent under your thrall, I can safely say with joy and pride, "You have no power over me!"
- And to Cuwu: My cowardly lion. Our friendship may have been brief, and you were pretty shitty and callow towards the end, but it was still hella saucy and helped pushed me to come out as trans and write this book (which contains many Marxist terms/colloquialisms that I learned personally from you); also thank you for lending me your copy of A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things and for introducing me to SpongeBob. It really was a good show.

(artist: Ronin Dude)

Special thanks to several other models who were actively involved in this project during its early period. To Dani—thank you for modeling specifically for this project on short notice and for generally being cool and sweet! Meowing from Hell, thank you for the abundance of reference material early on and for sharing my work as much as you did; it made a giant difference (even if you ultimately disagreed with my politics/identity and treated me fairly poorly because of it)! Emma, thank you for keeping my spirits (and other things) up during this book's creation!

Special thanks to all the other models involved throughout the entirety of the project; their efforts breathed tremendous beauty, inspiration and meaning into my work. This extends to over forty additional collaborators, whose various contributions were absolutely vital: Tana the Puppy, Bovine Harlot, Forte, Venusinaries, Eldritch Babe, Roxie Rusalka, Drooling Red, Autumn Anarchy, Ashley Yelhsa, UrEvilMommy \(and partner\), Keighla Night, Scarlet Love, Jazminskyyy, Cedar, Bubi, Lil Miss Puff, XCumBaby98, Mischievous Kat, Soon2Bsalty, Lovely Babe 2017, Mikki Storm \(and partner\), Mei Minato, Red's References, Dulci, Angel Witch, Jericho (and partner), Lady Nyxx, Miss Nia Sax \(and partner\), Annabel Morningstar, Coffin Milf, Ebonnyy, Scoobsboobs, Miss Misery, Rae of Sunshine, Vera Dominus, Kaycee Bee, Cupid Kisses, Monster Lover, Delilah Gallo and Feyn Volans. I wrote it for all of you, but also every sex worker/cutie I've drawn over the years. In hard times, know that you're all special, valid people; that your signature kindness, warm personalities, and stunning bodies enrich the world!

Special thanks to the artists (other than Odie) who agreed to be commissioned for the book: Lucid-01, Adagadegelo, Autumn Anarchy, Marlon Trelie, Jim32, and Dcoda.

Special thanks to the ace and/or neurodivergent people in my life, whose constant feedback and support has proven invaluable!

Special thanks to my mother—for never having an English dictionary in the house, and for giving me a room of one's own to complete my work. This book wouldn't exist without the sanctuary and means you provided to see it through.

I'd also like to thank the content creators on YouTube whose political discourse and general content not only proved incredibly helpful in writing this book: Theremin Trees, Rebecca Watson, Essence of Thought, Sheep in the Box, J. Aubery, Jessie Gender, Professor Lando, Three Arrows, Schafer Scott, Xevaris, Rhetoric & Discourse, Satenmadpun, The Majority Report, Hasan Piker, The Kavernacle, Fascinating Horror, YUGOPNIK, Broey Deschanel, Macabre Storytelling, Sisyphus 55, John the Duncan, Noah Samsen, Bad Empanada (and his second channel), The Living Philosophy, Heckin' Steve, Ashley Gavin, Spikima Movies, MarshSMT, Behind the Bastards, Genetically Modified Skeptic, Eldena Doubleca5t, STRANGE ÆONS, F.D. Even you centrists, broken clocks and chudwads: [Joon the King, Turkey Tom, penguinz0, Knowing Better, The People Profiles, More Plates More Dates, and Collative Learning. Thank you all for your wonderful (or at least telling) video essays, political commentaries, and documentaries!

