

(model and artist: Romantic Rose and Persephone van der Waard)

Disclaimer

"If it was not good, it was true; if it was not artistic, it was sincere; if it was in bad taste, it was on the side of life."

—Henry Miller, on criticism and the Supreme-Court-level lawsuit he received for writing The Tropic of Cancer (1934)

Regarding This Book's Artistic/Pornographic Nudity and Sexual Content: Sex Positivity thoroughly discusses sexuality in popular media, including fetishes, kinks, BDSM, Gothic material, and general sex work; the illustrations it contains have been carefully curated and designed to demonstrate my arguments. It also considers pornography to be art, examining the ways that sex-positive art makes iconoclastic statements against the state. As such, Sex Positivity contains visual examples of sex-positive/sex-coercive artistic nudity borrowed from publicly available sources to make its educational/critical arguments. Said nudity has been left entirely uncensored for those purposes. While explicitly criminal sexual acts, taboos and obscenities are discussed herein, no explicit illustrations thereof are shown, nor anything criminal; i.e., no snuff porn, child porn or revenge porn. It does examine things generally thought of as porn that are unironically violent. Examples of uncensored, erotic artwork and sex work are present, albeit inside exhibits that critique the obscene potential (from a legal standpoint) of their sexual content: "ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated, masturbation, excretory functions, lewd exhibition of the genitals, or sado-masochistic sexual abuse" (source: Justice.gov). For instance, there is an illustrated example of uncensored semen—a "breeding kink" exhibit with zombie unicorns and werewolves (exhibit 87a)—that I've included to illustrate a particular point, but its purposes are ultimately educational in nature.

The point of this book isn't to be obscene for its own sake, but to educate the broader public (including teenagers*) about sex-positive artwork and labor historically treated as obscene by the state. For the material herein to be legally considered obscene it would have to simultaneously qualify in three distinct ways (aka the "Miller" test):

- appeal to prurient interests (i.e., an erotic, lascivious, abnormal, unhealthy, degrading, shameful, or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion)
- attempt to depict or describe sexual conduct in a patently offensive way (i.e., ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated, masturbation, excretory functions, lewd exhibition of the genitals, or sado-masochistic sexual abuse)
- lack serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value

Taken as a whole, this book discusses debatably prurient material in an academic manner, depicting and describing sexual conduct in a non-offensive way for the express purpose of education vis-à-vis literary-artistic-political enrichment.

*While this book was written for adults—provided to them through my age-gated website—I don't think it should be denied from curious teenagers through a supervising adult. The primary reason I say this (apart from the trauma-writing sections, which are suitably intense and grave) is that the academic material can only be simplified so far and teenagers probably won't understand it entirely (which is fine; plenty of books are like that—take years to understand more completely). As for sexually-developing readers younger than 16 (ages 10-15), I honestly think there are far more accessible books that tackle the same basic subject matter more quickly at their reading level. All in all, this book examines erotic art and sex positivity as an alternative to the sex education currently taught (or deliberately not taught) in curricular/extracurricular spheres. It does so in the hopes of improving upon canonical tutelage through artistic, dialectical-material analysis.

Fair Use: This book is non-profit, and its artwork is meant for education, transformation and critique. For those reasons, the borrowed materials contained herein fall under Fair Use. All sources come from popular media: movies, fantasy artist portfolios, cosplayer shoots, candid photographs, and sex worker catalogs intended for public viewing. Private material has only been used with a collaborating artist's permission (for this book—e.g., Blxxd Bunny's OF material or custom shoots; or as featured in a review of their sex work on my website with their consent already given from having done past work together—e.g., Miss Misery).

Concerning the Exhibit Numbers and Parenthetical Dates: I originally wrote this book as one text, not four volumes. Normally I provide a publication year per primary text once per text—e.g., "Alien (1979)"—but this would mean having to redate various texts in Volumes One, Two and Three after Volume Zero. I have opted out of doing this. Likewise, the exhibit numbers are sequential for the entire book, not per volume; references to a given exhibit code [exhibit 11b2 or 87a] will often refer to exhibits not present in the current volume. I have not addressed this in the first edition of my book, but might assemble a future annotated list in a second edition down the road.

Concerning Hyperlinks: Those that make the source obvious or are preceded by the source author/title will simply be supplied "as is." This includes artist or book names being links to themselves, but also mere statements of fact, basic events, or word definitions where the hyperlink is the word being defined. Links to sources where the title is not supplied in advance or whose content is otherwise not spelled out will be supplied next to the link in parentheses (excluding Wikipedia, save when directly quoting from the site). One, this will be especially common with YouTube essayists I cite to credit them for their work (though sometimes I will supply just the author's name; or their name, the title of the essay and its creation year). Two, concerning YouTube links and the odds of videos being taken down, these are ultimately provided for supplementary purposes and do not actually need to be viewed to understand my basic arguments; I generally summarize their own content into a single sentence, but recommend you give any of the videos themselves a watch if you're curious about the creators' unique styles and perspectives about a given topic.

Concerning (the PDF) Exhibit Image Quality: This book contains over 1,000 different images, which—combined with the fact that Microsoft Word appears to compress images twice (first, in-document images and second, when converting to PDFs) along with the additional hassle that is WordPress' limitations on accepting uploaded PDFs (which requires me to compress the PDF again—has resulted in sub-par image quality for the exhibit images themselves. To compensate, all of the hyperlinks link to the original sources where the source images can be found. Sometimes, it links to the individual images, other times to the entire collage, and I try to offer current working links; however, the ephemeral, aliased nature of sex work means that branded images do not always stay online, so some links (especially those to Twitter/X accounts) won't always lead to a source if the original post is removed.

Concerning Aliases: Sex workers survive through the use of online aliases and the discussion of their trauma requires a degree of anonymity to protect victims from their actual/potential abusers. This book also contains trauma/sexual anecdotes from my own life; it discusses my friends, including sex workers and the alter egos/secret identities they adopt to survive "in the wild." Keeping with that, all of the names in this book are code names (except for mine, my late Uncle Dave's and his ex-wife Erica's—who are only mentioned briefly by their first names). Models/artists desiring a further degree of anonymity (having since quit the business, for example) have been given a codename other than their former branded identity sans hyperlinks (e.g., Jericho).

Extended, Book-Wide Trigger Warning: This entire book thoroughly discusses xenophobia, harmful xenophilia (necrophilia, pedophilia, zoophilia, etc), homophobia, transphobia, enbyphobia, sexism, racism, race-/LGBTQ-related hate crimes/murder and domestic abuse; child abuse, spousal abuse, animal abuse, misogyny and sexual abuse towards all of these groups; power abuse, rape (date, marital, prison, etc), discrimination, war crimes, genocide, religious/secular indoctrination and persecution, conversion therapy, manmade ecological disasters, and fascism.

For Cuwu, whose demonic behavior (and academic contributions, in between playtime) helped shape what Gothic Communism ultimately became! I've often thought of you as a demon (and compared you to Pennywise the Clown for your wide, hungry mouth, below), so it only makes sense to dedicate your contributions in the Demon Module, itself. This one's for you, kid!

(artist: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

To Bay. I wanted to include a small addendum, acknowledging your contributions once per volume; i.e., what attracted you to the project, me to you, and what we appreciate about each other as partners in its making (and as lovers). For this volume half (with Volume Two cut into multiple parts), here is the fifth slice of the pie:

No matter how things are going for either of us, you are always so kind and considerate to me, always letting me know it's okay to feel and express myself. I don't have to be shy about my sexuality with you, or my emotions, always knowing I won't be judged for them when telling you how I feel. You always have the sweetest smile, and even when you're feeling low, you take the feelings of others into account. You have a gentle, kind heart, but like a hobbit, can be as fierce as a dragon in a pinch. But even amid that substantial ferocity is the immeasurable kindness of a good, sweet boy who loves all things great and small. You love nature and animals and taught me to be a better steward to the Earth and all its creatures. And among them, you are the bestest goodest boy. Bright eyed and bushy tailed, my spirit dog and rainbow muffin, as gentle as the spring rains, but also the soft sigh beyond the sky and behind the rain. My magician, my darling captain. I love you so, ever and always.

Abstract

"This castle is a creature of Chaos. It may take many incarnations." —Alucard, Castlevania: Symphony of the Night (1997)

My book, Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism: Liberating Sex Work under Capitalism through Iconoclastic Art, examines the various differences between sex positivity and sex coercion in sexualized media. Its "Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism¹" combines a wide variety of theories in order to critique capital and capital's sexualization of all workers: anarcho-Communism, Marxism and fourth wave intersectional feminism with the sharpness of Gothic academic theory, the immediacy of online political discourse, as well as postcolonial, posthuman and queer theory, ludology, sex education, antifascist (thus antiwar/anticapitalist) sentiment, poetry and a variety of ironic, xenophilic sex worker illustrations and negotiated labor exchanges' creative successes that illustrate mutual consent in Gothic BDSM language; i.e., what I call "ludo-Gothic BDSM" using various poetic devices to establish—among other things—rape play and the palliative Numinous during calculated risk to raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness; e.g., Metroidvania and the monstrous-feminine having the whore's revenge against profit pimping nature (re: "Rape Reprise"). As such, Sex Positivity employs these theories (and their respective language/mode of expression) holistically and intersectionally to dialectically-materially examine and combat unironic xenophobic mental enslavement during the Internet Age: sex positivity (and universal liberation from profit and the state) versus sex coercion (and universal enslavement pursuant to profit).

Specifically Sex Positivity tackles how neoliberal state-corporate proponents—i.e., official or stochastic cops, including TERFs (trans-exclusionary radical [fascist] feminists) and other standard-to-tokenized (crypto)fascists use canonical imagery created from coerced sex work to affect imagination as a socio-material process; i.e, using canon to generate complicated linguo-material arrangements that

- continuously exploit sexualized workers through widespread xenophobia under late-stage Capitalism; i.e., Capitalism sexualizes all workers to heteronormatively serve the profit motive, commonly through harmful Gothic poetics and BDSM theatrics.
- canonically exploit said arrangements to enshrine their abuse in abject, cryptonymic-hauntological crypts/chronotopes that "incarcerate," "lobotomize," "infantilize" and "incriminate" the public imagination; i.e., Mark Fischer's Capitalist Realism, or myopic inability to imagine a world beyond Capitalism even when Capitalism is in decay (whose maxim regarding Capitalist Realism reads: "It is easier to imagine the end of the world than the end of Capitalism"; source: Capitalist Realism, 2009).
- simultaneously pimp and condemn sex-positive artists who seek to liberate sexualized workers through their own iconoclastic, ironically xenophilic praxis; i.e.,

¹ Re: "the deliberate, pointed critique of capital/Capitalism and the state using a unique marriage of Gothic/queer/game theory and semi-Marxist (an-Com) ideas synthesized by sex-positive workers during proletarian praxis: developing systemic catharsis, mid-liminal expression, with ludo-Gothic BDSM." Refer to "Paratextual Documents" for the full definition, as well as all of the core Gothic theories I use.

camping the canon to escape its brutal historical materialism through their own creative successes, achieving praxial catharsis regarding systemic abuse and generational trauma.

Sex Positivity illustrates, similar to how oscillation is a key component of the Gothic, that Gothic Communism is the oscillation between Capitalism and anarcho-Communism as dialectical-material forces felt in Gothic language by real people: oppositional praxis, or the practical application/synthesis of theory in dialectical-material opposition. To combat nation-states as the ultimate foe, Gothic Communism's chief aim is to be campier (thus sexier and funnier) than Marx; i.e., camping his ghost to develop a holistically intuitive anarcho-Communism begot through a widespread, collective and solidarized emotional and Gothic intelligence/awareness that recultivates the Superstructure and reclaims the Base through intersectional resistance and de facto (extracurricular) reeducation.

Simply put, Gothic has that mood, that cool factor to do the trick; i.e., by subverting monstrous language, which normally dehumanizes workers and nature through popular stories furthering abjection (us versus them): to suitably humanize the harvest, which capital (and its Realism) can only pimp out when vengefully raping nature as monstrous-feminine whore. The whore's revenge against profit, then, is to fuck back on the same Aegis; i.e., when the Man comes around, show him your Aegis. When done correctly, its paradoxical, cryptonymic exposure will set you free (re: silence is genocide), but reversing abjection must happen together as one—per intersectional solidarity healing from rape through a shared pedagogy of the oppressed: walking away from Omelas and towards post-scarcity while becoming better stewards of nature than historically have ever existed (assimilation is poor stewardship)! Medusa demonstrates there is power in what they try to control; take it back by using it in ways they can't steal from you! Become the Gorgon!

(artist: Nyx)

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism: Liberating Sex Work under Capitalism through Iconoclastic Art

Volume Two (volume 3 of 4; from 0 to 3): Monsters, part two: Gothic Poetics, Their History; Demon Module: 1st ed. (v1.1²) written and illustrated by

Persephone van der Waard

(with her original artwork [& art for this book] made in collaboration with fellow sex workers and artists)

edited and co-written by Bay Ryan

This book is strictly non-profit/not for resale. Originally released on her 18+ website for purposes of sex, gender and art education, transformation and critique.

² Redirected the hyperlinks for quotes from Volumes Zero and One to the online book promotions: "The Total Codex" and "Make It Real." Updated the abstract, acknowledgments and glossaries.

Two Essential Halves: Dividing Volume Two in Two

We speak of Time and Mind, which do not easily yield to categories. We separate past and future and find that Time is an amalgam of both. We separate good and evil and find that Mind is an amalgam of both. To understand, we must grasp the whole.

—Isaac Asimov, foreword to Light Years (1988)

The size of Volume Two has required that I divide it in two, if only because doing so has made it easier to work with and transport. It's still very much a single volume, but one composed of two essential halves: the usage and history of Gothic poetics. Part one provides the Volume Introduction and Poetry Module, the latter of which discusses the poetic usage of monsters versus their historical evolution; and part two supplies the Volume Conclusion preceded by twin monster modules, the Undead and Demon Modules, which invert the focus from poetry to history—i.e., focusing on the historical usage of undead, demonic and animalistic monsters. Each half will contain the usual paratextual documents (with images swapped out for each), but their unique content works in harmony and must be combined to grasp the whole of oppositional praxis, mid-poiesis. Technically this is a six-book series, but I still prefer to consider it four volumes where Volume Two has been divided in three (parts one and two, part two having two sub-volumes). But, just as the Gothic concerns manmade (Cartesian) divisions that alienate us from nature and ourselves—i.e., as black-and-white beings to battle against one another in service of elite aims; e.g., Ripley the centrist warrior-maiden defending her virtue from the Communist, intersex Medusa—we must consider how liberation occurs by subverting these dichotomies to upend worker abuse within state territories being reclaimed by us. Doubled during oppositional praxis, Ripley and the alien become things to canonize or camp. To camp canon, you will need both volume halves: the medieval (Gothic) poetry of monsters and the revived (Neo-Gothic) history of its use. Just as Ripley and the alien aren't separate from each other, but form two essential halves torn asunder and going to combat with multiple versions of themselves, the spectres of Marx and capital haunt the same cathedral and its inhabitants across space and time; they cannot exist without each other in some shape or form. As Galatea, we can free them from Pygmalion's mind, making each our own.

(artist: BTG Art)

Note, 8/6/2024: Due to length issues, I've decided to divide Volume Two, part two in two, effectively treating each module—the Poetry Module (from part one), and the Undead and Demon Modules—as its own sub-volume with its own release, but also its own online promo series (where you can download the exhibit images at full resolution): "Brace for Impact," "Searching for Secrets," and "Deal with the Devil." For organizational purposes, all sub-volumes are considered part of the same volume; each module will actually have a longer page length than Volumes One and Zero, and each will feature a unique front and back cover with Harmony on it—with the exception of the Demon Module you're currently reading, which has Romantic Rose on the front and the back:

(artist: Romantic Rose)

Volume Summaries

Sex Positivity is composed of four volumes: Volume Zero, One, Two and Three (arranged numerically as "volume [1, 2, 3, or 4] of 4, from 0 to 3" on their text-only title pages). Each has a proper title and ordinary noun(s) with which it is referred to; e.g., Volume One is also called "the manifesto," and Volume Two is also referred to as "the Humanities primer," etc. Currently my thesis volume, manifesto volume, Poetry Module and Undead Module are all live; the remaining volumes/modules are planned to release over the remainder of 2024, and will be accessible through my website's 1-page promo (below).

These summaries are short and basic. To access the entire list of volume/chapter summaries for Sex Positivity and its full table of contents, a separate PDF can be downloaded from my website. Click here to access my website's 1-page promo, which contains all relevant download links/information regarding my book. —Perse

Paratextual Materials (per volume)

The paratextual materials concern the entire book, and come with each volume. The front of every volume will have: its front and rear cover images, its first disclaimer (legal information, citation facts, and trigger warnings, etc), the abstract, the inner cover image for the entire book, the text-only title page for the current volume, the volume/chapter summaries; an essay about "making Marx gay" and a small explanation on one of this book's oldest and chief aims, illustrating mutual consent; the second disclaimer (what I will and won't exhibit), an address to the audience, essential keywords, and (for Volumes One, Two and Three) a heads-up section with various reminders from Volume Zero, including reading comprehension pointers; and, of course, the table of contents per volume. There's also (for Volumes Two and Three) a small section about losing our training wheels and relying less on theory as we push into the second half of the book; and (for Volume Three, parts one and two), a brief explanation on why that volume was ultimately divided in two. Finally, the back of each volume will include the keyword glossary and the Acknowledgments and About the Author sections.

approximate³ length: ~57,000-62,500 words/~204-220 pages⁴ and ~17 unique images (including the front and rear covers)/~95-104 total images

³ The length of the paratextual documents vary slightly per volume. All approximations are subject to change as the volumes are finalized.

⁴ ~75-95 pages for the front of the volume, and ~128 for the rear.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Volume Zero⁵: Thesis

The thesis volume contains the complex theory of my book series; i.e., its various lists of interconnected theoretical devices, as well as the entirety of specialized keywords, all of which I unpack and explain in order. To that, it contains my author's foreword, a small essay on the performance and paradox of power ("Notes on Power"), as well as my book's manifesto tree (scaffold of oppositional praxis), thesis argument⁶ on Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism, "camp map" and symposium; it uses them to encompass, then articulate, the entirety of my book's theoretical content, using a variety of cited material and keywords (e.g., the Gothic, monstrous-feminine, and Amazonomachia) to delve into its broadest/most common arguments as deeply as possible. Written based on years of independent research—as well as older blogposts, essays, and my master's thesis—Volume Zero essentially operates as my PhD on Metroidvania and ludo-Gothic BDSM but also my total curriculum, which can be simplified as needed when being taught to others in more anecdotal, everyday forms.

approximate volume length (minus the paratextual documents): ~226,000 words/651 pages and ~474 unique images

⁵ When writing the thesis volume, I just called it "the thesis volume"; I also wrote it after initially writing Volumes One, Two and Three (out of order, and revisiting each in turn after my thesis was completed and put online, followed by Volumes One; Two, part one; and Two, part two's sub-volumes, etc). For my own sanity I have decided to continue preserving the original nomenclature: the thesis volume, Volume One (the manifesto), Volume Two (the Humanities primer) and Volume Three (on proletarian praxis). The thesis volume is technically Volume Zero in relation to them and I sometimes call it that in the book; I also call it "my thesis," "the thesis argument" or "the thesis volume," etc.

⁶ (a summary of the thesis paragraph from the thesis volume): "Capitalism dimorphically sexualizes everything under a heteronormative, settler-colonial scheme, one whose Cartesian myopia of Capitalist Realism must be escaped from; i.e., via a deliberate iconoclasm that liberates sex workers (or sexualized workers) under Capitalism through sex-positive art."

Volume One: Manifesto and Instruction

Volume One contains the simplified theory of my book series; i.e., its Gothic-Communist manifesto outlines a teaching method for synthesizing praxis, meaning through an introduction to Gothic-Communist theory from my thesis volume that has been simplified. Written before my thesis but updated in light of its construction, the manifesto takes a more conversational approach to my thesis argument; i.e., presenting said argument through my original preface, manifesto, sample essay and synthesis roadmap as a potent means of teaching others how to develop Communism through the Gothic mode. To this, Volume One merely begins exploring the application of my theories when trying to achieve development through praxial synthesis and catharsis; i.e., power and trauma as things to interrogate (and negotiate/play with) by writing about and illustrating them through Gothic poetics in the shared dialogs of contested spaces: ludo-Gothic BDSM serving as a flexible, campy and productive means of teaching empathy and class/culture consciousness through anecdotal evidence merged with dialectical-material scrutiny and analysis—where survival and healing from state abuse (and generational trauma) must be expressed through what we create ourselves as stemming from said abuse and its complicated spheres. While the reduction of pure theory to more comprehensible forms remains vital to achieving emotional/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness, their instruction is nonetheless informed by workers living with trauma who inherently distrust the state: the oppressed. Heeding their pedagogy remains essential when synthesizing praxis in our own daily lives; i.e., through our personalized learned approaches to Gothic instruction being assisted by those with less privilege merging their poetics (and theatre) with ours.

approximate volume length ("): ~206,000 words/564 pages and ~394 images

Volume Two: Monsters

Volume Two is the Humanities primer/Monster Volume. It divides into three smaller modules, which comprise a history of applied Gothic theory and poetics (simple and complex). Organizationally the volume divides in two larger parts, with three separate modules; re: the Poetry Module in part one, which explores the usage/application of Gothic poetics (with some historical elements); and Undead and Demon Modules in part two, which explore the history of Gothic poetics (with some applicative elements; re: ludo-Gothic BDSM). Due to their length, each

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

module has actually been released as its own sub-volume; in turn, each has its own promo series, where you can read a given module, piece-by-piece, as individual blogposts; re: "Brace for Impact" (the Poetry Module), "Searching for Secrets" (the Undead Module), and "Deal with the Devil" (the Demon Module).

Furthermore, the sub-volumes collectively explore the complex-to-simple usage/application and history of Gothic poetics during oppositional praxis; i.e., its (un)ironic manifestation as xenophobic and/or xenophilic: creatively interpreting (and negotiating with) the Gothic past/Wisdom of the Ancients to better understand our own alien, fetishized world and the exploitation we face within it as dehumanized workers. We will demonstrate how to think like a Gothic poet/Renaissance person (through applied monstrous poetics), then examine two basic monster classes—the undead and demonic—and include anthropomorphic examples from the natural world as further hybridizing these already intersecting modules (furries, chimeras, composites); e.g., zombie-vampire werewolves, or undead fox demons, etc.

We'll also reconsider Mark Fischer's notion of Capitalist Realism; i.e., inspecting how it fosters a plethora of cyberpunk and other dystopic/operatic "canceled futures," whose canonical, myopic hauntologies and cryptonomy must be challenged with iconoclastic monsters operating as a counterterror device: to help people radically imagine, and empathize with, a world beyond Capitalism (and state terror). Instead of simply viewing the current world as ending and labor to blame for it, we can learn why the state is ultimately to blame for a) its own decay and b) its scapegoating of said decay onto dehumanized monstrous-feminine workers of decreasing privilege/socio-material advantage. In turn we can portray the Medusa (nature-as-alien) as something to hug, fuck and love, not rape, kill or otherwise harm for profit vis-à-vis Cartesian thought.

Volume Two, part one: Poetry Module

Whereas the Monster Modules focus on the history of Gothic poetics—i.e., as something to learn from when poetically articulating our own pedagogy of the oppressed—the Poetry Module focuses on Gothic poetics as a historical-material process whose history we contribute towards. Its emphasis lies in teaching with Gothic poetic devices by applying them, the module explaining said devices while going over them, one-by-one; i.e., in a series of poetry-themed sections: "Time," "Teaching," "Medicine," and "the Medieval." Last but not least, the module includes a sizeable extension that goes over different ways to play with the imaginary past; i.e., per ludo-Gothic BDSM and rape play.

approximate length ("): ~300,000 words/~795 pages, ~625 unique images

Volume Two, part two: Undead Module

This module explores the poetic history of the undead; i.e., as creatures driven less by active intelligence and more by a desire to freeze and feed in the buried presence of trauma and harmful conditions. It explores how the state's monopolies lead to a state of exception within its sites of settler-colonial violence, which in turn create a violent upheaval/silent scream among the oppressed and oppressors alike as the state takes from workers and nature; i.e., the voice of colonial trauma and the vengeful, desperate feeding on the living by the undead as the genocided dead, having come home to roost—zombies. However, the alienation and feeding also affect the ruler class, leading to vampirism as a canonical effect that must be personified in healthier forms of medieval nostalgia that, for their using logical motions, become ghost-like, copied and imperfect. Reclaiming these modules requires embodying and subverting the very traumas the state relies on to control us by keeping us hungry and braindead (a process I call "lobotomization")—to, as the undead generally do, paralyze our prey and feed on their frozen bodies, albeit in ways that pointedly develop Gothic Communism: by taking back what's ours during ludo-Gothic BDSM (demons, by comparison, tend to give; e.g., dark desires, fatal knowledge or revenge fulfillment).

approximate length ("): ~430,580 words/~1,055 pages and ~832 unique images

Volume Two, part two: Demon Module

This module explores the poetic history of demons (made/summoned/of nature); i.e., as actively cunning-yet-alien shapeshifters. Canonized as treacherous within transactional dialogs of forbidden, unequal exchange (of power, knowledge and darkness) and permanent transformation, demons frequently yield a repressed desire for radical change haunted by systemic abuse; i.e., of rape and revenge as things to canonize or camp through the Gothic mode: as untrustworthy beings made deceitful and torturous through the ghost of the counterfeit's process of abjection's Promethean Quest or Faustian bargain. As such, we'll consider the subversive, cryptonymic potential of demons; i.e., to reverse abjection through revolutionary cryptonymy's double operation (to conceal and reveal taboo subjects), all while dealing with state doubles (re: DARVO and obscurantism, including tokenized variants). Be those people, places or something in between (the chronotope and its castle narrative/mise-en-abyme), we'll do so through their classical function—as seductive, mendacious granters of dark wishes, including fulfilling the whore's revenge: of nature policed, thus pimped, as monstrous-feminine by the state for profit, which the demon (as a vengeful, monstrous-feminine whore) challenges said motive (and its raping of nature) in favor of something better.

To it, we'll explore the dark, hauntological creativity and endless morphological variety of demons, but especially how they manifest and behave; i.e., as a vengeful, nebulous, psychosexual matter of exchange, transformation and desire, onstage and off, during ludo-Gothic BDSM and liminal, half-real expression: composite bodies like cyborgs, golems and robots that are built with mad science (the Promethean Quest), occult beings that are summoned and dealt with (the Faustian Bargain), or overtly natural totems that are hunted down within nature-as-alien.

approximate length ("): ~534,396 words/~1,245 pages and ~1,169 unique images

Volume Three: Praxis (WIP)

Volume Three, or the Praxis Volume, combines Volume Zero's complex theory, Volume One's simplified theory/synthetic model, and Volume Two's monster history and application; i.e., as something to challenge the state by fostering our own creative successes of proletarian praxis, and whose mutual consent, informed consumption and informed consent, sex-positive de facto education, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation boil down to sex positivity (and liberation) versus sex coercion while developing Gothic Communism (with a huge focus on resisting tokenization; e.g., TERFs). In other words, Volume Three covers the informed, intersectionally continuous application of successful proletarian praxis as we reinterpret the Gothic past pushing for universal liberation. Striking a careful, intuitive balance between pure theory and taught instruction, its introduction/summation takes Volume Zero's

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

theoretical backbone, Volume One's simplified teaching approach and Volume Two's past lessons, then outlines the dialectical-material objectives through which to apply our central Gothic theories—i.e., in a dialectical-material way using updated, posthumanist models (expanded beyond Cartesian thought) in order to achieve Gothic Communism one step at a time. This includes the creative successes of proletarian praxis, which the volume explores in relation to state forces who resist their transformative power to keep things the same; i.e., the state vs workers, generally by pitting the latter against each other. A huge part of proletarian praxis, then, involves a gradual development of emotional/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness during our updated teaching approach and labor negotiations when expressed during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., to counterattack state forces in service to our larger goals—our six Gothic-Marxist tenets—thwarting Capitalist Realism.

The Praxis Volume divides in two halves (inside one volume):

Volume Three, part one: Lays out sex positivity and sex coercion—but also the liminal areas between them—in a two-part introduction, followed by three chapters.

Volume Three, part two: Concerns sex positivity versus sex coercion. It contains Chapters Four and Five plus the Conclusion, which concerns the creative successes of proletarian praxis versus state praxis. Time to fight!

approximate volume length ("): ~234,000 words/795 pages and ~394 unique images (under construction)

approximate total book length: ~1,967,400 words/5,325 pages and ~3,992 unique images

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Making Marx Gay

"Why camp canon?" you ask? Because we have to! Canon is heteronormative, thus foundational to our persecution as built into capital out of antiquity's Drama and Comedy into more recent inventions of the staged gimmick; i.e., of the back-and-forth wrestling match versus the Greek play's chorus and musical numbers, but also the opera and castle as an operatic site of forbidden, extreme desire, guilty pleasure and possessive love. Capitalism needs enemies to fight who are different from the status quo and we fit the bill. In short, we fags "make it gay" for our own survival.

—Persephone van der Waard, Sex Positivity, Volume Zero (2023)

This short, five-page essay aims to address several key points: a) about Marx's homophobia, and b) inability to say as much about queer rights that we, while camping canon, must address by camping Marx, hence making him (or rather, his ghost) gay. I wrote it after thinking on Marx's underlying bigotries and other shortcomings in Volume One (which I mention in that volume's preface). While I had focused on his lack of a conscious Gothic critique and active anti-Semitism (source: "Karl Marx in the Ludwig Rosenberger Library of Judaica," 2006), I also wanted to address his homophobia, insofar as to camp something is to make it gay using Gothic poetics. We must do this to Marx's ghost, lest Communism remain stuck in place, unable to develop away from Capitalist Realism.

(source: The Gay Liberator, no. 42, 1974)

Fascists tend to say, "make something great again," arguing as they do for a return to greatness that is inextricably tied to a conservative imaginary past. Conversely, Marx and his ilk tended to look to the future to escape the ghosts of the past, except their banishment under Capitalist Realism has led them—as Derrida pointed out—to haunt language through spectres of the man himself: his nebulous, shapeshifting reputation. It is this version of Marx that we must contend with, because it is the one that we can transform out of the actual man himself as a complicated fixture of history.

To that, this brief reminder stresses something that my thesis discusses repeatedly and should likewise be kept in mind throughout the entire book: Marx wasn't gay in the functional sense⁷; he was to some degree homophobic, and bigoted in ways his epistolary correspondence with Engels reveals. And while I think it's entirely worth noting that homosexuality and its formative history merit valid criticism insofar as men with power have often sexually abused children (which Foucault dubiously called "everyday occurrence in the life of village sexuality [and] inconsequential bucolic pleasures," notably lamenting their ending of, following the rise of the bourgeoisie⁸), we must also remember that until the late 1800s gender-non-conformity was entirely synonymous with criminal activity (for men, because women and slaves weren't legally considered people at this point); i.e., "sodomy" as a breaking with the ancient canonical codes that stress PIV sex, thus sexual reproduction. To this, those who abused children and those who did not were clumped together in the same messy sphere, say nothing of important but tardy modern distinctions such as "trans," "intersex," and non-binary," etc.

Moreover, this malnourished trend (and its inherited confusions) stemmed from socio-material conditions that are not set, but rather can change and transform as time goes on. Just as the word "homosexual" didn't spring into formal, written existence until 1870—and words like "transsexual" and "transgender" emerged later still—the oral, Gothic traditions that informed them are as old as Humanity itself (certainly far older than Enlightenment thinkers and their disastrous Cartesian models) and have only continued to evolve over time (which Volume Two shall demonstrate). So our praxis (which Volume Three shall cover) must take heed

⁷ I.e., not openly, anyways. Heteronormativity certainly has closeted men endlessly overcompensating for their perceived "lack" of straightness, to which we can only speculate about Marx being closeted or not. What matters is what he said or didn't say regarding the liberation of GNC people from state control. His problem, as we shall see, lay less in how he focused primarily on class and material conditions instead of class and culture combined through socio-material conditions, but that the language hadn't "caught up." As Sherry Wolf points out in "The Myth of Marxist Homophobia" (2009): "It is insufficient, however, to argue that Marx and Engels were merely prisoners of the era in which they lived, though they were undoubtedly influenced by the dominant Victorian morals of the early Industrial Revolution" (source). Indeed, they fought progressively for the Cause regarding those scandals and crises-of-the-day that society published most openly and clearly. Among these, homosexuality had yet to emerge, and indeed would not until Oscar Wilde's infamous trial (1895) twelve years after Marx had already kicked the bucket (1883).

Wolf raises concerns about American slavery and anti-Irish racism, to which Marx and Engels fought for the oppressed; what injustices they saw and had the language for, they fought for the side of workers on social issues:

All this refuses definitively the argument that Marxism is interested only in questions of class. Marx and Engels' body of writings and life's pursuit have influenced generations of revolutionaries who have fought for a better world, including a sexually liberated one. Yet there is no reason to defend every utterance and act as if they were infallible gods instead of living men, warts and all (ibid.).

I'm inclined to agree with Wolf, but won't apologize for the societal ignorance that informed Marx and Engel's private homophobia. Clearly there is room for improvement, which neither man lived to see, and this is best expressed through Gothic poetics; i.e., the open, popular language of monsters and aliens as fetishized by the state, but also workers for or against the state and the bourgeoisie.

⁸ From A History of Sexuality, Volume One (1980).

of the updated jargon, but also the imaginary past as something to revive in the present by making Marx gay in ways the man himself could not.

(source: Pluto Press)

The idea isn't exactly new—Mario Mieli's Towards a Gay Communism established the basic idea in 1977 and the Revolutionary Communist Party's admittedly incomplete 2001 "On the Position on Homosexuality in the New Draft Programme" discussed the idea towards homosexuals and women⁹, first and foremost, while not having the most comprehensive understanding of trans people¹⁰. My approach takes things much further through a holistic Gothic methodology meant towards ending Capitalist Realism (which hadn't crystalized in 1977, let alone the 1800s). Sex Positivity camps canon by "making it gay" using monsters to consciously humanize, thus liberate, workers with; i.e., cooler, sexier and more fun, etc, and in ways that—unlike Foucault or Marx—actively and effectively diminish the state's capacity to inflict harm in service to the profit motive through Gothic poetics.

In other words, the state commodifies oppression through monsters, which we must challenge by making our own. Our "making it gay" includes Marx and his ghostly reputation as something to debate with (and improve on) in spectral forms

⁹ The New Draft Programme raises a series of rhetorical questions for which no immediate answers are supplied:

Should our goal be to put an end to the subordination of all women, and to liberate all humanity, or to be satisfied with some women laying claim to a few prerogatives historically reserved for privileged males and with groups that have been discriminated against and 'marginalized' achieving some 'self-expression' within a self-limited subculture or community? Should we be seeking to find individual solutions and pursuing illusions like 'inner peace,' or to collectively raise hell and, with the leadership of the proletariat, unite all who can be united, to tear down the old society and build a new one with the goal of uprooting and abolishing all oppression? (source).

In short, their stance is less hard than it should be.

¹⁰ "More recently a movement has emerged to take up the rights of transgendered people (people who live or 'pass' as the opposite gender as well as people who actually become transsexuals via medical and surgical intervention). This is a development our party needs to understand better" (ibid.). Clearly.

that hold these once-living men accountable now for their bigotries back then (from my author's foreword in the thesis volume):

Marx wasn't gay enough for my tastes, thus could never camp canon to the amount required. In camping him, I'm obviously doing this through the Gothic mode, specifically its making of monsters—their lairs, battles, identities and struggles—through a reclaimed Wisdom of the Ancients that represents ourselves during shared dialectical-material struggles that take what Marx touched on before going further than he ever could

However private they may have kept them, it doubtless affected their ability to speak out loud concerning the rights of gender-non-conforming persons and their divergent sexualities. So we, by camping their ghosts, must not be silent like theirs were/are; we must use any means at our disposal to "cry out," including novels and movies, but also videogames and their franchised material (a neoliberal phenomenon)—e.g., Metroidvania (which Volume Zero will expand upon).

Just because Marx and later, Foucault, were "of their times" and indeed regressing to some degree towards an imaginary (thus possible) world—one where the past-as-problematic informed their incomplete visions of the future—this doesn't mean we must do the same; i.e., blindfolded and crossing our fingers. Indeed, we can openly acknowledge a queerness of the historical past in imaginary forms that speak to a better future than what Marx dared imagine. For he and Engels, queerness was "sodomy" and the third sex (a problematic term) was "Uranians," but that view was informed by the present availability of information at the time. Even so, Engels—despite calling sodomy "abominable" in "Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State" (1883) and lacking the ability to distinguish harmful forms from non-harmful forms—tries in the same essay to imagine a world beyond his own that speaks to our goals:

What we can now conjecture about the way in which sexual relations will be ordered after the impending overthrow of capitalist production is mainly of a negative character, limited for the most part to what will disappear. But what will there be new? That will be answered when a new generation has grown up: a generation of men who never in their lives have known what it is to buy a woman's surrender with money or any other social instrument of power; a generation of women who have never known what it is to give themselves to a man from any other considerations than real love or to refuse to give themselves to their lover from fear of the economic consequences. When these people are in the world, they will care precious little what anybody today thinks they ought to do; they will make their own practice and their corresponding public opinion of their practice of each individual—and that will be the end of it (source).

In response, Sherry Wolf writes in "The Myth of Marxist Homophobia,"

While here Engels is explicit about how heterosexual relations would undoubtedly be transformed by a socialist revolution, his broader point is that by removing the material obstacles to sexual freedom the ideological barriers can fall. This raises far-reaching possibilities for a genuine sexual revolution on all fronts (source).

(artist: Mugiwara Art)

Again, I am inclined to agree, but want to critique Engels a bit more than Wolf does. The people he's discussing aren't those born into a world where Capitalism simply "doesn't exist" when the person is born. To posit that is to kick the can down the road and shrug one's shoulders. Instead, the current generation must try to imagine a better future while developing Communism in the bargain. To that, hearts, minds and bodies can change while people are alive, and the trick, I would argue, is through Gothic poetics; I was in the closet once and have needed to work hard while alive to become a better, more authentic person. It's certainly far too late to rescue Marx and Engels the historical figures from the embarrassing grave they admittedly dug for themselves, but we can transform their spectres as living entities inside society and ourselves. Take what is useful and leave the rest. Marx will understand. And if he doesn't, to Hell with him!

Illustrating Mutual Consent

Sex Positivity was founded on informed consent through negotiated labor exchanges. By extension, the book's entire premise is to illustrate mutual consent (and other sex-positive devices) through dialectical-material analysis; i.e., something to learn from when regarding the products of said labor whose iconoclastic lessons nevertheless cannot be adequately supplied by singular images (or collages) alone, but must instead be relayed through subtext in an educational environment where these things are being displayed: a gallery. In other words, sex positivity becomes something to exhibit and explain during dialectal-material analysis of sex-positive works prepared in advance by mutually-consenting parties.

(model and artist: Maybel and Persephone van der Waard)

Every volume for this book is full of exhibits like the one above; every exhibit that features artwork made in active collaboration amounts to a conscious attempt between myself and others to negotiate our respective boundaries in open cooperation, and each was made while interrogating personal and systemic trauma as something to mark and negotiate with using monstrous language. Regardless of the exact poetics used, a large part of any exhibit made in collaboration is the deeper context for its construction: that the sex work and artwork being displayed remain just that—work, which requires payment in ways that both parties agree is fair from fairly argued and fairly implemented positions.

In keeping with the anarchist spirit of things, nothing was arranged from positions of unfair advantage on my end; everything was spelled out up front. In turn, the various permissions that other workers granted me were executed by those who had total say over the material being used/featured: in essence, they controlled how I represented their labor, bodies, and identities. From the cropping of the images and monster design choices per illustration, to the aliases being used and the services being plugged, every personalized exhibit has been devised according to how the models-in-question decided while navigating these exchanges. To that, each transaction goes well beyond commercial goods traded for money and includes whatever we bartered, insofar as labor for labor amounts to a great many things: photographs for art, sex for sex, sex for photographs, art for sex, and acts of friendship and displays of shared humanity and kindness that we discovered along the way.

To all of the people involved, I give thanks; this book could not exist without you. For a comprehensive thanksgiving to all the sex workers involved in this project, please refer to the Acknowledgements section at the back of the volume.

(artist: Maybel and Jackie)

Defining Sexualized Media/Sex Work, and Regarding Hard Kinks: What I Will and Won't Exhibit

"What's in the box?!"

—David Mills, Se7en (1995)

Comrades,

These remaining paratextual elements (and their footnotes) are lifted directly from Volume Zero. Given how they discuss the entire book, I've decided to include them in every volume purely for convenience. You may skip them using the hyperlinks, below.

The table of contents for the Demon Module doesn't appear until page 118, preceded by the heads-up on page 103. Until then, this second disclaimer explains what I will and won't artistically exhibit in the book

- What I Will Exhibit \(and related terms\)
- What I Won't Exhibit

followed by several more small paratextual sections:

- A Note on Canonical Essentialism
- The Six Gothic-Marxist Tenets and Four Main Gothic Theories
- The State: Its Key Tools; re: the Monopolies, Trifectas and Qualities of Capital
- Abridged Manifesto Tree \(of Oppositional Praxis\)
- [About the Logo \(for Gothic \[gay-anarcho\] Communism\)](#)
- Concerning My Audience, My Art, Reading Order and the Glossary
- Essential Keywords, a priori
- "Rage Over a Lost Penny": Neologisms; or, Jargon that I Coined
- Written Backwards: A Ship of Theseus, a Gothic Castle
- Into the Void: Losing the Training Wheels
- Concerning Monsters
- We Are Legion: So Many Monsters, So Little Time

Click here to skip to the heads-up (a small section of things to keep in mind from the thesis volume); click here to go directly to the table of contents and the rest of the volume.

Love,

—Your "Commie Mommy," Persephone

The Monster Volume is the third of four volumes for Sex Positivity and contains ~2,600 unique images (subject to change); all four volumes, when they release, will contain over 3,900 unique images (subject to change) and hundreds of collage-style exhibits. These invigilate, interrogate and weaponize sexualized media for proletarian purposes of class/culture war during oppositional praxis (competing applications of theory during dialectical-material exchange, or opposing material forces), but especially fetishes, kink and BDSM common in Gothic poetics: monster art/porn and yes, hardcore sex. Given the taboo nature of these things—and that Gothic media habitually explores taboo subjects like dehumanization, murder and rape, we're left with a thoroughly loaded equation whose variables have specific definitions:

Capitalism sexualizes all labor for the profit motive in a heteronormative (thus colonial, dimorphic) theatrical scheme: "sexualized media = sex work as sex-positive vs sex-coercive in the fight for basic human rights centered around debates of universal correctness/ethics and reactionary purity arguments."

To address both the equation and the taboos that Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism wrestles with, I wanted to provide some definitions and disclaimers, right out of the gate.

To start with, we need to define kink¹¹, fetish, and BDSM as forms of roleplay that we'll expand on (e.g., chaser/bait, exhibit 1a1a1h1) in the thesis volume and elsewhere in the book (normally block-quoting keyword definitions is restricted to the thesis volume, but these terms are some of the most vital in the book. As such, these four definitions will not be abridged, nor will any of the others in this second disclaimer as it appears in all four volumes):

roleplay

The playing of roles in social-sexual situations, usually with a dominant/submissive element (as many come from classic stories which tend to be heteronormative; but even iconoclastic stories transmute BDSM, fetishes and kinks to be sex-positive within dominant/submissive models).

¹¹ In this disclaimer and the entire thesis volume, I have emboldened and color-coded keywords (rather than opt for italics/underlining, which I generally utilize for emphasis). Generally this is done when first introducing them, but also when I am about to define/am currently defining or otherwise stressing their involvement (I will also do this as a graphical aid to showcase when a bunch of keywords are being used in tandem, especially during the thesis statement). Regardless of when I do, it's meant to clue you in that we're discussing words that have specific definitions that are about to be expanded on or otherwise invoked (at the present time or later in the document) or reinvoked after they have already been explained. Also, while this only happens a few times, a couple of phrases aren't in the glossary because I haven't been able to define some of the more niche or incidental expressions (usually idioms or figures of speech); this is something I'd like to address in a future, second edition.

kink

Nontraditional forms of sexual activity that don't necessarily involve forms of power exchange between partners (unequal or otherwise).

fetishization

A fetish, or the act of making something into a fetish, is "a form of sexual desire in which gratification is linked to an abnormal degree to a particular object, item of clothing, or part of the body." Generally, fetishes are pre-existing social-sexual trends that people either embrace or reject. They aren't explicitly sexist (e.g., mutually consenting to show feet), but become sexist when used in exploitative ways (e.g., sex workers forced to show their feet to generate profit for someone else).

(demon) BDSM

Bondage, discipline, sadism, and masochism—seemingly nontraditional forms of sexual activity that involve unequal power exchange that has actually been canonized and must be camped in doubled forms. Both involve power, but non-consensual (sex-coercive) variants canonically involve power abuse—generally of women and other marginalized workers by white, cis-het men/arguably token queers in romanticized tales thereof (e.g., Stoker's vampire, Barker's Cenobite) that often, according to Susan Sontag's "Fascinating Fascism" (1974), invoke not just the "master scenario" whose purely sexual experience is "severed from personhood, from relationships, from love," but also the fascist language of death: "The color is black [and red], the material is leather, the seduction is beauty, the justification is honesty, the aim is ecstasy, the fantasy is death" (source). In a sex-positive sense, such rituals regularly invoke demons as a Gothicized means of catharsis, but also practicing impulse and power control during non-harmful euphoria whose painful, physical, emotional, and/or sexual activities occur between good-faith participants; i.e., ironic variants of Ann Radcliffe's classically xenophobic and dubiously "consensual" Black Veil (hiding the threat badly), demon lover (the xenophobic/xenophilic threat of unironic mutilation and rape), and exquisite "torture" (rape play).

We'll further unpack Radcliffe's tricky torture tools in the thesis volume (and lay waste to her sacred memory in the process). There's also dom(inator/-inatrix), sub(missive), "strict/gentle," topping/a top vs bottoming/a bottom, regression, rape fantasies, and aftercare; but we will likewise unpack these in the thesis volume when we discuss subverting rape culture and "prison sex" mentalities vis-à-vis Man Box, good play vs bad play, and other germane theatrical factors (ahegao, moe, chasers/bait, etc).

Now that we've outlined the basic ideas of Gothic fetish and kink, the rest of the disclaimer will provide some definitions for what I will exhibit, followed by what I won't exhibit. This goes beyond basic nudity like the image below but will involve nudity in either case:

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

What I Will Exhibit (and related terms)

Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, sagas, Nocturnos lemures, portentaque.

Dreams, magic terrors, spells of mighty power, Witches, and ghosts who rove at midnight hour (source).

—the pre-preface epigram to Matthew Lewis' The Monk (1796)

Matthew Lewis was a very queer and very educated young man when he wrote The Monk (which despite the lack of open queer discourse at its inception, is a tremendously queer apologia written in Gothic camp par excellence). Like him, I am very queer and educated (though not as young or closeted, I think); also like him, I like to parody sex in the Gothic mode—i.e., write about campy monsters in sexualized media. Here are some glossary definitions and exhibits to give you an idea of what I mean:

sexualized media

Media that contains sexual and gendered components—of cis-het men and women, but also queer persons/other marginalized groups for or against the state. However, the treatment of sexuality and gender—how it is sexualized by "the Media" or in media more broadly—depends on if it is sex-positive or sex-coercive (some examples, below):

(from the companion glossary, exhibit 3a1: Artist, top-left: Frank Frazetta; top-middle-to-right: Sveta Shubina; bottom-left: J. Howard Miller; bottom-middle: Norman Rockwell; bottom-right: Michelangelo.

Artistic mimicry through homage is a common phenomenon of art, with women being illustrated historically by men for various purposes. A common reason for doing so was to illustrate their place in a man's world; e.g., as wives, mistresses [the Virgin or the Whore] but also as workers. Whereas open fascism historically relegates women to traditional modes of women's work, American propaganda temporarily made various concessions during WW2. These occurred to support the overall war effort and the material interests of the elite. After the war ended, women's rights were quickly rescinded in favor of a return to the status quo, female workers being demonized by the same male employers and patrons who formerly promoted them [and fetishized by the likes of Frank Frazetta, who started his career during a regression towards female re-enslavement after the war].

Mimesis is a back-and-forth process, borrowing images and symbols for new purposes during oppositional praxis. In Rosie the Riveter's case, promotions of female "equality" were themselves guided by an American sense of righteousness that went on to be co-opted for social movements long after the original pieces aired. Indeed, Rosie only became a cultural icon of feminism in the 1970s—i.e., as a symbol of female empowerment that eclipsed Rockwell's Christianized mimesis of Michelangelo's Isaiah. On Rockwell, Christina Branham writes in "Rosie the Riveter" (2016),

The pose she strikes seems a bit awkward, but it too conveys a message: it was inspired by Michelangelo's portrayal of the prophet Isaiah on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Why? As stated during a Sotheby's 2002 sale of the original art, "Righteousness is described throughout Isaiah's prophecy as God's strong right arm." Rockwell's Rosie is certainly sporting some strong man-arms, but I would say the bigger message is that America was on the side of righteousness [source].

After Rockwell's upstaging by Miller's latter-day revival, the image of Rosie took on a life of its own. The image itself went on to convey the nostalgia of a reimagined past: the rights of cis-het white women [which second wave feminism primarily represented through its arguments]. In the works of future artists, nostalgia becomes something to reclaim, but also regress towards depending on the context and political leanings of the creator.)

(from the companion glossary, exhibit 3a2: Assorted pieces by Milo Manara and Luis Royo; middle-right: Olsen; far-top-right: Morry Evans. Hauntology presses women into different forms of transgressive servitude—i.e., more about titillating the cis-het male gaze within risky positions of appropriative peril and high imagination/adventure that women are expected not just to perform but compete for under male Pygmalions. Indeed, white, cis-het women assimilate and promote these roles, focusing on the unironic torture of a highly specific and prescriptive industry body type, versus catharsis for women forced to do certain forms of coercively humiliating labor regardless of the genre. Reduced to blind pastiche, these can perpetuate various harmful stereotypes within transgressive media as a means of submitting to formal power rather than resisting and reclaiming it through the same rituals as subverted; e.g., Morry Evan's work of a servile giant for the counterfeit of a nun; or Sveta Shubina's Bowser and Peach, below. We'll examine more iconoclastic subversions throughout the book; e.g., the aforementioned size difference as something to appreciate in different monster types, such as the Amazon/mommy dom, exhibit 51d2.)

(from the companion glossary, exhibit 3a3: Artist, left: Sveta Shubina; right: Don Bluth. The desire to separate the art from the artist and aesthetics from ideology is understandable/possible, but it remains important to remember that when emulating a given style, said style in the past was associated with a problematic belief system and its symbolism; e.g., Don Bluth's damsel-in-distress, Princess Daphne, "needing" to be rescued from the dragon by a man who is still draconian themselves [the knight and the dragon being dichotomized variations of the "walking castle"/human tank]. Shubina is clearly emulating Bluth's visual style but subverts the relationship between the princess and the dragon—i.e., like King Kong but seemingly negotiated through the topos of the power of women [to attract men] as something to toy with. This context, of course, is difficult to glean from the base drawing itself, all but requiring a bit of imagination from us to reinterpret the same old clichés. But even if these stereotypes are subverted, their own work will remain haunted by the sexism of past idols that people unironically love in the present.

The woman as "emasculator" ties to the ironic cuckold of men, having them figuratively "by the balls": "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." This historically unenviable position becomes canonically enviable among women forced to compete for limited husbands with wealth, being judged by men as "gold diggers" and judged by other women jealously fighting over the same heteronormative prize. Conventionally pretty women become viewed through various double standards: the treacherous beauty as a user of everyone around her to get what she wants; i.e., sex as a weapon. While the narrative reduces the woman to a singular role and personality type, it's one where their intelligence is treated like a concealed weapon behind their sexuality as front-and-center. They're forced into uncomfortable clothes and pitted against other women wearing the same princess-style uniform; i.e., the historical-material reality of women competing for the same bloodline: to be the king's prized broodmare.

This includes Bowser in BDSM circles, a prime candidate for the "daddy dom" or queer "bear" stereotype [artist, above: Taran Fiddler]. The paradox of the spiked collar is canonized as the master's sigil that simultaneously is an anti-predation device for a large, powerful pet in iconoclastic circles.)

sex work

Any work centered around sexuality and gender roles, including artwork. More commonly thought of as "prostitution," patriarchal sexism under Capitalism extends sex work to the broader division of sexualized labor within a colonial gender binary: men's work versus women's work. While the former focuses on war, violence and promotion through socio-material dominance, the latter involves submissive, traditionalized modes of sexual-reproductive labor towards a male authority figure—often a boss, parent or husband. So, while many sex workers perform strictly eroticized acts in this manner, many more are secretarial or marital in nature, performed inside traditional sites of women's work like kitchens, bedrooms, or laundromats, but also banks or hospitals. In the creative world, sexist employers compel female creators (musicians, models, illustrators and writers, etc) to promote prescriptive notions of coercive sexuality and gender tied to heteronormative beauty standards, fashion and music. Regardless of the work, sex-positive workers will resist sex coercion through their own labor.

sex positivity

Sexual/asexual expression that enables individual self-expression (thus self-empowerment) by relatively ethical means—the right to do sex work or partake in sexual activity if one so desires. In other words, it is a positive freedom; i.e., freedom for people to do what they want, specifically "the possession of the power and resources (material conditions) to act in the context of the structural limitations of the broader society which impacts a person's ability to act." Apart from being morally good and materially beneficial, sex positivity empowers marginalized communities (who, amongst other things, are generally exploited for sex as a form of labor); it does so by arguing for mutual consent, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation using historically regulated language: bodies and biology, gender identity/performance and (a)sexual orientation.

sex coercion

Sexist, heteronormative argumentation, work and artistry that compels and upholds sexual and gendered norms by abolishing others through various unethical means. This includes corporations downplaying their harmful actions as benign, or fascists framing their openly harmful actions as justified. This freedom to act is a negative freedom; i.e., freedom from external restraint on one's actions. It is generally repressive towards marginalized communities, the elite exploiting them on a material level while also denying them their basic human rights.

Small idiosyncrasy in terms of my writing: When using "sex positivity" or "sex coercion" (nouns) as adjectives, they will be hyphenated; e.g., "The sex-positive fog crept in on little sex-coercive feet." This is completely arbitrary but my aim is to be consistent. —Perse basic/civil human rights

The Communist idea that all human/animal workers deserve fair and equal treatment, which nation-states and corporations historically do not give (they are bourgeois and exploit workers). In Marxist terms, these rights are administered through Communism not according to profit, but "From each according to [their] ability, to each according to [their] needs." According to LeiLani Dowell at the Worker's World Forum in 2012, this existence is planned and achieved through the development phase, aka Socialism: "...to each according to their work."

ethics, ethical, ethicality

This book treats universal ethicality not as canonical societal norms (what is prescriptively "correct" or "morally right" according to canon), but that humans, animals and the environment have basic, unalienable rights. The universality of these rights is what is correct. Anyone's hypothetical ability to systemically "question" or undermine these rights—including the bourgeoisie—is fundamentally incorrect/unethical (what moderates call "compromise").

KASIA BABIS thenib.com

(artist: Kasia Babis)

-phobia/-philia

In Gothic-Communist terms, a phobia isn't raw, animal fear—e.g., fear of death or the unknown—but an actionable, social-sexual stigma, bias or taboo assigned to a particular out-group or historical-material victim under the status quo/inside the state of exception: xenophobia, pedophilia, necrophilia, etc. This extends to various moral panics—e.g., Satanic panic, Red Scares, or the fascist revenge phobia of the backstabbing Jew, etc. Phobias are canonically fetishized. Phobias are often deliberate/accidental misnomers insofar as abuse euphemisms are concerned (again, necrophilia, pedophilia, zoophilia); i.e., used to describe acts of abuse wherein the abuser is acting on a sexual attraction or otherwise abusive compulsion but is acting it out on a party that cannot actually consent (the dead, children, or animals; slaves, wives and other humans legally regarded as property in some shape or form).

purity arguments

A type of reactionary, fascist argumentation tied to manufactured scarcity, consent and conflict as radicalized during moral panics under police states/ethnostates. Think "boundaries for me, not for thee," but attached to limited-time waivers for those who best fit whatever soldiers those in fascist seats of power are looking for (with Himmler anything but "Nordic"). This tends to historically-materially manifest in racial-purity pseudoscience and aggressive recruitment tactics, defending the "purity" of a nation (and its children and women) through racialized supermen, generally with the descriptor "ethnic" attached to them—e.g., ethnic Germans (in Nazi Germany) or Jews (in Israel).

In short, my exhibits and general writing/illustrations concern sexualized media, sex positivity vs sex coercion according to basic human rights (and animal rights/environmental health) according to various xenophobia/xenophilia (whose distinctions—of monster-slaying and monster-fucking—I'll expand on more during the thesis volume) and purity arguments. All are generally relayed through roleplay during kink, fetish and demon BDSM theatre and power/death aesthetics, and while there's room to communicate trauma of all sorts, I have my own comfort levels in terms of what I'll invigilate, exhibit-wise.

What I Won't Exhibit

But my grief was unavailing. My Infant was no more; nor could all my sighs impart to its little tender frame the breath of a moment. I rent my winding-sheet, and wrapped in it my lovely Child. I placed it on my bosom, its soft arm folded round my neck, and its pale cold cheek resting upon mine. Thus did its lifeless limbs repose, while I covered it with kisses, talked to it, wept, and moaned over it without remission, day or night. [...]

Sometimes I felt the bloated Toad, hideous and pampered with the poisonous vapours of the dungeon, dragging his loathsome length along my bosom: Sometimes the quick cold Lizard roused me leaving his slimy track upon my face, and entangling itself in the tresses of my wild and matted hair: Often have I at waking found my fingers ringed with the long worms which bred in the corrupted flesh of my Infant. At such times I shrieked with terror and disgust, and while I shook off the reptile, trembled with all a Woman's weakness (source).

—Agnes de Medina, The Monk

Lewis' camp is violent in the tradition of the Elizabethan/Jacobean theater (e.g., Titus Andronicus, c. 1594; and The Duchess of Malfi, 1614). As such, he had a thing for the abject, the grotesque as hyperbolic and necromantic—dragged up and carted about in a thoroughly campy danse macabre. I'm not partial to combining sex and abject gore, and its exclusion from Sex Positivity doesn't mean it can't be sex-positive¹²; it's just "not my bag." I'd like to quickly explain why.

¹² Consider the postcolonial critique of colonized peoples' being openly raped onscreen during Jennifer Kent's hard-boiled historical drama, The Nightingale (2019). The film unflinchingly explores the intersectional complexities of class, race and gender during Australia's colonization by the British empire; i.e., of the Irish indentured servant and Indigenous slave of color by white Englishmen. It's not meant to be entertainment and that's the point. It also doesn't celebrate the rape of the heroine or the various other people who are raped and/or murdered by the villain as an extension of the white, European (Cartesian) status quo. Despite their brutal nature, these frank depictions of rape aren't exploitative, but expressed through a historical drama meant to educate us about the generational trauma that has been whitewashed in recent years; thus, they are abjectly violent and harmful, but patently designed to be sex-positive by expressing the sex-coercive nature of the abusers towards the abused.

Everyone has limits when it comes to kink, BDSM and the Gothic¹³. What I explore in this book is informed by my own kinkster's/artist's bias—my artistic hard limits regarding hard kink (scat, gore, vore, loli, actual rape) intersecting with my gender identity, orientation (demi-pan, polyamorous) and chosen kinks, but also my Gothic writings about these things. So, while I could easily write an entire book about "male humor" or literal shit, extreme torture porn and "Male Gothic" abjection, hard kink is not something I prefer to explore in my own sex work, artwork or writing (except for consent-non-consent, which we'll cover a fair bit). Likewise, while I am a "gore hound" when it comes to horror movies (I once interviewed Vancouver FX for their effects work in "Alien Ore," 2019, for example), I don't enjoy exhibiting those things as abjected, then fetishized by capital—e.g., acts of unambiguous rape, but also intensely private things put on display like female bathroom antics as a means of publicly degrading the subject as an unironic object of total humiliation, or demonizing literal human excrement/bodily waste.

Art is shared negotiation, and all the content in this book has either been negotiated or is Fair Use. As a whole, Sex Positivity doesn't curate itself to please everyone; it exhibits sex positivity by blurring the lines between porn and art, asexuality and sexuality, pain and other pleasurable responses, trauma and catharsis, lover and associate, etc. Couples and friends can make art. Enemies can, too (friendly and unfriendly). Sometimes I've slept and played with models, but also have friends-with-benefits and platonic friends (my best friend, Ginger, is strictly platonic though we're very open with each other). I engage with all of these things to reflect on praxial synthesis: life drawing and modeling, performance art, homemade porn, cosplay, makeup tutorials, asexual exhibitions of nudism, etc).

Furthermore, there was originally no hardcore porn of me in this book (despite me generally playing with my muses and friends in some shape or form). Starting with the Poetry Module, onwards, I have started including myself in a small number of exhibits.

This book constitutes the cathartic exploration of trauma through Gothic Communism; i.e., through iconoclastic, pornographic art made by workers in exhibitionistic-voyeuristic collaboration: exhibits that feature and highlight the context of negotiation, for the monstrous-poetic expression of our rights and pedagogy of the oppressed¹⁴ (this book features a small number images to critique data theft under the AI boom, but otherwise consists entirely of artwork made by actual humans, not generated by unthinking machines). Even so, while I feel thoroughly uncomfortable exhibiting canonical art as a source, endorsement or perpetuation of unnegotiated trauma,

¹³ The Gothic mode/imagination. For our purposes, the making of monsters, though I will unpack other definitions for context in the symposium: "the 'Gothic' [is] a common point of contention as something that historically remains difficult to define that nevertheless is plastered over everything and used off-hand for centuries according to aesthetics whose ownership is equally imperiled among different media types."

¹⁴ Radical empathy. Coined by Paulo Freire in his 1968 book of the same name, the text is a warning to closeted (and active) moderates to stop talking down to people who know their own trauma far better than moderates do.

- animal exploitation or abuse (my stepfather forced me to watch as he killed our pet rabbits in front of my brothers and I, then cooked and ate them) but also frank depictions of animal butchery under Capitalism (e.g., Our Daily Bread, 2005, and its unflinching examination of an ordinary abattoir)
- abuse, exploitation and fetishization of children and/or persons with physical or mental disabilities
- unironic torture porn in general (e.g., A Serbian Film, 2010; Martyrs, 2008; Funny Games, 1997; Kidnapped, 2010)
- necrophilia exploitation films (e.g., Nekromantik, 1988)
- the grotesque; e.g., the "geek show" gross-out exhibit from William Lindsay Gresham's 1946 novel, Nightmare Alley, or Katherine Dunn's Geek Love (1989)

I do discuss things like chattel/canonical rape, public shame/self-hatred, murder and unironic psychosexual violence (meaning "battle sex," or warring notions of sex in terms of theatrical codifiers for a belief system, but also coded instructions executed by arbiters of an unironic and ironic nature: cops and victims)

psychosexuality ("battle sex")

Literally "of sex and the mind," but in Gothic often having a combative "sex battle" element (the psychomachy), psychosexuality is the adjacent placement of pleasurable pain and other euphoric sensations next to unironic harm; i.e., rape fantasy or theatre. Just as canon and camp exist in the same shadow zone, performative irony and its absence are equally liminal using the same shared aesthetics of power and resistance, death and rape, heroic (monstrous) violence: the colors of stigma, vice, power and sin. Canonical psychosexuality conflates pleasure with genuine harm, including bigoted stereotypes that further this pathology. These result in widespread misconceptions about healthy BDSM as a result of sex-coercive BDSM (through unironic "demon BDSM" examples, including criminal hauntology news cycles or "true crime" in other mediums besides television), and genuine pluralities that seek out dangerous sex (hard kink) due to confused pleasure responses resulting from extreme prey mechanisms/posttraumatic stress disorder that compel victims to unironically spifflicate; i.e., "to be self-destroyed or disposed of by violence" in an unironic sense. As something to unironically or ironically seek out on and offstage, abuse manifests differently per person relative to congenital and environmental factors which are often accident-of-birth. But general psychosexuality manifests through the Destroyer persona and their utterly devastated victim as part of the same social-sexual equation; i.e., a cultural pathology or ironic, informed interrogation regarding the proliferation of this extremism in normalized, canonical depictions of heroic sexuality as embattled: as sex-coercive, hence unironically violent and rapacious through warring factions thereof (and against camp in the larger meta conversation).

in writing throughout the book; and there's certainly a place for all of these things in iconoclastic art (trauma needs to be communicated in as many ways as it can); i.e., the digging up of dead things when we feel—in the classic Gothic sense—"buried alive" according to the enforced relationship between sexuality and gender as Gothicized in canonical works:

live burial

The Gothic master-trope, live burial—as marked by Eve Segewick in her introduction to The Coherence of Gothic Conventions (1986)—is expressed in the language of live burial as an endless metaphor for the buried libido within concentric structures as something to punish "digging into" (which includes investigating the false family's incestuous/abjectly monstrous bloodline; source). To move beyond psychoanalytical models and into Marxist territories, I would describe live burial as incentivized by power structures in ways that threaten abuse (often death, incarceration or rape) to those who go looking into hereditary and dynastic power structures, especially their psychosexual abuse and worker exploitation: the fate of the horny detective, but also the whistleblower.

This poetic disinterment and its paradoxical examination of ourselves as abjectly undead is critically valid; it's just not the kind of necromancy I care to communicate through, first and foremost. As the kids say, it "gives me the yuck."

For example, porn under Capitalism becomes synonymized with gore and other taboo displays as looked at a particular way—clandestinely or otherwise in trashy, "forbidden" stories that communicate through vibes, raw pastiche, recycled conventions, and aesthetics first and foremost. Parody is common, but optional (especially "perceptive" parody, which goes against the profit motive). As such, I thoroughly recognize several key foils, including the fact that a) non-painful pleasure and harmful/non-harmful pain elide in classic Gothic aesthetics¹⁵ and fiction, but also apparel as a core part of these stories; and b) often rely on humiliation kinks that cheerfully play with dead things in a memento mori, "happy Gothic"¹⁶ approach to "dead body positivity"—i.e., of the Tim-Burton Corpse Bride (2006) sort (to be frank, I prefer the less-gory-and-more-moody gloomth of the Mancunian postpunks, or Edward Smith's The Cure), but also more "strict" BDSM: "marathon sadism," electrocution, knife play and hard-choking¹⁷ or simulated drowning exercises, etc. These can be transgressively sex-positive as a means of psychosexual catharsis—especially when dealing with regressive trauma or confused pleasure and pain responses; i.e., seeking pain for its own sake, or having death fantasies (towards oneself or others in a gradient of unironic and ironic forms) that launch a knee-jerk (so to speak) orgasmic response/*jouissance*¹⁸ that stems from surviving hardcore sexual abuse (and emotional/physical abuse, or intersections of all three).

¹⁵ E.g., nipple piercings, which often appear in the shape of spikes—as "phallic," but also as anti-predation devices (see, below); they work within human physiology as something to fetishize at various erogenous points that explore "forbidden" sites (and means) of pleasure; i.e., the pierced female nipple or clitoris as a visually intense and physically playful means of pleasurable pain that isn't automatically linked to biological reproduction, while supplying the viewer, player and owner with liminal cosmetics of death and exquisite "torture": the woman-in-black's heart-adorned fetish gear commonly made from leather and lace (the classic damsel/demon or virgin/whore binary).

(artist: Honey Lavender)

¹⁶ The term "happy Gothic" has been lifted straight from Catherine Spooner's Post-Millennial Gothic: Comedy, Romance and the Rise of Happy Gothic (2017).

Yet, despite their validity as provably cathartic within the Gothic mode, abject sexuality and strict BDSM still aren't "my bag" in terms of what I like to study or explore; that is, despite having performed sadistic exercises on an ex-partner by request, said person also traumatized me, making future requests of performing "strict" pain on new partners a potentially unpleasant task. Not my thing. Sex and full-on gore? I'll pass. But sleep sex (exhibit 11b2), societal collapse/Gothic castles (e.g., the danger disco, exhibit 15b1), Numinous consent-non-consent (exhibit 39a2), voyeurism (watching consenting couples fuck [exhibit 101c2] or having others consent to watch me fuck) and graveyard sentiment (exhibit 37b)? Hell yeah, sign me up (I hesitate to quote Coleridge because he's a racist prude, but he was absolutely on the money with this snippet from "General Character of the Gothic Literature and Art" [1818]: "...the Gothic art is sublime. On entering a cathedral, I am filled with devotion and with awe; I am lost to the actualities that surround me, and my whole being expands into the infinite; earth and air, nature and art, all swell up into eternity, and the only sensible impression left, is, 'that I am nothing!'")!

Porn under Capitalism is always a liminal proposition, one where canon conflates gore, rape, and general harm with supposed acts of love (e.g., Squid Game's gratuitous 2021 violence illustrating a generalized violation of human rights through misdirection and pornographic force presented as a "cute" game). As the title might suggest, then, Sex Positivity is largely about sex positivity as something ¹⁷ These kinks are classified as "hard" for a reason: They're potentially dangerous and require not just experience but expertise, meaning if you don't know what you're doing when performing them, you could easily harm or even kill someone. For example, choking is fine when a professional sadist is working with someone they trust, while both parties know the ropes and have safe words (the traffic light system is a safe bet). But experience is the teacher of fools and informed consent requires just that—for people to be informed correctly. The problem is, many people learn from entertainment, especially regarding BDSM as canonically harmful. So while Gothic media can potentially yield critical power within discourse about systemic abuse, it won't actually teach you proper choke technique in terms of giving or receiving erotic asphyxiation (any more than watching James Bond will show you correct espionage). Never try it by yourself and always have someone who won't harm you by accident (or on purpose). Just ask David Carradine or Richard Belzer!

¹⁸ E.g., frisson, aka "the skin orgasm" (often felt during so-called Numinous, or "religious" experiences).

to replace canonical forms of abuse with; i.e., liminal expressions of sex and trauma that lean towards, and help lead survivors away from, the status quo using cathartic monster poetics and sex-positive "demon BDSM," not Radcliffe's demon lover (more on them, in the thesis statement and Volume Two)!

Whether sex-positive or not, monsters are liminal, but their iconoclastic reclamation coincides with ironic rape fantasies and complicated symbols of recovery (fetishes) that reverse-abject state-sanctioned, social-sexual violence through transformative, even pornographic Gothic embellishment. Abject sexuality and exploitation exist squarely outside my invigilator and creator comfort zones, hence won't be featured in this book. That being said, I will have plenty of monsters that approach these subjects comfortably for me; i.e., to a healing degree, not a "geek show" insofar as the exhibiting and voyeurism of peril are concerned. To that, camp and schlock allow for "rape" to exist in quotes using fetish aesthetics—often with a fair amount of Gothic nostalgia and expertise. Weird nerds tend to know their stuff, and can push into abject spaces in ways that still account for the boundaries of others:

(exhibit -1a: Artist: Mercedes the Muse. They aren't just a stone-cold fox; they're an incredibly passionate and knowledgeable filmmaker and performer when it comes to schlock and camp! Both genres are equally worthy of study and consideration as things to recreate and learn from.)

Of course, I am discussing the Gothic mode in a sex-positive light; there are some liminal/grey-area exceptions I'll need to make, exhibit-wise. For example, I repeatedly discuss Mercedes's awesomely schlocky creations (and other campy monster artists reclaiming heteronormative stigmas), featuring her "tromette" performances in our book's first exhibit, as well as exhibits 67 and 78, among

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

others; despite having some gross-out qualities, her content is something I'm comfortable recreating in my own work/exhibiting in this book with her permission (she's also incredibly sex-positive, which makes working with her a snap).

So while this book displays and analyzes "vanilla" porn (exhibits 32a or 32b), it tries quite hard to examine dozens of cases of sex-positive monster porn (too many to easily list, but Mercede's previous exhibit counts, as does exhibit 1a1a1h3a2). I also exhibit several contentious subjects: one, several drawings of naked, pre-pubescent children/teenagers from Robie Harris and Michael Emberley's 1994 sex-education book for children ten-and-up, It's Perfectly Normal (exhibits 55 and 90a); two, the problematic moe art style (meaning either a child-like appearance, or sexualized children/teenagers in non-erotic media) featured in neoliberal, American-aligned media like Dragon Ball and Street Fighter 6 (1986 and 2023, exhibit 104b) but also canonical porn (exhibit 104c)—albeit as something to be wary of; three, ahegao or "rape face," which is also examined in the same section, in exhibit 104d towards the end of the book; and four, one example of straight-up murder and torture performed by the Male Gaze of an evil superman called Homelander (exhibit 1a1a1h3a1a1) and several examples where unironic rape scenes are discussed, but not shown. Excluding the Homelander collage, unironic rape and violence aren't openly displayed in this book's imagery (and even then, it's featured to make a point about Man Box culture).

This book series contains hundreds of collages, some of which include liminal, complicated examples of sexualized media that ultimately have something to salvage or transmute away from canonical, sex-coercive forms mid-resistance; e.g., ironic psychosexuality (exhibit 0a1b2b) and catharsis (exhibit 0a1b2a1). For our book's second exhibit (exhibit -1b), here's an example to give you an idea of what you should largely not expect moving forward:

- abject, gross-out gore—either as an exploitative dissection of the human form, or as eroticized, psychosexual variants (e.g., Phedon Papamichael's excellent, but hard-to-watch exploitation film, Inside [2008]—a movie about a Gothic impostor forcing her husband's killer to have a C-section during an utterly gross scene which makes Alien's "birth scene" look positively ordinary by comparison).
- any bathroom hijinks and overt, aggressive rape scenarios involving animals, disabled people, dead bodies, or "non-consenting" persons (excepting moe and ahegao and some appreciative rape scenarios; i.e., consent-non-consent).

(exhibit -1b: Various scenes of gore from classic horror movies, as well as abject merchandise and gory props, aka memento mori: "remember that you [have to] die." Most are shots of the 2018 Halloween from "[The Horrors of Halloween"] or screencaps from Alien, 1979, middle strip; however, the far-mid-left shot of Reagan from The Exorcist, 1973, is from EllimacsSFX. Such Gothic craftsmanship tends to form a tradition of recreating death and disgusting things, but also female vulnerability through the Male Gaze—with the bathroom not simply being a place of abject activities like taking a shit, but also a place of profound vulnerability where one's pants/panties are literally down: easy pickings/the sitting duck. These grotesque exhibits have been canonized by male Pygmalions like Stanley Kubrick and Alfred Hitchcock, who both made their lengthy careers by needlessly terrifying/torturing women—so much so that after 180+ takes on The Shining [1981] Shelley Duval became a decades-long recluse, only returning to break the silence in the 2020s¹⁹ the same "tortured saint" effect happened to Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio [being tortured on the set of The Abyss²⁰, 1989; but also

¹⁹ Cody Hamman's "The Forest Hills Star, Shelley Duvall, Sits Down for an Interview with Grimm Life Collective" (2023).

²⁰ Brandi Yetzer's "Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio Never Worked With James Cameron Again After Filming a Torturous Scene" (2022).

Maria Falconetti [being forced to kneel for hours on stone during *The Passion of Joan of Arc*²¹, 1928; and taken to awful diegetic extremes with the aforementioned Martyrs\]. These Pygmalions also tended to take the mastery of suspense away from earlier female examples—e.g., suspense girl-wizard, Ann Radcliffe, who admittedly had her own problems—but also any notion of informed consent regarding their own workers' basic human rights.\)](#)

There are plenty of specialized terms in here that I will explain more during the essential keywords paratext, and many more still during the thesis volume (all are defined in the full keyword glossary per volume) but for a quick, handy idea about Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism, refer to the next two sections: "The Six Gothic-Marxist Tenets and Four Main Gothic Theories" and "About the Logo."

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

²¹ Chadwick Jenkins' "Suffering the Inscrutable: The Ethics of the Face in Dreyer's The Passion of Joan of Arc" (2018).

A Note on Canonical Essentialism

...latitude, like genetics and ecology, is not destiny. We echo earlier concerns about the perils of single factor explanations and suggest that chance, and perhaps factors that promoted colonial empires, need to be more seriously considered as potentially important drivers of human inequality (source).

—Angela M. Chira, et al, "Geography Is Not Destiny: A quantitative Test of Diamond's Axis of Orientation Hypothesis" (2024)

Watching Rebecca Watson first discuss the widespread critical backlash received by Jared Diamond's Guns, Germs and Steel (1997) after its debut, then offer up various counter studies since the book's publication ("Study: Guns, Germs, and Steel was Wrong," 2024), I thought of my writings on Capitalism and canon; i.e., as things to oppose through iconoclastic art when developing Gothic Communism, mid-opposition. For the next four pages, I want to quickly mention and reflect on the essentializing nature of canon within Capitalist Realism—both why the latter requires the former to succeed, but also how it manifests in ways we should routinely keep in mind.

(artist: Alexey Lastochkin)

Per my thesis statement, Capitalism sexualizes everything in a heteronormative (vertically arranged, sexually dimorphic) scheme; canon achieves heteronormativity by essentializing biology, ecology and geography (economics, etc) in equal measure in order to achieve and maintain a Cartesian outcome:

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

domination of the natural world (and workers) to serve profit. This happens through the routine gendering of Nature vs Society (vis-à-vis Raj Patel and Jason Moore) by Cartesian thinkers; i.e., in ways that men like Francis Bacon and René Descartes started, but continue to remain relevant under Capitalist Realism as a more recent affair that neither patriarch lived to see: a raping of nature as Promethean, meaning in this case "primed for abuse, ad nauseum." Nature is Medusa; Medusa must obey and die (over and over).

(artist: Shardanic)

In turn, said Realism yields neoliberal fantasies (often videogames) that present nature as good or evil in essential terms, and by extension, gendered ones that are biologically and ecologically divided along problematic moral categories whose territory is geared towards a settler-colonial outcome: the mapping and execution of conquest, thus genocide through us versus them, reliably framing "us" as human and "them" as inhuman through various black-and-white binaries that serve capital, thus empire (or humanizing inhuman groups—e.g., white cis-het women [above]—to recruit them harmfully into a centrist story that prolongs settler-colonial conflict; i.e., for profit's sake, instead of permanently ceasing hostilities by actually addressing the socio-material conditions that historically lead to them: pro-state workers triangulating through the equality of convenience ["boundaries for me, not for thee"] to unironically punch down in defense of the state against intersectional solidarity and workers, animals and the environment at large).

It bears repeating that said execution of conquest involves a map of a location, the latter filled with enemies (e.g., orcs) who must be cleared by human agents or token enforcers, doing so step-by-step, person-by-person, room-by-room to effectively "sweep" the entire area of perceived hostilities. Doing so is meant to achieve one cycle of capital in miniature; i.e., moving money through nature to achieve profit as expressed concentrically on all registers. Likewise, the basic categories of land, sexual biology and ecology manifest in a variety of refrains canonizing Cartesian dualism (and its harmful divisions) through Capitalist Realism. My book pointedly highlights two: Tolkien's and Cameron's; re (from "Scouting the Field"):

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

(the map exhibit [1a1a1h2a1] from Volume Zero: "...Videogames are war simulators; in them, maps are built not merely to be charted and explored, but conquered through war simulations. The land is an endless site of conquest, war, rape and profit carefully dressed up as "treasure," "liberation" and "adventure," but in truth, brutalizing nature during endless wars of extermination borrowed from the historical and imaginary past as presently intertwined:

- top-left: Tolkien's refrain, "Thror's Map" from The Hobbit, 1937
—source: Weta Workshop
- top-right: Thomas Happ's map of Sudra from Axiom Verge, 2015
—source: magicofgames
- bottom-left: Team Cherry's map of Hallownest, from Hollow Knight 2017
—source: tupkam1
- bottom-right: Bungie's map of the West from Myth: the Fallen Lords, 1997
—source: Ben's Nerderly

[...] Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth-like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion...)

Tolkien's refrain gentrifies war in a fantasy-themed cartography (the map of conquest in novels, movies and games, video or otherwise), which neatly and consistently divide land and occupant between good and bad, human and orc (or spider, demon, ghost, etc). Cameron's refrain, the shooter and the Metroidvania, was first inspired by Robert Heinlein before likewise being injected into popular media as conducting *military optimism*²² abroad: insectoid places to go and bomb/shoot into oblivion. Doing so happens while simultaneously popularizing it back home through military urbanism and urban warfare inside the Gothic castle (versus the land around the castle, as Tolkien tends to do; i.e., the open battlefield). There is always an enemy of nature to kill and destroy in ways that fetishize the larger alienating process, turning "empowerment" into a Promethean Quest through a Faustian bargain. It becomes Romanticized, nostalgic, endlessly remediated (a Cycle of Kings, ruins, graveyards). By extension, war is dimorphically sexualized as us-versus-them, the hunt (and its associate tensions, reliefs and anxieties) celebrated with a lucrative fakery to maintain the lie of Western sovereignty through the ghost of the counterfeit's usual process of abjection. The West, including its fantasies, remain haunted during the liminal hauntology of war as a routine appearance within a structure; e.g., Dracula's castle.

On this generic spectrum and its assorted cartographic architecture, one thing remains constant between the two refrains (and their imitators and offshoots): nature is monstrous-feminine, queer, non-white and non-Christian, etc. This includes its land and various human and non-human occupants being deliberately prepared for endless invasions and harvests by Capitalism's architects and usual benefactors: white cis-het men (and token agents) of various monomythic positions. There is a good land and a bad, a good people and a bad, a good nature and a bad, and the centrist nature of the larger structure sanctions and essentializes canonical violence by the good against the bad; i.e., reliably justifying the former invading and brutalizing the latter to move money through nature by cheapening nature. Nature becomes Hell by design, amounting to a documentation process required by Capitalism to function in essential perpetuity.

²² From Persephone van der Waard's "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," (2021):

Just as Alien evolved into Aliens, the Metroid franchise has become increasingly triumphant over time. Abjuring the Promethean myth, it instead offers military optimism—the idea that seemingly unstoppable enemies can be defeated with patience and, more importantly, military resources; the more victories, the more resources there are to use (even if these are little more than looted plunder in the grand scheme).

Samus repeatedly embarks on the Promethean Quest. Over time, this quest has become less cautionary and more professional. The Promethean past isn't something to fear or avoid; it's something to shoot. This attitude removes the quest's cautionary elements, especially where the military is concerned. This creates a franchise much more fixated on Samus as a neutral figure with military ties. Rather than fight them, she does their bidding and is celebrated for it (source).