Out of the above YouTubers, though, I wanted to give further special praise and thanks to those meriting it; i.e., for their incredible work as a whole, but also individual video essays and ideas they produced/discussed and which I found especially (in)formative in my own output. These are just as much those who "ring a bell" when I think of them as those who are foundational to my book series, but also my approach to synthesizing praxis; i.e., regarding those I find fun and accessible during the educational elements (the mark of a good video essayist):

- To Renegade Cut: I first encountered your work through your 2019 "Thanos Was Wrong - Eugenics and Overpopulation." And while your work in thinking critically about popular media is often quite solid (e.g., "Frank Grimes - The Cult of Work" or "Kai Winn - Better Villain Than Khan," 2019 and 2022), I especially enjoy your real-world political analysis and activism. There's tons of videos you've done in that area, but for me, your best and most comprehensive—the one that single-handedly introduced me to a lot of useful terms relative to my own anti-fascism work, like "obscurantism"—was "What Is \(and Is not\) Anti-Fascism?" (2022); i.e., which breaks down a lot of complicated ideas in a self-contained and well-researched video. Your humor is often quite dead-pan and dry and I'm also here for that, and while I think your eventual turn away from such things to give yourself an extended break in the midst of rising crisis is unfortunate, I also understand why you did so and want you to know what your work before then didn't go to waste!
- To Brows Held High: I first encountered your work with "STARSHIP TROOPERS, Part 1: HEINLEIN" (2021), which went on to single-handedly inform much of my writing about Aliens in 2021; e.g., "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," but also its discontinued book series: Neoliberalism in Yesterday's Heroes. I eventually absorbed said series into my PhD work and Sex Positivity book series. So essentially, that one video by itself gave me a rock-solid foundation for critiquing Heinlein/coining "military optimism"—a term that would, itself, go on to formalize my other academic ideas, "canonical essentialism" and Tolkien and Cameron's refrains (the High Fantasy treasure map and shooter/Metroidvania); i.e., hence inform and reinforce pretty much all my critiques written on Metroidvania, as a whole (re: my 2025 Metroidvania Corpus). The sequel video, "STARSHIP TROOPERS, Part 2: VERHOEVEN," is also interesting—and you raise a lot of solid and fair critiques about Dutch culture and misogyny in Paul Verhoeven's work!
- To Anansi's Library: I found your radical perspective formative to "burning Rome," and especially enjoyed/used your exposure of Frantz Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks ("Fanon, Blackness, and Gender," 2020), as well as your discussions about having experienced police brutality, first-hand ("Police Brutality," 2021). Also, your cat rocks and your name is also Persephone, which is cool as Hell (so to speak)!
- To GDF: While your video, "The Iraq War Wasn't About Oil" (2024), is frankly a bit of a headscratcher, you also introduced me to Robert Asprey's War in the Shadows (1975) with "How The Irish Got So Good At Smoking British Soldiers" (2023); i.e., hence his vital idea of guerrilla warfare, counterterror and the "paradox of terror" that I came to rely on extensively in my own writing. Likewise, your coverage of guerrilla war in older American conflicts like Vietnam, Iraq and Korea was illuminating, but also smaller exchanges that likewise shined a light on American hypocrisy/foreign policy (e.g., "How Israel Cucked the United States," 2024).

- To Skip Intro: I encountered your 2021 copaganda series in early 2023, when writing Volume Three and initially expanding my glossary. The term "copaganda" as I use it comes directly from you, and frankly your entire series on copaganda is essential viewing for its comprehensiveness and holistic approach to the subject matter/research area (and the guests you routinely have on, too).
- To Caelan Conrad/Little Hoots: I first encountered your channels/content with your 2022 "What Is A Groomer?" The entire video is useful for its wider historical coverage and (mis)use of the term, but I especially enjoyed the section on "Satanic Panic," civil rights, and the AIDS crisis; all helped me conceptualize moral panics more broadly, meaning in an intersectional sense.
- To Dreading: I first encountered your 2022 videos exposing sexual predators, such as Bill Cosby, Kevin Spacey, Brian Singer and Stephen Collins. While your videos are well-researched, in general, these ones are long enough to be informative but not so long that they drag on (usually from excessive amounts [hours upon hours] of in-court testimony); i.e., to the degree that I often reference them in my own work, doing so when talking about homonormative behavior and tokenized predation at large!
- To Thought Slime: I've been aware of your channel since at least 2018 (originally recommended by an ex). You cover a wide variety of topics, but I especially enjoy your activist work and close-reads in ways that overlap; e.g., "GIVE ME SUPERMAN'S UNDERWEAR, I AM NORMAL" (2023), a video that taught me about the Comics Code Criteria of 1954 (similar to the Hayes Code in cinema): an idea I found especially useful in writing about comic book characters like Captain America, but also Wonder Woman and even non-comic-book examples like Ellen Ripley. But beyond your many interesting and eclectic takes—and your refreshingly humorous synthesizing of these with being openly queer and defending it through your social/activist work—I especially have enjoyed/relied upon your amazing Eyeball Zone series, which unto itself has repeatedly introduced me to a variety of small channels, creators and ideas I'd never have found on YouTube otherwise (and which served as the inspiration for the title of my Poetry Module book section, "The Eyeball Zone").
- To Second Thought, YUGOPNIK, and Hakim: All three of your deviate away from the usual BreadTube clichés and problems, breaking down a variety of complicated concepts quickly and well. While Second Thought does this from an American standpoint—and introduced me to the neoliberal trifecta of worker/owner division, infinite growth and efficient profit I'd go on to use in my own Gothic Communist manifesto—Hakim comes from Iraq (and makes excellent book suggestions; e.g., William Blum's 1995 Killing Hope and David Michael Smith's Endless Holocausts: Mass Death in the History of the United States Empire, 2023) and YUGOPNIK from Eastern Europe. In turn, each gives a non-American perspective that comes together nicely with Second Thought's domestic voice; i.e., in your collective Deprogram podcast series. In short, it's solidarity 101 and you're all rockstars!

- To Bad Empanada: Your postcolonial work is excellent, but some of your ideas are too reductive, hypocritical and nihilistic for me to recommend you without substantial caveats; e.g., "all first-worlders are bad," even though you're a white straight guy from Australia. Likewise, your at-times SWERF-y ideas on sex work and GNC activism occasionally cross over into Stalinist areas of problematic (re: "make it taboo again"); i.e., you have a big mouth and tend to shoot said mouth off about things you don't know much if anything about—so much so that I've devoted hundreds of pages of academic rivalry responding to just how stupid and harmful those statements are (e.g., pretty much my entire "Understanding Vampires" chapter). Also, your ability to critically analyze popular media essentially boils down to confirmation bias and "find what I want to attack my political enemies [however valid your animus with them is] and forget everything else"; e.g., your opinions about anime and other popular media forms being remarkably reductive and myopic (essentially arguing "all anime is pedophilic," which is nonsense). All that being said... your entire postcolonial work/activist endeavors on Palestine and your essays refuting Zionists in so-called "progressive" circles remain wholly invaluable, as do your various excellent essays on the Iraq War, Lebensraum, South America and American geopolitics, climate change denial, Jewish Exceptionalism, and so on. Also, you introduced me to Ward Churchill's "Some People Push Back" (2005), which was incredibly useful!
- To Atun-Shei Films: Beyond your introductory "Checkmate, Lincolnites!" series, I frankly enjoy your holistic approach to research and application much more; i.e., I can take or leave your Nazi roleplay fetish, which I understand why you do—to camp Nazis 'n all—but find it's not your most interesting work. Instead I consider your work with animal rights activists and abolitionists to be wholly essential (your platforming of Zionists, not so much). In particular, I especially enjoyed a phrase that came up on one of your videos: "power aggregates"—an expression from In Range TV noting that "power aggregates" against potential/actual revolt, discussed in your 2021 video, "Fighting for Freedom: The Weapons and Strategies of the 1811 Slave Revolt; timestamp: 20:55). Great stuff!