In short, nature becomes canon, a mandate for how to think, thus behave regarding the usual benefactors and victims within a settler colony and the state of exception found in or between its surrounding areas of influence. There must always be a good and bad land, but also good and bad occupants according to biology as essential (and connected to gender) in terms of a heteronormative ordering of workers within nature as something to control, thus dominate; i.e., there are white cis-het men and anything else is alien to varying degrees; e.g., white women are alien, but not as alien as trans people provided they behave within the structure. "Rocking the boat" through intersectional solidarity against capital invites collective (and selective) punishment through reactive abuse to keep these dichotomies not only installed, but constantly enforced through physical, mental and/or socio-ideological forms of menticidal violence; i.e., dogma insofar as canonical essentialism aids and abets in Capitalist Realism concealing capital functioning as it always does. As something to criminalize and dominate, nature is always alien, fetishized, incorrect, criminal, outside, black, etc...

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

The proof is in the pudding. Or rather, it appears in the "pudding" of people as expressed through commodities that—when reclaimed by active, emotionally/Gothically intelligent and conscious workers synthesizing praxis—assist in said workers' chaotic liberation (camp) as part of the natural-material world enslaved and exploited by Capitalism through routine, orderly conquest and genocide (canon); i.e., by dissolving the very boundaries, thus binaries, that trap and exploit us in home as foreign: a settler-colonial project for which we are not strictly welcome and for which internal and external tensions hyphenate clean divisions like inside/outside or correct/incorrect into something far more liminal, messy and grey. "There is no outside of the text," insofar as people and their interactions with each other (and the various cultural markers of coded behaviors that lead to or resist genocide) become something to acknowledge ipso facto. We see the aesthetic of torture, for instance, in calculated risk as a proletarian function; i.e., a Gothic fetish that aims to express power through its theatrical absence/disparity as an informed means of negotiating state trauma. In viewing it, we must learn to recognize the human, thus autonomous, person involved in defense of nature, of workers, of our land, sexualities, bodies, genders, etc, as constantly under attack by capital.

My friend, Harmony Corrupted, is but one example. Consider how this book is full of similar people, places and things. Seek them out, but also recognize the ones I do not have time to list. Then achieve class and culture war yourselves; i.e., as a cathartic sexual undertaking with non-heteronormative (thus non-Cartesian) results. We're in this together, comrades!

The Six Gothic-Marxist Tenets and Four Main Gothic Theories

(artists: Lady Nyxx and Persephone van der Waard)

Gothic Communism has six Gothic-Marxist tenets (the Six Rs) and four main Gothic theories (the Four Gs). They operate in conjunction, and their collective idea is (to borrow from/rephrase our abstract) to make Marxism a little cooler, sexier and fun than Marx ever could through the Wisdom of the Ancients (a cultural understanding of the imaginary past) as a "living document"; i.e., to make it "succulent" by "living deliciously" as an act of repeated reflection that challenges heteronormativity's dimorphic biological essentialism and bondage of gender to sex, thus leading to a class awakening at a countercultural level through iconoclastic (sex-positive), monomorphic Gothic poetics.

I've written the Gothic-Marxist tenets to keep in mind, not cite each and every time. In short, they provide general teaching objectives that sit between theory and application, and their interpretation and scope is meant to be fairly broad and conversational regardless of your exact approach. They are as follows:

- Re-claim/-cultivate. Seize Gothic art as the means of emotional (monstrous) production, tied to cultural symbols of stigma, trauma and fear that abject workers or otherwise emotionally manipulate them to surrender the means of production—their labor, their intelligence and control—unto canonical productions that normally make workers ignorant towards the means of reclaiming these things: the ability to produce, appreciate and cultivate a pro-labor, post-scarcity Gothic imagination, including theatrical implements of torture; i.e., shackles, collars, whips and chains, but also undead, demonic and/or animalized egregores in service of Gothic Communism. As part of their complex, warring praxis, minds, monsters, history and sexualities, workers must hone their own reclaimed voices—a dark poetics, pedagogy of the oppressed, splendid lies, etc—to challenge the status quo (and its war and rape cultures) by attaining structural catharsis during oppositional praxis, thus limit the systemic, generational harm committed by capitalist structures (abuse prevention/risk reduction behaviors).
- Re-unite/-discover/-turn. Reunite people with their alienated, alienizing bodies, language, labor, sexualities, genders, trauma, pasts and emotions in sex-positive, re-humanizing (xenophilic) ways; an active attempt to detect and marry oneself to what was lost at the emotional, Gothic, linguistic and materially intelligent level: a return of the living dead and the creation/summoning of demons and their respective trauma and forbidden knowledge. This poetic coalition should operate as a sex-positive force that speaks out against Cartesian division, unironic xenophobia and state abuse, while advancing workers towards the development of Gothic-Communism.
- Re-empower/-negotiate. Grant workers control over their own sexual labor through their emotions and, by extension things (most often language, symbols or art) that stem from, and relate to, their sexual labor as historically abjected and privatizing under Capitalism; to allow them to renegotiate their boundaries in regards to their trauma through their sexual labor as their own, including their bodies and emotions as a potent form of power interrogation, re-negotiation and re-exchange amid chaotic and unequal circumstances (worker-positive BDSM and Satanic rebellion, in other words) that fight for conditional love and informed, set boundaries during social-sexual exchanges that heal from complex, generational trauma: the "good play" of conditional offers and mutually agreed-upon deals—not unconditional, coercive love compelled by pro-state abusers; i.e., "bad play" and "prison sex" within rape culture. This doesn't just apply to deals with institutions (e.g., [where I had to make conditional/unconditional offers set by a \[money-making\] university](#)—linked arm-in-arm with financial [money-lending] institutions exiting as a part of the same student-exploiting business); it applies to our own lives as sexualized workers, synthesizing our principles with those we work/set boundaries with in relation to our labor, bodies, emotional bonds, etc. Setting individual and collective boundaries is important towards protecting yourself and others during activist behaviors, which automatically pose some degree of risk under capital; don't be afraid to impose your own limits to minimize risk of abuse, even if that means "losing" someone in the process. If they're holding that over your head, they weren't really your friend to begin with.

- Re-open/-educate. To expose the privatization of emotions and denial of sex-positive sex/gender education to individual workers, helping them reopen their minds and their eyes, thus see, understand and feel how private property makes people emotionally and Gothically stupid; Marx's adage, "Private property has made us so stupid and one-sided that an object is only ours when we have it—when it exists for us as capital, or when it is directly possessed, eaten, drunk, worn, inhabited, etc—in short, when it is used by us." This applies to de facto education as a means of facing systemic trauma and dismantling it through Gothic paradox and play teaching workers to be better on a grand intuitive scale.
- Re-play. Establish a new kind of game attitude and playfulness during development towards Communism, one that dismantles the bourgeoisie's intended play of manufactured scarcity, consent, and conflict in favor of a post-scarcity world filled with "game" workers who can learn and respond creatively to the natural and person-made problems of language and the material world with unique solutions: emergent play, or player-developed approaches in games (e.g., including Communist videogames like Dwarf Fortress, 2006) but also game-like environments (our focus is Gothic poetics and BDSM theatrics); i.e., to be willing to try negotiating for themselves through playful forms during social-sexual scenarios of all kinds; to reclaim, rediscover, and relearn, but also teach lost things using iconoclastic monsters that critique the status quo in controlled/chaotic settings; to enjoy but not blindly enjoy, thus endorse cheap canonical "junk food" by re-inspecting them with a readiness to critique and reinvent. As Anita Sarkeesian explains, "It's both possible, and even necessary, to simultaneously enjoy media while also being critical of its more problematic or pernicious aspects" (source: Facebook²³). The idea in doing so is to understand, mid-enjoyment and critique, that development is not a zero-sum game, but as Jesper Juul puts it in his eponymous book, is "a half-real zone between the fiction and the rules" that allows for emergent, at times transgressive forms of good play (me) as a transformative device (source). To borrow and mutate three more ludic terms, then, the "ludic contract" is whatever the player negotiates for themselves inside the natural-material world, acting like a "spoilsport" by redefining the terms of the contact within and outside of itself²⁴; i.e., as a half-real, "magic-circle" space where, as Eric Zimmerman explains, the game takes place in ways that aren't wholly separate from real life²⁵—except for us, games occur along Gothic, liminal routes, wherein workers playfully articulate their natural rights in linguo-material ways between reality and fabrication that go beyond games as commodities but are nevertheless informed by them as something to rewrite; i.e., through play as a general exercise that involves a great many things: a reached agreement of power and play in Gothic terms, whose luck/odds are defined not through canon, but iconoclastic poiesis that can be expanded far beyond the restrictive, colonial binary and heteronormative ruleset of the elite's intended exploitation of workers to challenge the profit motive and all of its harmful effects in the bargain; e.g., genocide, heteronormativity and Max Box culture. The sum of these concepts in praxis could be called "ludo-Gothic BDSM"²⁶.

²³ Original source: The Guardian, 2015—which has since been removed (undoubtedly to appease "Gamergate" misogynists because The Guardian are moderates at heart; i.e., they don't take hard stances against capital, thus can't push back against fascists).

²⁴ (from the glossary): The ludic contract is an agreement between the player and the game to be played; or as Chris Pratt writes in "In Praise of Spoil Sports" (2010): "the more traditional definition of the ludic contract [is] an agreement on the part of players that they will forgo some of their agency in order to experience an activity that they enjoy." Yet, inventive players like speedrunners (which Pratt calls "spoilsports") converge upon intended gameplay with unintended, emergent forms. In other words, the ludic contract is less a formal, rigid contract and more a negotiated compromise occurring between the two; i.e., where players have some sense of agency in deciding how they want to play the game even while adhering to its rules and, in effect, being mastered by it (see: Seth Giddings and Helen Kennedy's "Little Jesuses and *@#?-off Robots," 2008, exhibit 0a2c).

²⁵ (abridged, from the glossary): The magic circle is the space where a game takes place, be that a social game, a sport, a dialog or gender performance onstage, and videogames, etc. The founder of the idea, Eric Zimmerman, writes in "Jerked Around by the Magic Circle" (2012):

The "magic circle" is not a particularly prominent phrase in Homo Ludens, and although Huizinga certainly advocates the idea that games can be understood as separate from everyday life, he never takes the full-blown magic circle point of view that games are ultimately separate from everything else in life or that rules are the sole fundamental unit of games. In fact, Huizinga's thesis is much more ambivalent on these issues and he actually closes his seminal book with a passionate argument against a strict separation between life and games... (source).

²⁶ (from the glossary, abridged): My combining of an older academic term, "ludo-Gothic" (Gothic videogames), with sex-positive BDSM theatrics as a potent means of camp. The emphasis is less Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

- Re-produce/-lease. To disseminate these tenets through worker-made sex-positive lessons that we leave behind; i.e., egregores, "archaeologies" and other Gothic-Communist "derelicts." As the oppressed, our pedagogy should be centered around the continued production of communal emotional intelligence as a Gothically instructional means of transforming the material world and, by extension, the socio-natural world for the better—by healing from generational trauma by interrogating its structural causes together.

I call these tenets the Six Rs because they constitute six things to reclaim from Capitalism through the Gothic imagination; i.e., vis-à-vis our own bodies and labor as things to weaponize against capital during praxial synthesis: through our creative successes, whatever they may be.

(artist: Crow)

Underpinning our six tenets are four central Gothic theories, the Four Gs:

about "how can videogames be Gothic" and more how the playfulness in videogames is commonly used to allow players to camp canon in and out of videogames as a form of fairly negotiated power exchange established in playful, game-like forms (which we'll unpack during the "camp map" in our thesis volume).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

- abjection (from Julia Kristeva's process of abjection, vis-à-vis Jerrold Hogle's "ghost of the counterfeit")

Coined by Julia Kristeva in her 1981 book, The Powers of Horror, abjection means "to throw off." Abjection is "us versus them," dividing the self into a linguistically and emotionally normal state with an "othered" half. This "other" is generally reserved for abjected material—criminal, taboo or alien concepts: good and evil, heaven and hell, civilization and nature, men and women, etc. Through Cartesian dualism—the rising of a dividing system of thought by René Descartes that led to settler colonialism—nation-states and corporations create states of normality (the status quo) by forcefully throwing off everything that isn't normal, isn't rational, masculine or even human, etc. Through the status quo, normal examples are defined by their alien, inhuman opposites, the latter held at a distance but frequently announced and attacked (a form of punching down); the iconoclast, often in Gothic fiction, will force a confrontation, exposing the viewer (often vicariously) to experience the same process in reverse (a form of punching up). Facing the abjected material reliably leads to a state of horror, its reversal exposing the normal as false, rotten and demonic, and the so-called "demons" or dangerous undead as victimized and human: "Who's the savage?" asks Rob Halford. "Modern man!" Descartes was certainly a massive dick, but the spawning of endless Pygmalion-generated undead and demons scarcely started and ended with him. Instead, it expanded through the ghost of the counterfeit as wedded to the process of abjection in Gothic canon; or as Dave West summarizes in "Implementation of Gothic Themes in The Gothic Ghost of the Counterfeit" (2023):

In [the 2012 essay] "The Gothic Ghost of the Counterfeit and the Process of Abjection," Jerrold E. Hogle argues that the eighteenth-century Gothic emergence from fake imitation of fake work is the foundation of what is defined as modern Gothic today. He maintains that Horace Walpole's 1765²⁷ The Castle of Otranto, which is considered as the groundwork of the modern Gothic story, is built on a false proclamation that the novel was an Italian manuscript written by a priest. [...] Hogle argues that modern Gothic is grounded in fakery.

²⁷ Walpole actually published the original manuscript in 1764 under a pseudonym without the qualifier "a Gothic tale" (which he added a year later after people pitched a fit that he—the son of the first British prime minister—had effectively forged a historical document and passed it off as genuine). The story was based off his architectural reconstruction (thus reimagining) of medieval history, Strawberry Hill House (a cross-medium tradition carried on by Gothic contemporaries/spiritual successors—e.g., William Beckford's Vathek, 1786, and subsequent "folly," Fonthill Abbey, in 1796—but also videogame spaces inspired by the cinematic and novelized forms previously build on real-life "haunted" houses: the Metroidvania).

[In turn,] Hogle's observation of the history of The Castle of Otranto forms the basis for understanding the concept of counterfeit as a result of the abjection process.

Gothic Communism, then, reverses xenophobic abjection through xenophilic subversion as a liminal form of countercultural expression (camp). Sex work and pornography (and indeed any controlled substance—sex, drugs, rock n' roll, but also subversive oral traditional and slave narratives) operate through liminal transgression; e.g., subversive monster-fucking Amazons (exhibit 104a), werewolves (exhibit 87a) and Little Red Riding Hood (exhibit 52b) or Yeti (exhibit 48d2), etc. Reversing the process of abjection, these monstrous-feminine beings allow their performers to not only address personal traumas "onstage," but engender systemic change in socio-material conditions; i.e., by performing their repressed inequalities during arguably surreal, but highly imaginary interpersonal exchanges that are actually fun to participate in: as a process of de facto education in opposition to state fakeries (thus refusing to engender genocide within the common ground of a shared—indeed, heavily fought-over—aesthetic).

(artist: John Fox)

- chronotope/parallel Gothic space (from Mikhail Bakhtin's "Gothic chronotope")

Mikhail Bakhtin's "time-space," outlined posthumously in The Dialogic Imagination (1981), is an architectural evocation of space and time as something whose liminal motion through describes a particular quality of history described by Bakhtin as "castle-narrative":

Toward the end of the seventeenth century in England, a new territory for novelistic events is constituted and reinforced in the so-called "Gothic" or "black" novel—the castle (first used in this meaning by Horace Walpole in The Castle of Otranto, and later in Radcliffe, Monk Lewis and others). The castle is saturated through and through with a time that is historical in the narrow sense of the word, that is, the time of the historical past [...] the traces of centuries and generations are arranged in it in visible form as various parts of its architecture [...] and in particular human relationships involving dynastic primacy and the transfer of hereditary rights. [...] legends and traditions animate every corner of the castle and its environs through their constant reminders of past events. It is this quality that gives rise to the specific kind of narrative inherent in castles and that is then worked out in Gothic novels.

For our purposes, Gothic variants and their castle-narratives have a medieval/pre-Enlightenment character that describes the historical past in a museum-like way that is fearfully reimagined: as something to recursively move through, thus try to record in some shape or form; e.g., the Neo-Gothic castle (Otranto, 1764) to the retro-future haunted house (the Nostromo from Alien, 1979) to the Metroidvania (1986, onwards; my area of expertise). Canonical examples include various "forbidden zones," full of rapacious, operatic monsters; i.e., canonical/capitalistic parallel space. Expanding on Frederic Jameson, the iconoclastic Gothic chronotope is an "archaeology of the future" that can expose how we think about the past in the present to reshape the future towards a Utopian (Communist) outcome. Although we'll expound on this idea repeatedly throughout the book, a common method beyond monsters are hauntological locations housing things the state would normally abject: the crimes of empire buried in the rubble, but also contained inside its castle-narrative as an equally hyperreal, "narrative-of-the-crypt" (from Hogle: "The Restless Labyrinth: Cryptonomy in the Gothic Novel," 1980) mise-en-abyme. Iconoclastic parallel spaces and their parallel society of counterterror agents, then, align against state-corporate interests and their "geometries of terror" (exhibit 64c) which, in turn, artists can illustrate in their own iconoclastic hauntologies (exhibit 64b) and castle-narratives; i.e., ironic appreciative movement through the Gothic space and its palliative-Numinous sensations.

- hauntology (from Jacques Derrida's "spectres of Marx" and Mark Fisher's "canceled futures," vis-à-vis Jodey Castricano's cryptomimesis):

A basic linguistic state between the past and the present—described by Jacques Derrida in Spectres of Marx \(1993\) as being Marxism itself. Smothered by Capitalism, Marxism is an older idea from Capitalism's past that haunts Capitalism—doing so through "ghosts" in Capitalism's language that haunt future generations under the present order of material existence. In Cryptomimesis: The Gothic and Jacques Derrida's Ghost Writing, Jodey Castricano writes how Marx, though not a Gothicism, was obsessed with the language of spectres and ghosts—less as concrete symbols sold for profit in the modern sense and more as a consequence of coerced human language expressing a return of the past and of the dead as a repressed force; she also calls this process cryptomimesis, or "writing with ghosts," as a tradition carried on by Derrida and his own desire to express haunting as a feeling experienced inside Capitalism and its language. The concept would be articulated further by Mark Fisher as Capitalist Realism \(2009\); i.e., a myopia, or total inability to imagine the future beyond past versions of the future that have become decayed, dead, and forsaken: "canceled futures" (which Stuart Mills discusses how to escape in his 2019 writeup on Fisher's hauntology of culture, Capitalism, and acid Communism, "What is Acid Communism?"). While all workers are haunted by the dead, as Marx states, this especially applies to its proponents—cops and other class traitors, scapegoats, etc—as overwhelmed by a return of the dead (and their past) through Gothic language/affect in the socio-material sphere. For those less disturbed by the notion, however, this can be something to welcome and learn from—to write with; i.e., in the presence of the dead coming home as a welcome force in whatever forms they take: not just ghosts, but also vampires, zombies, or composites, the latter extending to demons and anthromorphs as summoned or made; but also all of these categories being modular insofar as they allow for a hybridized expression of trauma through undead-demonic-animalistic compounds. As Castricano writes of cryptomimesis

Although some critics continue to disavow the Gothic as being subliterate and appealing only to the puerile imagination—Fredric Jameson refers to the Gothic as "that boring and exhausted paradigm" [what a dork]—others, such as Anne Williams, claim that the genre not only remains very much alive but is especially vital in its evocation of the "undead," an ontologically ambiguous figure which has been the focus of so much critical attention that another critic, Slavoj Žižek, felt compelled to call the return of the living dead "the fundamental fantasy of contemporary mass culture" (source).

in regards to ghosts, I would argue the same notion applies to all undead, demons and animalistic egregores; i.e., writing with both as complicated theatrical expressions of the human condition under Capitalism.

(artist: Zdzisław Beksiński)

- cryptonymy (from Nicolas Abraham and Maria Torok, vis-à-vis Jerrold Hogle's "narrative of the crypt" and Jodey Castricano's cryptomimesis)

In Cynthia Sugars' entry on "Cryptonymy" for David Punter's The Encyclopedia of the Gothic (2012), Sugars writes, "Cryptonymy, as it is used in psychoanalytic theory and adapted to Gothic studies, refers to a term coined by Nicolas Abraham and Maria Torok [which] receives extended consideration in their book The Wolf Man's Magic Word: A Cryptonymy (1986)." Sugars goes on to summarize

Abraham and Torok's usage, which highlights a tendency for language to hide a traumatic or unspeakable word with seemingly unrelated words, which compound under coercive, unnatural conditions (the inherent deceit of the nation-state and its monopolies). For Sugars and for us, Gothic studies highlight these conditions as survived by a narrative of the crypt, its outward entropy—the symptoms and wreckage—intimating a deeper etiological trauma sublimated into socially more acceptable forms (usually monsters, lairs/parallel space, phobias, etc; you can invade, kill and "cure" those. In my 2021 writeup, "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," I call this false optimism the "puncher's chance" afforded to pro-Capitalist soldiers and de facto killers for the state; the odds suck and are either disguised or romanticized through heroic stories/monomyths). Described by Jerrold Hogle in "The Restless Labyrinth" as the only thing that survives, the narrative of the crypt is a narrative of a narrative of a narrative to a hidden curse/doom announced by things displaced from the former cause: Gothic cryptonyms; illusions, deceptions, mirages, etc. Sugars determines, the closer one gets to the problem, the more the space itself abruptly announces a vanishing point, a procession of fragmented illusions tied to a transgenerational curse: "a place of concealment that stands on mere ashes of something not fully present," Hogle writes of Otranto (the first "gothic" castle, reassembled for Horace Walpole's 1764 "archaeology"). In regards to the mimetic quality of the crypt, this general process of cryptomimesis draws attention to a writing predicated upon encryption: the play of revelation and concealment lodged within parts of individual words tied to Gothic theatrical conventions and linguistic functions, but also patently ludic narratives that can change one's luck within a pre-conceived and enforced set of rules; i.e., rewriting our odds of survival, thus fate, inside exploitative ludic schemes by pointedly redictating the material conditions (through ludo-Gothic BDSM) that represent "luck" as a variable the elite strive to manipulate for profit under Capitalism.

Unlike the Gothic mode—which tells of legendary things (undead, demonic and/or animalized monsters or places) with, as or within Gothic media as things to perform, create, or imagine/reimagine, wear, inhabit, occupy or pass through (we'll explore all of these variants throughout the book)—Gothic theory explains the process behind all of this while it's going on, has gone on, will go on. Guided by these theories, the re-education of sex worker emotions achieves the Six Rs through instructed critical analysis of sexualized art, but also praxial synthesis of good social-sexual habits; be it their own, someone else's, or something to cultivate together, these collective sex-positive lessons are designed to teach emotional intelligence through a Gothic mode whose cultural imagination, when used in an iconoclastic sense, becomes a vulgar display of power in defiance of the state: it raises emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, cultural and racial awareness, thus Gothic maturity mid-struggle.

(artist: Crow)

The State: Its Key Tools; re: the Monopolies, Trifectas and Qualities of Capital

(artist: Angel Witch)

In service to the profit motive, the state requires the ability to defend itself through absolute means; i.e., us-versus-them dogma, cops-and-victims propaganda (re: copaganda), and terrorist/counterterrorist arrangements of privilege, authority and status/class flowing power towards the state. This basically happens by antagonizing nature as monstrous-feminine and putting it to work as cheaply as possible; i.e., to move money through nature, thus reify and maintain capital until the end of time. Often, this movement is guided by revenge in dualistic opposition; i.e., the whore has their revenge by thwarting profit through their bodies, artwork and labor anisotropically moving power, money and information away from the state and towards workers (by reversing terror/counterterror, thus abjection). The state, by comparison, accomplishes the movement known as "capital" using three basic things: the state trifectas, monopolies and qualities of capital policing nature as monstrous-feminine.

These ideas first introduce in Volumes Zero and One (and expand in Volume Two; e.g., "the whore's revenge" coming from the Demon Module), but are so ubiquitous that I feel you should have access to their basic definitions regardless of which book volume you're reading. I'll list, then define them:

- the monopolies: of violence, terror and morphological expression.
- the trifectas: manufacture, subterfuge/deception, coercion—with a neoliberal "handle": the profit motive; i.e., infinite growth, efficient profit (meaning value through exploitation, regardless if it is ethical or materially stable) and worker/owner division as disseminated through the three tines.
- the qualities of capital: heteronormative, Cartesian, and setter-colonial (refer to the glossary definitions for these terms)

If, at any point, I say "the monopolies, trifectas [and/or] qualities of capital" moving forwards, these are what I'm referring to; i.e., the control of worker bodies and the violence, terror and morphological poetics orbiting them.

Defining them, let's start with the monopolies:

- of violence; re: Weber's maxim, "a state holds a monopoly over the legitimate use of violence within its territory, meaning that violence perpetrated by other actors is illegitimate" (source).
- of terror; re: Asprey's paradox, from War in the Shadows: the Guerrilla in History (1994): "Not only can terror be employed as a weapon, but any weapon can become a weapon of terror: terror is a weapon, a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it" (source). Even so, the state will try to monopolize it. Anyone who uses violence against them is a "terrorist" and anyone who uses violence in service to state aims is either a "counterterrorist" or at least not a terrorist.
- of morphological expression; re: of my arguments regarding the state control of Gothic dialogs during the other two monopolies, animalizing workers in harmful predator/prey relationships (from Volume One):

the medieval character of state violence and terror cannot be destroyed during morphological expression, only subverted or contained through linguo-material "traps" we put into motion during revolutionary cryptonomy as an essential means of counterterrorist liberation; i.e., by throwing the setter-colonial character of heteronormativity into dispute through a rebellious medieval, postcolonial imaginary. Taking Hell back while doubling its colonial [forms; i.e., through] morphological²⁸ expression when using animalized Gothic aesthetics (with undead and demonic elements too, of course). To that, I want to quote a snippet from our thesis volume that will prove germane as we proceed:

As a kind of deathly theatre mask, something else that's equally important to consider about demons and the undead (and which we'll bring up throughout the entire book) is that animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms; i.e., stigma animals relayed through demonic BDSM and rituals of power expression and exchange that embody hunters and hunted, predators and prey that play out through the ongoing battles and wars of culture, of the mind, of sexuality and praxis as traumatized: marked for trauma or by trauma that parallel our green and purple doubles onscreen (source: Volume Zero's "Pieces of the Camp Map").

So when I say "animalized" vis-à-vis Gothic aesthetics, this is predominantly what I mean [...]

As something that predictably rises during material instability and societal unrest, emotional turmoil is very much at home in the Gothic. This includes anxieties about physical bodies and their hauntological uniforms as often having a sexualized, animalistic, psychological element that overlaps with half-exposed, unburied trauma acquired generationally under state domination. This domination occurs within regressive, medievalized positions of crisis and decay that defend and uphold the status quo, but can be reclaimed by proletarian agents within weird-nerd culture; e.g., workers embodying knights to reclaim their killing/raping implements inside the state of exception, while simultaneously dealing with state infiltrators fighting to recapture the same devices back for themselves and their masters; i.e., Amazons and furies, etc, as forms of contested morphological expression that can assist or hamper gyno/androdiversity within Gothic poetics under state monopolies. To that, heroes are monsters, and monsters go hand-in-hand with animals being for or against their own abuse to varying degrees.

²⁸ I'm specifically focusing on morphological expression, here, because state forces will try to control it in relation to other variables; i.e., in monopolized opposition to workers' manifestations of monstrous bodies during countercultural dialogs that stand up for their basic human rights (and that of animals and the environment). While we obviously want to separate human biology from sexual and gender expression (and allow sex to divide from gender during said expression), it nevertheless remains tied to them during morphological expression as part of overall worker struggles; i.e., to liberate themselves from capital in morphological language that challenges the heteronormative standards normally proliferated in canonical Gothic stories.

The resultant middle ground of this duality grants words like "demon," "zombie," or "animal" a double purpose for which the rest of the subchapter is divided: predator and prey. [...] Domestication invokes a sense of the wild that is reclaimed by state forces to serve the profit motive, which rebellious agents must challenge and reclaim while being animalized. The larger struggle involving animalization constitutes an uphill battle that obscures one's vision in the same crowded sphere. Inside it, space and time become a violent circle, one where endless war over state nostalgia constitutes ongoing dialectical-material struggles to keep with, or break from, current historical materialisms under Capitalist Realism: state violence dressed up as dated "protection/shelter" during our aforementioned emotional turmoil (stemming from criminogenic conditions; i.e., manufactured shortages, crisis and competition tied to images of the decaying fortress and its unholy armies) [source: "Operational Difficulties and Revolutionary Cryptonymy"].

Second, the trifectas (also from Volume One):

The first bourgeois trifecta is the manufacture trifecta:

- Manufactured scarcity. Not enough resources, space, sex, etc; cultivates a fake sense of supply/demand, but also fear of missing out (FOMO) through exploitative business maneuvers that, in turn, engender fragile, deregulated markets; e.g., games—micro transactions, live-service models, phone games; manufactured obsolescence (Hakim's "Planning Failure," 2023), hidden fees, privatization—i.e., pay more for less quality and/or quantity and so on.
- Manufactured consent. From Chomsky's book Manufacturing Consent (1988); cultivates a compliant consumer base, but also workforce confusion, obedience and ignorance. Chomsky's theory is that advertisers are beholden to their shareholders, aiming consumers towards a position of mass tolerance—tacitly accepting "negative freedom" as exclusively enjoyed by the elite exploiting them: "Boundaries for me, not for thee." In Marxist terms, this amounts to the privatization of the media (and its associate labor) as part of the means of production. They shape and maintain each other.
- Manufactured conflict/competition. Endless war and violence—e.g., the War on Drugs, the War on Terror, the Jewish Question, assorted moral panics, etc; cultivates apathy and cruelty through canonical wish fulfillment: "the satisfying of unconscious desires in dreams or fantasies" with a bourgeois flavor. To this, nation pastiche and other blind forms encourage us-versus-them worker division, class sabotage and false consciousness/mobile class dormancy ("somnambulism"), not collective labor action against the state by using counterterrorist media to rehumanize the state of exception.

Through the manufacture trifecta, neoliberals appropriate peril using economically "correct" forms, socializing blame and privatizing profit, accolades, and education as things to normalize the way that neoliberals decide; it's about control—specifically thought control—through the Base as something to leverage against workers through bourgeois propaganda: "War and rape are common, essential parts of our world; post-scarcity (and sex-positive monsters, BDSM, kink, etc) is a myth!" Fascists de-sublimate peril in incorrect forms, going "mask-off" yet still running interference for the state; i.e., in defense of the status quo until their true radical nature becomes normalized: the black knight.

Eternal crisis and cyclical decay are built into Capitalism and the nation-state model; the state is inherently unstable and leads to war and rape on a wide scale, but also politically correct/incorrect language selecting state victims for the usual sacrifices that profit demands: the grim harvest. These are dressed up through a particular kind of cryptonym: the euphemism. For the state, political language becomes synonymous with whitewashing or otherwise downplaying the usual operations of the state with inoffensive, sleep-inducing phrases; e.g., "extreme prejudice" and "military incidents" (false flag operations) as directed at the state's usual victims. The state, but also pro-state defenders and class traitors, reliably use these and other linguistic manipulation tactics (e.g., obscurantism) to routinely make war and profit from it; i.e., by raping or otherwise exploiting workers like chattel.

(artist: Seb McKinnon)

As a site of tremendous cryptonymy (trauma and linguistic concealment), the Gothic castle symbolizes the function of the state doing what the state always does: lie, conceal and destroy. A swirling accretion disk of husk-like chaff orbits ominously around an awesome, concentric illusion: an illusion of an illusion, a fakery of a fakery whereupon the closer to the center one gets, the more entropic the perspective. Like a spaghetti noodle, one is stretched out (and ripped apart) by how perfidious and unstable every step is; the floor becomes eggshells, a flotilla of chronotopic trash surrounded by danger and oblivion, gravity and shadows, but also gargoyles whose exact function remains to be seen.

This presence of tremendous obscurity inside the infernal concentric pattern/narrative of the crypt's mise-en-abyme brings us to our second bourgeois trifecta: the subterfuge/deception trifecta

- Displacement. Conceal or dislocate the problem.
- Disassociation. Hide/detach from the problem.
- Dissemination. Spread these bourgeois practices through heteronormative canon.

through which neoliberals maintain the status quo by concealing war as a covert enterprise that has expanded exponentially since Vietnam into the 21st century's own wars and lateral media (copaganda). Whereas that war failed by virtue of showing American citizens too much, war has increasingly become a fog through which those in power control the narrative by outright killing journalists, but also "failing" to report where their mercenaries operate (GDF's "How the US Military Censors Your News," 2023). In other words, neoliberal illusions involve outright skullduggery and lies to keep their hegemony intact. Much like the lords of old, they rule from the shadows, but have more material power and control than those former monarchs could dream of; i.e., a mythologized existence hinted at by the displace-and-dissociate stratagem of neoliberal copaganda; e.g., Lethal Weapon's 1987 "Shadow Company" reflecting on the very-real Phoenix Program and so-called "advisory" role of the CIA: "We killed everybody."

[...]

the third bourgeois trifecta—the coercion trifecta that results from these kinds of manufacture and subterfuge:

- Gaslight. A means of making abuse victims doubt the veracity of their own abuse (and their claims of abuse).
- Gatekeep. A tactic more generally employed by those with formal power, denying various groups gainful employment (thus actual material advantage) or working platforms that allow them to effectively communicate systemic injustices perpetrated against them.
- Girl-boss. Tokenism, generally through triangulation: of white, cis-het or at least cis women towards other minorities.

This trifecta is used more liberally by neoliberals (or centrists, vis-à-vis Autumn), as fascists tend to default to brute force. However, deception and lies—namely fear and dogma—are commonplace under fascism, as are token minorities (though these will swiftly disappear as rot sets in).

As Gothic Communists, our aim is deprivatization and degrowth—not to abolish everything outright, but move consumption habits gradually away from the neoliberal "Holy Trinity" within Capitalism's fiscal end goals

- Infinite growth. Pushing for more and more profit.
- Efficient profit. Profit at any cost.
- Worker/owner division. A widening of the class divide.

as disseminated through the three bourgeois trifectas. Rejecting all of these, Capitalism becomes something to transmute, proceeding into Socialism and finally anarcho-Communism through Gothic poetics. This isn't possible unless sex work becomes an open discussion, not a private means of enrichment and control. As Autumn demonstrates, said enrichment and control are things to embody and live by according to a brand image; i.e., an aesthetic with a bourgeois function tied to individual workers punching down with zero empathy inside a dog-eat-dog structure. It's precisely that kind of thing that monstrous aesthetics need to challenge, not support as Autumn does (while encouraging them to charge through "constructive criticism" guided by sound theory).

(artist: Nat the Lich)

To stand against the bourgeoisie and capital is to resist their trifectas and financial end goals, thus stand against "Rome's" self-imposed, endlessly remediated glory as inherently doomed to burn by design (the strongman's toxic stoicism a mask behind which madness historically reigns; and elsewhere, the elite under American hegemony sit far away from the flames). However, like Rome itself, even that activity of resistance by us is far more complicated than it initially appears. The basic concept involves our "creative successes" that occur during oppositional praxis, synthesized into proletarian forms within our daily lives as workers; i.e., according to how we treat each other as weird nerds who can come to blows over the confrontation of trauma, but also its interpretation through Gothic poetics, mid-exchange. Rebellion isn't simply refusing to obey the state; it's being kind to each other as a means of monstrous instruction that camps canonical renditions of sex work as monstrous. Doing so liberates workers from systems of socio-material control by first allowing people to imagine the changing of these structures, then implementing said changes in highly inventive ways that are respected and upheld during intersectional solidarity [ibid.].

Again, all of these come into play during capital; i.e., as the state alienates, sexualizes and gentrifies/decays everything in service to profit, doing so through us-versus-them police violence, terror and morphological expression legitimized by state forces in state territories against state enemies/targets (anything the state needs them to be).

Abridged Manifesto Tree (of Oppositional Praxis)

Despite their poetic nature, performance and play are an absolutely potent means of expressing thus negotiating power through the Gothic mode (its castles, monsters and rape scenarios); a polity of proletarian poets can negotiate future interrogations of unequal power within the Gothic imagination as connected to our material conditions: one shapes and maintains the other and vice versa (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "Interrogating Power through Your Own Camp" (2023)

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Proletarian praxis revolves around camping canon, which goes something like this (abridged, from Volume Zero's manifesto tree):

Camp's assembly and production of cultural empathy under Capitalism happens according to the "creative successes" of proletarian praxis (manifesto terms intersect and overlap; e.g., "good sex education is sexually descriptive")

- mutual consent
- informed consumption and informed consent
- sex-positive de facto education (social-sexual education; i.e., iconoclastic/good sex education and taught gender roles), good play/emergent gameplay and cathartic wish fulfillment/guilty pleasure (abuse prevention/risk reduction patterns) meant to teach good discipline and impulse control (valuing consent, permission, mutual attraction, etc); e.g., appreciative peril (the ironic damself-in-distress/rape fantasy)
- descriptive sexuality

as things to materially imagine and induce (often through ironic parody and "perceptive" pastiche) through Gothic poetics; i.e., inside the "grey area" of cultural appreciation in countercultural forms (making monsters)

- the culturally appreciative, sexually descriptive irony of Gothic counterculture's reverse abjection with sex-positive, demon BDSM, kink and fetishization; as well as asexuality and the ironic ontological ambiguities of trans, non-binary, intersex, and drag existence

[...] to foster empathy and emotional/Gothic intelligence by weird iconoclastic nerds reversing the canonical, unironic function of the Four Gs

- reverse abjection
- the emancipatory hauntology and Communist-chronotope operating as a parallel society—i.e., a parallel space (or language) that works off the anti-totalitarian notion of "parallel societies": "A [society] not dependent on official channels of communications, or on the hierarchy of values of the establishment."
- the Gothic Communist's good-faith, revolutionary cryptonymy

[...] On the flip-side, our would-be killers collectively lack emotional and Gothic intelligence; they do not respect, represent or otherwise practice our "creative successes." As we're going to establish by looking at the definition of weird canonical nerds (in the thesis statement), their conduct is quite the opposite of weird iconoclastic nerds; weird canonical nerds don't practice mutual consent; they canonize, thus endorse

- uninformed/blind consumption through manufactured consent

- de facto bad education as bad fathers, cops (theatrical function: knights) and other harmful role models/authority figures; i.e., canonical sex education and gender education, bad play/intended gameplay resulting in harmful wish fulfillment/guilty pleasure (abuse encouragement/risk production patterns); e.g., appropriative peril (the unironic damsel-in-distress), uninvited voyeurism, etc
- prescriptive sexuality through their own synthetic toolkits during oppositional praxis. They endorse

- the process of abjection
- the carceral hauntology/parallel space as a capitalist chronotope (e.g., the "blind" cyberpunk)
- the complicit (thus bad-faith, bourgeois) cryptonymy to further Capitalism's crises-by-design, hence its expected decay, according to a variety of bourgeois trifectas that lead to the banality of evil [through state arrangements of power relayed through the usual neoliberal stores: books and movies, but also videogames.]

There is also the basics of oppositional synthesis from our synthesis symposium in Volume One: girl talk (anger/gossip), monsters, camp. Refer to said symposium if needed; and "On Twin Trees" from Volume Zero, which talks about the manifesto tree more at length.

In a nutshell, Gothic Communism is "camping and recultivating the twin trees of Capitalism—the Base and Superstructure—during oppositional praxis, including its synthesis and catharsis [regarding the confrontation of generational trauma]" (source: Volume One). These are ideas that will appear more in Volume Three, aka the Praxis Volume; but it doesn't hurt to have an in-text copy within Volume Two's modules!

About the Logo (for Gothic [gay-anarcho] Communism)

If I say that my somewhat extravagant imagination yielded simultaneous pictures of an octopus, a dragon, and a human caricature, I shall not be unfaithful to the spirit of the thing. A pulpy, tentacled head surmounted a grotesque and scaly body with rudimentary wings; but it was the general outline of the whole which made it most shockingly frightful.

— H.P. Lovecraft, "The Call of Cthulhu" (1928)

(model and artist: Blxxd Bunny and Persephone van der Waard)

For much of this book's construction, I was using the Laborwave hammer and sickle insignia over a red-and-yellow cover to represent the book's concept of Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism. However, I decided on 8/26/2023 to design, thus give, the ideology its own symbol (the full PNGs for the Gothic [gay-anarcho] Communism logo by itself—with three different versions [full version w/flame and w/o flame, and the "skeleton key" simplified version] are available either on my website or on my DA Stash).

(artist, left: Leonardo Galletti; top-right: Eyeliner; bottom-right: [Esprit 空想 \[Esprit Fantasy\]](#))

When crafting my own symbol, I wanted to progress further beyond the Vaporwave aesthetic (which emerged in roughly in 2011) than Laborwave had, which, in 2016, combined Vaporwave's signature corporate mood/neoliberalism-in-decay with Marxist-Leninist icons divorced from their historical-material past. I wanted to not simply reflect on corporate/neoliberal fallibility and decay within dead/dystopian postpunk-tinged nostalgia, nor wax nostalgia on the undead pastiche of Marxist-Leninism, but inject a Gothic-queer presence to evoke an anarcho-Communist potential towards ending Capitalist Realism in the eternal drive towards developing Communism.

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

So I took the iconic hammer and sickle, found an anarcho-Communist variant with the same nostalgic/trans color scheme, and embossed a skull with it over a Wiccan pentacle; the skull I treated as the circle of the transgender symbol, fashioning it from black bones and horns (to symbolize the undead and demonic of Gothic poetics fused with the aesthetics of power and death; i.e., the green flames and purple slime as reclaimed colors of canonical stigma and persecution). If I was going to simply it, I thought I'd lose the flames and pentacle, turn everything black, and make the an-Com symbol negative space in the forehead. The thought process was, I wanted the embellished version for the book cover (like a monk's monasterial tome) to give it a thoroughly medievalized flavor (the embossed codex). But as part of a logo guide, I included the simplified version of the symbol simply called "the skeleton key." I thought about using just the "A" in the forehead or the hammer and sickle, but that verges on too simple (the "A" being for Anarchism and the hammer and sickle being for Communism); so I went with the more complex an-Com symbol to preserve its meaning. That + the skull and crossbones + the horns + the trans icon = Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism. It can be drawn all in black with a simple marker in a simplified "bathroom stall" form, but also has a fancier black logo that can be further embellished with ornaments and color if needed. Also, completely by accident, it kind of reminds me of Mercyful Fate's Melissa skull + the Grateful Dead logo, the latter being one of the most famous counterculture rock 'n roll bands of all time: sex, drugs and rock 'n roll all in one package!

(artist: Bubi)

Concerning My Audience, My Art, the Reading Order and Glossary

What should I do with your strong, manly, spirited Sketches, full of variety and Glow? – How could I possibly join them on to the little bit (two inches wide) of Ivory on which I work with so fine a Brush, as produces little effect after much Labour?

—Jane Austen, in a letter²⁹ to her "favorite" nephew, James Edward Austen.

(artist: Henry Fuseli)

For most of recorded human history, women (or beings perceived either as women, or simply "incorrect"; i.e., "not white, cis-het Christian men"; e.g., eastern cultures, people of color or Indigenous Persons, genderqueer entities, etc) have been reduced to sex objects, sources of fear and/or (especially in the case of white women) accomplished pieces of property that could do little tricks, like sew or play the piano (what Mr. Darcy, in Pride and Prejudice [1813], smugly calls "female accomplishments"). Generally women were prized possessions, not people, and this reflected in how they were shaped in media as it became more and more widely available (in short, when Europe transitioned from an oral society to a written one): through the gaze of men, or according to women who—in some shape or form—served men by acting like/for them under Capitalism as a developing enterprise. The colonial standard, then, has certainly complicated itself in recent times, but the apples don't fall far from the tree; i.e., allowing the feminisms of older times—the first and second waves—to fight for their (white, cis-supremacist rights) while throwing everyone else under the proverbial bus (or stagecoach, in those days). The equality of convenience during older historical periods became a defense of the status quo enacted upon by women-of-letters, which continues into the present: Britain's "TERF island" is a mirror into the imaginary past, one whose fear and dogma continually uphold its tyrannical historical materialism, thus mass exploitation and genocide; i.e., "Yes, Austen belonged to a slave-owning society³⁰."

²⁹ source: Zoe Louca-Richards' "Two Inches of Ivory: A New(ish) Jane Austen Acquisition" (2020) Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

If the above paragraph is any indication, books are generally written (and illustrated) with an intended audience in mind; apart from that, there's the ideal audience (who simply "gets" or understands the material) and the actual audience (whoever actually reads the book, regardless of what they know beforehand). Sex Positivity was intentionally written for a holistic audience, with an emphasis on non-academia/non-accommodated intellectuals (as per Edward Said's notion of the "accommodated intellectual" from Representations of an Intellectual, 1993); it doesn't expect you to know everything and provides as much secondary material as it can to help you along. However, because of its size, I've had to cut the book into four volumes, the thesis volume being the volume that actually unpacks the companion glossary's terms (though all four volumes contain the glossary in their rear pages). Even when it was shorter, though, I had written and organized Sex Positivity to be read in order—as in, from top to bottom for first-time readers. This fact remains constant. The entire book (all four volumes) is meant to be read as: Volume Zero, Volume One, Volume Two, and Volume Three, head to toe. From there, if you want to jump around, the volumes have been structured and organized to make doing so as easy as possible. Go wild, my little angels.

If you choose to jump around, I'll assume that you've read my thesis volume (or at least browsed its unpacking of the keyword glossary terms). Apart from Volume One, whose full manifesto outlines my book's central thesis on sex-positive, social-sexual activism, Volume Two acts a kind of "prelude" to Volume Three, providing a "Humanities primer" that adjusts you to a more open-minded way of thinking that is useful to our thesis argument: "Capitalism dimorphically sexualizes everything under a heteronormative, settler-colonial scheme, one whose myopic Capitalist Realism must be escaped from; i.e., via a deliberate iconoclasm that liberates sex workers (or sexualized workers) under Capitalism through sex-positive art." The primer does so through numerous "monster art" exhibits that show how to think (and how past people thought) openly during oppositional praxis, using specific terms, theories, and formatting devices which apply to various topics broached later in the book when proletarian praxis (and its synthesis) is articulated chapter-by-chapter (and art exhibits are slightly less frequent, at least in the first edition).

³⁰ From Edward Said's "Jane Austen and Empire"; Culture and Imperialism (1993).

However, as any artistic exhibit (not just mine) is idiosyncratic, this book is indulgently "me" to make that point abundantly clear. This includes iconoclastic porn as something that I've often explored and cultivated in my own body of work—with me actually preferring to cultivate erotic, sex-positive art displays during my own creations. As I write in "My Art Website Is Now Live" (2020):

In my work, I don't like to treat sex separate from everyday life. Instead, I emphasize sexuality and intimacy as being part of the same experience. Not only do you have the intense, raw close-ups during sex one might encounter in a VHS porno; there's also the tender, little details: the smiles, excitement, and other factors that make up everyday sex for people in relationships. I try to communicate all of this in a fantasy or sci-fi setting populated by my favorite videogame characters. It might be a regression of the quotidian into the Romantic, but being a Gothicism I'm not against liminal forms of expression. My work is erotic, forming a balance of the raunchy and tender inside a videogame milieu. These characters aren't fighting dragons; they're having sex, but there's so many different ways this can go about, and I have my own special blend I like to try and capture in my art (source).

In other words, my campy artistic creations invite you to imagine ordinary behaviors from extraordinary-looking people—e.g., Link and Nabooru less as representations of the status quo, and more as a highly flexible performance that can interrogate and subvert, thus negotiate, power using the same-old aesthetics on and off the usual stages where these performances take place. Imagine as I would, then, that Link and Nabooru "save" Hyrule, then talk about laundry and what's for dinner while having sex in a half-real, incredibly playful scenario. Except in our case, there never actually was a war to be fought (thus no genocide)—just a roleplay had and costumes worn by two workers who, for all intents and purposes, really look the part but whose function has subtly (or not so subtly) shifted away from the heteronormative scheme to undermine, thus weaken, the state's grip on the Superstructure:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Bear in mind, these portfolio samples come from 2020, when I was still in the closet and trying to uncover/understand my own identity and struggle as a trans woman. But they still contain a certain iconoclastic playfulness that I've since built upon after coming out as trans (as the rest of my exhibits will hopefully demonstrate); i.e., in the dialectical-material context, subverting what's expected in favor of delineating away from traditional heroic activities (such as genocide): make love, not war (except class/culture war). While my focus is often on videogames (the dominant canonical medium under neoliberal Capitalism), the same idea goes for any heroic-monstrous character borrowed from a particular franchised narrative: Midna and the Great Fairy from different Zelda games (a crossover); Link and Minda from Twilight Princess (2006); Squall and Quistis from Final Fantasy 8 (1999), and so on:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

If this basic thought experiment feels too difficult to visualize or understand, it will get no easier from here on out (we'll focus primarily on non-heteronormative/non-tokenized and gender-non-conforming media). Likewise, if you're unfamiliar with the Gothic, ludic/queer theory and/or Marxist thought (and Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com)

the glossary keywords), chances are the rest of this book (after Volume Zero; i.e., from Volumes One, Two and Three onwards) will seem incredibly alien and confusing to you; all are either lost and forgotten concepts in relation to Capitalism, reduced by capital to pulpy canon this book does nothing but dissect, or swim around in the grey areas of (which Capitalism and its heteronormative colonial binary discourage). For first-time readers, then, this book really is meant to be read in order.

That being said, the thesis volume (as per the heads-up refresher) is more academic, thus inaccessible. If you haven't read it yet or found it too difficult, Volume One's more conversational/instructional approach unpacks the same basic ideas in a less dense, but also less developed dialog concerning the manifesto tree ideas (the scaffold of oppositional praxis). If you feel lost when reading my thesis, the manifesto (and its additional chapters on instruction and praxial synthesis) may be a better place to start. Try reading it first, familiarizing yourself with the manifesto's iconoclastic ideas, visual aids and various guides, signposts and roadmaps. Then, consider returning to the thesis volume, which unpacks these ideas far more intensely and completely. Once you comprehensively understand what Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism is, try moving onto Volume Two, which explores the historical development of the Gothic imagination and its complicated past—of flawed, conflicting poetic expression as something to learn from moving forward. From there, Volume Three outlines the goals and objectives of Gothic Communism as a means of attacking Capitalism and its ideologies directly through solidarized worker poiesis.

The goal of Volume One is to outline a general teaching method that explains complex things in commonplace ways, which Volume Two expands on through the poetic history of monsters as a dehumanizing tool that must be reclaimed. Everything tied to proletarian praxis is re-summarized after the introduction in Volume Three: in the summation section before Chapter One of that volume. You will need what the manifesto contains when you read the synthesis roadmap in Volume One; you will need what both (and the thesis volume) contain when you read the primer from Volume Two; and you will need the introduction, summation and Chapter One from Volume Three when you Chapters Two through Five of that volume, etc. Last but not least, familiarize yourself with my "artistic exhibit style." First shown during the second disclaimer during exhibit 3a1, 2, and 3 (and exhibits -1a and -1b); and during exhibit 0a1a during the foreword, my exhibit style is utilized throughout entire the book in over 200 similar exhibits covering a broad range of artistic subjects (and monsters).

Last but not least, you do not need to read the entire glossary up front, simply because I wrote the thesis volume to introduce keywords to you, step by step. There's a lot of them, but it explains the most vital one at a time and in (I feel) the most logical order demanded by my arguments. Even so, my book has still had to alter or simplify academic language, terms and theories by combining them with everyday language. It also deals with groups (fascists and centrists) who frequently employ obscurantism—often through general/Gothic cryptonyms (words that hide), used in bad-faith to control others through sexualized and gendered language that isolate the mind (with isolation being a predator's tactic). So while most of these terms are defined in some shape or form inside my thesis statement, word count (and flow) remains an issue. I could only recite the most important in full, and summarize the rest in the thesis volume itself. Therefore, I want to provide all of their full definitions (modified and expanded on/narrowed by me) in the companion glossary, which you can access in the back of whichever volume you're currently reading.

(artist: Mikki Storm)

The keywords are divided into separate sections and you can access individual terms via the bookmarks located on side of your PDF. While the most central are quoted in part or in full within the thesis proper, I recommend familiarizing yourself with all of them before moving onto Volumes One, Two and Three (which again, shall henceforth continue being referred to as such; the thesis volume was written last and I don't feel like changing the names. Instead, think of it as four volumes: One, Two and Three, with the thesis volume as Volume Zero). Do not assume you know what they mean. A good few are less central but still useful when grappling with these larger topics.

In conclusion, while the keywords are all important to know and understand, there aren't too many that need to be understood a priori—as in before reading my thesis statement (and the rest of the book). This being said, there are a few I won't be able to unpack in the thesis proper—the simple reason being the unpacking of my Gothic, ludology and genderqueer terms was written with a presumption that you have a modicum of understanding regarding basic queer and Marxist theory. So before we proceed, please peruse the below list to make sure you're familiar with the more essential terms from the "Marxism and Politics" and "Sex, Gender and Race" sections of the glossary.

Essential Keywords, a priori

What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust? man delights not me: no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

—Hamlet, Hamlet (c. 1599)

(source: Clyde Mandelin's "How Symphony of the Night's 'Miserable Pile of Secrets' Scene Works in Japanese," 2013)

Through its motley crew of assorted keywords, Gothic Communism aims to describe sexuality and gender within Marxist, Gothic and game theories. Sexuality and gender are not complicated, then; it's just not a binary like heteronormativity expresses, insofar as a gradient is simply a different (and more accurate) arrangement to what sexuality and gender actually are. In the presence of state power and its defenders, thoroughly stupid questions get asked, kettling the oppressed into an asinine, deadly game; e.g., "What is a woman?" in Matt Walsh's "documentary" of the same name (it's fascist propaganda, my dudes). Well, I certainly can humor fascists with my own definition

a woman

That depends ("Beware the elves for they will say both yea and nay"). Keeping the [below] terms in mind, a woman is multiple things at once. On the bourgeois side, she's anything a man isn't—i.e., a cis-het sex slave/employee/girl boss, etc (note the gradient of euphemisms to disguise the deliberate marital role of unpaid women's work under Capitalism); on the proletariat side, she's however someone identifies in relation to the state³¹ as a worker—for or against it to various, liminal degrees (this includes personas, alter-egos, egregores and various other disguises). To reduce it to "an adult, human female" is super gross, Nazi-level shit (and while I want to seriously feel sorry for Matt Walsh's probably-battered housewife, assuming she's entirely ignorant of her husband's abuse would assume that she actually puts in the work; however, if she does, it would take total isolation of anything not supplied to her in advance by her "big, strong, powerful, caretaker" husband. That's quite sad and pathetic). I hate Nazis, Matt Walsh; my grandfather fought them during WW2 after they raped and destroyed his homeland and killed most of his friends and family. They prey on fear yet instantly run away like Brave Ser Robin when they're outed as perfidiously and ignominiously stupid. You're cut from the same cloth, you giant, callow man-child.

but that's not really the point of them asking, is it? Their doing so is an invitation for moderates to belittle gender-non-conforming persons, then look the other way while fascists normalize vigilante violence against minorities (which translates to state/police violence when Imperialism comes home to roost). In short, Hamlet—when viewed as the male action hero—is a real "piece of work," alright. He's an absolute, unironic monster³²; i.e., mad with grief over the death of his father until ³¹ (from the symposium): Whenever I say "the state" in this book, I am referring to the state as both a current mechanism for capital, but also the status quo more broadly—a state of affairs that has evolved into its current form (including the Gothic castle as a hauntological advertisement for state hegemonic displacement and dissociation): nation-states, whose sense of national identity in relation to capital had to evolve into itself from the Cartesian Revolution onwards (bringing with them modern war and globalization as they currently exist).

³² "Hamlet begins the play as a possible tragic hero, but as he interacts with corrupt characters, his traits become increasingly tainted until his potential for heroism disintegrates completely. Although Hamlet is depicted at first as a seemingly normal, depressed man, he is influenced by his relationships with Claudius, the ghost, Rosencrantz, and Guildenstern until his old virtues are no longer recognizable. His evil actions, whether with Polonius, Gertrude, or Ophelia, further ingrain his corruption. Horatio's steady, honorable personality emphasizes the demoralization of Hamlet's character. By the end of the play, Hamlet no longer has any traits of a hero but seems more of a

he becomes the anti-hero³³ who must be unironically sacrificed (along with everyone else) at the end of the play. In modern language, it's a murder-suicide committed by the usual suspect: the entitled "man of the house" acting like a total incel who kills his mother, sister and best friend (Shakespeare is hardly perfect, but absolutely satirizes heteronormativity—i.e., similar to Romeo and Juliet, 1597, or Titus Andronicus).

The keywords in this list, then, are skeleton keywords I've tailor-made based on preexisting definitions I've either narrowed and/or expanded on to suit my own holistic arguments; i.e., utterly essential to following my arguments on Gothic Communism, except I won't have time during the thesis volume to unpack them to the degree that I do the Gothic material (which is hard enough to unpack on its own). In other words, the book assumes you've already read the glossary definitions (at least these terms) ahead of time, or otherwise know them a priori. While all of the glossary keywords are useful to some extent, absolutely make sure you have these ones down pat (which I've abbreviated in case you can't be arsed to actually look at the glossary. You should because many of these shorthand definitions are inadequate; simply click on the in-text links to be taken to their full definitions):

Marx tended to focus on material conditions and change (the Base); Gothic Communism extends this to social-sexual conditions tied to material ones: stressing the Superstructure as something to recultivate through iconoclastic art. Anything expressed here as "material," then can be easily interpreted as "socio-material" with an emphasis on sexuality and gender identity/performance. —Perse

- Marxism: Schools of thought stemming from Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, trying historically to achieve Communism through the state first (Marxist-Leninism) instead of direct worker solidarity and action operating in opposition to the state and establishment politics (anarcho-Communism).
- material conditions: The factors that determine quality of life from a material standpoint.
- historical materialism: The normalized, vicious cycle that history is predicated on the material conditions that routinely bring it about.
- dialectical materialism: Classically the study of oppositional material forces in relation to each other—i.e., the bourgeoisie vs the proletariat.

villain, full of immoral, evil thoughts and devoid of his former inner goodness" (source: Reverie Marie's "Hamlet Is Not a Tragic Hero," 2016).

³³ "Anti-hero" can mean different things; it can mean "tragic hero," in the sense of state apologetics; e.g., Oedipus Rex's "feel sorry for me even though I killed my dad and boned my mom" schtick. It can also mean "tragic rebel"; i.e., Satan from Paradise Lost (1667) as the rebel devil-in-disguise fighting against the Christian idea of heroism, thus being revered under British Romanticism for being revolutionarily heroic against the villainy of state tyranny.

Gothic Communism extends this to various social-sexual elements; i.e., canon vs iconoclasm, sex positivity vs sex coercion.

- the means of production: Marx' Base, owned by the elite; the ability to (mass)produce material goods within capital/a living market.

This moves in a spiral pattern.
The base is generally dominant.

(source: "Base and Superstructure Theory," 2013)

- propaganda: Marx's Superstructure, or anything that cultivates the Superstructure; for Gothic Communists, this means in a sex-positive direction.
- private property: Property that is privately owned, generally by the elite through privatization via state-corporate mechanisms; i.e., capital.
- privatization: The process that enables private ownership at a systemic, bourgeois level.
- functional Communism: The eventual (centuries from now) abolishment of privatization/private property (a classless, stateless, moneyless society). This process is called development, or Socialism.
- nominal Communism: Canonical depictions of Communism—i.e., Communism in name alone, sold to workers through canonical propaganda to scare them into upholding the bourgeois status quo.
- Marxist-Leninism/"tankies": An embryonic form of Socialism that, past and present, favors state models and nostalgia; i.e., one that hybridizes Marx and Engels with 20th century thinkers and leaders—most notably Lenin, Trotsky and Stalin, but also Mao, Castro and other state leaders/schools going into the 21st: through "tankie" apologia whitewashing the crimes of said leaders and their states as beings to worship and compromise with (Bad Mouse's "On Hakim's Nuance," 2025).
- anarcho-Communism: The gradual disillusion and transmutation of Capitalism into Socialism and finally Communism through direct worker

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

solidarity and collective action versus through state mechanism and argument; i.e., whereupon power is horizontally restructured away from state models and Marxism Leninism (and state power/state-regulated Capitalism).

- Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism (abridged, full definition in "The Terms I Coined"): the titular term of my book series, so I'll quote the whole thing, here—expanded and updated substantially since 2023, in 2025, to account for my writing of four books after Volume Zero): Coined by me, Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism is the deliberate, pointed critique of capital/Capitalism and the state using a unique marriage of Gothic/queer/game theory and semi-Marxist (an-Com) ideas synthesized campily by sex-positive workers during proletarian praxis: developing systemic catharsis, mid-liminal expression during praxial opposition, using ludo-Gothic BDSM and palliative-Numinous dialogs (e.g., Metroidvania).
- neoliberal Capitalism: The dominant strain of Capitalism operating in the world today—i.e., Capitalism employed by neoliberal canon, centrism, moderation and personal responsibility rhetoric to achieve the greatest possible division between the owner/worker classes (a re-liberalization of the market through the abuse of state power), as well as infinite growth and efficient profit (more on these during the manifesto proper). Neoliberal Capitalism is founded on a vertical arrangement of power through national-state-corporate leaders operating against worker interests by exploiting them to the fullest using capital.
- capital/Capitalism (a super-important term and often incredibly misunderstood, so I'm giving the full definition, here; it's the longest in this entire list): A system of exploiting workers, nature and the world, whose resultant genocide and vampiric devastation is synonymous with profit for capitalists/the elite. The elite parasitize everyone/thing else to generate profit through Capitalism; or to quote directly from Raj Patel and Jason Moore's A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things (2017):

Money isn't capital. Capital is journalism's shorthand for money or, worse, a stock of something that can be transformed into something else. If you've ever heard or used the terms natural capital or social capital, you've been part of a grand obfuscation. Capital isn't the dead stock of uncut trees or unused skill. For Marx and for us, capital happens only in the live transformation of money into commodities and back again. Money tucked under a mattress is as dead to capitalism as the mattress is itself. It is through the live circulation of this money, and in the relations around it, that capitalism happens. The process of exchange and circulation turn money into capital. At the heart of Marx's Capital is a simple, powerful model: in production and exchange, capitalists combine labor power, machines and raw material. The resulting commodities are then sold for money. If all goes well, there is a profit, which needs then to be reinvested into yet more labor power, machines and raw materials. Neither commodities nor money is capital. This circuit becomes capital when money is sunk into commodity production in an ever-expanding cycle. Capitalism is a process in which money flows through nature. The trouble here is that capital supposes infinite expansion [growth] within a finite web of life (source).

For our purposes, this "web of life" concerns the privatized, social-sexual exploitation of workers in monstrous language—something to be unironically defended by class traitors preserving Capitalism, thus the state as a means of maximizing capital for the elite (infinite growth); i.e., to serve and protect capital, not people, through the means of production/propaganda's current bourgeois hegemony under neoliberal Capitalism's personal responsibility rhetoric—to regulate the market and empower the state through concealed abuses that accrete out from the center in all directions. As anarcho-Communists, we much critique this canonizing process' profit motive through our own iconoclastic material.

- capitalists: Those who own capital, the bourgeoisie (the owner class).
- Rainbow Capitalism: Capitalism appropriating queerness, generally through surface-level, inauthentic representation and queer-baiting.
- recuperation/controlled opposition: The process by which politically radical ideas and images are twisted, co-opted, absorbed, defused, incorporated, annexed or commodified within media culture and bourgeois society, and thus become interpreted through a neutralized, innocuous or more socially conventional perspective.
- sublimation: The process by which socially unacceptable impulses or idealizations are transformed into socially acceptable actions or behavior. Normalization.

- prescriptive sexuality (and gender): Sexuality and gender as prescribed according to various explicit or tacit mandates; i.e., sex, orientation and gender performance/identity are not separate and exist within a cis-gendered, heteronormative colonial binary.
- descriptive sexuality (and gender): Sexuality and gender as describing actual persons, be they sexual and/or asexual. This includes their bodies, orientations and identities, etc, as things to appreciate, not appropriate (thus exploit).
- praxis: The practical execution of theory.
- appreciative irony: A descriptive sexuality (or gender) that culturally appreciates the irony of queer existence (and other minorities) in various forms.
- asexuality: A gradient of expressions that includes demisexual/grey ace and aromantic persons, asexuality displays orientations and performances or gender identities that diverge from sexual attraction, generally in favor of romantic, spiritual and emotional connections; i.e., a neurodivergent condition, not a disease that needs to be repressed, shamed or attacked.
- neurodivergence: A spectrum of atypical brain conditions that diverge from neurotypical persons and brains. Neurodivergent people canonically tend to be demonized, but also shamed as disabled, insane or mendacious.
- sex-repulsed: Not to be confused with sex-negative/reactionary politics, sex-repulsed is the quality through which persons—whether through nature or nurture; i.e., hereditary or environmental trauma factors (these tend to overlap)—are repulsed by sex. This can be partial—can amount to gradient indifference or outright trauma/triggering status depending on its severity. Important: Sex-repulsion is not strictly a symptom, but a neurodivergent condition with congenital/comorbid factors operating within the brain as neuroplastic.

- comorbid/congenital: The simultaneous presence of two or more diseases or medical/psychological conditions in a patient—congenital meaning "present at birth," inherited.
- LGBTQ+: Lesbian, Gay, Bi, Trans, Queer, and various other gender-non-conforming groups.
- queer: A general, all-purpose label reclaimed from its colonizer origins. For example, I identify as queer/am a queer person. While terms like trans, queer, gay and so on most certainly have specific definitions, in everyday queer parlance they tend to be used interchangeably (with idiosyncratic boundaries being drawn up when the need arises); forced conformity/division is to "make things weird" (though marginalized gatekeeping/sectarianism is definitely a thing).
- genderqueer: Challenging gender norms; also called "questioning" or "gender non-conforming."
- monogamy/-ous: The performance of a singular, happy relationship, canonically structured around marriage, reproductive sex and the nuclear family structure. In Gothic canon, this structure is often threatened by a Gothic villain—e.g., Count Ardolph from Charlotte Dacre's Zofloya (1806).
- poly(amour-ous): Non-normative family/open relationship structures that break with the heteronormative structure/cycle of compelled marriage. Historically conflated with swinging or serial monogamy (which are really their own heteronormative practices; i.e., "We're not poly, we're serially monogamous!"). Note how poly relationships tend to be framed as polyamorous, not polygamous.
- beards: A relationship of convenience to appear straight, heteronormative, monogamous, nuclear, "Roman," etc. The nuptial variant of a beard is the lavender marriage.
- heteronormativity (a big one; I will provide its full definition with the thesis paragraph): The idea that heterosexuality and its relative gender norms are prescribed/enforced to normalized extremes by those in power—i.e., the Patriarchy.
- gender trouble: Coined by Judith Butler, gender trouble is the social tension and reactions that result when the heteronormative, binary view of sexuality and gender is disrupted. This trouble can happen through the parody of social-sexual norms through ironic or appreciative (counterculture) media.
- girl-cock (exhibit 7c) or boy pussy (exhibit 52c)/gender parody: Genitals or genitalia-like artifacts (and various other modes of performance) that fulfill an ironic/gender parody cultural role that interrogates heteronormative gender assignment, performance or identity, as well as sexual orientation.

- natural assignment: Accident of birth—i.e., the natural assignment of one's biological sex (and conditions to form one's gender identity around, whether through conformity or struggle); one's birth sex/genitals: male, female, and intersex.
- AFAMs/AMABs: Assigned-Female/Male-at-Birth—i.e., one's birth sex. Can be used as a noun or adjective; e.g., "AFABs dislike this" or "an AFAB person," etc. Intersex people are their own category.

what is INTERSEX?

The term "intersex" is used to describe an individual whose chromosomes, hormones, or sexual organs are not in line with the perceived male/female sex binary.

SEX is not binary: SEX is a spectrum:

Sex is determined by a doctor upon birth using the following guidelines:
(according to the infant's genitals)

it's a girl! (under 3/8") Phall-O-Meter® it's a boy! (over 1") unacceptable!

Babies with "ambiguous genitals" often undergo inhumane, dangerous, and unnecessary surgeries to "normalize" their genitals, many times without parental consent!

INTERSEX PEOPLE...

- >> are about as common as redheads!
- >> can have any sexual orientation or gender identity.
- >> should never be called "hermaphrodites."
- >> should have their privacy respected.
- >> should not have to be ashamed of their bodies.
- >> deserve to be treated like anybody else.

INTERSEX AWARENESS DAY // october 26

SOURCES: isna.org, actuallyintersex.tumblr.com, sexandgender.net, apcdaily.wordpress.com

(from the glossary, exhibit 3c1: source)

- intersex: The existence on a biological gradient between the qualifiers male and female, amounting to a variable "third sex" that presents mixed features of either sex to varying degrees; except, the umbrella term doesn't represent one particular manifestation as a strict third, but all of them together on a vast, complicated spectrum of genotypical and phenotypical elements. They are often depicted as angels or demons in the classically androgynous sense, or stigmatized/fetishized in porn as "shemales," "he-shes" and other canonically pejorative labels; a common, non-insulting label is "androgyne" (though this can apply to trans people and mixed gender performance, too). A common intersex example in Gothic media is the phallic woman or Archaic Mother—e.g., the xenomorph.

- non-binary: "An adjective describing a person who does not identify exclusively as a man or a woman. Non-binary people may identify as being both a man and a woman, somewhere in between, or as falling completely outside these categories. While many also identify as transgender, not all non-binary people do. Non-binary can also be used as an umbrella term encompassing identities such as agender, bigender, genderqueer or gender-fluid" (source: Human Rights Campaign's "Glossary of Terms," 2023).
- sexual/asexual orientation: How people orient (a)sexually/"float their boats" in relation to gender identity and performance—sexually but also emotionally and romantically. A double helix of two gradients, each having two theoretical "poles," wherein both ribbons descriptively intertwine/intersect within the socio-material world (more on this in Volume Three, Chapter Three).
- heterosexuality³⁴: Orienting towards the opposite gender. Classically called "opposite-sex attraction," gender-non-conformity (GNC) treats heterosexuality as orienting towards the gender opposite to oneself. This being said, pure opposites do not generally exist outside of heteronormative enforcement (which compels binaries in service of the profit motive/process of abjection) so heterosexual people also tend to be cis; i.e., cis-het, or "straight."
- homosexuality: Orienting towards the same gender. Classically called "same-sex attraction," gender-non-conformity treats homosexuality as orienting towards the same gender as oneself. No binary is required, and the term is generally synonymous with "gay" or "lesbian."
- bisexuality: Orienting towards two or more genders. Classically called "both-sex attraction" (or something along those lines), gender-non-conformity treats bisexuality as orienting towards the gender opposite to and the same as oneself.

³⁴ Traditional orientation terminology is classically binarized, which GNC usage complicates by introducing non-binary potential. Traditional usage ties a specific orientation to sexuality—e.g., heterosexual—but descriptive orientation can just as much involve an emotional and/or romantic attraction and generally includes gender and biology as interrelating back and forth while not being essentially connected. So whereas heteronormativity forces sex and gender together and ties both to human biology as the ultimate deciding factor regarding one's gender and orientation, sex-positive usage is far more flexible; orientation isn't strictly sexual or rooted in biology at all. Those variables are present, but neither is the end-all, be-all because sexuality and gender are things to self-determine versus things the state determines for us (to exploit workers through binarized stratagems; e.g., "women's work"). To compensate for this flexibility inside GNC circles, orientation labels are generally shorted to "hetero," "bi," or "pan" (homosexual is commonly referred to as "gay" or "[a] lesbian"), allowing for asexual implications. Even so, classically binary terms like "hetero" and "homo" tend to be used more sparingly and are often swapped out for more specific identities or umbrella terms; e.g., "I'm queer/gay" or "I'm bi" as something to understand with some degree of intuition, which can later be explored in future conversations if the parties in question are interested in pursuing it. This pursuit is not automatic, though, so neither is the language denoting what can be pursued; instead, sexuality is an option, not a given.

- pansexuality: Orienting towards someone else regardless of their gender. However, this does not preclude exceptions and the phrase is generally used interchangeably with bisexuality in everyday parlance.
- heteronormative assignment \(gender roles\): Accident of birth in relation to one's "birth gender" as socially constructed by the state in relation to one's genitals.
- transgender reassignment \(transgender identity\): Being trans is gender identity wherein one feels, and hopefully one day decides to recognize, that one isn't cis.
- gender identity: One's conforming or nonconforming gender identity as a (sub)conscious act; i.e., how one identifies, be that passively or actively.
- gender performance: Gender performance is coded in relation to oneself, their identity/orientation, and to society's in-groups and out-groups, aka formal/informal gender roles. Whether one's gender identity is assigned to them at birth, or is self-assigned through various gender-non-conforming types—e.g., trans man/woman, non-binary, femboy, agender, etc—their gender performance amounts to a coded set of social behaviors (and corresponding materials and language) that adhere to performative rules meant to reinforces one's gender as either self-assigned, or assigned heteronormatively by the state. To that, these concepts do not exist in a vacuum, but intersect and often conflict (which leads to iconoclastic gender parody³⁵ and gender trouble during subversive exercises).

(artist, left: Mark Bryan; right: Cursed Arachnid)

³⁵ Classic, canonical gender parody would include cross-dressing in Shakespearean theatre, whereupon (arguably) cis-het men would have played both men and women, the latter often by teenagers/prepubescent boys wearing various costumes and makeup. All the same, Shakespeare was debatably not straight (see: all the gay shit in his work), and the theatre remains a classic site for gender-non-conforming fulfillment and expression.

- gender performance-as-identity: Some identities involve broader gender performances to identify around or as; e.g., drag queens or femboys.
- the (settler-)colonial³⁶ binary: Nadi Tofighian writes in Blurring the Colonial Binary (2013) that, having evolved beyond Rome's master/slave dynamic, colonialism and Imperialism "separated people into different classes of people, ruler and ruled, white and non-white, thereby creating and widening a colonial binary" (source). To this, the cis-het, white European/Christian male is superior to all other workers. This binary extends to token marginalizations and infiltrated and assimilated/normalized activist groups, thought/political leaders or public intellectuals, who serve as class traitors, but also functional police for their respective domains.
- poiesis/poetics: "To bring into being that which did not exist before." Art. A commonplace example is "poetry," which historically has granted impoverished, exploited people idiosyncratic voices/parallel societies in times of struggle; i.e., making monsters that voice our trauma and concerns.
- canon (dogma): Marx's Superstructure as normally cultivated by the elite through official/unofficial, state-corporate icons and materials designed to control how people think, behave and feel: heteronormative propaganda/dogma.
- iconoclast/-clasm (camp): Marx's Superstructure, counter-cultivated by an agent or image that attacks established variants, generally with the intent of transforming them in a deconstructive, sex-positive manner. Such a manner is treated as heretical by the elite, but also workers sympathetic to bourgeois hegemony.

³⁶ Since Alexander the Great's famous conquests or those of the Roman Empire (a safe starting point, let's call it), so-called "Western colonialism"/Imperialism (the highest stage of Capitalism, vis-à-vis Lenin) has existed on the global stage; since the Enlightenment, it has—starting with Ireland* and spreading elsewhere around the world—adopted a racialized settler-colonial flavor whose latter-day fantasies' hauntologies help perpetuate (e.g., Aliens, 1986). For our purposes, heteronormativity is settler-colonial, insofar as there is always a settler-colonial bias within Capitalism as it currently exists through nation-states; but that bias also executes differently depending on where and who you are as the story's intended/tokenized audience: the Global North's military urbanism/Imperial Boomerang versus settler colonialism conducted abroad. I confess the words "colonial," "imperial/Imperialism" and "settler-colonial" will be used synonymously and that the word "(settler-)colonial binary" is more or less functionally synonymous/synergetic with "heteronormativity." I will do my best to give nuanced examples throughout the book, but freely admit that settler colonialism is not its chief-and-only focus.

*"The British Empire began developing its colonialization tactics in Ireland and Canada, before exporting them throughout the world. / From the sixteenth through the nineteenth century, Britain developed an empire on which the 'sun never set,' subjugating local peoples from North America to East Africa to Australia. But as three University of Manitoba scholars, Aziz Rahman, Mary Anne Clarke and Sean Byrne, wrote in 2017, it developed many of the methods it used in its colonization much closer to home: in Ireland. [...] Unlike previous invaders, the authors write, these British Protestants regarded the Catholic Irish as racially inferior. The newcomers rarely intermarried with the locals. In 1649, when Oliver Cromwell's forces arrived in Ireland, the result was a brutal genocidal campaign" (source: Livia Gershon's "Britain's Blueprint for Colonialism: Made in Ireland," 2022).

- centrism: The theatrical creation of good vs evil as existing within politically "neutral" media—a dangerous preservation of orderly justice whose "moderate," white (or token) voice-of-reason/cloaked racism and discrimination pointedly maintain the status quo: Capitalism.
- war pastiche: The canonical remediation of war as something to sell to the audience (for our purposes) as canon, generally in centrist forms (which we then subvert through performative irony of various kinds).
- nation pastiche: Any kind of pastiche that ties war and combat to national identities; e.g., Street Fighter.
- heels/babyfaces: The centrist heroes and villains of staged, professional wrestling and American contact/combat sports—i.e., war personified—but commonly employed through combat e-sports like the Street Fighter FGC. Heels normally wear black, fight dirty and talk trash; babyfaces (often called "faces" for short) tend to wear white, fight fair and refuse to talk trash.
- kayfabe: The portrayal of staged events within the industry as "real" or "true," specifically the portrayal of competition, rivalries, and relationships between participants as being genuine and not staged.
- neocons\(ervatism\): Neoconservatives are liberal hawks who, exposed to menticide propaganda over time, despise war protestors and promote peace through strength, including neocolonialism and proxy war. It's the centrist, oscillating phenomena of so-called Liberalism turned bloody, routinely demanding its blood sacrifice on the so-called "altar of freedom."
- menticide/waves of terror: From Joost Meerloo's The Rape of the Mind (1956), menticide is the animal, "Pavlovian" conditioning that happens through various forms of torture, including "waves of terror," to mold an ideal subject within state mechanisms; i.e., someone not just complacent with state abuse, but complicit. Of menticide, Meerloo writes (abridged),

The core of the strategy of menticide is the taking away of all hope, all anticipation, all belief in a future [which aligns with Mark Fisher's "hauntology," or inability to imagine a future beyond past forms supplied by Capitalism; i.e., a myopia]. It destroys the very elements which keep the mind alive. The victim is entirely alone (source).

Meerloo describes waves of terror as the use of well-planned, repeated successive waves of terror to bring the people into submission. Each wave of terrorizing cold war creates its effect more easily—after a breathing spell—than the one that preceded it because people are still disturbed by their previous experience (ibid.).

- Liberalism: Not to be confused with neoliberalism (though the two generally go hand-in-hand), Liberalism is the disingenuous language of the Enlightenment becoming Americanized, then used alongside Cartesian dualism to obscure genocide under settler colonialism.
- neoliberalism: The ideology of American exceptionalism (which extends to allies of America like Great Britain) that enforces global US hegemony through deregulated/"re-liberalized" Capitalism as a structural means of dishonest wealth accumulation for the elite. Laterally enforced by state/corporate power abuse through a public conditioned by these groups to worship the free market, neoliberalism seeks to foster a centrist attitude.
- fascism: Capitalism-in-decay aka "zombie Capitalism." When Capitalism starts to "fail" (which it does by design), it creates power vacuums whose medievalist regressions reintroduce scapegoat mentalities on a state level; i.e., the Imperial Boomerang, or "Imperialism come home to empire."
- pre-/post-fascism: Pre-fascism is the Gothic imagination that historically was obsessed with the inheritance of a decaying system prior to the rise of fascism in the 18th and 19th centuries, which in turn has become post-fascism: the fear of fascism and systemic decay entertained through popular discourse and Gothic poetics in the 20th and 21st centuries, post-WW2.
- eco-fascism: The turn towards fascist rhetoric, stowed away inside nature conservatist rhetoric.

Also, familiarize yourselves with Umberto Eco's 14 Points of Fascism (from "Ur-Fascism," 1995). It's a really handy guide for spotting fascism, which tends to conceal itself or idiosyncratically manifest within centrist/neoliberal media. We don't go over all fourteen points in this book to nearly the same degree, but there are a few that I like to focus on; e.g., "The enemy is always weak and strong," the obsession with a foreign/internal plot, and the cult of machismo, etc.

"Rage Over a Lost Penny": Neologisms; or, Jargon that I Coined

"That's funny, what does it mean?"

—Ellen Ripley (to Ash, the science officer), Alien (1979)

This section dedicates to neo-jargon that I coined while writing Sex Positivity from start to finish (from 2022 to 2025). To my knowledge, they don't exist anywhere else—i.e., I didn't take these terms and reinvent them; I invented them, period. Due to their size, I've copied directly from "Paratextual \(Gothic\) Documents" on my website; they are not included in my in-book glossary (or its online version).

To it, if I had to pick one glossary definition to include, here, it would be "Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism"; i.e., it's literally the title of my book series, so I'll quote the whole thing here—expanded and updated substantially since 2023, in 2025—to account for my writing of four books after Volume Zero. Given I devised "Gothic Communism" in relation to several other key terms I also coined (e.g., "ludo-Gothic BDSM," "the palliative Numinous" and "Metroidvania," among others), I have supplied them here, too. —Perse Coined by me, Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism is the deliberate, pointed critique of capital/Capitalism and the state using a unique marriage of Gothic/queer/game theory and semi-Marxist (an-Com) ideas synthesized campily by sex-positive workers during proletarian praxis: developing systemic catharsis, mid-liminal expression during praxial opposition, using ludo-Gothic BDSM and palliative-Numinous dialogs (e.g., Metroidvania). Exploitation and liberation exist and occur in the same half-real shadow zone, on and offstage. Designed to transform neoliberal Capitalism's centrist monomyth refrains (thus fascism and Marxist-Leninism also abusing nature as monstrous-feminine), our ironic performances (of staged "exploitation" in quotes) happen by camping the canon, and do so to playfully and flexibly liberate workers and nature; i.e., through emotionally/Gothically intelligent and class, culturally and racially aware sex-positive labor (and monsters). Reclaiming these dualistic poetic devices happens in pursuit of universal liberation (no Omelas); i.e., during holistic, intersectional solidarity as punching up poetically at the state and its standard/token proponents. In turn, rebellion synthesizes daily at a dialectical-material, social-sexual and horizontal level—one unfolding anisotropically to empower all workers during calculated risk (reversing abjection, thus the terrorist/counterterrorist binary in the shadow of state force and police action); i.e., not just by sex workers in an overt sense, but all work as sexualized and alienized by capital (re: my PhD). All seek to cultivate a second-nature mentality whose gradual shifting of socio-material conditions help raise Gothic Communism from the ground up over space-time! From cops to capital to canon to states to presidents and police, then—ACAB! ASAB! ATAB! APAB (and so on)! Furthermore, development is a fundamentally genderqueer exercise; i.e., versus the state as straight, the latter enforcing straightness (not just heteronormativity but Cartesian thought and settler colonialism) per the profit motive using the state's usual tools (re: its monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital, listed in "Paratextual \(Gothic\) Documents"): to rape nature as monstrous-feminine (meaning anything not white, straight, male, Western European and/or Christian to varying modular degrees of privilege and oppression) for profit! To it, hybridity is strength through informed diversity overcoming state antagonism and betrayal, fighting fire with poetic fire; the latter extends to ghosts of capital and worker concessions haunting the process (which Derrida called "spectres of Marx" in his eponymous book on hauntology as a Communist "ghost" that cryptomimetically haunts language [re: Castricano] after the so-called "end of history"). Gothic-Communist development ultimately happens, then, by critiquing Marxist-Leninism as much as mask-off Capitalism; i.e., to cryptonymically go after token police elements and false rebellion, which both extend to ostensibly left-leaning dogmas abusing the many but also the marginalized to empower the few at the top (and their middle-class gatekeepers). Marxism gentrifies and decays like anything else, so we must camp and make it (thus Marx) gay to survive (re: "Making Marx Gay"). In short, we must make Marxism (thus Communism) sexier and less dry/more fun than Marx (and his followers) historically bothered! Though sex and force are the ancient languages of imperium and state, nothing is more policed than worker sex through state force; i.e., during an evolving state's Venn diagram of modular-yet-intersecting persecution networks. For every whore yearning to be free, there is a pimp clutching their pearls (re: the bourgeoisie and their servants privatizing nature).

Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism

(artist: Cupid Kisses)

Like the Medusa and her Aegis, then, the Gothic Communist ideology survives by endlessly mutating with past media to recultivate the Superstructure (favoring the social-sexual elements of grassroots revolution versus purely material or class reductionist ones); e.g., Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (and other useful ideas and works orbiting Marx's female forebear) per the Wisdom of the Ancients as a continuous cultural understanding of the imaginary past writ in opposition to the state as straight. Time is a circle; effectively haunting capital after different rebellious components are shattered by state forces (cops), these traitors—whether official or stochastic—help divide nature and labor with nature and labor (assimilation) to conquer (thus rape) everything for profit: the pimp versus the prostitute (and all Medusa's spectres) through various facets of abjection (us-versus-them), its broader process achieved by state-corporate models of domination (which is all that profit ultimately is). Reversing abjection effectively makes us (and our anisotropic pedagogies of the oppressed healing from rape) "Communism in small"; i.e., regardless of the traditional ways that capital and the state (a form of capital, thus police violence) try to divide and conquer us: the state cares about property and profit, not people or nature, and will privatize, exploit and destroy the latter through Man-Box thinking and "prison sex" mentalities that, however banal, uphold the status quo. In doing so, they chase the Numinous to pimp it; i.e., spectres of Caesar and the Shadow of Pygmalion pimping Galatea.

However modular and gradient, then, tokenism pursues assimilation at its core, and tokenism—precisely because it adheres to capital as a fundamentally rapacious system—is poor stewardship (which Gothic Communism challenges; i.e., having been devised to originally challenge TERFs, but consequently any form of tokenism you can shake a stick at). This conquering historically self-inflicts, including through any normativity you could think of or point towards raping labor and nature; e.g., Afronormativity but also Marxist-Leninism as a kind of "Marxist normativity" that survives beyond its heyday into its graveyard shell: as an aborted "what if?" that cannot evolve or change.

So do tankies grow brittle, disingenuous and cruel—in short, acting like Capitalism yet dressed up in different clothes pimping nature (thus workers) as nonetheless monstrous-feminine; i.e., there must always be a whore for the state to pimp and blame—one its own shallow, bad-faith practitioners can vengefully feed on to better help the state survive: as slaves to party nostalgia, exclusionism, outmoded theory and ultimately betrayal. They'll eat themselves (and blame other facets of capital during the hot potato tossing match), but not before they eat us; i.e., the better we can camp canon with ludo-Gothic BDSM and the palliative Numinous, the more we can humanize the harvest as human in the eyes of our would-be abusers (who dutifully antagonize nature and those of nature as monstrous-feminine, putting them cheaply to work). The more we do this, the better our odds of survival become while exposing their (and the state's) inhumane treatment of us while comporting ourselves as sluts; re: "to critique power, you must go where it is" and subvert what the state is trying to control using what we got, on and offstage—our bodies, identities, performances, et al. Everyone likes the whore, but for different reasons; we have the whore's revenge against the state during Gothic Communism, thwarting profit as stewards of nature (see: the Demon Module's "A Rape Reprise; or, the Whore's Paradox Having Its Revenge During Ludo-Gothic BDSM," 2024).

The following terms are ludo-Gothic but synthesize holistically with Gothic Communism's Marxist elements. Given their interrelative nature, I'm including them, too. They're also neo-jargon I personally coined in my work (save for "ludic-Gothic" and Aguirre's original definition to "infernal concentric pattern"), so I want to supply their full definitions for maximum clarity. They are shared elsewhere in abridged form, but here is the only place where I give them in full. —Perse

the Shadow/effect of Pygmalion/Galatea

Another of my neologisms (from the thesis volume), the Shadow of Pygmalion or "Pygmalion effect" is the patriarchal vision and subsequent shadow of any knowing-better "kings" of empire, thus capital; i.e., of male- and token-dominated industries inside the Man Box, wherein "Pygmalion" means "from a male king's mind," but frankly extends to all traitors (male or not): upholding profit/the status quo raping nature for profit (and those treated by the state as "of nature" for those reasons); e.g., the evil monarchs of older tombs (abstractions of the bourgeoisie in crisis and decay) occupying the same colonial territories at home and abroad across space-time (a classic example being Hamlet's father's ghost, Shakespeare's famously confusing story affording some ambiguity to the experiencing of such entities). More to the point, the gatekeepers of the elite routinely fabricate imaginary visions of the past, present and future, doing so to uphold Capitalist Realism through these ghosts; i.e., a broader pacification that includes the monomyth/Cycle of Kings, but also infernal concentric pattern and heteronormative legion(s) of monsters, invasion scenarios and escape fantasies; re: their reasoned, Cartesian treatment of nature as monstrous-feminine is heteronormative, wherein state proponents (cops) pimp and police nature out of pre-emptive revenge (and spite).

Said revenge is generational, thus taught through popular monomythic stories; i.e., whose collective abjection of nature in service to profit ostensibly spares the cop from state cannibalization: antagonize nature and put it cheaply to work through concentric tokenism; re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss, but also the various modular and interchangeable statuses for blood libel, sodomy and witch hunt accusations—as an intersectional and constantly evolving Venn Diagram of persecution networks recycling dead us-versus-them language. The inverse of the Shadow of Pygmalion (and its effect) is the Shadow of Galatea; i.e., of Medusa/the Communist Numinous (as something to chase) and spectres of Marx (as something to camp) versus spectres of Caesar (the original Pygmalion, also something to camp) existing inside the same performative zones; re: exploitation and liberation share the same spaces of performance (and their fractal recursion happening through the disintegration and rediscovery of monomythic and Promethean language).

the Cycle of Kings

Another term of mine, the Cycle of Kings is the centrist monomyth, or cycling out of good and bad kings (and the occasional queen), which extends to all the kings' white cis-het Christian men or those acting like these men, thus warrior-minded good cops and bad cops (weird canonical nerds) apologizing for state genocide through Man Box and "prison sex" mentality arguments; i.e., within hauntological copaganda dressed up in medieval language; e.g., TERFs but also other token groups in-fighting for profit, hence dressing up in bad faith. Trapped between the past and present according to "spectres of fascism" and "spectres of Marx" (which grapple, mid-kayfabe, in anachronistic language, thereby having an emphasis on the imaginary past/retro-future, aka Fisher's "canceled future," vis-à-vis Jodey Castricano's cryptomimesis), these dark reflections often trouble persons of the heteronormative persuasion versus those of a genderqueer persuasion. Either struggles to identify with themselves in relation to canonical propaganda dictating how non-standard deviations from canon must die; i.e., someone is always a cop or a victim, but generally with some sense of overlap, imposter syndrome and internalized stigma, bigotry, guilt and shame, etc.

To it, Capitalism is always in a state of emergency/exception, and this relies on the creation of monstrous enemies (and related qualities; re: internalized stigma) to turn workers against each other (the in-group and its tokenized proponents). Doing so during state decay and regeneration (feeding vampirically on workers and nature) serves to keep labor too busy to effectively challenge the elite; i.e., by warring with one another and inside-outside themselves. In turn, these inherited confusions, guilt and mistrust are used by the elite to justify their hold onto vertical power as a structure, whereupon the calamity of war-as-an-apologetic-business—of canonically whitewashing class, culture and race war (e.g., the battle-of-the-sexes or civil rights activism)—personify in theatrical wars that extend offstage, as well as total war and shadow/proxy war on the global, non-diegetic stage (or its return home via the Imperial Boomerang/military urbanism). All collectively reek from Capitalism's zombie-like bulk, its hellish orifices release Promethean "exhaust" during offshoots of the infernal concentric pattern.

the infernal concentric pattern

Described by Manuel Aguirre in "Geometries of Terror" (2008) as the final room, or rather a room that, per my arguments, conveys finality through the exhaustion of military optimism in the face of an endless, yawning dead;

where the hero crosses a series of doors and spaces until he reaches a central chamber, there to witness the collapse of his hopes; [this infernal concentric pattern has] in Gothic one and the same function: to destabilize assumptions as to the physical, ontological or moral order of the cosmos [... It is like a Mandelbrot set (left):] finite, and yet from within we cannot reach its end; it is a labyrinth that delves "down" instead of pushing outwards. From the outside it looks simple enough: bounded, finite, closed; from the inside, however, it is inextricable. It is a very precise graphic replica of the Gothic space in The Italian [...] Needless to say, the technique whereby physical or figurative space is endlessly fragmented and so seems both to repeat itself and to stall resolution is not restricted to The Italian: almost every major Gothic author (Walpole, Beckford, Lee, Lewis, Godwin, Mary Shelley, Maturin, Hogg) uses it in his or her own way. Nor does it die out with the metamorphosis of historical Gothic into other forms of fiction (source).

i.e., the infernal concentric pattern is the smoke of the ignominious dead used as a myopic screen of arrogant, Americanized Capitalist Realism—one that hides the obvious function of the free market and exploitation as an irrefutably man-made, but nonetheless brutal Cartesian, heteronormative, and settler-colonial model: profit, by any means necessary (often through a Protestant work ethic whose post-Enlightenment era of "benign" Reason demonizes medieval markers in ways useful to the state and its Radcliffean thieves; e.g., the Roman Catholics, but also the paganized Romans before them and the selectively-religious fascist "Romans" after them, etc: the First Reich, Second Reich, and Third Reich, aka Holy Roman Empire, Weimar Republic and Nazi Germany).

Furthermore, such patterns are generally archaeological and architectural in nature, speaking to the medieval idea of mise-en-abyme ("to place in abyss") and Numinous occupations with palliative therapeutic and harmful potential, alike; re: canon vs camp, during the demonic, ergodic, concentric, anisotropic, entropic and gigantic recursions at work; e.g., Metroidvania and similar Gothic castles (or otherwise haunted mighty homes' signature castle-narratives, mid-chronotope) relayed through endless inheritance and doomed heroic motion: death from the house birthing and eating you while exploring it through fatal homecomings. As things to generate and play inside for different reasons, such spaces suggest profit as normally concealing itself during the cryptonymy process; i.e., showing things normally hidden/opaque through unresolved systemic/ontological tensions, exquisitely torturous emotional distress, total imprisonment, taboo subjects, raw aggregate power, paradoxical healing and tremendous obscurity (re: darkness visible, the Black Veil, etc). The pattern, then, is Capitalism (and its deliriums) in small, hence conducive to ludo-Gothic BDSM (and calculated risk) at large when played within miniatures expressing those hypermassive/quantum things felt beyond and inside themselves.

"prison sex" mentality

Coined in my own work, "prison sex" mentality speaks broadly to rape culture as a practice; i.e., as a systemically taught and enacted approach leading towards the routine harming of others while maintaining the status quo. It is similar to the Man Box argument by Mark Greene, who—in his 2023 podcast, Remaking Manhood: The Healthy Masculinity Podcast—refers to "Man Box culture" as:

the brutal enforcement of a narrowly defined set of traditional rules for being a man. These rules are enforced through shaming and bullying, as well as promises of rewards, the purpose of which is to force conformity to our dominant culture of masculinity (source: Mark Greene's "How the Man Box Poisons Our Sons," 2019).

"Prison sex" mentality exists in quotes because it occurs inside-outside actual state-described "prisons"—said facilities (and their legends) bleeding chronotopically into the nuclear home (and onto those things in the home's shadow as a fractally recursive extension of the state and its victims/perpetrators). To it, "prison sex" mentality is the same idea as Man Box culture, except it chooses to focus less on men and more on the unequal power dynamics that occur between dimorphized workers of any sort; i.e., as trained by the state Superstructure not just to rape and kill one another in literal terms, but also theatrical language.

weird canonical nerds (versus weird iconoclastic nerds)

A term I coined while borrowing from and expanding on Cheyenne Lin's "weird nerds" phrase from "Why Nerds Joined the Alt-Right" (2023), and one I present through my usual dialectical-material approach despite the obvious social components I'm weaving into things: weird canonical nerds vs weird iconoclastic nerds, or otherwise proponents of canon vs camp in popular culture; i.e., anything that weird canonical nerds posit, their iconoclastic brethren challenge in duality.

To it, weird canonical nerds work within a toxic subset of nerd culture. Whereas nerd culture more broadly is for those who present an increased intellectual interest in a given topic—often in literature, but also popular media more broadly as something to consume, critique, or create (with iconoclastic varieties extending such matters into a spectrum of modular activism and counterculture)—weird canonical nerds are those who undermine genuine, active intellectualism; i.e., by exchanging it for dumb, hostile and even bad-faith consumerism and negative freedom for the elite. As something to blindly enjoy/endorse through zealously faithful, uncritical consumption, they celebrate the monomyth and Cycle of Kings as "good war"; e.g., Gamergate, 2014, but also TERFs and their territorial emergence in the late 2010s. Not only are TERFs, and by extension weird canonical nerds, very wide—as a practicing group of stochastic terrorists that encompasses white cis-het male consumers and women, as well as token traitors (of class, culture and race)—but they unironically lead to fascism per the infernal concentric pattern as a holistic enterprise (with Gamergate endorsed by weird canonical nerds into the 2016 election of Donald Trump, and whose neoliberal sentiments' fascist outcomes were felt throughout the consumption of media and mentality alike as things to practice).

Weird canonical nerds are systemically bigoted, pertaining to Man Box culture as something to openly endorse, or "resist" in ways that do nothing to change the status quo/avoid the infernal concentric pattern/Cycle of Kings; e.g., TERF Amazons, but also proudly "apolitical" non-feminist nerds who embody a particular status within the nerd pantheon of canonical heroes: Mega Man as a go-to centrist male hero, for instance, but also Eren Yeager as the "incel fascist" with mommy issues, or Samus Aran as the Galactic Federation's singular girl boss/white Indian, etc. All become something to endorse within critically blind portions of nerd culture that ape their prescriptive, colonial heroes within culture war dressed up as "apolitical" (the fascist ideology being secondary to the pursuit and claiming of personal power by changing one's shape and language to fit those aims; e.g., Reinhardt Heydrich as a fascist war pig [to combine Umberto Eco with Black Sabbath] who would say whatever he could to justify his own iron grip on the minds of the populace: the foreign plot inside the house, once and forever).

To this, the Gothic and its various intersections, contradictions and conflicts are embroiled within oppositional praxis for or against weird canonical nerds, hence depictions/endorsements of different monster types; i.e., that, in the white, cis-het male tradition of privilege, such persons routinely "fail up," and as success—like a whore/wife or nice house—is something they are taught to believe is owed to them (the promise of shelter and sex). Such betrayals and entitlement extend to token minorities allowed a slice of the pie, post-betrayal, but also must surrender their pie when the time comes (for which the real "Indian givers" are the settler colonist bearing false gifts: the Trojan Horse, aka the Faustian bargain, in Gothic circles).

ludo-gothic BDSM

My 2023 combining of an older academic term, "ludic-Gothic" (Gothic videogames), with sex-positive BDSM theatrics as a potent means of camp. The emphasis is less about "how can videogames be Gothic" and more how the playfulness in videogames is commonly used to allow players to camp canon in and out of videogames as a form of negotiated power exchange established in playful, game-like forms (theatre and rules). Commonly gleaned through Metroidvania as I envision it, but frankly performed with any kind of Gothic poetics, ludo-Gothic BDSM playfully attains what I call "the palliative Numinous," or the Gothic quest for self-destructive power as something to camp (the Numinous, per Rudolph Otto, being a divine force or numen tied less to the natural world [the Sublime] and more to civilization as derelict, dead and alien; re: the mysterium tremendum): a Communist Numinous/the Medusa per Barbara Creed, but not tokenized (re: the Amazon) while dancing with Hogle's ghost of the counterfeit to reverse abjection (thus profit) and shrink the state!

For further information specifically on ludo-Gothic BDSM, refer to my new webpage cataloging the subject and its history as coined and synthesized by me. —Perse

ludic-Gothic

Gothic videogames. "The ludic-gothic is created when the Gothic is transformed by the video game medium, and is a kindred genre to survival horror" (source: Laurie Taylor's "Gothic Bloodlines in Survival Horror Gaming," 2009).

the liminal hauntology of war (danger disco)

Another term of mine, one describing a half-real poetic space to heroically move through, onstage and off, and one that concerns the hauntological presence and function of a Gothic chronotope (the castle or some other war-like alien double of the nuclear home); i.e., of the Imperial Boomerang bringing monsters (and their masters) home to roost, during fascism; e.g., Tolkien and Cameron's refrain (further academic coinage on my part, specifically that of the High Fantasy treasure map and Metroidvania/shooter), per the monomyth and Promethean Quest (for power) chasing the Numinous: for different reasons during the dialectic of the alien. In turn, these translate in and out of neoliberal stories (especially videogames) into real life; i.e., during the abjection process as something to reify and further for profit raping nature as monstrous-feminine (re: "A Note About Canonical Essentialism"). Also something I call the "danger disco," or source of Numinous thrills; i.e., where the hero chases the Numinous during calculated risk: to articulate and interpret generational trauma under state confusion and duress.

military optimism

A term I wrote for a discontinued book series, Neoliberalism in Yesterday's Heroes, military optimism speaks to the half-real "gun-happy optimism of Pax Americana—i.e., that one can always shoot away the state's enemies and problems" (source: "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," 2021). This includes any scapegoats that exist in and out of media/the Superstructure and society's public imagination; i.e., between fiction and non-fiction, onstage and off; re: during Capitalist Realism antagonizing nature as monstrous-feminine, pimping it through abject (us-vs-them) revenge before repeatedly summoning and banishing it, Radcliffe-style.

(artist: Alex Ahad)

the dialectic of the alien

A term I coined to articulate the dialectic of the abjection process and venerate the Gothic—vis-à-vis Julia Kristeva, but also Frederic Jameson's "dialectic of shelter" and subsequent class nightmare (re: Postmodernism), as well as Summoning Salt's "The History of Mega Man 2 World Records" (2024; timestamp: 8:25); i.e., as a dialectic useful towards universal liberation, one concerning the alien as something to parse and arbitrate for or against abjection (as something to reverse): to hug or hate, police or liberate, the assignment of "alien" status using the same language/aesthetic of the alien, mid-play. As I write in "Brace for Impact: Some Prep When Hugging the Alien" (2024):

All in all, I live the Humanities as a ludo-Gothic means of thinking inclusively about and experiencing the Gothic first-hand (an ongoing relationship the Gothic deliberately combines—an affect); i.e., BDSM or otherwise, people work through preference and experimentation to issue public statements that are, to some degree, coded. Monsters are code for the dialectic of the alien

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

(us versus them) as taught to us through canon, power being made to flow in one direction when faced with trauma as a historical-material effect: the ghost of the counterfeit waiting patiently for revenge (state shift). The horror of the Gothic, then, is when it truly comes alive, ceasing to be a pure fiction but a nightmare that applies to us as victims of the state cannibalizing us" (source).

Ludo-Gothic BDSM, then, is a potent means of negotiating generational trauma during the dialectic of the alien; i.e., by rarefying or otherwise going where abuse (or spectres of abuse) are—mid-dialectic—to perform and interrogate shelter and alienation for development purposes: setting nature-as-alien (re: the monstrous-feminine) free from state control/pimps (re: the whore's revenge).

the palliative Numinous

A term I designed to describe the pain-/stress-relieving effect achieved from, and relayed through, intense Gothic poetics and theatrics of various kinds (my preference being Metroidvania castle-narrative vis-à-vis Bakhtin's chronotope applied to videogames out from novels and cinema and into Metroidvania).

Metroidvania (my definition, abridged)

Metroidvania are a location-based videogame genre that combines 2D, 2.5D, or 3D platforming [e.g., Dark Souls, 2009] and ranged/melee combat—usually in the 3rd person—inside a giant, closed space. This space communicates Gothic themes of

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

various kinds; encourages exploration* depending on how non-linear the space is; includes progressive skill and item collection, mandatory boss keys, backtracking and variable gating mechanics (bosses, items, doors); and requires movement powerups in some shape or form, though these can be supplied through RPG elements as an optional alternative.

Exploration pertains to the deliberate navigation of space beyond that of obvious, linear routes—to search for objects, objectives or secrets off the beaten path (source: "Mazes and Labyrinths," 2019; refer to the Metroidvania page on my website for everything that I've written on Metroidvania).*

praxial inertia

A term I coined when dealing with weird canonical nerds, praxial the resistance to/mistreatment of state-sponsored scapegoats in monomythic stories.

Tolkien and Cameron's refrains

Originally conceived of during my PhD, a refrain is a repeatable exercise that upholds Capitalist Realism, in some shape or form (though generally in videogames, per neoliberal media onwards). As I write in "A Note on Canonical Essentialism" (2024):

execution of conquest involves a map of a location, the latter filled with enemies (e.g., orcs) who must be cleared by human agents or token enforcers, doing so step-by-step, person-by-person, room-by-room to effectively "sweep" the entire area of perceived hostilities. Doing so is meant to achieve one cycle of capital in miniature; i.e., moving money through nature to achieve profit as expressed concentrically on all registers. Likewise, the basic categories of land, sexual biology and ecology manifest in a variety of refrains canonizing Cartesian dualism (and its harmful divisions) through Capitalist Realism. My book pointedly highlights two: Tolkien's and Cameron's [from Volume Zero:

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth-like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or

Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force (source). ...]

(exhibit 1a1a1h2a1 [ibid.]: [...]) Videogames are war simulators; in them, maps are built not merely to be charted and explored, but conquered through war simulations. The land is an endless site of conquest, war, rape and profit carefully dressed up as "treasure," "liberation" and "adventure," but in truth, brutalizing nature during endless wars of extermination borrowed from the historical and imaginary past as presently intertwined:

- top-left: Tolkien's refrain, "Thror's Map" from The Hobbit, 1937—source: Weta Workshop
- top-right: Thomas Happ's map of Sudra from Axiom Verge, 2015—source: magicofgames
- bottom-left: Team Cherry's map of Hallownest, from Hollow Knight 2017—source: tuppkam1
- bottom-right: Bungie's map of the West from Myth: the Fallen Lords, 1997—source: Ben's Nerdery [...]

Tolkien's refrain gentrifies war in a fantasy-themed cartography (the map of conquest in novels, movies and games, video or otherwise), which neatly and consistently divide land and occupant between good and bad, human and orc (or spider, demon, ghost, etc). Cameron's refrain, the shooter and the Metroidvania, was first inspired by Robert Heinlein before likewise being injected into popular media as conducting military optimism abroad: insectoid places to go and bomb/shoot into oblivion. Doing so happens while simultaneously popularizing it back home through military urbanism and urban warfare inside the Gothic castle (versus the land around the castle, as Tolkien tends to do; i.e., the open battlefield). There is always an enemy of nature to kill and destroy in ways that fetishize the larger alienating process, turning "empowerment" into a Promethean Quest through a Faustian bargain. It becomes Romanticized, nostalgic, endlessly remediated (a Cycle of Kings, ruins, graveyards). By extension, war is dimorphically sexualized as us-versus-them, the hunt (and its associate tensions, reliefs and anxieties) celebrated with a lucrative fakery to maintain the lie of Western sovereignty through the ghost of the counterfeit's usual process of abjection. The West, including its fantasies, remain haunted during the liminal hauntology of war as a routine appearance within a structure; e.g., Dracula's castle.

On this generic spectrum and its assorted cartographic architecture, one thing remains constant between the two refrains (and their imitators and offshoots): nature is monstrous-feminine, queer, non-white and non-Christian, etc. This includes its land and various human and non-human occupants being deliberately prepared for endless invasions and harvests by Capitalism's architects and usual benefactors: white cis-het men (and token agents) of various monomythic positions. There is a good land and a bad, a good people and a bad, a good nature and a bad, and the centrist nature of the larger structure sanctions and essentializes canonical violence by the good against the bad; i.e., reliably justifying the former invading and brutalizing the latter to move money through nature by cheapening nature. Nature becomes Hell by design, amounting to a documentation process required by Capitalism to function in essential perpetuity.

In short, nature becomes canon, a mandate for how to think, thus behave regarding the usual benefactors and victims within a settler colony and the state of exception found in or between its surrounding areas of influence. There must always be a good and bad land, but also good and bad occupants according to biology as essential (and connected to gender) in terms of a heteronormative ordering of workers within nature as something to control, thus dominate; i.e., there are white cis-het men and anything else is alien to varying degrees; e.g., white women are alien, but not as alien as trans people provided they behave within the structure. "Rocking the boat" through intersectional solidarity against capital invites collective (and selective) punishment through reactive abuse to keep these dichotomies not only installed, but constantly enforced through physical, mental and/or socio-ideological forms of menticial violence; i.e., dogma insofar as canonical essentialism aids and abets in Capitalist Realism concealing capital functioning as it always does. As something to criminalize and dominate, nature is always alien, fetishized, incorrect, criminal, outside, black, etc... (source).

the euthanasia effect (rabid token Amazons)

A term, coined by me, to describe the canonical, assimilative qualities of the Amazonian myth (and one whose Amazonomachia has canonized, post-Wonder-Woman, in Metroidvania through Cameron's refrain and—to a lesser extent—Tolkien's). It is one where magical, mythical warrior women—as simultaneously virgin/whore animal people (the female* berserk)—are canonically employed to keep men (and the victims of men/token enforcers during "prison sex" police violence) paradoxically in line, mid-panopticon; i.e., a female-coded (usually white, or token non-white) centurion or stentor girlboss who, in between yawping at the men to aurally castrate them (the banshee or siren), "tops" them in hauntological, dominatrix-style fashion, elsewhere outside the bedroom (re: Foucault): "make it through this and I'll ride you until you beg!" Death by Snu-Snu becomes the traditional hero's monomythic reward and doom; re: Irigaray's creation of sexual difference, but tokenized into a kind of virginal warrior Madonna jailor pulled from the Neo-Gothic's former dungeons; e.g., Charlotte

Dacre's fearsome and "phallic" (stabby-stabby) Victoria (see: Sam Hirst's 2020 "Zofloya and the Female Gothic" for a good summarizing of that dilemma):

Canon is heteronormative, thus dimorphic (and settler-colonial/Cartesian). There can be intersex elements, but these will be treated as "phallic," thus male/female and masc/femme during the Amazon's struggles; i.e., as a monstrous-feminine entity the state monopolizes by gaslight-gatekeep-girlbossing*

it. Such things, then, canonically embody the Amazon and Gorgon's doubled morphological conflict inside-outside itself; i.e., to simultaneously exude the psychomachy's calm/furious or virgin/whore qualities, such "mirror syndrome" (another term of mine) punching a black reflection where state victims are housed (thus useful to profit pimping nature as alien); re: the postscript from the Poetry Module's "Following in Medusa's Footsteps." Throughout BDSM and Gothic media, on and offstage, you see the euthanasia effect in Metroidvania a ton. To enhance your own ludo-Gothic BDSM (to camp subjugated Amazons with), refer to my 2025 Metroidvania Corpus for some good examples of the Promethean Quest (though my "Concerning Rape Play" compendium also raises some salient reading regarding ludo-Gothic BDSM as a whole). Apart from either of those, we'll tackle Amazons, Medusa and the monstrous-feminine revenge argument more directly in the "Predator/Prey" subchapters, in Volume One (which explore Amazons and knights). Also consider the Demon Module's "Amazons and Demon Mommies," "Vampires and Claymation," "Summoning the Whore," "Exploring the Derelict Past," and "Follow the White-to-Black Rabbit"; i.e., for good examples (outside Volume Zero) of the cop/victim approach in canonical Amazonomachia and how to subvert it to have the whore's revenge against profit! I also recommend Volume Zero's "Symposium: Aftercare" for plenty of extra lists and fun examples.

The canonical Amazon, then, is a time traveler TERF meant to serve profit by betraying her fellow oppressed (women or not). Ripped spectacularly from the ancient pre-fascist past and expressed in "ancient" fascist forms during state crisis, Red Scare employs Amazonian fascism and Communism—during the usual kayfabe centrism and anisotropic terrorist/counterterrorist refrains pimping nature on the same stage—through a black-and-red aesthetic of power and death corrupting nature for state aims: to feed on nature by triangulating against state victims "of nature," per Cartesian thought; i.e., to antagonize nature as monstrous-feminine with nature as monstrous-feminine, during the Capitalocene (from Walpole's Otranto onwards—per Hans Staats' "Mastering Nature: War Gothic and the Monstrous Anthropocene" [2016] but married, per my arguments, to Raj Patel and Jason Moore's idea of Capitalocene).

Through these dualistic poetic devices' assimilative function, the subjugated Amazon is a functionally "white" Indian/whore/savior cowgirl (token) cop who harvests the functionally "black" whore (criminal, alien, etc) during the abjection process (and its bad-faith revenge arguments; e.g., Orientalism). All happen while suffering the usual double standards and embarrassments such betrayals bring on (which camping through ludo-Gothic BDSM anisotropically reverses through the same aesthetic—shrinking profit while sending abjection back towards the colonizer agent/apparatus); e.g., Samus Aran (re: the Poetry Module's "Playing with Dead Things") but really a wide variety of such weyfu herbo monster girls upholding Capitalist Realism: by kettling therefore blaming the whore Archaic Mother/ghost of the counterfeit.

Such blaming occurs ipso facto "for its own genocide" during the Promethean Quest's infernal concentric pattern (e.g., Ayla or Savage Land Rogue; re: "Death by Snu-Snu!: From Herbos to Himbos, part two"); i.e., an eternal warrior "of nature as hellish" sent back into Hell come to Earth—all to do battle with the verminized, insectoid-chattel, stigma-animal, diseased-and-deathly Medusa on the same Aegis (the liminal hauntology of war): as her dark, Venus-twin half (the long-lost relative, often an evil/false sister or wicked step mother)! The Amazon is a "scab" operatically punching labor as alien hysterical (the wandering womb), but pulled from their ranks to do so inside the state of exception. From Radcliffe onwards, then, the Amazon is a warrior detective who canonically remains a classic pro-state actor fabricating scapegoats; i.e., from older pre-existing legends repurposed for profit now (the settler colony a chronotope danger disco).

(artist, top: ChuckARTT; bottom-left: Arvalis; bottom-middle: Flyland; bottom-right: Pagong1)

*The male version of the Archaic Mother is something I call the Dragon Lord or Skeleton King (re: the Cycle of Kings with vampiric, draconian or otherwise patriarchal versus matriarchal elements the state can scapegoat; e.g., Sauron or Count Dracula). Offshoots of said half-real monarchs are often lesser necromancers, rogues or death knights (re: offshoots of the Numinous tied to the same danger-disco structure's unheimlich nightmare home).

Being of the Medusa as Archaic Mother (re: the whore's paradox, from "Rape Reprise"), Amazons endure endless punishment from on high and down below (capital's "middle management"; e.g., Ellen Ripley); i.e., a classically female Prometheus, they are always treated as a substantial risk/desperation measure, one that must be collared just as quickly lest she "corrupt," thus take her fellow soldiers along for the ride (and back whence she came, to hellish territories, forever). In short, the Amazon is a token scapegoat witch (vampire, goblin, etc) policing other witches, therefore whores (re: me, vis-à-vis Silvia Federici, in "Policing the Whore"), and does so through modular-but-intersecting us-versus-them, white-on-black (of any sort, not just skin color) and monstrous (undead/demonic/animalistic) abjection: someone virgin/whore who, per these imbricating persecution networks, eventually exposes through Radcliffean state arbitration (demasking the villain); i.e., shown as whore and released shamefully from service (the endless oscillation used to keep such class, culture and race traitors off-balance while conditioning them to ruthlessly punch down, inside-outside the concentric frontier ghettos they patrol, mid-relegation; i.e., "good job today, bitch—kill you, tomorrow!"); re: Ellen Ripley but also future versions of the female Rambo that came after and expressed in different kinds of neoliberal Gothic's trademark fantasy-to-sci-fi language: a prison colony police agent serving the state as its token barbarian, all heroes are monsters but assimilation is poor stewardship!

(source)

As "A Note on Canonical Essentialism" describes it; re (from Volume Zero):

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth-like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force [military optimism] (source).

This is how the subjugated Hippolyta do (the queenly protagonist version of the regular Amazon; e.g., Wonder Woman)—a kind of token, monomyth, queen-for-a-day "fallen Pandora" (or Chaucer's "Thus swyved was this carpenteris wyf" line, from "The Miller's Tale"), and one whose previously established map and recursive occupants/warmongering we'll be camping more; i.e., during Volume Zero's "Scouting the Field" (rabies is bad for you) but also through revolutionary cryptonymy with subversive Amazons (a concept Volume One's "Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy and the State's Medieval Monopolies on Violence and Terror through Animalized Morphological Expression" unpacks at length; re: the predator/prey dichotomy and canonical abuse of animalized language in furtherance to profit, thus genocide, rape and war).

mirror syndrome

Another term of mine, one that occurs through the euthanasia effect; i.e., the euthanizing of token agents, ignominiously attacking their own black reflections' troubling comparison (which doubles are for). Such complicit cryptonymy happens during the abjection process/state of exception and, in effect, betraying their own interests (and those of their fellow workers and nature) for profit: Roman fools killed mid-apocalypse, during blind parody's remediated praxis (re: boom and bust).

Amazonomachia (Amazon pastiche, subjugated/subversive)

(exhibit 1a1b from [Volume Zero's "Symposium: Aftercare"]): Top half's artists, top-far-left: Michel Dinel; top-mid-left: Jiyu-Kaze; top-middle: Viviana Vixen; right: Edu Souza; bottom-middle: Nunchaku; bottom-mid-left: Edwin Huang; bottom-far-left: Frederico Escorsin. Bottom half's artist: Mika Dawn 3D.

A kind of Galatea traditionally sculpted by Pygmalion and his imitators, Amazons and their complicated pastiche embody social-sexual conflict during oppositional praxis, hence come in a variety of shapes and sizes. They are canonically war dogs of a binarized character. Most notably is the noble Athena versus the dark Medusa from the female legends of Antiquity [also, Queen Hippolyta]: the doubling of the hunter persona, a white and black wolf. Such war-boss, queen bitches canonically offer good behavior and bad behavior as our proverbial "teeth in the night" meant to serve as man's best friend in centrist theatre [and whose true rebellion goes against the elite's profit motive]...)

Not a term I coined, but one I certainly expanded on (to speak on subjugated, reactionary, TERF-style forms and subversive variants, mid-duality). "Amazon battle" is an ancient form of classical, monstrous-feminine art whose pastiche was historically used to enforce the status quo; i.e., Theseus subjugating Hippolyta the Amazon Queen to police other women (making regressive/canonical Amazonomachia a form of monstrous-feminine copaganda). With the rise of queer discourse and identity starting in arguably the late 18th century, later canonical variations in the 20th century (e.g., Marsden's Wonder Woman) would seek to move the goalpost incrementally—less of a concession, in neoliberal variants (every Blizzard heroine ever—exhibits 45a, 76, 72), and more an attempt to recruit from dissident marginalized groups. The offer is always the same: to become badass, strong and "empowered."

In truth, these regressive/subjugated Amazons become assimilated token cops; i.e., the fetishized witch cop/war boss as a "blind Medusa" who hates her own kind by seeing herself as different than them, thus acting like a white, cis-het man towards them (the "Rambo problem"): triangulating nature against nature, pimping itself for the state. In the business of violent cartoons (disguised variants of the state's enemies), characters like Ripley or Samus become lucrative token gladiators for the elite by fighting similar to men (active, lethal violence) for male state-corporate hegemony. To that, their symbolism colonizes revolutionary variations of the Amazon, Medusa, etc, during subversive Amazonomachia within genderqueer discourse.

Written Backwards: A Ship of Theseus, a Gothic Castle

"[...the infernal concentric pattern has] in Gothic one and the same function: to destabilize assumptions as to the physical, ontological or moral order of the cosmos [... It is like a Mandelbrot set:] finite, and yet from within we cannot reach its end; it is a labyrinth that delves 'down' instead of pushing outwards" (source).

—Manuel Aguirre, "Geometries of Terror" (2008)

(artist: TMFD)

In light of releasing Volume One, changes to the original manuscript have led me to address a fundamental aspect of my book's (re)construction: Sex Positivity was written backwards. For a fuller detailing of exactly how, refer to the foreword from Volume Zero, but otherwise just know that I wrote Volume Three first, followed by Volume One, Two, and then Zero. Except the writing of Volume Zero led me to reconsider Volume One as something to rewrite, simplifying my thesis in ways that I couldn't do until there was something to simplify (that was, itself, based on a previous argument: the original manifesto). This required me expanding on

Volume One to account for these changes, but also rewording older portions of it to account for synonymous terminology that, in my mind, better conveyed the manifesto's original points; i.e., swapping out old "boards" for new ones; the new timber represents the same fundamental arguments, except it has been fine-tuned—honed for further precision and specificity than when I had initially started out. In short, my humble vessel towards the end of its journey will have had most, if not all, of its original parts replaced, while more or less resembling what it once was; i.e., a Ship of Theseus, or better yet, a "flying" Gothic castle with fresh bricks. Unlike a traditional Gothic castle, my chateau's renovations aren't meant to primarily confuse and overwhelm, but reconsider my own work from new perspectives in a holistic manner through the same chambers, vistas and corridors, but also bodies.

A huge part of this reorientation owes itself to my partner, Bay. His contributions led me to reconsider my own arguments—not to completely change them, but view them from different angles and vantage points. I became inspired to expand on my manifesto and crystalize it into a pure thesis, from top to bottom over and over until I felt satisfied ...except this led me to revisit my manifesto, Humanities primer and praxis volume, leading to our aforementioned Ship of Theseus/Gothic castle! That's holism for you; or, as my thesis puts it, "Returning and reflecting upon old points after assembling them is a powerful way to understand larger structures and patterns (especially if they're designed to conceal themselves through subterfuge, valor and force). It's what holistic study (the foundation of this book) is all about." Alongside my other contributors, then, Bay's presence is felt throughout the entire book, haunting it from within. Having grown and developed inside my original construction, I reflected on Bay's haunting having joined me inside. Piece by piece, said structure changed until all the bricks were new (and stamped with Bay's friendly influence alongside my original mark).

The same idea, then, pertains to bodies as expressed between people, with you viewing a shot of a given individual under circumstances that, while similar to before, are by no means identical. Two bodies can assume the same pose and look vastly different; the same body can adopt a previous pose and yield up exciting new discoveries. Combined with my subtle retooling (and adventuresome expansions) of Volumes One, Two and Three through a sharpened thesis and manifesto, I think the benefits of applied hindsight should speak for themselves (for a point of comparison, though, compare the manifesto to the original, unmodified blogpost). Of course, you needn't recognize this hindsight to appreciate my work, but it does illustrate the subtleties of change amid consistent arguments that survive over time. For Communism to develop into itself, it will have to survive older changes that shift into future forms hitherto unimagined. To that, I am merely at the starting point of something grand, of which has already changed and evolved into something that, at its inception, I could scarce hope to imagine: a mighty cathedral, represented by our bodies, labor and relationships, abstracted into architectural forms and back into bodies again, but also theatrical exchanges held somewhere in between. Instead of spelling our doom, its "trauma" offers up the knowledge needed to set us free.

(artist: Doxxasix)

Into the Void: Losing the Training Wheels

"The future, once so clear to me, had now become like a dark highway at night. We were in uncharted territory now, making up history as we went along."

—Sarah Connor, T2: Judgement Day (1991)

As we described in the conclusion to Volume Zero ("A Gay New World"), the book so far has been a series of "booster rockets"—slowly igniting their fuel to propel you into the increasingly unknown Elsewhere of a homeland-turned-foreign:

Beyond the thesis argument and its symposium, Sex Positivity takes its time—gradually launching into its complex (ergodic) arguments through concentric, staged roadmaps. Imagine a rocket launch into space: This requires multiple stages and "boosters," meaning there's always time to abort the launch if things get hairy (source).

Except now the rockets have launched and we're hurling into deep space!

To that, I now want to take the training wheels off (for me as well as you) and explore the remaining volumes minus a tether while in free fall; i.e., not covering all my bases by including total theory (simple or complex) and instead

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

looking at examples of Gothic poetics (old or current) with a checklist to keep in mind. Otherwise, if I try to include all theory each and every time, the volumes will start to feel the same, which I don't want; but also, I want you to grow accustomed to being modular within a holistic approach that allows for intersectional solidarity while still being focused, practical and efficient, but also honest and reflective on our praxial realities.

Volume Two will examine monsters in a historical sense, and Volume Three will consider praxis in a current framework that accounts for dialectical-material struggles and scrutiny during oppositional praxis. As we move through both, I'll be covering the modules of monster classes and subclasses, and the creative successes of proletarian praxis vs state praxis. I will mention theory conversationally but also in pieces and modules that draw upon select terms. I will try to stress the ones that feel most relevant, and include additional footnotes and citations whose ideas you can trace back to my older theory-heavy volumes if you wish. But provided you have a good grasp of theory already, that shouldn't be necessary.

Instead, I want you to use Volumes Two and Three to try and focus on cultivating emotional/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness during the struggle to liberate workers under Capitalism through iconoclastic art; i.e., by focusing on confronting and interrogating state/Cartesian trauma with Gothic poetics to end Capitalist Realism with. Capitalism alienates and sexualizes everything to serve the profit motive; we must reclaim these devices through the Six Rs, thus reclaim and recultivate our socio-material conditions (camping the twin trees of Capitalism) to reunite with nature and our own alienated, fetishized bodies, labor and power as things to play and perform with. But you must go where power is, thus paradox: through chaos, darkness visible, Satanic rebellion, Athena's Aegis, etc, as a ludo-Gothic, BDSM means of reversing the historical-material process of abjection (and unironic variants of the Shadow of Pygmalion, Cycle of Kings, infernal concentric pattern, narrative of the crypt, hyperreality and astronoetics, etc) through parallel societies (chronotopes), emancipatory hauntologies and revolutionary cryptonymies.

Of course, these occupy the same shadow zone as unironic forms, so being conscious and aware is vital to dodging and upending those who would harm you and enslave the future; i.e. with an imaginary past whose Wisdom of the Ancients serves the same-old settler-colonial system of medieval abuse—its cycles of crisis and decay amounting to endless blood sacrifices that move money through nature, workers, sex and monsters, etc, as cheap, disposable; i.e., a heteronormative commodifying of worker struggles that we must change inside of itself. To liberate ourselves, we must take said struggle—and its violent, terrifyingly hellish language—back from state monopolies/trifectas, making our own pedagogy of the oppressed.

Provided you have a roadmap and some sense of competency and direction when synthesizing praxis to achieve systemic catharsis, the darkness isn't something to fear inside liminal space and its limitless ergodic motion. Instead, the change of rebellion happens through conflicting thresholds and on the surface of shared images; it becomes, like the stars, something to shoot for while rescuing Hell and its performative darkness from bourgeois forces. This must become second-nature and intuitive, hence without a harness (and rigid gameplan) anchoring you down.

To that, the boosters so far have not only given you the energy needed to rush into the raw chaos of unknown spheres; they've supplied you with the know-how to both survive and foster sex positivity in dangerous places, making them habitable/pleasurable in ways yet unimagined while striving for transparency in the face of tremendous opposition. The vast, yawning abyss needn't be terrifying if you know more or less how to proceed: without set shape but instead, like a constellation, connecting the dot-like stars, lighting up the sky.

Heads-Up (a brief refresher)

"Maybe you haven't been keeping up on current events but we just got our asses kicked, pal!"

—Hudson, Aliens (1986)

This seven-page heads-up grants several important reminders as we segue into the current volume: to give a small, two-paragraph history of the remaining three volumes after the thesis volume; a refresher on poetics and mimesis (essentially a tiny excerpt from the thesis volume's symposium); and a small selection of things to keep in mind from the thesis volume overall—namely how this book synonymizes and synergizes its terms and arguments; i.e., reading comprehension pointers.

Reminder one, our volume histories: This volume was initially written before my thesis volume, which now serves as the formalized argumentation on which these more conversational volumes presently stand: Volume Zero (which I wrote in roughly a month [from August 31st to October 8th, 2023] based on years of independent research; older blogposts, essays, and my master's thesis; and the three previous volumes' rough drafts). If you haven't read my thesis argument already or found its more academic approach too dense (it's essentially the independent-research equivalent to my PhD), you should find these volumes more conversational and poetically engaging; i.e., they literally apply my PhD's theories to Gothic poetics' application and history of application unto ludo-Gothic BDSM and different topical areas of research; e.g., Amazons, Metroidvania, zombie apocalypses, etc, but also the tokenization of those things (especially in Volume Two, part two, and Volume Three).

The manifesto/Volume One was written as a looser document that introduces our Gothic-Marxist tenets, manifesto tree coordinates (the scaffold for oppositional praxis) and main Gothic theories that, for the most part, have been on my old blog since mid-2023; but its instruction portion has been expanded on to better account for and help articulate praxial synthesis and catharsis through the cultivation of good social-sexual habits (during oppositional synthesis) that we can develop to better confront and process systemic trauma with.

The second volume, the Humanities primer/Volume Two, is largely about undead/demonic and animalistic monsters and is currently being released in pieces (sub-volumes, per module, and in on-site, per-post promo series; re: "Brace for Impact," "Searching for Secrets," and "Deal with the Devil"). Considering how the application and history of Gothic poetics is nigh-endless, I've spent a lot of time expanding on Volume Two, dividing it into three modules with separate releases, each containing a plethora of close-reads, symposiums and mini-thesis arguments; e.g., expanding extensively on my Metroidvania research³⁷.

Our final volume—Volume Three, which covers the executing of proletarian praxis in opposition to state forms—was the first volume I actually wrote, and has expanded since initially writing my manifesto and Humanities primer; i.e., it was on my blog until around April 2023, when I separated it from the manifesto along with the primer (then wrote my thesis argument). Until I started expanding Volume Two, Volume Three was the book's longest volume, and is still intended to be the most conversational and applicable in our day-to-day lives.

Newer volumes cite older volumes; e.g., Volumes One, Two and Three all borrow quotations from the thesis volume, and Volume Two, part one will cite Volumes One and Zero, and Volume Two, part two will cite part one, as well as Volumes One and Zero, etc. They also introduce new material in relation to the cited works, but generally will not introduce new foundational ideas that were not previously introduced in the thesis volume; they merely unpack said ideas and explore them further (especially during close-reads, in Volume Two, part two).

(artist: Jean-Baptiste Regnault)

Reminder two, poetics and mimesis (quoted from my thesis symposium): To be clear, as I am a ludologist, Gothicism, anarcho-Communist, and genderqueer trans woman, poiesis wasn't simply a structure for my pedagogic narrative, like Mikhail Nabokov thought of Jane Austen's novel, Mansfield

Park (1814), in Lectures on Literature (1980):

all talk of marriage is artistically interlinked with the game of cards they are playing, Speculation, and Miss Crawford, as she bids, speculates whether or not she should marry [...] This re-echoing of the game by her thoughts recalls the same interplay between fiction and reality [...] Card games form a very pretty pattern in the novel.

³⁷ Persephone van der Waard's "'She Fucks Back'; or, Revisiting The Modern Prometheus through Astronoetics: the Man of Reason and Cartesian Hubris versus the Womb of Nature in Metroidvania" (2024).

Nor was it echopraxis ("the involuntary mirroring of an observed action") according to the kind of "blind" pastiche³⁸ that plagues canonical thought and proponents of capital; i.e., an empty kind of "just playing" sans parody that stems from what Joyce Gloggin in "Play and Games in Fiction and Theory" (2020) calls "a 'traditional' understanding of mimesis" (which we repeatedly alluded to earlier when we mentioned Plato's cave/shadow play during the thesis argument):

Mimesis or imitation therefore, as one form of play, is an essential element of poiesis, or the "making" of art, which in turn is instrumental in creating what some now refer to as possible or imaginary worlds, that is, fiction.

This traditional understanding of mimesis as an essential element of poiesis places mimetic play at a more distant remove from reality than even the shadows in Plato's famous allegory of the cave from book VII of The Republic. Related in the form of a dialogue between Socrates and Glaucon, book VII allegorizes the human perception of reality, likening our reality to shadows projected on a cave wall. These shadows are perceived by human subjects, shackled around the ankles and neck and unable to turn their heads to see the puppeteers who cast shadows on the cave wall before them, which they mistake for reality. In other words, what mortals see and know is merely shadow, and this is what mimesis mimics — not reality.

Importantly, this version of mimesis and reality has long informed the marginalization or trivialization of mimetic arts as "mere play," "just games," or insignificant ludic imitations of reality. Likewise, the marginalization of play and its rejection as a serious object of study are motivated by the suspicion that play and ludic cultural forms are treacherous and capable of rendering us the dupe (source).

My own mimesis challenged these traditions. As I consumed and learned from older artists/thinkers (and their odes and homages), my own Galatean creations started to change, as did my way of thinking about the process of making them; my countless allusions and allegory became a far less traditional and far more subversively and transgressively playful mode of engagement with others—not just my family in the world of the living but also those long gone, echoing their arguments from beyond the grave: cryptomimesis, or the playing with the dead through perceptive pastiche and reclaimed monstrous language that is then used in place of the original context; e.g., queer people calling everything "gay" (space Communism) or black people using the n-word for everything versus white people wanting to do the same thing in an ignorant or hateful context.

³⁸ Pastiche is simply remediated praxis (the application of theory) during oppositional forms. This book covers many different kinds of pastiche types under the Gothic umbrella as canonical or iconoclastic: Gothic pastiche, of course, but also blind and perceptive forms of war pastiche, rape pastiche, poster pastiche, monster pastiche, disguise pastiche, Amazon pastiche, and nation pastiche, etc.

The same basic idea applies to monstrous language and materials as things to reclaim from their original carceral/persecutory monomythic functions (which we will thoroughly examine in Volume Two) or from covert/dishonest regression towards this old medieval sense of compelled BDSM and lack of consent/trust; e.g., witches as traditional scapegoats (exhibit 83a) versus regressive "cop-like" variants (exhibit 98a3) that iconoclasts subvert through various sex-positive BDSM rituals, ironic peril and Gothic counterculture (exhibit 98a1a); i.e., as a general practice that turns the death fetish or state officer/thug into something other than a fascist-in-disguise through transformative context (e.g., subversions of Shelly Bombshell or Zarya, exhibits 100c2b and 111b). This Gothic-Communist paradigm shift reclaims the unironic imagery at all levels of itself—of actual, non-consenting and uninformed enslavement, torture and rape through their associate handcuffs, leather uniforms, whips or collars; but also insignias and color codes: green and purple as the colors of envy and stigma (exhibits 41b, 94a3) but also black-and-red as pre-fascist (the Roman master/slave dynamic), anti-Catholic dogma (exhibit 11b5) eventually applied to 20th century fascists and Communists during and after WW2 in videogames (exhibit 41i/j) and other neoliberal propaganda (Vecna's D&D Red Scare schtick: exhibit 39a2). All exist together in the Internet Age along with their assigned roles—as subverted in liminal, transgressive, formerly exploitative ways (exhibits 9b2, 101c2) that often yield a campy (exhibits 10a) or schlocky flavor married to whatever unironic forms they're lampooning (exhibit 47b2). This exists in duality and opposition as a rhetorical device—a conversation, but also an argument.

For example, you've probably noticed said duality in how I alternate between labels or play around or within them when it suits me (which is often). The reason is to accommodate their natural-material functions. Language is fluid in its natural, uncoerced state; there is no "natural order" of the state's design, no "transcendental signified" that "just happens" to favor the profit motive. That is installed and enforced through a particular belief system and portioning of codified space and behaviors useful to the elite. Instead things flow in and out of each other quite organically.

Reminder three, how this book synonymizes and synergizes its terms and arguments: Regarding the above organic relationship, I've made a little heads-up guide. It includes a few useful reading-comprehension pointers when exploring my work, which has been included in Volumes One, Two and Three from Volume Zero (indented for clarity):

We'll be code-switching a lot throughout this volume when talking about some very chaotic things. So try to remember that function determines function, not aesthetics. Also remember your parent dichotomies—bourgeois/canon/sex-coercive vs proletariat/iconoclasm/sex-positive—as well as your various synonyms/antonyms, orbiting factors and related terminologies that follow in and out of each other during oppositional praxis; i.e., the productive idea of power as paradox and performance, wherein said performance's games, rules and play remain incredibly potent ways of interrogating and negotiating power yourselves; i.e., through liminal expression's doubles thereof, existing inside the Gothic mode's shadow zone: (sequenced here in no particular order):

the essentialized connecting of biology (sex organs and skin color) to gender and both of these things to the mythic structure as heteronormative/dimorphic, thus alienizing (to weird canonical nerds and everyone else) in service of the state/profit motive > a lack of dialectical-material analysis > willful ignorance/"rose-tinted glasses" to achieve class dormancy through blind "darkness visible" > Capitalism's monomyth/good war > Beowulf, Rambo > the infernal concentric pattern/Cycle of Kings and Shadow of Pygmalion > carceral hauntology/dystopia (myopic chronotopes/Capitalist Realism) > good cop, bad cop or cops and victims > assimilation > class traitor/weird canonical nerd > Man Box/rape culture > state espionage and surveillance/complicit cryptonomy > babyface/heel kayfabe > war hauntology > subjugated Amazon/mythical copaganda (female Beowulf, Rambo) > TERF > unironic ghosts of the counterfeit and the process of abjection's symbols of harm > profit, rinse and repeat versus the separation of gender and sexuality from each other and both of these things from the heteronormative mythic structure; i.e., Gothic Communism's monomorphic subversion of all of the things listed above through class war as enacted by our own weird iconoclastic nerds > spectres of Marx > deliberately active, class-conscious/campy "darkness visible" and dialectical-material scrutiny > shadow of Galatea > pro-labor espionage, revolutionary cryptonomy, emancipatory hauntology/parallel societies and chronotopes > reverse abjection > the pedagogy of the oppressed > reclaimed symbols of harm > post-scarcity

As a point of principle, I've left out some stuff and these lists in the heads-up are asymmetrical; also, I'm not going to try and include or string everything into a grand necklace/dichotomy that I then trot out each and every time a given topic comes up; i.e., the oppositional praxis of canon vs iconoclasm (as explored during the body of the thesis volume). Instead, I'm using them from a position of internalized intuition that I expect readers to learn, including relating them to parallel parent dichotomies like sex-positive vs sex-coercive, canon vs iconoclasm, bourgeois vs proletarian, as well as their orbiting factors—e.g., iconoclasm emphasizing mutual consent, informed consumption, de facto education, descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation as things to materially imagine (often through ironic parody and "perceptive" pastiche) in subversive/transgressive Gothic poetics that challenge their canonical doubles during oppositional praxis.

If you can't parse all of this intuitively then I suggest you familiarize yourself with the thesis proper and "camp map" from the thesis volume (which is available on my website; click here to access my website's 1-page promo, which contains all relevant download links/information regarding my book) [source: "Symposium: Aftercare"].

The above heads-up guide should be useful, I think, as the organic nature of existence and human society and language is aptly symbolized and demonstrated by chaos. It also, in Gothic circles, elides the organic and inorganic in ways that confound the Cartesian Revolution's chief aim: divide and conquer, map and plunder the land and its inhabits, all while quaking at the witch as an object of revenge (in both directions) or the pumpkin rotting after the harvest as intimations of Capitalism's own superstitious mortality. The occupying army is both weak and strong.

(artist: Karl Kopinski)

Concerning Monsters

"Science is real! Monsters are not!"

—the Principal, The Monster Squad (1987)

(artist: Paul Mann)

As the title might suggest, Volume Two is entirely about monsters. Specifically it concerns the modularity of monsters during oppositional praxis as a historical-material concern that evolved into present-day forms under Capitalist Realism: the state vs workers by monopolizing monsters to exploit workers with (and, per my thesis statement, sexualizing everything to serve the profit motive behind state myopias). This historical-material arrangement is profoundly ubiquitous, requiring workers to reclaim monsters (undead, demons and totems) away from the usual state monopolies of violence, terror and hellish morphological expression; i.e., during our own pedagogy of the oppressed—our anger and gossip, monsters and camp—having evolved into itself: a dialectical-material process whose oscillating interrogations (and myriad interpretations) of trauma took centuries while monsters were already evolving into state implements and canonical, singular interpretations thereof. Iconoclastic monsters, then, become flexible and productive critical lenses that raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness as something to "turn into"; or, as Volume One argues:

Contrary to Pygmalions and canonical weird-nerd culture, monsters aren't just commodities; they're symbolic embodiments of speculative thinking tied to larger issues. You don't simply buy and consume them (commodifying struggle) but use them as a means, if not to put yourself directly in the shoes of those being oppressed, then to think about things differently than you might normally. It's an opportunity to empathize with the oppressed and contribute to their pedagogy in ways that, to be frank, make you less stupid, nasty and cruel (source).

Monsters are often seen as "not real" or "impossible," relegated to the lands of make-believe and pure fantasy. Except this isn't true. In Gothic Communism, they constitute a powerful, diverse, and modular means of interrogating the world around us as full of dangerous Cartesian illusions meant to control workers by locking Capitalism (and its genocidal ordering of nature and human language) firmly in place. Good monsters become impossible, as do the possible futures they arguably represent.

Instead of saying "in a perfect world," then, we should say "a possible world"; i.e., in a better possible world, nudity (and other modes of GNC sexual and gender expression) can be exposed and enjoyed post-scarcity and not be seen and treated as inhumanely monstrous (a threat; e.g., bare bodies being a threat to the pimp's profit margins). Rather, the monstrous language remains as a voice for the oppressed to flourish with; i.e., a de facto (extracurricular) means of good education, deliberately raising awareness and intelligence among intersectional, solidarized workers in the face of state tyranny. As I write in "Bushnell's Requiem: An Ode to a Martyr" (2024):

terror is a weapon. So is counterterror. The elite mandate and control these voices through violence, which they will use to silence those who speak out; i.e., with the thunder and prolificity of arms. Except you can't kill monsters, merely adopt them to causes that suit your aims. Like Medusa and her immortal, severed head, Bushnell's doom isn't something the elite can ever hope to control because it reverses the [anisotropic] function of terror and counterterror normally envisioned and entertained by Western dogma; i.e., vis-à-vis Weber's monopoly of violence and Joseph Crawford's invention of terrorism, but also Asprey's paradox of terror as a proletarian weapon in a postcolonial age informed by past struggles surviving under modern empires (source).

Monsters cannot be destroyed, then, only repurposed towards different anisotropic³⁹ aims that guide the flow of power in a given direction, mid-polarity. For the state, a particular arrangement will always come back, and proletarian forms—the spectres of Marx—are equally die-hard. We must replace the former with the latter, camping canon through monsters that channel the status quo as a flow of information, materials, power and education, etc.

Open monstrous sexuality, then, isn't the end of the world as Capitalist Realism would treat it as (a world where such things are impossible save as shackled commodities that uphold the status quo), but the start to what the elite want us to think is "perfect," thus "impossible": humanizing the harvest of fruit-like bodies laid low by Capitalism's habitual reaping.

(artist: EXGA)

Another point I wish to make before we jump into the primer is the value of monsters, of Gothic poetics during oppositional praxis/synthesis. When limited to singular, essential interpretations, we become inflexible and rigid, but also alienated

³⁹ From Volume One:

I've repeatedly said that function determines function. Another way to conceptualize this is flow determines function. That is, during oppositional praxis' dialectical-material struggles, terror and counterterror become anisotropic; i.e., determined by direction of flow insofar as power is concerned. Settler colonialism, then, flows power towards the state to benefit the elite and harm workers; it weaponizes Gothic poetics to maintain the historical-material standard—to keep the elite "on top" by dehumanizing the colonized, alienating and delegitimizing their own violence, terror and monstrous bodily expression as criminal within Cartesian copaganda (source: "A Deeper Look at Cartesian Trauma in Rape Culture").

Humanizing monsters challenges the flow of power in service of workers, not the state.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

from what else exists that we could become. Instead of one essential option that never changes, then, we open ourselves up to the realm of infinite possibility with endless potential and options to choose from, insofar as humanizing ourselves through Gothic poetics is concerned (this is my longest volume for a reason; the modules are easy enough to organize, but the number of monsters, like the human imagination, is without limit). It should be enjoyed and appreciated as such, not shunned and punished. Indeed, it is our greatest strength⁴⁰—to transform and resist canonical subjugation by liberating ourselves (and our judgement as trustworthy) with iconoclastic art; i.e., by subverting the means of domination through our own prolific, variable confrontations with and interrogations of psychosexual trauma, a pedagogy of the oppressed: to teach the world to be better by disobeying state mandates, taking control of our own bodies and their potent ability to express our concerns to the world while developing Gothic Communism. Rape is everywhere; so are the monsters we need to free ourselves with—from constraints, from shame, from oppression.

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

⁴⁰ From my thesis volume:

State proponents are straw dogs (throwaway effigies)/sacrificial roosters, believing themselves immune to the elite's gain while the owner slits the faithful worker's throat sooner or later. Their "greatest strength" is actually what dooms them to an ignominious death: complete alienation driven by a dimorphic connecting of everything to biological sex, skin color and their canonical-monstrous connotations in service of the profit motive but refusing to scrutinize things at a dialectical-material level (willful ignorance/"rose-tinted glasses"). Conversely our greatest strength as class-/culture-conscious class warriors is our "darkness visible" doubling theirs through the Wisdom of the Ancients as something to cultivate relative to the modern world; i.e., our deliberate, cultivated ability to critique capital and its agents/trifectas through dialectical-material scrutiny and iconoclastic, campy behaviors that synthesize the Superstructure to our purposes (rehumanizing ourselves by separating from the colonial binary in monomorphic fashion) all while suffering the fools of canonical tragedy and farce within canonical historical materialism. Our aim is to "make it gay" by reclaiming the Base through our Four Gs: abjection, hauntology, chronotopes and cryptonymy—but also our Six Rs, or Gothic-Marxist tenets of Gothic Communism during oppositional praxis as something to synthesize (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

We Are Legion: So Many Monsters, So Little Time

*I'll wipe away all trivial, fond records,
All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past,
That youth and observation copied there,
And thy commandment all alone shall live
Within the book and volume of my brain*

—Hamlet, Hamlet (c. 1599)

I love monsters and sex (who doesn't?). I also think they're the ticket to solving the thing that ails us (Capitalism). Except, while time is of the essence and I want to list all the monsters that I can, we simply won't be able cover them all. There's just too many to even remotely consider that. However, I will try to cover as many as possible in liberation of sex workers. In fact, I was trying to, and wanted to limit it to modules, but through my typical backward and holistic approach eventually thought of different ways that monsters can be applied. So already large, the volume ballooned; I wanted to quickly put that into perspective.

(artist: SGT Madness)

I've spent my life consuming monsters and later studying them ("benefits of a classical education"), so we'll definitely cover the classics from different centuries the way I was taught at MMU—in modules. We'll also go over the Humanities; i.e., as a means of critical thought that predates Capitalism but survives inside it through monstrous signifiers:

indicative of schools of thought that, not just promoting a delivery style (the Schools of Terror and Horror from Radcliffe and Lewis), but also more recent critical theories (the Four Gs) with which to look through monsters as critical lenses.

In other words, if monsters are the lenses, then the theories are points of view with which to apply them. Except we'll also involve non-academic ways to look at, and identify with, monsters; i.e., monsters as emblematic of sex worker identities from different time periods, commercialized by capital mid-crisis through the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection (for us, this mainly concerns the monstrous-feminine, but that manifests in a billion different ways—next page...).

So yeah, there's a lot of ground to cover—a fact not aided by the book's holistic nature. I could, if I chose, write an entire book about just Frankenstein (1818) or Alien (1979), or just zombies, demons, or anthromorphs; but diversity is strength amid intersectional solidarity so I want to include a lot of different hermeneutics (study approaches) and schools of criticism, to boot! It's enough to make a girl weep... but I love it! Being a weird nerd obsessed with death rituals designed to relieve stress, fuck hard, and further class war through cultural Gothic signifiers is just my game:

(artist: SGT Madness)

Normally this is manageable, as theory is knowledge to apply in the real world and knowledge is limited. The problem is, the Gothic applies knowledge through imagination, which knows no boundaries a priori, but is further enlarged by Capitalism's measureless cruelty and Humanity's sexual desires (which are also endless) as enslaved by capital or at least under it; i.e., the ghost of the counterfeit and the process of abjection tailoring the Gothic towards the British and American middle class; e.g., during hijacked village-life rituals that scapegoat a particular group as the beautiful sacrifice or fetishized object of death: Halloween and witches, commodified by capital to give anxious Americans (and their allies) a means of quick, cheap, replicable release during times of state crisis, decay and moral panic. This extends to and comments on symbols of superstition during witch hunts as speaking to larger aspects of settler-colonial genocide, of intersectional bias and axes of oppression... which of course means there's a praxial double (canon vs camp). Think infinity then double it:

(exhibit 33b1a: Artist: SGT Madness. There exist endless ways to artistically present anything in the world. For us, that includes one monster from one time period in a particular style tied to a given holiday as combined together in a dialectical-material argument; i.e., Halloween and monster girls; e.g., in a monochromatic 1960s cartoon style with Ben Day dots. Nature is monstrous-feminine, insofar as Cartesian thought alienates and fetishizes both it and labor universally to serve profit through death fetishes adjacent to genocide as abroad, but felt during state crisis at home [fascism is Imperialism come home to empire] to a captive audience: death-sex comfort food in all the traditional ways. Except people can also respond to and during a given cycle in sex-positive or sex-coercive ways using porn-to-art as liminal expression, which again, are all gradients with infinite variation between them! Pastiche is remediated praxis; capitalists use monsters to drive money through a finite web of life; immortal monsters live and *replicate endlessly in markets driven by inheritance anxiety and latent rebellion.

And so on...)*

From the Salem Witch Trials to Howard Zinn's A People's History of the United States, commodifying struggles is America 101. Except beyond Halloween and the ghost of the counterfeit/process of abjection, there's also medieval expression defaulting to paradox, time being a circle (historical materialism) predicated on dialectical-material forces, and the various reading guides I've written and citations from my other volumes and written sources. Also, I just love monsters and could spend my whole life writing about Amazons and Metroidvania (the latter which encourage recursive ergodic motion through boundless Numinous feelings). It was basically if the Grinch's dick grew three sizes that day and then kept at it with a nasty case of priapism.

(artist: SGT Madness)

Simply put, there's a million uses to one monster and monsters you didn't even know (or want to know) existed and kid-friendly versions and adults-only versions (if something exists, there is porn of it, or gender swaps of it, or canon or camp of it...) and palimpsests that stack on top of each other and castles (of castles of castles...). It really just goes on and on and I love it, but wanted to address here just why there's so much going on with the one's we have, and why I've probably left out your childhood favorite. Any bestiary is, like Hamlet's commonplace book, a scrapbook to fill to the brim, but is forever incomplete; so was his, and still Hamlet was Shakespeare's longest (and most quoted/popular) play. It became a madness that seemed to go on endlessly.

We likewise have our own madness, are pushing with our monasterial codex towards something great; i.e., a Communist Numinous we can touch on and brush against its massive vagueness and repetition (the Gothic caters to disintegration) through the monstrous power of suggestion. And yet, we're also touching on something that can be expressed by any monster through any worker alive (or once alive) to speak to a better future conceived through a shared imagination, a cultural understanding of the imaginary past as endlessly updating itself through constants and variables, mistreatment and healing. I've tried to account for that by including as many monsters as possible. For it, this is my largest volume in the Sex Positivity series, and also my favorite. I really hope you enjoy!

Table of Contents

I am the table! —James Hetfield; "The View," on Metallica's Lulu (2011)

(model and artist: Sinead and Persephone van der Waard)

Please note: The table of contents per volume will only contain its volume's summary and list of chapters/subchapters (with Volume Two's sub-volume's limited to the contents of a given sub-volume). To access the entire list of volume/chapter summaries for Sex Positivity and its full table of contents, a separate PDF can be downloaded from my website. Click here to access my website's 1-page promo, which contains all relevant download links/information regarding my book. —Perse

—Volume Two: Monsters, part two: Gothic Poetics, Their History—

Monster Volume Outline, part two

\(Module Three\) Demons: From Composites and the Occult to Totems and the Natural World

- Of Darkness and the Forbidden: A Demon Symposium
- Forbidden Sight, Faust and the Promethean Quest; or, Knowledge and Power Exchange
 - Forbidden Sight, part zero: A Rape Reprise; or, the Whore's Paradox Having Its Revenge During Ludo-Gothic BDSM \(feat. Nyx\)
 - Forbidden Sight, part one: Idle Hands Are the Devil's Workshop; or, Weapons in Clay and Even More Playtime: the Monstrous Prostitution of Blood Libel and Its Violent, Demonic Revenge
 - Idle Hands, part zero: A Cheat Sheet; or, Some Larger Thesis Arguments/How We'll Apply Them to Blood Libel and Demons at Large
 - Idle Hands, part one: Amazons and Demon Mommies
 - Prefacing Medusa: to Bay
 - On Amazons, Good and Bad, part one: Always a Victim \(feat. Medusa, Aliens\)
 - On Amazons, Good and Bad, part two: Reclaiming Amazons; or, Cops and Victims
 - Cops and Victims, part one: the Riddle of Steel; or, Confronting Past Wrongs \(feat. Amanda Nicole\)
 - Cops and Victims, part two: Our Sweet Revenge; or, Being Ourselves While Reclaiming Anal Rape, mid-Amazonomachia \(feat. Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart\)
 - A Paucity of Time: Addressing the Rest of the Demon Module's Relative Brevity
 - "I'll See You in Hell": Dark Faeries and Demon Mommies
 - Darkness Visible: Dark Faeries \(feat. Annabel Morningstar, Harmony Corrupted, Romantic Rose, The Witch, and more\)
 - Trial by Fire: Demon Muscle Mommies \(feat. Lady Hellbender and Hela, The Shape of Water\)
 - Idle Hands, part two: Vampires and Claymation \(feat. Takena's "Midnight Vampire"\)
 - Prefacing Tolkien: to Harmony/Concerning Big Black Dicks and "Anti-Semitism" vs "antisemitism"
 - Idle Hands, part three: Goblins, Anti-Semitism and Monster-Fucking \(feat. Tolkien's orcs and goblins, acid Communism, and SpongeBob SquarePants\)

- From New to Old: Concerning the Rest of the Module
- Forbidden Sight, part two: Making Demons \(re: Prometheus\)
 - Foreword: To Mary Shelley
 - "Fire of Unknown Origin": Composite Bodies, Golems and Mad Science; or the Roots of Enlightenment Persecution in the Promethean Quest \(feat. Mary Shelley, Frankenstein and Ridley Scott\)
 - Afterword: A Further Note on Angry Gods \(and Playing with Them, feat. Cuwu\)
- Forbidden Sight, part three: Summoning Demons \(re: Faust and Radcliffe\)
 - Raw Deals, Impostors, the Occult and Death Curses; the Demonic BDSM of Canonical Torture vs Exquisite "Torture"
 - Whores and Faust: Summoning the Whore/Black Penitent \(feat. Ann Radcliffe, Matthew Lewis, Doctor Faustus, Alan Rickman, Roger Ebert, John Landis' Animal House, Kevin Smith, and more\)
 - The Road to Hell; or, Summoning the Whore, Ourselves \(and Other Considerations of the Faustian Bargain vis-à-vis the Participants\)
 - Going Mask-Off: Showing Jadis' Face while Doubling Them
 - Dark Shadows: The Origins of Demonic Persecution and Camp; or, Applying My Education \(from School and Jadis\) to Smile, Evil Dead and More
 - Exploring the Derelict Past: the Demonic Trifecta of Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons; or Enjoying Yesterday's Exquisite Torture on the Edge of the Civilized World
 - Radcliffe's Refrain \(reprise\)
 - "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part zero: Derelicts, Medusa and H. R. Giger's Xenomorph; i.e., the Puzzle of "Antiquity"
 - "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part one: Non-Magical Damsels and Detectives \(feat. Out of Sight, Nina Hartley, Velma, and Zeuhl\)
 - "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons," part two: Demons and Dealing with Them; or Abandonment, Dark Worship and Vengeful Sacrifice When Dissecting Radcliffe \(feat. Ridley Scott's The Terror and Alien: Covenant, Ninja Scroll, The Dark Crystal, and Harmony Corrupted\)
 - Afterword: In Measured Praise of the Great Enchantress \(feat. Ann Radcliffe, Sailor Moon, The Ronin Warriors, and Harmony Corrupted\)

- Call of the Wild; or Sex Education: Trans-forming the World through the Trans, Intersex and Non-binary Mode of Being
 - Call of the Wild, part one: Hunter and Hunted; or, Nature vs the State
 - Call of the Wild, part two: Dark Xenophilia; or, "Far Out, Dude!" Monster-fucking and Magic Girls Helping Foster Dark Radical \(Communist\) Empathy During Healthy Sex Education \(for Children and Young Adults into Adulthood\)
 - Dark Xenophilia, part one: Monster-Fucking and Furry Panic \(feat. Lycans, Chimeras, and Sentient Animals; e.g., Cuwu, "Pelts," Erika Eleniak, Sonic the Hedgehog and Pippi Longstocking\)
 - Dark Xenophilia, part two: "Follow the White-to-Black Rabbit"; or Magic, Drugs and Acid Communism \(feat. the Monstrous-Feminine of Magic Girls, Unicorns and Xenomorphs\)
 - Saying Goodbye: Onto Better Times Ahead \(and Harder Ones\)

The Future Is a Dead Mall; or Reviving the Zombie Future with Proletarian "Archaeologies": Revolutionary Cryptonyms that Defy Snobbish Critics of the Gothic to Break Capitalist Realism

The Caterpillar and the Wasp; or, What's to Come

Keyword Glossary

Acknowledgements

About the Author

(artist: Drooling Red)

Volume Two, part two: Gothic Poetics, Their History

"But you're dead! You can't taste, can't smell!"

"Ah, but I remember!"

—Schmendrick the Magician and the Skull, The Last Unicorn (1982)

(artist: Quinnvincible)

Volume Two's poetry and monster modules encapsulate Gothic poetics from two different ends; i.e., that which collectively concerns the imaginary past as something to reclaim and cultivate for a more intelligent and empathic Wisdom of the Ancients, pedagogy of the oppressed, etc. As such, Gothicists fear the return of a barbaric past; the way to escape that under Capitalism is to break Capitalist Realism—i.e., by studying the imaginary past as something to learn from and create new liberatory forms of "enslavement" with. Part one explores the usage of medieval poetics (of monsters, magic and myth) when making new proletarian histories (the Gothic—of which the Neo-Gothic revives in the present); part two reverses the arrangement, examining the history of these monstrous poetics in two basic modules that future workers can learn from while thinking like Gothic poets—through monstrous creation that represents struggle through monstrous identity as paradoxically pleasurable, cathartic.

When there's hell to pay and Medusa's out for blood, neither oral nor written traditions are enough to avoid state shift by themselves; they must be combined and considered as such: a new combination of both to avoid disaster with—holistically pushing for post-scarcity as something whose slow-but-steady progression moves as quickly away from older harmful systems as it can. This includes the uncontrolled chaos of the natural world as enslaved by Cartesian forces. Capital is an old, brutal system that enslaves nature to profit from its cheapening (thus genocide). We want to be stewards of nature (thus ourselves) by transforming capital (and "Rome") from within using Gothic poetics as oral and written, half-real.

Monster Volume Outline, part two

"Didn't you just love the picture? I did! But I just felt so sorry for the creature at the end!"

"What'd you want, for him to marry the girl?"

"He was kind of scary looking, but he wasn't really all bad! I think he just craved a little affection! You know—the sense of being loved, needed, wanted?"

—The Girl and Richard Sherman, The Sever-Year Itch (1955)

This is the volume outline for Volume Two. The first half will be the same for part one and part two's sub-volumes, summarizing the goal of the whole volume; the second half will list and summarize the main chapters/modules per volume half.

Capitalism leads to universal alienation, sexualization and fetishization to serve profit, which has a functional opposite—worker liberation. This means that monsters speak to the evil in and around us as a historical-material consequence of those dialectical-material forces. They take infinite forms, but do fall into some fairly distinct classes.

To that, Volume Two is composed of various essays/chapters, but primarily three modules that divide the volume in two, before segueing into Volume Three: our Poetry Module and Monster Modules, which holistically invite readers to partake in all monsters to find what is useful between them. That is, rather than focus on one exclusively for the entire book, my focus is diversity-as-strength to contribute towards monstrous pedagogies of the oppressed; i.e., on holistic modularity with emphasis as needed to better illustrate (thus achieve) intersectional solidarity through oppositional praxis, mid-synthesis. To that, I implore you to try things out—to mix, match and combine rather than specialize in just one, when making your own. Most people have a preference, but most monsters are also quite flexible, walking the line between demon, undead and/or animal during the Gothic's fatal nostalgia and "exploitation" put into quotes; the more flexible the monster, the more flexible the mind using it as a critical humanizing lens. I try to cover the classic monsters, here, but may leave something out:

(artist: Oh No Justino)

The state and workers are always at odds; the Gothic fixates on nature as fetishized and alien (monstrous-feminine) to better notify workers of the state in decay—i.e., as data that manifests linguo-materially as pain, stress and death in various half-real forms (meaning "between fiction and non-fiction"). The Poetry Module focuses on the poetic procedure regardless of the monster type; by comparison the Monster Modules consist of two primary halves—undead and demonic—of which animals (and other nature-themed beings) are included in the demonic side. This being said, there is an undead component to nature-as-alien being harvested by Cartesian forces, leading my thesis volume to argue (and my manifesto to both simplify and expound upon):

As a kind of deathly theatre mask, something else that's equally important to consider about demons and the undead (and which we'll bring up throughout the entire book) is that animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms; i.e., stigma animals relayed through demonic BDSM and rituals of power expression and exchange that embody hunters and hunted, predators and prey that play out through the ongoing battles and wars of culture, of the mind, of sexuality and praxis as traumatized: marked for trauma or by trauma that parallel our green and purple doubles onscreen.

So when I say "animalized" vis-à-vis Gothic aesthetics, this is predominantly what I mean (source).

All monsters are alien; Capitalism, Volume One argued, chattelizes workers to serve profit, making them (and those peoples and places in connection with them) alien and fetishized, thus ready to be abused in all the ways that Capitalism demands in order to profit. In turn, power and material flow towards the state through the ghost of the counterfeit's process of abjection; i.e., by sexualizing everything to serve profit through Gothic poetics that flow power towards the state. As my thesis statement from Volume Zero argues:

Capitalism dimorphically sexualizes all work to some degree, including sex work, resulting in sex-coercive media and gender roles via universal alienation through monstrous language; this requires an iconoclasm to combat the systemic bigotries that result—a (as the title reads) 'liberating of sex work under Capitalism through iconoclastic art.' Gothic Communism is our ticket towards that end (source: "Thesis Statement").

All in all, the Gothic plays with the past as monstrous. Put in more blunt language, the monstrous past becomes something to, at times, quite literally fuck with, mid-consumption; i.e., in ways that cross undead, demonic and animalistic forms during a social-sexual ritual of some kind or another as meant to humanize the dehumanized: the alien, the other as normally ripe for slaughter by Cartesian forces, but for us expresses in delicious, food-like forms of theatre that are quite old—the Comedy and the Drama, but also the Ancient Romance revived in Neo-Gothic forms. On the Internet, workers can take things further than historical forms have dared to. We can embody the imaginary past as something to recultivate in ways that change the flow of things by literally fucking with it ourselves:

(exhibit 33b1b: Model and artist: Jericho and Persephone van der Waard. Often, an effective way to humanize monsters is to romance them; e.g., Beauty and the Beast or The Creature from the Black Lagoon [1954]. However, those narratives "transform" the monster, either killing/banishing them [as with the Creature] or converting them into an acceptable human shape [the Beast]. The latter is as much a historical-material concession of the princess as it is the monster itself: the canonical "kissing of toads," hoping they turn into princes [which isn't really fair to actual toads or those who identify with them. Indeed, many monster-fuckers hope the monster stays exactly the way it is].)

These are the primary sections/chapters of part two of the volume. Modules are sections that concern multiple chapters (which divide into subchapters that I will not list/summarize here):

"A Cruel Angel's \(Modular\) Thesis"; or, the Broad-Stroke Nature of Holistic Instruction: Camping "Rape" as Food for Thought Regarding the Monster Modules: Gives a new thesis argument to keep in mind; i.e., when examining the modular and intersectional histories of Gothic poetics.

The Undead \(module\): This module explores the undead as creatures driven less by active intelligence and more by a desire to freeze and feed in the buried presence of trauma and harmful conditions. It explores how the state's monopolies lead to a state of exception within its sites of settler-colonial violence, which in turn create a violent upheaval/silent scream among the oppressed and oppressors alike; i.e., the voice of colonial trauma and the vengeful, desperate feeding on the living by the undead as the genocided dead, having come home to roost—zombies. However, the alienation and feeding also affect the ruler class, leading to vampirism as a canonical effect that must be personified in healthier forms of medieval nostalgia that, for their usual logical motions, become ghost-like, copied and imperfect. Reclaiming these modules requires embodying and subverting the very traumas the state relies on to control us by keeping us hungry and braindead (a process I call "lobotomization")—to, as the undead generally do, paralyze our prey and feed on their frozen bodies, albeit in ways that pointedly develop Gothic Communism.