- To Non Compete: Your honesty in slowly turning more and more Communist over years and years of checked privilege/wake-up calls is valid, useful and refreshing, as is your moving to Vietnam to encounter different systems to better understand (and enjoy) how they work opposite the United State (see: "America's Officially Fascist. Now What?" 2024). I especially enjoy your discussions about fascism being "Imperialism come home to empire" in service to capital, and strange forms of fascism like "MAGA Communism" (2022).
- To Behind the Bastards: Your podcast covers a ton of people who historically suck, and learning the truth behind their façades (when historically trying to whitewash how terrible they are in service to Capitalism) has proved invaluable to me; i.e., to how I approach my own dialectical-material scrutiny of any darling I kill. All your videos/guests are informative and funny—e.g., your Bobby Fischer, Nicholas II or Adam Scott segments—but I especially benefitted from your Vince McMahon series, which taught me about "kayfabe" much more in-depth and how it works less on or offstage and more in between the two.
- To John the Duncan: Neoliberalism can be a difficult concept to wrap one's head around, and your videos about it explain everything succinctly and well (e.g., "Neoliberalism: Class War and Pacification," 2020). You also discuss gender theory and activism against genocide in your work, which revolves around preventing it vis-à-vis neoliberalism in your own PhD material. In short, you're an inspiration of mine and helped me wrap my head around academia and application tied to all of these things (and Foucault and prisons, though I never watched your Chicken Run video)!
- To Hasan Piker: Hasan's a bit of a nepo baby and dude bro with an embarrassing early career making material no different than Steven Crowder if we're all being honest (Joon the King's "Everyone Hates Hasan Piker," 2025), but his general understanding of socio-political theory is solid and today he fights for marginalized groups around the world, including Palestine. He's not perfect, and I think he's a bit elitist (saying, for example, "black and/or trans people, be quiet, and let me speak to angry white/straight people for you"), but he did introduce me to the idea of cops being "class traitors"—a concept I would go on to use extensively in my own work.
- To Shaun: Someone whose lengthy videos have consistently pushed back against bad-faith impostors not just in online leftist circles, like BreadTube, but also against American exceptionalism/Pax Americana as a whole (e.g., "Harry Potter" and "Dropping the Bomb: Hiroshima & Nagasaki," 2022 and 2020). Especially useful to my work in 2024 and beyond, though, was Shaun introducing me to Ursula K. Le Guin's essential "Those Who Walk Away from Omelas" (1973; source, from Shaun: "Palestine," 2024; timestamp: 57:11)—a thought experiment about tokenism and selective liberation/genocide I've gone on to reference many, many times (e.g., "Remember the Fallen: An Ode to Nex Benedict," 2024). He's basically the perfect straight ally and I love his work.