Demons (module): This module explores the poetic history of demons; i.e., as actively cunning-yet-alien shapeshifters. Canonized as treacherous within transactional dialogs of forbidden, unequal exchange (of power, knowledge and darkness) and permanent transformation, demons frequently yield a repressed desire for radical change haunted by systemic abuse; i.e., of rape and revenge as things to canonize or camp through the Gothic mode: as untrustworthy beings made deceitful and torturous through the ghost of the counterfeit's process of abjection. As such, we'll consider the subversive, cryptonymic potential of demons; i.e., to reverse abjection through revolutionary cryptonymy's double operation (to conceal and reveal taboo subjects), all while dealing with state doubles (re: DARVO and obscurantism, including tokenized variants). Be those people, places or something in between (the chronotope and its castle narrative/mise-en-abyme), we'll do so through their classical function—as seductive, mendacious granters of dark wishes, including fulfilling the whore's revenge: of nature policed, thus pimped, as monstrous-feminine by the state for profit, which the demon (as a vengeful, monstrous-feminine whore) challenges said motive (and its raping of nature) in favor of something better.

To it, we'll explore the dark, hauntological creativity and endless morphological variety of demons, but especially how they manifest and behave; i.e., as a vengeful, nebulous, psychosexual matter of exchange, transformation and desire, onstage and off, during ludo-Gothic BDSM and liminal, half-real expression: composite bodies like cyborgs, golems and robots that are built with mad science (the Promethean Quest), occult beings that are summoned and dealt with (the Faustian Bargain), or overtly natural totems that are hunted down within nature-as-alien.

"The Future Is a Dead Mall" (chapter): Monsters are classically devalued outside of canonical forms utilized by state forces, which leads to Capitalist Realism under the current order of things. To critique Capitalism, then, we must critique people's devaluing of the Gothic or otherwise misusing/scapegoating it for Capitalism's woes: Radcliffe, but also Coleridge and Jameson's own complicit cryponymy. Through a cultivated Wisdom of the Ancients (a cultural understanding of the imaginary past), we can confront Capitalist Realism through the monsters normally pitted against us instead of speaking for us and nature as exploited by the elite. It becomes something to synthesize through our creative successes' revolutionary cryponymy—a concept we'll explore entirely in Volume Three while reflecting on Volume Two's monstrous histories (and theories from Volume One and Zero).

"The Caterpillar and the Wasp; or, What's to Come" (conclusion): A conclusion to the volume based on its contents, but highlighted through medieval expression and a coda (the caterpillar) to encapsulate everything the volume has discussed moving into Volume Three.

Capitalism treats bodies as monstrous to compel and enslave workers through set intended uses that serve the profit motive (thus genocide) through Cartesian thought; we, to liberate them using the same language—our bodies and poetic extensions of them and their sexualities, genders and orientations serving as a potent, emergently playful means: of storing and exchanging precious forbidden data per outing to challenge Capitalist Realism as a settler-colonial project. In this volume, then, we'll be playing with monsters you'll undoubtedly have seen before (often as little [sex] toys), but will be asked to think about now in ways that may seem new and strange to you and me (and I've been doing this awhile); re: "Returning and reflecting upon old points after assembling them is a powerful way to understand larger structures and patterns (especially if they're designed to conceal themselves through subterfuge, valor and force). It's what holistic study (the foundation of this book) is all about." The shape doesn't matter provided the function (and flow of power) is consistent—for and towards workers united in a Cause that is in-the-flesh, intuitive, second-nature. The continual idea, then, is a constellation to reassemble and reflect on trauma in a holistic manner using monsters to liberate workers (and their bodies) with; i.e., to illustrate mutual consent with Gothic poetics to break Capitalist Realism once and for all. "New vistas of reflection," indeed!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

"A Cruel Angel's (Modular) Thesis"; or, the Broad-Stroke Nature of Holistic Instruction: Camping "Rape" as Food for Thought Regarding the Monster Modules

*Per my thesis statement, Capitalism sexualizes everything in a heteronormative (vertically arranged, sexually dimorphic) scheme; canon achieves heteronormativity by essentializing biology, ecology and geography (economics, etc) in equal measure in order to achieve and maintain a Cartesian outcome: domination of the natural world (and workers) to serve profit. This happens through the routine gendering of Nature vs Society (vis-à-vis Raj Patel and Jason Moore) by Cartesian thinkers; i.e., in ways that men like Francis Bacon and René Descartes started, but continue to remain relevant under Capitalist Realism as a more recent affair that neither patriarch lived to see: a raping of nature as Promethean, meaning in this case "primed for abuse, ad nauseum." Nature is Medusa; Medusa must obey and die (over and over).*

In turn, said Realism yields neoliberal fantasies (often videogames) that present nature as good or evil in essential terms, and by extension, gendered ones that are biologically and ecologically divided along problematic moral categories whose territory is geared towards a settler-colonial outcome: the mapping and execution of conquest, thus genocide through us versus them, reliably framing "us" as human and "them" as inhuman through various black-and-white binaries that serve capital, thus empire (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "A Note About Canonical Essentialism" (2024)

Please note, I wrote the Monster Modules over a year-and-a-half ago. The raw theory is there, but the historical arguments aren't aimed at specific recipients of state violence so much as I try to holistically consider all of them per intersectional solidarity as something to achieve together during Ludo-Gothic BDSM;

i.e., built on older monstrous histories: learning to camp rape and find our power during liminal expression/Gothic counterculture as a sex-positive force. Think of my various staged critiques being aimed at the middle class as the gatekeepers of capital, decaying and tokenizing (non-white and gender-non-conforming traitors of class, race and culture) to attack the elite's enemies by virtue of profit requiring enemies to exploit: nature as monstrous-feminine; e.g., Sigourney Weaver's GNC, Tim-Curry-tinged 1983 shoot with Helmut Newton clearly having inspired their 1984 possession as the Gozer of New York: Zuul being Medusa-by-another-name.

(source: Kino Images)

As such, a lot of what follows paints in broad strokes regarding said history as it applies differently for various exploited groups; i.e., under the same predatory system relative to our Four Gs, Six Rs, Gothic mode of expression, etc; e.g., masks and revolutionary cryptonymy as something we can weaponize for ourselves:

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

In short, these modules have a symposium style-flavor I want to preserve; I won't be stressing particular theories like cryptonymy or terms like monstrous-feminine, as we've already talked about them extensively across multiple chapters and book volumes. Instead, I'll be focusing on holistic expression per the monster classes as dualistic poetic devices. Any oppressions I express here, then, should apply intersectionally to white women, people of color, non-Christians, GNC people, disabled persons, etc, but it will apply to each differently! I want to focus on universal liberation vis-à-vis iconoclastic art, generally by considering sexuality and gender expression as canonically enslaved per the process of abjection; i.e., as attacking the ghost of the counterfeit through cryptomimesis, the narrative of the crypt and Cycle of Kings, etc, as forever serving profit. I'll try and mention these and other past concepts at least once, and consider locations—e.g., castles, prisons, what-have-you—but the monsters remain the main focus, here (simply pick your poison and go to town, lovelies).

(artist: Les Edwards)

Likewise, my focus challenges Capitalist Realism by camping Marx with Gothic Communism as a genderqueer BDSM-meets-ludology hybrid in the Internet Age; i.e., as something to take advantage of for workers by workers. To that, Marxist analysis with Gothic poetics dates back to the man himself, but also contemporaries; e.g., Gogol's Dead Souls (1842) writing about the exploitation of serf numeration as a predatory necrometrics designed to enrich a predatory mid-level state official. There's truly nothing new under the sun as far as that goes and the Internet is a powerful tool for finding whatever you need (until today I had no idea who Helmet Newton was, for example). So take whatever I supply here and close-read whatever you like—from Gogol's vintage grift narrative to the anti-Semitic themes of the cover art for Uriah Heep's Abominog (1982, above). Go nuts!

This isn't hard to do; monsters are everywhere and always maintain a dualistic, dialectical-material potential. Yes, Capitalism sexualizes everything (my PhD thesis) per the dialectic of the alien (from Volume Two, part one), but said dialectic still manifests differently (and per various double standards) depending on who's relating to whom, mid-struggle (from Volume One, "Healing from Rape"); i.e., as a given monster type through a given monster function; e.g., white women vs black men as zombies to humanize or dehumanize, or queer men as "vampires" feeding through sodomy on different prey groups to achieve complicated results: the whore, the demon, the rapist working as "dark predator" and prey in ways that code police violence as something to give and receive in canonical scenarios. As such, said violence becomes something to preemptively attack workers with, preventing their liberation by using dogmatic instruction meant to serve profit. As such, law and order canonize through state force and terror (often regarding sex) while invariably decaying as a result of itself (colonies always die; fascist ones die faster). Fear of that in the likeness of the cop and victim is a vital survival tool for us to weaponize against the state:

(source tweet, Katastrophe: December 14th, 2018)

Again, my instruction is multi-media, repetitive and holistic, not microscopic or myopically "total" (such completions are impossible, me and my friends' work simply adding to all the others who came before). As long as you keep that in mind, you (and your constellations) should be able to apply what I write here to any disadvantaged group through any text/medium you want; i.e., not just the undead receiving/giving trauma and feeding psychosexually on it, nor demons shifting shapes and granting forbidden power and knowledge, nor the natural world as being to some degree undead and/or demonic, but newer ideas I've coined since writing these modules regarding the same profit motive: as something to critique among all media and labor under Capitalism. In short, I want you to be intertextual and extratextual in your applications, but also excessive, shameless, and unafraid to try new things again; i.e., "bein' extra" provided it's sex-positive per various concepts we've already discussed being continuously part of a larger theoretical structure to camp canon with in a practical sense.

For example, you should do your gold-star best to keep Sarkeesian's adage in mind while synthesizing praxis: enjoy but do not blindly endorse canonical media, mid-consumption; i.e., as something to normally dissect for profit while shoving one's head in the sand as a kind of self-important history (re: most speedrunner documentation, for instance, is settler-colonial—chasing immortality through world records tied to profit that ignore state atrocities all along the watchtower).

In other words, no matter how cool someone seems or touts themselves as, don't act like this guy⁴¹ (next page) without some degree of irony that critiques profit and its heroes. We're here to kill our darlings (as a matter of critique), not worship them! Rags-to riches is bullshit, installed by the elite to force people not only to fight for scraps, but deify the entire opportunistic, manufactured process of scarcity and salvation; i.e., neoliberalism 101 per rigid inflexible minds incapable of fighting for anyone but themselves as part of a bourgeois Superstructure! Look around you. See that culture full of so-called gods of the sport, the Pantheon-grade colosseum and gladiators' kayfabe? American or not, it's "Rome" brought back to life in a 21st-century world, capital married to Cartesian thought raping Medusa on a global level; i.e., as a death sentence foisted onto workers and nature's labor value converted into monetary forms tied to police violence: all the heteronormative divisions of settler-colonial sex and force wreaking harm, thus profit as something to count, name and repeat until the world ends. Until that happens, Medusa becomes a token slave, forced to mother her abusers while "threatening" them with kayfabe-style Snu-Snu: anti-predation for the oppressor and predation for the enemy (which is anything that doesn't serve profit).

(artist: Yves Balak)

⁴¹ From Papa Lobster's "From Controversy to God: The Evolution of Tokido" (2024; timestamp: 8:57).
Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
 Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

To this, sex positivity shouldn't be a mystery monopolized by corporate guilds, a trade secret denied purposefully by dogmatic institutions in favor of crueler models of exchange (monetary value and labor/wage theft). Per revolutionary cryptonymy (e.g., "flashing"), though, we'll still have to paradoxically guard ourselves while trying to teach people less knowledgeable than us; i.e., to be more involved, thus active and engaged with, the world around them in a pro-worker sense: to actually risk getting hurt while building towards something better (which is what sex-positive relationships ultimately boil down to). People who refuse to do that in any shape or form—who blame and attack anyone but themselves and Capitalism—are doomed to not only live alone in their self-centered universes (which is what videogames classically are), but cause harm wherever they go in pursuit of their so-called "legacies" while cementing themselves within capital prison-like realities (that isn't a commentary about this exact person, below, but such clubbism and divisive sport mentalities are designed to foster us-versus-them animus favoring the usual predatory benefactors, weird canonical nerds, as naming everything after themselves, mid-rape):

So ends the tangent. Any like it will be made holistically in respect to a given chapter's core themes and ideas, but also the book's at large. And while I can't stress every idea here in this opening due to time and word constraints, keep your eyes peeled nonetheless. They'll surely pop up, and each-of-them grant special properties, extensions and intersections of all three monster types (which function modularly but often intersect) while developing Gothic Communism across all our lives; i.e., expressed by different members of the proletariat defending themselves and nature from state abuse/police violence while relating to each other in monstrous language that humanizes the alien: as something to reclaim through our own labor value/unequal power exchanges, including our guilty pleasures making us blush merely at the thought of saying them out loud!

Mind you, the embarrassment is ironic, canonical chagrin stemming from asking for something we're expected to take by force; i.e., coercively under unequal socio-material arrangements prioritizing white cis-het men (and token groups) as the universal clientele per Cartesian thought having evolved into Man Box/"prison sex" forms. It's these canonical behaviors/roleplay scenarios that iconoclasts play around with, mid-camp; e.g., during anal vs plane-Jane PIV sex as normally monopolized by capital. At first blush, they don't look so different under Gothic scenarios:

(exhibit 34c1a2: Capital loves to have their cake and eat it, too; i.e., to threaten actual destruction if one deviates from "correct" forms of sexual activity while simultaneously abjecting and cashing in on "incorrect" ones: "black Bibles" to thrust in workers' faces [often as cultural exports; e.g., Bible Black (2001), above]. These, in turn, are sold back to the middle class through a nuclear family model that is allowed to sin in the bedroom, provided it stays in the bedroom; i.e., it relegates to exploitative fantasies whose dogmatic elements punish the usual victims of state force outside the family home [often at school and society in general as invaded by dark prurient forces during moral panic]: as witches to prostitute to the fearful as fascinated with them, treating such prurience as throwaway pleasure blindly aping Hawthorne, not administering sex-positive lessons that actually challenge Puritan ideals [thus Capitalism under the Protestant work ethic]! As usual, though, such spaces become places to camp—to try new things while just as easily [for many newlyweds and extramarital couples] trying sex at all for the first time. It's normal to be nervous, the idea scary for most virgins because capital treats it as a tightrope to walk; i.e., as ignorantly as possible, leading to dangerous confluences conducive to scared brides submitting to their husbands' knife-like dicks, thus patriarchal dominance. While the Gothic's mutilative element has been commonplace since Radcliffe to Freud, subverting this unironically violent Amazonomachia generally requires a shy experimentation that frankly is cute to watch: "Can we... try anal?" Aw! Sure, babe!

To that, reversing abjection and humanizing the black⁴², GNC whore [and sodomy as a non-rapacious activity] becomes yet another experiment to try before giggling about it together after an admittedly nice time: "That wasn't so bad!" No, it generally isn't, which can turn peoples' worlds upside-down for the better insofar as they realize, post-anal, that "God" isn't going to smite them; i.e., God's not real, so what else isn't? Apart from the snow-white bridal "reward," what else can be reclaimed to liberate workers from capital, the middle class, menticide and the process of abjection?

Such dances with the ghost of the counterfeit not only open the mind, but help it heal. It's not a slippery slope [though the argument is present, when used by bad actors] but a complicated act of self-discovery that, once ventured, helps past victims heal from rape as committed against workers by police forces; e.g., wives and women's work; i.e., the home as something to police and expand into capital, at large, as nuclear. Each liberation is, to some degree then, unique. If yours includes anal or rape play [consent-non-consent] then that's ultimately a good thing because you'll know what works for you! As such, you become more emotionally and Gothically intelligent, which extends to class and culture war often enough.)

When camping canon, said exchanges should illustrate mutual consent (and one's basic human rights at large) through ludo-Gothic BDSM and castle-narrative; i.e., as something to pass along into the future as already dead, waiting to wake up once more, then consciously haunt the living as already haunted passively by imperial abuse experienced at home and broad! To this, here's a modular (cruel-angel's) thesis statement to keep in mind per the Monster Modules' subsequent essays and symposiums (indented for emphasis):

Capitalism achieves profit by moving money through nature; profit is built on trauma and division, wherein anything that serves profit gentrifies and decays, over and over while preying on nature. Trauma, then, cultivates strange appetites, which vary from group to group per the usual privileges and oppression as intersecting differently per case; i.e., psychosexual trauma (the regulation of state sex, terror and force) and feeding in decay as a matter of complicated (anisotropic) exchange unto itself, but also shapeshifting and knowledge exchange vis-à-vis nature as monstrous-feminine: something to destroy by the state or defend from it (and its trifactas, monopolies, etc) using the same threatening aesthetics of power and death, decay and rape.

⁴² Again, from a settler-colonial black-vs-white argument with pre-Enlightenment histories that predate settler-colonial racism; i.e., "black" as pure non-English, non-Christian stigma, thus incumbent less on skin color than the dialectic of the alien simply meaning "different" tied to older institutions where race argumentation wasn't the primary focus.

Poetically there's not much difference functionally-speaking between feeding and transformation. As a kind of power/knowledge exchange, each has a rich, unique history woven into itself; i.e., as someone's or some society's older preference serving as monstrous code to proudly shape into cryptonymic cultural forms with their own double operations: showing and concealing or vice versa regarding the Gothic's usual erotic medieval paradoxes.

These, in turn, remain cursed by mouth-fang and dick-knife hyphenations/doubles (tokenization) that, once shown mid-mise-en-abyme, can't be unseen: the undead as the classic unthinking (and addicted, ravenous) slave to state dominion, the demon as the wily contractor to such inequalities, and the animal as forced to endure a cruel stewardship thereof; e.g., the black Nazi Jew, witch cop, TERF, etc, as hogging the graveyard as an odd, paradoxical site of psychosexual rapture, healing and release camping rape; i.e., as normally a dogmatic, xenophobic tool—of punishment, of us-versus-them, temptation, dangerous confusions and straight up kink—posturing as "necrophilic" camp that we must make campy in the same spaces: a pedagogy of the oppressed healing from rape, thus police abuse as all around us, the graves our cradles less to crawl out of and more to make love inside. To survive, you have to work fast in the crypt, telling good actors from bad while playing with trauma as a historical-material loop decaying inside of itself.

(source film: Cemetery Man, 1994)

Rape isn't unique to Capitalism, then, but Capitalism exploits rape for profit, which always leaves a bloody footprint for us to double (think Danny escaping his rampaging father by walking backwards in his own footsteps during The Shining's [1981] hedge maze scene, except the camera man also had to do it⁴³). In turn, its ubiquity

⁴³ Garret Brown writes, "As Danny backs up stepping in his own footprints to fool Jack, I had to back up ahead of him also in his footprints! To accomplish this I had to wear special boots with Danny-sized
Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
 Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

is something to challenge through ludo-Gothic BDSM liberating worker minds during calculated risk: the moribund body and graveyard coalesced through a concentric cycle of exchange. Such complicated theatre (and prostitution) dates back to Rome and the ancient world (re: B.B. Wagner's "The Graveyard Prostitutes of Rome and Beyond," 2020), expanding into the Middle Ages, the Neo-Gothic (from the Graveyard Poets, Matthew Lewis, etc) onward to a cryptic hauntology beyond Great Britain; i.e., relishing in corpse sex theatre (and other unspeakables) under neoliberal Pax Americana's anxious inheritance foisted onto fresh workers to threaten them with (menticide): the ever-growing army of the elite's undead!

In turn, harmful versions of said therapy mirror the abuse as "activity" and "area"; i.e., sex in funerary places historically overlapping as burial grounds and sites of masochistic rapture—as a nightly, "almost holy" meeting place for extramarital affairs (adjacent to taboo elements like rape, suicide, cannibalism, incest, nightmares/sleep sex, murder and so on) classically tempting young men of the cloth with the forbidden-yet-constantly-advertised forbidden pleasures of the flesh; e.g., the film adaptation for Umberto Eco's The Name of the Rose (1986): sex is fun when you're breaking the rules; it's healthy when no one's being harmed or forced/taken against their will (the empty threat of God smiting you for doing the nasty in His decaying house being a potentially Numinous aphrodisiac).

Irony is always the deciding factor insofar as something is sex-positive or not. Furthermore, such curious privileges extend to anyone and everyone in the Internet Age—to partake and enjoy a "necrotic," rape-fantasy ecstasy having been camped rather pornographically since Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet to Rocky Horror and present-day works: live burial ("burying the bishop") a psychosexual means of feeling at home with one's trauma as inescapable; i.e., a patriarchal system designed to benefit white cis-het Christian men that—however tokenized or gentrified it seems—will always decay in ways they can't rely on to exclusively protect them, either (spectres of Marx seeking revenge through praxial success exposing the bourgeoisie for the murderers they and theirs are; re: a pedagogy of the oppressed, a voice of the rat/damned snitching on capital and the elite)!

Simply put, the exchanges are anisotropic, working as much to camp canonical forces (and move power towards workers) versus harming us with soles nailed to the bottom so I wouldn't make the footprints any bigger!" (source: "The Steadicam and The Shining Revisited," 2022).

dogmatic sites of older psychosexual crimes—of gargoyles scaring the faithful, fearing "God" as much as overtly secular as not (capitalists famously walking the tightrope; e.g., Ronald Reagan's Christofascism). However damaged we are from past abuse, camping this fact feels more and more homely and correct, in practice; i.e., once you go black, you can't go back, babes (the dialectic of the alien a powerful means of catharsis and self-defense)! Camping canon is often "rapacious," sexual; i.e., anger/gossip, monsters and camp (the basics of oppositional synthesis) with sex (and force) getting your attention in reliably Gothic ways: "Help! I'm an undead demon and I'm being 'raped' animal-style to Rocky Horror's 'Time Warp'!" Guess we should investigate, right?

(artist: Tago Van Tor)

More to the point, "rape" is an acquired taste; victims of rape (whatever the form) experience medieval-coded, regressive fantasies of "rape" they ideally want to camp during ludo-Gothic BDSM to avoid actual rape (and overall harm) in the future. In turn, praxial catharsis occurs through iconoclasm while healing from rape in xenophilic ways that involve nature as monstrous-feminine in fetishized, cliché sites of death, damage, decay and rebirth. As such, exploitation and liberation occupy the same shadow zones' theatrical spaces, the latter weaponized through the same linguo-material devices canonically waged against workers by traitorous forces; said workers reclaim these in public-to-private theatrical "danger disco"/rape-castle operatic spaces (and bodies) mapping trauma out: as something to immersively dance/party with (re: cryptomimesis, or fucking with the dead as a bad, Matthew-Lewis-style echo), adopting sex-positive strategies that resist capital/profit: by misbehaving as a matter of good sex education challenging profit as a matter of fact.

In the Gothic, naughtiness is generally built on genuine trauma. To avoid war and rape as systemic harm leading to generational trauma/stolen generations, we must learn from the dead as something we embody through our Wisdom of the Ancients. Like a Gothic heroine in a castle, the liberatory ideal is exploration leading deeper inside—to heal from police atrocities, tokenistic exploitation, and compelled perversions occurring through feminism and genderqueer politics (and other minorities) in decay (e.g., TERFs, queer and Afronormativity, Zionism, etc) leading towards genocide, thus grim harvests.

"No body, no crime," says the state, denying atrocities however much it needs to continue its dark feast. State cannibalism and disempowerment dismember what can ultimately be reassembled, though, strung together composite-style and speaking to its own murder and/or rape by the hands of others (e.g., Emily Portman's "The Two Sisters" [2010] and similar murder ballads with changeling elements); or it can appear like a ghost, a simulacrum speaking to such lies as ultimately visible, mid-apocalypse. Cryptonymy is cryptonymy regardless of shape or size (a castle-like body or body-like castle denoting trauma as mirror-like; revolutionary or complicit, cryptonymy is about hiding in plain sight, then, generally as a means of good or bad habits synthesizing praxis in ways the state cannot manipulate or dissect (e.g., Child of God, 1972) as its fear and dogma normally do: useful criminal flesh⁴⁴ reduced afterwards to a useless unalive state, something to criminalize and scapegoat per criminogenic conditions, then incarcerate, judge and rape through law and order as usual: "all road men, gangsters, proper naughty boys and all that bollocks!" as Charlie Hunnam says, in Guy Ritchie's The Gentleman (2019).

⁴⁴ I've previously written about this excision of value regarding flesh; re: "Critical Review of Fred Botting's 'Future Horror (the Redundancy of Gothic)'" (2017):

Botting's obituary perpetuates themes of meaningless substance, writing how 'any anchoring substance is scraped away [as identity] slides precipitously across surfaces.' Mankind merely becomes the sum of so much superficial clay slapped on and removed with such astounding alacrity as to rob this interchangeable tissue of all meaning. Consider the surgery scene Botting initially evokes, where a British woman is being cosmetically operated on: "The skin is lifted and excess tissue scraped from under the cheeks [while a hose likewise suctions] gelatinous globules and bloody ooze pumped from the [woman's] thighs." Yet, this trope of meaningless flesh isn't exclusive to our immediate age. I recall how the lifeless body of Matthew Lewis' ill-fated prioress was beaten, trod upon and ill-used, in The Monk (1796), "till it became no more than a mass of flesh, unsightly, shapeless and disgusting"; or, consider Lester Ballard's ignominious demise, in Cormac McCarthy's novel, Child of God (1973):

He was laid out on a slab and flayed, eviscerated, dissected. His head was sawed open and the brains removed. His muscles were stripped from his bones. His heart was taken out. [...] At the end of three months [Ballard] was scraped from the table into a plastic bag.

In both instances, the flesh of the authors' victims is squeezed so tightly that it oozes between their white-knuckle fingers. However, Botting confidently asserts that, in modern times, "the terrors of the night are replaced by the terrors of the light"—as though this is an idea exclusive to that temporal region. Yet, Lewis or McCarthy both seem perfectly happy exploring those naked realities Botting attributes exclusively to our own present.

In The Monk, Sister Agnes and Father Ambrosio exemplify this. The former describes the unveiled horror of a present moment, not some obscurity of the long-dead past, when she says, "...often have I at waking found my fingers ringed with the long worms which bred in the corrupted flesh of my infant." Likewise, the latter, tortured by the Inquisition, tries to deny the existence of a God, but laments, "those truths, once [my] comfort, now presented themselves before [me] in the clearest light." Manifest in said light, there is always some present horror for any writer to explore. These respective anxieties aren't in the future. There's no linear progression leading to a bright, over-exposed annihilation. Gothic fiction isn't redundant because the past and future are in the present, and always have been. Thus, I can hardly agree with Botting when he writes, "the future produced in the void of the present [is] both horrifying and thrilling. But it is far from Gothic" (source).

Botting is a dumbass.

If the latter is a kind of intolerant, stalker-grade Count Dracula you do not want to be friends with, proletarian undeath and demonic poiesis reflect our being marked with trauma and yet still being able to function healthily with others to encourage universal tolerance but, per Karl Popper, exclude bigotry and harm; i.e., to not rape others as the state/capital do by design (regardless of venue). Whatever the monster type, there's always a double for the state and vice versa projecting onto the same troubled surfaces and into the same thresholds—them, to blame others with and us to expose them as harming us.

To that, the state will always invoke self-defense as a matter of castle doctrine. They love plausible deniability and DARVO under settler-colonial conditions; i.e., playing the victim and the underdog rebel while treating us as terrorist, Nazi-Communist, what-have-you. Our monsters go against such systemic features, including high burdens of proof routinely and reliably defending the powerful as people extending from the state as centered around wealth and power always flowing up.

In a world of grand illusions, there's no "seeing the light" as completely naked. Per cryptonymy, there's always something hidden and something exposed that you must navigate by playing with proponents of good vs bad faith, play and education, BDSM, etc (which we'll introduce here historically before unpacking fully in Volume Three: as something to make new histories with regarding the state as something to defend or dismantle). Intent matters less than socio-material outcomes, which those in bad faith cannot conceal (another topic for Volume Three); it's always dualistic/dialectical-material, a historical-material trail of psychosexual rituals raised from the wreckage—of trauma as something to express, confront, negotiate with as a power we can reclaim. But it's always a likeness of itself, an estate of unrest, a restless ghost (or some other egregore; e.g., Banquo's zombie-like spectre, from Macbeth: "Thou canst not say I did it. Never shake / Thy gory locks at me!" source) of rape to camp; it has to be or it simply becomes invisible, thus conducive to profit through the perception of order as lawful, good, stable.

Per the Gothic, though, ghosts don't stay dead; they get up and move around. It becomes something to invite in (or be invited into, that curiously polite quality of vampirism going both ways), then interrogate insofar as what ails them more or less ails us, too—Capitalism as a castled site of violent lies to survive and spatially thread, from mazes to labyrinths.

In turn, these become, per C.S. Lewis's Problem of Pain, a dreadful, uncanny confrontation with a spirit of some small-to-mighty configuration; i.e., less a tiger in the room and more an echo that might be a tiger but just as much yields a general feeling of unheimlich. For or against the state, such likenesses are commonplace during cryptomimesis as a kind of puzzle to solve, a murder most foul (so-called "foul play" through intended gameplay in service to profit) testifying badly for itself across texts (the 1998 Ringu, above, coming from an older book). It becomes charged with corruption as data to expend like dark lightning from its sexually changed surfaces. Even so, entropy is the vector and the clue, the obfuscating reality of existence as meant to confuse us, but which we can weaponize against our confusers per the same historical-material effects during our revolutionary cryptonymy penetrating the spectral membrane: Schrodinger's hot piece of vengeful ass!

(artist: Grobi-Grafik)

No matter how violent, antagonistic or intangible they seem, then, puzzles are solved by playing with them; history-towards-development is no exception. To that, the Gothic's complicated, often-combative history of rape and its modular-to-intersecting preferences/poetics⁴⁵ are what we want to outline and explore here, but time is a factor. Sometimes we'll focus on cryptonymy, others on hauntology or abjection, medieval poetics at large (e.g., a confusion of the senses, of boundaries during the dialectic of the alien) etc. Furthermore, from zombies to vampires, ghosts to composites, cyborgs to lycans, we'll survey an example for each module taken from some of the most die-hard legends, just like I did in grad school; i.e., fluctuating between a looser symposium style and various essays that adhere to this larger module thesis argument amid smaller interesting-but-not-always-wholly-constant tangents and hot-cold Gothic extremes: a preferred alternative favoring the irrationally violent cluing the audience into a presence of decay state illusions have repeatedly tried to conceal since the Enlightenment—self-destruction, of state proponents punching themselves in the mirror-like face (re: "We have found the enemy and he is us.").

⁴⁵ E.g., vampires and demons both can feed, exchange power and transform, but each module historically emphasizes/stresses these individual poetic qualities more than others do, mid-intersection, and in specific unforgettable visualizations/monstrous shorthand.

(source: Broke Horror Fan)

As such, consider the above module thesis argument as a kebab skewer—a follow-through to achieve common ground, but also food for thought; i.e., something to go into your little brain baskets (and holes, mid-skewering of your meat) as you holistically try to weigh the historical function of monsters in the manner that I've carefully arranged here: as expressing and exchanging unequal power ("rape") under duress during oppositional praxis while consuming and learning from/as the past, yourselves. It becomes vital forbidden knowledge we can reclaim when healing from rape by playing with "it" in quotes. This includes its odd sediment, doubles, hyphenations, etc; e.g., knife-dick play while looking for Mr. Right—our paradoxical salvation in a mock-up of our theatrical demise badly aping our deaths, our rapes, our confused pleasure-pain responses (versus Man Box types "finding religion" as just another grift/assimilation tactic, especially in kayfabe circles or executive positions; i.e., a redemption arc rehabilitating abusers; e.g., Hulk Hogan or George W. Bush) in search of a palliative Numinous, a Communist Numinous that engenders emotion/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness as a kind of second-nature dexterity towards being a better human and class/culture warrior on the side of the proletariat against the state and all its class traitors: dancing with the ghost of the counterfeit, giving Medusa a hug.

One more thing as far as that goes: Simplicity (abbreviation) is just a different means of abstracting trauma and power in ways useful to praxis; i.e., just an arrangement and interpretation of monsters at a given register that we can apply as needed. You already have complex and simple theory to combine with the Poetry Module; what follows is a historical inspection and hopefully future application towards fresh histories. Per the regulation of sex and force for or against the state and its Cartesian dialogic, monsters aren't just threats ("Alright you primitive screwheads! Listen up!"); they're poetic lenses that concern power as something to paradoxically shift away from state forces, mid-struggle. They are, like power more broadly, something to interrogate by going where they are through performance and play. This concerns war and rape, decay and feeding, transformation and fatal knowledge. All exchange per various human tissues as poetic material—from brains, to flesh, to blood, to cum, and others things we won't touch on as much (e.g., shit).

In turn, all overlap; all are modular and dualistic; all are psychosexually anisotropic insofar as power is concerned, because sex and force are power insofar as they are perceived through monsters as us-versus-them arguments—in short, how we function as monsters, how we feed, decay or transform, etc, mid-exchange. State power aggregates for profit to induce praxial inertia, and by extension a decrease in emotional/Gothic intelligence and class-cultural awareness. We must aggregate against all of these variables, thus the state's trifectas, monopolies and qualities of capital: through ludo-Gothic BDSM as our castle-narrative to weave into the future regarding something we won't live to see—a kind of "bucket list" to give back to future generations in very sexy-macabre ways; i.e., a "spit roast" that likes the very idea before the pole(s) go in—a piece of meat with agency and rights negotiating its own "rape" in ways that liberate all parties from profit and sexual harm, but play with the poetics, nonetheless; e.g., the captive fantasy with appreciative irony per ludo-Gothic BDSM. As such, the calculated risk should constitute a subversive act of illustrating mutual consent per intersectional solidarity between workers united against the state: to make "rape" impossible by putting it in quotes as a mutually consensual act!

(artist: Reiq)

Last but not least, this cruel angel's thesis cannot reify alone; it takes friends to repeatedly perform these arguments—i.e., relative to state proponents trying to pit us again each other on the same stages, in the same undead, demonic and/or animalistic costumes constituting state force and decay (sickness) weighed against ours taking root to achieve the opposite function: liberation from rape through iconoclastic art as Gothic counterculture, including sexuality and gender identity through performative struggle (something we'll adumbrate here and expand on much more in Volume Three). For us, Medusa is androgynous and monstrously humanized; both undead, demonic and/or animalistic, they are able to see, feed and exchange power and knowledge despite this seemingly blinding and otherwise crippling monstrous status (demons being more vocal than undead, but banished to hellish spheres).

(artist: Romantic Rose)

On our sexy mirror-like Aegis, then, Medusa smiles to deliver their best revenge against the state in various operatic forms. Often-musical, but always theatrical (from classical to industrial, heavy metal, punk to rap; to movies, videogames, novels and performance art), Medusa never settles down; they put "rape" in quotes, saying to their enemies harvesting them, "Can't kill me, bitches! That all you got?" It's that or state shift; i.e., when Mother Nature goes grim and actually fucks our brains out.

So pick your poison—voyeurism or exhibitionism—until then, sweeties! Capitalism is doomed, regardless!

Demons: From Composites and the Occult to Totems and the Natural World

"Who needs chicks when you got demons?" [They're not mutually exclusive, my dudes.]

—John and Moe, The Gate II: Trespassers (1992)

(source: Austin Vashaw's "Forgotten Sequel GATE II," 2018)

This module focuses on forbidden, unequal exchange (often power, darkness and knowledge, which for us are synonymous with each other) and radical transformation (commonly shifting shape) through demons, but especially creation using such things and their dark materials' desire/fulfillment of wishes (commonly around advancement and revenge using black magic/mad science); i.e., going beyond what capital normally allows for most people. The gods, for example, classically use clay to create whatever they want (re: all heroes are monsters). Demons, then, commonly constitute unequal exchange through power, darkness and knowledge as a forbidden creative act; i.e., they make for an incredibly broad category of monster that—famously shown during Satanic Panic, in the 1980s—exhibits beings (thus power, darkness and knowledge) as literally fashioned from clay (an analog of human flesh)! Doing so constitutes highly regulated acts of vengeful creation; i.e., showcasing forbidden ability (again, as power, darkness or knowledge) through limitless poetry that we'll explore in the pages ahead; e.g., from Pygmalion and Galatea, Milton's Satan, and Shelley's Frankenstein, to echoes of those we won't: Ray Harryhausen, Larry Roemer's Rudolf the Red-Nosed Reindeer (1964), and Frosty the Snowman.

(artist: Oxcoxa)

Self-fashioning linguo-materially also ties to incredibly old forms of demonic poetics, which the elite package and sell under capital in a variety of media forms, but also dichotomies; e.g., virgin/whore and videogames (with prostitution and whore-as-sex-demon being something we'll explore at length, in "Forbidden Sight"). So while demonic "claymation" has occult origins dating back to the Golem of Prague (and far older examples), these have since been reinvoked; e.g., with John Carmack's own Martian variety in Doom (1993); i.e., as also being fashioned from clay before being digitized (a common '90s technique, Blizzard originally intending their 1996 flagship game, Diablo 1, to also be digitized claymation).

Apart from clay, however, demons are embodied and invoked by various materials and methods reanimating dead things; e.g., ink (above) but also what William Blake called "corroding fires" in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790); i.e., being made of dark hellish materials, summoned from dark hellish zones, or sensed through the imbibing of dark hellish substances:

- posthuman mad science, composite demons and Cartesian thought leading to modern-day fascism and xenophobia (the Promethean Quest)
- the liminal expression of occult language, anti-Semitic black-magic symbols, and BDSM rituals (the Faustian bargain)
- and drug-fueled ecstasies/xenophilic knowledge tied closely to nature, sexuality and gender expression; i.e., as alienated from the modern world and fetishized/pimped out by capital

We'll go over these ideas one chapter/subchapter at a time:

- "Of Darkness and the Forbidden" (opening) is a symposium that discusses various poetic ideas and paradoxes (contradictions) known to darkness and demons, which will come up throughout the entire module.
- "Forbidden Sight, Faust and the Promethean Quest" (chapter) parts zero, one, two and three consider forbidden power as something to see; i.e., forbidden sight, per the Faustian Bargain and Promethean Quest. They do so through the history of making/summoning demons—initially according to Gothic, Renaissance approaches and prostitution (whores) as a Faustian bargain, but then unto the Promethean Quest; i.e., Cartesian dualism meant to punish demons, or otherwise summon/pimp them through the ghost of the counterfeit to further the abjection process in service to capital raping nature-as-vengeful (and whose inheritance anxiety occurs inside the Imperial Core, continuing Capitalist Realism as a fear of the outside, of the dark, of the Earth, creativity and nature⁴⁶).

⁴⁶ Nature is demonized by Cartesian forces; i.e., becoming something to fear to the point of ridicule. This includes the ultimate weapon of counterterror against occupying armies: their own fear of nature, which the elite expect them to police out of fear. They see nature as wild, hence must be raped to serve profit. Think of a twig snapping in a Vietnam jungle, one that sends the "brave" occupiers into a shooting spree with their surroundings. They think themselves invincible, but also spook easy. This also happens at home, during military urbanism; e.g., acorns, as this Florida deputy discovered (The Guardian's "US Officer Fired at Handcuffed Man in SUV After Mistaking Acorn for Gunshot," 2024).

Demons generally aren't tied to the land, undead are. Except demons are tied to a Cartesian othering which demonizes nature and conjures it up; i.e., as a curse of "the past" to attack the inhabitants of a settler colony from within; e.g., animals, Pagans, and ritual sacrifice being of "somewhere else": as within an unheimlich according to a forged division of sovereignty whose "historical" counterfeits remain haunted by the ghosts of actual atrocities (re: Hogle's ghost of the

- "Exploring the Derelict Past" (subchapter) considers the dialectical-material tensions between a demonic trifecta of damsels, detectives and demons; i.e., as something to enjoy on either side of oppositional praxis, while endorsing pro-state or pro-worker functions (their appropriative dogma or appreciative ironies): according to those expressing and investigating demons and their shape-shifting trauma/catharsis.
- "Call of the Wild" (chapter) considers the natural world as a hellish, demonic site of animals-as-monstrous; i.e., demonic and/or undead to varying degrees, which the state will exploit per the Cartesian model and its heteronormative, settler-colonial profit motive. Parts one and two consider the revolutionary potential of monster-fucking and the sex-positive educational device offered by the monstrous-feminine as animalized; i.e., how both liberate nature and workers from state-fueled furry panic using acid Communism (the merger of inter- and extra-community measures).

As we proceed, please remember Weber's maxim concerning the state's monopoly of violence (and in connection to it, Asprey's paradox of terror and Crawford's invention of terrorism vis-à-vis the Neo-Gothic mode); these apply to any demon, be the iconoclast of mad science, occult magic and/or nature, or to some degree chimeric/undead (e.g., the xenomorph). Made to prey on nature as monstrous-feminine, the state has an intrinsically heteronormative, Cartesian and settler-colonial police character that will double and weaponize Gothic poetics against pro-worker forms of counterterror seeking liberation; i.e., through demonic expression.

(artist: Mizugi Buns)

To it, demons embody poetic exchange—as unequal/forbidden, and with transformative linguo-counterfeit and process of abjection). Viewed as "past," state forces abject systemic abuse, then and now, to an imaginary place dug back up: demonic dead.

To that, Sam Raimi's titular Evil Dead (1981, onwards) possess self-styled "civilized" persons on home turf with a spirit of childlike black revenge; i.e., one that mortifies the flesh (a melding of torture and rot) according to a demon of nature-as-undead, of Cartesian enemies ferried into the present through Gothic reinvention. It's Capitalist Realism suspended through Gothic animations—of various stolen myths, language, and monsters. The pact is the colonizer's; i.e., with a world they are born into as inherited according to a system that distracts, overwhelms and confuses them. Like Evil Dead, it's paradoxical: silly and serious, inside-outside, secular and superstitious, fearful and fascinating (re: Conrad's Heart of Darkness [1899] and racist fascination with the abomination).

Moreover, such power cannot be killed, only used for specific aims; re: "Bushnell's Requiem"; e.g., Victor Frankenstein, the Cartesian man of science, is hunted by the ghosts of the dead he stitches together from clay/things he disinterred from the dark earth of Germany and calls "demon" (something to fear and enslave). Except, he made what he feared to maintain his own sense of power according to the land around him. We can reverse all of that to serve our own aims; i.e., dismantling the state versus it conjuring us up, Radcliffe-style, before ripping us apart to serve profit.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

material devices (re: power, darkness, knowledge; if I mention a particular noun in this module, it's because I'm stressing it). As such, they are classically made, summoned or found, and argue dualistically (through doubles) along these circuits of poetic discourse; i.e., by creating something out of clay or summoning it into a clay-like substance (or dead flesh, possessed victim, graveyard soil, etc): to deal/treat with power in all its forms, including of nature and death as old, haunted, anathema and ubiquitous. Knowledge is power and vice versa during such exchanges; i.e., as dark, anisotropic.

Couched in "darkness visible" as a poetic, xenoglossic device, we can make not just voices, but also bodies that speak cryptonymically to taboo, illusory and paradoxical things, injecting them with fresh poetic life (trans people are poets of identity and the flesh, above); i.e., a half-real, checkered combination of violent, terrifying and hellish morphological freedom of expression, existing in andro/gynodiverse defiance of state monopolies, trifactas and qualities of capital, hence Vitruvian medicalization and genocidal apathies (re: the Shadow of Pygmalion as white/xenophobic, fearing things not of the West ["not of this Earth!"] and bastardizing them as abject, alien evil, forgotten; i.e., reimagined with asymmetrical/guerilla powers exploited by the state but not monopolized by them)!

(source: Testament's Dark Roots of the Earth, 2012; artist: Eliran Kantor)

Per Hogle, the ghost of the counterfeit furthers abjection through the middle class upholding status-quo arrangements of power and knowledge through Gothic fakeries; i.e., viewing colonized land as dark and alien, vis-à-vis Cartesian thought and heteronormative language demonizing older forms of culture connected to nature, life and death, having become alien in ways that uphold capital (and its black/white colonial binary argument). Under Capitalist Realism, something is "dark" if it ostensibly moves anything of value (re: power and knowledge) away from the status quo. Generally this darkness is associated with the vengeful imaginary past based on buried historical atrocities, the latter paradoxically twisted by the former to keep control right where it is (among the elite). Anything that challenges this paradigm is canonically framed as dark, evil, profligate; i.e., nature as vengeful whore, which capital takes revenge on through DARVO-style police violence/obscurantism, witch hunts, tokenism and moral panic; e.g., Medusa and her Aegis' forbidden sight (we'll get to her).

Rebel power/knowledge, then, becomes ontological in highly dark, Satanic, and "archaically" poetic ways; i.e., through iconoclastic abstraction and impression, but also hefty substance, sensitivity and savory deliciousness regarding the natural world as funerary and wild (as forbidden fruit generally is): "death" as an extant state of constant radical change, made by those "of nature" the forces of light deem ethnocentrically "lesser" or "accursed" while conveniently abusing the same language of the imaginary past's priestly and funerary necrobiome, themselves (always in service to profit/a Cartesian paradigm raping nature as whore, Pagan, black, the latter closer to life and death through reimagined death gods, post-genocide—above). And yet, all monsters are linguo-material devices, hence exist in anisotropic duality during oppositional praxis; i.e., in dialectical-material struggle, moving power towards workers or the state. This further complicates by a give-and-take approach to what is being exchanged. Whereas the undead take essence when they feed in relation to trauma, demons give knowledge to transform themselves and others into demons when they teach.

From Ovid to Milton to Giger to Vandermeer's Shimmer (the Rainbow from Hell, per Lovecraft's "Colour out of Space" [1927] worshipping cosmic nihilism), we Gothic Communists are not "sick"; we change both ourselves and others through love, pleasure, pain, and annihilation, turning into our true forms less as set and more constantly growing: amid a parallel state of existence whose Wisdom of the Ancients challenges Capitalist Realism and its blind, braindead myopia! Not to cheat death, but face and become it, we knock 'em dead—are the guardians of the universe, not its conquerors: the stewards of nature's mighty-mighty darkness. Darkness is power as potential, waiting not just to happen but intersectionally collect, consolidate and explode in a rising pandemonium of anarchistic intelligence and consciousness; i.e., shifting the giving of unequal, forbidden knowledge towards worker struggles fighting for universal equal rights, dismantling the state as we do.

(artist: Mizugi Buns)

This occurs through playing with power-as-knowledge-exchange insofar as demons represent it through darkness as an aesthetic; i.e., expressed through ludo-Gothic BDSM. Something of an Unholy Trinity that turns capital on its head (usually expressed as upside-down; e.g., the crucifix) power, darkness and knowledge—often as conspicuous, ritualized acts of creation/poetry and (re)invention through magic/mad science—go hand-in-hand during unequal, forbidden exchange, radical transformation and dark desire/wish fulfillment (my demon thesis, the overarching argument for this entire module). The demon symposium shall explore this lofty and productive concept for the remainder of its pages, using these words somewhat interchangeably. In doing so, we'll conversationally unpack an assemblage of complexities and contradictions/paradoxes inherent to demonic expression as "dark," thus useful insofar as worker liberation under Gothic Communism goes; and we'll impose limitations on demonic variation/our study's focus, just to keep things—while holistic—somewhat grounded!

Of Darkness and the Forbidden: A Demon Symposium

*Darkness imprisoning me
All that I see Absolute horror
I cannot live
I cannot die
Trapped in myself
Body my holding cell*

—James Hetfield; "One," on Metallica's ...And Justice for All (1989)

This symposium is like that great library from The Shadow of the Wind (2001)—many books on the shelves and far too many to read in one lifetime or several. With selective reading, we shall pull this or that down from the dark, dusty stores, doing so to assemble and articulate a variety of poetic ideas/thesis statements useful to rebellious demonic expression, as well as arbitrating the focus of the Demon Module at large: forbidden knowledge and "darkness" to transform ourselves through ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., the demonic subversion of state harm by playing with copies of these things just as state proponents do, but in reverse; e.g., incarceration, torture, rape/power abuse, and the all-around policing of ironic demonic sex and force with unironic demonic sex and force: deus ex machina, Deus Vult!

Ludo-Gothic BDSM, then, is to play with unequal power as "dark" knowledge (or vice versa); i.e., plastic and anisotropic, to better make art in any linguo-material form that allows for transformation as such. Often, this speaks to someone's perspective, but it also ties to violence, terror and morphological expression—a communion with dark earthly forces communicated by their bodies and minds as somehow "demonic"; i.e., in monomorphic ways antithetical to state configurations. Power is a paradox, then, something "dark" to (re)invent and (re)enforce along the control of poetry and knowledge by the state. As a structure, it invents conditions and ideas—generally through the assignment of guilt and innocence—that flow power up by criminalizing nature and policing it in us-versus-them demonic forms; Gothic Communism reverses all of this by inverting the same terrorist/counterterrorist devices and arrangements: to illustrate how those assigning guilt—or otherwise benefiting from capital as a heteronormative, Cartesian, setter-colonial arrangement—are generally the most guilty of all.

For your convenience, I've divided this symposium into six larger chunks and a conclusion (all concern demons and darkness, and the titles should give you an idea of what to expect):

- Hello, Darkness, My Old Friend
- Playing with Power
- Limiting Our Focus
- Expanding Our Demon Thesis
- Further Food for Thought
- Broad Strokes; Some Larger Arguments about Demons
- Conclusion: New Eyes, Forbidden Sight \(and "Religious" Concerns\)

Before we proceed into the symposium at length, then, a couple of pages about "darkness," why it's vague, and what I mean by it in relation to demons!

Hello, Darkness, My Old Friend

"Darkness," whatever its form, is aggregate, massive, dwarfing the light—man vs nature, virgin/whore, state/chaos, etc—and its poetics and paradoxical ideas of dark knowledge exist within liminal in-between positions of incomplete knowledge. To be "in the dark" is to be at a disadvantage. These states of ignorance and lies actually stem from older pre-Christian religions (re: Judaism and golems), doing so in ways that hauntologically endure well into the present; i.e., "darkness" and "knowledge" attaching to "power" as, per Foucault, being equally broad. Demons are a very old kind of monster—far older than modern vampires or zombies, and still evoking that ancient tenebrous quality to them: a proximity to power merged with a foreboding but also welcoming sense of the unknown. "Dark" = "demon" as evoked by merely hearing or seeing the phrase; i.e., "a being of darkness, thus power as 'dark' or from/of nature as alien, vengeful," simply as something to feel, thus imagine. Darkness is, in one sense, highly subjective—a feeling or a mood associated with demons. Per Plato, though, it operates through shadowy suggestion, having the capacity to liberate dupes or enslave them again through allegory (which is just as old as golems are).

(artist: ArturSG)

Per ludo-Gothic BDSM, "power" is often psychosexual and conveyed in terms of size or classically gendered, phallic/vaginal symbols of sex and force, like caves or swords under Cartesian reimplementation; e.g., Lion-O's Sword of Omens from Thundercats (first image, 1985) vs Mumm-Ra's pyramid of power (and his latter-day Egyptology's skeleton king in two parts: Old Man Saturn and revived youthful tyrant, above) speaking to neoliberal (false) power fantasies made from dolls/pulp and playing with them. Simply put, power is something you articulate through perception, poetry and play as, often enough, "dark," subjective, unstable, and Gothically vague. Shadows stand in, doing so as simulacra and synecdoche; they abstract to reify whatever our dialectical-material positions are, and whatever is policed by the state and which workers reclaim (usually sex and force, through nature-as-alien, left). Centuries of dogma change how the world is perceived in ways that must be subverted.

(artist: Kinky Birb)

Cartesian arguments classically divide nature into "thinking" and "extended" beings, essentially boiling down to white, entitled European men colonizing anything else per settler colonialism dressed up as "progress"; i.e., taming nature as wild, whorish, savage. For the state, there must always be an enemy expressed as "dark" in terms of a victim for cops to stomp—less a Snidely Whiplash to make Dudley Do Right appear good by virtue of the team he's on, and more something that either can unite against. There are no moral actions, only moral teams under centrist paradigms, and the portrayal and perception of strength upholding capital, Pax Americana and the state standing against "true darkness (nature)" is the only "good team" under Capitalism: the state was made from clay as genocide during the Cartesian Revolution, the latter seeking revenge against God's will through the former as something to possess in alien-like, demonic ways. The pastoral yields a shadow the state scapegoats and pimps mercilessly through DARVO and obscurantism: Lilith, Medusa, zombies, etc, threatening daintier forms with "corruption" (rape epidemics, sodomy and blood libel, etc; e.g., Beauty and the Beast, The Creature from the Black Lagoon, Persephone and Hades, and similar stories abjecting or reverse-abjecting our mates; i.e., who we want to marry/fuck versus who we're forced to). We can defend and protect whoever we want for different reasons.

(artist: waifumelsz)

So while "darkness" is initially a subjective inkblot that serves cosmetically for state forces and victim aesthetics alike, in reality it accounts for the holistic, cosmic, total, objective flow of power through language and nature as phenomenologically ambiguous, dualistic and historically-materially divided in two: team bourgeoisie and team proletariat, workers and nature vs the state, man vs nature (often expressed as women), black/white ethnocentrism vs settler-colonial territory ordered for conquest, ownership and rule (e.g., Tolkien's Christianized Great Chain of Being and Divine Right⁴⁷), and sex positivity vs sex coercion, etc.

As such, "darkness" handily accounts for the sheer poetic variety recorded, witnessed and experienced under these two constants; i.e., combining the five normal senses, but also swapping their roles to speak to new demonic ones; e.g., seeing in "darkness" but also with it, as with power in all its poetic forms (refer to our medieval poetic devices from the Poetry Module to get a better idea of what I mean: a confusion of the senses, selective absorption, magical assembly and our Song of Infinity). Demons classically mislead. Under state illusions, us-versus-them theatre yields not just cops and victims, but supercops and supervillains. Clarity comes from confusion, then, as something workers control and command to upset state logic/cultural attitudes about nature and workers at large; i.e., to use shadows, seduction and demonic instability to escape bourgeois illusions to pursue Gothic Communism and sex worker liberation through iconoclastic art, instead: our own shapes to occupy. Gothic maturity comes by using "darkness" to achieve sex-positive things, our mirror-imaged twins debating with state forgeries in and out of ourselves (myself being an identical twin, a trans woman versus my cis-het double).

(source: Lina Hoshino's "'Ghostly Shadows' on Petaluma Streets," 2022; artist: Larry Harper)

Arbitration is just that—arbitrary.

"Darkness" isn't automatically evil; it simply is what it is. For one, shadows are often conceived as "lesser" or "diminished" offshoots of someone formerly "bright"—i.e., to be a shadow of one's former self—or a vague concentration of some kind of occupation, calamity or hard-to-define force attached to something else (a double or Venus twin). However, this doesn't make them "less," and often they have great mass and substance; they're just a dark side to a person, place or event, or—like a black ghost or spirit—express a presence or entity unto itself that is dark, painful, mysterious, different, intimidating and/or left-behind, etc (a trace; e.g., the shadows of the victims of Nagasaki and Hiroshima, above).

⁴⁷ Gentrifying war in D&D cartographic refrains, but also demons and evil nature canonized by him: orcs, Balrogs, Dark Lords, previous Rings of Power (the pure Three standing in for the Holy Trinity versus the others as less as less pure, good, and correct) and giving of gifts. We'll revisit Tolkien some more, moving forwards. To those interested, though, my PhD explores his refrains at length, and Volume One his BDSM expressed pointedly through vampire and the giving of rings.

Cartesian thought generally conceives what makes a shadow feel "alien" to begin with; i.e., as needing to be explored, destroyed, and purged, etc (re: the abjection process creating a state opposite to police, a stain generally of nature as monstrous-feminine). But it can just as easily be a pulpy expression of power in romantic language—a potential waiting to happen. To it, the shadowy butterfly Psyche, or ancient goddess of the mind, is a classical symbol of transformation through said potential since Ovid, to Shakespeare, to Keats, to Marvel's somewhat looser adaption of the same basic idea:

Elizabeth Braddock, Betsy to her friends, grew up in the U.K. with her older brother Jamie and her twin Brian, better known as Captain Britain. Betsy worked for S.T.R.I.K.E.'s psi division after her mutant telepathy manifested, lost her eyes in the line of duty, then was kidnapped by the extra-dimensional media mogul Mojo, who gave her new cybernetic eyes but forced her to star in his wild TV shows. She joined the X-Men, swapped bodies with a ninja name Kwannon, trapped the Shadow King within her own mind, died, and was later resurrected. In fact, there's not much Psylocke hasn't done in her life (source: "Marvel Vs. Capcom Origins: Psylocke," 2012).

Power as "darkness" is something to harness, channel and express for different reasons; it drinks the light trying to purify and extinguish it.

Furthermore, and from a pure applicatory standpoint during oppositional praxis, anyone can betray/stab someone in the back under the guise of luminary holiness and blind faith steered by bad, all in service to American Liberalism, white knight syndrome and capital; anyone can use the abstraction and aesthetic of demons and "darkness" to punch up. Cops and victims, pimps and whores, music and visuals—the state, under neoliberal Capitalism, creates whatever it needs in order to maintain its position; we respond in kind, existing in ways that use the same demonic language for our purposes, passing forbidden knowledge along: "We're here and we're queer!"

These ideas generally elide, and it's actually quite difficult to stress just how similar state and liberatory forms of power outwardly appear. They mirror each other on the same Aegis per the abjection process going forwards or in reverse; i.e., during liminal expression, through state monopolies and trifectas; e.g., "Gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss."

Cops, then, can look like victims (undercover), and whores can look like cops working for or against the state (re: brothel espionage—with "darkness" ontologically vague in ways the elite can use to expand the state of exception, and for us to hide and communicate inside it during the cryptonymy process).

"Darkness" is dualistic, is everything at once, is both the state justifying attacks on workers/nature and the rebel defending themselves/subverting state power through devilish cryptonymy showing you things that normally vanish the closer you get; i.e. are abjected, policed or recuperated by state proponents abusing them: scorn, sedition, lust and other riled-up, simmering emotions/repressed socio-political sentiments, biases, stigmas, phobias, etc (and the linguo-material things attached to either side of them). For political purposes, the disambiguating factor is function/flow, which parses through dialectical-material scrutiny! Cops flow power up towards the elite; rebels redistribute power and knowledge downwards, each addictive, intense, ready to devour and be devoured.

(artist: Durane-S)

Flexibility/vagueness of expression and interpretation is a strength, not a weakness because it constitutes an uncanny ability to play with powerful things and use them to tease people with titillating possibility as "dark," but also impressive. Whatever their forms, power and "darkness" remain thankfully diffuse and nebulous; i.e., linked to nature-as-monstrous-feminine per the cryptonymy and abjection processes; e.g., shadow warriors or similar beings of darkness, like pirates, barbarians, xenomorphs, Gothic castles, werewolves, and garden-variety Amazonian redheads—all giving weird nerds wet dreams (I want to fuck what I want to be): as badass, of-nature, partially inaccessible things to get close to and play with, "darkening" ourselves in ways that heal the world through subversion and camp as a kind of devious, wicked, energizing pulse to tap into.

Except, our "darkness" and demonic chaos works opposite state "darkness"; i.e., within the same devices at odds through duality. State chaos is a prison, one meant to contain and pacify workers in order to feed on them; emancipatory forms disable all of this, but still work through illusions of power meant to dominate through pain as much as erogenous pleasure. The idea is to unlock the unknown secrets of the body and mind through reunion with alienated fetishized things "of nature," but especially sex and force injected with irony as inventive; i.e., by pulling us towards truth as, to some degree, encased in powerful, "torturous" shadows that can meet many different communication goals; e.g., Satan's shapeshifting in Paradise Lost, but also Cú Chulainn's demonic ríastrad as "a visual reflection of disorder" (re: Enri's "Inside Out... and Upside Down," 2013). This can be a threat display to ward off predators, or paradoxically to attract them during calculated risk: "Ravish me, mommy war goddess! Take me into your bush, your sylvan scene! Green light!"

Playing with Power

Darkness is vague, a found document written in Greek; demons communicate through power expressed nerdishly as pleasure and pain, sex and force (Faust was a giant nerd, as was Victor Frankenstein, and so many others pursuing forbidden things to fill in their knowledge gaps). This symposium shall address all of these linguo-materials vagaries and try to articulate the nigh-endless ways you can think about power as such, while still applying it yourselves; i.e., in more productive and less harmful ways than state monopolies do; e.g., Thundercats' playing with dolls and symbols of power tied to medieval, European structures of power and their dialectical-material concerns/dualities parallel to various hauntological kinship rituals, rememory and rites of passage. State force doesn't solve anything and only leads to profit for the elite, thus rape and megadeath for us; to counteract those historical-material effects, workers must familiarize themselves with alienation and exile to poetically speak through the interlocutory (dialectic), cryptomimetic barter of demonic sex and force for workers; re: to give knowledge back to workers, transforming them into outsiders while still inside Plato's cave and inviting them to do the same with others—through shadows.

We'll get to that. As demons embody the at-times pulverized exchange of forbidden, thus policed transformative knowledge as a creative act, I'd further like to consider the vague, thus inherently broad umbrella category "darkness" and demonic poetics. We shall do so through an extended exhibit/apologia—one loosely containing various ideas to keep in mind; i.e., insofar as this creative process is a) normally monopolized to serve state forces, and b) reclaimed in the same exploitative boundaries by us to achieve liberation, developing Gothic Communism through ludo-Gothic BDSM: to play with demons, thus hug the alien as a shadowy figure/lie telling truth in virtually endless forms: "Life's fantasy—to be locked away and still to think you're free!" (Black Sabbath's "Die Young," 1980):

(exhibit 43e2a: Model and artist: Mugiwara Art and Persephone van der Waard. My drawing of Mugi as a dark visitor trapped between their devastated homeworld and ours; i.e., built on the fatal, Orientalist nostalgia of the 1980s Egyptian counterfeit: the return of the demon, demanding submission of the [canonically white] slave, the white Indian: "Frozen eyes stare deep in your eyes as you die!" From Percy Shelley's "Ozymandias" [1818] to Slayer's "Seasons in the Abyss" [1990], you'll have seen and heard such abjection everywhere, and multiple times in this book, already re: [Castlevania's Countess, Jojo's Pillar Men, Samus Aran and Skeletor, etc]. Here, it serves a vital theatrical role: "antiquity" in decay delivering calculated risk with a Numinous, beyond-the-realms-of-death traveling flavor we can reclaim from the elite; i.e., as neurodivergent personas challenging their bad demon BDSM—reversing abjection! To that, Mugi and I are both neurodivergent, but Mugi is also plural [and unless stated up front is seamless within a system]. Younger plurals tend to be more open about their condition as a matter of Gothic poetics.

For example, my older friend Mavis likes to be underestimated, operating more like a chameleon, a ninja. They are plural like Mugi is and can agree and disagree with me seamlessly within a position of survival. Once taught, they can't turn it off, and like all demons, they are made by capital exerting its will upon them. Similar to the nightmare scenario of the skeleton lord coming home to roost, plurality is often a consequence of trauma; i.e., demons are made, but as the entire following module will expose, they and their "darkness visible" can be used for different aims, to represent different things; e.g., plural people, queer persons, and/or Communists to varying degrees: medical conditions, social practices, class attitudes, often as things to summon and offer as paradoxes of forbidden knowledge and unequal power exchange. We become false and true at the same time, our way of seeing the world permanently altered: the inferno inverts, as does our sight—revealing that which is hidden by darkness with darkness.

Except the state doesn't need to be the only ones making demons and using them to advertise, "other cultures are savage, not us!"; workers can place "rape" in quotes using the same faux-Egyptian counterfeit, albeit for sex-positive reasons that don't unironically seek revenge against nature-as-alien, profiting as the state does on such inherited anxieties [re: "white people disease"]: a funeral procession making the planet dead as an Orientalist metaphor for fascism and moral panic, a cradle of conquerors and the devastation "they" routinely offer [a pro-state DARVO/obscurantist argument].

[artist: Zdzisław Beksiński]

Gothic Communism camps what is easily canonical, in this respect. The eclipse, here, equals the rising of the black, "ancient," faraway castle in either case; i.e., as a projection of all the usual bourgeois abuses onto fear-and-dogma playgrounds: the liminal hauntology of war [a flying castle, Walpole's Capitalocene] on the rise. Canon-wise, it merely becomes a middle-class opportunity to cash in on abjection, as so many did during the 1980s; i.e., move money through nature while dressing everything neoliberally up as "alien, past" [the Stargate Egyptology trick: ancient aliens tied to Biblical reinventions, specifically Exodus] and speaking to that Cartesian division through metal, cartoons, comics, videogames and so on—to sex, drugs and rock 'n roll as essentially dark demonic pulp, thus where power truly lies. For canon, the black pyramid is simply the West diminished, apologizing for "Ra" [and the sun-like Imperium] as merely decayed, unstable like a volcano during the dialectic of the alien and needing a Walpolean facelift. It's abject pacification, mid-consumerism—the worship of power-in-decay displaced to an other time, a liminal space, a Gothic-castle Sodom and Gomorrah to play with all manner of demons inside a castled morphology: floodgates to Hell, promising oblivion once thrown wide!

[source]

*When I was living this lie, fear was my game
People would worship and fall
Drop to their knees
So bring me the blood and red wine
For the one to succeed me
For he is a man and a god
And he will die too*

[...] Now I am cold but a ghost lives in my veins Silent the terror that reigned Marbled in stone

A shell of a man God preserved

*For a thousand ages
But open the gates of my hell
I'll strike from the grave*

*Tell me why I had to be a Powerslave
I don't wanna die, I'm a god
Why can't I live on?
When the Life Giver dies
All around is laid waste
And in my last hour
I'm a slave to the Power of Death [source: Genius].*

To this, one of the monopolies I articulate is morphological expression; re: Hell and darkness. This power is neoliberal Capitalism in decay as something to camp; i.e., to monologue as Langella does, the sassy lich becoming a god waxing poetic about the power of "death," for a fleeting moment: "I feel the power of the cosmos; the universe flows through me! [...] The universe's power! Pure, unstoppable power!

And I am that force! I am that power! Kneel before your master!"; re: "I am become death, destroyer of worlds!" He's a filthy whore, deluding himself as much as being a Darth Vader pimp from Space Egypt.

Such delusion mainly the point, the performative megalomaniacal idea is to own the stage as whore-like; i.e., during a given, profoundly intense and campy instance of the grim harvest/Grim Reaper as exotic, magical, straight-up stylish and cool. We faggish whores do it to draw attention to state predation and puff ourselves up, as proletarian counterterrorist guerrillas historically do; by comparison, the state monopolizes the night's black boner/sodomy champion/gay butt wizard [the ass is dark and full of terrors] or resident catgirl⁴⁸ Medusa death god, summoning and raping them unironically through police violence before banishing them again—rinse and repeat. As always, liberation and exploitation share the same stage/shadow zone's power-and-death, sex-and-force aesthetics.

In the classic neoliberal refrain, Capitalist Realism strengthens by virtue of a presence of corruption and decay darkening the city scape as coming—per the "black Egyptian" classic displacement—out of the imaginary past to threaten the present world with a ghost of the counterfeit: the pimp-like Great Destroyer traveling from older decayed empires into the Imperial Core as weakened and using garden variety obfuscation and DARVO; i.e., deflecting criticism and projecting state violence onto the same-old victims. Through English operas, rock 'n roll and Gothic, then, power and darkness express less in funeral poems and more in funerary incantations—Christianized per the Resurrection as abject, Gothic in the NWOBHM style [re: as Iron Maiden did, above, with death anxiety and inheritance fears; e.g., "Hallowed Be Thy Name," 1982].

To this, a Nazi-Communist skeleton king or Medusa [a dark Cleopatra, "O rare Egyptian!"] conveniently shows up, displacing current systemic harm back onto the same imperiled world; i.e., the Imperial Boomerang and military urbanism returning per a fatal homecoming [as the Gothic generally does]. In response, a white knight is canonically summoned to whitewash the Imperial Core through a false promise of restoration; i.e., one that conveniently banishes the angry foreigner/Wandering Jew [and his global conspiracy/cabal—the titular "Masters of the Universe"] whence they came [from the glossary]:

⁴⁸ I.e., graveyard sex in "ancient" mighty ways; e.g., Capcom's Menat, below, as a catgirl and mummy (with cats being holy guardians of the Ancient Egyptian underworld, and mummies generally being important figures wealthy enough to have tombs, thus leave their legacy behind, preserved into the afterlife). Such antiquated abjections' imaginary forms work similar to European progressions; i.e., merging sex, rapture, sacrifice and death into comparable spaces/bodies "from elsewhere": as, to some extent, dating back to Biblical times and Ancient Egypt, but generally reimagined to a hauntological degree. In short, it's a gimmick, and a lucrative one; i.e., calculated risk to uphold the status quo during Capitalism in decay, middle-class predation and tokenism! Our liberation reverses these pimp-like devices, giving "ancient" power back to whores! No gods, no masters! Just sluts of darkness owning the means of shadowy production. Dark Pharaoh mommy pussy a kind of "mil spec," power and darkness assume many forms!

(artist Reiq)

The Ghost of the Counterfeit

Coined by Jerrold Hogle, this abject reality or hidden barbarity is a hauntological process of abjection that, according to David Punter in The Literature of Terror: A History of Gothic Fictions from 1765 to the Present Day (1980), "displaces the hidden violence of present social structures, conjures them up again as past, and falls promptly under their spell" (source). I would add that it is a privileged, liminal position that endears a sheltered consumer to the barbaric past as reinvented as consumable.

In other words, it's the usual scapegoater summoning the Radcliffean castle during the liminal hauntology of war to enact Red Scare, except we can reclaim such devices to forge our own destinies with the self-same demonic language of the imaginary past. The state doesn't monopolize that shit, and Langella's performance [and Silvestri's sweeping score] become things to camp the ghost of "Caesar" and Marx with in equal measure: "A battle fought in the stars...now comes to Earth."

artist: [Drew Struzan]

For the state, it's Star Wars' billionaire Marxism, but Gothic like Alien was while cycling profit through an endless series of centrist, neoliberal wars, battles, heroes and villains: an Americanized temple of "ancient" war traveling to and fro along with its conspicuously swole deities/avatars thereof carried into shooter-style videogames, especially [Doom's unironically hypermasculine Doomguy as a profoundly stupid and violent himbo protagonist]. It's gibberish, made-up demonic hieroglyphic nonsense settled through force; i.e, disrespectful towards the actual past as something to learn from in imaginary forms, administering dogmatically through faux "archaeology" and sold over and over to maintain Capitalist Realism: by glorifying police violence as "timeless," eternal, pimping nature as dark and dead graveyard whore.

Canon-wise, it's an old war-film tactic, and one that translates to pretty much anything violent; e.g., gangster films and Westerns [like Heat's \[1995\] infamous bank robbery scene](#) and the ending shoot-out to [The Wild Bunch \[1969\]](#): cops and robbers, but also dragon slayers; i.e., one-man armies whose hauntological worship under capital ignores the regular victims of those exchanges—nature and workers, obscured by evil necromancers. We can camp all of this, but remain entirely beholden to the same astral poetics. Simply put, knowledge is power but limited in ways that Gothic poetics supplement. Like printing money as much as comic books, the state wants to monopolize violence, terror and hellish bodily expression using their us-versus-them arrangement of demons; i.e., a canonical flow of power and knowledge to serve the state by pacifying workers with moral panics and their demonic codes under heteronormative, settler-colonial rule: more targets of state violence, established by playing with demonic stand-ins. All occupy the same shadow zone and use the same dark forces to say this or that.

Canon-wise, banishing a demon back to Hell is functionally no different than slaying a dragon, punching a Jewish-coded wizard, or shooting a zombie, insofar as the endless bullets, beams, missiles, muscles, blades and bombs [re: "stab, shoot, punch"] all equal profit in the eyes of capitalists selling police violence; i.e., by having soldiers, mercenaries and cops [usually himbos and token herbos] use them on the requisite victims, the latter dressed up as monsters: to be destroyed by other monsters during canonically escapist "empowerment" fantasies.

Videogames—being the classic neoliberal refrain—become monomythic war simulators built atop older media forms already designed from an early age to condition people into cops [of media, childhoods]: us-versus-them against nature-as-monstrous-feminine [whore-like] married to anti-Semitic, Orientalist and otherwise xenophobic stories framing nature as abject, as "ancient," dark, and unruly! Antagonize nature, then tokenize it and put it to work in ways that cloud its vision and judgement; e.g., Amazons like Ellen Ripley and Samus Aran, Hippolyta pimping Medusa. Betrayal is betrayal and cops are cops according to how they attack and drain nature-as-alien: summoned by state necromancers to induce a police, us-versus-them function. Canonically speaking, monsters are made to uphold and disseminate this device; i.e., to learn its ins and outs by playing with it through state-sanctioned toys classically made from wood, clay and metal, soil and shadows, etc—[with L.A. Beast even attempting to make a sword out of Casein plastic: spoiled milk⁴⁹]. Canon makes worlds it populates with Pax-Americana cops and victims, the state Aegis asking workers, "Would you kindly break that sweet puppy's neck?" while making it look large and frightening. Nature is a whore; rape it [often with whores policing whores, left].

artist: [Xavier Garcia]

⁴⁹ L.A. Beast's "Best of The Worst (Failed Video Ideas)," (2024); timestamp: 11:48.

While a proletarian Aegis [often, a booty humanizing the whore] can dualistically and dialectically-materially reverse all of this—i.e., in order to make workers reflect on dark unpleasant realities as they evolve—in the eyes of the state, each is already dead and blind; re [from Marx]: dead labor sucks on living labor to enrich the state with cheaply stolen life, itself further rendered [vis-à-vis my arguments] into addictive junk food marshalling the entire process not once, but on loop, mid-Amazonomachia. In turn, the state cannibalizes its "muscle" [cops] per the euthanasia effect [re: tokens first, then black knights/crooked male cops]: "Bitches be crazy!" They must eventually be married off, generally as burly whores stuffed into bridal gowns [or chainmail bikinis enslaving them to the recruitment process, below]: war is eternal, its pimping forever collared during boom or bust [which again, we can camp, but always inside the same poetic spaces and on their dark angry surfaces; "enjoy but do not endorse," as Sarkeesian sagely puts it].

artist: [Reiq]

Until retirement, cops are bully vampires that enjoy an army of demonic victims, the latter waiting politely to be destroyed by said enforcers in doubled states of purgatorial exception; i.e., fetishizing the alien to disguise how banal and unsexy the state and economics are [e.g., Red Sonya is basically a sexy alien queen/demon warrior dangled in front of nerdy boys, done canonically to pacify them with "Red Scare," left]. Playing with smaller toys during a Sale of Indulgence as war-like, such canonical war games acclimate children [starting with white cis-het men] to the complicit cryptonymy of darkness-as-genocide; i.e., standard-to-marginalized traitors playing war for the state; e.g., women playing token subjugate Amazons [re: the monstrous-feminine] like Ripley or Samus, Cheetara or Red Sonya, and status-quo knights like Doomguy or Conan, He-Man or Lion-O, Rambo, etc, doing much the same with men. Power is comparable to itself as something to enforce through shadowy likeness.

For the elite, the goal is simple: "Make monster hero predators and monster victim prey⁵⁰ and comfort middle-class children, from standard to token as needed; threaten them with pulpy harm, then furnish them with clay-like surrogate parents, avatars and war-bride wheyfus for them to grow into: demonic sex and power fantasies, thus rewards." Triangulating against state victims by playing victims themselves, cops manifest as supermen/superwomen impossibly threatened by darkness visible [re: "the enemy is both weak and strong"] and motivated by damsels-in-distress [the usual TERF gimmick] tokenizing feminism-in-decay [and other rotting recuperations that eventually rescind state concessions] set within a Gothic liminal space; i.e., the Man Box—one that isolates the hero monomythically inside Hell as a place to endlessly slay between childhood and adulthood, imagination and real life: a cop to call or a vigilante to triangulate against the unruly mob not just as undead, but demonic! Weird canonical nerds don't just see red, but all the colors of "the Covenant of the Rainbow":

⁵⁰ For more work on predator and prey per Amazons and knights, refer to my chapter from Volume One, "Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy."

And God blessed Noah and his sons and said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth. The fear and dread of you will fall on every living creature on the earth, every bird of the air, every creature that crawls on the ground, and all the fish of the sea. They are delivered into your hand. Everything that lives and moves will be food for you; just as I gave you the green plants, I now give you all things [source: Genesis 9].

Through not classically what "Rainbow Capitalism" refers to, the regressive likeness is tempting enough. Called to heel, corporations abuse a Protestant ethic after God's death [re: Nietzsche] to have state boys and girls rape nature for them in the usual hauntological Crusades: the "apolitical" stance of seeing planet Earth as a game to act power out in ways that historically oscillate/transfer onstage and off. Oddly colorful and toy-like, said paradoxical vision reflects in the hero's, theirs literally making for a heads-up display⁵¹ [above] but also curiously set to equally hauntological music stolen from a rebellious past.

Visuals and audio, everything becomes like fruity slop—an infernal breakfast cereal stuffed with sugar, bad ideas and even worse intent; i.e., communicating the same fatal nostalgia to gamer culture while trapped inside the Man Box, coded to defend the state by devoting themselves to colonizing said fantasies [any and all of them, across all media forms]. For videogames, this generally locks inside half-real kill rooms mirroring real life in ways the state wants; re: Gothic liminal spaces whose heroically police-violent movement and action inside is written in spilled demon blood—everything set conspicuously to rock 'n roll and similar "rebellious" music, its plastic reality's fatal nostalgia turned into controlled opposition: holocaust by sprite and MIDI-tune versions of older devil's music bled of its wicked irony/potential [from opera, rock, rockabilly [fast cars, faster women], metal, punk, swing and rap, etc]!

⁵¹ An effect shared with other videogames we've examined, like Metroid and Castlevania as giving the hero, per Cartesian thought, quantifiable means of mapping and destroying a built world; i.e., with a numbered, arcade-style element per what can be taken from the world and absorbed into the hero, or thrust by the hero into the world—a health bar and ammo counter as they kill the state's demonic enemies in vampiric fashion.

Hardly a trade secret, capital needs such things to function according to the profit motive guiding such poetics. As I write in Volume Zero

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth-like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion—a franchise to subdue during military optimism sold as a childhood exercise towards "playing war" in fantastical forms; e.g., Castlevania or Metroid. Conjure a Radcliffean menace inside the Imperial Core, then meet it with American force [source].

I then go on to expand in Volume One

The grander counterterrorist moral isn't simply that traumatic penetration is psychosexual violence, which fetishes corporally represent; it's that such devices can be reclaimed through iconoclastic praxis during liminal expression, wherein one chooses to fetishize oneself in controlled, informed psychosexual terms. Despite the ambivalent, conflicted nature of Gothic language, the awesome power to set ourselves free lives within us and our bodies as transcendent gateways to better worlds of infinite possibility framed as "impossible" by Capitalist Realism. Except, Hell—if it is to be a home for all of nature criminalized by Cartesian thought—must be a place on Earth. We must become of two worlds, then, "half-bred" to wreak havoc and sow discord towards a better kind of place than Cartesian order does when enforced by moderate cunning and reactionary brutes' usual dogma. Their knife dicks rape and kill; ours "rape" and "kill" to drain our would-be-murders' potency when aiming their weapons against us. They freeze under our power insofar as we humanize ourselves in their eyes and expose them as the brutalizers.

To this, Gothic-Communist instruction occurs through praxial synthesis telling a different story than canon does, the latter's norms preying on nature and bodies tied to nature as something to harvest ("fat" being the classic state of something "ready-for-harvest"). By humanizing the harvest, the butt needn't be a symbol of chattel, nor its owner's smiling face a forced Doki-Doki-Literature-Club-style mask. The smile of the soon-to-be-fucked can be genuine; when the owner raises their butt, they can illustrate mutual consent, indicating how they actively want it from being hard-up: begging for some dick a particular way from a particular type of person while reclaiming the activity with their body and all too happy to do so—i.e., "We are not animals, nor are we guilty or afraid. Now gimme." It becomes vitalistic in a vampiric way that celebrates the transmission of essence and vitality through all the usual vectors, minus the stigmas; i.e., a revival of older pre-Cartesian ways for seeing the world, updated for the kinds of dialogs-under-capital that have carefully evolved to bring these monsters (and their complicated humanity under state oppression) out into the open: a vampire standing in daylight, making them sparkle.

Trauma is always adjacent to sexuality and performance, but needn't determine the outcome. Insofar as harm can be reduced to calculated risk in forms of iconoclastic playfulness, the imaginary past remains plastic, thus can be recoded by empowering monstrous aesthetics with a critical-instructional edge, but also jouissance; e.g., the vampire as a play on rape theatre, traumatic penetration (stakes and fangs) and vitalistic power exchange through medieval language as reclaimed by ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., from Cartesian thought's bad instruction under capital: a harvesting of sanguine that enriches both parties through informed consent that profanes the church and returns to nature [source].

which I now tie to demons, here; i.e., this transfer doesn't have to be seen exclusively as vampiric through a taking of essence, but instead a giving of forbidden knowledge as demons do on their surfaces and inside their thresholds.

Such fatal portraits yield a flexible monomorphic poetic lens, one to think of monstrous things in demonic terms as much as vampiric ones: the foreclosure of dreams, but also the brokering of new ones [false or not].

Capital bullies and rapes nature as monstrous-feminine, except the monstrous-feminine is holistic, employing a variety of modules all at once; e.g., Lady Dimitrescu from Resident Evil: Village [below, 2021] being a vampire on her face, but also a giant, shapeshifting demon: the Medusa as a golem-gargoyle Galatea. While she turns to stone when she dies, she's already statuesque and colossal. And while she has an outwardly humanoid form, she's also no maiden.

Furious or calm, she's always a whore, and yields strict-flavored energies in a Gothically "phallic" type: a foxy gangster moll with no immediate boss running her side of things—Bonnie without Clyde, the Archaic Mother with a curiously recent, noir-flavored timestamp!

artist: [Felicia Vox]

"Power corrupts" is generally referring to state power. Yes, Medusa's Aegis can poetically amount to state abuse weaponizing the "strong" against the meek to inherit the Earth for the elite; but it can also be those whores "of nature" taking the planet back—by subverting the dialectic of the alien, making darkness something to get close to and become "dark" in turn! During such reversals, the whore becomes a demonic muse that corrupts canonical data and transmits subversive, concentric replicas inside the Trojan Horse's formidable "wagon"; i.e., as doubled, bouncing back onto the glass of the screen—not war for the state, but workers raising class, culture and race war through Neo-Gothic, cryptomimetic means: "Medusa lives; now fight back!" Her harvest humanized, Medusa's letting it all hang out! Merely doing so challenges state monopolies on their face; i.e., states are pimps that rely on whores being policed/punched down against and brutalized into order to exist as states do. Silence is genocide, but genocide is never fully silent. Frontier romances always come home.

artist: [Sinead]

In response, iconoclasts can loudly revisit and reshape the state's harmful ideas of "past" in Gothic; i.e., through "tone poem" art as highly personal-yet-cathartic—not just the shape, but the perception of shapes that don't always change that much in appearance; e.g., a drawing I did of Lady Dimitrescu, originally made by me when I was with Jadis, only to have me return to it three years later for this exhibit. My new version, below, and the original share a love for big strong women, and infuse into their surfaces a strict dominatrix/whorish character for the audience to enjoy and shudder at. Even so, the new picture also seeks, despite those likenesses, to make the alien past friendlier to workers; i.e., per an oppressed pedagogy's Wisdom of the Ancients recultivating the bourgeois Superstructure: as conceptualized since I wrote my PhD and three other books [up to this point].

The two drawings are quite similar in their design and message, then; I'm just continuing to synthesize them more and more to my liking after surviving Jadis—e.g., akin to Georgia O'Keefe painting flowers after leaving Alfred Stieglitz, but in my case, occurring through active daily habits I've kept up after leaving someone who was openly a TERF and a SWERF [thus highly abusive towards me as a trans-woman artist and sex worker]!

artist: [Persephone van der Waard]

Sex and force, pleasure and pain; BDSM, fetishes and cliché rape, death and general power fantasies—all work well enough with demons as undead, in this respect: out of joint, doing their own thang to not just to shapeshift, but turn into objects d'art coded with power. They amount to sex and force expressed as verboten "darkness" but, like the Tree of Knowledge, just hang there begging to be plucked and bitten into. It's a vanity—a diaphanous robe hanging open and showing the viewer the whore's goods beckoning into sites of power to play with forbidden knowledge! Per the cryptonymy process, things can be framed to show and hide what you want shown or hidden, but power is always there, always restless and unstable per the vanishing point: "Watch and learn!" but also "Indulge, you sick fucks!" Weird attracts weird, in this respect; trauma attracts trauma, X marking the spot, playing with superhuman symbols of power that range from kayfabe⁵² to kawaii: crimefighters and archvillains moonlighting as genuine rebels in our capable hands, a secret identity/alter ego with a secret identity/alter ego! Doubles can double [and double and double...] and whores are an aesthetic and political stance with various sides to them!

artist: [Beefy Kunoichi]

Gothic Communism plays with these accordingly in order to threaten capital and tease development in ways that reward us; i.e., with actual empowerment [socio-material change] while giving the lesson away as forbidden cargo disguised as dumb entertainment/traditional ideas of strength, beauty and vice/virtue: stories classically made during genocide as a spoonful of sugar to help the medicine go down. We take that idea and use it to lead to bitter pills we supplement with our own "sugar" to spice things up! That's generally how allegory works, and our doing so is yet another black eye we, together as one, align to give state poetics!

"The villagers feared the plague and ran away. All it took was one dead horse to scare them." Fascism is like a tinderbox. Whores, then, are a crime of reputation that only can redeem itself by doing, as the state defines it, more crimes. When the state sees you as alien, that's precisely what existence is, but in doing so becomes stronger than the foundations of the Earth, as terrible as the dawn, as deep and unknowable as the depths of the sea. Like the moon, Medusa becomes something to invoke and consequently summon as an appeal; i.e., to the humanity of those demonized. Seen as forces of nature pushing against the Capitalocene, they strive to safeguard nature before state shift becomes permanent. So much damage has already been done, much of it irreversible. But as the saying goes, it ain't over till the fat lady sings, and she's just warming up [so to speak].

Life is an experiment, as is rebellion through Gothic art. My experiment with Dimitrescu is just one of many. So many artists play around in much the same sphere of Gothic poetics. The power of revolutionary cryptonymy is something formidable to robe and disrobe as needed; i.e., mixing and matching all manner of powerful and transformative devices, from bodies to swords to castles, to sword-like and castled bodies, etc, as political but appearing as things commonly disputed as "apolitical"; e.g., wish fulfillment and power fantasies told in common language: worker bodies manifesting a desire to never be hurt again but remain desirable—to be stacked in ways that make up for the odds being stacked against them. We are the night, and it can never fully be purged. "What is light without darkness?" The state cannot exist without us to police, but we very much can exist without the state! We want equal rights, not pimps, so tip your sex workers and refuse to ratify genocide in all its forms!

⁵² There's a mix-and-match, conglomerate quality to Gothic that's nearly as old as monsters, kayfabe, theatre, dolls, and combat itself (we won't have time to do more that flirt with the idea, but my PhD discusses it at length; for a fun, shorter example, consider Napoleon Blownapart's "A Brief History of Freakshow Fighting," 2023).

artist: [Vasilia]

Again, that's where we come in. Whores are both treated as homewreckers and instructors of forbidden knowledge that turn the nuclear model upside-down; e.g., polyamory vs amatonormativity. In turn, people learn through Gothic sex as sexual, but also as asexual insofar as its BDSM can yield artistic and political commentaries about different social-sexual issues and struggles. As sex symbols of demonic beauty and strength, whores remain powerful while disrobed, reversing abjection as such by refusing to cheerlead profit as a genocidal, heteronormative, settler-colonial affair. Instead, we cheer for our right to fuck/get railed by whomever and own our bodies and their labor value expressed in monstrous, GNC language!

With a body like Eva's [above] from the same videogame franchise, Lady Dimitrescu cooks with gas, popping cherries. Beyond her and her children, nature is simply "Medusa." Anyone the state could police and pimp, then, Medusa will double to challenge them through a polyamorous, unruly proletariat's doubles of state counterfeits. She's truly seen and done it all, having survived worse: the state often beating and raping workers to submission, but not what they represent in duality! Medusa's body is sex, and sex is a demonic weapon for which no monopoly is possible! There is only argument for or against the state, generally through theatrical combat where the state tries to portray itself as the underdog and its victims' the "real" abusers; in turn, truth becomes a matter of position concerning which aspect of theatre you want to support—the Gothic concerned largely with paradox about multiple things being true at once. Such is dialectical-materialism, a series of paradoxes through monsters in duality! Heroes are about overcoming adversity. Unlike the state's, ours is actually genuine, but theirs is likewise an impossible task. Demons don't die.

artist: [Vasilia]

So play with "Medusa" from any angle, size, shape, sex or gender your rebellious hearts desire; observe what collocates, then insinuate [with sinew] as your "clay" to work with, making gender trouble for fun. Make demons not to pleasure Pygmalion, but liberate Galatea so she might stomp on the Patriarchy's balls! "Chonk, stronk, and ready to bonk!" as Jadis would say! BALLS DESTROYED [or sliced with a sickle cropped out of the image, above; re: Barbara Creed, the Medusa, and castration fears from the Archaic Mother and her phallic spawn].

Keeping with darkness visible and paradox, then—and darkly mirroring older morality plays from centuries previous [mainly concerned with warring emotions and desire surrounding sex and force]—virtue and vice become things to demonically double, reify and dualistically play with medieval gags as demons do. Except Gothic Communism abjures the state's policing character in exchange for actual rebellion; i.e., flashing with power during revolutionary cryptonymy in pursuit of a sex-positive, post-scarcity world! The whore, like Pandora, cannot be put back into her box; her "box" is out there, a mighty-mighty fortress speaking cryptomimetically out against pimps while demanding equal pay and other basic human rights! All such play goes where power is to investigate it, we underdogs existing in the same imperiled sphere as our enemies, camping their canonical, completely unethical [and unfair] refrains!

All this being said, power is often not just visual, but audio-visual; i.e., a peep show generally comes with music of some kind or another! So keeping all that bread-and-circus music and violence we've already mentioned in mind, and the vampire-demon exhibit above, canon's inclusive pandemonium has a commercialized, pandering feel to it; i.e., using older examples of demons sold to men [or those acting like men] who never grow up, but LARP to "defend the realm" from evil: projected onto whatever state enemies they demonize, then conceal/dogwhistle with the usual suspects by proxy. The whore is something to attack in-game and out [which we camp in an equally half-real sense].

Yet, while sight has an aural, heard component to accent its visuals, this can decay and age just as fast when abused by profit. For example, as I write in, "Spectating FPS Speedruns: Potential Pitfalls Exemplified by Doom Eternal" [2021]:

Classic Doom is a curious mix, and takes its visual cues from actual gargoyles, toy guns, and clay demons; its music is MIDI metal, but also post-punk, '70s prog and '90s grunge. Doom 3 features elegant, nefarious concept art and dark, industrial levels, but minimal music (the opening track is pretty great, but rips off Tool's "Lateralus"; it also features Chris Vrenna, a former NIN drummer). Doom 2016 had a giant corporation being re-colonized by the demonic oppressed, underpinned by some desaturated visuals (inspired by late dystopian surrealist Zdzisław Beksiński) and excellent level music (re: "Rip and Tear," "BFG Division"). This music was composed by Nu-Industrial auteur Mick Gordon.

As observed in my original review, Doom Eternal's music isn't bad. Parts of it come alive, though especially when making obscure nods to older games (Diablo) and movies (Predator). Nonetheless, it's fairly journeyman and rote; or, as [one of my exes] once said, Doom Eternal's OST feels like "industrial lite"—music written for people who have never listened to industrial before. For my partner, the music builds, but never climaxes. It hints at NIN, Rabbit Junk or Front Line Assembly but doesn't go anywhere with it. You'd be better off listening to those bands instead (see, also: Reznor's soundtrack for The Vietnam War).

For me, Doom Eternal's checkered music production history leaves a bad taste in my mouth. Originally the story (from id Software Studio Director Marty Stratton) involved an open letter on Reddit in 2020, detailing how Mick's unprofessional music for the second game was delivered late, forcing Chad Mossholder, id's lead audio engineer, to have to piece everything together himself; later, Chad and id really got a lot of hate from fans, and Mick seemingly stayed quiet about it. Except after two years, Mick came forward with a ton of receipts, saying Marty lied about the circumstances surrounding the DOOM Eternal Soundtrack and used disinformation and innuendo to blame me entirely for its failure. Afterwards, he offered me a six-figure settlement to never speak about it. As far as I'm concerned, the truth is more important (source).

As Greg Kennelty writes in "Mick Gordon Publishes Massive Statement over Allegations Surrounding Doom Eternal Soundtrack" (2022):

All told, Gordon's post runs about an hour in length and is long enough to warrant a table of contents. In the Summary of Facts section, Gordon alleges the following against Stratton [emphasis, theirs]:

- He was not paid for over half of the DOOM Eternal soundtrack
- He received a contract for the soundtrack 48 hours prior to the release of the game, and was not told the entire truth about the scope of his work
- He was cut out of the process at the end of the soundtrack

- Stratton never reached out to him about the controversy, and instead published the open letter
- He received torrents of abuse and harassment from fans afterward
- His reputation has been damaged because of this situation

Read the full letter here.

*I don't care if the guy is an artist that "everybody" loves; compared to famous FPS OSTs from artists like Bobby Prince, Trent Reznor or Sonic Mayhem—hell, even Mick himself—the OST for Doom Eternal just isn't that great. It doesn't break any new ground, and it feels like a double CD release that could've been trimmed down to just the "combat" tracks. You know, the ones with an actual pulse [source].*

Furthermore, old monsters can start to feel adrift as time goes on, like soldiers without countries or wars to fight. Sometimes there's a punk element, as Richard Ray remarks in "Doom, Coronavirus, the Mancubus and Me" [2020]:

*id Software's Doom was made by a band of dropouts and misfits led by gaming pioneers John Romero and John Carmack. It is widely considered the grandfather of the First Person Shooter genre. It's also been aptly described as gaming's "punk moment." It was loud, fast, violent and didn't give a shit about your feelings. It glorified the sound effect of pumping a shotgun and blasting away at fire-spewing Imps, vile Cacodemons, unholy Hell Knights and zombified employees of the Union Aerospace Corporation [source].*

*Except, of course, this gamer-style history of "rebellion"—from Tolkien to Cameron to Romero and Carmack, to speedrunners and content creators at large as weird canonical nerds seriously, just [look at these two dweebs, left—is all at once incredibly dumb, self-serving and largely false, from a revolutionary standpoint; i.e., aimed squarely at gamer culture performing strength: as something largely white, cis-het and male⁵³. Made to "rebel" against a cartoon idea* capitalizing on being a cynic, as Maynard from Tool does in "Enema" (1996) should be wholly discouraged:

⁵³ I.e., Bill Gates syndrome, such privilege having fascist components when the punk elements, if ever they even existed, decay into pro-state forms playing the rebel/victim; e.g., Tool's Maynard James Keenan (from Volume Two, part one):

Some say the end is near
Some say we'll see Armageddon soon
I certainly hope we will
I sure could use a vacation from this (source: Genius)

This is fascist rhetoric delivered by white privileged men, seeing the "end times" as a "vacation" that is anything but a natural disaster (though Capitalism profits off manmade interference assisting in so-called "natural disasters"); it's an apocalypse to shoot "zombies" with until things "go back to normal." Except they won't during state shift, and the fascists and moderates will eat each other (unable to farm or tend the land around them, much like the original American colonists/so-called "Pioneers" were unable to). The only imbeciles who would say this is a self-centered cunt who paradoxically thinks it doesn't apply to them; i.e., a white boy's charmed life posturing as doomsayer and preacher cashing in on their own Kool-Aid to sell to the kiddies (source).

It's white people disease, specifically that of violent, disingenuous white boys who never quite grow up, save to kill state enemies in their own victimized hero complexes. It's not just dumb for its own sake (re: "Army of Darkness: Valorizing the Idiot Hero," 2020), but complicit in the face of genocide; i.e., as something to turn your back on and blind eyes towards while raking in money through the usual mechanisms geared towards weird canonical nerds to begin with (a concept we'll unpack in Volume Three when we critique said nerds). There is no win condition, just necrometrics and lies committed by whitey playing the victim time and time again. Until then, it's business-as-usual, shutting anyone out who doesn't conform/toe the line.

I'm speaking from experience here; i.e., I used to work with white cis-het male streamers in my different interview series about Doom and FPS in general; e.g., the "Hell-Blazers" series (2020) with Byte Me, Under the Mayo, Your Mate Devo and others. However, the moment I began to research the games these men played in ways that critiqued them in a genderqueer/postcolonial manner (as I slowly left the closet and challenged Capitalism in the process), they ghosted me. It was as though a cone of silence, an omerta, had been enacted upon me when I said the quiet part out loud (from a now-defunct 2020 piece, "Postcolonialism in Doom," featured on Marilyn Roxie's also-defunct blog, Video Hookups):

Like Ripley, the Slayer unwillingly serves a powerful, corporate employer—in his case the slippery Dr. Hayden, head of the UAC corporation. Faced with an energy crisis "the world had no answer for," Hayden has colonized Hell to harvest its energy. Who inhabits this unlucky 4th world? Demons, of course—monsters, whose only purpose is to be slain. Of course, it's entirely possible to see the demons of 2016/2020 as an extension of their 1993 forebears: heavy metal piñatas. Smash them; have fun. However, it's hardly the sole interpretation, even if the makers intended otherwise. It's even possible for the player to see his enemies in-game as piñatas, but for this to reflect a parallel viewpoint held by him outside of the game.

In this video at AGDQ for example, the livestreamer Byte Me pauses Doom 2016 to thank United States military members for their service. When I heard this, I found myself unable to view his words as neutral praise; an army has orders, after all. This remains true despite AGDQ being a charity fund-raiser where Doom is just another game being played to generate cash. Soldiers, or people who support them, still play Doom to revel in its slaughter of evil corporations, they do so by soldiering against "evil," occupying positions of settler-colonial violence to administer as cops do. "Demon," then, is really canonical code for all the usual things white boys [and token recruits] shoot in the name of state/corporate preservation as beaten into them; i.e., to achieve, for all intents and purposes, an unironic, middle-class clubbism/gang-style revenge of the/for the nerds; re [from Volume Two, part one]:

In turn, the American middle class (so called "gamer culture") would gatekeep and safeguard the elite through videogames being an acclimating device to neo-feudal territories to defend in reality (outside of the game world[s] themselves) as capital starts to decay like usual [source: "Modularity and Class"].

Back then, white boys "rebelled" as a matter of having the means to do so on '90s computers [and other home entertainment systems] evolving into a business they got a jumpstart on for themselves as extensions of capital; i.e., what they created, as such. Their creations—our aforementioned heroes, if they were punk in a proletarian sense—quickly became witch hunters once recuperated amid fairly stupid debates had between fighting gangs circle-jerking it⁵⁴; they invent enemies and jingoistic camaraderie. It might pale against the reality of military service, but it still reflects said service through a videogame made for a larger audience. Not all members of this audience are soldiers, but those who are can revel in the game for their own reasons.

Perhaps it's better for those who benefit from Doom Eternal's gregarious qualities to avoid having it stamped as a military recruiting tool, a la America's Army: Proving Grounds (2015). Even if Doom Eternal wasn't built strictly as a recruiting tool, its imagery can, at the very least, be adopted laterally for this purpose. People with similar views can arguably flock to the same banner and say it belongs to them, not unlike a national flag. Already there's a sense of division, wherein someone like myself who enjoys Doom feels divided from its more warlike customers. I'm against war, so politically we're already of two opposing camps going in. Doom is still being marketed to a larger, heterogenous group: the old-school shooter crowd. Not all shooters shoot things in real life, but when gamers openly support the military "slaying demons" around the globe, the door for postcolonialism gets thrown wider than the gates of hell (source [repost]: "Those Who Walk Away from Speedrunning").

This cold shoulder extended to anyone in the industry—from John Romero to Nick Newhard (the former whose wife answered my emails but never followed up, the latter who acted interested until I mentioned my left-leaning political lens).

A similar thing happened with British Brat, who expressed an interest in being interviewed... until I mentioned my genderqueer politics. Like Byte Me, Brat is a military man and acted friendly to my face (as white moderates generally will do), but ceased all contact the moment he realized I was who I was: queer and against war in videogames—in short, an encapsulation of Gamergate attacking anyone who isn't "neutral/apolitical" by icing them out; i.e., segregating dissidents to enforce said neutrality in service to profit. It becomes all about them—their music, their toys, their guns, their land—taking it all for granted as Man Box thinking enslaves them to the same-old cruel grind; i.e., violence always being the solution, graduating from kiddie violence to grown-up forms per soldier, per generation.

⁵⁴ E.g., Clerks 2 (2006): "There's only one "Return" and it's not of the King, it's of the Jedi!" A cop's a cop, Kevin Smith (also, you're a giant homophobe and Mark Hamill's a Zionist cunt, regardless of how he plays out in your stupid He-man reboot).

to feel useful while seeking payment as capital decays like always. It's vital, then, to court such persons through counterterrorist demonic expression, using ludo-Gothic BDSM to offer them a better path than the state does [refer to Volume One for some good examples of this; i.e., the subchapter "An Uphill Battle, part one: 'Predators and Prey,' or Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy and the State's Medieval Monopolies on Violence and Terror"].)

Limiting Our Focus

Despite barely scratching the surface, the above exhibit should hopefully demonstrate the virtually endless ways to manifest and play with power by proxy and in proximity to; i.e., letting darkness inside (or out) versus staving it off through a self-imposed vigilance (thus ignorance of its utility in worker hands). Likewise, neither are poetics, imagination, and creativity divorced from history and politics as a living document; instead, they compose, define and inherit them, hence dictate whatever direction that power flows, or the dark forms it can take through weird nerd culture, en route! Marx argued that history repeats in tragedy and then farce; from ghosts to demons, we faggy whores camp it all, including him!

Arguments are fights, then, for which demonic stand-ins are well-suited. Hell is their home—something to not only show off for those foreign to it, but stare back at them with. This isn't to so much defeat those being stared at, but demolish their abusive positions towards nature; i.e., as much for the demons to ingratiate themselves through the giving of—you guessed it—knowledge that is fatal to an older perspective that withers in the presence of new forms. On the Aegis, new demons are raised, the exchange helping workers by reversing the flow of power so that state harm against them is lessened and eventually under perfect circumstances, impossible. Nature-as-demonic is effectively a revolutionary's food for thought—something to love, respect and identify with, post-apocalypse: to camp not holocaust, but our survival of genocide in ways that don't tokenize into gentrified/decayed spoofs, long after an epicenter of genocide has become a thing of the past (e.g., Afrocentrism unto Afronormativity, post-diaspora).

(artist: Gammel Gaedda)

power as demonic argument.

First, classification. As already stated, egregores take two basic, modular forms: undead and demonic (with animal qualities to each, often overlapping in

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

chimeric fashion; e.g., the xenomorph). Both are figuratively manmade in the poetic sense, and undead can act demonic or vice versa; i.e., a demon can feed and embody trauma and the undead can give forbidden knowledge and transform. It's just not either's poetic emphasis, historically. While zombie, vampiric or ghostly undeath are qualities that can be supplied to nature, the morphological breadth and liberty of demons invoke elements of actual construction that make them incredibly broad, taxon-wise: literally manmade, summoned/supernatural, and/or linked to nature, the instances of each we shall explore in order—both during the "Forbidden Sight" chapter and in the "Call of the Wild" chapter after it.

Second, morphology. Demons are literally fetishes; i.e., objects (often kinky ones) of fabricated power and darkness, thus status and socio-psychosexual knowledge. As such, the infinite poetic variety and limitless creative potential of demons and nature requires me to adopt a more survey-style approach for the entire module (future editions can always include more close-reads).

In both cases, I'm adopting such pedagogic limitations to be more playful, thus keep true to demons' shifting physiology and complicated psychosexual torture games; i.e., as poetic license and lens putting "rape" in quotes per neo-medieval expression. So expect a bit of eclectic messiness and campy oscillation to the rest of the symposium and the module at large: something to slurp/chow down on! "Eat me alive, you animal! Oh, no! I'm being 'devoured'! Heaven help me/the devil take me!"

(artist: Gammel Gaedda)

Demons or not, all monsters provide preferential code talking about sex and force as policed subjects; i.e., haunted by abuse concerning these topics for which assorted euphemisms give way to genuine pleasure: a cryptonymic exhibit of at least one, but often two (or more) people playing and having harmless fun behind calculated-risk suggestions of "harm." Harm haunts "harm." That's what the reclamation of monstrous poetics through ludo-Gothic BDSM is all about! Psychosexual catharsis thriving despite state abuse, Hell spills over and cannot be policed!

The rest of the symposium shall remain fairly conversational and holistic. We'll proceed as follows—first, to summarize demonic expression through a demon thesis, then examine various food for thought about demons and the complicated darkness they represent (each emboldened to signpost them as we go): demonic cosmetics; the paradox of power and its performance, play and exchange; how demons lie as a means of instruction that commonly expresses through genderqueer existence, pleasure-and-pain BDSM rituals, and hurt-not-harm roleplay scenes/unequal power scenarios; intersectional solidarity, our strange appetites/modular thesis, dark desires/courtly love, demon lovers and the anisotropic/pact-like nature of demons.

Expanding Our Demon Thesis

To summarize demonic expression, demons transform and exchange/give unequal, forbidden things (re: power, darkness and knowledge) back and forth; e.g., unequal power as forbidden knowledge (not ordinary knowledge, then, but dark knowledge that supplies the power to change things in radical new directions). This only sets the stage; i.e., for our aforementioned infinite variety that occurs in terms of what these things actually are in practice. Demons don't take like the undead do when the undead feed, but rather give forbidden knowledge back as lessons to embody and witness that—once received—turns the recipient into a demon, which can happen over and over again! "She turned me into a newt" can be followed by any other shape/power configuration the demon desires, often from underground (re: golems, clay and animation; e.g., *Steve Universe*⁵⁵ making its

⁵⁵ The show is highly regimented/militarized—so much so that it's hardly a surprise to see the ways its "gargoyle mil spec" plays out; i.e., through bodies that can assume any material, color and shape, but also the power-as-performance that comes with them. Always to some degree, essentialized, this happens in ways that can be played with, thus entertained and/or challenged in-text and out (so-called "head canon"): through different roles/positions of power and status borrowed from older forms; i.e., from play without shifting shape, or shifting shape merged with said play as a half-real game that juggles power and positions of power between multiple parties and stages, or even across several cartoons in and out of real life; re (from the Undead Module's "Playing with Dolls to Express One's Feeling Undead," 2024):

(exhibit 38c1b: Artist: Boner Bob [amazing]. Heteronormativity frames anything beyond PIV sex as alien, thus worthy of attack. Meanwhile, the idea of the hero's reward after emerging from the Abyss during the monomyth is both conversion therapy and compelled love that promises them PIV sex after killing the monstrous-feminine [e.g., Jung's female chaos dragon] as part of a normalized cycle of queer, thus Gothic-Communist repression.

In truth, the descriptive sexuality and cultural appreciation of gender-nonconforming relationships presents the group as a negotiated affair that isn't divorced from sexual desire as doll-like; it merely conducts it ironically in relation to the status quo's harmful standards. In other words, the monomyth—as we have discussed a fair bit already—is a highly prescriptive and harmful device and needs to be challenged; i.e., by going into the abyss of gender-nonconforming lovemaking and modes of relation that allow for all parties to exist through reclaimed implements of shame, hatred and domination; e.g., Scott Pilgrim [above] as "made Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com queer" through camp: in ways that highlight its queer potential, which also applies to Steven Universe [next page] as more overtly doll-like, thanks to a steady reliance on the golem myth.

Beyond children's stories or cartoons, though, the same basic idea applies to more overtly "goth" poetics; e.g., like Rob Halford's "Isle of Domination" or some similar genderqueer zone; i.e., occupied not by "the Ripper" as a queer-coded gay man in xenophobic canon but a sex-positive example of the gay party animal/favor as a twink-style sex doll: the usual object of total annihilation that isn't taken literally as a matter of psychosexual performance. Such irony reclaims the harmful imagery of the death fetish and its associate, doll-like tortures and sodomy—doing so for the better of society at large by progressing away from their historically unironic usage. Often, this sits on the cusp of actual exploitation, the harm it presents as always adjacent to a given performance as made to heal from feelings of inadequacy that seek out domination as a matter of interpersonal bonding through BDSM:

[artist: Doxy Doo. Their 2015 "Gem Dom" comic of Steven Universe elides the "futanari" hentai genre (the feminine body with a penis) within the broader Amazonomachia of the militarized BDSM scenario. The liminality of the scene evokes the "prison sex" culture of dominance and Spartan-esque culture of war (which has a pedophilic history to it) as overshadowing a means of doll-like catharsis: the golem. Its legitimacy of violence, terror and sexuality is of the state versus workers seeking sex-positive subversions of the former operating through various BDSM/theatrical tropes: the phallic woman (of color, in this case; i.e., the Medusa) and the non-white goblin taming our white "shrew" (note the long nose) through stereotypical discipline-and-punish exercises: overpowering through brawn, verbal commands, degradation, hyperbolic/painful sex and/or double-penetration, bukkake, collars and bondage, open mouths eagerly and obediently awaiting their reward.

Within a military culture and centrist framework, the idea isn't far removed from its historical counterpart as unironically abusive, being a forbidden sexual outlet/guilty pleasure whose predatory interplay between superior officers and subordinates would have been a historical reality (and one whose inversion within tokenized, girl boss bureaucracies would emulate their male counterparts under Capitalism).]

Catharsis, post-rape, always walks a borderline [the victim is always afraid of future abuse, thus relies on calculated risk to release tension by emulating rape up to a point]. There's clearly room to perform this irony further than the centrist, post-fascist overtures in Steven Universe. But doing so requires actively using ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., to make an earnest interrogation of the dialectical-material role—the context—of everyone beyond mere wish fulfillment/the novelty of golems ambiguously bullying one another for the Maze Gaze [which under centrist circles extends to tokenized queer people "acting like men"]. The danger of the sadist is always the advertised lack of compunction making them a frankly good dom, but also someone who can just as easily take advantage in ways that reduce the individual they control to putty in their hands [source].

Capital and its systemic abuses create strange appetites, requiring workers wanting to field said appetites to work within power as a language; i.e., to critique its harmful generational effects on us by

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard

Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

golems not just from clay but gemstones mined from the Earth and uniforms made topside). Hell is a place of forbidden knowledge about the underworld, populated by all manner of demons who—knowing things—can magically transform because of said knowledge above ground. The more they know, the more they might transform into this or that—are beings of voluntary contrast, levied against those whose shapes (and knowledge) remain stuck/mired in harmful dogma.

In other words (indented for emphasis, an expanded demonic thesis for the rest of the module):

Something of an Unholy Trinity, power, darkness and knowledge—often as conspicuous, ritualized acts of creation/poetry and (re)invention through magic/mad science—go hand-in-hand during unequal, forbidden exchange, radical transformation and dark desire/wish fulfillment; i.e., someone will trade what they have for what they don't in order to transform or otherwise fulfill a given wish: with a demon that has the requisite item(s), build and/or abilities (e.g., sensations; re: Medusa's Aegis/forbidden sight).

Demons are the classic, mighty and at-times-untrustworthy granters of dark wishes/desires, be those fame, fortune, sex, and/or revenge (which transformation facilitates, on either side of an exchange). During a Faustian bargain, power is exchanged for knowledge; during a Promethean Quest, playing with it ourselves. To critique power-as-demonic, you must go where it is, generally by making fetishes of it that you can play with; i.e., doubles standing in for us as demons do, expressed as dolls but also through doll-like games played with people as dollish, thus demonic.

First, even without changing anyone's bodies, the likes of Scott Pilgrim have near-endless ludic potential; i.e., in terms of who is on top/the bottom, the dom/sub, and the activities and duties portrayed that everyone arbitrates/agrees to. Second, the corporal uniforms of demons like Pearl or Garnet take on a variety of physical shapes, sizes and sex organs, but also BDSM roleplay tied to said morphologies and associate ludo-Gothic freedoms. This arbitrates according to preference, allowing for endless morphological/poetic expression tied to ludic expression in classic demonic forms: actual or figurative golems doing BDSM for the purposes of expressing and playing with power to heal from power abuse; i.e., "What we get to do within the rules and roles we reify outside of state forms!" Demons are clay and can be as strong or shapely as you like:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

The only limits that exist are those our imaginations already have, which can be imposed on us through Capitalist Realism (and its notions of false power), or rejected and challenged by iconoclastic forms playing with toys/toy-like things for liberatory and ironically cathartic means.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

knowledge is exchanged for power, either being two sides of the same basic coin (of darkness)—i.e., knowledge is power and power is knowledge about sex and force, often as darkly shows thereof. Both hail from older forms of barter that return to either challenge/uphold capital; they concern unequal/unfair trades, leading to self-destruction by the human party trading with the demon party—death being the presumed outcome. And while permanent, this event (often of status shift) marks radical, sudden change in ways that are seldom literal; e.g., Persephone, Faust, Medusa's victims or Lot's wife standing in as before/after metaphors; i.e., that seal the dealing parties away from the human world, whence they presumably cannot return (as the monomyth generally allows for/encourages). Faustian bargains predominantly involve a deal with the devil in spoken/written discourse; Promethean Quests concern power as found/left-behind by godly forces, which Shelley describes as denying their power to Cartesian agents: to punish them for using mad science to police nature with (versus reclaiming and safeguarding it from the state, as functional Communists do).

Yet, in the demonic tradition, punishment and reward go hand-in-hand as much as power and knowledge do, this being as much an abject, cryptonymic, esoteric commentary on state reprisals as it is for worker liberation through those (and other) Gothic theories. For all demons, power and/or knowledge is unequal both in how it trades and presents, but speaks to the forbidden, oft-anthropomorphic aspects of nature that state forces close off; e.g., as demonic, whorish, vengeful, off-limits, corrupt, degenerate, etc. Demons stress exchange as such in ways that oscillate; i.e., they go back and forth with such data, empowering people by showing them what the elite have stolen from them, and alluding what workers have to gain by defying the status quo; i.e., during ludo-Gothic BDSM, doing so to experience things that are, from the whore's perspective, natural, but also under their control despite state assertions to the contrary. For Gothic Communists, mutual consent is power because its illustration demonstrates our ability to exchange what the state can only treat as unironic rape, mid-harvest (of Medusa's peach). Power is sexy for us because it isn't sexy as the elite envision it; re: to dominate and harvest nature pursuant to profit, because the state is incompatible with life, with human rights, with liberation.

The word "power" appears a lot in the Demon Module. I synonymize it with "unequal," and each with "knowledge," "exchange," "play" and "virgin/whore" (experience and ignorance) as equally interrelated, thus treated to the same rule of thumb during liminal expression; e.g., "power = unequal knowledge exchange/play about sex and force with whores as sex demons." —Perse

(source: Reddit)

Form follows function insofar as power flows either direction. Speaking to form, then, whereas zombies are more one-note (despite being a hybrid monster, in modern settings; re: Romero) and vampires—despite their own historical prolificity and ontological complexities—tend to look fairly similar across the board, demons and nature are entirely defined by their morphological, sex-to-gender variety and ludic complexity challenging state monopolies. "Demons" are cartoonishly transformative, thus can be whatever you want them to be; their bodies, terror and violence communicate through sex and force as generally uneven, torturous, and raw (charged on black aphrodisiacal surfaces, above). For instance, the Medusa (arguably the most ubiquitous and famous demon to come out of the West) classically and thus regularly plays out this way through BDSM pastiche (above). Raped by the state, she disrobes any such timidity to expose her succubean whore's furious and febrile darkness; it becomes her revenge to expose (more on this, later).

To know is to (ex)change; to (ex)change is to adopt a state of mind as a performance one can play out through paradox. To it, the more power given through knowledge, pain or anything else exchanged, the greater the transformation generally is; e.g., Skeletor from Masters of the Universe declaring "And now, I, Skeletor, am master of the universe!" when he receives the fire of the gods, becoming a god in ways that are perceived as "fatal." His body and his mind—already twisted in pursuit of such things ("It is my destiny!")—explode in delusions of rapturous grandeur: "playing god."

A Faustian bargain canonically finger wags, saying "be careful what you wish for" to curious minds/desperate parties; but it also reminds us that knowledge can grant the ability to change our stars in ways that will see us excommunicated from state realms. This isn't a fate worse than death, but a mercy exiting Plato's cave: "Better to rule in Hell than serve in Heaven." The same idea applies with the Promethean Quest's Numinous refrains—the searching for excessive power that leads to us being punished by false Faustian gods telling us we can't be gods, too.

"Death" becomes a state of change, then, one pursuant to our own building of better worlds using the Gothic aesthetic/poetics of power and death, sex and force (all the fun things). Poetry is cool; power and death are cool; and anyone who discounts the Gothic's ability to create genuine rebellion through them is terminally lame/a cop defending private property (thus poetics) for the state; e.g., Mark Hamill [the voice for Skeletor, below] being a dyed-in-the-wool Zionist! Gothic is a smoke screen—a regressive/progressive mode of expression whose "new flesh" (as Priest calls it) allows for all manner of politics under its enchanting darkness (no monopolies, remember)! As much as we whores wear the same aesthetics on our sleeves—i.e., to smuggle in good, sex-positive knowledge, mid-allegory—the state can pimp this out, giving bad knowledge to nurse death anxiety with sin: a clownish juggernaut, leviathan, behemoth, and Great Destroyer getting what he wants (revenge) before ejaculating delight and promoting a world beyond our own that we cannot possibly imagine!

Or perhaps we can. Hauntology is nostalgia unanchored from a specific space and time, but haunted by a specific space and time oscillating as the Gothic does, shaking things up like a snow globe. Building anything that challenges God is considered revenge against God, thus forbidden by God (which extends to capital under a Protestant ethic and neoliberal dogma), thus framed as destructive and deceptive vis-à-vis Capitalist Realism. Darkness bad; darkness crossdressing and murderous, turning order upside down. "Come and see!"

In a dualistic, dialectical-material sense, though, Skeletor becomes a great shadow/castle in the flesh for both sides of oppositional praxis—a wrestler's heel crossing the point of no return per a kayfabe momentum shift; i.e., his appetite for destruction basically makes him not just Caesar but Prometheus and Faust: a whorish/demonic being seeking his revenge, and for the state (and its police) to deny. His impudence must be punished—for making a deal with the devil/stealing the fire of the gods (and transforming like Loki would, from Norse myth) to become less and less human, or conversely posthuman in gigantic ways: that return him to lost states of existence, which state proponents view/treat as "dead"; re: Capitalist Realism. As such, he's also Satan/Frankenstein's monster challenging God—either in ways whose rebellion is false, thus in defense of the state, or illegitimate in ways that—as vice characters so often do—promote the joys of basic human rights demonized as non-Christian, foreign, and alien: swollen hubris and bodies of nature, death, and the monstrous-feminine as equally tumescent.

Any way you slice it/want to think about it, knowledge and power are forbidden, but witnessed paradoxically as vengefully out in the open; re: as darkness visible. Looked at/viewed with, this force classically alienates in ways that canonically distance the state from workers and workers from each other and the state. By comparison, liberated workers may exit normal states of existence to become increasingly demonic, thus drawn to other demons who know things, too! Knowledge is power because it gives us the ability to (ex)change not just ourselves, but the ordering of the universe as canonically ordained by bourgeois forces. Iconoclasts upset this ordainment by existing merely as ourselves, thus have our sweet revenge; i.e., if state proponents ultimately deride Melmothian wanderers (or monopolize them in strictly fascist interpretations; re: Hamill's moderacy/white knight syndrome decaying into fash arguments), then we fags ultimately celebrate them through camp: to mold ourselves and our trauma like clay into demons, thus gain some sense of agency and control over power-as-poetic during rape play and other unequal, made-from-clay power fantasies haunted by state abuse!

As such, unequal power—as something to play with, negotiate and exchange during ludo-Gothic BDSM—is likewise notoriously diffuse, illusory and nebulously subjective; i.e., formally presented as a deal, bargain or negotiation (often of fatal knowledge, through Faust—see footnote), "power" can be whatever you want, can flow in either direction⁵⁶ to morphologically arrange however you want (e.g., demon monarchs or servants/imps; circles of Hell, wombs of nature, darkness visible/pandemonium, and other tiered/concentric torture dungeons; "white devils" and other foreigner classifications like "barbarian" or "savage"; kayfabe heels/babyfaces; etc) as an aesthetic or metric (re: Foucault, bio-power)—can be guided by impulse, mood, urgency/detachment and individual preference. Milton aside, one person's Heaven is another's Hell, and vice versa. The orgasm (skin or otherwise) is all in the mind!

Furthermore, apart from elemental demons—or demons of nature that yield an elemental quality to their appearance (earth, wind, water and fire; e.g., a fire jinn or water nymph)—nearly all (and their knowledge) are sexual (whores); or they concern sexuality discussed in asexual, meaning in socialized ways that express through BDSM-style rituals of pain, fetishes and kink. These extend to general power imbalance, paradox, public nudism, as well as survived and inherited/generational trauma voyeuristically exhibited. But natural demons, as we shall see in the "Call of the Wild" chapter, often concern sexuality linked to nature-as-object; i.e., massive and dark, hunted or otherwise pursued and caged/dominated by Cartesian forces.

Divorced from genocide, these conditions become—pardon the expression—breeding grounds (next page) for intense psychosexual expression with asexual elements: to play with that which no one is supposed to see outside the bedroom, but pimped out on street corners and inside bazaars thereof. Reclaimed by workers making the imaginary past wiser, Medusa is a fat, sassy whore (or gigolo) looking to instruct through demonic sex. All are power expressed in dark delicious totality—as, per ludo-Gothic BDSM, something to understand through play! So smack that demon ass, bitches! The more we play god, the more those pre-existing deities of capital seem false and hollow!

⁵⁶ Faustian bargains are one-way and express in game theory as "zero-sum." Implements of trickery aside, they harm one person to benefit another as receiving all of that person's power. Faust, by the end of the bargain, is completely disempowered and—in Marlowe's version, at least—pulled limb from limb (a gruesome fate that would play out through Clive Barker tearing the villain from Hellraiser to pieces with hooks and chains).

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Simply put, for demons there's a million-and-one ways to combine, give and instruct with sex and force through pain (non-harmful or not), but also to marry it educationally with erogenous pleasure, medieval aesthetics, mil spec, time periods, (a)sexual fetishes and clichés, masks, costumes, alter egos, herbos and himbos, Biblical allusions, castle parentage/disputes, fatal homecomings and bread-and-circus trials by combat (e.g., Ornstein and Smough, the black-knight-style demons from Dark Souls, or Marcellus and similar oni-style Yokai from Onimusha and similar Asia-themed survival horror and Metroidvania), kink and BDSM rituals/torture implements (whips, chains, leather and so on), muscle and fat, clay and golems, doms and subs, gender and body euphoria/alteration, and various taboos, stigmas—and biases, anxieties, phobias, what-have-you—while likewise arranging and exchanging power imbalance during ironic/unironic demon BDSM. Existence becomes a point of reference, then, one to wrap our heads around by playing with power as such. In turn, all things expressed and played with as demonic conveniently become food for thought, insofar as playing with power-as-unequal goes.

Further Food for Thought

Let's pursue that. With vampires, for example, the poetic emphasis leans more on fluid exchange/giving and taking essence as fluid. Though "essence" translates easily enough to power and knowledge through BDSM rituals, "demons" make for an incredibly broad umbrella category amounting to food for thought—can enjoy or express power and forbidden knowledge (about power, essence, or anything else) in any shape or size, vestige or portrayal; and they and their poetic lessons don't need to be red and/or black (often, green or purple works, too, but really any color scheme⁵⁷). Indeed, they could drink blood as a liquid, breathe spirit as gaseous, or eat a solid shiny red apple;

(artist: Judith Meets Salome)

similar to "darkness," the apple can represent pretty much anything (cum, power, cum as power, etc) and Eve can be phallic/serpentine through Biblical symbolism, or through illusory-to-allusory stand-ins for stand-ins, dead metaphors out-of-joint with canon, classic-to-Freudian-topostmodern interpretations/umbilicals, and so on. The potential to change is threatened by implied action and temptation: "Eat me."

⁵⁷ E.g., Uriah Heep's "Rainbow Demon" (1972).

Demon cosmetics remain simultaneously prolific and cryptonymically vague, as such; re: "dark"; e.g., a fat, menacing "castle" something of a vanishing point, mise-en-abyme—an event horizon/Satanic asshole that sucks you in (which assholes tend to do, save when shitting something out). The presentational idea, then, leaps to visual immediacy and in language most people understand/relate to in some shape or form; re: sex and force. Exceptions aside, Western whores tend to classically (within the Gothic mode) dress/appear in black and maidens in white; collars, gloves, corsets, stilettos, stockings and lingerie are popular (next page), as are whips, feather dusters and maid outfits, and various dichotomies like leather/lace, angel/devil, black/white, dom/sub and virgin/whore. They communicate, thus grant knowledge through sex and power as things to recursively reify and exchange; e.g., in a dark forest of desire (again, next page); i.e., in any of the ways outlined above: "Eat me. 'Die.' Learn. Change. Grow. Become what is needed."

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

All of these can hybridize, mid-aesthetic (all women are virgins and whores), but whores are canonically property first, people second; both something to call and relegate afterwards, they paywall in visually obvious ways—marked in society for being a particular kind of criminalized servant/forbidden merchandise that cops, as pimps, "protect" (versus the legalized variant of women's work: the bride/wife, relegated to broodmare status, party to "legitimate" bloodlines [and their households] thanks to virgin/whore syndrome; i.e., the husband getting his jollies with his mistress/paying for her abortions to avoid bastard, illegitimate bloodlines).

We really don't have time to unpack the universal wardrobe for whores worldwide. Just know the sky's truly the limit regarding what's "on tap" and how you want to respond to it (darlings can be killed and authors die): to draw your own conclusions/make your own connections beyond what dogma and the Imperialism of Theory (re: Norton) afford! Dogma forces singular interpretation, hence police violence; for us and Gothic Communism, speculation and critical potentiation/prolific interpretation is the name of the game! "Eat the fucking apple! They're going blame you anyway!" Rock those fishnets, girl!

Hermeneutics aside, demons essentially and creatively have carte blanche, affording users limitless, infinite potential and creativity in how they themselves perform, present/perceive and play power out through demonic avatars and their doubled, darkness-visible paradoxes; i.e., like money and material goods, power is an illusion, but specifically a transient, dualistic, liminal one to play between different states that hyphenate (fake-not fake, authentic-inauthentic); e.g., knowledge is power and power is terror, violence, and morphological expression, under dialectical-material dispute during oppositional praxis. They're something to exchange for as long as possible; i.e., as a means of communicating state abuse (and our place under its shadowy tentpole): as something to subvert, thus escape under hollow existence and empty threats backed up with police force.

Original Sin makes for a classic, recursive, and dogmatic example. Satan tempts Eve with the apple, which is knowledge, but also power performed between different players casting blame and owning up to/casting off responsibility in the face of state structures (and punishment): it's a lie but true through state force as something to administer (often through the soul and purity arguments tied to glory and eternal salvation translating, under capital, to a Protestant ethic). Faced with total power, workers will happily point fingers to escape damnation/excommunication; i.e., desperation marries with convenience to encourage paranoid betrayal (which, in turn, amounts to more power for the state)! A witch hunt is a blame game, then, one where the state and the state alone can "win." Except, it's a lie, both everywhere and nowhere. Sex is everywhere in ways that, through these excuses to coerce workers, cannot be avoided.

(artist: Domenichino)

Dogma weaponizes sex as something to control in unequal ways. Paradise, per law and order under state rule, is generally threatened by shapeshifting devilry (queerness) and nature as monstrous-feminine (classically female parties, but really anything that isn't white cis-het European Christian men); i.e., Eve, per Original Sin, corrupts under Satanic influence (which God allows), opening the door for degeneracy and decay of the state, hence moral panics/states of exception, hence profit during police abuse/tokenization when Imperialism comes home to empire (and when the state preys on the Global South until that point): antagonize nature-as-monstrous-feminine (alien) and put it to work under capital/settler colonialism as informed by older power structures like Imperialism, organized religion and feudalism. It's women's fault, and the Gays, the fall of Eden comparable to the fall of Rome insofar as white male fragility is "threatened" by the collusion of dark forces against that biggest of "victims": cis-het men and their DARVO schemes (which lead to betrayal/triangulation during Man Box/"prison sex" mentalities, and really assimilation of all kinds [e.g., black skin, white masks] embedded inside persecution networks/rungs of preferential mistreatment).

So what is power? Per Milton, power is paradox and darkness visible played with; i.e., both infinite and finite, tremendously figurative and objective, cryptonymically dualistic and doubled; e.g., "heaven in a wildflower" vis-à-vis labor value (which has infinite value, the state wishing to steal our power [whatever the shape] through Faustian bargains). Since "darkness" denotes heretical/abject power and "power" can literally take any form (and often manifests as such through theatre, acting and disguise, all happening subjectively in good faith or bad versus objective forms, like material conditions), the simplest way to conceptualize it is, "power is exchange" as a matter of context concealed/showed during the cryptonymy process' double operation; i.e., regarding forbidden knowledge in terms of gender, sex and anything else; re (from "Notes on Power" in Volume Zero):

Banquo got it wrong: Lies and the language of darkness aren't inherently bad, meaning harmful or deserving of capital punishment; while he exclaims, "Can the devil speak true?" to himself and Macbeth, the devilish workers of Communism can speak true—i.e., in order to help each other survive the real dangers of a structure evolved to deceive us through harmful forgery (the irony being Banquo was killed by his own friend, not the witches—all for the same status inside the same power structure they lived inside together and which Shakespeare relayed through a stage play whose name people [specifically thespians] don't like to say).

Language, like the devil, is plastic and can change shape (only following the Cartesian Revolution and Capitalism's rise of mapping and dominating the world through doubles inside and outside of "pure" fiction [exhibit 1a1a1h2a1] did language solidify and binarize in service of the profit motive). Paradox is an essential component of human language in its natural and material forms; i.e., the immensely popular idea of theatre and duels told through heroes and their monstrous contradictions to ascribe meaning through staged conflict. Within this broader dialogic, the Gothic is mired in mimetic paradox through the communication of "deathly" appetites" (indented for clarity):

Death is the ultimate feeling of a lack of control, to be out of control. To face it as codified according to stigmas and biases, theatre is a tremendous, psychosexual device for calculated risk/informed consent (which operates to give agency through performance as a negotiated, heavily controlled affair). For Gothic Communists, these praxial contraptions are built around the profit motive as something to face and challenge through its praxial doubles: Gothic Communism's monsters and their poetic, liminal extensions versus Capitalism's, communicating in shared struggle and language as paradoxical on various registers simultaneously.

calculated risk/risk reduction exercise

A calculated risk minimizes harm but mimics the feeling of being out of control; e.g., consent-non-consent/informed consent.

consent-non-consent

Negotiated social-sexual scenarios through informed consent, consent-non-consent where one party surrenders total control over to the other party trusting that party to not betray said agreement or trust; aka "RACK" (Risk-Aware Consensual Kink) in relation to risky BDSM; i.e., bodily harm; e.g., public beatings, rape scenarios, whippings, knife play and blood-letting (source).

In essence, power is paradox during liminal expression through doubles (two or more things existing at once). From Paradise Lost onwards, then, power and its exchange (again, often through/with forbidden knowledge) becomes something to disguise, then tempt ignorant parties with as a gift; i.e., Original Sin (though, in defense of or from the state, this performative notion [and the epistemological freight it offers each side] goes both ways): canon vs iconoclasm using the same aesthetics in duality. Lies are simply another form of language, begging the question, "Which lies anisotropically serve workers?" As I argue about camp, we want to be of the devil's party and, unlike Milton (re: Blake), actually know it!

At their most basic, then, devils are splendide mendax sullyng Paradise with beautiful lies; i.e., as something to darken law and order (with shadows), to dirty or corrupt the state through forbidden exchange by Satanic forces. "Canon" being the strict, rigid control of information (thus power flow) by state paradigms, a devil is a whore, a tramp, a broker iconoclast of so many different things that earn them backhanded compliments by police agents (applicable to men/queer parties at large, but classically to white cis-het women in a heteronormative scheme): a dirty, naughty and/or bad girl, etc. Whores aren't just demons, then, but criminals who gatekeep knowledge inside-outside themselves. While iconoclasm takes and delights in that fact, Gothic Communism and ludo-Gothic BDSM are more selective/enterprising than simply offering sex to the uninitiated! It uses any expression of power imaginable to foster sex positivity as antithetical to state aims (namely that of profit, raping nature during us versus them)!

A "devil," then, becomes someone—usually a charming or brute-force tempter of this or that—to deal with in some imposturous degree of disguise and bald face (the paradox of shifting shape through affect versus literal appearance). But such cryptonymy's dark, ludic/ontological flexibility further owes to demons being performative/poetic in a highly staged way that goes on and off said stage; e.g., serial killers, vigilantes and again, doms, subs, and switches, classically extending to horny college professors taking advantage of their students through a structural power imbalance (above), etc; i.e., BDSM isn't just for the bedroom (re: Foucault) and it isn't purely sexual, combining asexual interrogations of sex and force through demonic power displays and public nudism, amongst other things!

To it, demons teach, and generally by example, mid-poetics. These examples historically date back to the ancient world revived hauntologically in ours; i.e., schools function—from Plato's Academy to modern universities—as special sites of forbidden knowledge, whose poiesis and exchange are ruled classically by patriarchal agents. Except, anywhere can be a classroom/extracurricular dealing space to exchange with devilish things. Demon sex (commonly framed as "whorish") becomes an ancient weapon evoking nostalgia and poetics to rewrite the Wisdom of the Ancients; i.e., to levy in devilish arts against the state, which again, their patriarchs cannot monopolize! So long as power can express in parallel courts, it can consolidate there, too!

(artist: Jan Rock)

Revolution or critical analysis, then—but especially labor action and mutual consent established through gender and sex, parody and pastiche—can suitably manifest anywhere; i.e., through artistic/theatrical articulations of forbidden knowledge, demonic morphology and power exchange (above): deals with the devil as a cruiser's costume—a mask to put on or remove as needed (often in a dungeon, ball, closet or false/inverted "church" of some kind; i.e., a danger disco; e.g., a bathroom stall, below, where forbidden "exchange" and "worship" [often extramarital sex and/or drug use] might take place without interruption or interference: prayer and predation, internment and instruction, education and reeducation, etc)! Pre-capitalist, GNC ideas like demonic androgyny (above) move into a post-scarcity world beyond Capitalism, predicating on the reshaping of those things that, canonized and kept under lock and key/close watch, keep us hopelessly locked in place ourselves: a crucible that heats us up and changes our shape to suit us, not the elite! It hurts, but anything worthwhile does!

To it, demons speak to a heretical desire to change, feel strong and look cool—to fit in, sometimes, but also stand out in ways we pass off as normal, safe; i.e., a death of the old turning into the new as waiting to unfold (as queerness in the closet always is). "The dose doth make the poison," and we Commie fags—while perhaps setting a trap or two ("The play's the thing!")—aren't exactly Zofloya handing Victoria a poison chalice; we're giving you, yes you, the chance to learn and grow away from dogma, even if we're a little slick/two-faced/tongue-in-cheek about it. Nothing lasts forever, and pomp and circumstance eclipse themselves. Things lost stay lost, but can be reborn in new terrifying (and awesome) forms using ludo-Gothic BDSM! As such, demons riot, and "a riot," explained MLK, "is the language of the unheard." Mid-argument (thus battle), demons are pragmatic in the linguistic sense, making themselves heard; i.e., through sarcasm, innuendo, play and mood (which Gothic encompasses).

To that, a good BDSM actor/sex worker can take any language on Earth—regardless of where it is written (e.g., in a Bible verse, or as graffiti on a bathroom stall door) or performed (e.g., rock 'n roll, next page)—and make it powerful through suggestion/subversion, generally through conscious anticipation of various responses, mid-tension-and-release: "I'll eat your 'apple'!" Nothing is sacred (except basic human, animal and environmental rights) and anything goes. We whores fuck to metal, then, screw on the first date—in short, we just love to fuck, period—all to spite naysayers and prudes; i.e., they're hypocrites/desperately starved of good connection, missing out on what makes life worth living! Learning is fun, is sex, is wicked, cunning and bad! "I don't always cum when I learn, but when I cum, I'm always learning!" Yeah, baby! Everyone loves whores, demons and sluts; the idea is to learn not to hate them, too (e.g., Kim Petras, certified transsexual and slut pop star extraordinaire, left)!

In genderqueer terms, then, it's less about hating on ourselves (though self-hatred/internalized bigotry are an ongoing problem for those in the closet or threatened with it) and more how we gay devil sluts incessantly delight in fucking with normies' perceived, pre-determined ideas of sin and salvation; re: green eggs and ham that, once tasted, turn canon's sad little world upside-down: the sinner being that person in the closet, acting holier-than-thou and for whom "sin" is both a guilty pleasure to watch and death sentence once administered!

Though queerphobia isn't a joke (token or not), most jokes play with phobias to some extent; i.e., riling workers up not to do what the state wants, but to make some noise/rage against the machine while celebrating ourselves building better worlds while inside: as "unholy" in ways they can't control, mobilizing us to challenge, hence change the status quo through sex work and art as more or less the same, as far as that goes; e.g.,

These boots are made for walkin'
 And that's just what they'll do
 One of these days these boots are gonna walk all over you (Nancy Sinatra's "These Boots Are Made for Walkin'", 1966).

It's free-love sass, a threat with a wink to the pimp, but wrapped into Vietnam war songs by Hollywood directors recuperating sex, drugs and rock 'n roll for Pax Americana. Two parties, different goals, same language: dark, fertilizing, of the night as alienated by capital and reunited with workers by workers out of the closet, kissing and telling⁵⁸. It's fun, natural, energizing and magnetic—the dark, earthly stuff of Medusa/Gaia unchained that rebellion and recuperation build on; i.e., oppositional praxis pimping demons out or liberating them in equal, warring measure!

⁵⁸ "This gal suggested... maybe I should have some attentions paid to my butt's hole!" (Letterkenny's "It's Impolite to Kiss and Tell," 2016).

So often, cis-het men are afraid of non-normative sex, but want it anyways; re: virgin/whore syndrome; i.e., getting it from those who are more used to being treated as sex objects/advertisement props: women (or those forced to identify as/act like women). Framed as "closer" to nature all its forms, and routinely sold under capital as such, women both a) live on the fetishized and cliché, "wild side" of things, and b) appear as chaste maidens or ordinary people (the "angel in the streets, freak in the sheets" paradox). Cryptonymy is something to enact all of these things with; i.e., it becomes a game of show-and-conceal, repressed agents speaking to what they normally mark as swallowed by Gothic's usual vanishing points: castles, whores and other such event horizons. "On the ashes of something not quite present," we demon sluts become ghosts in spectral castles that come and go like dreams, the latter dictated by socio-material turbulence!

For example, I once worked with someone from Norway who was making a graphic novel: about a redhead named Madikken (reillustrated by me, below). The story concerned the original author's closeted sex fantasies, which they wanted to celebrate and bury in the same breath. As such, the "vanishing point" was in full effect, here; i.e., the closer the author got to the sex scene, the less detailed it became! The color all but vanished from the pages' pastoral scenes, and the quality of the art disappeared as well. I could see their shame unfold in this respect; i.e., clearly embarrassed by their own desires, the author closeted them mid-novel on account that they were basically MAGA in that part of the world (they loved Trump and Gamergate was in vogue)!

Out-of-text, this had a censoring effect on the actual book, as well. We originally published the novel in 2016, only to have them scrap it/the main character entirely. Except, entropy needn't be a censoring force. Picking up the pieces, I took Madikken and won her in a legal dispute, putting her squarely out of the closet! For me, Madikken's strong and out there—having an ass and body that don't quit. She puts in work and is proud of it!

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

To it, we sluts live for any theatrical tensions that arise, doing so to create in ways we can control; i.e., watching weird canonical nerds clutch their pearls, fearing our dark suggestions of damnation and delight making them sweat bullets. Trouble in paradise? That's just our game! We live for it, but also camp canon to survive; re: watching them crap their pants something of a special treat, but likewise entirely necessary during revolutionary cryptonymy: when reading the room to sus out who's good and bad faith using our Aegis!

Furthermore, torturously disabusing them of such harmful notions—i.e., by radicalizing them through ludo-Gothic BDSM (often sex)—is, unto itself, tremendously validating. Sex and force, pleasure and pain, metal and pulp media at large—modular and united, each works like a charm, the whore using her bag of tricks ("Wind! Fire! All that kind of thing!") to heat their client up and strike while the metal's hot. Pent up, we release tension, fight stress, and have fun on top of catharsis. This house is clean, babes!

To that, while certainly drug-like, we don't owe chudwads (who certainly feel owed sex) an enabler's taste, nor personal instruction/a benefit of the doubt, be that roleplay or sex. But people are seldom black-and-white. The state, being straight, enforces straightness in its own image, meaning we can corrupt that. Any work-in-progress, then, can promote its own potential to improve, and if we see that potential on someone's surface and choose to act on it—to mold it like clay into something better than before—well, that's our choice, isn't it? "I like them. Let's put in the work; but regardless of what happens, I'll have fun!"

So while demons constantly transform, pushing towards a "final form," they generally shift forever under surveillance, and always towards new growth and understanding. Amounting to perpetual evolution ocularized, and furnished by competing natural and socio-material forces, revolution is a journey and a cycle, not a destination (the state will always resist development). To it, relationships don't exist in vacuums; workers must adapt and, as REO Speedwagon puts it, "Keep pushing!" To learn, then, is to keep learning regarding labor and sex, gender and activism as demonic. Like a birthday party with friends, one happens followed by another amid fresh growth and maturity! Applying that to Gothic, so many breakthroughs, demon "cakes" (muffins, pies, etc) and splashes of wet rapture await (so much yummy frosting to eat and paint ourselves with)!

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Furthermore, any teacher who passes sex-positive knowledge to a former entitled dumbass is going to love seeing their work bear fruit; i.e., making the world better according to what we put into it—through what we give back to workers and the world (versus taking endlessly from workers as the state does, watching us). The gift is both an item and a lesson, fighting alienation with demonization: to promote reunion with the never-was to engender what could be.

This goes for sex, but also social practices tied to power exchange through sex work and gender expression; i.e., applying to "devils" among sex workers, lovers, and drag queens, all trying like Sisyphus to get people to abandon harmful ideas by having them watch and learn from us—gazing upon our Aegis' surfaces and thresholds. Few things are as uphill as rewiring dogma to regain meaningful connection through alien, fetishized things (re: Capitalism alienates and sexualizes everything pursuant to profit, thus rape and genocide). So when it actually happens, that frankly feels amazing! "You're doing it, babe! We're doing it!"

(artist: In Case)

Sex is forbidden/anathema under capital, but also sold in conspicuous, highly-watched ways we can recreate, abjuring privatization and breaking Capitalist Realism; i.e., through praise, scorn, or anything else we want to roleplay and give back, on and offstage. It's not something to fear above all else, but overcome fear about and welcome accordingly back into our lives: letting "Satan" and "darkness" into us as holistic unto suffering-as-comorbid, but also healing through commodity! That's good praxis, and ideally it should mobilize workers into loving the exchange of/doing away with bad knowledge and lies for good knowledge and lies, thus restoring confidence by synthesizing it. In true demonic fashion, then, these translate to any form of power/knowledge exchange you could dream up; i.e., any relationship or fantasy thereof that can be had between two or more workers; e.g., me meeting Zeuhl and them delighting at the power we shared, and which they often dictated the terms of (often at my expense, though I learned a lot, and savored their fat, hairy "deli-cut" pussy—similar to the one in the illustration, above): something to see power play out as, through sex in common, socialized, artistic forms.

Sex is power and power takes work to, well, work; you have to juggle this with that and while it is generally a lot of fun, it doesn't always last. And it, as power always does, takes many different forms from cycle to cycle. In turn, complex ideas should be able to be communicated as simply as possible through playtime exhibited! The optics consist of fun, but also profound, demonic change had in life-altering ways—giving and receiving through poetics lenses, liberty and license; i.e., whose licentious ardor can shape how we profligates wield power and see through it as something to operate and articulate unto others: through play reclaiming humanity as "torture." Churches, after all, are classically prisons of faith people escape inside themselves.

In BDSM, this is called "a scene" or "a negotiation," and combines imagination with playfulness to marry fun with Gothic conventions/reinvention; i.e., to make us not just horny/cum, but able to navigate/negotiate and give/receive power out in the real world: as half-real, trapped between the fiction and rules, the fantasy and the reality as forever in flux! While physical abuse is something you can disassociate from, emotional abuse is ongoing and participatory in ways that cannot be ignored so easily. Seeing how such games involve people who don't want to play but are concentrated into tight, cramped spaces that not only surveille them, but force them to participate, the only way to escape segregation is by subverting the flow of power while being subjected to it!

For workers or the state, the aesthetic (and chiastic dualism) of dealings with the devil remain largely unchanged: in punitive systems that would seem to both discourage and encourage said behaviors! To litigate better boundaries, you must break down old ones and learn what works and what doesn't, using whatever "clay" you decide as you do. Short of total genocide (with ethnic cleansing designed to wipe capital, thus the state, clean⁵⁹), this eventually becomes second-nature on a community level: to work with thicker and juicier variants of the same-old "clay" formulating new tasty (and backdoor, Hannibal-the-general-style) propositions! Churches classically construct through front-facing façades flanked with not just with divine sunlight, but shadowy confessionals, choir screens, and straight-up torture dungeons speaking to repressed desire under a cloistered existence that expects people to court and breed, but in modest, highly controlled forms (e.g., Mormon "soaking" rituals allowing for PIV penetration, but not thrusting in and out of the vagina—requiring a third party under the bed to assist in the motions by kicking upwards into the mattress): a recipe for worker blue balls, but also resenting those controlling sex for the state.

(artist: In Case)

In Case, for example, specializes in demonic art, of which they express in earthly-to-hellish forms using a variety of costumes (e.g., nuns, left); i.e., tied to different institutions of power and knowledge exchange whose barriers demon(strate) and transform, sure enough, in disguise: tit for tat, changing shape and dress to liberate ourselves

⁵⁹ Such erasure is impossible. For one, language is always haunted by echoes of trauma; re: palimpsests and cryptomimesis. Furthermore, the state cannot afford to completely erase monsters, because profit requires them to move money through nature. God needs Satan to justify his empire.

through fantasies of transgression that, however gross in excess and provocative they seem, cannot actually harm anyone!

This is not a new idea (though it is a "novel" one, haha). Matthew Lewis' The Monk (1796)—a story written by a twenty-year-old gay man in a time when queerness was expressed entirely in Gothic fakery instead of medical documents—gleefully has Matilda imitate/profane the Madonna to excite Ambrosio, the story's star dupe. From Rosio revealing himself to be Matilda and later Matilda as a crossdressing servant of the devil styling herself as a painting of the Madonna that becomes simply the devil, period, "he" becomes "she" becomes something without shape—all according to a hidden devilish urge that Ambrosio both loves and fears, and which Matilda brings out in him to critique and expose the church: as mendacious and rapey through him! As such, Ambrosio becomes a slave to faith; i.e., a house of God that houses jailors who are, themselves, jailed. They preach austerity but do not practice it, are ignominiously ripped apart instead by gay devils in God's absence!

In Case's art speaks to indulgence overshadowed by God as someone to defile with relish. In turn, doing so teases a campy, bad-echo, crossdressing power game well at home in Gothic fiction before, during and after Lewis' work; i.e., nuns dressing in black and white, misbehaving under God's roof (above): "Heaven holds a place for those who 'pray'" (Simon and Garfunkel's "Here's to You, Mrs. Robinson," 1968). All constitute ludo-Gothic BDSM, thus precious opportunities to subvert and transgress against canonical, thus policed, pernicious forms of demonic power exchange felt within churchly spheres; i.e., through heretical, "almost holy" games, we gay demons play with things we shouldn't. Speaking to a profound and ceaseless delight, iconoclastic liberation from inquisition affords fresh, vital perspective, mid-instruction; e.g., "Suck on him like this! Learn what he likes and respond to each other in kind!"

In doing so, you learn how to relate as people do, but in sex-positive versions thereof: through psychosexual rituals of sex and force, thus power exchange on a two-way street. Making people "come" to earth-shattering revelations—e.g., about sex and gender uprooted from biology but able to play with it anyways—is one of a sex worker's biggest joys: to "see the light" by playing with "darkness." Attached to morphological and cosmetic freedom, good sex and BDSM can radically change your perception of canon's unironic aesthetics of torture; i.e., power is control during feelings of no control, paradoxically acted out during calculated risk regaining said control (for us, not the state).

Per my arguments, then, such tutelage and the demonic power it affords remain entirely rooted in performance and play "dressed up"; i.e., in the abject language of power and death, putting "harm" in exquisitely "torturous" quotes; re: ludo-Gothic BDSM! We're all toys to play with, lessons to learn! Power is plastic, so assume whatever form/combination of forms aid in passing good instruction/demonic flexibility along while collaborating inside inescapable shadows/shows of state rule (necessity is the mother of invention, worker counterterror challenging the state's throttling of creativity vis-à-vis state monopolies, trifactas, and qualities of capital during class-culture and race war). In doing so, watch your horizons, minds (and other things) expand!

To that, there's certainly multiple iconic standbys—e.g., the red devil with a pitchfork, pointy tail and horns, or the phallic-woman dominatrix succubus whipping naughty boys inside her retro-future dungeon, infringing liminally on holier grounds. As things to pilot and perform, such dominatrixes take endless forms per the Gothic aesthetic and its "sweet spot" between pleasure and pain (often confusing them on purpose); e.g., Chun Li hyphenating Amazons, slutty mil spec/cop uniforms (the character is a cop, thus crimefighter dressed up, often enough, as a weightlifting whore), all-purpose (and endless) Halloween costumes, toys for boys and honeypots: muscle inside scantily-clad outfits, where the avatar's thunder thighs, stockings and tell-tale spike bracelets let players police the slum during kayfabe-style Amazonomachia! Sex is literally a weapon, dogma dressed up as fun and games!

(source)

True to form, friendly-looking demons have darker doubles, then; e.g., the cackling, histrionic and leather-clad dark mistresses from the Dungeon Keeper franchise (next page)... which really aren't all that different functionally from xenomorphs, cenobites, or Lewis' Matilda dominating through frog-like amplexus; i.e., torturously phallic, faux-medieval poetics hyphenating sex with vaso vaginal penetrative violence, queerness with needles and medieval-to-modern medicine/malpractice, etc. Enemies of the state enjoy one "luxury" afforded to them, in this respect: alienation as humanization (re: Said's pleasures of exile).

To exist in this sphere is grounds not just for dismissal or arrest, then, but termination of a more exterminatory sort. Until then, it's constant containment, surveillance, and torture; i.e., the Radcliffe-style⁶⁰ rescinding and deprivation of

⁶⁰ As Nick Groom writes (from the Oxford World's Classics of The Italian, 2017):

Ann Radcliffe may have not been a revolutionary, but her work is far from being conservative—she repeatedly tested the boundaries of orthodoxy at a time of revolutionary foment. This may explain why everything is under scrutiny in The Italian. It is a novel suffused with secrets and mysteries, and pervaded by scrutiny, examination, and interrogation. [...] It looks forward to a society in which order is enforced by institutions keeping individuals under perpetual surveillance. As such, The Italian [is] very much a novel for the twenty-first century.

So often, play is couched within abuse (or vice versa), concealing itself as "just games." We'll return to Radcliffe and Groom deeper in the module; suffice to say, she wrote her stories in the wake of the French Revolution and before women could legally own property. In doing so, she helped provide unique perspective through Gothic fiction, speaking to state abuse and control felt then and now in and out of such stories.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

rights, dressed up as justice per the Spanish Inquisition reimagined. It's moralized, an argument unto itself that leads to generational remorse, regret, and for our purposes, roleplay reversing such axioms through the same basic aesthetics and their associate actions: selling ourselves for workers versus taking state pay to punch down! Prurience cannot be stopped, so the state surveilles it in brothels as prison-like and paradoxically enough, highly publicized and "ecclesiastical."

In turn, all require us whores, suiting up, to blend in/stand out onstage and off, and whose poetically sexualized weaponization comes with various broad strokes to paint with and larger arguments about demons to keep in mind. We'll cite some of these next (as block quotes), then close the symposium out with some thoughts about religion (which demons play with)!

(source)

Broad Strokes; Some Larger Arguments about Demons

Concerning the Demon Module as a whole, the holistic demands of Gothic Communism (and sheer poetic multiplicity and potential of demons) all but require me to paint in broad strokes, going forwards: if something is a "demon," it emphasizes power/forbidden knowledge exchange and transformation (which basically makes the Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers quintessential demons, per a neoliberal power trip; re: "teenagers with attitude!"). We'll cover all our bases, through ludo-Gothic BDSM, but there won't be as many close-reads as the Undead Module (at least, not for the first edition, v1.0)!

As usual, our aim is intersectional solidarity during a pedagogy of the oppressed—one meant to raise the degree of public knowledge and power when spectated about; re: expressed liminally as emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness during praxial synthesis (class war is race war, race war is culture war, etc): to locate the expression of worker traumas (queer or otherwise) and subvert their canonical, punitive forms. In doing so, we want to reverse abjection along the ghost of the counterfeit felt through our daily lives—the rules and games we install and play out versus those of the state (church or not).

By examining zombies, vampires and ghosts during the Undead Module, we've already looked at the many different ways that monstrous persecution and creation go hand-in-hand with conditional monsters; i.e., monsters that imply a status or affliction assigned to them by Cartesian powers (we've also examined the "feeding" vector of each monster type relative to this condition). Except, it also applies to demons through forbidden knowledge (thus power) exchange often being sexual: "flow" something to go with and induce/indulge in; re: undead take back when they feed on trauma, demons give back when they teach forbidden knowledge to transform.

(exhibit 43e2b: Artist: Mugiwara Art. "I want you to cum all over me!" Cum = data, darkness, and seeds, but also where to "sow" them. As things to give, commands are powerful, insofar they consider power through sex as, from the French Revolution onwards, relegated to the bedroom [re: Foucault]; i.e., as a side of power exchanges/knowledge checks and gaps both forbidden outside of such areas and canonically advertised everywhere as "terrorism," vis-à-vis Crawford. Amateur porn showcases that in ways that stress how worker can transform through knowledge exchange as "guerrilla"; e.g., angel in the streets, demon in the sheets. It becomes power for workers through knowledge as something verboten to share: through globs and globs on one's fuzzy mound and squishy body as delicious—not just forbidden sodomy-style knowledge, but tasty fruit as darkly Satanic per revolutionary practices enacted and witnessed during the summoning of "rape"; i.e., establishing boundaries independent of state dogma.)

To that, specifically keep our modular thesis argument in mind, as I won't have time to set it up and stress it neatly per monster type as demonic:

Capitalism achieves profit by moving money through nature; profit is built on trauma and division, wherein anything that serves profit gentrifies and decays, over and over while preying on nature. Trauma, then, cultivates strange appetites, which vary from group to group per the usual privileges and oppression as intersecting differently per case; i.e., psychosexual trauma

(the regulation of state sex, terror and force) and feeding in decay as a matter of complicated (anisotropic) exchange unto itself, but also shapeshifting and knowledge exchange vis-à-vis nature as monstrous-feminine: something to destroy by the state or defend from it using the same Satanic, darkness-visible aesthetics/pandemonium.

As such, demonic transformation and knowledge/power exchange are anisotropic;

(artist: In Case)

trauma makes us decay/corrupt as monstrous-feminine or fascist (token or not), albeit in ways that cause us to develop demonic habits that are to some degree sex-positive or sex-coercive inside and outside the bedroom as canonically abjecting such things. Said flow of power is seldom clean, too, lurking in the odd, spicy and grey liminal area of the theatre stage, the monster costumes viewed there hardly exclusive to neoliberal Capitalism; re: with past poets closer to death, rape and raw sexuality in ways we're currently alienated from (save in fetishized forms that serve profit inside the state of exception). Persephone, once in Hell, can stay there if it please her (dualities in full effect, of course); she can "crown" fresh abortions—to witness and play with the mighty and grotesque, but also Numinous afterbirth.

Fortunately, hauntology lets workers brush against the past; i.e., as nostalgic in ways that never quite existed, yet push towards Communism anyways: as canonically aborted by capital/the process of abjection (and other Gothic theories). Exploitation and liberation sit in the same shadow spaces, as do pro-state and pro-worker apocalypse arguments that fend off or expand the state of exception (and state forces using DARVO and obscurantism to muddy the waters): the state is incompatible with life, consent and workers, and we are with it! We must hug Medusa, not fear her, but there can still be Gothic thrills/doubles; e.g., the xenomorph is basically a sex demon threatening alien rape⁶¹ against token ⁶¹ We've already discussed the chimeric, "ancient" qualities of the xenomorph in the Undead Module (e.g., the tokophobic, queerphobic, and racist elements to the monster); but will return to examine it even more moving forwards (especially tokenism/witch cops attacking nature, in "Derelicts, Medusa and Giger's Xenomorph").

Amazonian maidens, but whose immortal design ditches the red for all waspy⁶² black: pure death that sometimes covers itself in human blood and gore!

This speaks to an honorary third quality of demons (though it relates to unequal power): sin, but especially desire (commonly expressing in religious forms as "burning passion"). From Radcliffe's menacing demon lovers and Black Veil (re: Wolff's "Radcliffean Gothic Model," which came out the same year as Alien, 1979), we can see the pursuit of a vulnerable party (classically framed as white, cis-het and female, in Neo-Gothic literature) by a dark, arrested/Oedipal, wholly murderous slasher to, if not outright overcome, then at least survive: a killer's reputation that permeates the dark out-of-doors and castled, churchly and/or graveyard environments to equal measure! Nigh elemental, these are deeply ingrained, well-established-if-partly-founded/unfounded fears with tell-tale classic embodiments (usually big men with dick-like knives; e.g., Jason Voorhees' machete from Friday the 13th, above) predicated on concealment and revelation occupying the same infernal, golem-esque bodies: "darkness" as a trigger to throw and experience calculated-risk sensations.

Historically within Gothic, a dialectic of the alien and of shelter orbit around a privileged liminal group, white women; i.e., going from property to proprietor amid a state of transition, speaking to the only idea of "affection" they're ever known—pursuit and abuse from someone for whom restraint is a myth, rape is automatic, and for which sex and harm overlap (rape being an act of total domination): a transient, regressive/reductive violator-inflictor of harmful, psychosexual pain. Doing so per transaction, the class character is one of white, middle-class women demonizing poor people/immigrants/slaves through liminal expression since Radcliffe's Italian (or Lewis' Monk, minus that story's camp)—as abject, hulking maulers, invaders, trespassers in alien likenesses to their homes instead of their husbands and actual houses: getting their knickers in a twist over supernatural-tinged highwaymen (or castle knights) ravishing them.

Though it's a toy-like, evocative simulation of mutilative, life-or-death exchanges—and Freudian analysis isn't something Gothic Communism endorses (favoring dialectical-material scrutiny)—the fact remains that genuine feelings of fight, flight, fawn, freeze and flop regularly leap to mind when facing slashers (and the Halloween-grade, mad-science-meets-black-magic, holiday superstitions associated with them and their haunted lands). That's arguably the point, but these human, or at least humanoid, bugbears sit alongside fearful sightings of state enemies; re (from Volume One):

⁶² Arguably a Protestant ethic pun as much as insectoid life-cycle metaphor.

The Western world is generally a place that testifies to its own traumas by fabricating them; i.e., as markers of sovereignty that remain historically unkind to specific groups that nevertheless survive within them as ghosts of unspeakable events linked to systemic abuse. Trauma, in turn, survives through stories corrupted by the presence of said abuse. There is a home resembling a castle, where a ghost—often of a woman—lurks inside having been met with a sorry fate. But undeath is something that can be felt through echoes of ourselves that aren't diegetically spectral; they feel spectral through an uncanny resemblance, like standing over our own graves. This becomes something to play with, akin to an (at-times) humorous, even trashy gallows theatre rife with dark, forbidden language: sin, vice, violent sex, all-around death, and other taboo subjects (source: "Healing from Rape").

In short, these orations of rape/demonic poetics and play are cathartic and criminogenic, educating and agitating to pacify as much as to rebel (re: controlled opposition). They're chilling and dogmatic, praxially inert in canonical forms that see white women fetishizing those they commodify and police (re: Jameson's "boring and exhausted paradigm"): the "help" as outsider but also strong-thighed bargeman, lycanthrope, sperm donor for lady what's-her-name to fantasize with.

As far as demons more broadly go, mortal combat is a huge part of medieval theatre (the duel, Beowulf-style). Obviously this carries over into the adrenaline and ambrosia of modern-day BDSM/vice theatre; i.e., playing for laughs, thrills and cryptomimetic, legitimate-to-illegitimate boundary-breaking and setting exercises; e.g., Mortal Kombat's dark '90s rock 'n roll, sold-on-CD aesthetic—its arcade-style forces of darkness, outworld shenanigans, and the passing of order into chaos, videogames into celluloid. It's a place to play and preach in equal measure, for the state or against it using the same demonic, hitman's stabby-stabby language; re: courtly love, the way of the warrior as lovable scoundrel (e.g., Trevor Goddard hamming up Sonya Blade's evil foil, Kano below, as part-meathead, part-phantom-of-the-opera). Better to have the language to play with than not; i.e., to play is to think about power through Gothic poetics (and their live-bur-al conventions) for cathartic purposes, making us strong enough to push back—often by killing our rapist in pure trashy schlock with a dark, genuine and swift undercurrent.

At their most basic, then, demons of all kinds operate sex-dungeon clubs/toy-like novelties replete with music, action and gory theatrics laden with an important asexual element: investigating all of the things listed above, granting them an artistic, social, campy/gallows-humor component that concerns healing from trauma versus simply getting off to this or that; i.e., interrogating our confused predator/prey responses, seeking death/the void in ways that speak to our rapturous survival: establishing control during feelings of us lacking control, generally on the cusp of almost-certain temptation, doom, delight and ecstasy! Part of that denial and indulgence (a mentality that embodies the West), the dominatrix is all-at-once inaccessible and forbidden, and very front-and-center! "You want this 'rape,' don't you, slut?"

Do we? It's complicated, but excluding battered housewives and other comorbidities during ongoing abuse, survivors of abuse like to put "harm" in quotes; e.g., to be spit-roasted by masked men provided there's an element of control merged with the self-destructive theatrics (and provided no harm takes place)! Humans are messy and trauma only makes us messier (for which there's the paradox of Gothic oxymorons, too; e.g., Monty Python's Spanish Inquisition threatening people with comfy chairs to make them confess)!

This forbidden sight extends to world politics, on and offstage. From Israel to America's Vietnam or any other settler colony project, the problem of demons remains one of police violence; i.e., the deliberate and systemic abuse of demonic language to serve state aims; re: raping nature as monstrous-feminine to harvest it through settler-colonial means. But, to reiterate, they have to essentialize these monopolies of demonic sight to hold onto those territories, which is impossible.

Indeed, as Asprey writes, "Not only can terror be employed as a weapon, but any weapon can become a weapon of terror: terror is a weapon, a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it" (source). State monopolies seek to decay rebellious forces (and their perceptive vision) and present them, vis-à-vis Parenti, as false versions of themselves: as open fascists, but also moderate, disguised forms of the same police agents (often playing as "guerillas," themselves). We are devils in disguises versus the state's devils in disguise. There's no avoiding that duality. The sooner we accept that and modify our cryptonymy's weaponized sex accordingly during the dialectic of the alien, the better!

(artist: Homare Works)

Keep that in mind throughout this module, as I won't overly stress it (we'll rehash it, but won't discuss police abuse to nearly the same extent as the Undead Module did; e.g., the "Bad Dreams" chapter). But also keep in mind that, like all monsters, the paradox of class, culture and race war through demonic poetics owes to how all demons use the same base aesthetics of power and knowledge, but also transformation hovering nakedly on the cusp of Great Destruction (the maiden/sub threading the labyrinthine castle while avoiding/seeking the demon lover); i.e., to anisotropically reverse the usual flow that power and knowledge travel in, often through transformation/the presentation of something standing transformatively in for something else, a "blinding" that sees forbidden things with; e.g., xenomorphs for Communists; re (from Volume One):

I've repeatedly said that function determines function. Another way to conceptualize this is flow determines function. That is, during oppositional praxis' dialectical-material struggles, terror and counterterror become anisotropic; i.e., determined by direction of flow insofar as power is concerned. Settler colonialism, then, flows power towards the state to benefit the elite and harm workers; it weaponizes Gothic poetics to maintain the historical-material standard—to keep the elite "on top" by dehumanizing the colonized, alienating and delegitimizing their own violence, terror and monstrous bodily expression as criminal within Cartesian copaganda: [...] subjugated phallic women castrating a female master rebel, once she visibly tries—through a dissident question of mastery—to reverse the status-quo binary (and flow) of terrorism and counterterrorism by showing her trauma, anger and willingness to fight back against a presumed overlord (source: "A Deeper Look at Cartesian Trauma in Rape Culture").

Demons—in all their shapes, sizes and colors—obey the same rudimentary principles for or against the state as straight, putting nature-as-monstrous-feminine to work. Those who shift power towards the state will be viewed as "counterterrorists" (cops or deputized forces); those who don't will be seen as "terrorists" (re: Crawford's "Invention of Gothic Terrorism") or criminals for cops to punish and victimize per the Cartesian, heteronormative and settler-colonial process, mid-abjection.