- To Essence of Thought: Essence of Thought, aka Ethel Thurston (she/they) is a trans investigative YouTuber and video essayist; i.e., one whose extensive and impressively researched/cited work has catalogued tokenistic abuse ranging from atheists like Richard Dawkins and Rationality Rules, famous problematic authors like C.S. Lewis, bad-faith "leftist" impostors like Ian Kochinski, and many real-life events involving trans rights (frankly too many to list). All of this is essential, insofar as Ethel combines thorough and biting research with careful and nuanced application while investigating real-life sexual predators in marginalized communities. That being said, I especially benefited from their exploring of parasocialism in "Lily Orchard Sexted A 16 Year Old - 2nd Victim Testimony" (2022). In short, Ethel does it all—educating and investigating in ways that perfectly combine stellar citation skills (always timestamping their citations and giving the scripts to all of their videos with the citations listed and numbered, which frankly just rules) with genuine and outpouring empathy for GNC people (and other minorities) at large. I'm glad to have them in my corner and have learned much from my own examination of their work. To that, their brave 2022 exposé regarding Buck Angel and Contrapoints/Natalie Wynn's defending of the former's NERF-y behavior inspired and informed my book series' earlier (2022/2023) work—i.e., when investigating and writing about TERFs and other exclusionary feminisms in tokenized circles—and Ethel remains someone I eagerly watch and cite to this day!
- To Professor Lando: Not someone I cite too often, admittedly, but who makes awesome, fun and easy-to-parse shorter videos explaining stigmatized ideas of sex, gender and performance (e.g., "Twinks, Femboys, Otters, and Bears Explained," 2023) that—for all their brevity—contain a ton of useful ideas and applications regarding things normally demonized by heteronormative society at large. While there's undoubtedly people who delve into these topics much more in length (like myself), Lando makes it quick and accessible: to curious audiences who may not actually be queer but nonetheless want to learn about such things in good faith; i.e., in ways that poke fun, but also come from an instructor whose "normal" appearance belies a queer core that he passes onto his students.
- To Kay and Skittles: Someone whose literary analysis is both informative, just the right length, funny and insightful (and has a cute animal mascot, Skittles the ferret). I especially enjoyed "How Enemy At The Gates Lies To You: Saving Private Ryan, Othering, And Cold War Narratives" (2023) in how it introduced me to Howard Zinn's "Private Ryan Saves War" (1998)—a piece that went on to inform my appreciation for Zinn beyond just A People's

History of the United States (1980); i.e., vis-à-vis Edward Said's Orientalism and American exceptionalism in popular war media at large.

- To Theremin Trees: A practicing therapist who breaks down a lot of applied therapist jargon through applied theory. This includes, in their case, personal experience ("My Cluster B Parent Died and I Felt.... Nothing Much," 2023), but also tons of testimony from anonymous sources the therapist has worked with (e.g., "Letting Go of Fixing People," 2020). This approach inspired my own; i.e., when working with other sex workers behind aliases we collectively use to speak about difficult subjects; re: Cuwu, myself and healing from rape through dialectical behavioral therapy, sex (work) and drug use. Also, Theremin Tree's music and self-designed visual aids are both stylish and second-to-none (along with their relaxing and verbose vocal delivery); i.e., which help make Theremin Trees' complex-on-paper ideas even more accessible in practice. Highly, highly recommended!

Thank you to Karl Jobst (for your good detective work, not your racism or pick-up artistry), Bismuth, Summoning Salt, and the other members of the YouTube speedrunner documentarian community for making such well-researched content; it contributed to my own graduate work and towards this book. Thanks as well to Jeremy Parish and Scott Sharkey for their research into Metroidvania (even if they hate the term now), and for Jeremy Parish's books on Metroid (e.g., The Anatomy of Metroid, 2014) but also on the subject of videogames in general; they were fun reads!

Thanks to the various content creators, actors, speedrunners, and streamers I've interviewed over the years for my various interview series, whose reflections have helped me rethink what the Gothic even is. Without your contributions, this book as it currently exists would not be possible:

- "From Vintage to Retro: An FPS Q&A series" (2021): This Q&A series centers on power and how it's arranged in FPS between the player and the game. In it, interview Twitch streamers and speedrunners, but also several game developers who play and create FPS games: Jrmhd91, Cynic the Original, Alec and Stuff, Frosty Xen, Yellow Swerve, and James Towne.
- "Mazes and Labyrinths' Q&A, Interview Compendium" (2021): A series of Q&A interviews I give, interviewing speedrunners of the Metroid franchise: CScottyW, Behemoth87, ShinyZeni.
- "Hell-blazers: Speedrunning Doom Eternal" (2020): I created this series when Doom Eternal was new. It interviews Twitch streamers and speedrunners about the game and why they play it: DraQu, Under the Mayo, Byte Me, The Spud Hunter, King Dime, Your Mate Devo, and Frosty Xen.