The same is true for us in reverse, then, our doubles and their paradoxes' food for thought illustrating duality mid-opposition and inviting troubling comparisons that, for us, break Capitalist Realism and reclaim our lost humanity in the eyes of state forces; e.g., David in Alien: Covenant being a terrorist in the eyes of the company but also occupying that giant shadowy space between Nazi and Communist. Pastiche can be perceptively "blind," or just blind unto enslavement through the same darkness.

Conclusion: New Eyes, Forbidden Sight (and "Religious" Concerns)

So ends the symposium. There's plenty in here we could only touch upon, and much of what we introduced here we'll return to/unpack later throughout the

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

entire module. This starts with how demons alter our perception using the forbidden knowledge they give; i.e., operating as a kind of forbidden sight—a poetic gateway or keyhole to darker realms of repressed knowledge, thus exchange:

As such, we shall further consider demons' anisotropic flow of power and knowledge moving forwards, but also their whore-like shapeshifting abilities. Demons can change shape, often through illicit, occult forms of sex like Matilda's clothing but also her skin; i.e., as a psychosexual, oft-violent summoning ritual invading sites of godly surveillance projected onto secular doubles: to summon, show/conceal and disseminate forbidden knowledge about violence and sex under state influence (thus abuse). This remains our poetic focus, not the eating of trauma as such. Yet demons-as-modular intersect with the undead to comment on nature-as-alien/monstrous-feminine; i.e., in oft-composite ways that feel hellish and undead (re: Skeletor), but also quasi-religious; e.g., Giger's Gothic surrealism one of many dark churches, mise-en-abyme.

The Gothic and its psychosexual theatre thrives in the counterfeiting of religious things (re: Walpole's Otranto) to speak in code, and I would be absolutely remiss to not mention that. For the rest of this conclusion (seven pages), I want to consider something popular about demons that we haven't touched upon, yet, but will come up in the module ahead: the "religious" elements!

Churches were schools of the medieval world, and continue to spread dogma through shells of their former canonical greatness (re: Hogle). Per Cartesian dualism, capital divides in service to profit through emotional manipulation, gentrifying and decaying anything it requires to do so. This hauntology/canceled retro-future includes Christianity's endless dominion/schisms and denominations ordering nature as such: to mask genocide as "charity" using the order of power-as-pecking-order instructing us-versus-them violence, mid-crisis-and-decay (the state rots, tolling its Pavlovian alarm/funeral bells; the menticed holy regress like gargoyle cops—to defend said order's laws under attack by Satanic criminals).

Apart from canon, though, demons offer up a wild cradle for release and resentment alike, allowing for new apostatic regrowth in Gothic spheres camping the canon; i.e., to safeguard nature from state forgeries, the Madonna winking at whores in the audience waging class warfare liberating all workers through intersectional solidarity as, to some degree, out of joint. Tailored through "almost holy" prostitution, their second-coming resurrections (and gooey rapture, below) surround the nun or the Madonna as anything but immaculate; i.e., normally ransomed by capital holding everything hostage, releasing vital fluid and "fatal" knowledge about nature-as-pimped-out under state control: through the kinds of storied, performative, and panting ahegao, all-too-hungry lessons (about lust and the other deadly sins) that demons in particular are known for (e.g., naughty nuns—again, below)! Sinning gloriously to release ourselves from state influence, we flirt with "danger" to release police-like holds on our fear-addled brains! God is blind to our nightly trespasses, the evil eye a myth but the church panopticon watching us like lepers! So do we demon sluts bloom like fungus inside their blind spots, making our own poetic arguments that refute theirs—through Neo-Gothic paradox, our seditious "organs" working in concert!

(artist: Bec Santus)

Simply put, demons are born-again whores; i.e., threatened with rape by state forces and relieving stress by burning their churches down, then and raising pandemonium from the euphemistic ashes' calculated risk. Thirsty for knowledge-as-forbidden, these euphoric, promiscuous instructors grant comparably prurient lessons meant to trouble blind faith coded into workers by state copaganda; i.e., by playing with the virgin/whore binary through the world's oldest profession as normally policed in demonic psychosexual language. By joyously scorning dogma, sluts secure special sight surrounding spoiled subjects, their policing of which Satanic atheists/Gothic Communists lampoon by example: to unspool us before installing new demonic threads in the place of older tapestries, seeing the light our Paganized darkness emanates! It's code, the corruption a data unto itself upsetting state boundaries-for-me-not-thee! We're not doing it to enjoy special privileges—e.g., nuns playing as ninja vigilantes (exhibit 48b)—but fight for equal rights granted unto all peoples; i.e., as brothel espionage, our impersonation a revolutionary cryptonymy for those who know! Canon is like a light switch, one we can flip on and off framed as "fake," giving another dimension to our coded pornographic missives: hiding in plain sight, smuggling Satanic rebellion inside faux reliquaries! Espionage is a Gothic utility through the femme fatale playing as naughty nun (someone paradoxically able to infiltrate a patriarchal space because she's a slut).

Missionary brides are victims of prescription, segregating themselves to submit to state enforcers. Classically expected to turn into demons—to spread their legs and dutifully have babies, then become the things that holy men ward off in public, but indulge in private (from doggystyle to sodomy of all kinds)—such women are kept, thus trapped. To be a good little Communist whore, then, is to be a good teacher/code-switcher pointing state (and token) hypocrisies out! Revolution is to get off the fence—to get ourselves off, period, motivating good praxis during oscillating positions of master and apprentice, sinner and saint, giver and receiver using Gothic language! We give and accept fresh knowledge in all its neo-medieval forms, such "data" including hot cum; i.e., using our abject open mouths (and other body parts/tissues) to poke fun of organized religion/capital's Protestant ethic. Often through ritualized cannibalism, blood libel and other sodomy double standards normally enjoyed by the state, we turn them into a crown of thorns—a thorn in the elite's side whose agony delights us to no end!

From hustle to gratuitous heist, any despoiling by us of virgins (and other such modesty/virtue arguments) is to emancipate them from holier-than-thou state forces; i.e., the latter raping women, children and minorities on a daily basis, instilling fear-and-dogma ignorance over the former to preserve the nuclear model's "purity" through impunity! From Rome into "Rome" under capital, the state is morally bankrupt. Steeped in controversy and scandal, such hypocrisy becomes endless crises of faith to leverage against them; any bastions to the contrary are merely a giant lie we can turn on its head. The iconoclastic idea, then, is camping harmful norms, breaking from their police traditions to install liberatory devotion through demonic porn/sex work at large; i.e., unto sex positivity as earnest, genuine and educational towards those revelations breaking Capitalist Realism (and canon's sex-coercive myopia) like a stained-glass window—into pieces!

Per Weber, capital is Christian "in spirit"; i.e., of a Protestant work ethic, which reliably runs aground by operating merely as it does. So whereas Christianity evokes power in language both historically grand, vivid, and vague, the state has since hollowed out churchly house and occupant alike: profit trumps true belief, blind faith becoming bad faith cashing in on demonic doubles. It's an easy system to retailer along state deceptions; i.e., built on the past as copied into Gothic doubles (re: the ghost of the counterfeit).

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

In response, demons of all forms generally constitute a half-real pact or offering—one that, in our hands, demolishes dogma through the reclamation of state poetries inside "found documents" (from Walpole onwards): as "castles" (above) antithetical to status-quo bodies waiting to be exposed! Concerned with churchly "donations," and felt onstage and off, our showing of the ass (a mea culpa) promise/promote a Gothic-Communist "beyond." Perceived according to linguo-material exchanges that cryptonymically achieve step-by-step development in the present space and time, these Holy Grails suggest a better world through corporal data, even psychosexual violence dressed up as "death" incarnate. Extracted through calculated risk (re: convulsionnaires, demon lovers and exquisite "torture," etc), whores communicate with pain, as often as not. In turn, the state penalizes its martyrs, driving them into psychosexual rapture. Making them writhe, the elite cannot fully monopolize such agonies. Harmed, we hypnotize others by placing our "harm" in quotes! We make it gay but also demonic and undead! It becomes a pornographic, visually weaponized/vaso vagal and politically charged, inflammatory spectacle no elite can fully control.

I'm not religious (and ironically am not the biggest fan of nuns, in Gothic), but find much to subvert in religious language/canon. Furthermore, I remain entirely serious when saying that such a palliative Numinous can change us—i.e., how we see the world—by demonically playing with codified trauma; i.e., that which the state tells workers to either completely ignore, or to play with only in particular ways: "flesh and the power it holds." The price is canonically envisioned as "steep," exorbitant, and fatal. In truth, it's simply transformative, vis-à-vis the shadows of a Hell reclaimed by workers seeking revenge through demonic escape; i.e., from Plato's cave by using a massive cryptonymic ass, tight pussy or asshole, what-have-you, as priceless: there being no price the state can put on them to sell ourselves (and our fellow workers) out!

Instead—and per liminal expression's surfaces and thresholds (of forbidden exchange)—revolutionary whores unchain themselves "on the cross." Gaining paradoxical access to capital's usual voyeurs spectating sacrifice (always unto others), we point out various double standards that apply uncomfortably to them; i.e., those that—once exposed by us, smiling through the happy pain (and rough, worker-dictated sex)—strip the state bare and lay them naked on the altar! Guilty pleasure becomes liberatory unto realizations the state wants to vault: that their usual fixtures of power are not so holy or fixed! Faced with that, one grows defenseless against temptation and seditious reeducation!

Indeed, the heretical, naughty sense of conjuring mischief expresses through the whorish Mephistophelean; i.e., the so-called "nun" as bent, being up to no good during ludo-Gothic BDSM—that one is breaking state rules/canonical laws to free one's mind from bourgeois dogma and illusions, thus interrogate state trauma. This happens through similarity amid difference, strung vicariously together by willing allies playing games of a restorative, debriding sort: the pedagogy of the oppressed as a shared, oft-naked activity—gettin' down with the devil in us as abjected by state forces! We reverse this ghastly procedure on our Aegis, gorging and gouging this with that. "Stare and tremble!" becomes an invitation: to play with power yourselves, following the white rabbit as demonic whore.

Regardless of whom, subverting state conventions—reclaiming and humanizing their fetishes and clichés—should feel "dangerous," hence intimate, intimidating and fun; i.e., hooking up free of judgement, mid-disco, delivering the goods for two (or more) people indulging in deep, bottomless appetites; i.e., of all shapes and sizes to share with those looking in (often ourselves, watching the footage in private)! To see how the other side lives, "destruction" means giving ourselves to each other entirely—to hold heaven in a wildflower!

(artist: Mugiwara Art)

Through poetic license, we Gothic Communists aggregate and solidarize, exchanging holistic tit for tat through ludo-Gothic BDSM as churchly pun, live burial; e.g., burying the bishop (the church and its dimorphic expressions of power are full of sex puns)! Like demons, Hell and true rebellion are what you make of them: through biomechanical trigger responses; e.g., piercings, tattoos, sex toys, knife play and so on as body-horror "new flesh"; i.e., relating to people as animate-inanimate objects, recipients of closeted rage whose diaphanous permanence expresses across bodies the only way it can, short of just filming it "as is." Demons express autonomy amid damage and healing sharing the same spaces. These become a confusion of this with that; i.e., as language exists naturally and soupily in the brain and across history's space-time: to tightrope lightning and be full of it as PTSD, which can trigger in martyred, dualistic, accessibly gargoyle shorthand ways we can dialectically-materially channel to thwart capital's dire historical materialism.

So often, the palliative Numinous communicates through ludo-Gothic BDSM, in this respect; i.e., mixing erogenous pleasure and non-harmful pain haunted by harm living inside-outside us: dogma on churchly walls. It, in turn, expresses during various relationships to sex and force through others; i.e., clawing power back any way we can, taking control of out-of-control situations per the human condition as such: to feel social again through anti-social/alienating tendencies we can socio-materially rewire through safely chaotic outlets (the collocating of power that translates so readily and accessibly in religious forgeries; re: "Gothic"). The code-switcher's idea/preference is to appreciate and understand psychosexual dysfunction as a spectrum; e.g., the Tin Man versus Ryan Gosling in Drive (2010); i.e., doing so in coded spectral ways that divorce from actual psychosexual harm, but manifest through demonic echoes during liminal expression! Love is a package deal, but not a ball and chain; i.e., that, once triggered, our trauma lets us transform our past (and the "past" of churchly spheres essentially the present as "stuck"), learning from and facing it without shame to lead to new exciting destinies (rewriting the church and our place in its theatrical in-betweens)!

So keep everything we've discussed in mind, up to this point; i.e., staying vigilant and perceptive as we forge ahead into the Demon Module's object lessons: weighing our linguo-material extensions that we embody in turn, during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Exchange all the essence that you can, use all the toys you can; i.e., the larger ones giving you an element of control that often has an enormous size/alien element to its design, for calculated-risk purposes; e.g., less "murder dick" (what my ex and I would call period sex) and more freaky toys for cuties of all walks seeking to regain agency through infernal, demonic play! Both loose and tight, erogenous and painful, closeness to power can be incredibly medicinal, but also revolutionary! "Oh god, it's growing bigger!" Our sleeves hunger for God's rod and Satan's shaft ("I can be your angel or your devil!")!

(artist: Ashley Yelhsa)

Ludo-Gothic BDSM has a reclamatory function, in this respect; e.g., words like "invalid" or "alien" have as much a legal, medicalized usage that dehumanizes sex workers (with Ashley reclaiming her disabled status to fight back against people unironically using those terms to pity or prey on her). Through ourselves writhing restlessly and rapturously during ludo-Gothic BDSM, they become a kind of forbidden sight we can weaponize to mobilize and activate pastiche as paradoxically perceptive: to see with darkness (eyes and ears on the walls) as only demons can echo it! Switching code, we whores reclaim the church; i.e., as a conspicuous site of forbidden knowledge that, far from being empty of whores (and other demons) is positively full of them. All to speak to the faithful's fragility (thus tendency to turn coat) in eye-catching sites of powerful orders! Power is perception, something for the desperate and eager-to-believe do so out of convenience (the promise of sex) that we can expose, thus manipulate inside its own panics. If you kill us, you will have to face the reality that we are human; i.e., as you try to pimp, police and persecute us (denial being the final stage of genocide).

In a world that canonically watches for sin and suppresses it—whose criteria for care is unrealistic—we become ready the moment we gain a voice, a valve, and ultimately a value that can discuss things by reifying them as demonic sight: a reversing of virtue and vice similar to terrorist and counterterrorist, legitimate and illegitimate or possible and impossible (or any other binary you possibly could imagine). This linguo-material reversal takes effort to synthesize, but it remains, as we shall see, playful, vital and fun. To it, building such churches of "rape" should be fun; i.e., to offend those institutions that unironically rape us. To spite any who isolate and harm us in dualistic blindness, nothing can be more holy than intimating world's without them; i.e., where we are free of their malign influence!

Of such "secret sin," Walpole's Mysterious Mother (1768) described an untold tale "that art cannot extract, nor penance cleanse." For us psycho sluts from outer spaces, it's time to sin in public; i.e., through art in ways that expand on Walpole's genderqueer echoing of "religious" (from Lewis' Matilda into present-day varieties of the same spoofs, above)! A popular façade to forge anew, we aren't slaves to quasi-medieval/religious symbols and erotic puns if we don't fancy them (they are a bit done-to-death), but they nevertheless remain popular and productive; i.e., in overt forms to include among our holistic, Evil Cupid's imposturous GNC quiver (we'll consider "subtler" seemingly secular varieties when we look at Giger's xenomorphic disguises)! Whatever the whore's outwardly form, the state will call her exposure and witness testimony "violent," then automatically compel/advocate for heteronormative violence against anyone humanizing the whore-as-harvest; so we, existing already as violence incarnate, must refuse to be quiet about what the state does to us every waking moment!

"Hogle argues that modern Gothic is grounded in fakery" and fake works (re: Dave West). From Walpole onwards, the Gothic predicates on encryption in ways we whores can hijack, mid-oscillation; i.e., the camping of Catholic orthodoxy through twilight "historical" documents: a paradoxically faithful ornamental approach/churchly embellishments to celebrate modern life by sarcastically aping the past. The joy of the Neo-Gothic author is being entombed in holy places to defile them, badly imitating them to deliberately rewrite history as-living-document (re: the historical Gothic tradition). Such reinvention speaks to organized religion historically organizing itself around lies, which our black mirrors can utilize to upend state monopolies/dogma; indeed, there's never been more of it, thus a need for workers to get creative in this respect! An equal and opposite reaction, we push back; i.e., making cops recoil and scamper away from the thing the state has alienated them from, making them fetishize/fear the most: nature and sex!

When normies make, they fit in; we stand out, enacting and embodying activism through iconoclasm reinventing language where power is stored and controlled (doing so while appearing as cool things, ourselves—like spies, assassins and whores/demons hiding in plain sight: as "maidens"). Indeed, it's our God-given right to double and camp the canon through this ghost of the counterfeit, our "secret" found documents' gloomth-y archaeology of the future sarcastically defending Medusa from the state by reversing abjection amid public excoriation; i.e., as whorish guerillas, ironic masters of disguise covertly concealing camp as "canon" to liberate sex work (thus all workers and nature) while relieving stress. We can change the past, thus the future (commonly expressed in hauntological media as retro-future); i.e., by using our bodies as church-like mise-en-abyme (the graveyard sex of demon whores, hauntologically embellishing in medieval miracles). This is our land, something to infiltrate and reclaim from unironic missionaries passing themselves off as "locals." When cracks in start to show, we push it to the limit, using darkness visible holy hell (sex and force; violence, terror and morphological expression) to blow the lid off state power as hollow!

In doing so, our reclaimed Wisdom of the Ancients/proletarian Superstructure happens through iconoclastic art to paradoxically build trust in/with: as concentrically cryptonymic/framed, code-in-code, pornographic camouflage, and trashy (thus cheap), toe-curling mise-en-abyme (no spies, here, just whores pretending to be nuns)! Furthermore, doing so becomes something to organize and fund between workers illustrating mutual consent through rebellion as silly-serious, like Zorro; i.e., a Communist Numinous both difficult to prove but easy to spot: hiding a sword in her bosom/up her "sheath," or her bosom as "sword-like" on its dark surface carrying its own demonic power (up the bungus)! Espionage is the romantic language of the past brought forwards to serve us, here and now! If the church is a brothel, our best revenge is fitting in to transform the church while spying inside it. Profaning Madonna to take Medusa back, we use every toy at our disposal (natural or manmade): to pass off and pervert in equal measure!

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

Medusa's not without fans. Everyone loves sluts, especially monster mommies with knock-out assets; we want to free them (thus workers and nature) from state bondage/Original Sin (and other persecution networks, such as Orientalism). To double dogma as bad-on-purpose is to invite troubling comparison, our doing so to change power as workers utilize and perceive it, hence how it linguo—materially emerges on all registers and in all poetic forms; i.e., to alter the course of history through ourselves as things to ironically watch and learn with/think differently about than ever before: having control over our bodies, labor, sexualities and gender identities/performances despite state insistence to the contrary! What is rigid, "pure" and dogmatic can darken, becoming loose/plastic enough again to change not just shape but polarity—demonstrating those at the top as not being exempt from such poetic realities. As above, so below! In any hole! Sell your soul (and your bodies)! It's forever a game of constant underestimation and embellishment, hiding our power on artifacts thereof: as known for both their (un)reliability and cloak-and-dagger potential, but also coded, uncanny ability to have fun with it all! Rebellion is life-or-death, playing on dogma as undead, demonic and animalistic.

The line they walk is, at times, razor-thin. Just as nuns haunt churches, whores haunt castles and the nuclear model's imperial shadow at large—doing so in hilarious, horny showboating ways that work to our advantage, mid-prison-break; i.e., sex and force, per Gothic invention/imagination, as limitless energies that can drive any rebellion through hauntology and cryptonymy (such euphemisms combining the language of sex, danger and war, food and death, etc): churches are brothels ordained by a false fallible god, reaping paradise and caging its almighty power for greedy men (and token sell-outs loyal to profit, thus policing and raping nature-as-demonic). Keeping with venal paradox, Gothic maturity is mature when rebellion encourages universal sex positivity on a cultural level through such processes swapping state fakeries out with ours. But this, as Walpole and Lewis gleefully showed us, is often immature/campy on its face!

Power isn't absolute; it's an illusion that maintains its legitimacy through performative appeals, not objective reality (re: canonical essentialism). The state polices power as a language it wants to monopolize and arrange as it sees fit; i.e., of power diegetically policing itself through Capitalist Realism finger-wagging iconoclasm as "childish" and "vain," criminal and illegitimate; e.g., American exceptionalism. So do we whores have hearts of gold (what the Ancient Egyptians called "the breath of god"); i.e., worn deliciously on our "orthodox" (unorthodox) sleeves, echoing across the centuries: to help you have a last-ditch change of heart, yourselves! Not to smite us as enemies, but embrace (and "smite") us as human, like you! In doing so, demon power is notoriously unequal. Perhaps you've gotten perhaps more than you bargained for, then but will have still received a far better deal than the state would ever give you (they don't negotiate with terrorists, which is precisely what Satan is). Such games, then, belong to our natural unalienable right to defend ourselves from the state; i.e., with it (and the bourgeoisie) as incompatible with life, with mutual consent as defined by us. There is no god; we are legion!

So no rest for the wicked! Dynamite coochie, let's weaponize demon sex, "raw dogging" its liminalities for workers! Reclaim Catholic excess and Protestant reformation ("Methinks the lady doth protest too much!"). Raid the church for ammunition, then give 'em hell (and other puns)! Misbehave! "Rape" ironically and jizz on dogma, danger disco—doing so to take the edge off and inject the holy prim-and-proper with the wilderness of the not-so-holy! Camp the canon, then watch state anuses implode (sending their own bad-faith doubles to mingle and imitate ours)!

(artist: Mimsy)

This concludes the "religious" portion, and by extension, the demon symposium. We'll continue unpacking this idea of "forbidden sight" more vis-à-vis the Promethean Quest (the quest for the Numinous; re: transformative, ostensibly self-destructive power), unraveling each in the next chapter!

Forbidden Sight, Faust and the Promethean Quest; or, Knowledge and Power Exchange

*Approaching, you writhe, we take control
 Unholy inquisition, sentence very cold
 My servants, demons, take you down the hole
 Your mind destroyed now I want your soul (source).*

—Dave Padden; "Phantasmagoria," on Annihilator's Never, Never Land (1990)

Faustian bargains deal with devils, exchanging power to gain forbidden knowledge (often immortality or weapons, followed by fame, fortune, sex and revenge); the Promethean Quest, faced with ancient mysteries and devastation, sees Cartesian men of reason heading into godly realms to uncover self-destructive power once more (resulting in fatally optimistic, militarized homecomings met by rogue technology and astronoetic nostalgia).

To it, demons are unheimlich. Their houses look suspiciously human, as do their whorish, made-from-clay occupants; i.e., through cryptonymic acts of concealment and revelation, arrangement and argument: poetic renditions of forbidden sight (those black or red glowing eyes) gleaned through all the regular senses, as well as extra poetic ones (re: Milton was blind when he wrote Paradise Lost, enlisting his daughters to transcribe his dreams into Latin). As such, power and knowledge are witnessed, albeit as "darkness visible" per exchange—through duality and paradox, demonic doubles teasing one hell of a good time!

As such, power and knowledge often exist as something to gaze upon, such forbidden scenery blasting the viewer to bits; but just as often, they're meant to be played with on the Aegis, bridging this with that:

- "part zero: a Rape Reprise": Considers how the state rapes nature for profit, a process of abjection that can be subverted during the whore's paradox and its revenge vis-à-vis ludo-Gothic BDSM.
- "part one: Idle Hands, Weapons in Clay" (re: blood libel): "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned!" Explores the morphology of whores inside the violent, vengeful domain of blood libel, persecution/revenge and sex demons' dark desires; i.e., psychosexual camp with traumatic baggage, examining Amazons/Medusa (demon mommies), followed by Takena's short-but-gnarly claymation skit, "Midnight Vampire" (2024), then goblins as demon lovers exchanging poetic violence of all different kinds!

- "part two: Making Demons" (re: Prometheus): Explores the act of making golems/composite manmade demons from Mary Shelley's 1818 novel onwards!
- "part three: Summoning Demons" (re: Faust): Per Alien, Evil Dead and other Gothic stories, lays out the idea of summoning occult demons, including acts of interrogating them through the classic Neo-Gothic model: damsels, detectives and demons per canonical torture vs exquisite "torture."
- "Exploring the Derelict Past: the Demonic Trifecta of Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons": Considers the left-behind, derelict flavor of demons, and unpacks various poetic qualities to damsels, detectives and demons separately and together!

Hindsight 20/20. Such poetic ventures concern rewriting a cultural understanding of the imaginary past (re: the Wisdom of the Ancients) to dismantle state operations and illusions, which my books have previously discussed at length; i.e., to apply pre-capitalist ideas towards a post-scarcity world, one whose pedagogy of the oppressed—when collectively synthesized amid intersectional solidarity—shatters Capitalist Realism vis-à-vis Gothic Communism and ludo-Gothic BDSM: nature as something to conquer versus nature fighting back against the usual weird canonical nerds "having studied the blade," nature camping cops to not only survive their wrath, but thrive in spite of it!

(artist: Kordie)

Demons, then, embody virtue (value) and vice through warring dialectical-material forces for or against the state-as-straight; i.e., from a historical-material standpoint during oppositional praxis, demons are beings to defeat, but also welcome back to better challenge state tourneys as anything but fair!

As we proceed, then, remember several things: one, how the undead embody feeding and trauma, which overlap with demonic exchange and transformation (with power and knowledge being synonymous during said exchanges); and two, that each poetic lens concerns the natural world as preyed upon by capital—i.e., expressed favorably or unfavorably in such language as ironic or unironic; e.g., the composite nature of mad science and the chimeric nature of animals prone to merging with the undead and demons through commonplace medieval hauntologies, but especially demon lovers, Black Veils, and courtly love speaking cryptonymically to state abuse at home and abroad: inheritance anxiety a package deal under capital's veiled and rotting imperium.

Also recall how these variables divide as separate modules according to their respective poetic histories. In doing so, this chapter shall explore playing with demons as such; i.e., in and upon abject spaces and thresholds, which can be repeatedly conjured up anew as demons are: to be played with, thus interrogate power under capital (and alter its flow in either direction: anisotropically towards or away from the state). Trauma and feeding will come up during "Forbidden Sight," and you may think about demons in those terms if it helps. Call them "vampires" if you wish; doing so merely stresses an ongoing relationship to undead/animal poetics and the histories and modus operandi known to them (e.g., lycanthropy and crazy wolf men ravishing sluts, below).

Bearing all that out, "Forbidden Sight" will explore exchange, first and foremost; the chapter after it, "Call of the Wild," will explore transformation more pointedly (and with an emphasis on demonic, anthropomorphic animals that present with undead, chimeric elements—furies). Before we jump into acting out and playing with demonic exchange through whores and their revenge, I want to give a reprise on rape, just to be thorough (given the heavy subject matter); i.e., about demons as whore-like, starting with a thesis—the whore's paradox—and some arguments built around it in defense of nature: having its revenge against capital harvesting it under normalized, canonically essential circumstances.

Forbidden Sight, part zero: A Rape Reprise; or, the Whore's Paradox Having Its Revenge During Ludo-Gothic BDSM (feat. Nyx)

Rape isn't unique to Capitalism, then, but Capitalism exploits rape for profit, which always leaves a bloody footprint for us to double [...] In turn, its ubiquity is something to challenge through ludo-Gothic BDSM liberating worker minds during calculated risk [...] More to the point, "rape" is an acquired taste; victims of rape (whatever the form) experience medieval-coded, regressive fantasies of "rape" they ideally want to camp during ludo-Gothic BDSM to avoid actual rape (and overall harm) in the future. In turn, praxial catharsis occurs through iconoclasm while healing from rape in xenophilic ways that involve nature as monstrous-feminine in fetishized, cliché sites of death, damage, decay and rebirth (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "A Cruel Angel's (Modular) Thesis" (2024)

Earlier, we discussed demons having a third quality apart from exchange and transformation—desire, whose forbidden, wishful thinking/fulfillment occurs under a Western hegemon that alienates, fetishizes and scapegoats nature by design; i.e., by whoring it out during the dialectic of the alien and raping said alien for profit (from cops to states to billionaires and Pygmalions, ACAB, ASAB, ABAB, APAB, etc; re: the state is straight, thus heteronormative, settler-colonial and Cartesian). I want to offer a reprise, one we whores can work with to have our revenge, being stewards of nature better than past workers historically were or have been since capitals gradual evolution into itself!

Note: Given the importance of the whore's revenge as a concept (and how often it appears throughout the rest of the module), I've prefaced the original rape reprise and thesis argument with something of a foreword—one starring my muse and friend, Nyx! Said preface is nine pages long and poetically introduces/outlines the whore's revenge before the original thesis argument and reprise body. —Perse

(artist: Nyx)

As you can imagine, profit's structure and grim prostitution historically-materially translate easily enough to revenge by one side committed dualistically against the other in praxial opposition—of man/the nuclear model and token Man-Box forms betraying nature and labor vs nature-as-whore and vice versa; i.e., commonly expressing as Amazonomachia during ancient to "ancient" wrestling kayfabe dialogs, psychomachia and similar "derelict" theatricalities, but also the Medusa and many other monstrous-feminine GNC forms that routinely play such things out as vice characters generally do: throughs monstrous theatre and its myriad death masks, costumes and mirrors (from animals and undead, to demons), but also birthday suits! Whatever the monstrosity exhibiting itself, antiquity and weaponized nudism go together like peanut butter and chocolate! The mommy dom is delicious and crushing—like a black hole, sucking us inside! Except, notions of psychosexual aside, it's not strictly nihilism if the end result of such playtime is an end of profit, thus rape; a profane wicked joy waits for us at the ass-end of space, a dark star to take us to its hellish center and crush us to oblivion!

(artist: Nyx)

Numinous play aside, general prostitution remains the oldest form of organized labor hence labor theft and action; i.e., the messy interlocution something to police in half-real forms, meaning ones where the whore's revenge to overcome said exploitation happens through parodies of trauma: performatively undermining profit as a monomythic structure, one whose yawning graveyard/narrative of the crypt hegemonically leads to overlapping persecution networks, onstage and off; e.g., blood libel, sodomy and witch-hunt arguments (whose revenge theatres we'll unpack sequentially as we go). Whatever the style of revenge being teased, the proletarian function (thus flow) of power is universal— one where Gothic theatre becomes a complicated, paradoxical means of relief and attack across space-time. It's gloriously messy.

As a hauntological entity of revenge since Ancient Athens' Archaic Period, for example, the witch is both primordial hag and whore of a younger nubile, badass and seductive persuasion, yet bears out phallic, black-magic elements of formerly ethnocentric hysteria arguments (and ritual sacrifice) that turn capital on its head; i.e., per Creed's Archaic Mother argument, regarding the monstrous-feminine as an act of revenge tied to looking: according to where power (and trauma) are stored in modernized identities speaking to ancient struggles having evolved under capital's own dark metamorphosis channeling sexuality from action to identity as something to look upon and reflect!

Such is the Medusa and her Aegis' murderous womb (which we'll examine at length, in "Idle Hands"), but really any form of nature as monstrous-feminine beyond white female biology canonized as "exclusive victim" in Omelas (thus its cops that, tokenized and deputized, police concentric rape dialogs to root out "false" victims); i.e., haunted embarrassingly by state revenge and holocaust—Creed's oversight about the monstrous-feminine refusing to be victims not precluding tokenism as a regular historical-material symptom of capital (re: Athena punishing Medusa as much as empowering her on the Aegis)—thereby triangulating TERFs against other witches and marginalized parties. Called "Satanic" by the former in bad faith, the latter remain utterly capable, all the same, of enacting non-nuclear rebellion; i.e., during the cryptonymy process to reverse abjection (thus profit), mid-revenge! So does hostility shiver on the Aegis (ass or otherwise), quivering like a pissed-off rattlesnake!

(artist: Joshua Reynolds)

However confusing this might seem at first glance, the fact of the matter remains: the cruel angel's proverbial thesis can be escaped through its own subversion of capital's strange appetites; i.e., profit as endemic to rape, yet its monsters of rape—the pimp and the whore as demon lovers—being anisotropic through profit as reversible through monsters (which whores and their revenge constitute)! Likewise, revenge is always dualistic, thus rife with troubling comparisons we can reclaim during liminal expression; re: the unheimlich as liminal hauntology of war embodied between workers and language more broadly!

Latin, for example, is the dead crystallization of "Rome" and its Numinous offshoots; e.g., the Holy Roman Empire, aka the First Reich. In turn, modern demonology is basically "pig Latin"; i.e., tied to other forms of gibberish and linguistic-to-corporal morphology hybridized, mid-synthesis, to achieve a variety of praxial effects: mix-and-match word-salad rebellion games, which ludo-Gothic BDSM boils down into social-sexual arrangements thereof—that bleed off the page to synthesis catharsis through rape arguments favoring the whore!

Wherever she finds herself, then, everyone loves the whore, including the bourgeoisie profiting off sacred ideas of Satan-as-whore. Power is power as something to perform, then, the performances repeating and playing out through endless variations for or against the state pimping nature! The state is an addict that can never stop exploiting nature—i.e., having only doubled down on its own dogma over time—and this is where we can work our magic, on the Aegis! The elite love the whore to pimp; rebels, to hoist her foes on their own petards!

"Do you wanna fuck this mommy pussy?" Nyx breathes, for example. Stabbing herself gingerly for our entertainment (technically mine, but the images from that session are featured here, above and below), she waves a magic wand; i.e., teaching us through demonic sex—and in more ways than one! However magical and enchanting the pussy (and other holes) being "stabbed" are such elements are haunted by state operations making them ubiquitous and off-limits! The whore is the footstool of canon, terror the kissing cousin of force.

To court the whore, then, is to court a dark governess camping the canon through various forms of "rape" played out; i.e., forbidden love as offered by dark mommy doms who fuck to metal as a kind of poetic "sex, drugs and rock 'n roll" (the purview of Gothic); e.g., cannibalism, live burial, incest, pedophilia, captivity and so on, expressed in safe-to-consume (thus perform) varieties. In turn, such cryptonymy is a matter of the worker's pride in their craft; i.e., the whore having fun with things normally used to persecute them in bad faith, giving and receiving in equal dualistic measure: "Come to mommy!" So does Nyx make us hers, but release us on our own recognizance to reflect on such dialogs that we might remake them and pass Medusa's fatal wisdom along! Ace or not, sexuality and public nudism—from frisson/skin orgasms to toe-curling erotic orgasms—are the whore's greatest weapons! Foreplay is common, but optional, so come prepared ;

i.e., know what you want, so the Devil can give it to you in the heat of the moment!

(artist: Nyx)

So do we whores insert the ghost a bit more actively into the counterfeit! In turn, so does revolution always begin, the whore humanizing themselves through what the state wants to control, but can't; i.e., Nyx isn't someone to unironically "hex" us with actual blood magic, cannibalism and kidnap, post-abuse, yet whose performance remains haunted by precisely the kinds of dogma canonical media routinely summons and prescribes: the trafficking of sex (and apologia of rape) relaid in demonic code lying in both directions! What they abuse we can savor by transgressively subverting such things.

To that, Nyx proudly uses her awesome body—notably that of a dark, Numinous sex goddess who loves nature; i.e., as something to free from capital through iconoclastic art—to summon the Medusa, doing so to make us more Gothically mature, hence empathetic towards Mother Earth. Doing so always happens during rebellion; i.e., as an ongoing process of development towards Gothic Communism, our rape dialogs authored by whores leading to more intelligent and conscious workers. Indulgence, mid-reflection on Bald Mountain, is very much the point; re: "Man is but an ass if he go about to expound this dream."

And yet, here we are, partaking of the usual guilty pleasures. Unlike fascism (and TERFs; re: fascist feminism, Christo- or otherwise), to actually rebel against police violence is to consent, and consent is sexy!

(artist: Nyx)

Speaking to the grander peach's routine harvest in small, to gaze upon Nyx's fat Gorgon ass is look on one of many such cases clamoring for revenge as something to expound; i.e., to behold the very Earth itself as harvested by capital, an organ of perception, of contraband, of orchards of forbidden fruit! Pimps cannot stand to let their perceived merchandise speak out. And yet, it's only threatening if you mean us harm, thus fear exposure taking away state-sanctioned ideas of rejecting alien, non-white elements ("darkness" speaking to anything destabilizing state orders of existence). From Nyx to us and all whores under state brothels privatizing property as literally the planet and all life deemed "extended" under Cartesian models, we must punch up from Hell as where the state relegates us, and ultimately fears without irony!

True belief or not, incarceration and threats of release are Capitalist Realism's name of the game, and one we must challenge on our own black mirrors having the whore's revenge! Such dialogs (and the whores raising them) are always state victims; i.e., doomed with reprisals for daring testify to rape with "rape" in quotes! Regardless, such language (and its interminable, shadowy lineage) must become naked to speak frankly while suffering the consequences belonging to accident of birth; i.e., under state duress, the reaction joining the conversation by pushing Medusa back into her grave. The vitality of said "grave" (the whore's abyssal cunt) lies in how it speaks to what is otherwise repressed by state pimps.

Abjection be like that, its canonical forms tempting the middle class and luring them with its own ghost-of-the-counterfeit brides of darkness wrecking house and home; i.e., as sold back to superstitious (and punitive) audiences seeking assimilation through persecution of the alien as whore, the state's de facto pimp to summon, shadow and police the whore during controlled opposition and hypocritical Protestant ethics; re: Hawthorne's pimps always being the Puritans playing false preacher and Satanic rebel during historical materialism: a vicious cycle of profit whose boom-and-bust peddlers pander sequentially to moral panic during oppositional cryptonymy! The pimp and the whore are hopeless tethered.

Revenge—for the pimp or the whore, then—is always a game of dark desires told and retold on black mirrors neither can monopolize for revenge; re: Medusa's awesome Aegis as much our weapon as the state's and vice versa, speaking dualistically regarding Marx' "tradition of all dead generations" weighing anisotropically like a nightmare on the brains of the living! Pimps are classically charlatans with bubbles to burst; i.e., by the whores they cage effectively dictating labor action as able to camp, thus subvert, its own pimping to start with.

So do we whores make Marx gay as much as the state (then and now); re: we camp canon because we must, liberating any and all brothels while going through Hell; i.e., as a matter of dogmatic reenactment, one purposefully made ironic through our holistic dualism's ergodic and liminal perversions. To bust gut and nut alike—castrating our foes with terrifying exposure to the things they fear taken out of their hands and used against them—the brothel is classically a church; i.e., one having turned pimping into a form of religion, thus dogma blaming older orders for current crimes against workers. Such is virgin/whore syndrome at play!

Much like the pearly castle that concludes Otranto's Capitalocene, then, the canonical good witch is always the worst; i.e., is still a virgin/whore, but a token traitor acting like she (the classic token being a white straight European women) isn't a witch, thus a whore punching down from positions of relative (dis)advantage; e.g., the Salem adjudicators tilting at windmills during virgin/whore and mirror syndrome, thereby conjuring up bugbears behind Black Veils/on the Aegis: during liminal expression to mollify and whitewash their own brutality from time out of mind. The oldest class traitors actually stem from ancient feminism versus Indigenous populations, the former being an older breed of activism, thus the first to decay into self-righteous and -deceiving methods of itself; i.e., in Radcliffean service to capital, the state and Capitalist Realism; e.g., the Warren family of The Conjuring (set on the cusp of the 1980s, thus Satanic Panic); re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss. It's the oldest trick in the book, Hippolyta subjugated to punch Medusa! They can't help themselves; i.e., questing for the Numinous to pimp it because capital pimps everything.

A cop is a cop, a whore a whore, and many tokens self-select (out of desperation and convenience) to prove their righteousness against alien invaders impersonating the status quo; i.e., by punching down against state and Communist spectres alike! American Liberalism exorcizes both, abjecting Communism and concealing its own nature as fascist behind the mask (and its neoliberal double standards with or without concealment). Centrism be like that; i.e., speaking to state needs, high on their own supply!

The fact remains, profit is built on persecution mania as something to enforce against the whore as alien; i.e., state pimps being the very cops who dutifully avenge their employers' privatization (that of the elite) against nature-as-colonized; re: as something to shiver at Numinously while cracking the case. Therefore, nature as something to seek revenge against—however dressed up in goodly white fakeries, mid-abjection—remains ever-and-always something they must chase to keep up appearances with, but also enrich themselves (the Warrens, for example, keeping a trophy room full of former conquests, hoarding said victories like any good serial killer does). Indeed, their stories cannot work without such naturalized antagonism, the abjection process opening the door to their own downfall by treating labor as holy through pimping the Numinous time and time again.

Sand in the hour glass, so bides the Medusa her time; i.e., ever a patient predator camping the canon to fake-it-until-she-makes a functional opposite, the whore's campiness aiming at Miltonic revelation: that which, deliberately unleashed on viewers, studiously reminds those looking in that all deities reside in the human breast (and extensions of said breast). That of a fallen status quo laid low from endless greed, the whore brings such cataclysm about through tone-poem siren songs; i.e., levied against state pimps, the latter's complacency breeding delusions of grandeur that—like Icarus and similar Greek heroes—await one-and-all tragic ends the Medusa gleefully administers through Original Sin: the petard our dark oracle happily hoists them on (the classic Gothic villain killed through exposure)!

To that, the whore's terrorist/counterterrorist refrain is one of chiastic revenge; i.e., one that more broadly speaks to social-sexual paradigms of poetic exchange, and which concern power and knowledge as demons (thus whores) commonly express them: of workers routinely and fractally-recursively whored out under state rule forbidding fruit of all kinds. So do the "bananas" of a given republic grow loquacious, chorusing apotropaic revenge in kind!

Our revenge as whores, then, ultimately concerns the anisotropic development of Gothic Communism—one whose radical empathy occurs through our aforementioned ludo-Gothic BDSM (and its various paradoxes); e.g., Matthew Lewis' cryptonymy and cryptomimesis camping rape/profit inside the brothel-esque church/Gothic castle's prioress and Matilda. Both occupy the same virgin/whore spaces and bodies of performance, on and off canvas! Whatever the form, state logic divides good and evil into black-and-white, us-versus-them binaries whose fractal recursion lays the Gothic Ozymandias to barren waste: "Kettle this, fuckers!" Any weapon can instill terror to discourage profit as much as not! It's a mood, our whore's reprobate palace a place to raise Cain inside-outside itself!

(artist: Nyx)

In turn, the entire poetic, palliative-Numinous spectrum plays with "rape" in quotes to end rape without quotes: nature—suitably antagonized and put cheaply to work by

Pygmalion's binaries—seeks the whore's revenge against the state and its bad, traitorous actors' own neo-medieval screeds; i.e., the "civil" parties kettling Galatea as the state scapegoat for the elite's disastrous historical-materialism; re: DARVO obscurantism like the Warren family (and a million other token offshoots) masking profit's deadly daily operations, thus obfuscations and sorry betrayals policing the whore within the infernal concentric pattern: with whores playing Radcliffean detectives, thus pimps throwing accusations at their abject victims. From the Covenant of the Rainbow onto Francis Bacon and modern police states, all colonize Earth and those "of it" as a habitual Indigenous status to assign and carry out, meaning inside the Patriarchy-to-Protestant-ethic's holistic state of exception (the noble and unruly savage).

To be blunt, cops require victims to operate, thus feed the state with whore blood, but the whore can reverse this process, too; i.e., by showing the madness of the zealot thinking themselves sacred, but in truth being a sorry (and cheaply bought) pirate. Keeping with Radcliffe and her pirates, then, we want to demask them during the cryptonymy process, thereby reversing profit as a hauntological/chronotopic matter of abjection—to, with our own "eyes of confusion," speak to rape through "rape" as the viewing of what is raped haunted by the spirit of play as much as genuine, unironic abuse: to turn the abuser's world upside-down by showing them what they want to attack but can't; i.e., not without exposing themselves! Something they literally cannot afford (as a matter of profit), it gives our own invasions a paradoxical safe space of "danger" to launch our own salvos from, haunting the nuclear home!

In turn, "Here's true power!" becomes something of a liar's paradox; e.g., "This sentence is not true!" So is Medusa, so are we whores; i.e., both not what the state fears yet precisely what it attacks during reactive abuse because they fear our revenge baked into their formulas: our come-and-get it booties taking such colonizer rhetoric out of their hands "for good." "Stare and tremble!" speaks to what workers might do when freed from the elite's profit motive, the fatal visions we presage lurking on the temptation of forbidden knowledge seen and felt in the flesh! Concerning forbidden knowledge (and fruit, whatever), "the way of all flesh" becomes a surreal hellish gateway leading the viewer in many directions (echoes of Borge's "Garden of the Forking Paths")! Head-crushing thighs and pussy speaking through castled "Kegel analogs" (e.g., watermelon)! In Gothic, big = "non-white," thus alien whore to pimp and fight back with, during morphological expression (and metaphor)!

(artist: Nyx)

As such, demons are whores and communicate through sex and force, thus pleasure and pain merged with predator/prey being routinely confused phenomenologically under state models; i.e., as things to give back on the Aegis as a psychosexual exchange device; re: body-like castles or castle-like bodies, during liminal expression. Said whore's revenge, then, happens during demonic testimony through unequal, forbidden exchange and radical (empathetic) transformation; i.e., the chase of the black rabbit less a destination and more a journey fulfilling an end to profit as dark desire personified: policing nature as alien whore and said whore having enough, her anger darkly entropic and magnetic pathos something we terrorize our foes with as their brand us; you say "heretic," we say "fuck you!"

Luckily that blade cuts both ways, then; i.e., anisotropically weaponizing in ways useful to class warriors, sharpening our testimony to witness/reverse state harm, thus counterterror on the same Aegis. The fearsome, nakedly furious and seductive Medusa, then—despite being an infamous and awesome goddess of death tied to gratuitous rape, murder and revenge—is often vivacious, cute, and full of tricks as revenge! So does the whore regain control through play—both with death and rape, but also empathetic cultivation during ludo-Gothic BDSM and its various theatrical registers; i.e., as a demonic matter of revenge during calculated risk: "What dost thou want?" (more on this and black rabbits in "Call of the Wild").

True to form, whores can humanize the harvest and its castles-in-the-flesh, doing so to make the state's flagrant inhumanity appear undressed; i.e., to expose their bad intent while arming us through paradoxical nudity cultivating empathy (segregation being no defense, Radcliffe). Revelation merely exposes anything hidden, but does so on the imagery of the surface: as a dark aesthetic whose visually ambiguous function demands dialectical-material scrutiny to reveal itself!

(artist: Nyx)

In turn, the whore's revenge operates against profit and pimp, alike (the two ideas are inextricable). Doing so is a concept I originally introduced in the Undead Module's "Policing the Whore"; re: by building on "Hot Allostatic Load" and Silvia Federici by introducing a ludo-Gothic element to BDSM as performative revenge speaking to state perfidy by showing workers our Aegis: as a harvest to humanize in the shadow of state force, a pedagogy to heal from rape with!

I want to build on doing so, here, first highlighting the whore's revenge; i.e., as a matter of thesis argument—power being play as something to regain through performative trauma putting "rape" in quotes—and then spending the rest of the module exploring various aspects of it to reclaim: tied to different demonic and natural forms, whose crafting and assorted, operatic, danger-disco hybrids (with undead elements) speaking notoriously out against/with the harm normally used to chattelize us and control our bodies and labor for profit. Where there's profit, there's unironic rape and death—the subversion of which occupies the same spaces of exploitation and liberation; re: on the Aegis, Medusa's luscious wrath (and similar neo-medieval oxymorons) coming from an alien barbarian catching your eye! Death by Snu-Snu, the dark gods exact their productively whorish revenge!

The usual dualities and surreal paradoxes (e.g., Giger) apply here, insofar as deals with the devil can be had with the state as much as Medusa. Whatever a demon's form, then, the usual dialectics of shelter and the alien are anisotropic: they go both ways, but mean vastly different things depending on where power flows; re: the ghost of the counterfeit (and its simulacra) forwarding or reversing the abjection process; i.e., nature having the whore's revenge against capital or vice versa; e.g., Frazetta's Orientalism and damsel-in-distress theatrics, below.

However messy it appears, trashy it feels or loud it sounds, then, the language of the imaginary past speaks volumes to the sins of empire and operations of capital (and its qualities) moving things hauntologically along! In this faux-medieval's vicious cycle, there's a place for the hero, whore, evil wizard and animals all depicted on canvas and off—one to uphold said cycle (and Capitalist Realism) or break it, once and for all. This takes bait during the cryptonymy process switching things out, but nevertheless can have us completely safe during the usual buffers state agents cannot easily cross. They'll certainly try (as monomyth characters generally do), but in doing so risk possession by an empathy for the abject that's entirely our doing—the ol' bait-and-switch, baby! Your dominatrix is a Commie slut, radiating dark strength—fetish and cliché!

(artist: Frank Frazetta)

Alien torture promotes sweet release from capital's Numinous torment, but only when domination becomes playful, thus ironic, to end profit. But where to start? Luckily we won't have to go far because the Gothic (thus Medusa) is all around us; i.e., "We live in Gothic times." Regardless if demons makes any visual objective sense, then, that's how things historically personify or otherwise hinge upon/arbitrate when demonically translating back and forth; i.e., capital is a cycle that comes back, slithering ouroborotically around and around: raping nature through recycled phobias, fetishes and stigmas... to which nature seeks out her revenge through rape play of varying degrees of silly-seriousness and performative irony's mise-en-abyme. So do we compel the state's demise through empathy as the whore's revenge; re: during ludo-Gothic BDSM: a fatal portrait to leave our behinds, well, behind! We'll not just dance on your graves, but fuck on them to spite your fallen hubris! Desensitized to illusion, our riotous asses cannot be contained or denied, ambiguity our lullaby and your torment music to our ears! Who's dominating who, again?

So concludes the new preface portion of this rape reprise. —Perse

We'll get to that. For now, try to understand how demonic desires are shadowy and repressed, given form by oppositional poetics in dialectical-material argument. So when I say "revenge" from here on out, I do so with concerns to the usual us-versus-them, cops-and-victims language that demons manifest as/relate to us with (and we them) while pinned between nation-states/corporations and nature growing increasingly turbulent; i.e., said revenge had by one against another pursuant to worker or bourgeois needs. Rebellion through demonic poetics happens through a particular thesis to counteract: nature is monstrous-feminine (re: Volume One)—a whore under state control, which the elite rape for profit, and for which both sides seek revenge before, during and after structural abuse. The exploitation is endless because profit and labor value (of nature) are endless!

(artist: PiMo)

Demons, then, are whores under Western (Cartesian) dominion opposite virgins, but also are virgins depending on the circumstances; e.g., subjugated Amazons like Psylocke, left. This need for state control and dominion introduces a paradox from which a new thesis can arise during ludo-Gothic BDSM (for this chapter/module, indented for emphasis):

Ludo-Gothic BDSM has many theoretical definitions⁶³ and applications. In practice, though, I frequently utilize it through rape play that paradoxically games occur along Gothic, liminal routes, wherein workers playfully articulate their natural rights in linguo-material ways between reality and fabrication that go beyond games as commodities but are nevertheless informed by them as something to rewrite; i.e., through play as a general exercise that involves a great many things: a reached agreement of power and play in Gothic terms, whose luck/odds are defined not through canon, but iconoclastic poiesis that can be expanded far beyond the restrictive, colonial binary and heteronormative ruleset of the elite's intended exploitation of workers to challenge the profit motive and all of its harmful effects in the bargain; e.g., genocide, heteronormativity and Max Box culture. The sum of these concepts in praxis could be called "ludo-Gothic BDSM."

⁶³ The word as I coined it has several definitions. One (from the Six Rs):

Another (from the glossary, abridged):

My combining of an older academic term, "ludic-Gothic" (Gothic videogames), with sex-positive BDSM theatrics as a potent means of camp. The emphasis is less about "how can videogames be Gothic" and more how the playfulness in videogames is commonly used to allow players to camp canon in and out of videogames as a form of fairly negotiated power exchange established in playful, game-like forms achieves catharsis; i.e., by putting "rape" in quotes, thus healing from rape without quotes. Often by rape survivors, such people classically find power/agency through theatrical reenactments of unequal, unfair or otherwise rapacious treatment and conditions; i.e., by relying on a concept I'll heretofore call "the whore's paradox."

(artists: Ray Sugarbutt and Sammy Stocking)

access happens anyways; i.e., (de)valued, mid-exchange, thus used to humanize or dehumanize the demonized through performance and play. Per Marx and myself, Capitalism alienates and sexualizes everything. Nature is monstrous-feminine as such, "empowerment" applying to any aspect of our life, bodies, violence and terror the state wishes to monopolize/control, and

The paradox simple: demons are maidens and maidens are demons, but both are virgins and whores, and each finds power (and knowledge) according to how the state forbids access, yet

As I've moved through this series, though, the definition has narrowed, according to my focus on the term specifically to play with rape as I define it; re (from the Poetry Module's "A Note about Rape/Rape Play," 2024):

as something broadened beyond its narrow definition, "penetrative sex meant to cause harm by removing consent from the equation." To that, there is a broad, generalized definition I devised in "Psychosexual Martyrdom" (2024), which will come in handy when we examine unironic forms of rape, but also "rape" as something put into quotes; i.e., during consent-non-consent as a vital means of camp during ludo-Gothic BDSM:

martyrs are generally raped by the state, which we have to convey mid-performance without actually getting raped if we can help it ("rape" meaning [for our purposes] "to disempower someone or somewhere—a person, culture, or place—in order to harm them," generally through fetishizing and alienizing acts or circumstances/socio-material conditions that target the mind, body and/or spirit) [emphasis, me]: finding power while disempowered (the plight of the monstrous-feminine).

Rape can be of the mind, spirit, body and/or culture—the land or things tied to it during genocide, etc; it can be individual and/or on a mass scale, either type committed by a Great Destroyer (a Gothic trope of abuse of the worse, unimaginable sort, rarefying as a person, onstage) of some kind or another as abstracting unspeakable abuse. It's a translation, [...] adding the irony afterward as a theatrical means of medicine; i.e., rape play challenging profit through the usual Gothic articulations in service to workers and nature at large (source).

To that, rape is something that demons play with during the whore's paradox. By extension, ludo-Gothic BDSM is effectively rape play combined with Gothic themes and BDSM practices to avenge state wrongs against nature.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

any trope, convention, cliché or fetish that might be used to degrade, humiliate, rape or otherwise demonize/dominate beings "of nature" per capital's qualities (re: settler-colonial, heteronormative and Cartesian); i.e., that we can reclaim during ludo-Gothic BDSM, hence through unequal power letting us "get a leg up," topping from a position of normal disadvantage to have our revenge: perceived disempowerment becoming a paradoxical, interchangeable means of escape, regarding universal worker liberation onstage and off (versus equality of convenience inside the text).

(artist: ALT3R4TION)

To do so is to break capital's hold on all things demons, darkness and nature they stole and monopolized, in turn smashing their own abjection against them and breaking Capitalist Realism with our Aegis—to deny capital's dead labor and language feeding on living labor and language according to what power and knowledge we exchange to and fro. The whore's revenge is to break the profit motive by making a world for which it (and rape) are no longer possible using these methods; i.e., by using the same demonic and slutty language capital does, but at cross purposes: to hug the alien—not demonize it to receive state violence—thereby (ex)changing how the world is seen to begin with. We aggregate power differently than state forms, outlasting and outperforming them to dismantle their harvesting mechanisms, social and material, foreign and domestic.

Nature, then, is always a whore who punches up against state pimps to end profit as an endless structure of genocide. History more broadly could be described as whores vs pimps, hence workers vs the state; i.e., something the seemingly cannot die, but whose aforementioned whores are as imperishable as Medusa despite being beheaded.

That's basically the gist of the whore's revenge during the whore's paradox, and we'll unpack the demonic notion of enacting revenge through ludo-Gothic BDSM more in parts one, two, three and "Exploring the Derelict Past" (then tie those to nature as a poetic-performative element, in "Call of the Wild"). First, in part zero, let's consider the poetic forces and work that drive such revenge to not only take place, but wrestle against pro-state actors! They need us far more than we need them, the whore too cool to deny and too precious to abstain from! Like Medusa, her revenge is always sexy and gratuitous (though it can be strict or gentle to varying degrees), molesting our brains (the medieval, neo or not, loves its silly-serious puns)!

I want to be brief, but inclusive; i.e., Gothic Communism is a group effort, but also a checkered one. Against the state binarizing and dividing us, our best revenge is to exist in ways that speak holistically and cryptonymically to our specific-yet-combined abuses under capital; i.e., that merge in a collective desire among all workers, whose pedagogy of the oppressed must speak to a collective, universal desire to be free and loved, out in the open, bare and exposed:

(source)

Anything less is imprisonment, genocide, and rape of some by others. The proletarian potential of such carnivals, then, is to make everyone a monarch, year-round. No gods, no masters, just equality for all and the stability of post-scarcity afforded by the ability to imagine, then reify it, during ludo-Gothic BDSM. The avenging idea, in turn, is to be stewards of nature while of it, yourselves—to expand your horizons, a unity of whores thinking outside the box when throwing shade/fucking with this or that.

Again, we're painting in broad strokes here, narrowing them per case as needed. Apart from the raw materials, sex positivity should speak to holistic liberation through reclaimed exchanges affording morphological expression as exchange. Play is all but required to work with all of them separately and together to varying degrees, "monstrous-feminine" meaning many things, not just female or black skin, but anything "of nature" that isn't the status quo; i.e., that isn't white, cis-het, Christian European men pimping nature-as-alien.

Under Cartesian models, for example, whores are commonly "non-white" in terms of skin color (above) but also shape and size wielded by people of various ethnicities (next page); i.e., seen/depicted as equally gluttonous and peach-like, thus fallen and ripe for future conquest by Cartesian, heteronormative, settler-colonial agents policing nature-as-monstrous-feminine (chattelizing and exotifying alien things for profit, consequently raping them). Sex work is generally caught in the middle; i.e., the bigger the size, the bigger the prize, thus axe to grind. We're not always master of such things, but they demand to be heard, all the same. Simply put, it's a war—one full of opposing demonic forces competing among the shadows and fog as the shadows and fog!

To that, exploitation and liberation sit side-by-side on the same shadowy stages. Indeed, such media might seem hopelessly haunted by capital's bloodthirsty cycles (from gentrification and decay to tragedy to farce). In truth, such things manifest differently per oppressed group and their various intersections' vengeful episodes, but adhere to the same exclusionary rhetoric viewed through capital's qualities and state monopolies/trifectas occurring through newer modes of capital built on older imperial systems; i.e., strategically swapping out different divide-and-conquer qualities of alienization within these imbricating persecution networks (diversifying tokenization). All canonically operate in service to profit as a structure; i.e., as something for workers to gradually overcome through similar mixing and matching across a spectrum of status, class, culture, race, privilege and oppression told in body language and labor exchange, biological sex, orientation, gender identity and performance: state demons versus worker demons, the former recruiting from the latter to dominate them with members pulled from their own populations—all while abusing the potential said populations yield per harvest/altercation.

(artist: Hailey Queen)

Mid-conflict, guerilla warfare turns land and body into a weapon; i.e., as something to perceive, counteracting state advantages (which state embodiments abuse, mimicking guerrilla tactics and imagery to achieve profit/play the victim). To illustrate a perfect world through Gothic Communism, then, is to speak adequately and advantageously using our bodies: to articulate how they are seen, thus controlled by us and others regarding "non-white⁶⁴" qualities among other marginalized elements; e.g., non-male, non-Christian, non-European, etc; i.e., where we can bare it all and not be attacked, but also not be targeted for abuse regardless how much clothes we have on (or don't) and stripped bare by the lecherous eyes of others (or their antagonizing hands). Whatever her shape, color, gender or size, then, Medusa unbound denotes an outsider among all of us who refuse to sell out for the usual equality of convenience (and desperation). And while segregation and tokenization are no defense, showing off should still be done in ways that reveal our friends to us, while placing things between our attackers and us (often a phone screen and/or an alias).

Such are the forces of capital that push us towards self-defeating revenge, which we must make into an inclusive, intersectional, solidarized agenda. Yet, the paradox of art is you have to first be unhappy with it, then change it by listening to your own pained existence inside-outside yourself.

By that same token, to enact rebellion (thus have one's revenge), you must first conceptualize it under duress; i.e., in ways that speak to the usual double standards, moral panics, and guilty pleasures at work: something to glut, binge and purge like a drug compensating for their own sorry lives (alienated from nature, acting superior to it). This addict's predation speaks to cops-and-victims, us-versus-them arguments inside the state of exception, save that instead of zombies as givers and receivers of state violence, you have demons executing pimps and whores to achieve the same discernible effect: cops and merchandise. The former answer only to and investigate themselves, shielded by the state to reap for its owners during selective punishment/reactive abuse.

⁶⁴ In the settler-colonial sense, which isn't necessarily skin color. The English colonizing the Irish, for example, demonized them as animals despite both parties have pale skin.

Under this dynamic, the state antagonizes nature-as-monstrous-feminine to put it to work, endlessly harvesting it through police violence. In turn, revenge becomes acceptable to exact against nature as the cop sees fit, but not for state property to do so in return (which historically women, or those treated as women, have been [and still are] treated as). Per state monopolies, trifectas and the qualities of capital, one side's violence, terror and morphological expression are entirely legitimate/sovereign, thus human per the ghost of the counterfeit, and the other side is wholly illegitimate/not sovereign, thus inhuman, incorrect, unreal in service to profit (and genocide/unironic rape) during the abjection process. "When in Rome." From the oldest systems of conquest in the West to the present ordering of things, there is generally one correct way and others that—while tolerated from time to time—are hierarchically lesser/wrong.

(artist: Rotten Mo)

However strong a rebellious demon appears, then, it is ultimately criminal, thus bridled on the Aegis: hunted, abused, stalked, killed and discarded like waifu trash by imperial forces reaping nature-as-monstrous-feminine (this applies to tokenized forms, too; re: the euthanasia effect). We must reclaim this, doing so in sexually descriptive, culturally appreciative ways (re: the creative successes of proletarian praxis) during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., that give Satanic upheavals, however dualistic per their shared aesthetic with the state, a proletarian character resisting TERFs, SWERFs, cops and states. All of them rape nature through modular-yet-intersectional persecution networks (e.g., virgin/whore + black/white + master/slave + blood libel, etc) on a scale of descending privilege/preferential mistreatment.

Due to their "our way or the highway" approach, imperial systems are generally brittle, prone to enclosure and maladaptation. It takes energy to control things that very much resist being controlled, wherein strongmen and fascist bullshit go hand-in-hand; i.e., strength is a performance, meaning to fight enemies no one can defeat, or which only the Chosen One(s) can defeat. Empires die very much for this reason; their myopic approach and mythical, largely imaginary conquest of nature prohibits them anything but a short lifespan. It's Icarian, or closer to the mark—Promethean. Similar to Faust looking backwards, such pursuits are always nostalgic towards disaster as something to fulfill, the followed footsteps filled with old and fresh blood alike. Gothic helps us avoid that in ways we can recultivate; re: ludo-Gothic BDSM.

Furthermore, the ability to say how in Gothic language is tremendously useful, if only because the more marginalized a particular group is, the more the in-group will be expected to police their treatment; the more policed they are, the more these behaviors escalate when empire decays; and given the Gothic is concerned almost entirely with the slow death and inheritance of dead empire, demons, whores and other creatures of darkness are vital to bridging the gap for those who spend most of their time on the state's good side. A time will come when this won't matter—point in fact, the state is harvesting these same benefactors for the exclusive benefit of a very small group of people. Having the language to recognize such predation gives us the ability to change and adapt in response to this exploitation, dispelling state illusions and changing our socio-material conditions (reclaiming the Base and recultivating the Superstructure) to account for a better world denied to us by the elite. Capital never stops; neither must we.

As we'll see moving forwards, then, our whore's thesis extends to the owner class that whores must contend with. Those who pimp, thus harvest/rape nature are professional labor thieves forever out of touch with reality who, as a result, think they're really cool; they're really not:

(source tweet, Sonny Bunch: October 5th, 2024)

No one ever said desk murder was attractive. Yet, this is who we're dealing with, and must have our revenge against: rapists and divorced dads with all charisma of a souless wooden puppet, unbothered by state shift as something only possible after the Industrial Age fed into the Capitalocene and its fairly recent profit motive (and concessions). The elite style themselves as lords of nature on a cosmological scale, passing themselves off as rapacious, Cartesian gods: sucking nature-as-monstrous-feminine (classically as female) dry while her fury becomes impossible to ignore. They know it's disastrous; they don't care—so long as they can do it for as long as possible!

Concerning demonic poetics and an ever-growing desire for revenge, context clearly matters, here, but isn't always dialectically-materially obvious. Because such violent, terrifying forms (and their demonic, vengeful appeals as such) are endlessly doubled, finding power and knowledge through unequal exchange/transformation occurs while responding to whatever strange appetites capital saddles us with; re: trauma attracts trauma, weird attracts weird; i.e., according to unequal socio-material conditions we weaponize during calculated risk against profit (as inherently unequal/rapacious, by design): reversing terror and counterterror by playing with rape among those who don't cramp our style (and to crowd out those who do)!

In the interim, we whores survive on the street as comparable to Hell foisted upon us, but paradoxically "Hell" also becomes something that we gain control over on and offstage. Doing so, as I shall expand upon deeper in "Forbidden Sight," constitutes a half-real act of revenge the state both cannot forgive but must, to some degree, allow then punish accordingly. Per capital, the state is incompatible with life; i.e., it rapes nature-as-monstrous-feminine, grappling with Medusa during mortal combat to simply move money through nature-as-alien: as their whore to endlessly make/summon, then rape, ahegao-style during graveyard sex with combative, passionate elements. "FINISH HER!"

(artist: Rita)

Except, the elite's mistreatment of nature is performed through workers; i.e., those who can alter said dogma away from state copaganda in service to workers and nature, onstage and off. Nature's revenge, then, must go beyond what the state regularly affords workers when antagonizing them (and nature) as monstrous-feminine on the Aegis; i.e., such whorish power fantasies should induce praxial shift in a sex-positive direction, not just scare and titillate cops enticed by feisty victims (and token servants playing dom); re: praxial inertia.

So while the usual traitors psychosexually provoke and police us through the ghost of the counterfeit, we workers reclaim whores-as-demonic during equally psychosexual playtime; i.e., to suit liberation as an ongoing battle, one fought over said ghost reversing the abjection process; re: hugging the alien, Medusa, through cryptonymy's usual veils, vanishing points and other Gothic devices/theories: playing with rape to expose those of modernity savaging us.

No one likes a hypocrite. Revenge is reclamation to revolt as such. Regaining some degree of control over our bodies and labor is to writhe in ecstasy on the Aegis, its dark mirror loaded with rebellious energies, counter information and weaponized psychosexual context; i.e., to reclaim and rehumanize through demonic language and rape play reversing abjection, humanizing the harvest to expose the state and state servants⁶⁵ as inhumane, incompatible with life and consent. That is our revenge against those who wrong us. They pimp us unironically in spaces and on surfaces framing sex workers (and all workers sexualized by the state; e.g., women's work) as virgin/whore; we play ironically there as well to spite them and carry a counter message along: "We're human despite what you say and how you treat us." To it, we'll recruit such whorish language to suit our needs (during ludo-Gothic BDSM, thus liminal expression). Tits out, tongue out, clam out! Whatever! Hit me with your best shot! For some, we're an oasis; for others, a mirage to prohibit the entitled thirsty their unearned "wataa" (that was a Twitter pun).

⁶⁵ Which includes tokenized monstrous-feminine refusing to be victims (re: Creed); i.e., by playing the victim as they triangulate against and attacking other victims, Omelas-style: token cops, white Indians, reactionary/moderate cops and vigilantes acting as pro-state monsters, class/culture/race traitors raping their comrades out of desperation and convenience. Betrayal is betrayal. However, the more privileged someone is, the more convenient their betrayals are; the more oppressed they are, the more desperate their betrayals become. Either can be exploited by the state, which relies on betrayal to survive.

(artist: favcxntt)

During our own calculated risk and potential bad decisions, we choose what barriers to raise, who to fool around (thus lower our defenses) with, to use condoms or not, and what lessons to pass along during informed, fairly negotiated labor exchanges; i.e., those happening under criminogenic conditions that we alter inside of. Education is always a game of chance, then, which calculated risk through ludo-Gothic BDSM aims to reduce systemic harm but encourage social-sexual activities conducive as such: demonic passion/possession, psychosexual rapture, and feelings of martyrdom suddenly given a voice when playing with rape in shadowy forms. Keeping with the cryptonymy process, rape remains ubiquitous and invisible in its energies; we make it darkness visible, demonically ostentatious!

Founded on generational trust, not harm, we do so to better raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class-cultural awareness through demons-as-whores. Power exchange negotiates and navigates old boundaries through what is given and taken, generally through roleplay as an educational device regarding unequal things: to break bad habits, then establish a new trend or guideline for sex-positive behaviors (and positive reinforcement). All the while, exchange remains unequal by nature of power as a demonic performance; i.e., one interfaced with by workers informed by unequal conditions, but who refuse to interfere with equal rights as they play. It's an interaction between autonomous beings, not an assembly of dead parts for one side to exclusively control, enjoy and abuse. "Terror is a weapon, a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it." As such, anyone can play with rape and shadows of rape, weaponizing its terrifying aesthetics in service to workers challenging state monopolies, thereby avenging nature-as-monstrous-feminine! Sex, then, is a demon's greatest weapon.

Keeping such forces in mind, I want to delve into our rape reprise; i.e., some general-if-germane ideas about prostitution, nature-as-whore and concomitant revenge/rape fantasies that will come up throughout the entire chapter/module!

For one, demons are not limited by form when playing with rape, and their playtime surrounding rape is equally tenebrous and broad; i.e., BDSM can exist in isolation from medieval rape and torture aesthetics (of power and death, sex and force, etc), but often marry to these through whores during ludo-Gothic BDSM: in ironic ways that subvert older Gothic conventions, bending and shapeshifting under sex work vis-à-vis current industry norms and activism. Whores certainly carry a signature "look" under capital, but one where function determines function in ways not entirely removed from form; i.e., as self-selected among pre-existing dolls:

(artist: Fugtrup)

Workers can influence this selection process to allow for greater freedom of expression; i.e., responding to conventions we bend as much as break while applying theory in demonically nebulous voices. Indeed, this module was inspired by the spirit of play in ways that are more fluid and carefree concerning rape in demonic forms; i.e., as something to normalize provided irony is present when camping canonical prescriptions thereof. The Gothic since inception has mobilized and played with the hauntological language of rape, death and war as useful to workers vs the state; i.e., through history as a living document we can change while buried alive, multiple dialectical-material forces being true (and false) at the same time. Power writes in blood and fiction speaking to ongoing atrocities/power abuse (which rape is). It also aggregates, affording double standards through DARVO and obscurantism for those who uphold the status quo (raping their wives and children, celebrated on a community level while indoctrinating both through force); we upend that paradigm, pivoting through the same aesthetics reclaimed during liminal expression for revolutionary (anarchistic, counterterrorist) purposes: on the same exploitative, Foucauldian (carceral, shadowy and potent) stages while avoiding the Omelas-style exceptions and dog-eat-dog concessions tokens strike with state brokers.

For our purposes, it means no SWERFs demonizing sex workers under Capitalist Realism (noir-style criminal-hauntology dialogs that treat sex workers like femme fatales, statistics and trash for middle-class women to look down on, pity and fear), nor sex workers playing the moderate-to-reactionary fash cop/token vigilante. Quite the opposite, even when the vice characters we play are flawed/damaged goods—the madwoman in the attic, the Medusa, the strung-out whore as criminal; e.g., through *Batman's*⁶⁶ greatest hits/pinup centerfolds—they should always speak cryptonymically to what we want to change that workers and nature might benefit.

In short, the state values structural instability married with demonic symbols to dogmatize workers, but which said workers can reclaim: of status to possess and wield, which knowledge and power are, and express operatically through the persuasive, vivid, and entertaining language of slumming and acquisition-through-conquest; i.e., criminality and warfare, but also rape; e.g., owners/earners, cops/victims, crime/punishment, reprobation/rehabilitation, recidivism/reward, might-makes-right, blackmail, gentrification and decay, hush money and other such carrot-and-stick menticial dogma per unaddressed criminogenic conditions personified. Whores—and by extension, nature—are classically military targets felt and seen at home among civilians (re: Amazonomachia and military urbanism). As societal collapse nears thanks to capital's boom and bust, fear of the colonized afar

⁶⁶ A series known for celebrating gilded-age gentry and police, anti-Semitic banker vaudeville, street justice, and old-world master/apprentice distributions of power and wealth, while simultaneously demonizing criminals and romancing mental illness, drug wars/substance abuse, double-crosses, backroom deals, assassins and banditti, Freudian complexes, and objectified women (the house cat* being a sex symbol and underworld guardian) to preserve the status quo.

(artist: Artgerm)

*From Volume Zero: "the cat as a sex symbol is regarded as 'small,' its killing implements either removed (the claws) or vestigial through the softening of features that communicate symbiotically with human masters" (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map"). Catwoman is smaller than Batman—a "stray" in fetish gear for him to "tame," but always smaller than him, tied to lunacy (the catwoman of the moon). She's a kinkster strict dominatrix and cat burglar put in her place by Gotham's billionaire golden boy moonlighting as a bat (the white Indian).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

takes on a domestic mood, one concerned with guilty pleasure, avenging gargoyles and foreign plots threatening shadowy revenge (often mil spec, below)!

(artist: Chloe in Pink)

As usual, then—and keeping with my demon symposium's aforementioned limitations (an emphasis on demonic holism versus close-reads⁶⁷)—I want to play with rape and presume a degree of fluency from my readers looking in on my fifth book. The order of things matters less than how you can assemble and play with them (and their modular elements) yourselves; i.e., how the world presents them to you, and how you use the ideas here to make demonic expression sex-positive in your own work and agreements: recursively combining things I can only elude to here when talking about sex and force through a holistic pedagogy of the oppressed (whose poetic forms and labor value are virtually endless); e.g., kung fu movies, BDSM, rock 'n roll, monsters, porn, art, and whatever else goes into the witch cauldron per arbitration's invigilation.

From the Four Gs (our biggest theories) to the Basics of oppositional synthesis (anger/gossip, monsters, and camp), expertise matters far less than function, concerning demons and liminal (oft-pornographic) expression; i.e., a second-nature synthesizing of these devices through an embodiment of competency about them regardless of state approval. "There are no experts" insofar as vertical authority is something to abolish; i.e., per the fluency and practice of sex-positive demons vs sex-coercive ones during liminal expression, worker unity mattering far more than singular authority. How you combine them is entirely up to you—from whatever positions of scarcity and privilege, theory and practice, format and linguo-material register. If you chose, you could marry Edward Said's postcolonialism to a '90s RTS videogame and Andrew Blake's arthouse porn tendencies (re: Velvet Blue's "The Helmut Newton of Porn," 2008). Provided it pulls a baddie and gives them a voice (their revenge), that's all that really matters!

Speaking from experience, this is how I did it and how I was taught; i.e., my grandmother worked at an asylum for mentally ill children, but Mom came from the street—was bred on Tolkien, Said, Edna St. Vincent Millay and many others giving her a glimpse of different worlds. She's streetwise and loyal, but educated and urbane—having survived things I can only imagine to give me a better life: to break the cycle by redistributing power in demonic forms of revenge. Glimpsing such worlds through Gothic, its mode is yours to retailor as you see fit. A buffer and a mirror to show and conceal, try to find the courage to invent your own bad, silly-to-serious echoes on its darkened Aegis—to snatch victory sarcastically from the jaws of defeat not as a brand or a pose, but a way of life from cradle to grave: power as something to perform and imagine away from harm towards healing! We "better the instruction" ("If you wrong us, shall we not revenge?") through kindness showcasing rape; i.e., as a friendly ghost of itself speaking to its evil police twin without harming anyone: exquisite "torture" making the elite pearl clutch (afraid to lose what they stole) and encouraging that labor rise up to reclaim and recultivate for ourselves. That's the whore's paradox, and simply how humans communicate, whores or not (though capital pimps all workers to some degree)!

⁶⁷ If you want those, go and read the Undead Module, which is full of close-read essays that merge into demonic expression (vis-à-vis our modular thesis argument). There are plenty in the other volumes/sub-volumes, as well—with Volume One in particular designed to hand-hold through simplified theory.

(artist: Chloe in Pink)

Furthermore, regardless of combination, stratagem and form—from demon to ninja, unicorn, and whore—the state will try and monopolize any and all inventions in service to profit and the elite. Inside the state of exception (treating demons like zombies and other undead, as well as witches and other beings "of nature" having demonic/undead qualities), sex workers exchange power and knowledge about sex and force, the latter emblematic of power and knowledge: as things to canonize and police, thus cannibalize. The whore's endless reversal of abjection, as such, helps expand society's cultural understanding of rape in imaginary language. This includes its campy prevention while capital works against us; i.e., in bastardized, pro-state forms.

Fractally recursive, us versus them subdivides into cops, knights, and champions, etc—all canonically upheld with LARPer-grade costumes, a decaying language of medievalized rebellion, and the color-coded dungeons' half-reality (on and offstage) whose power fantasies (of death, captivity and rape) we reclaim through doubled poetic abstraction. Our Venus mimicry happens during ludo-Gothic BDSM—by camping canon as demons do; i.e., through murky and potent existence (our bodies and their labor aggregate becoming things to play with for iconoclastic purposes), but also by trading in forbidden, shadowy things (sex and force, power and knowledge as verboden) that translate, thus transform hyperobject structures responsible for our rape: vis-à-vis generational trauma hyphenating this with that (dogma disguised as fatal nostalgia and military-optimist "child's play"). Subverting said trauma occurs during intersectional exchange as playing with power (and all its synonyms) to have our whorish revenge: making the imaginary past, the Wisdom of the Ancients, wiser towards liberation among the shadows.

Through poetic exposure as such, sex marries force to monsters (and to monstrous activities, locations, fetishes and clichés) through psychosexual theatre. For the doll-like sex object, to have revenge there is to regain control from state forces pimping us out as sex demons to begin with; i.e., through reactionary police violence and segregation aggravating local populations to push back against with reactive abuse—in effect occurring through what they normally agitate and imprison, then sell in commodified forms.

They do so back towards pacified consumers, the latter helping harvest nature through scarcity arguments: the monomythic reward, the maiden promoting doubly as whore after Medusa is "dead" and nature-as-dungeon converts territorially into nuclear households; i.e., with alien red light districts just a jump, hop and skip away! Like food, sex is cheap insofar as it equates to the labor of paupers/property cordoned off and made expensive through adult entertainment (sold for "mom and dad" inside/outside nuclear families): state variants of Faustian, Faustian, sodomy-grade, primal breeder wish-granting and exploitative price-paying versus the paradoxical clarity of proletarian nightmares!

(artist: Nikki Delano⁶⁸)

Keeping with doubles and double standards, nature is a whore, a call, cam or e-girl to abject and police because that's where power is found; it's how it defines within the current order's demonic illusions—the state's false love and artificial wilderness, its bread-and-circus: "The masses have never thirsted after truth. They turn aside from evidence that is not to their taste, preferring to deify error... Whoever can supply them with illusions is easily their master; whoever attempts to destroy their illusions is always their victim" (source: Gustave Le Bon's The Opinions and Beliefs of Crowds, 1985). It's something to canonically plunge into, then refuse to pull out.

⁶⁸ Pornstars are often quite educated. According to Nikki's IMDb profile:

She's of mixed Italian, Colombian and Puerto Rican descent. The eldest of eight children, she was raised in a strict Catholic family and attended Catholic school, where she was an honor roll student and participated in gymnastics. Nikki graduated from the John Jay College of Criminal Justice with a bachelor's degree in forensic psychology and a double minor in addiction studies and criminology. Delano worked as an office manager for a non-profit organization and was a mainstream model for over a year prior to being contacted by a talent scout for the adult website Brazzers on her ModelMayhem page (source).

In the above video, for example, Nikki riffs on her Catholic upbringing. Leaning into the naughty schoolgirl trope, she reverses roles, camping the canonical, demonic aspects to her own past: as "mommy" telling the naughty "schoolboy" how to fuck her—harder! Framed in Spanish (thus, to some degree, exotic), these echoes of incest are endemic not just to porn, but Neo-Gothic fakeries displaced onto imaginary countries "beyond" Britain (empire haunted by its own fabrications, their half-real "medieval" looming over seemingly modern procedures).

In that spirit of things, Nikki regains a modicum of control over money and sex; i.e., over things for which the state normally denies control of in service to profit, thus wage and labor theft. The better she acts, the more she carves out a name for herself, thus a place in the world: to make it more sex-positive through a normally harmful practice like the porn industry!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

They say revenge a dish best served cold, but keeping with Gothic paradox and oxymoron, revenge is often quite hot; re, Queen Jadis' dominion over the titular magician:

"Do not dream of treachery. My eyes can see through walls and into the minds of men. They will be on you wherever you go. At the first sign of disobedience I will lay such spells on you that anything you sit down on will feel like red hot iron and whenever you lie in a bed there will be invisible blocks of ice at your feet" (source: The Magician's Nephew, 1955).

To liberate is to decriminalize, which won't happen without a fight. In the eyes of the state, sex work (and by extension all work under capital's monopolies, trifectas and qualities) is criminal as to exploit it in Gothic (demonic) forms: slices of the pie to buy cheap loyalty with. As such, the state always defaults to automatic blunt force, but all's fair in love and class, culture and race war! Ironic forms are key to systemic catharsis, winning worker hearts and minds by reclaiming monster language especially when the state rewards classical misuse of such things; i.e., God is always watching and lets certain things slide.

Of course the system looks after its own; the point is to fight back—to resist state forces by using demonic language for our sake and those less fortunate by dancing with the ghost of the counterfeit! To it, Medusa's still around and fixin' to scrap with her giant assets, her gangster's hysterical honeypot, her wandering womb's vain and formidable Aegis. Closed-off from state forces that treat us as alien whore wedding cake, let's show 'em who's boss—that we'll fight for our right not to be demonized by state forces, but demonize instead for ourselves. Show 'em that we're more than a thing to play with, blame, dominate or accuse—more than a dark peach to carve up like fruit (re: Volume One)! Whores are spies, secret/double agents collaborating for good reason: we've been burned before, but have targets on our backs and don't have the luxury of state protection. Restraint is a weapon to us, as is sex—our poker face and billboard, alike: disguise and foil to state marquee (of melons⁶⁹ to harvest)! Just as often, so is a lack of restraint. It merely depends what the situation (thus our revenge) calls for!

(artist: Slimthickn)

⁶⁹ The pro-worker weaponizing of sex, but also slave foods/pauper dishes and work to speak out against settler colonialism and Pax Americana while taking these things back.

Intratextual messages speak to extratextual solutions; a house of cards is a place to hide, wait, and bide one's time while seemingly stripped bare, the visuals seeming to support a narrative of peril, but also feel and play out of joint with its instructions inside a safe space's revolutionary cryptonymy. Whore and rape go hand-in-hand, then, but lend the verb quotes easily enough. There, we whores relieve stress for other workers and ourselves, playing out our own deaths and rapes per all the usual sexist, or otherwise storied, bigoted fetishes and clichés on and offstage: little deaths, but also just deaths, period; re (from the Poetry Module):

My own quest for a Numinous Commie Mommy isn't so odd; capital makes us feel tired relative to the self-as-alien, both incumbent on the very things they rape to nurture them (re: Irigaray's creation of sexual difference). I'm hardly the first person to notice this:

As Edward Said astutely notes in Culture and Imperialism, most societies project their fears on the unknown or the exotic other. This barren land, where the viewers are kept disorientated, is threatening. It is a place between the familiar and the foreign, like part of a dream or vision that one cannot remember clearly. There is always a sense of a lurking danger from which the viewers need protection. Nikita provides that sense of protection (source: Laura Ng's "'The Most Powerful Weapon You Have': Warriors and Gender in La Femme Nikita," 2003).

I am, however, a trans woman who has gone above and beyond women like Barbara Creed, Angela Carter, Luce Irigaray and Laura Ng, etc, in my pioneering of ludo-Gothic BDSM: as a holistic, "Commy-Mommy" means of synthesizing proletarian praxis inside the operatic danger disco(-in-disguise), the "rape" castle riffing on Walpole, Lewis, Radcliffe, Konami, Nintendo, and so many others. I sign myself as such for a reason—not to be an edgy slut (though I am a slut who walks the edge). Rather, my pedagogic aim is to consider the monstrous-feminine not simply as a female monster avoiding revenge through violence, but a sex-positive force that doesn't reduce to white women policing the same-old ghost of the counterfeit: to reverse what TERFs (and other sell-outs) further as normally being the process of abjection, vis-à-vis Cartesian thought tokenizing marginalized groups to harvest nature-as-usual during the dialectic of the alien (source: "In Search of the Secret Spell," 2024).

It's a bit ghoulish and Numinous, demons generally oscillating between such earthly-to-divine qualities inside a given shadow zone/danger disco (commonly a white woman's idea of castle or ballroom; i.e., authored for those fearful of the nuclear model's sexual marketplace, reifying and playing with the Gothic's operatic rape castle doubling domestic abuse and, by extension, colonial abuse).

All in all, fear spaces (and bodies) are informed by pre-existing biases, phobias and stigmas, which means they exist as much to announce/expose a given comorbidity as to relieve stress resulting from it. If we summon these spaces and their fears ourselves (often concerning our bodies), we can learn of repressed feelings attached to their likenesses and begin to counteract them through our own constructions. Rebellion happens in defiance of oppression/relegation; Amazons and other demonic whores are instruments of oppression shared by colonizer and liberator alike. Activism, reconnaissance and charity occupy the same poetic devices, including their bare surfaces!

(artist: Maple Misty)

As such, we're not totally fleeced on the Aegis. Yes, the Gothic is sex, drugs and rock 'n roll told in duality and made from garbage according to a middle-class fear-fascination with closed-off things. But behind every patriarchal wet dream/shadow of Pygmalion's gritty opera duel or kaiju fight (e.g., the Godzilla spoof from Crank 2, 2009) is a Galatea-sized elephant in the room; behind ever caricature of city life (e.g., Pablo Francisco's "Little Tortilla Boy"⁷⁰ 2010) is the ghost of a raped woman, devastated slave, closeted fag and/or abandoned child conflated with her abuser⁷¹. We are none of those things and all of ⁷⁰ "In the city... you must fight to survive! He sold tortillas on the street corner!"

⁷¹ The Gothic violates boundaries to speak to the indiscretion of nightmares; i.e., that follow us into the waking world, where tokenized agents seek to retire and send them back to Hell. In part, they're like the Victorian chagrin of sleep arousal, a slut to shame; i.e., the control of human biology and desire by the state personifying as the succubus or incubus abjected into fearsome banditti-style rapists: the knife-dick/dickhead totem, the lady in black, etc. It's as much to police these gargoyles as it is about the Freudian dogma attached to them; i.e., the demonizing of regular sex responses to dogmatize/mystify biology and canonize the nuclear home as "under siege" by whores—by nature as "seeking revenge" and needing to be quelled by state doubles playing the cop, pimp, and assassin behind various disguises/false premises.

As capital decays, panic sets in. First, the grim harvest cannibalizes workers, leading to witch hunts punching down against nature: blame the victim by attacking the whore to tokenize and/or subjugate her! Then, doubles emerge within the same aesthetic—mere honorifics designating police violence to give and receive further abuse. And while the state of exception commonly affords an

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

undead flavor to traitors (and their victims) marke(te)d as such, a demonic one proves reliable—invaders from "Hell" made of clay threatening the "end times" under Capitalist Realism: a dark world where whores may walk free, unencumbered by state forces "protecting" workers from sex workers and sex workers from themselves!

The worst liars are the owner class and their traitors among us, those who accuse others of terrorism, murder and rape. As such, capital is bipartisan, funding multiple sides to the same team. Souless and cloned, this happens to make the bourgeoisie appear seemingly at odds, versus in cahoots (re: Parenti): create false "enemies" among themselves, but actual enemies among workers that both can police inside territory and hierarchy alike. There must always be gods and masters ruling over nature-as-alien; i.e., whores to punch, police, and divide, conquer and rape. To uncape Medusa is simply foreplay that teases her endless recapture. Not unlike Schrödinger's cat, she oscillates under state dominion as a kept pet, military target, and space alien foreigner to trot out on home soil (the Imperial Core) dressed up as Elsewhere; re: "Hell is a place that always appears on Earth," the harvest in small as a territory for fresh conquest.

(artist: Baby Lee)

Fortunately empire has a time limit, one the state will blame its usual victims for "causing." This extends to overall state harm; i.e., as colonies decay/threaten mutually-assured destruction, making Realism fade and Imperialism sail home. So does Gothic claptrap mirror state dogma and owner abuse seen and felt upon the Aegis; i.e., power in sex-as-alien as much speaking to genuine fear as adoration. As usual, then, nature becomes alien, something to fear and interrogate per the usual black/white binaries; i.e., treating her "non-white" rump as something to seek out, carve up and "tame," thus possess in DARVO arguments: a hellish queen to rape and blame for said rape during virgin/whore syndrome ("she gave me a boner!"). Chasity and ignorance become virtues to defend through force against imminent invasion: "Brave talk for a mortal boy who's world is about to end!"

However extravagant or invented, then, such arrangements canonically uphold the status quo/current order as supreme over nature. And while proletarian guerillas can weaponize such cryptonymies to anisotropically fight back and reclaim their humanitarian value, complicit counterparts divide the world for conquering anew by state monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital; i.e., by growing alienated from all things the state fetishizes, the entire arrangement invading every aspect of daily life on and offstage, at home and abroad, asleep and awake. Us-versus-them double standards extend cryptomimetically to maidens and whores, but also good doctors and quacks policing women (and those treated like women), the latter suddenly affording explanations for the appearance of monstrous-feminine sex demons: sluts without a pimp, walking out in the open (the state allows exceptions up to a point, but always under incredibly broad, vaguely written rules that can be randomly and selectively enforced to serve profit; i.e., manufactured conflict, scarcity and competition occurring over whores by state enforcers pimping them)!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

them, are not defined by the past as something to trap us with but haunted by it all the same. Through its powerful poetics' forbidden fight, we see right through them and their fairytale illusions; we have our revenge by purposefully toying with canonical, thus forbidden things, their darkness visible granting us fresh demonic sight through our fairytales, our Gothic inversions (upside-down, inside-out).

And so we camp canon, hugging Medusa in search of recourse, survival, and resurrection counteracting shame, self-hatred, and tokenization! Yet, whores—like power and knowledge—take many shapes, some of them quite old. Animals are the oldest, but demons are a close second; i.e., speaking through whores as the world's oldest profession, their modules and intersections poetically articulating how workers "of nature," past, present and future, are demonized and chattelized under capital (thus desire revenge).

Per virgin/whore, the Gothic hyphenates inside/outside, doing so to play out the usual dialectic of the alien vis-à-vis some variation of home/hunting grounds: cage, kitchen, bedroom or castle, versus cavern, dungeon, river or forest. As such, the state rapes nature as maiden and whore, claiming her for itself and closeting her abuse while humiliating and mutilating her at every turn (marking her as theirs, often with cum, but also brands of different chattelizing kinds); the whore, in response, becomes the worker's guerrilla instrument of revenge, expressed during rape play to bring such abuses out once more—the castle rape played out inside

Paying rent, whores sit in limbo during liminal expression; i.e., while the state sexes up its banality of evil (desk murder) by proxy—using whores as punching bags/quick relief during state operations (ostensibly divorced from marriage yet punished for said divorce to uphold nuclear models)! Bourgeois pimps pimp like all the rest, then. Scare people; make them spend money on things they can abject for the state. The state gives an inch but takes a mile; it lies, cheats and steals, acting noble and good through endless Sales of Indulgence furthering the abjection process under neoliberal Capitalism.

(artist: Nikki Delano)

In turn, the colonization of the imperial home starts with erections and vaginal lubrication becoming ill omens; i.e., beckoning middle-class homeowners towards extramarital affairs, but also abuses committed by them and theirs towards vulnerable parties. It's a medieval regression, capital decaying nostalgically into older hauntological versions of itself: a time that never quite was, but whose legendary violence, terror and police are quite real. America is a place that arms its citizens to their teeth; i.e., is populated by moderates/fascists playing white Indian, rebel, savior as undercover cop. Good cop, bad—pimps of nature, one and all!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

itself as rape castle, but also brought out-of-doors, or conversely the outdoors atrocity brought inside to make home feel invaded by her angry spirit, postmortem. Instead of merely burying these bones, revenge offers the raped their chance to be heard; i.e., by living with the reality of monstrous-feminine existence, becoming at home with abuse relayed as "past" to prevent it in the future; re: we were/will be human again.

In turn, our "discomfort" comforts us and makes our abusers uncomfortable in ways we can read (to recognize and redistribute), thus mark through the cryptonymy process. We publicize what they privatize, airing our dirty panties in public; i.e., scandalous nets letting little get past (re: selective absorption), reminding them that—while everything has a price and whores are often forced into slums, subsisting on garbage—there's no price we'll pay the state can put on our basic human rights (and those of animals or the environment)! Faced with abjection's reversal, the state has little it can do but try to censor and scatter us underground, lest our humanizing of the harvest on the Aegis expose them as inhumane. Yet, doing so has precisely that effect! Such is how Medusa wages war!

As rape generally goes, merely showing resistance to one's oppressor is unforgivable, but fighting back is the point (and converting others to our cause, one boner at a time). Rome wasn't burned in a day; it was forced to transform over centuries of internal corruption and asymmetrical warfare.

(artist: Lady V)

Whether summoned or made, whoring is how demons commonly articulate, thus communicate the rape of nature while playing with it in safe forms; i.e., doing so through sex symbols that cryptonymically denote violence: rape fantasies that speak to state abuse of sex and force, often by playing dead or dumb. In turn, either poetic variable expresses as pleasurable, non-harmful pain and erogenous, psychosexual responses haunted by harmful demon-BDSM variants (the ghost of rape, the Shadow of Pygmalion) while camping canonical norms; e.g., the vaso vagal response, frisson, and fight, flight, fawn, freeze or flop. Worker revenge requires using these in ways that shift history in new, less rapacious directions. Lived realities sit alongside imaginary forms mirroring them, and liberation and exploitation—playful "surrender" and unironic subjugation—likewise sit side-by-side, jousting inside the same shadow zone's half-real spheres; e.g., "Hands in the air!" (above) being a cops-and-robbers refrain that has plenty of room for ironic roleplay in and out of bed, thus revolutionary potential.

Negotiating power, then, is to exchange it in common, seemingly tired forms—including the kinds of everyday pornographic and unequal, dehumanizing tropes/trades the state enforces between one party (often women) routinely and systemically disadvantaged by another's privilege and under their "protection" (men, or traitors acting like men, thus pimps); i.e., through bad theatre, hellish body language and wacky puns, the data acting out a clay-like mixture of pleasure and pain as much synonymous as separate. In turn, demons are ancient monsters that speak to prostitution as the world's oldest profession, including its equally old abuses (re: vae victis); monstrous-feminine fury speaks to patriarchal misuse of female (and later non-Christian, non-white and queer) labor "of nature" under state watch. Such ghosts of rape are angry for good reason, these transgressive fantasies resulting from steady criminogenic conditions built up over time; i.e., that yield the usual abuses that compel catharsis, the latter acted out paradoxically during calculated risk: a situation to make or otherwise summon that which speaks to repressed trauma during the rememory process. Escape happens mid-imprisonment and under dress; e.g., threat of impalement or homeless destitution should one refuse:

(artist: Olsen)

e.g., "Stuff my taco!" equaling the mirroring of a fawning mechanism that speaks to rape turned, suitably enough, into a release word and reward for good boys that follow instructions; re: "hurt, not harm." Furthermore, there's the paradox of asking for commands from someone; e.g., "Tell me to fuck your pussy"; i.e., the sub seeming to have the most power in realms of mutual consent, but really it being an exchange between unequal distributions thereof.

In turn, most fantasies stay fantasies and don't actually manifest even through play. They're simply fun to think about during games—to fantasize and take whatever shapes we demonize ourselves as. Anything becomes possible, not just what the elite want using the same ancient, animal-theatre language; re (from Volume Zero):

As a kind of deathly theatre mask, something else that's equally important to consider about demons [...] is that animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms; i.e., stigma animals relayed through demonic BDSM and rituals of power expression and exchange that embody hunters and hunted, predators and prey that play out through the ongoing battles and wars of culture, of the mind, of sexuality and praxis as traumatized (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

Our Gothic takes something old and makes it "old" again to transform the present, thus capital, to have our whore's revenge.

(source tweet, Soli: October 8th, 2024: "Japanese poster for Bram Stoker's Dracula")

That's what ludo-Gothic BDSM does, you see; it familiarizes actors to the exchange of power as something to isolate, then articulate as a performance of many different popular (and ancient) kinds—our Gothic-Communist bread and butter whisper-screaming sex, drugs, and rock 'n roll being as old as demons and prostitution, but also the shadow plays evoking them during informed consent/calculated risk!

For us whores, shadow theatre hovers over the half-real hauntings of trauma denoting widespread harm under Capitalist Realism and its equally grim illusions! We whores have become fluent not just in rape, then, but monster rape as something to camp, thus reclaim our basic human rights from prescriptive inhumane forms, post-inheritance; i.e., to achieve catharsis conducive to Gothic-Communist development—meaning on a societal level, changing a cultural understanding of the imaginary past (the Wisdom of the Ancients) insofar as power is understood and expressed in Gothic language. We regain control in all the ways that control can be regained—doing so in the shadow of rape to camp "rape" by putting it in quotes using highly inventive-yet recycled⁷² forms; i.e., power cannot

⁷² Not only is this not new at all, but it's something I've written about before; re (from Volume Zero):

In all the universe, in all the gin joints in all the world, Persephone walked into mine and made me her avatar. "All deities reside within the human breast," wrote Blake; yet, I think of the "Jewish revenge" of my marriage of Heaven and Hell as Canon's tyrannical plea, re-camped by me and billions of other workers actively and/or passively yearning for freedom. Its sui generis format is both "Workers of the world, unite! You have only to lose your chains!" married to "Grant me revenge! And if you do not listen, then to hell with you!" (this second sentiment goes for anyone who taught me or otherwise contributed towards that dark beautiful thing that became what I am today). For Communists wronged by the state, we monsters and what we make are human as Shylock was:

Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions; fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? If you poison us do we not die? And if you wrong us shall we not revenge? If

be created or destroyed, only transferred and reconfigured. We do so to challenge state forms, doubling and subverting them. Taboo things—seemingly hard to discuss, thus exchange in rebellious forms not beholden to profit sublimating them—suddenly become as easy to illustrate as casting a shadow on a wall; i.e., such cryptonymy showing and concealing in equal measure: reflecting something as a shadow of itself sent back towards state abjectors. Subversion suitably operates both on the shadow of a doubt and the ominous confirmation of things haunted the state's proposed luminaries wreathed in darkness.

we are like you in the rest, we will resemble you in that. If a Jew wrong a Christian, what is his humility? Revenge. If a Christian wrong a Jew, what should his sufferance be by Christian example? Why, revenge. The villainy you teach me I will execute, and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction (source).

Our revenge, as a simulacrum, only resembles that of those who wrong us and counterfeit our campy legends for their canonical gain (Tolkien's refrain); our aesthetic is shared but our function is altogether different: class consciousness as uncontrollable opposition relayed in terrifying medieval language that is thoroughly more wise through hindsight; i.e., not just according to Robert Asprey's paradox of terror (which we'll consider in relation to state forces decrying labor as terrorists) but the hauntological paradox of "the Wisdom of the Ancients," whereupon old forms of monstrous expression have been updated for the modern world and its challenges to accommodate our needs as workers being exploited by Capitalism and its propaganda. That is our revenge—slowly camping the canon, thus the Superstructure, and reclaiming the Base through our monstrous, ghostly theatre as something that once turned on, can never be shut down or destroyed; it can only be repressed in forms that always come back because the elite cannot kill all its workers (not on purpose, anyways).

Shadow theatre and its mythic structure are nothing new. It dates back to Plato's infamous allegory of the cave and its mimesis as paradoxically haunted by the shadows of class struggle (the spectres of Marx, which in theory did not technically exist when Plato was alive, and yet whose struggles for emancipation include these older slaves that Marx alluded to in "The Eighteenth Brumaire").

Camus may have noted in The Myth of Sisyphus that canonical shadow theatre repeats to an absurd degree; i.e., Sisyphus pushing the rock up the hill as punishment by the gods. To escape it, we can't just smile at the gods like he proposed, but steal "their" fire on our own Promethean Quest! This means camping the canon, which requires repeated forays into Hell and putting the wrong things right at the source: our "darkness visible" and gods as stolen out from inside our breasts and put on the cave wall of Plato's cave [...]: oppositional praxis as playing on in shadowy forms dancing on the same cave wall, our darkness deliberate fencing back and forth with the state's blind canonical doubles like Errol Flynn's Robin Hood dueling Basil Rathbone's Guy of Gisbourne [source: "Doubles, Dark Forces, and Paradox"]:

We'll still doing so thousands of years after Plato, using shadows to camp, thus counteract state forms.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

That is our revenge. Power is knowledge about something as demonic in order to play with it during safe-yet-evocative fantasies to have this revenge, the latter which sit adjacent to actual forms of death, rape and torture that help us regain control during performance and play camping the canon; i.e., over our feelings/desires of revenge by those peoples and systems who have not just wronged us, but constitute a world we want to change through demonic theatre: to break Capitalist Realism.

Again, demons are whores. Made to witness and be witnessed per forbidden sight as much a fruit to consume, doing so happens unto Promethean outcomes and Faustian bargains railing against state doubles; i.e., under Western dominion, pain and torture mingle with sex and comedy being how they communicate to camp canonical norms through a shared imaginary's neo-medieval past; re: through bad theatre and puns, the data a clay-like, Gothically ludological mixture of pleasure and pain as much synonymous as separate; re: war/alarm, shelter, food and sex, but put on blast. "Stuff my taco!" becomes TACO STUFFED during ludo-Gothic BDSM:

(artists: Cuvu and Persephone van der Waard; font generated by Rezuaq's "FromSoftware Image Macro Creator," 2022)

Such plundering is campy and fun, but like any opera haunted by actual rape, our resident fat-lady whose avenges past abuse through clay-like doubles: desire and revenge, putting "rape" in quotes. That's the whore's paradox—our spectres of Marx to reclaim and remind people we are whores; i.e., as a source of pride under persecution. Again, context matters, the demonized choosing who calls them "whore" (and who doesn't), to allow whatever into ourselves (or not).

For our liberation, prostitute becomes something to advertise to spite its corpse-like stigmas and taboos; e.g., a whore is synonymous with a corpse, death—with an orgasm that, like the convulsionnaires, has a martyred, rapturous, even vengeful quality to it (the eyes rolling back into the skull, dying the little death but Numinously evoking the Big One). Like a demon, it becomes its own thing: a "sacrificial" fetish of statuesque, monstrous-feminine power coupling this with that to exchange this with that—to say to our enemies, "That's what you don't get!" To rub their faces in what we whores trade in all the time, upending our pimps! Sex workers trade not just in money but trust as something to convey in ironic for(u)ms.

Ludo-Gothic BDSM is typically silly-serious, in this respect—putting "rape" in quotes through playful, thus goofy and regressive psychosexual theatre that, often enough, can get hella rough (remember your aftercare, babes).

Catharsis is anything but simple, then, social-psychosexual improv running along well-used tracks, and behind the usual aliases and Aegises, but also combined linguo-material codas/codes suggested above: "Help, I'm a damsel in distress! Psych! I'm a whore! Joke's on you!" But we take this far further than the morality plays of old; from freak to freak, it becomes a demonic, at times enigmatic mode of existence. Doubling as good praxis, our aforementioned whore's revenge becomes the reclamation of such things; i.e., under isolated duress and through socio-political adversity from pro-state agents, looking to fang and defang us during controlled opposition (re, Eco: "the enemy is both weak and strong")!

All the while, liminal expression affords the potential for good faith and bad, thus BDSM, play and acting as equally dualistic and oppositional during canon vs iconoclasm. The sex-positive idea is to enforce our rights by subverting the state and its own sex-coercive police mechanisms; i.e., using the same shared aesthetic and basic rules of exchange, thus play to synthesize catharsis! Nature is a hysterical whore the state rapes, the raped then seeking revenge in ways the rapist will always try to control: how people talk, monopolizing the language of the whore to subdue her for profit.

(artist: Valentina)

As such, our own bargains and quests for power mustn't decay/tokenize and dutifully "put out" for our captors stranding us, nor punch down against other oppressed peoples; as whores, we must intersectionally solidarize and push towards universal liberation beyond state forms. The state is straight, is a pimp of nature that canonically enforces its own status quo; i.e., through power and knowledge exchange that harm nature for profit: money for chattelized, thus policed sex, reaping nature-as-monstrous-feminine to alienate, fetishize and ultimately infantilize, pimp, and rape as such. In short, the state manipulates nature to uphold its own unequal power over nature, doing so in service to profit as something to police; its manipulation of nature and workers, per the usual monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital, then, is sex-coercive towards those ends, ad infinitum.

Our goal is to critique systems more than individuals, but include individuals under such umbrellas; i.e., viewed through the critical lens that demons constitute. Capital, like all systems under it, exists to protect powerful men (and those tokenizing to act like men) while impugning their demonized victims: to receive patriarchal, thus lawful, goodly force under the shadow of the badge, might making right under centrist stories meant to manufacture and prolong conflict with heteronormative, settler-colonial, Cartesian impunity ("boundaries for me, not for thee"). As such, the state forces women to mother their own killers, dying ignominiously by the hands of entitled, de facto sons (re: Irigaray's creation of sexual difference), such persons "looking for mother" as a whore to unironically rape, thus revive and reinforce state arrangements. It's sadly the only way these killer man babies (or those acting like men, inside the Man Box) can get it up, which we want to circumvent; i.e., by coding society-wide psychosexual responses conducive to non-harmful, social-sexual relationships: our own darkness visible, expressed and embodied during our day-to-day lives; e.g., my husband, Bay Ryan!

(artist: Bay)

Per the whore's paradox, revenge is reclamation to revolt against canonical embargos and their harmful monopolies' pacifying copycats. This is quite paradoxical on its face, but no less affective for it. While there's nothing pejoratively "savage" about bare bodies or Gothic aesthetics used in demonic ways (with Bay both Scottish and Māori, my postcolonial goth slut), there's everything the matter with those who enforce such abject, ghost-of-the-counterfeit binarization to uphold the status quo/Capitalist Realism; re: "Who's the savage? Modern man!" Sex is money and "money is the medium through which capitalism operates," writes Patel and Moore in A History of the World in Seven Cheap Things, "a source of power for those able to control it. That control isn't about people and wealth. It's about how such control entwines with nature," (source). They extend this to nature as something that must be dominated through particular canonical expressions; i.e., that only allow others to destroy them pursuant to profit during the abjection process:

It only took a day from her crime to her execution. Yet court documents don't even record her name. She lived in Tlaxcala, New Spain, and on Sunday, July 18, 1599, she smashed crosses in a church, incited Chichimec Indians to rebel against the Spanish, and killed a Tarascan Indian using sorcery. The next day she was arrested. Six witnesses testified against her. As the sun set, she was permitted to speak in her defense. She recounted her deeds and then—according to the court record—recounted a dream:

Of deer and they said to her not to turn away and that they were looking for her and that they did not want to appear to anyone else but her, because she was ill and they wanted to see her, and she said that she was very old at the time she saw the figures and she is young and healthy and they have taken away some cataracts that she had, and then these two figures went into a cave with her and they gave her a horse, which she has in said pueblo of Tlaxcala, and that one of the two figures was a deer that rode atop of a horse and the other deer had the horse bridled, and on that occasion she was crippled and after seeing the two figures she is well.

Of the crimes she committed, her dream was the worst. She might have fueled insurrection, desecrated a church, and interfered with the flow of silver from Chichimec land, but most dangerous, she offered a vision of order and nature contrary to the colonizers'. The horse ridden not by Spanish men but by a deer—the symbol of the Chichimec; not white men astride nature, but local life upon the colonizers' life. The dreamer of this dream was guilty of calling not just for a political insurrection but for a cosmic one. She dreamed the order of the world seditiously. She was hanged as a witch later that afternoon.

It's hard to speak of this woman without knowing her name. Her killers called her a witch. This is a name she may have used for herself, albeit without its colonial venom. Even though her name was set at so little that it didn't merit an entry in the conquistador's paperwork, it is an act of memory against forgetting [rememory] that her story is told. The dreamer of this radically different ecology had to be killed, swiftly. To allow her to live would sanction an alternative to capitalism's world-ecology (ibid.).

Such bleak realities are something we whores push back onto capital; i.e., the latter describing us per a catastrophic Realism fearful of our revenge, and scapegoating us for its abuse: our freedom is the end of the world. It is the elite's greatest gaslight, their supreme weapon to demonize sex in service to its pimping of nature until the end of time—from continent to ocean, land and sky as theirs and theirs alone. But when the seas boil and "the moon becomes as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth," that Judgement Day is our fault. It's DARVO on a colossal scale.

Under capital, then, all AFAB are women and all women are chattel whores without irony (a condition that extends idiosyncratically to anything "of nature," thus monstrous-feminine in the eyes of the state; re: Bay canonically demonized for the same qualities listed earlier). The usual dualities and inversions apply when camping canon, making nature—already alien—hostile to state operations. Such monarchs of nature look pointedly for someone to "rape" them; i.e., by means of play that vary between gentle and strict forms (thus BDSM, fetishes and kink). We play with fire because the gods of capital have stolen it from us; its shadows lurk on our bodies and environments like castles doubling theirs—in the flesh! Behold, a pale horse! My sweetie, the galactic traveler, has come!

(artist: Bay)

Per the virgin/whore mechanism, demons are presumed "in disguise" and constantly sexualized on their surfaces regardless of what they have on (re: Segewick); i.e., forced to disrobe hence confess less in ways that are objectively true and more to spill one's guts, thus be the whore that men with virgin/whore syndrome are searching for (and token agents; re: whores pimping whores): all virgins are whores, all whores look like virgins and "need" to be subjugated under dogmatic, love/hate, criminogenic conditions. They must because Capitalist Realism demands it, Numinous iterations of the victorious whore-as-Great-Destroyer promoting Red Scare; i.e., spectres of Marx threatening the Fall of "Rome" as Rome presently stands. Death and rebirth challenge the state, which then tries to monopolize them; re: Halloween and those "of nature" inside the state of exception as a repeating cycle that—per the liminal hauntology of war—always comes home to roost. Despite the infamy of slashing reapers like Michael Myers haunting colonized lands (and threatening colonization of the colonizer inheriting the Imperial Core under elite rule), such beings and their language of violence, terror and morphological expression cannot be weaponized exclusively by the state (whose lands, per settler colonialism, there must always yield someone to harvest—to exterminate as evil, lesser and dark); our ghostly asses can use them to send state fears (and denial of their precious stolen goods) back at them! Stare and tremble, fuckers!

In turn, dirty little girls have dirty little secrets (the name of the porn skit starring Valentina, above and below). Such compelled theatrics can be reclaimed on the same stages, with the same Aegis' mirror/compartiment syndrome freezing state abuse and reclaiming our power through slutty theatre. We trade with what we got, with what society values/discounts through porn and, by extension, art and daily life; e.g., transportation, rent, and food all paid for with sex as legal/illegal (the only thing afforded to women in a patriarchal society): a tush, a rack and a box! Virgin = legal; whore = illegal. Women (or those treated like women) are fucked, either way! Whores are simply more upfront about it, more candid, natural and earthly (freaks that fart, belch, swear and spit during sex). She's animal, demonic—a demon lover wolfing sex down but also dishing it out, Chaucer-style, to threaten nuclear models of ownership and reproduction with squelching hungry holes stirring macaroni!

(artist: Valentina)

Sex doesn't just hit the spot, but pounds it in ways that speak laterally to our abuse happening elsewhere vis-à-vis what people are currently looking at: the controlled objects coming alive to act out their own "rape," making it like a metal song (or the POW! Blocks from Mario 2, 1988): fun, volatile, and satisfyingly thrilling. To make iconoclastic, sex-positive demons, then, is to humanize the harvest, thus the whore—to make love while turning profit (thus rape) entirely on its head: the cute "virgin" form incensed to a feral "whore" form doubling it; i.e., Medusa going "mask off" to bare her fangs, exhaling in rapturous, ahegao-style passion (and taking our essence and power as she does)! In effect, she decides what implement goes in what hole, vaginal or anal comprising different kinds of exchange concerning the same policed subject: sex as marital vs extramarital, thus wild, forbidden, fun. Instead of retreating backs into the past, we pay it forwards with thunder and darkness, fueling and fertilizing fresh beds of doom. The place where the holy go to die and dark dreams manifest—sex-machine booty getting the lead out: "heavy buns of lead fills her victims full of dread!" Twerked to death, then taken by Persephone's nightmarish ass to Hell and back—you'll never wanna leave!

That's what intimacy is through demonic, whorish expression; i.e., showing any side of ourselves that will normally be attacked! Sex is dangerous and fun in ways we can camp in duality (more on this in "Making Demons"): handling those we trust won't harm us, and having fun through performance and art, friendship and business as speaking cryptonymically to so many instances where that luxury of agency is denied! Loving the whore is taught by the whore in the lusty shadow of actual rape and hate, but also predatory porn contracts and barbaric, blame-the-whore rhetoric those unequal power arrangements historically encourage; e.g., "What was she wearing?"

I'm sorry but that's irrelevant. She could be buck-ass naked and rape still isn't okay! Ever! Furthermore, no one "asks for it," as far as unironic rape goes, but that's precisely the kind of bullshit revolutionary cryptonymy challenges through our chosen buffers and stages: the demon lover's cry of Medusa finding a reciprocal, affectionate audience! For her and hers, fear and courage, love and pain occupy the same stage under pressure! We learn to relax and control our fear through safe spaces that, at times, cross over into actual, grave danger (when the state intervenes) but also put "danger" into quotes; i.e., to nullify state apathy in worker hearts and minds, saving our dark mommy by giving her what she desperately wants/needs! "Ravish me!" The whore's paradox is a command speaking to the shadow of rape—a command to follow in ways that evoke a barrier whose barrier yields revelation, protection and catharsis. It's loud and noisy but dark and fun; i.e., both what it postures as and something else entirely!

Simply put, it's an act—one whose darkness speaks to hyphenated pleasure-pain, their control administered fairly between all parties involved. People are sexual, even those asexual parties communicating to sexual topics through calculated risk, public nudism and art/porn more broadly. Exposure to demons begets arousal; i.e., we see sex and often enough, get turned on—our dicks wet with precum, our mouths (or "mouths") salivating and our brains buzzing with giddy anticipation! Read about demon sex; get wet, hard and horny! That's human, but tapping into its primal energies helps us reunite with nature-as-alien; i.e., in ways we can weaponize in counterterrorist forms, which go intentionally beyond state tolerances: to eat them alive, as Medusa (the wandering womb) loves to do! Om, nom, nom—all over that dick like the baby from Super Metroid (camp requiring some degree of irony and humor to work, often in oxymoronic degrees)!

(artist: Valentina)

The paradoxical, ironic nature of Gothic is commonly transgressive, subverting taboos and fears during liminal expression. Such pedagogies of the oppressed lend demons the uncanny ability to lend power expressed as forbidden knowledge; i.e., to speak to what is normally alienated from one side or the other by state forces (re: Volume One's "Healing from Rape").

Such prolific and varied rape fantasies speak of someone being controlled, and someone feeling small and weak in ways that can be controlled without harming anyone; e.g., the "teen" isolated and ravished during roleplay that can easily be good or bad; i.e., controlled opposition vs genuine rebellion using the same sex, drugs and rock 'n roll to make—with their shared aesthetics—completely different arguments: an opiate for the masses vs a forbidden way of seeing that speaks to state abuse by (at times) badly reenacting it. Catharsis equates as much to freedom of expression as it does the ability to say the quiet part out loud. We pick and choose, mixing things up through holistic interpretation that reminds people just how controlled, thus policed nature is/our bodies and labor are! Sex is highly controlled, under Pax Americana; violence is unregulated to control sex.

Keeping with paradox, then, rape is both no laughing matter and solved in Sisyphean, smile-at-the-gods gallows humor camping rape; i.e., doing so in ways that are fun precisely for those reasons. By extension, singular interpretations are dangerous, amounting to an ordering of power that benefits one side (the elite) over another (workers and nature) per a master/slave hierarchy.

In turn, the defense of said interpretations' singularity happens by police forces upholding state operations, which we must camp by saying whatever we want however we need to; i.e., to relax amid hypervigilance, ducking segregation by respecting mutual consent through different evocations of it, tailor-made per roleplay scenario; e.g., "Get your hands off my penis!" versus "Fuck me like you mean it!" Each safe/danger phrase (green/red light) can be said with or without irony to support or challenge police violence, hence the state. For our purposes, we emerge dualistically from abject veils—from Hell, the underground, other dimensions—to command respect using what we got: our bodies and negotiator's fluency dismantling state operations on all linguo-material registers!

(artist: Valentina)

In turn, everyday interpersonal affairs extend/translate easily enough to geopolitical ones. For example, the Gaza Healthcare Letters, written on October 2nd, 2024, by "veterans and reservists" styling themselves as "neutral observers," demonstrate a stunning amount of ignorance regarding how states historically operate. To it, they style themselves as "a multifaith and multiethnic group [none of which] support the horrors committed on October 7 by Palestinian armed groups and individuals in Israel" (source).

So right off the bat, they're off to a really bad start; i.e., both-sidesing the issue and appealing to the very people responsible and standing to profit off these matters:

We are not politicians. We do not claim to have all the answers. We are simply healing professionals who cannot remain silent about what we saw in Gaza. Every day that we continue supplying weapons and munitions to Israel is another day that women are shredded by our bombs and children are murdered with our bullets. [emphasis, theirs]

President Biden and Vice President Harris, we urge you: end this madness now! (ibid.).

On one hand, asking the White House to stop genocide seems noble enough. On the other, doing so is like asking Hitler (another desk murderer) to stop killing his enemies of the state while pretending like he doesn't; it's stunningly ignorant to how states (and their bureaucracies) function, historically—how they create these enemies specifically to rape them. These doctors seem to forget that, ignoring the fact that America is doing this on purpose; i.e., is responsible for everything these doctors are mopping up, and stands to profit from it en masse. They sound like fools, drunk on Pax Americana's exceptional goodness, thus its whitewashed bloodbaths and Zionist mythmaking. Biden and Kamala are worse than Trump in that respect.

Worse, our good doctors lack the jester's ability to critique the king in his own court; i.e., they're not vice characters, they medical professionals acting as pick-and-choosers, saying it's okay for some to die by finger-wagging oppressed groups for responding the only logical way under settler-colonial conditions: the only reason Palestinians attacked Isreal is because Israel has been genociding them for over seventy years with America's help (similar to how 9/11 only happened because America is a settle colony that routinely invades and destroys other countries for profit). Yet, our good doctors utterly miss the point, writing:

President Biden and Vice President Harris, we urge you to immediately withhold military, economic, and diplomatic support from the State of Israel and to participate in an international arms embargo of Israel and all Palestinian armed groups [emphasis, me] until a permanent ceasefire is established in Gaza (ibid.).

It's obtuse, verging on obstruction; i.e., the gesture itself is certainly a stance, but one the state can simply deny as it always does (and one where the doctors can pat themselves on the back for writing the letter). In effect, the very solutions these doctors propose are empty gestures, blaming the victims and exonerating the state by treating them as "neutral"; i.e., ignoring the reality that Biden, like all presidents, says one thing and does another to enrich his corporate brethren selling weapons to both sides.

Such ignorance would seem to benefit from the kinds of playful rhetoric our crisis actors seem completely unable to perform. All they can do is wring their angelic hands and ask daddy politely to stop. Since when has that ever worked? Again, we have to humanize the harvest in worker hearts and minds, and this happens through whorish dialogs; i.e., those able to point the finger directly at the only ones responsible for pimping nature: through the same straws and liquid they siphon rejecting state violence and sucking our power back towards us.

Again, context matters—dividing along dialectical-material scrutiny during oppositional praxis, and where radicalization compounds during paradoxical, half-real exposure. Liberation is often trashy and all the more delicious and therapeutic for it; i.e., it's junk food comforting the normally powerless with something tasty, fiery and fun (re: "eating a meal, a succulent Chinese meal")—a sex object that, revived as Galatea by Galatea (and not Pygmalion), revs our engines! During oppositional praxis, sex is a battle, babes! A castle under siege—a disco to invade, all guns blazing out on the dance floor with dance partners who weaponize sex against the state versus for it! Pew! Pew!

Silence is genocide, so make all the noise you can above ground⁷³—to say to the world, "Here I was, am, will be! Raped but unbowed, and wilder and braver because of it!" Such accomplished and worldly liminalities see the whore accepting payment where they can get it (versus simply having it shoved at or into them like a slot machine), and spreading allegory whenever they can help it. Fuck to metal (whatever hits the spot)! Demonize to humanize; "rape" ironically (camping rape as it normally plays out, on and offstage)! Death by Snu-Snu! "Harder, faster!" Weeee!

(artist: Valentina)

Profit demands rape, genocide, what-have-you.

Fighting the profit motive, then, such wet-and-wild, slutty arguments notably ⁷³ Such archives speak to underground journals tapping into repressed appetites, but also pedagogies of the oppressed highlighting the hypocrisies and cryptonymies of empire; e.g., The Pearl was "A Journal of Voluptuous Reading: The Underground Magazine of Victorian England" (originally published anonymously in 1878 and republished by Ballantine in 1968—itself a tumultuous year under empire):

Having decided to bring out a Journal, the Editor racks his brains for a suitable name with which to christen his periodical [...] at last our own ideas have hit upon the modest little "Pearl," as more suitable, especially in the hope that when it comes under the snouts of the moral and hypocritical swine of the world, they may not trample it underfoot, and feel disposed to rend the publisher, but that a few will become subscribers on the quiet. To such better disposed piggywiggys, I would say, for encouragement, that they have only to keep up appearances by regularly attending church, giving to charities, and always appearing deeply interested in moral philanthropy, to ensure a respectable and highly moral character, and that if they only are clever enough never to be found out, they may, sub rosa, study and enjoy the philosophy of life till the end of their days, and earn a glorious and saintly epitaph on their tombstone, when at last the Devil pegs them out.

Such voyeuristic curiosity towards whorish exhibitionism is not wholly the domain of the hypocrite, but it's often who we have to deal with all the same.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

code/decode through preference—doing so to become a joyous, tragic, and comedic gag to reclaim during copycat pornographic refrains; i.e., showcasing agency as, true to form, a kind of demonic joke/apologia about unshackled monstrous-feminine desire speaking to harsher realities haunting the venue.

These jokes, in turn, echo and inform industry standards mimicking us and vice versa. The deciding factor in terms of sex positivity is irony and humor about being stranded and all the dire, sinister implications that entails (see: It's Always Sunny in the City's "Dennis Explains the Implication" scene, 2010). All the while, fun and danger go hand-in-hand with risk prevention and praxial synthesis, giving us new ways to see the world based on old abuses and pacifying illusions we demonically subvert during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., per our idle hand's ghastly creations reviving sex-positive dungeon paradigms, demon lovers and vengeful whores reclaiming our agency—by putting "rape" in quotes, as we demonized always must. To keep quiet is to grit and bear it from our jailors, demanding we choke on them despite our gag reflex speaking to the contrary. Like, fuck that!

So concludes our rape reprise. Such camp and its unheimlich-maneuver revenge, of course, take many forms (e.g., big butts, class consciousness, class-conscious big butts), but power as such classically becomes something the state prescribes to rape nature and those of it, determining such actions per their usual demonic ceremonies of false power and police violence; i.e., under neoliberal Capitalism's Faustian and Promethean arguments built on older forms of capital and Imperialism⁷⁴; e.g., Don Cheadle's Captain Planet spoof: "The power is mine, bitches!" (Funny or Die's "Don Cheadle Is Captain Planet," 2011). We must see it for what it is and reclaim it through the looking glass. Keep that in mind as we proceed!

(artist: Galactixy Illustrations)

⁷⁴ Its cartographic technologies of conquest described by Patel and Moore as "a single, disembodied, omniscient and panoptic eye" (and cataloged by me through various cartographic refrains; re: Volume Zero). It is precisely this eye who those of nature must meet with our own Aegis, its abyssal gaze staring back in ways that stall the usual monomythic conquest; i.e., that capital and canon essentialize in any and all forms, monsters and territories. Their governance cannot be met with politeness, but bare-and-exposed sluts speaking truth to power through our own way of seeing the world: making everything gay!

Forbidden Sight, part one: Idle Hands Are the Devil's Workshop; or, Weapons in Clay and Even More Playtime: the Monstrous Prostitution of Blood Libel and Its Violent, Demonic Revenge

One, two! One, two! And through and through The vorpal blade went snicker-snack!
 He left it dead, and with its head
 He went galumphing back (source).

—Lewis Carroll, "Jabberwocky" (1871)

Part two and three of "Forbidden Sight" shall pointedly consider the processes of making and summoning demons vis-à-vis the Promethean Quest and Faustian Bargain. For part one—and to further examine the nebulous spirit of demons—I'm devoting even more time to the idea of playing with them (thus rape) in different vengeful forms; i.e., attached to blood libel as morphologically whore-like during ludo-Gothic BDSM; re: the state antagonizing nature-as-monstrous-feminine to put it to work as cheaply as possible, pimping that which we avenge: by reclaiming ourselves as whore-like weapons-in-clay from state monopolies raping us, throwing the doors of perception wide!

The larger poetic theme for part one is persecution/alienation, namely blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts conceived not as undead, but demonic; i.e., Amazons (witches), vampires and goblins expressed, and subsequently analyzed, in ways that speak to their demonic abilities: to exchange and transform, be that for the state or against it, through the dualistic language of persecution. Said state historically uses blood libel to demonize, prostitute and police nature-as-alien with nature-as-alien; i.e., the tokenized poetic language of punishment and revenge (witch hunts) within overlapping persecution networks, said devices chattelizing marginalized groups as dark, animal, and inhuman, but also terrorist, criminal and vermin aliens on the homefront (the enemy within). All serve to pointedly divide-and-conquer a population with a population: demons policing demons, whores policing whores.

Such scapegoat devices (and their medieval-style, hack-and-slash revenge) are soupy and plastic, meaning playing with instruments of them (dolls) is the quickest and simplest way to articulate their dialectical-material complexities (of sex and force). Jest or threat, one scene should hint at all underlying themes and potential for other forms that yield the same inequalities and drive towards liberation: the potential for morphological variety (e.g., horns, snake eyes, red skin, and cloven-hoof feet) but also that of violence and terror ontologically breaking Capitalist Realism.

To synthesize praxial, thus systemic catharsis means prioritizing the ability to play with rape; i.e., any and all pieces that assemble to our benefit each and every time. We feel unequal and play it out, but establish equal rights through such playtime. Once installed, your launchpad can use whatever "rocket" you and your idle hands can fabricate. Power and knowledge operate through perception, to which there is truly no limit to how they convey upon the Aegis and inside its devilish, hauntological discotheques.

To be holistic and flexible, then, I'm devoting even more playtime with demons from said launchpad. Except, whereas part zero focused on the revenge of nature accounting for its own demonized criminal existence, part one shall focus on the violent quality of said revenge under unequal conditions; i.e., demons and non-demons as black and white (which unto itself suggests a broad inequality to both sides, black the opposite of white and vice versa) that settles through poetic lens and debate; re: exchange and transformation as vengeful and psychosexual, but also desired by those alienated from it.

Simply put, everyone loves the whore, and we can enjoy her violent fantasies without a) harming anyone (re: "hurt, not harm"), and b) synthesizing praxis to cultivate a better cultural understanding of the imaginary past during ongoing revolutionary struggles—to reclaim the Base and recultivate the Superstructure.

To it, demons are whores, and whores are vice characters, including Amazons, vampires and goblins. They communicate dualistically during liminal expression, but so do people in general (which demons stand in for). This includes revenge, be it canonical or campy under the whore's paradox; re: the finding of "power/agency through theatrical reenactments of unequal, unfair or otherwise rapacious treatment and conditions [...] demons are maidens and maidens are demons, but both are virgins and whores, and each finds power (and knowledge) according to how the state forbids access, yet access happens anyway."

Doing so veers into monster fucking as a poetic device; i.e, the broader GNC elements of demons—one embedded inside a postcolonial examination that rehashes older points about Amazons from my older books, vis-à-vis Lady Hellbender and similar monstrous-feminine, "dark warrior queen"⁷⁵ demons—which this section will then explore through vampires in Takena's weaponized claymation skit, followed by demons at large (featuring my older work on Tolkien; re: goblins).

⁷⁵ This by itself is a huge area of research; i.e., nature-as-monstrous-feminine through monomythic stories made to endlessly announce the sudden arrival of dark mothers (of an unruly hysterical sort); i.e., as scapegoats slain repeatedly by state forces, but especially tokenized subjugated Amazons revived and whored out under neoliberal tenure/Capitalist Realism. To peruse this specific topic, refer to the list of hyperlinks under Metroidvania as closed space, in the glossary. Furthermore, while I write about Amazons extensively in Volume Zero, they likewise appear in all of my books.

Per this module's tangential symposium style, I've divided "Idle Hands" into three subdivisions on blood libel (and a cheat sheet) you can trace and jump to as needed:

- part zero: "Cheat Sheet": My original notes for "Idle Hands," left for your convenience. Lays out the very basics of the blood libel argument, its connection to sodomy and witches in terms of their shared dualistic usage when furthering or reversing abjection (thus persecution and alien), and some germane points, exhibits and quotes to keep in mind as we go.

- part one: "Amazons and Demon Mummies": Considers the demonic aspects of blood libel per the Amazon/Medusa as witch-like prostitute, extending to demon mummies such as Lady Hellbender (above) as Amazonian in their own right.
- part two: "Vampires and Claymation": Lays out the basic idea of demonic, whorish revenge with vampires, whose blood libel it explores in Takena's "Midnight Vampire" (and reconsiders some ideas of tokenization per some of our thesis arguments that apply to all demon types).
- part three: "Goblins, Anti-Semitism and Monster-Fucking": Examines the vengeful, monstrous-feminine qualities of blood libel per goblins; i.e., their being "of nature" in ways that can be policed or avenged by theatrical agents waxing demonic poetic while playing with darkness visible. Explores these dualities first in Tolkien canonizing evil labor policed by good (orcs and goblins [vengeful-Jewish-coded slaves and whores] vs humans), followed by our own work and others camping him: through such "monster-fucking" play as highly chaotic/acid-Communist (e.g., Ween and SpongeBob), before weighing in on some transitional arguments that segue into "Forbidden Sight," part two (which discusses the making of demons, vis-à-vis Shelley's Frankenstein).

To alienize something is to make it alien; i.e., through exotic fetishes and clichés as much through alienating the colonized subject from others through forced relocation (a war crime/act of genocide). In turn, this often has a weaponized, persecutory quality useful to either police terror tactics or worker counterterror devices opposing said cops through demonic poetic expression; i.e., of violence, terror and morphology. Whores, then, are often spies, assassins and warriors, and as such, take on a variety of monstrous and masculine/feminine forms, including Amazons and/or goblins. They look cute in ways that cause others to underestimate them, but also collared in freakshows that help the audience let down their guard; e.g., King Kong in New York City (a colonial hub, Wall Street originally being a slaver's market). Sex is a weapon, and it conceals and reveals per the cryptonymy process as complicit or revolutionary!

(artist: Personal Ami)

I've presented these ideas and subchapter subdivisions in a somewhat logical-if-arbitrary order and try to mention as many germane ideas as I can. Mentioning all of them is impossible. Instead, there's enough selective reading to get my larger message across: play with "rape," hence the descriptive, lived reality of women (or those chattelized like women/slaves to Cartesian men; e.g., men of color); i.e., workers living in the half-real shadow of rape without quotes vis-à-vis state influence, geopolitics and militarized illusions, onstage and off. I'm still working through this material myself—marrying the academic to the worldly and prurient—and I expect each and every one of you to do the same!

Idle Hands, part zero: A Cheat Sheet; or, Some Larger Thesis Arguments/How We'll Apply Them to Blood Libel and Demons at Large

In the Gothic, then, decay and inheritance of a fallen West can denote a "Gothic effect" (re: Baldrick), but just as easily suggest size difference and alien signatures that, from Capitalism to Communism, help workers reunite with lost mighty things by remaking them; i.e., the potential not to be a victim, but gods, kings and queens where no such things exist for one, but all [...] We don't tokenize/rape rank and place Original Sin over blood libel, black rape epidemics, or sodomy accusations; we unite, intersectionally solidarizing under Gothic Communism to break Capitalist Realism: through our counterterror's pedagogy of the oppressed. This has a mark to it—pieces that are controlled and yearn to be free in ways that perceive both as unreal and more real than real. The fantasy poster comes alive, but stays half-real, like a ghost promising all manner of reckonings and revelations (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "Seeing Dead People" (2024).

As some you probably know by now, I write backwards. Either I go to the top, get to the bottom, and go back to the top again with what I just wrote, or I write something first and then write around it/preface it with a great deal of extra material.

This time around, I started "Idle Hands" by writing "Vampires and Claymation," first (which was very short—only four pages). I then chased it with "Trial by Fire" and "Goblins and Anti-Semitism," followed by "Amazons and Demon Mommies" (the latter which took forever because I love Amazons and Medusa, dedicating large swathes of page space to each, only to sub-divide again and write about dark faeries/commission a bunch of models to go with that addition) before eventually arriving back at "Vampires" and "Goblins," again! This writing is something of a "cheat sheet," then, which I wrote partway through the process; i.e., where I decided, en medias res, that I wanted a multi-section element dedicated to blood libel, witches and sodomy demons at large!

(artists: Persephone van der Waard and Cuwu)

As my readers also know, I don't like to waste stuff, and very much believe in holistic study by revisiting and playing with old things (e.g., Cuwu and I, above).

To it, I very much like people to have context regarding my creative/directing approach. This includes backstories, but also writer's notes, which part zero essentially is. However vestigial, tangential, or otherwise unnecessary and spectral/diaphanous it might ultimately be, I've decided to include my notes here, anyways, for your convenience. Use or discard them as thou wilt!

(artist: Nyx)

First and foremost, blood libel goes hand-in-hand with sodomy and witch hunts; i.e., witches, vampires and goblins occupy the same demonic, monstrous-feminine umbrella (of persecution and alienation); re: under capital, which rapes nature for profit by antagonizing it before putting it cheaply to work. Also, if I mention "blood libel," I'm generally referring to the other terms unless specified, and vice versa!

While vampires in particular function as undead beings traumatized by theft, the other two historically exude alien/Pagan/anti-Semitic qualities tied to nature vs empire. To liberate sex work by camping canon (thus reversing abjection through the terrorist/counterterrorist argument during oppositional praxis), we'll be treating all as sex demons, in this module; i.e., in terms of critical analysis through their poetic lenses, coded idiomatic language and subsequent, cryptonymic potential; re: a spectre of Communism—specifically Medusa's fat ass (through an avatar, above)—is haunting capital (not just Europe, Marx⁷⁶). We haunt capital to have the whore's revenge (thwarting profit through the whore's paradox/paradox of rape during calculated risk): a Communist Numinous rising up from Hell while in Hell, a given train preceded by smaller concentric hauntologies with their own cryptomimetic sense of power and size, mise-en-abyme—haunting and echoing onstage and off, blighting the nuclear home, mid-chronotope (re: me, vis-à-vis Derrida, Castricano and Bakhtin)!

That's the gist. The rest of the sheet is largely how I wrote it, originally. It's short—nine pages (three of which are a block quote from Volume Zero)—a small basket of different curios I've gathered for you, should the need arise:

Before we dive into the blood libel section of demonic expression, let's refresh ourselves. First, let's trot out some thesis arguments, which will undoubtedly come up a lot; re: Capitalism sexualizes and fetishizes everything pursuant to profit and the usual bourgeois trifectas, monopolies and resultant qualities of capital; e.g., police violence as something to resist through play that lets us copy ourselves; i.e., into posthuman homunculi that can be taken apart. Also, "to critique power, you must go where it is"; "humanize the harvest, and the state becomes inhumane"; just as trauma cultivates strange appetites—anything in service to profit gentrifying and decaying the potential for rebellion through recuperated means—so does "trauma" make its own appetites in service to workers! And so on.

⁷⁶ Marx wasn't above using the Gothic to speak to capital's rising abuses. Neither must we, but in doing so, must—as usual—camp Marx's ghost with all the rest!

We'll play out these arguments going forwards, including anything made with others' help; i.e., as "violent," in quotes; re: the paradox of appearing torturous, but functioning as playful, cathartic and revolutionary during ludo-Gothic BDSM:

(exhibit 43e2c0: Model and artist, top left: Mikki Storm and Persephone van der Waard. The title of the drawing is "The Palliative Numinous," drawn to Mikki's specifications. Despite the appearance of rape and gagging "bondage with tentacles," the Numinous asphyxia [and demonic whore] on display is an ironic, cryptonymy rape fantasy that doesn't advocate for genuine harm. For one, it's how Mikki wanted to be depicted as during our negotiation, saying that "beasty" demons and tentacles are her kink. Hugging the alien is what she's into, showing and hiding things that, apart from concealing anything at all, also show a fair bit of themselves on themselves. Power's paradox lies in its duality, mid-feeling, expressing dialectical-material pushback against canonical norms. So do workers like Mikki and I touch on abuse, then instruct others how not to harm through "abuse" in quotes.

Furthermore, the shoving of tentacles down one's throat is no different, in practice, than a cock down the same pipe, or hands clasping "tightly" around one's throat [the appearance of tightness is for the viewer while a gentle-enough grip in reality is important for the recipient]. Even portrayals of "actual" bodily harm could be allowed, so long as their execution puts "harm" in quotes; i.e., is symbolic and cathartic as a kind of nightmare expression of trauma that helps the subject—notably a sex worker, in this case—process their own complex abuse. Tush, rack or box, "Medusa" employs cryptomimetic demonic exchange and transformation to show what she wants to show and to express her power through mutual consent: the conveying of normally hidden things expressed between pieces of Gothic language in openly monstrous forms; i.e., monsters are "suits" for people to wear and perform in for various reasons, for or against the state; re [from Volume Zero]:

Yet the monstrous-feminine also lends itself well to camp, supplying performers with the means to generate a cutesy-creepy uncanny in ways that make it far less torturous/stigmatic and far more fun, even strangely sexy [the proverbial "weirdest boner"]:

artist: top-left, bottom-left, top-right and bottom-right: [Jessica Nigri; top-middle: Johannes Sadeler; bottom-middle: Salem Hysteria]

Camp can yield gender trouble and gender parody in equal measure—camp, in the case of the guy watching Pyramid Head ride four-eyes like an ass [mimicking the "power of women" topos vis-à-vis Phyllis and Aristotle] and parody for her and her performer friend making trouble/having fun; e.g., camping the canonical-if-at-times-tangential "Nazi" of the occult, psychosexual BDSM aesthetic [with bonafide Nazi camp being its own musical/comedy hit⁷⁷ that never seems to age]. Likewise, Pyramid Head echoes the hauntological medieval as darkly torturous in a cryptomimetic, "Catholic miracle" sense, which can rescue pain from a variety of falsehoods: the false dichotomy of "pleasure and pain," the false equivalency of "pain as sexual" but also non-pleasurable, the false stigma that pain is automatically harmful, thus has no cathartic potential. Trauma begets trauma and the chase of the Numinous can be medicinal in relation to lived trauma. Even so, it can just as easily be a burlesque show as kawaii vs kowai [cute vs scary] for genuine play and delight in an asexual sense with psychosexual overtones [the color swap] instead of internalized ones. Simply put, these aren't pointless novelties or exclusive "hard kink medicine" for legit mental scarring, but also deeply fun [and subversive] exercises in the genderqueer creative spirit. Given the destructive nature of capital, all overlap through the same symbols and theatre as something to reclaim from the bourgeois monopoly on these things [source: "Symposium: Aftercare"].

As always, the context behind the drawing's negotiation and expression of power exchange remain an important part of the entire exhibit. The water, smoke, and volcano exemplify the same chaotic, seemingly Numinous power being embodied by the dark, giant monster whore "ravishing" Mikki, and Mikki [dressed in white, like the maiden] consents to a consent-non-consent ritual that cannot harm her by virtue of these things serving her complex needs; they can excite her and help her heal from trauma through a ludo-Gothic BDSM arrangement that addresses police trauma as something to live with, thus interrogate through the performance of power in paradoxical ways: calculated risk.

⁷⁷ Which can be used for the state; re: Virginia Allison's examination of Evita (1979) and Nazi theatrics in "White Evil: Peronist Argentina in US Popular Imagination Since 1955" (2004). We examined this in Volume Two's Undead Module; re: "That Which Is Not Dead"; or, Capitalism as a Great Zombie\(-Vampire\)," (2024).

The Numinous, in this sense, becomes palliative/counterterrorist through its psychosexual nature challenging the inherent police design of state monopolies; i.e., the language of the performer being for or against something dualistic, liminal and anisotropic; e.g., terrorist/counterterrorist, good/evil, virgin/whore, protest/counterprotest, etc. Like in chess, the elite or workers can assign their position as "black" or "white," albeit in duality and at cross purposes; e.g., "the state calls us 'terrorist,' but actually we are counterterrorist"; i.e., challenging the dichotomy of abjection and its usual blood-libel flow of power and knowledge, but also morphological forms: the virgin and the whore hyphenated, versus divided.)

Optics matter during playtime, of course—with rebels outwitting cops through counterterrorism's dialectical-material context; i.e., the sort aiding and abetting guerrillas since ancient times; re: during the dialectic of the alien, the state dehumanizing the monster only for it, the "terrorist" barbarian/scapegoat, to reverse roles (and abjection) on the Aegis! Iconoclasm is a two-way war of mirrors.

Tied to capital, such things are historically-materially ubiquitous and eternal; i.e., so long as Capitalism remains and continues to rape nature as its alien, monstrous-feminine whore. From vampires to demons, then, you'll never be rid of the Gothic aesthetic (which is so engrained within the West to be synonymous with it), but you can subvert how it is viewed and applied, mid-liminal-expression; i.e., insofar as the application of sex and force during state vs worker dialogs are perceived, swinging back and forth: cops and victims, felt amid common poetic extremes (which metal, videogames, comics, and porn, etc, are known for).

Canonical Gothic is notably "immature," harmful. Gothic maturity is when workers can engage in/with such discourse to prevent harm; i.e., when labor becomes emotionally/Gothically intelligent enough—and class, culturally and racially conscious enough—to a) develop, not hinder Communism, and b) break Capitalist Realism through these means on a cultural level; re: during sex-positive sex work, generating iconoclastic art to recultivate the Wisdom of the Ancients into a proletarian Superstructure. Liberated from harm, "rape" becomes intuitive; playful but practiced, martial but artist, it shines a black light on dried blood (and other fluids). Such is the palliative Numinous.

This goes for arguments that apply equally to monsters of all kinds; be they undead, demonic, and/or animalistic, we can take those from one module, turn them inside-out and apply them intersectionally to other poetic devices (which we are, here, with demons vis-à-vis blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts). Furthermore, we can literally dress up or disrobe such things and go from there. Be it a uniform (above) or a single article of clothing (a hat or a cloak, below), any and all function as fashion statements and socio-political stances regardless of how they're worn/dressed; i.e., they are linguo-material, in nature, hence subject to the same cryptonymic dualities and dialectical-material arbitration all human language is:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Our emphasis, here, is demonic expression, thus creation; i.e., as demons are normally created through themselves (and their uniforms). For example, my original character—Ileana Sanda, the Queen of the Night (from my unfinished fantasy series, The Cat in the Adage)—is a "golem" of sorts; i.e., a sex doll and embodiment of power as I see it through the witch aesthetic. She accordingly turns witch hunts on their head through said aesthetic; i.e., by using it to defend women and children from state tyrants, dwindling the latter's reserves while largely in the buff as an Amazon might be: an action figure whose seditious-yet-protective spirit of utility is ludo-Gothic BDSM. Through Ileana, I marry such playfulness to dark spells and public nudism, to prostitution and parlor magic thumping the pimp without a male hero taking all the credit!

In Amazonian fashion, Ileana's armor is her body, bare and exposed; i.e., in ways patriarchal forces cannot dominate, mid-exposure, but rather who dominates them in a pastel-goth, witchy aesthetic. She's badass, but not furiously angry and mute, like so many female ghosts are. Instead, she's a stage magician, slut and mommy protector acting as the queen of Hell, of her kind; i.e., within pandemonium as granting all occupants of Hell equal rights. She's not just a sex toy for me to fuck, then, but what I want to be (the two are not mutually exclusive):

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

In turn, witches—along with vampires and goblins—embody the most immediate aspects of persecution and alienation; i.e., their subversion but also their similarities amid difference. They look radically different from each other and to themselves, but redouble and announce the same function across a shared pedagogy of the oppressed: to be hunted by the state, or to survive the state while speaking out through the same terror language camouflaging them as "mere play"; re: healing from rape in the shadow of police violence. Silence is genocide; exposure is strength, provided we use our heads during the cryptonymy process!

The fact remains, we're all queens under Communism, babes—are all things to humanize and celebrate for our monstrous power (and birthdays, below)! But transformation is complicated, non-linear and ergodic; it takes work, but also repeated forays into the Gay Zone of Doom. It's a devil's workshop, one for idle hands to make toy-like monsters (clay or not) that challenge capital, hence profit; re: spectres of Marx evoking devilish tropes—e.g., Mary Shelley's shadowy cabal of "ancient" black magic, whose coded anti-Semitism haunts Victor Frankenstein's natural philosophy to slap him in the face—that, through ironic usage, can turn capital (and Cartesian thought) on its head!

(model and artist: Miss Nia Sax and Persephone van der Waard)

As a matter of violence, terror and morphological expression, imagination has the power to set us free as such, or cloister us all over again during the whore's paradox; e.g., sodomy being something to punish us for/with, but also which opens the door to lovely monstrous factors alienated from workers by capital; i.e., owning collectively what the state only tries to privatize by stealing from and killing us in the bargain: the monstrous means of production, of darkness visible and its forbidden sight. Creation is a mode of thought, as such, for which the Gothic and demons grant our deepest, darkest desires to break Capitalist Realism with by developing Communism; i.e., whatever our hearts desire versus the state trying to rule us by dictating how we present. We decide such things, not them! The profit motive is rape! ASAB! ACAB!

I'll demonstrate; i.e., by quoting from my thesis volume (next page), but doing so in favor of demonic poetics, this time around; re: while inspecting goblins, vampires, and witches—as similar tropes of persecution and alienation through blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts—that, suitably enough, are made from clay (darkness visible) to either endorse or tear down the status quo with!

From music to dance—to theatre to body language, to ludo-Gothic BDSM's age, rape or murder play (and various other predator/prey mechanisms)—it's entirely possible to summon, make or play with demons without harming anyone, while also recultivating the Superstructure in a proletarian direction (which the state targets with police violence; i.e., to label us "enemy" during blood libel to receive their violence⁷⁸): to fuck a dark mommy dom to metal and realize that—like

⁷⁸ Which we must anisotropically reverse while considering the optics of violence; e.g., Anansi's Library's "Nonviolence Is Good, Actually" (2024); i.e., we will always be "violent" because the state needs a weak/strong enemy to rape and reap through police force; re: nature-as-monstrous-feminine.

Milton's Paradise Lost—the real villain is God and any canonical notion of Heaven and Hell, good and evil, cop and victim is deeply untrustworthy.

Instead, we fags, women and other policed groups learn to trust our idiosyncratic feelings of abandonment acquired since birth; i.e., by using them to unify against the elite during liminal expression, we subvert subjugation rather than tokenize to serve the state as never providing for us: "Better to rule in Hell than serve in Heaven." This goes for all of us walking away from Omelas at once, solarized intersectionally towards that aim; i.e., a badge is not a shield from harm, it's just clemency during witch hunts, and a bigotry for one is a bigotry for all.

In "Camping the Canon" (2021), Colin Broadmoor argues how camping canon, since Milton and Matthew Lewis, exposes ongoing police (thus straight/token) abuse against queer people; i.e., through art, even when the language hasn't caught up or is otherwise suppressed through state force/tokenization. In response, I argue how workers camp canon because we must—for all workers! This accounts for our oppressed pedagogy's similarities, which occur amid difference. Like it or not, difference is where similarity occurs. Even so, revolutions cannot survive tokenization unanswered, which only makes them gentrify and decay in ways the state can closet, thus control through difference. So while insurrection is checkered, it still unfolds on a shared board to move different pieces across; i.e., while preventing state triangulation using the same devices! For the state, we're Satan⁷⁹ as someone to exploit; i.e., made from clay and beaten with hammers, suffering harm until we tokenize into gargoyles. For actual rebellion, though, workers combat various crippling feelings (e.g., gender dysphoria and body dysmorphia, commonly through impostor syndrome/gender trouble) while pushing towards our true selves during abjection, whether the state likes it or not; re (from Volume Zero):

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Why stick out? you ask? One, because we must in order to survive. Two, because our deals with the devil simply acknowledge our true selves, which the state wants us to reject (the queer version of Top Dollar's usual wisdom: "Every man's got a devil, and you can't rest until you find him"). But also, it feels good to be Athena's Aegis; i.e., challenging heteronormative power in ways that demonstrate how fragile said illusion (and its gatekeepers) are. State bullies are entitled nerds completely used to getting everything they want, who desire what I will never give them (a form of agency I've worked hard for); and completely afraid of nearly everything and will freak out at fairly silly things they have no business getting so worked up about: at people like me, burning down their imaginary churches and those churches' ideas of compelled order about Capitalism and its gobstopper illusions (those highly unnatural and imprisoning systems of thought that are slowly killing us as a species). Frankly the idea of me being terrifying seems absurd, but as a burning proponent of rebellion constitutes something that still, on some level, represents an incendiary threat that many advertise as the "end times": Communism... but Gothic and gay! To which I cheerfully put up the goat horns and say in response, "Hail, Satan!" It's like saying "Ni!" to old ladies.

⁷⁹ This isn't to say we're above critique (e.g., Ty Turner's "How Ava Tyson Became The Most Hated Trans Woman On YouTube – A Deep Dive," 2024) but that we're automatically "Satanic" within the state of exception, thus marked for police abuse by state proponents and their Gothic dogma.

Our performative and internalized devilry becomes something to join— a communion or pact whose assimilation classically amounts to a devilish bargain; yet Gothic Communism is a group effort, one whose sex-positive class/culture warrior is among a fellowship or pandemonium of equally sex-positive ne'er-do-wells instead of one or more class/race traitors for the elite and their age-old Faustian bargains. We reach towards you, croon "Join us!" and become something to run away with; i.e., corrupting the minds of the youth (women and children) by calling out seductively to them, offering forbidden knowledge/fruit⁸⁰ as a chance to go wild/go native by coming out of the closet in opposition to state forces (who will chase us, only to be turned away at the door—"no fascists allowed!"): the truth of things in its totality and not just a white person's perspective as an outsider to genuine atrocities; e.g., a Lovecraft novella, an overplayed Iron Maiden or Slayer song or the problematic castle of a Radcliffean novel (though these can all be enjoyed mid-rebellion). As Robert Asprey notes, terror and native wit/creativity are the historical tools of the counterterrorist, often being all they immediately have at their disposal; under Capitalism in the Internet Age, labor becomes a huge bargaining chip that Gothic Communism marries to terror during class war as a theatrical, operatic proposition (solidarity and labor action expressed as much through improvised Gothic poetics [improv] as improvised weapons): a means of bringing the oppressed and alienated closer to together in an informed, Satanic act of outer-space empathy and love in the face of state forces. The spotlight isn't something to hog or monopolize strictly by white nerds but expand and share in a drive towards post-scarcity (through a horizontally-arranged system that isn't rigged in favor of those who control it because no one person or select group will be in control, in that sense; that's what anarchism ultimately is).

⁸⁰ This experimentation comes with a steep tradeoff, of course. During Socialism, we a) come out of the closet/hiding to slowly regain control of our own bodies, labor, food and identities, but also b) shed the veil of ignorance to reunite with death as something to embrace and dance with, as well as stare down as oracles of the unbelieved, Cassandra sort that are also declared as devils, heretics, whistleblowers, castrators, bubble-bursters and iconoclasts by the faithful: the horrors of Capitalism as endless fields of exploitation, but also the subtler unheimlich where one gets an awful feeling—that one's home and inherited identity is unironically monstrous and harmful (as are one's usual means of escape: copaganda, unironic rape play and military optimism). The food will taste better and the sex will hit harder... but you have to be prepared to let go of childish things, including ignorant escapism into spaces of total, unironic enjoyment (repeat Sarkeesian's adage if it helps). Instead you will have to experience both sides of something so honest (unlike Capitalism): getting spit-roasted by heaven and hell. Shakespeare called the cause "slings and arrows," Coleridge called the condition "sad and wiser," and Mae Martin called its solution "sap." Of all three, I call it "the Wisdom of the Ancients."

Doing so becomes second-nature, a way of existing that doesn't require drugs or sex (though they can certainly be involved if one wants them to); it requires community and love in opposition to capital's usual bad-faith actors, fear and dogma: persons who blend in for fear of the state, overperforming its doctrines no matter how ridiculous it makes them look. I can understand why they do it (they're stupid and callow), but short of implied threats of force I can't begin to fathom why would anyone ever want to listen to people like them; i.e., persons who not only never experiment or try new things regarding gender and sex, but also probably never have had sex outside of abusive and/or vanilla scenarios. They're exactly the kind of people who act holy but hide behind their privilege as the most deviant ones of all⁸¹; i.e., prone to abuse their power and harm those under their care. In essence, they treat the Holy Gospel (in one form or another) as a means to abuse others from a position of willful ignorance: by refusing to eat from the Tree of Knowledge because some asshole saying they're God said so. The point isn't whether they're true-believers or that God is real or that God lied

⁸¹ E.g., Hawthorne's "Young Goodman Brown," but also Matthew Lewis' The Monk. The latter serves as a biting (and hilarious) illustration of the (not so) Silent Majority's abuse of privilege to indulge in guilty pleasure and wish fulfillment inside the closet (which is an awful, violent place), but also the ghost of the counterfeit's process of abjection. It's "boundaries for me, not for thee" for those who—alienated from everything around them except fear and dogma—act precisely the way that Capitalism needs them to: as hypocritical bullies. As I write in Volume Three:

manufactured scarcity deprives sexist performers of safe, nurturing sex (not just condoms or birth control, but consensual sex, too). They become sex-starved and information-deprived—killer virgins embroiled within a prolonged state of fearful ignorance beset by "evil" as instructed by formal institutions of power. On par with Ambrosio from The Monk (1796), such persons revel in bad play through violent fantasies geared towards achieving sexual control through coercive dominance. Indeed, Matthew Lewis cemented these within Ambrosio himself, a religious man obsessed with raping Antonia, a woman he barely knew (and his penis frequently being compared to a dagger or vice versa). Hidden virtuously behind a veil, her impeccable modesty bore no protection against the perfidious cleric (assisted on his horny quest by a crossdressing, devil-worshipping woman named Matilda). For Lewis, these opposites—Ambrosio's nefarious aspirations and Antonia's besieged virtue—were less imagined hypotheticals and more Lewis satirizing England's social-sexual climate within displaced and outrageous, but also queer language (re: Broadmoor). Moreover, its patently Gothic nature gave him the means to speak on taboo themes: rape as a material byproduct of violent cultural attitudes, not isolated nut jobs misled by the metaphysical devil. Ambrosio even blames Antonia for tempting him and Matilda for setting it all up, fulfilling the binary of temptress and rapist working in tandem while dumping his own blame fully onto women, not himself. This works as a pre-cursor to the whole "no fap" thing that many sexist religious men today endorse: blaming women for taking away the "essence" of their strength: their semen, but also their control; cumming is a sign of spiritual, physical and mental weakness.

about the apples being poison, but what they do with their power and sense of alienation inside the status quo (source: "Interrogating Power").

In short, all workers are whores under capital because capital sexualizes everything. By being ourselves in ways that consciously resist state power (and weird canonical nerds), we whores resist police violence and profit normally raping nature as monstrous-feminine; i.e., we break Capitalist Realism and—by extension, the Capitalocene's usual menticide and hopelessly afraid Man Box—by "running the asylum." Exploitation and liberation share that asylum. So might we, as the usual suspects/monstrous-feminine inmates, start to subvert canon's usual copaganda feeding on us! Capital robs us, mid-thirst; we slake said thirst while raising Cain, the whore avenging the pimp's harm, mid-harvest!

In turn, we transmute fear and dogma in all its forms. Through demons, blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts become things to level against our colonizers; i.e., by scaring them stupid through the cryptonymy process reversing abjection on the Aegis. So while weird attracts weird, its steady manufacture in our hands can shock our enemies senseless. From sex to gender to gender performance (and the trouble it causes), these things become weapons we turn into body art/graffiti codified as much by demonic symbols that have countercultural heft dating back centuries, but link to ongoing struggles; e.g., my art sharing the Palestinian cause.

Gothic Communism, at its core, recodes bias through holistic study. It does so during ludo-Gothic BDSM, disarming persecution with alien theatre; i.e., with our bodies, labor and language, whose playing at persecution during liminal expression regains control over ourselves as demonic. As demons, we're still alien/deserving of state violence according to them, but learn to master things that normally rape us during the dialectic; i.e., by illustrating mutual content in society at large: where "rape" can still and should happen, in quotes (solo and with others, below)!

(artist: Mercedes the Muse)

So ends our cheat sheet. Keep its arguments in mind as we investigate the demonic qualities present in blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts; re: the witch-like Amazons and Medusa, as well as dark faeries and demon muscle mommies; Takena's killer sex doll, in "Midnight Vampire"; and Tolkien's anti-Semitic rape fantasies—not his vampires, this time, but his goblins! We'll camp them all, one at a time!

Onto Amazons!

Idle Hands, part one: Amazons and Demon Mommies

Any free woman in a free society will be a monster.

—Angela Carter, The Sadeian Woman (1979)

"Idle Hands," part one considers a popular aspect to the monstrous-feminine, revived from Antiquity into modern mythical forms: the female warrior side as witch-like. We'll quickly⁸² consider this with Amazons—not strictly as "female," but placing the female biological marker onto a larger monomorphic gradient—then move onto more fiery and hellish postcolonial/GNC iterations.

- "On Amazons, Good and Bad": Parts one and two explores Amazons and Medusa—their history of tokenization and resistance, and how they manifest currently under state influence; i.e., as something to offer different unequal power fantasies, during the cryptonymy process; e.g., Gal Gadot's Wonder Woman and James Cameron's Aliens.
- "A Paucity of Time: Addressing the Rest of the Demon Module's Relative Brevity": Explains why the rest of the Demon Module will have more of a conversational, symposium style; also covers some points of holistic study and mutual informed labor exchange (collaboration), which the rest of the module will continue focusing on.
- "I'll See You in Hell": Goes beyond the earthly realms of classic Amazons, giving these warrior-whore sex demons more of an openly hellish character (that still yields the same ludo-Gothic BDSM devices): dark faeries and demon (muscle) mommies.

Both are monstrous-feminine beings "of nature," thus endemic to capital alienating and fetishizing nature-as-monstrous-feminine for profit; i.e., kettling it and capitalizing on its revenge by triangulating against different marginalized groups inside the larger persecution networks' series of preferential treatment during reactive abuse. As we proceed, I invite you to think of each having a shared cause: liberation under duress effecting all marginalized peoples, and bravery and courage (of an Amazonian or demonic mommy sort) each take myriad forms!

(artist: Aria Rain)

⁸² I say "quickly" because given my extended interest in Amazons, you should recognize many of the intersecting refrains inside referring to arguments and ideas from older books in this series; this is merely a taste—barely even a survey on all I've written about them. I love strong women/monstrous-feminine at large!

Prefacing Medusa: to Bay

A quick note about the Medusa section: It was written based on my PhD work, but also with my partner's help, in supervising the final drafts/proofreads. Just as Bay co-wrote small portions of my PhD but haunts the entire document, their presence is felt here as well; i.e., as a non-binary Indigenous bio-diversity ecologist with an interest in ancient legends, including Medusa. Despite coming from the ancient world, Medusa isn't really a woman, but nature itself as monstrous-feminine; i.e., struggling to be free from capital, from Cartesian thought, heteronormativity and settler colonialism as things presently stand. She involves vague, broad, and ultimately interchangeable-yet-highly-visible poetic ideas that give me difficulty from time-to-time, which Bays lends sparkling clarity regarding:

(artist: Bay Ryan)

On Amazons, Good and Bad, part one: Always a Victim (feat. Medusa, Aliens)

Witchcraft accusations, in fact, are the ultimate mechanism of alienation and estrangement as they turn the accused—still primarily women—into monstrous beings, dedicated to the destruction of their communities, therefore making them undeserving of any compassion and solidarity.

—Silvia Federici (cited from "Hot Allostatic Load," 2015).

(artist: The 1Medusa)

The Gothic (in)famously concerns itself with abject (us-versus-them) division, doubles, broken boundaries, homes and ontological grey area, nature alienated by capital to monstrous vengeful extremes during liminal expression, cryptonymy and similar poetic devices furthering abjection through Gothic fakery (the ghost of the counterfeit). As such, this section is less about thesis—beyond how state forces alienate, fetishize, and exploit nature as monstrous-feminine—and more a survey of Amazons and Medusa "in the wild," vis-à-vis demonic language; re: pertaining to unequal, forbidden exchange and transformation, either factor speaking dialectically-materially to revenge as a matter of desire, which demon lovers ultimately are. Medusa is our Numinous queen—a dark source of ancient power for the state to siphon from, and us to revive in "ancient" forms of unequal size (our queen's booty fruitful and massive, above); she turns capital on its head. She isn't any one thing, but all oppressed yearning to be free.

Capital rapes to profit; profit motive is the rape motive of nature-as-monstrous-feminine through police violence defending private property in bad faith (all cops rape; some, like Kamala Harris [or those unironically supporting them⁸³], do so under the "law and order" argument). In practice, "monstrous-feminine" means anything that isn't a white cis-het Christian European man (or things emulating that idea, through Man Box), moving money through nature during the abjection process and its revenge arguments: "Medusa is alien, thus evil," albeit in ways that preface her mere existence as reprobate, damned—one that rapes the West merely by existing inside a prison environment under crisis (the state of exception) expanded to the world at large (and shrinking during state decay).

Inside said prison, Medusa is a whore, but also a witch, goblin and vampire of the blood libel argument as tailored into a neoliberal settler refrain, and both cannot be suffered to live but must always exist to suffer in some shape or form. Medusa must always be a victim and a scapegoat, but also a demonic (rapacious, shapeshifting) threat that can be killed by token agents gaslighting, gatekeeping, girlbossing nature; re: Amazons. The latter adopt a "prison sex" mentality inside concentric prisons/persecution networks: blame the whore, assigning shame, guilt and similar debilitating emotions to them as a biology but also an identity to attack. This arbitration paradoxically includes assigning value; i.e., something to harvest despite its hellish guise, which cops then enforce in centrist refrains.

⁸³ E.g., Legal Eagle ("The Most Important Election of Our Lifetimes," 2024); i.e., the Omelas refrain. Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

In response, the state treats nature as monstrous-feminine strawman/false flag, raping it out of revenge during a pre-emptive strike, kettling the whore; i.e., through its token police, Amazons pimping nature, turning nature into a perpetual victim per Medusa triggering revenge by simply being the thing the state wants to attack (a zombie). As demons, all Amazons give rape (violence and terror during unequal exchange) as half-alien and Medusa receives it as wholly alien from Amazons playing at cop/acting like men (military servants for the state, upholding patriarchal structures; i.e., as Perseus did, killing Medusa in her sleep, except Amazons are classically uprooted from their own culture and forced to assimilate, gelded post-diaspora). But the state reverses all of this on its face through DARVO; i.e., dressed up as "rapist," Medusa becomes a peach, pumpkin (or some such crop/merchandise) to harvest through rape by the state claiming "self-defense"; i.e., rape in disguise, expressed in dualistic, revenge-fantasy settler arguments (often torture, captivity and death). It's obscurantism, blaming the whore to assert control over her and all she represents: "She's the rapist! 'Get' (rape) her!" "Woman is other" extends to "nature is other."

In demonic terms, this comes from flesh expressed with flesh, but also stand-ins for flesh speaking to flesh demonized (and vice versa): an alien invader in both directions, reifying to nature-as-queer through blood libel and sodomy.

(artist, left: Leeza; right: Grand-Sage)

I'll oblige (a makeshift Amazon thesis built on older⁸⁴ thesis arguments; indented for emphasis):

Profit requires victims; capital alienates and sexualizes everything to move money through nature-as-whore, "whore" being a combination of alien and monstrous-feminine pimping by cops playing the victim; re: us-versus-them, antagonizing nature and putting it to work as cheaply as possible. As actual victim, nature has her revenge by thwarting profit through the whore's paradox—in short, enacting Gothic Communism by being a whore (thus alien and monstrous-feminine) in ways the elite cannot fully tokenize/monopolize. For the state, sex is highly regulated through force during abjection as a kind of mirror argument, its mirror syndrome projecting rape onto symbols of colonization doubling as colonial victims; i.e., Medusa is both a hauntological, cryptonymic, abject symbol for imperial abuse pushed by cops onto state victims right now.