- "Giving My Two Cents: A Metal Compendium" (2020): I love heavy metal, and have made a name for myself by commenting on videos by Metallica remixers on YouTube. Eventually I decided to interview these remixers in a post hoc Q&A series: Creblestar, Bryce Barilla, State of Mercury, and of course, Ahdy Khairat (rock on, dude; your remixes absolutely rule).
- My 2025 Metroidvania Corpus, which includes all of these people.

- "The 'Alien: Ore' Interview Project" (2019): My first interview series, this project centers around the Spear sisters' Alien short film, "Alien: Ore." Originally I loved "Ore" so much I did my own extensive analysis of it ("Alien Ore: Explained (Spoilers)!" 2019). Kailey and Sam Spear enjoyed that so much they agreed to be interviewed. It includes numerous interviews from the cast and crew, all of whom are total rockstars: Mikela Jay, the star, and her co-stars Tara Pratt, Steven Stiller, Ambrose Gardener; Dallas Harvey of Vancouver FX; and Rose Hastreiter and Gerry Plant, the composers of Leonty Music Group.

Thanks to Boss Ross, Frank Frazetta, Zdzisław Beksinski, Stephen Gemmell, and Ridley Scott (and associate artists; e.g., Mobius, Giger and Cobb, etc) for having a profound and lasting influence on my artwork, imagination and life. Some of you haunted my childhood; others came later and blew my mind. But you're all rockstars.

Lastly, thank you to the many, many other artists hitherto unmentioned whose work is featured all throughout Sex Positivity. Some of you are recent discoveries, be they models from the present or masters from the past. However, I have followed and studied some of you for many years, and now feel very differently than I did once upon a time! For example, I can see the sexist, racist and otherwise xenophobic/fascist undertones in Frazetta. All the same, his canon is still worthy of dialectical-material study—to learn from the past and appreciate the sex-positive lessons in his work, however imperfect! May they shape the world into something better.

Thank you all very much for reading! Be brave and don't be afraid to learn! Nazi pigs and neoliberals, fuck off.

About the Author

*I've walked a path of darkness
 Just to open up my mind
 I've learned of hidden secrets
 Scattered through the depths of time
 And at my father's side I witnessed Things I can't describe
 "They must be evil!"
 The people cried*

*So when the prince went missing
 And the mob was at our door
 The king would not see reason
 Only vengeance, only war
 My father's neck held in his grip
 Until he was no more
 But the prince was still alive*

*And I said
 May never a noble of your murderous line
 Survive to reach a greater age than thine*

*Because I'm the Alchemist creator of your fears I'm the Sorcerer, a curse throughout the years
 And I won't rest 'til no one's left
 The ending of your line
 Their lives are a prison of my design*

Persephone van der Waard is the author of the multi-volume, non-profit book series, Sex Positivity—its art director, sole invigilator, illustrator and primary editor (the other co-writer/co-editor being Bay Ryan). Persephone has her independent PhD in Gothic poetics and ludo-Gothic BDSM (focusing on partially on Metroidvania), and is a MtF trans woman, anti-fascist, atheist/Satanist, poly/pan kinkster, erotic artist/pornographer and anarcho-Communist with two partners. Including multiple playmates/friends and collaborators, Persephone and her many muses work/play together on Sex Positivity and on her artwork at large as a sex-positive force. That being said, she still occasionally writes reviews, Gothic analyses, and interviews for fun on her old blog (and makes YouTube videos talking about politics). To learn more about Persephone's academic/activist work and larger portfolio, go to her About the Author page. To purchase illustrated or written material from Persephone (thus support the work she does), please refer to her commissions page for more information. Any money Persephone earns through commissions goes towards helping sex workers through the Sex Positivity project; i.e., by paying costs and funding shoots, therefore raising awareness. Likewise, Persephone accepts donations for the project, which you can send directly to her PayPal, Ko-Fi, Patreon or CashApp. Every bit helps!