⁸⁴ The entire "Idle Hands" subdivision borrows from my PhD's arguments, and its style of color-coding and emboldening its keywords.

To it, capital rapes nature as monstrous-feminine, inciting rape against the victim dressed up as eternal profligate scapegoat; i.e., Medusa classically receives rape from state forces, including Amazons who give rape to Medusa as a form of tokenized revenge exchange under a police umbrella; re: against nature-as-monstrous-feminine (queer) per the abjection process.

In response, Medusa reverses abjection to have her own revenge on the Aegis, but again, does so per the whore's paradox; i.e., as dualistic—meaning she is both what cops want her to be (an enemy of good nature/the state that fights back against them, hence threatens "rape" in ways they can brutalize for profit), and by being what they want her to be, is always illegitimate in ways that serve state interests. By seemingly crossing them when she's actually just minding her own business (under criminogenic conditions, mind you), her resisting of their rape accusations (and disingenuous labels) become part of the same inescapable death warrant. The state grants their scapegoat some latitude (wiggle room), releasing their grip provided money flows through nature to uphold state monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital—which means tightening it just as quickly (to pump their grip). Medusa wants out; those with power will be there, expanding what they wish to cut up into pieces time and time again: a pig fattened for the slaughter only to be carved up by police forces.

For our purposes, this praxis poetically expresses in a dualistic, doubled form of Gothic poetry called Amazonomachia (which I generalize as "monster battle"). Subjugated Amazons assist in avenging the state against Medusa to maintain capital. Medusa (manufactured disorder) makes the middle class pearl-clutch, tokenize and punch down at state victims, betraying their fellow workers while acting oppressed, themselves; i.e., fascism and moderacy per a centrist, neoliberal refrain. They seek revenge against nature by giving rape to Medusa, who receives rape as something that threatens revenge in the eyes of the middle class enacting gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss.

Subversive Amazons accomplish their revenge through a physically violent, demonic kind of rape-revenge symbolism: reversing state forms with the same language—one tied to a sisterly sense of stewardship over the land while likewise belonging to it as raped by settler-colonizers blaming the victim/scapegoat; i.e., emasculation/captive fantasies, aka "death by Snu-Snu" (often likened to "castration" in psychoanalysis, but not always literal any more than Medusa's "decapitation" is). In short, their justice is poetic, using ludo-Gothic BDSM to anisotropically reverse the common flow of violence, deftly reclaiming themselves and their homes as alien rebels hoisting empire on its own petard. Such delicious (and grim) reversals double/deliver with all the usual euphemistic, mix-and-match plays on words known to medieval and quasi-medieval (Gothic) theatre⁸⁵.

(artist: In Case)

Amazons and Medusa are my jam (with me writing "Medusa" last and sharing her first, in my usual backwards style). The rest of this subdivision divides in two, then. This section, part one, talks about the cops-and-victims relationship between Amazons and Medusa, and how these roles have transformed from the mid-20th century onwards (unfolding like origami, or a multi-stage rocket). Part two, will talk about reclaiming them. The emphasis throughout is critical-thinking skills, less so than documenting specific historical events.

Continuing into part one, though, I want to consider some history and poetics before looking at how token Amazons police Medusa; re: raping her per state DARVO arguments. First, we'll look at their mutual aesthetic, followed by their poetic history, tokenistic concerns and dialectical-material tensions—i.e., as they evolved into dogma/counterculture discussions about rape—then move onto how these exist under neoliberal Capitalism vis-à-vis Cameron's refrain (re: Aliens, Metroidvania, shooters). After that, I'll give my personal thoughts on Medusa (as someone evoked constantly in this project), and consider different, additional forms of her Numinous architecture; re: "She's a brick house!"

- The Basics/Aesthetics
- Poetic History
- Tokenization
- Dialectical-Material Tension \(mirror syndrome reprise\)

⁸⁵ E.g., Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (1597):

Sampson: 'Tis all one. I will show myself a tyrant.
When I have fought with the men,
I will be civil with the maids; I will cut off their heads.

Gregory: The heads of the maids?

Sampson: Ay, the heads of the maids, or their maidenheads.
Take it in what sense thou wilt (source).

- Amazons under Neoliberal Capitalism \(re: Cameron's refrain\)
- Medusa, My Thoughts Personally
- Second Breakfast: Further Forms of the Medusa
- Facing Death: the Aegis Opens!

The Basics/Aesthetics

Note: Neither Amazons nor Medusa are strictly female; i.e., the monstrous-feminine can be any sex and gender it wants/needs to be. I'll be sticking to "female/woman" in part because it's the classic model, but also because I identify with these monsters as a trans woman! Even so, Medusa isn't merely the opposite end of a heteronormative binary pimping nature to enslave it, but an inclusive spectrum reminding the Patriarchy how false, illusory and impotent their binary actually is; i.e., "[nature] is ours only when we have it, when it is owned by us" (re: Marx, modified by me to camp him for not being gay enough). Nature is queer/alien in ways we must reclaim, hugging the alien, thus Medusa as queer under straight state models (which historically abuse nature and queerness). —Perse

Though Amazons and Medusa currently exist under a GNC monstrous-feminine umbrella that isn't exclusively female, they remain historically female beings of Antiquity per the ancient canonical laws. This comes with a particular look that, while certainly hauntological (re: "ancient"), is pretty consistent in its classical forms. Any genderqueer forms that emerge will subvert canon, their combined aesthetics speaking to what is classically pleasing to the eye, but also terrifying!

Before we proceed, then, let me plant a picture in your mind, a seed to grow into something that—for us in the present world, attracted to the imaginary past in "ancient" forms—has crystalized into something workers (genderqueer or not) often take for granted: Amazons are phallic women—big, strong female givers of violence (usually described as captivity and rape); they're here to kickass and chew bubblegum, and they're all outta bubblegum. Medusa is the Archaic Mother—a mean demon/dragon lady personifying hysteria/wandering womb with snakes for hair and a petrifying gaze (or acid for blood, spikes and other defense/anti-predation mechanisms doubling as forms of attack during rape arguments), who, by so much as looking at you, turns you to stone (for fear of death/rape); placed on Athena's Aegis, she's known as much for being a severed head as a monster or symbol of female rage/monstrous-feminine resistance: a weapon of revenge.

We'll unpack all of this, but that's basically what they look like. Amazons consistently appear more human than Medusa. Furthermore, Amazons are androgynous through gender performance, first and foremost; Medusa's biology is arguably intersex, but speaks to andro/gynodiversity at large, which TERFs love to police: biology through sex work, connecting biology to sex and gender, and both of those things to themselves during false rebellion.

Expounding on that, Amazons are ancient, statuesque symbols; i.e., of rebellion and assimilation doubling as feminist revolt in the 20th century that, in tokenized forms, bend the knee and uphold colonial violence by raping Medusa (re: Man Box, triangulation, acting like a man). As phallic strongwomen, their powerful demonic bodies can threaten men with unequal exchange, but they cannot transform/change shape (normally—they're still expected to defeat Medusa by becoming Medusa, giving Amazons a cursed status worthy of exile or execution; re: the euthanasia effect). Furthermore, they were defeated in battle by men and married to their kings/put to work by men. Their rebellion is generally one of white middle-class people and cis-het/cis-queer feminism expressed since Marston's sleeper 1940s BDSM revival into the '60s, '70s, '80s and beyond. But by the '80s, neoliberalism happened and its cartographic refrains recruited said married prisoners into neoconservative, Heinlein-style Cold Warriors; i.e., policing not only the central nucleus from invasion, but the outermost forts on the rim of empire—at the frontier during colonial proxy war protecting private property from rape by the barbarian side (a personified DARVO argument, made by capital towards its victims): unironic givers of revenge rape to nature-as-monstrous-feminine, a preemptive strike.

To some degree, then, Amazonian violence became legitimate because it served capital/was committed ostensibly by white married women (and token normativities)—married to the job if not to actual men; re: warrior princesses, knights, and bounty hunters. They became TERFs of the first and second wave, recuperating resistance to serve the elite by attacking "evil" nature; re: subjugated Amazons being controlled-opposition witch cops, refusing to be victims by triangulating against state enemies/uncontrolled opposition, thereby giving rape back to the already-raped refusing to bend the knee: because Amazons fear rape themselves, they kiss up and punch down. As inheritors of the Imperial Core's middle class (cooked in the womb), they are "good" witches, seeing Medusa not just on black people, but queer ones and other marginalized communities sharing the same, shadowy surfaces: "good" and "evil" as much value markers to incite merciless witch-hunt violence upon as descriptors of material conditions (and their social-psychosexual elements).

(artist: Winton Kidd)

To that, Medusa is even more of an inkblot; i.e., the older, primal voice of the raped whore/unmarried woman in a dimorphic, binary-gender sense, but also an androgynous alien of civilized grounds that was there all along! The ghost of the counterfeit, she embodies death itself (for the state to fear and abject onto its victims, only for them to give all this anisotropically back)—a Numinous being not defined purely for her trademark snakes-for-hair or intimidating stone gaze, but by her dark, feral, wild status as monstrous-feminine; i.e., what her assorted embodiments stand for when they emerge from the shadows: the black mirror reflecting her victimization by state forces, shattering their self-righteous veneer on the Aegis! Yet, the duality remains; i.e., she equals jungle fever or queer chasing with irony as much without, a mirror argument we can steal on the Aegis (for our joy and mischief—breaking Capitalist Realism above), but said Aegis is still shared during the abjection and cryptonymy processes.

In other words, Medusa—as the perpetual victim/scapegoat—can threaten rape in any form, mid-exchange, but generally does so by merely existing; i.e., as something that was raped having transformed the victim into a scapegoat, which settler colonialism dogmatizes into its cops during mirror syndrome: "The colonized will seek revenge!" She not only has a good side and a bad side to administer unequal exchange during demon BDSM, but can transform suddenly from calm nature into wild, cute/ugly or happy/furious; re: kawaii vs kowai, warring forever inside/outside herself (and in ways that stunt one's growth; i.e., often inverting appearance and emotion, the Destroyer small and unassuming little girl/princess and the victim big and imposing herbo). This psychomachy reflects not just her internal/external trauma or her status as uncontrolled opposition, but her transition from object to subject to human woman (often by giving her a "glow up," below, or otherwise softening her features/making her easier to be around/witness), which we'll unpack more in a moment when we examine Elizabeth Hadley.

That's the gist. Given her complexity compared to Amazons, though, I'd like to unpack Medusa's analog potential a bit more, in aesthetic terms (seven pages).

(artist: Pinala Flame)

For the rest of the aesthetics portion, we're going to play a little game: "Medusa is." I'm doing so (and breaking the academic Golden Rule of not wasting valuable page space) because, while Persephone is my namesake, Medusa is my goddess. I love her and I want to indulge—specifically in her avatars' "uppity" elements defending the planet by reversing abjection. Medusa isn't modest; she's an immodest symbol of persecution—a big, bad or otherwise dirty girl who loves anal and fucks on the first date, and is someone to punish by the state (the fun police) through modesty arguments (of virtue/vice). She's a whore, a slut, a witch with big hair and a big heart; she's also an androgynous, motherly shadow symbol of power (the dominatrix) to reclaim from the state hunting and farming her as immodest, dark, alien, etc, for themselves: an ancient, paradoxically taboo-yet-ubiquitous death goddess/vice character to "set free" or "wake up," pointing as she does to a better retro-future world (re: pre capitalist ideas helping reify post-scarcity in our imaginations, thus daily lives, unchained from Capitalist Realism). To revive Medusa is to develop Gothic Communism; like sex, you want to communicate well, but also take your time having fun (while having your eye on the clock, as whores do).

Note: For me, Medusa is a hyperobject—a de facto mascot for Gothic Communism, workers/nature and the state as always in conflict. Essentially Mother Nature, while she abstracts and references things both titanic and diminutive (the planet and its inhabitants), we won't explore that size difference here, nor special cases (e.g., the kawaii/kowai inversion), save that smaller forms generally allude to the larger whole. —Perse

In short, while "it ain't easy bein' green," Medusa reflects our innermost human desire: of wanting to be loved, seen, craved, heard, believed, witnessed and defended as a subject, despite being treated as inhuman (for her devilish prurience)—usually. There are exceptions, but we'll get to those! When interacting with Medusa, the sex-positive (thus iconoclastic) idea is to surrender power versus dominating her through police force and repeat rape, lest the world end; i.e., at the hands of a vengeful, old deity coming home to roost after having been woken up (and raped) too many times: Medusa's "coming" while expose home as false, predatory (coming for your nuts); e.g., Macbeth's Dunsinane forest or the kodama from Princess Mononoke, the land taking itself and its monstrous-feminine sovereignty back: land back vs land preservation. Time is a circle; to gaze into the past is to see the future in different possible forms. Except, we're not assimilating Medusa; we're going down to where she is to hear her out!

(artist: Queen Medusa)

To it, Medusa is the out-and-out whore—something that reliably cuts loose, a whistleblower testimony going wild to expose the rapes of the West unto her in ways they and theirs cannot forgive; i.e., not just the whore to bushwack, but the Oracle/Cassandra to foresee disaster beyond Capitalism, which they martyr and closet: during Capitalist Realism, using nuns who were former whores, themselves. Amazons are warrior nuns, saying "Don't you dare!" before getting a guilty wish in while executing their victims; i.e., raping the whore—plundering her land and turning her into a spice, a song, a sex object—before putting the genie back in its bottle, Pandora back in her box. Medusa is a holistic egregore, ontologically broad and outwardly tortured; i.e., meaning she has infinite forms and interpretations, whose rape and revenge either serve profit or don't. To limit her to one and one alone is reductive, harmful.

While nebulous, Medusa is still a demon, and demons, like all monsters, embody positions within a given argument; they reify different vices (or virtues, but usually criminality or sin, expressed as forbidden knowledge) and emotions at war for one side (the state) or the other (workers seeking liberation), as much through comedy and drama kayfabe (wrestler's theatre, on and offstage) as parody and pastiche. She's a corpse for traitors to dig up and attack/rape when she speaks the truth about profit and the state, thus its loyal servants.

For the state, then, Medusa embodies hysteria, which token Amazons are expected to stoically resist/quell during necrophilic rape revenge. She's a pox, a demonic infestation—a criminal, Satanic, trickster, dragon, terrorist, vice character, vermin-zombie⁸⁶ thing to purge and exterminate; i.e., made to answer for imaginary crimes while being forced to turn into whatever the state needs to best demonize/prosecute Medusa, thus make profit happen (dipping the Amazon into Styx, like Achilles). It requires division, but paradoxically cannot entirely alienate workers from nature; instead, it must alienate (divide) then bring them back together during us-versus-them police violence as an oscillating form of praxial tension—one versus the other to put nature (and its dialectical-material tensions) cheaply to work. In turn, these tensions must happen for profit to work, hence the need for heroes, but also hostages and villain/victim/scapegoat; i.e., deserving and undeserving victims. It becomes a question of "state's rights" versus worker rights, the state having a right to defend its profits/property (the damsel-in-distress), thus itself, from workers using police brutality (worker rights being to defend themselves from the state and its violence). The continuous, push-pull antagonization is what moves money through nature; i.e., something the state does repeatedly through Promethean and Faustian narratives, both which inevitably involve Amazons vs the Medusa. They have become inseparable, and cannot be extricated.

For us (and Gothic Communism as a holistic discipline), Medusa is the human condition/ghost of the counterfeit, hence thoroughly immodest according to any aspect of life (and labor) the state would seek to control through police force and unironic demon BDSM during the dialectic of shelter/the alien; i.e., the fat-and-sassy posthuman/postmodern whore writhing in agony and pleasure, a dark counterculture/conduit thereof defying state medicalization and pathologization of so-called "hysteria," wandering womb, female/queer/non-white, etc, orgasms, ⁸⁶ Unlike Amazons, Medusa is chimeric; i.e., she's undead, animalistic and demonic. Like a zombie, she's not just cursed with death, but forced to come back from the grave; in similar terms, a demon doesn't stay dead/in Hell but returns from Hell to pester state forces (or is chased monomythically to Hell by said forces), either to move profit along or choke it in predator/prey language. Like Prometheus, Medusa cannot be killed (state shift being when she devours the Capitalocene), and like Mephistopheles, is always tempting Faust. She is anisotropically terrorist/counterterrorist, canonizing this binary by forwarding abjection or flipping it when reversing abjection (thus power towards or away from the state) during asymmetrical warfare.

public nudism and sex work (or sexualized work; e.g., women's work) as "mythical" and "criminal," thus needing to be contained in various ways that highlight the aforementioned tension; e.g., through humiliation kink, viewers repulsed by the whore on the toilet having spicy taco shits, yet seeking to police that in ways it can commodify and sell back to its constituents. Girls shit, which states alienize and profit off, by design. Antagonize nature-as-whore, then pimp her out as cheaply as possible—discipline and punish sans irony to quell sex positivity in favor of profit⁸⁷.

(artist: Quinn)

Medusa isn't all bark, no bite/all filler, no killer (though Quinn's booty [or mouth] is certainly full, left). Hers (thus ours, Quinn's) nudity (actual or projected onto the surface of clothes/clothes and skin; re, Segewick: the imagery of the surface) is a Numinous weapon we can reclaim, especially as it speaks to what the state will try to rape and control in ways we can subvert and blend in/speak out with during revolutionary cryptonymy and ludo-Gothic BDSM; re: as silly-serious, part-comic, part-drama-/drag-queen. Medusa is a Great Destroyer/death goddess, thus evokes the Numinous, insofar as life and death entwine; for us, this means the palliative Numinous when developing Gothic Communism to escape Capitalist Realism's tenuous control over life to try and cheat death (for the bourgeoisie): Mother Nature as giver/taker of either but growing increasingly incensed by capital, Cartesian men raping Medusa and pushing her towards state shift while trying to extend state life by raping nature. She echoes state mortality, which its rulers cannot stand. They either think themselves immortal, or don't care if they die, so long as they're on top for as long as possible. Born full, always hungry for more. America's a hustle, preying on the dispossessed.

Activating her trap cards, Medusa is a power bottom, playfully-yet-forcefully topping from below—is like the Gothic, very Meatloaf-style rock opera to hit those much-needed highs and lows; i.e., life fucks and then you die:

I am the way
 I am the light
 I am the dark inside the night
 I hear your hopes

⁸⁷ By comparison, my commission of Quinn (above) allowed his partner to come out of her cock cage to perform in a sex tape for this project: to illustrate mutual consent during our labor exchange's sexually descriptive informed consent, raising emotional/Gothic intelligence when reimagining the Wisdom of the Ancients to achieve praxial catharsis, mid-synthesis—of different ideas, cultivating good social-sexual daily habits in the process. Genuine rebellion isn't a daily event, but a horizontal counter structure resisting state forms; i.e., pandemonium.

I feel your dreams
And in the dark, I hear your screams (Savatage's "Believe," 1991).

In the Gothic-Communist aesthetic, Medusa is rape play/consent-non-consent challenging unironic forms (and their Cartesian dualism); she puts "rape" in quotes to speak to rape without quotes—i.e., relieving stress during ludo-Gothic BDSM, camping the canon and heteronormativity in neo-medieval forms of eustress: "storming her castle" because she wants it stormed, making it gay! Paradox! Catharsis! Building trust by tearing down old boundaries and raising new better ones! It's not rocket science, but it does require Gothic reinvention to work in our favor! The state, after all, fears death and farms Medusa to cheat the reaper (re: the Promethean Quest).

Under normal conditions, we're the whores of Omelas, pushing for universal liberation. As such, the aesthete Medusa squats between castle and occupant's mise-en-abyme (aka the belly of the beast); re: the dance hall's beastly masquerade handing out silk scarves (tied to bed posts) and gags (to stifle the screams of "dying" pleasure); i.e., a chronotope of castles-in-the-flesh, morphologically caught betwixt building and effigy speaking to the same dark, monstrous-feminine force—its live burial/graveyard sex aura as "ancient," dug up and reimagined through Gothic fakery tailored to a 21st century world: Bakhtin's dynastic primacy and hereditary rites (of sacrifice and passage). To it, Medusa's libido and license—all curves, wet and wild, rowdy like a Mozart nocturne, vulgar and urbane, yet dumb and fun (the paradox prone to pun and oxymoron alike).

Like a Neo-Gothic cathedral, there's always more to say and add; i.e., movement through her "almost holy" halls (ergodic motion) the name of the game: a place to lose control, but also win it back during calculated risk's castle-narrative. Things normally "set in stone" suddenly become plastic; i.e., in ways that can challenge state dogma/canonical essentialism during class, culture and race war breaking Capitalist Realism. The same liminalities go for statues; re: castle-like bodies and body-like castles both forbidden yet open-for-business, letting alien forces go in either direction: "Put us to the sword, baby!"

(artist: Magic Moonarts)

The Gothic, and Medusa by extension, is weaponized poetry in a neo-medieval age, one speaking to a half-real, none-too-distant, and questionably make-believe past that never really left (which many pretend didn't or couldn't happen back then or now): "We live in Gothic times."

To it, metaphors compare two unlike things, which demons very much do by personifying what is demonized (re: darkness visible): alienated forms of nature to reunite with and humanize once more; re: hugging the alien, Medusa, during the dialectic of the alien's pedagogy of the oppressed, instead of sedating us with her heady (get it?) charms to rape both of us with! The idea isn't to rape rank, but to intersectionally solidarize, making profit/privatization (thus rape) untenable on all registers by finding similarity amid difference. Except, if we "look the part" yet cannot be held in place, the state cannot closet (thus censor/silence) us, and that is where our revenge (camping the canon) takes place: humanize the harvest to expose the state (and its profit motive) as inhumane, thus incompatible with life (and consent) because it must rape life to profit. There must always be a cop defending itself (and the state) from nature, but also rescuing nature from its wicked other self (the princess from the whore, always threatening to possess for nature instead of the state). Silence is genocide, so make some fucking noise! Laugh, cum, bleed, get mad! Take your land/peach (and its power) back, girls (and boys, enbies, etc)! ACAB (All Castles Are Bad)! ASAB, the state is straight! Their "protection" is pure dogshit, everyone expendable but the elite; i.e., normalizing genocide, making society sick; e.g., PTSD for combatants who, far from defeating nature, become prisoners of its ghost.

Per the whore's paradox, the Amazon classically takes the yolk (re: Hippolyta marrying Theseus), whereas Medusa is the unbowed rape victim "of nature" by the state; i.e., meaning she's forever radioactive, thus hostile, towards the West and its nuclear model seeking to dominate her without irony! This terror mechanism extends morphologically to her lived violence morphologized—meaning her green⁸⁸/non-white skin, snakes for hair (which men love to project their penises onto), and petrifying gaze having "started it," per Original Sin, but also her unnatural reproductive life cycle assigned to state vermin; i.e., when the Pegasus sprang from her neck after she was killed, itself a cesarean, "somno" rape baby.

During the liminal hauntology of war's diaphanous membrane/grim harvest, all of these non-white/non-straight qualities translate to equally abject, prickly elements reclaimed by GNC forces from TERFs and other cops; e.g., a PAWG fire-breathing dragon or the xenomorph's acid for blood, its parasitoid eggs laid inside our unsuspecting hosts. Yes, cops impersonate their victims and infiltrate their lived/theatrical spaces (the danger disco, Gothic rape castle, etc), but this goes both ways, and doubles invite for troubling comparison. So back off, chuds, or we'll give you space rabies, turning your nuclear home into an ambiguously gay orgy⁸⁹/polycule! Death to America; cum on Medusa's big, beautiful tits!

(artist: Magic Moonarts)

⁸⁸ Re: the color of stigma; e.g., the Wicked Witch of the West.

⁸⁹ Something can appeal to the Male Gaze, be PIV and have white skin, and still be genderqueer towards universal liberation; re, Sarkeesian's adage: enjoy the pleasurable qualities to problematic media, but do not endorse their harmful qualities; camp them!

O, the horror and mixed feelings of Gothic-Communist rape-and-death therapy! Less about camping holocaust and more to camp our profound survival, mid-aftercare, its trauma lives in the body and all around us as things to unevenly police per embedded state persecution networks; i.e., as black-to-white livestock, reclaiming the Base and recultivating the Superstructure through sex controlled by force. As that curiously alien fire of the gods, it's ambrosia normally paywalled and cloaked in masculine/feminine division and mystique, but also monstrous-feminine symbols of strength and yielding to said strength (again and again, because we're sluts); e.g., Gothic novels promoting sex at the start, middle and end, but also showing and hiding it per the cryptonymy process: "Oh, yeah! That's it! Fuck that pussy! That all you got?" Medusa goads you, gripping the headboard as you ravish her just the way she likes. "Watch these titties bounce! My thighs, booty and tum! Jiggly flan! So tasty!" The world is Gothic, whereupon rape and sex (quotes or no quotes) lurk everywhere, on the surface of and inside. It is what it is.

Amongst other things, then, Medusa is a goddess of nature; i.e., depicting the ways that beings of nature want to be loved and feared, but also savored and worshipped more generally as givers of "death" in small. Our liberatory appetites, then, are always couched within the state exploiting us, and us liberating ourselves as Medusa, responding to older industry forms' guilty and privileged fantasies: where Medusa traditionally "belongs."

(artist: Victoria Paris)

It's a peep show of the whore's bedroom eyes, exposed merchandise, and fucking outside the bedroom: her hungry hand guiding you inside, those lips-that-grip keeping you there; grabbing the bedrails while getting railed, hyphenating the language of sex and force, war and food, decay and death, etc. Sex is a weapon, one for which Medusa's animalistic camping of rape (rawr) needs to become second-nature; i.e., mirroring our abuse to prevent its unironic continuation. Our cryptonymy must camp the state's, including its Sales of Indulgence unfolding right before our very eyes; i.e., while it happens in front of and behind the whore standing in for the theatre curtain's Black Veil (exposing its double standards and killing our darlings to rescue them; e.g., the predatory treatment of white girls vs non-white girls, but also white girls having non-white qualities: Victoria, above)! Otherwise, the state will segregate us.

Instead of being rightly seen as defense mechanisms against rape, though, the state makes Medusa's aesthetic abject, her rape and rage uncontrolled/turned into a dark reflection hanging over Amazonian heads, thus capital's: a revelation/reckoning uncovering the state's true purpose. She becomes wild, kaiju-style, as much by looking at things pointing to past versions of herself, thus returned to normal by monomythical force "preventing the apocalypse." Everything plays out on the Aegis, in the shadow zone, as contested; re: "In place of a dark lord, you would have a queen!" Fucking oath!

Through capital, then, rape is rape as something to give or receive through predictable police models, but whose busy and confusing historical-materialism took time to evolve into itself—from object to subject, yes, but also colonized subjects being pitted against objectified recipients of selective police violence; i.e., in unequal ways that historically sell out by attacking themselves, ranking rape; re: "Haven't I suffered enough?"; e.g., Afrocentrism rightly mistrusting white feminism, but abjecting all feminism/white people in the process. Instead of a united front against the elite, we arrive at competing voices speaking out against empire while also being internally at odds—those who had gentrified and decayed, versus those they denied the chance to evolve, relegating their political enemies to the dark shadow zone of Capitalist Realism. One side is always controlled opposition, the other always uncontrolled to a matter of degree—one collared with a longer leash, the length of said leash made to justify these kinds of us-versus-them conflicts/unproductive "perfect victim" arguments; their divisions are manufactured, as are their violent arbitrations and token, marginalized hair-splitting.

Tokenism doesn't preclude reclamation. However, such canon and camp had to evolve into where they are, including discussions about rape as a taboo subject that, all the same, must occur under capital for profit to happen (and which we must challenge to liberate ourselves with). Before we give neoliberalism a deeper look, then, let's further consider the poetic history, tokenistic considerations and dialectical-material tensions of Amazons and Medusa, including how I approach them as a Gothic-Communist scholar, sex worker and activist.

Poetic History

Whores aren't inherently bad; the state makes them bad in ways it can police. While Medusa is alive and well under Capitalism—is arguably the most famous monster stemming from the ancient world, abbreviating nature as raped—it's important to remember she embodies death unto the victims "of nature" by civilization. She's the madwoman in the attic, smiling at the gods and their absurdity (sex work not for the faint of heart)!

Even so, this man-vs-nature dialog also evolved over time, insofar as Medusa is an incredibly old legend (made from clay and other demonic materials of the ancient world; e.g., marble, above, fashioning shadowy dollish likenesses to our Numinous, magnetic nightmares); i.e., one about poetic discussions of rape that Barbara Creed sought to tie into third wave feminism using Freudian psychoanalysis (especially the Archaic Mother concept, from "Medusa's Head," 1929), Kristeva's process of abjection and film studies, which I expanded in my PhD beyond "just (white, cis-het) women" (and films) to anything "othered" under Western multimedia domination; re (from Volume Zero):

Canon is classically framed as immutable, eternal—literally "outside of time"—but it isn't. It can be altered, changing history through the wider interpretation and genesis of popular legends, but also the material conditions that respond to them and vice versa (the Base and the Superstructure). Capital historically-materially alienates owners from workers and workers from each other and themselves through Cartesian dualism (with owners being collectively afraid of the poor and siding with "their own kind" as the persons they are born growing up with; i.e., other rich people they identify with and see as friends): an entire system of thought as built around the essential binding of sex and gender to each other and human biology (skin color and sex organs), which is coded to have various "correct" qualities (such as "Christian" or "cis-het") when utilized in the "correct" fashion: towards the profit motive. There is an ostensible "other" who is murdered instead of the state defender killing them, but in truth, the soldier is completely expendable. Everything sits within a cycle of imaginary history that plays out through an endless, genocidal mirroring that must, if it is to cease, be met with mirrors:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

These particular mirrors (and their reflections' visions) become a way of seeing the world that isn't Promethean; i.e., they upend the infamous hubris of the Patriarchy without joining canon's process of abjection:

When Perseus slew the Medusa he did not—as commonly thought—put an end to her reign or destroy her terrifying powers. Afterwards, Athena embossed her shield with the Medusa's head. The writhing snakes, with their fanged gaping mouths, and the Medusa's own enormous teeth and lolling tongue were on full view. Athena's aim was simply to strike terror into the hearts of men as well as reminding them of their symbolic debt to the imaginary castrating mother. And no doubt she knew what she was doing. After all, Athena was the great Mother-Goddess of the ancient world and according to ancient legend—the daughter of Metis, the goddess of wisdom, also known as the Medusa (source: Barbara Creed's The Monstrous-Feminine, 1993).

Gothic Communism goes further than Julia Kristeva or Barbara Creed. Our "Medusa" doesn't play into the elite's scheme of weaponized trauma; i.e, the TERF surrendering her neck and, once beheaded, staring blindly and furiously at the underclass (dressed up to shock the formerly abused with a disingenuous threat of rape, of the shame of unwanted pregnancies projected onto a racialized, genderqueer "other": the man-in-a-dress, or their murderous, womb-like haunt). Nor does she segregate and "play ball" through compelled modesty/invisibility and tokenism of various doubled kinds.

Instead, our complicated monster heroine uses dialectical-material scrutiny to parse which is which, combining the awesome power of her reclaimed body and its labor to actively petrify the profit motive while blending in with it [...] In doing so, she utilizes the bizarre, recycled conventions (anyone who says, "truth is stranger than fiction" has never read a Gothic novel before) to actively encourage/incite degrowth—i.e., a so-called "Jewish revenge" against fascism and the state by borking its profit motive, in this life or the next: through a sex-positive counterterrorism that exposes the state's usual terror weapons and fictions [...] All the while, our Medusa has some semblance of safety because she will be viewed as human behind the looking glass (which serves as a buffer between her and the audience), being seen as something her would-be-killers will not sacrifice because they love her (source: "Author's Foreword").

To it, "striking terror" means many different things, and these merge with different qualities of the monstrous-feminine that are repulsive and attractive regarding rape as something to perform (the Medusa being a giant Numinous whole expressed by various offshoots). Amazons generally give rape as heroic warriors refusing to be victims by punching down, and Medusa gives it back, punching up on the same Aegis while being tortured/having survived older holocausts; either can forward or reverse abjection, but the polarity of such exchanges depends entirely on how.

As we've said, the Medusa legend itself is quite old, stemming from the Ancient Greeks to the Romans inheriting their stories, and for which Medusa herself underwent a long transformation from weapon to monster to human-appearing monster woman talking about rape. As Elizabeth Hadley writes in "More than a Monster: Medusa Misunderstood" (2024):

(artist: Sam Milnes)

You might know her from Caravaggio's famous Medusa, the face of Versace, the book, Percy Jackson and the Olympians, or some other adaptation of the ancient myth. Medusa is ubiquitous, appearing in Greek and Roman literature (from Hesiod's Theogony to Ovid's Metamorphoses) and in architecture, metalwork, vases, sculptures, and paintings throughout history. Yet the most well-known portrayals of her all predictably converge upon one brief moment from her life's story: her beheading and the use of her decapitated head by a man to petrify others. Medusa then becomes an apotropaic symbol warding off evil, similar to the evil eye. She is imagined more often as an object or a monster than as a human. Even though Classical and Hellenistic depictions presented Medusa as more human than in the previous Archaic period, the popular conception of Medusa today still upholds her "otherness," her monstrosity. Modern-day artists have embraced Medusa as an emblem of female power, a beautiful monster, and used her story in the service of social movements; for example, Luciano Garbati's Medusa with the Head of Perseus went viral in 2020 in connection with the #MeToo movement (source).

In turn, Hadley highlights the evolution of Medusa in three distinct cases:

- CASE 1: MEDUSA AS YOU KNOW: Medusa's more typical depictions feature her on a shield or as a decapitated head with snakes for hair. This first case highlights the Medusa you most likely know and learned in school or from a mythology book: Medusa as a monster, an object, a weapon. A head, a symbol, never a woman. Terrifying, never beautiful.
- CASE 2: THE TRANSITION OF MEDUSA: This case highlights the spectrum of Medusas, starting with the Greek version of the myth in which she is nothing more than a monster and moving towards a more human and feminine portrayal. These works of art highlight the nuance that is buried in Medusa's myth, and the numerous ways in which artists have chosen to render Medusa.

- CASE 3: MEDUSA AND RAPE: MORE WOMAN THAN MONSTER: Most audiences today who are familiar with the traditional character of Medusa don't know anything at all about her past or have misconceptions of the origins of her curse. In Ovid's Metamorphoses, the reason Medusa is metamorphosed into a Gorgon is because Neptune rapes her in Athena's temple. Instead of blaming Neptune, Athena punishes the beautiful Medusa for the violation of her temple, and curses her by transforming her from a maiden into a monster. Although Ovid is the first author to truly humanize Medusa by telling this story, he only does so within the context of the myth of Perseus and Andromeda. In that tale, Ovid emphasizes Perseus as the heroic male protagonist who retells Medusa's origin story after he's used her severed head as a weapon to save the endangered Andromeda.

Only one book in all of Rauner's many editions of Ovid's Metamorphoses contains the actual scene of Neptune raping Medusa, a microcosm for the reception of her story in art and literature. Whereas acts of rape in many other Greek myths are well-known and central to an understanding of their narratives, Medusa's is historically hidden and underrepresented. Instead, she is known for her beheading by heroic Perseus and for the people and monsters she petrifies both before and after her death. She is known for the terror she elicits and not her beauty or womanhood. As the books in this case demonstrate, even when Medusa's rape is illustrated, it is minimized, especially when compared to other representations of rape from Ovid's Metamorphoses, particularly at the level of body language (ibid.).

In other words, the idea that a whore could even be raped evolved into itself (from a monstrous force of nature/undead weapon to monstrous-feminine human victim), as did the awful reality that whores could rape each other in service to the Man—let alone talk about it to challenge capital with (re: the whore's paradox/revenge)! But in the Gothic tradition, repression goes hand-in-hand with liminality insofar as something is both buried, and cryptonymically exposed, by making it something that cannot divide terror or violence from nature (woman or otherwise); i.e., as a demonic giver and receiver of such terrorist/counterterrorist treatment: Medusa both punished and protected by Athena as Medusa-in-duality (a mutual, ouroborotic embodiment of the status quo and Archaic Mother), and whose shield is likewise abused by TERFs long after Medusa's original demise.

Embodied by Medusa, the imaginary past is loaded with contradiction and baggage alike, allowing us to change/recreate the myth to suit our purposes without effacing the actual historical abuse (and value) it poetically speaks to. Medusa isn't just female or white; her alien fetishized qualities speak to all manner of opposed peoples—i.e., abused per the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection committed by subjugated Amazons (and cops at large) against GNC, Pagan, non-white offshoots of the Medusa; re (from Volume Zero, exhibit 1a1c):

(...I don't want to focus on vagina dentata or literal breeding crises in the classical, Neo-Gothic sense; my book aims to go thoroughly beyond Barbara Creed's somewhat dated and limited, biological-/cis-centric view of the monstrous-feminine/"woman as other" [...] So while it's true that the phrase "phallic woman" traditionally denotes a war-like woman, huntress or vengeful monstrous-feminine, I want to stress how subjugated Amazons aren't just aggressively and physically violent towards cis-het, sexist men; they've radicalized inside a "prison sex" mentality to become hostile towards "outsider" groups, including trans people, while seeing themselves as the universal victims that tacitly yield to their conquerors by emulating their worst habits [exhibit 41g1a2].

(artist: Mizugi Buns)

As such, I want to expand on how the monstrous-feminine can also non-binarize to illustrate the gender-non-conforming idea of a non-violent trans, intersex or enby person; i.e., someone who refuses to be a victim without embodying the standard-issue implements of violence and war from conventional stories [including TERF examples: the blind, indiscriminate Medusa]. Instead, they can be nymph-like and soft, their penis a reclaimed source of shame/codified rape [mine was] and their monomorphic body offering up other gender-non-conforming surprises to boot. They become a dark being of chaos to sincerely-but-ironically worship relative to how they camp current heteronormative standards that abject such beings; i.e., as would have been the case before Cartesian thought came and binarized everything [source: "Symposium: Aftercare"].)

We want to expand Medusa's transformation story—of being raped, then raped and murdered while pregnant in her sleep for being a whore—beyond state forces weaponizing rape in reactionary-to-moderate forms during controlled opposition; re: through the Amazonian myth whitewashing the monstrous-feminine while treating Medusa as the eternal punching bag thereof, hence abusing the overall shock value of violence against nature in the Shadow of Pygmalion: into a state terror weapon directed at women/female parties to tokenize them, pitting Galatea against herself. It's canonically bad medicine for a problem caused by the plaguedoctors; i.e., a threat of rape injected into white women's menticed brains: false power through military optimism, neoliberal canon portraying Medusa as a gay Communist bug fetish that reproduces through ovipositor rape/traumatic penetration (the Queen "checking" Bishop, left, being the Promethean destruction of servile technology similar to Scott's Prometheus):

All in all, it's a presumption of guilt by those TERF-y she-chuds raping Medusa and treating her as inhuman, biomechanical insect (devaluing both species). Ripley the blue-collar worker batters the scapegoat heel in vaso vagal fetish gear (with Nazis and Communists occupying the same shadow space). The whole cycle not only repeats, but operates through steady ignorance and bad history as a regressive worldview to foist onto others; e.g., "What are birds? We just don't know!"; i.e., Ripley is a killing machine armed to the teeth and fighting an imaginary evil: Domino Theory (a metaphor for CIA activity in U.S. satellite regions). What happens abroad also happens at home.

For us, rape isn't something to see and attack by dehumanizing rape victims (which Communists generally are); we must listen and humanize those who have been raped, while also recognizing their subhuman, taboo, demonized statuses. If capital abjects rape to extend profit by blaming its own victims, mid-harvest, then we must expose that, too. Equality must be universal, including the equal ability to weaponize demonic counterterror (and rape revenge) against state doubles; i.e., playing at Omelas rockstars colonizing genocide dressed up as sex, drugs and rock 'n roll (themselves stolen from colonial spaces and turned on marginalized groups). We camp canon because we must—lest capital decay and do unto each of us what happened to the Medusas of yore, of the here-and-now under various double standards.

Think of it like Halloween, except it's not tied to the holiday—at least not exclusively. Rather, nature is something to rape under a system that goes boom-or-bust on a routine, accelerating pendulum. In turn, the Imperial Boomerang sails home, bringing Imperialism home to empire, aka fascism. The liminal hauntology of war is a castle that moves in place; i.e., wherein the membrane of Capitalist Realism grows thin, showing the horrors of settler colonialism to the inheritors of empire embodying those concepts. They see them as Medusa on the Aegis, and like Halloween's thinning of the veil releasing evil spirits between the world of the living and the land of the dead, coopt said things to incite moral panic. Capital decays to defend itself from its own victims, seeking revenge against nature as vengeful; i.e., a whore's revenge, which means to incite growth or degrowth in practice. This happens through the language of monsters, for or against capital.

As we've established, the historical elements (and all-around campy side) of Amazons and Medusa became more and more human in appearance, less biomechanical and inhuman. Even so, said process remains dualistic. For the state, Amazons were turned into cops by capital decaying feminism to serve its interests, while abjecting Medusa and her black revenge onto the imaginary past said Amazons could attack; i.e., the revenge of white women by colonial abuses (e.g., tokophobia or spousal abuse) projected during mirror syndrome onto black subjects with a racialized, non-Christian, and GNC Communist flavor! The effect is very much to see what you think is an old abuser and freeze, but also fight!

In short, the Amazon assimilated—was suddenly able to speak to her rape in ways that wouldn't go feral without a leash, leading people to demonize and attack her by first seeing her attack something "even worse"; re: Medusa. In blood-libel terms, this ironically "poisoned the well," turning feminists into unironic Nazis the state could shame and exhibit as demon BDSM; i.e., to conveniently bench, banish or recollar after the grim harvest was over (war brides with a warrior character). They would always be "on call," though. Anticipating Medusa's inexorable return, characters like Ellen Ripley became a modern mantle to pass from one debutante to the next (e.g., Amanda Ripley, in Alien: Isolation, 2014): cutting the giantess down to size, from laborer to land seen as one-in-the-same from the colonizer's perspective!

Doing so happens not to intersectionally solidarize different oppressed groups (which to some degree, white women are), but pit those with more privilege against those with less during the dialectic of shelter and⁹⁰ the alien; re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss; i.e., to divide workers, weakening labor through rape-ranking litigation that tokenizes out of desperation, fear and convenience: to help protect the state's next-in-line as part of a legitimate bloodline's Immaculate Conception.

During this nativity story, the white queen (the Madonna) saves one good white child (Jesus, presented here as a blonde female army brat⁹¹) by first killing hundreds of evil, non-white children: Grendel, the son of Cain, followed by Grendel's mother as having spawned said children out of dead American colonists (whose fatal metamorphosis into Communism is seen as a 1:1 irreversible trade; i.e., the former killing and corrupting the latter through vengeful "reeducation" versus reproducing normally [as humans do] outside parasitoid symbiosis). It's "Alien for men," except Rambo is a woman acting like a man against imperial doppelgangers: female Beowulf, taking names for God and country under a Protestant ethic upholding Christian motherhood (and general family values) through neoliberal force. She's aborting non-white children on the simulation of real-world battlefields ("How many drops is this for you, lieutenant?").

⁹⁰ A Gothic specialty, aka the haunted house narrative; i.e., my neighbor is an alien/my house is an alien—the land as alien from colonizer/occupying army's perspective, black reclaiming white, mid-hauntology. The boundaries between cop/criminal start to fissure and dissolve, the violence escalating. Capital moves money through nature, which becomes a land of madness, a tone poem/German Expressionism, a nebulous crime expressed through quantum excitement and dread. Through holistic expression, we return to the scene to get to the bottom of things; homes, in Gothic, are people and, like people, have something to hide and reveal per the cryptonymy process (we'll look into the detective aspects—of Aliens and the Gothic heroine—in another subchapter).

⁹¹ The blueprint for Samus' origin story, released years after Metroid came out.

The Gothic classically embeds and elides bodies and buildings in war-game language; i.e., chess, but concentric. For example, Newt—as sole survivor—is elevated to princess status, mid-rebellion. The film's damsel-in-distress, she's a doll inside a dollhouse (each having a hidden military function that returns under martial law) who, similar to Jesus (the sacrificial lamb), is "killed in the sequel"; to rescue Newt during Aliens' Beowulf-style impunity and momentum-shift rebounds, Ripley the Amazon self-righteously kills droves of dark aliens (which Cameron presents as faceless invaders on their own land—monolithic, imitative offshoots of a dark original [which the colonizers imitate] who "doesn't value human life the same way"). Doing so isn't to save Newt from instant or even eventual death, but from rape and parasitoid transformation being a fate worse than death assigned to her by state forces; i.e., by switching sides from white to black, turning the nuclear order upside down: to be trapped in Hell, sitting by the West's abjection of their own crimes onto a dark, female, deserving victim of state force—the Medusa. She's a black, castle-like body inside a body-like castle, mise-en-abyme, but also a liminal space in the architectural sense: something to move through and sterilize, but also spread her evil-coded likeness across the colonial universe.

Medusa is androgynous, phallic, disobedient—by and large unafraid of the West and its poisonous (and militant) ideas of motherhood, thus happy to saber-rattle and dick-measure with white opposites (dueling moms)! In turn, Ripley ain't no queer space Commie, and is gonna prove it by burying the gay (and, by extension, the state's atrocities): scuttling colony (and slave revolt) in a cloud of nuclear hellfire!

(source: Monster Legacy's "The Alien Queen," 2015)

As usual, Cameron's doomsday (and royal apocalyptic language, left) is nothing new. The Gothic is, since Radcliffe, "terrorist literature" (re: Groom) that concerns the creation of a terrorist identity from the French Revolution, onwards (re: Crawford). Like so many others, then, Cameron shows a Communist Numinous (a female T-Rex with an African tribal mask) grappling with state spectres of competing motherhood; i.e., two hyperobjects cosmically at odds. Framed as two queens (and all the queens' men) killing each other's babies, it's Divine Right/Manifest Destiny taken to hyperbolic extremes—a Great Chain of Being relayed through anti-Communist war film. To check Medusa, Hadley's Hope becomes a half-real colonial territory to both reclaim, but also deny its victims repossession of after America's defeat; i.e., to mark for death and blow to kingdom come, mid-Red-Scare—all to valorize Pax Americana denying its colonial victims land back, onstage and off!

We'll examine Aliens more, in just a moment. The fact remains, every superhero has a supervillain doubling them. The same goes for their associate structures, mid-kayfabe; i.e., Capitalism vs Communism. Doing so is merely another divide-and-conquer strategy recuperating and devaluing feminist language as not only hysterical, but the actual rapists under the Scooby Doo mask, not the elite. It's a bait-and-switch—not simply framing someone else for capital's destabilizing of the world, mid-apocalypse, but making them complicit in settler colonialism to erode any goodwill towards rebellious action (re: Federici, the epigram); i.e., to encourage submission towards capital as it presently is, returning things to normal by poetically keeping them normal in half-real, hierarchical terms. Man rapes woman; woman rapes nature. Nobody likes TERFs, but capital needs them to exist.

(artist: SLBtweety)

To it, white women are bridled once more. Whittled into obedient sex dolls/action figures, then conjured up as shameless lapdogs, they bite other marginalized groups as needed; i.e., cutting their heads off during female circumcision/all-around gender trouble. In doing so, their mutual-if-lopsided hysteria ("they're killing each other") conflates with sexual aggression, hydrophobia (rabies), bitches in heat, and enlarged female genitals outsizing male ones (common in different animal species, like the hyena), or male ones acting feminine to not serve profit as a settler-colonial structure. Gender and biology are a spectrum, not a binary, but states endure by enforcing false binaries; i.e., to yolk/repress andro/gynodiversity and liberatory gender parody/monster bodies, morphological expression and biodiversity at large (above): how bodies appear liminally inside/outside media, produced by the spirit of Medusa (a hag-to-harpy-style virago, but also a slut and younger beautiful woman). Whatever the form, our very existence is ironic, thus criminal per state models/monopolies telling us, more or less, to eat shit and die: "Fat, drunk and stupid is no way to go through life, son." Nothing ever measures up, save that we deserve what we get.

Profit is, at its ghoulish heart, patriarchal, and defines treason through ontological equivocations of military insurrection around a bigoted core; i.e., capital is built on Imperialism and feudalism, including their own bigotries/ethnocentric tools of demonic domination. Under global Capitalism, such systems overlap smaller persecution networks inside larger ones that hauntologically uphold the usual divisions; i.e., routine rapes of nature pursuant to profit, thus genocide as a matter of infinite growth and military expansion during frontier conquest (and witch hunts during military urbanism—when the state of exception shrinks said circumference into the Imperial Core). This selective punishment during reactive abuse tends to target sex workers, poor/non-white people and the homeless (which queer/disabled people often are, doing sex work as much to survive as communicate their humanity and basic human rights; e.g., Bay and Maybel, below). Such tokenized exclusion from SWERFs and TERFs (which are synonymous) further the abjection process through the ghost of the counterfeit; i.e., amounting to the middle class ruthlessly excising/exorcising nature through fear/fascination arguments with the colonized; re: equal rights for all, therefore land back, demonized by state proponents seeing those things as "rape" (of the bourgeoisie, their masters) under Capitalist Realism!

(artist, left: Maybel Syrup; right: Bay Ryan)

In short, anything immodest that threatens profit is charged, DARVO-style, as "rape" by the elite and their traitors selling rebellion out (thus pimping it out to its usual benefactors, be they white men/women, or token parties looking to assimilate by leading witch hunts against other witches; i.e., during the moral panics of settler argumentation). Capital is always harvesting nature; Medusa appears during fascism attacking Communism (the grim harvest), and is sacrificed to return things to back to normal—to make her children (workers) less rowdy, swollen, haunted, whatever.

But the same cryptonymy (and Freudian mumbo-jumbo) can be reclaimed by us from complicit forms; i.e., by using the Amazon or Medusa to exact her whore's revenge by breaking the profit motive (thus Capitalist Realism), humanizing the harvest quite literally! Amazons have their revolutionary whore's revenge by refusing to tokenize and attack Medusa; Medusa has hers by humanizing her monster-mom anger in ways that expose the men behind the curtain: inciting reactionary abuse between different oppressed peoples, and what they give birth to. Pimps can't police whores for the state on their own, but require them to police themselves, historically-materially. This includes their poetry.

Keeping with our examination—of Medusa's evolving poetic history—she is a dark mother goddess having adapted to speak out in modern times against state inequalities (concerning life and death as things to give); i.e., to her continued demonic exploitation overlapping with a new voice, one that speaks out Numinously against rape for all oppressed parties (not just white women). In doing so, her pedagogy of the oppressed devises monsters that challenge state monopolies while being chained, Prometheus-style, to their harvesting device, capital; i.e., the duality of switches, their mood swings flaring up during the state's nefarious extraction, which dissidents camp during calculated risk, on and offstage.

For example, a mommy dom made to submit can still have power while appearing fierce-yet-defeated; i.e., topping from below provided her aesthetic evokes a demonstrable end to profit and police violence during ludo-Gothic BDSM's liminal expression: the rogue whore, fag and escaped slave, etc, giving birth to rebellion in demonic poetry of the flesh! We can become/present as anything we want; i.e., whatever the state cannot control, thus fears, which is everything! Our carrion flower becomes the foul stench of a lovely rose to send them packing!

During Medusa's incredibly transformative potential as normally policed, "girl" and "boy" become things to define in opposition similar to "white" and "black"; i.e., against the elite, their supporter's colonial binary viewing genderqueer emergence as "feminist erasure" (while likewise treating the planet as a mandala/tabula rasa on loop). Like Medusa, we transform our bodies (and their poetic offshoots) to trigger state fervor during the cryptonymy process, thus expose them trying to capture, rape and terrorize us; i.e., as Chthonic entities/evocations predating patriarchal notions of power (then and now): Earth as female/feminine (e.g., Gaia, Medusa) versus the male gods of the sky (e.g., Apollo and Zeus) abjecting serpents, afraid of them and mortal like any man is. Coming second, the Father of Light colonizes the Mother of Dark.

Out of Greece and Rome into capital ("Rome"), history is written by the conquerors, treating death as something to fear and enslave versus embracing it during guerrilla warfare. Giants are things to behead, their eyes retaining their power (of clarity through confusion) long after the body is gone. Medusa is "ancient chaos" and Athena is "statuesque order" but really they're two sides of the same abridged coin, and live/exist in duality written by men punishing women for the "crime" of being raped, and everyone else either supporting or denying that claim: rape guilt engrained into Western culture, the latter repressing the former to serve empire. A masochist, Medusa takes the pain to reverse abjection, exposing their mortality and hypocrisy on the Aegis: as the terrorists calling her one. "The Gothic castle is the ultimate dom," as I put it; as castle-like body or body-like castle, Medusa's ability to give and receive pain—her ludo-Gothic BDSM playing with rape—is the ultimate counterterror weapon: to regain control (we'll return to this, in part two).

Concluding the historical evolution of Amazons and Medusa by discussing rape as poetic devices, let's now consider their tokenization and dialectical-material tensions a little more, and whose tangents we'll tie into profit (as a structure) when we examine capital raping Medusa in neoliberal forms (re: Aliens).

Tokenization

Before we lay out Amazons and Medusa in material opposition, though, I want to spend a few more pages setting additional boundaries regarding tokenism (a specialty of mine; my book series started while researching TERFs). Being holistic but strapped for time, we won't be able to cover all related variables here (the Four Gs or Six Rs; state monopolies, trifectas, and qualities of capital; hermeneutic Gothic-Communist quadfecta, etc), but what I say of/with them about tokenism (and resisting it) applies as much to goblins, vampires, and witches as it does to Amazons or the Medusa (and her memento mori, breadcrumb trail of Russian dolls), and likewise applies to all undead, demonic and/or animalistic beings. Sex is a joke, in Gothic, as is rape (a killing joke); i.e., insofar as we need that ability—to discuss it in popular modes of discourse—to best camp it: "Ask not for whom the bell fucks, it fucks for thee!"

(artist: Dreamy Skullz)

Such is Gothic maturity—a paradox of seemingly juvenile humor speaking cryptonymically to the state operating as normal (through Gothic immaturity furthering abjection); i.e., violating basic human rights for all workers, but doing so through the unequal and relative language of phobias and stigma. By comparison, tokenism is a matter of desperation and convenience, for which white cis-het women (the classic second wave feminist/female Gothic author) fall closer towards convenience.

Beyond any one group, though, any sense of superiority is generally in relation to another marginalized group the former is expected to police for being lesser than the status-quo, hierarchical places of each, but also various liminalities; i.e., someone is treated "white" if they act and/or appear white; e.g., white-skinned women are treated "white" so long as they seem, more or less, straight and modest—meaning quiet (about their abuse), skinny and not dressed like a punk, fag and/or slut (excepting uncover token cops, of course). Though additional latitude is given towards them for the color of their skin, this can be challenged by them being poor (white trash) and female, but also their political activity and flavors thereof. Class trumps sex and race, insofar as money talks, and the system protects men, but especially male celebrities, first; i.e., those who are lucrative; e.g., O.J. Simpson, a black man, killed his wife, a rich white woman, only to have the state shield him using his male privilege, wealth, and token, star-athlete status. If the superiority of men is ever thrown into question on a patriarchal level, women always pay the price. That's what the courts are for!

To further complicate things, though (as Gothic Communism is a holistic discipline), there's a second set of double standards to go with the first: straight > queer—with this having a third relative double standard; e.g., if a white woman is perceived as queer versus a black trans man. The complexities build and exchange between different axes of privilege and oppression in service to the bourgeoisie or against them; re: cops and victims. I've often called this "descending rungs of preferential mistreatment" per Man Box thinking and weird nerd culture, but it's less two basic sides and more like an intersecting lattice of many different variables. This further includes a theatrical variability that, itself, doubles during oppositional praxis⁹² being how people communicate; i.e., through the Gothic mode being simply the poetic language of monsters to describe people during state operations (ruler and subject). Truth through fakery (of the imaginary past) operates according to labor as a multicultural polity both divided and homogenous, clumped into different warring groups controlled by the same owner class; i.e., speaking dualistically through the same mirror dialogs while—doing as the West does—testifying to state atrocities by fabricating them (which Medusa embodies in oppositional praxis during Gothic Communism is less like the discrete, nine-squared D&D Alignment Chart (above) and more like a Venn Diagram of the same components doubled and super-imposed over each other. Hence, why revolutionary acronyms like ACAB ("All Cops Are Bad") are handy but also why you still have to distinguish between who's genuine/good-faith and who isn't/bad-faith during oppositional praxis; i.e., through dialectical-material scrutiny as performed by gay space wizards through whatever "poison" you pick and serve up (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

⁹² Re (from Volume Zero):

Workers are not homogenous. Different people are historically-materially demonized in different ways using the same language, which involves monsters as always being—to some extent—theatrical, thus half-real. These express in/as paradoxical positions of power and status that likewise carry their own double standards; i.e., depending on who's playing them, with irony or without; re (from Volume One):

By this same token, Pygmalion's opposite, Galatea, offers up classically female/genderqueer "monarchs" and non-abusive groups/communities with which to belong during oppositional praxis; e.g., Elvira (exhibit 12, a proletarian queen) and Ripley (a liminal, sometimes-proletarian "space trucker" queen/sometimes-bourgeois "TERF queen," exhibit 8b) or your run-of-the-mill sex workers rebelling and conforming to varying degrees: existing on the "rungs" of power as queens, but also figurative/literal princesses, lieutenants, captains, soldiers, etc. Either praxial type is distinguished by their good-faith or bad-faith façade; i.e., what is the queen-in-question angry about and what are they fighting for behind the persona—be they a witch, werewolf, zombie, vampire or some hybrid thereof, with all these canonical monsters personifying venereal disease but also bourgeois metaphors for homosexual men as the problematic practitioners [historically] of monstrous-feminine sex (source: "Challenging the State's Manufactured Consent").

Any evocation of the monstrous-feminine, then, must navigate (thus critique) trauma by performing and playing with power according to these inequalities and relativities: where they are; i.e., as things to consolidate in demonic language.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

giant, animalized ways). Often this happens through fatal nostalgia, mixing good with bad; e.g., remember the '80s, remember AIDS? Terror language marries to language of home, creating a kind of gargoyle; re: the home as familiar/foreign.

Yet, while it's easy to highlight how things like men/male, masculinity and white skin are canonically superior to women/female, femininity and black skin (and how the latter will historically assimilate to act like its colonizer double), this sits on a spectrum of non-whiteness/monstrous-feminine affording a great deal of poetic and functional latitude; i.e., in terms of who is punished and who isn't, but also how. The state classically controls nature through victims of nature being treated as "other" (for not being straight white men/straight men/men, followed by straight white women/straight women/women, etc); power is a performance to perceive, which means it is rife with paradox and concentric division tying people in knots (the Gothic loves its puns): false and true, Medusa and her snakes feeling pent up!

(artist: akiraeviI)

For example, a white girl has white skin, yes, but if she is fat, she suddenly takes on an "immodest, non-white" quality per the settler argument, making her "less white" as a matter of performance or perspective than someone who isn't fat. This can swap and/or compound; e.g., with a queer girl being treated differently depending on her orientation, biology and gender, but also her religion and class. Except, it's not only incredibly hard to "actually" reduce things purely to class, race or culture (religion and gender), but an exceptionally bad idea even if one could. Instead, it's how these modular qualities intersect and react holistically that matters; i.e., in ways that dialectically-materially serve or disobey profit. Someone who is functionally white, then, will either have double standards that let them do things regardless, or is someone who acts "modest" in order to avoid seeming "non-white" (again, per the settler argument).

(artist: Sinead)

Challenging those is a balancing act unto itself; i.e., people who might otherwise be able to blend in or lean into a particular identity to monopolize and police it under capital can likewise abstain from such temptations; e.g., Sinead is AFAB and fat, but not a woman (above); fae identify as fae, pushing towards fat liberation while also smoking weed and using artistic expression to make faer selves heard. So these things have to be acknowledged through faer own struggles; i.e., challenging the ways in which the porn industry will normally classify Sinead: as a BBW. Capital will exude forces onto faer to make faer feel like a woman, among other things; it will treat faer as Medusa according to its vision of the monster, not faers—a butt pirate to poach, purify or put down. There is always a double—a criminal to kettle, closet and cage; a cop to betray them "for the badge" (the myth of immunity from state force provided they punch down).

In short, capital arbitrates power through us-versus-them arguments that are, to some degree, entirely random. The structure is there, but it isn't determined by a metaphysical force, like a god or some other cosmic argument; there is no transcendental signified, but rather binaries that arbitrate through force (controlling sex and nature) by the colonizer against the colonized. These dichotomies classically emerge as black and white, but again determine by function over appearance within the various aesthetics; i.e., in a world of wealth through conquest. There's an element of dysfunction at play.

Appearance obviously matters, but isn't the end-all, be-all of arbitration. It's about who you serve and how you function under capital, which explains why you can have token Amazons to begin with—afforded their own double standards similar to any other liminal category that defies conventional boundaries; i.e., tokens, period; e.g., the token black family from Jordan Peele's Us (below, 2019). They'll never let you forget you're black, fat, female, queer, Jewish or anything else. When it comes time to blame someone, it will always be your fault when the chickens come home to roost (for example, no one blames school shooters for being white Christian wackjobs; they're simply taking the colonial model to its logical conclusion, from Columbine to the hundreds of shootings after it): the poor nuclear household and its women and children (Jordan Peele, a token black man/Zionist, learned nothing from Kubrick, below—abjecting Israel's war crimes, but also America's)!

Furthermore, the abuse isn't just chattelizing or infantilizing but verminizing. No self-respecting person does this, but plenty lack the respect or morals to uphold them when tempted by power under duress (or inheriting it; i.e., straight white chudwads; re: white [cis-het] people disease) to placate their conquerors versus killing their darlings. It becomes a shameless, incessant pillbox game, pushing the button inside a prison (of the mind; re: Plato's cave). Eventually conditioning wins out, making cops or victims, victims coming from cops. While it's a hard cycle to break, it generally happens through resistance to police arguments while embracing nature as a monstrous-feminine aesthetic; i.e., Medusa isn't just a BDSM rape slut, but a furry on the road to activism. We not only have to subvert police-agent weapons ("to reclaim our chains," Marx), but humanize what they target with them.

Generally this is very conversational, fluid; i.e., spoken through commerce, poetry and art (re: labor exchange and mutual action). Capital has many moving parts and dualities that are difficult to encapsulate, but all the same, my approach

(and that of the people I work with) tries just that. We use monstrous-feminine poetry during Gothic Communism to synthesize (make) new versions of older things that speak to our ongoing struggles. Elitism excludes, which we're not about.

Monsters aren't just commodities, then, but poetic arguments and lenses. In turn, the Gothic is imperial home dressed up as alien, which helps us change not just our own shape but that of our colonizers to speak to otherwise taboo things in acceptable forms of trespass. It's incredibly useful, but also scrutinized and occupied by people for or against Capitalism. To it, power and its articulation go both ways; e.g., aliens aren't bad, but become bad when they disguise settler arguments to assist colonial invaders (and their motherships). The same goes for any monster, including Amazons and Medusa, as articulated by different people seeing different things regarding sex and force (and orbiting factors like wealth, food and other forms of security and status). None have set definitions or shapes (the Medusa is especially plastic), but the imaginary past they collectively and hauntologically evoke tends to concern similar things across space and time.

Freud's interpretations, for example, concern police force as something that psychosexually shapes and upholds the nuclear model. And while I think Freud was largely dogmatic in his assertions (as cops generally are), he's not entirely off-base when it comes to violence and the unheimlich. There's a morphological character to the Medusa, but also one of violence and terror working together to describe a variety of things about the monstrous-feminine, all at once; re: Medusa is a crude, inkblot metaphor for sexual arousal and castration, but also a human subject for which those things are demonized as; e.g., a walking cock or clit that is queer-coded, black-coded, and/or female-coded, etc, and speaks to the dated fears/appetites of the audience that, sure enough, haven't gone anywhere. BDSM is still very much demonized, as are things like asexuality and public nudism, fake/denied orgasms, or really any kink described in Gothic!

To it, the transphobic, Orientalist, blood-libel, and black rape fears of white second wave feminists are very much alive and well; but so are those resisting them and their misogynistic gangsters and capital (with the cover to Barbara Creed's Monstrous-Feminine having a sideways "mouth," denoting a biology that isn't strictly the property of "rebellious" TERFs, but really sex workers of all sorts; e.g., next page). Ownership is action that is seen; e.g., speaking with release words/triggers like "thick," "hard," "throbbing" to excite as much as terrify (or terrify because one is excited by things the state labels "terrorist"; re: Crawford).

In Gothic, these manifest as excessive, goes-up-to-eleven overreactions; i.e., Medusa, speaking to rape as an abuse of power against criminalized bodies and portrayals of said bodies. "Slow and steady wins the race," or so the saying goes, but Medusa is anything but nice and easy! She's Numinous, Godzilla, making her enemies eat her ass. She's wild, criminal, highly suspect and off-the-rails—a force of nature, keeping it on cooldown, crushing your head with operatic, hysterical, vice-like kegels! Police forces alienize and fear holes (female space), but also phallic devices they cannot own; we play with their expectations to tease and excite rebellion: why settle for ordinary when you can be mysterium tremendum/the Great Destroyer? Forbidden sight is to see what is forbidden; i.e., the chattelized exhibiting them and theirs as normally a highly controlled substance (sex work) they transgressively reclaim through iconoclastic art: Medusa's dildo-like snakes, but also her "eye of confusion" on the Aegis!

(artist: Digital Play Toy)

Whatever the form or stigma, exploitation and liberation exist in shared spaces. To alienize and alienate through fetishes during settler arguments, then, generally boils down to the pimping of nature-as-alien/monstrous-feminine by the colonizer imitating the colonized through revenge. Violence, terror and morphological expression are totally allowed for one side (the state, who can do no wrong/are always right), and completely unallowed for the other (nature) save as nature's behavior achieves profit by damaging itself as monstrous-feminine. Those given carte blanche/divine right always default to crusader/witch-hunter violence (might-makes-right), because any resistance automatically exposes their absolute positions (of god and state) as fallible, thus impotent. It only takes one, so they hide their violence among us, silencing us in bad faith (which tokenism, to some degree, always is). Ergo, to show and conceal intent during cryptonymy (and holistic, dialectical-material analysis) is far more important than raw physical appearance. As whores, we expose our rapists during the cryptonymy process, reversing abjection to castrate them: a half-real demonstration of their perfidiousness.

Furthermore, because monsters are dualistic, any critique concerning one can—with some critical thought, invention and flair—apply to any other, in this respect. Medusa, in particular, is chimeric; re: as much a witch/whore, vampire and goblin. Equally undead, demonic, and animalistic, she can be applied to a black person treated as "other," or a trans woman, Arab, or some combination. Holistic analysis helps us change not merely our own shape or a cop's, but also the critical lens' usage per oppressed/oppressor element concerning whores and their revenge as police or victim. We are not defined by fetishes and clichés, but often rely on them to say what we need to say during genocide—through preference and code, but also the inherent linguo-material flexibility of those things. Change their shape and function, change how we think through the language of violence, monsters and camp; give us a lever long enough, and we can move the Earth!

When starting this series, I chose to reduce these matters to sex positivity vs sex coercion because one is inherently against the profit motive and one isn't; i.e., canon vs iconoclasm, in this respect. Fascists and moderates/classical liberals under American Liberalism defend market freedoms that code/otherwise inform these arguments, which is why Nazis are always allowed, whereas activists who actually challenge capital are always punished—i.e., the former for their carceral, complicit and abject behaviors, versus those who are emancipatory, revolutionary and reverse-abject. White or black doesn't determine by appearance alone, but how power moves involving appearance as the performance of many moving parts; e.g., immodest/non-white actions being too big, loud, or dark when they challenge profit and the status quo. Such things are perfectly fine for functionally white groups—including token parties, but also men in blackface/taking "problematic lovers" or white women playing witch cop against "bad" witches the state wants dead.

To that, if you're visibly white, male, straight and rich, you can largely do whatever you want under capital, including crimes (or whatever's going on, above); if you insert different marginalized qualities, this license narrows, doing so differently per token element: telling the desperate or opportunistic what they want to hear dressed up as "resistance," but in truth, is a Faustian bargain in disguise; re: us-versus-them coded instructions of violence.

In terms of crisis, then, the state will crackdown on dissidents differently than you might expect. When the membrane thins and colonial mechanisms are exposed through class awareness (tremors of Medusa), those who punch down to stymie said awareness through class betrayal (re: police action) are rewarded. This can be official police, but also vigilantes per stochastic terrorism. It is likewise a half-real proposition, occurring on and offstage, in and out of media, between fiction and nonfiction, on the magic mirror (where the game, activism, takes place). Those who attack activists in times of activism, in other words, are awarded more generously by the state than they might be otherwise; e.g., pink washing genocide, or black tokenism likewise speaking in favor of Israel. Tokens suddenly become exotic, highly useful strawdogs.

(artist: Hellavender)

When empire is weak, its rulers paradoxically appeal to fringe betrayals more often. Whatever the betrayer's form, there must always be a cop and a victim to serve profit; i.e., a formidable and subservient token agent doubling something that isn't tokenized; e.g., Ms. Bellum's mommy milkers and ginger afro hiding her virgin/whore eyes (above) doubled by Medusa, in the same show, as antithetical to state rule. Both encapsulate Athena, who isn't just a big-titty Goth girlfriend, but also, who's a big-titty Goth girlfriend (the Male Gaze)! Nature and nurture, destroyer and defender (the Golem of Prague classically a protector device made with Jewish black magic), lust and love—she's all of these things at once, divided into dueling sides: Hippolyta and Medusa.

Per psychomachy and Amazonomachia, Medusa is engorged, gross and black, Hippolyta sexy-but-white (the Goldilocks whore/virginal Amazon, similar to Ripley or Samus). As these personified arguments duke things out, cop-vs-scapegoat, we see a black-and-white mirroring of kawaii and kowai, hard and soft, aroused and unaroused, pleasure and pain, predator and prey existing in kayfabe duality but also in confusion, liminality—to move through and look upon to show others their inadequacies/non-manly needs/dependencies; i.e., Mr. Mayor (the status quo) a geriatric man baby that his steely Athenian confidante defends from her abject half during state crisis. Everything relays in monstrous-feminine language to make a pro-state argument; i.e., sex policing sex as a matter of revenge—a token, Marston-style matriarchy!

To it, state copaganda proves there must always be a scapegoat, under Capitalism, but also a servant—a victim/whore to pimp under capital (moving money through nature) according to settler arguments of token superiority and revenge. It's a property dispute over women, children and land; i.e., territory and mates, thus boils down to mirror syndrome: token Amazons vs Medusa.

By extension, America is a settler colony that expands its prison-like territory beyond the initially conquered lands, meaning the entire world (on and offstage) becomes the elite's to conquer/make into a prison territory (re: Alexander the Great). America becomes a staging ground, its shadowy likenesses falling to ruin and policed by recruits from the original prison space; i.e., to either turn back into a prison for kenneled, token good whores and bad, or deny to the enemy (us) having its revenge by reclaiming them (thereby denying the elite their much-desired profit). One side canonically "goes feral," kettling the other like good little white girls, Indians, savages, animals, whores, etc, against bad, black/non-white, anti-capital, etc, as always feral: Medusa eating the state's young per Orientalism, sodomy and blood libel. Her fat, evil ass is pretty hot and tempting but deserving of police violence by a good, equally PHAT double; dualistically nature is always "in heat," eager to receive punishment (unequal exchange) and give forbidden knowledge, which we use to transform into our best selves, mid-poetic engagement: camping the canon.

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Subjugated Amazons are Frankenstein's perfect children; their victims, including Medusa, are the Creature for the Amazon to brutalize, insofar as these arguments are constructed. To it, tokenism yields some fairly standard and familiar dialectical-material tensions, but also doesn't preclude reclamation; i.e., of devices that originally had a rebellious flavor that has become increasingly patriarchal over time: in opposition to rising calls for liberation by those classified as Medusa and Amazon, alike. Liberation is a mirror game fought with reflections; i.e., inside a hall of mirrors (which capital is), where language is already dualistic and tokens imitate us (and our heroes) in bad-faith.

Let's further unpack that, then consider how these track with neoliberalism abusing rape arguments to incite police violent upholding profit as a structure.

Dialectical-Material Tension (mirror syndrome reprise)

As previously stated, dialectical-material scrutiny helps distinguish the visibly identical. Now that we've looked at the basic aesthetic of Amazons and Medusa, Medusa's poetic history, and considered some additional points about tokenism, I want to consider how Amazons have the uncanny ability to subjugate (as cops) and subvert (as rebels); i.e., within the same aesthetic, either to help or hinder Medusa out of revenge. I want to look at a quick example of critiquing Amazons that seemingly look and act the same: Gal Gadot (and Wonder Woman).

Mirror syndrome isn't just attacking a black reflection on the Aegis; it involves copies of the same monsters embodying liberation and assimilation. These two historically appear the same. Indeed, keeping with blood libel, Amazons are classically witches and whores of a female warrior sort, their mere existence threatening the nuclear model since Ancient Athens (to some degree reimagined by modern state defenders): a darkly chaotic shadow (the Medusa) looming over the Western resident and residence, said West seeking to control (thus colonize) nature-as unruly using assimilation (token Amazons punching Medusa during us versus them). The state's revenge is to monopolize Amazons on the Aegis; i.e., turning them into witch hunters, thus defanging their rebellious energies and dooming most of them (and nature) to genocide (which is bad for colonizers, too; e.g., Nazi Germany's holocaust weakened the state to keep up the lie).

While the monstrous-feminine isn't strictly female (or white), canon dialectically-materially prioritizes Amazons being white female Indians it can demonize and replicate for the state's benefit: demon lovers who lustily rape smaller "lovers" (the phrase "lover" conflated with "warrior" in the ancient world; e.g., Keats' "Ode on a Grecian Urn" denoting the urn as not only spelling such cases out, but made from clay like demons are). This includes men who aren't big and strong enough to fend off their larger adversaries' sexually aggressive and uncharacteristically violent advances (with classic Amazonomachia both projecting male abuses onto evil imaginary jungle women that kill or brainwash men and women alike, mid-kayfabe, while still making Amazons weaker than the strongest men; re, Eco: "the enemy is both weak and strong").

Not to be confused with Medusa, Amazons are tall and formidable warrior women who classically threaten, thus overwhelm, the current patriarchal order by promoting matriarchal replacement through popular BDSM fantasies—said fantasies linked to an ancient-alien martial culture conspicuously opposing current Western values, laws and order (re: Marston and Wonder Woman, the latter basically Superman with BDSM thrown in): death, capture and rape fantasies informed by pre-existing biases, stigmas and phobias that, unto themselves, can be reclaimed with liminal expression and ludo-Gothic BDSM/calculated risk from Orientalism and white/male replacement arguments (often through humor—re: death by Snu-Snu); i.e., the latter describing Amazons as alien invaders and saviors ("alien" synonymous with "monstrous-feminine," meaning the native [or marginalized/abused person otherwise having legitimate grievances inside a colony space] being treated as "alien" in their own home).

In canonical terms, Amazons assimilate, embodying "kill the Indian, save the woman" during mirror syndrome, but again, occurs with devices that can be reclaimed from bad play by iconoclastic agents mirroring them—half-aliens that exchange power but again, can't normally change shape like Medusa can. Their duality lies in their equipment and their unchanging bodies.

The Lasso of Truth, for example, isn't purely a torture device (though Marston did invent the polygraph machine, a device he later disowned), but a highly playful mode of allegory (exquisite "torture") sold to a wider audience minus de Sade's particular mil spec uniforms (the Amazon has her own style, in this respect): release from illusion through feminist bondage! It's the whore's paradox in action, both a cop and a victim, a hero and villain on the same Aegis.

The problem is, feminism, BDSM and Amazons gentrify and decay under capital like all heroes (thus monsters) do. To it, Amazons paradoxically portray a herbo maternal side they try to assimilate with (or otherwise humanize through); i.e., as demonic whores/witches coming from a vengeful, mythical warrior half of nature the state can use to tokenize Amazons into Spartan-esque (rapacious) police agents; re: prostitutes and herbos becoming a particular kind of witch cop during blood libel (the grim harvest): whores policing whores on a spectrum of preferential mistreatment that took time to install, as did its mirrors; e.g., Gal Gadot (above) being a member of the IDF before she played Wonder Woman, basically making her "Nazi" by another name (a white, female, non-Christian champion from a latter-day rogue state styling itself as "rebel faction," Gadot's disguise pastiche whitewashing apartheid through token feminism: a "defensive" war). She's a TERF and subjugated Amazon—a monster girl/girl boss/wheyfu playing cryptofascist "rebel"; i.e., a token Amazon who assimilates, targeting dark aspects of herself that have become alien on the Aegis, which she abjects during the cryptonymy process/mirror medusa: Medusa.

Shown back to her by the state (on Athena's Aegis, to trigger a fight response), Gadot becomes the Medusa (a furious object of indiscriminate revenge, often a rape victim to warriors like the Amazon, below) to strawman and scapegoat her evil twin (the two hopelessly bound to one another); re: mirror syndrome—the menticed slave seeing herself of/from "good" nature. Faced with "bad" nature, dark aspects to nature suddenly appear and challenge Gadot (which she has distanced herself from to avoid summary execution; i.e., eventually going "rabid," thus requiring her exile and/or death per the euthanasia effect/black knight syndrome). Seeing those on Medusa, Gadot petrifies (white fragility in action) and punches down, a gargoyle for state churches (thus territory at large) earning herself a brief reprieve/stay of execution provided she kills state enemies out of revenge (normally as their white knight); re: it's DARVO by proxy and inside the Man Box' "prison sex" mentality—gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss. The killer of Medusa is classically a rapist, Wonder Woman acting like a man behind the mirror shield: killing capital's bogeywoman for the millionth time, posturing as underdog but acting the state's champion under their sponsorship (and all the accolades that entails).

(artist: Greg Rucka)

In short, a subjugated Amazon submits the moment she starts aping the colonizer against her own kind (and allies); i.e., punching down by embodying Western values and division putting her not quite at the top, but somewhere in the middle (class): a token monomyth cop attacking imaginary monarchs of the underworld, our female Rambo a latter-day Beowulf (soldier of fortune) abjecting the ghost of the counterfeit inside the latter's operatic, black-uterine lairs (often castles). Security is a lie upheld through force, policing nature (and sex) as monstrous-feminine per all the usual crises and decay but also concessions. Nature grows wild, hysterical; the sex police swoop in, circumcising her "for her own good" (and having a girl do it for good measure).

Keeping with the cryptonymy process (and its double operations), Gadot's justice becomes blind, yet shows the world exactly what's going on—she's a traitor that, like any token cop, avoids jail time by abusing the aesthetics of rebels: demon BDSM to defend property over people, killing vice-character whistleblowers (re: "bury your gays") and facilitating genocide (thus rape); i.e., by becoming the phallic woman to slay the Archaic Mother with. Generally this happens "in style," with sex, drugs and rock 'n roll disguising genocide; i.e., by becoming a symbol of recuperation and reward—a danger disco where you get to look cool and kick monster ass while acting as false rebel/actual rapist yourself (re: Parenti/me). The reasons are arbitrary, the motive is profit. Always.

To it, the state abjects the ghost of the counterfeit during the dialectic of the alien. As nature becomes alien under capital, the state uses the emerging cryptonymies to pimp nature out of revenge: Medusa appears, restless and wild; Amazons rape her incognito/sub rosa to restore law and order on the Aegis—by selling controlled opposition as commodities that cops mirror-mask with during cryptonymy and abjection. All happen according to state monopolies (violence, terror and morphological expression) upholding the qualities of capital (Cartesian, settler-colonial, heteronormative) through revenge.

Gadot's no longer a steward of nature, then, but a go-to rapist of nature having sold out to the Man: a white-moderate former-whore alienated from nature—poached from the streets to police an unruly black whore inside the state of exception's recuperated rock 'n roll ("black," here, extending beyond skin color to anything that isn't a white, European, cis-het, Christian man; re: "monstrous-feminine"⁹³). Her heroism is a ruse, one defined by shared context, on and offstage. Gadot is a Nazi, in real life; anything she attacks as Wonder Woman onstage equals Medusa onstage and off: something to rape, or to hide said rape with. There are no moral actions, only moral teams, and betrayal is betrayal through function, not appearance.

It's not just Gadot, then, but the women directing her who also sell out, in this respect; re: by acting like status-quo men. It's assimilative, muddying the waters by whitewashing the colonizers; e.g., Lexi Alexander—a Palestinian-German female director—doing just that despite critiquing Petty Jenkins' Wonder Woman 1984 (2020):

The much-anticipated Christmas Day release of Wonder Woman: 1984 was met with immediate controversy over its depiction of Arabs and the Middle East. Much of the online criticism of the film centers around its depictions of an Egyptian Emir and an Arab terrorist trying to obtain nuclear weapons, as well as scenes that many viewers felt shared jarring resonances with the violence Palestinians face under Israeli occupation. One scene drew particular ire: Wonder Woman lassoes a rocket to protect four Arab children playing soccer, which many felt was reminiscent of the high-profile killing of four boys from the same family who were playing soccer on a beach during the 2014 Israeli bombing of Gaza [whitewashing history with a good colonizer]. This was all the more loaded given previous controversies over Wonder Woman star and co-producer Gal Gadot's role as an IDF training officer during the 2006 Lebanon War, and a Facebook post she made in support of the IDF during the war in which the boys were killed.

Palestinian German filmmaker Lexi Alexander was quick to use her platform to signal boost the wave of online critiques of the film from young viewers of color. A seasoned director who has closely studied, and worked to challenge, the depictions of Arabs and Palestinians in Hollywood films, Alexander immediately recognized the tropes being described. The Punisher: Warzone, Green Street Hooligans, and Supergirl director was the first woman to helm a Marvel film adaptation, and has built her career in Hollywood while facing harsh retribution for her efforts to resist the industry's exclusionary, and frequently racist, status quo. For Alexander, the problems with Wonder Woman are representative of an industry that considers itself progressive while consistently excluding marginalized voices and punishing those who fight back, and of a culture that still actively resists any attempt to portray Arabs, especially Palestinians, in a humanizing light. I recently spoke to Alexander about the Wonder Woman controversy, her personal experiences of racism behind the camera, and the stakes of accurately portraying marginalized communities on screen (source: Rebecca Pierce's "White Savior Cinema," 2021).

⁹³ Medusa is classically a Western myth, centered around white cis-het women as the go-to victims of said myth. Similar to Afrocentrism, we want to decentralize it and solidarize intersectionally among all oppressed peoples; i.e., that we might unite under a common goal despite uneven privilege and oppression, but also the pointed origins of such devices.

It's all good and well to point that out, but taking Hollywood paychecks becomes its own betrayal. You have to challenge all of them, thus profit, or you wind up becoming tokenized to deliver a given form of systemic bigotry to the masses:

You can't go into this business and be the woman who loves to make chick flicks or peace movies. Kathryn Bigelow knew that making movies like the guys is the way in. [...] Why do people think I did that? I did that to show that I'm the least "woman" you can imagine. I'm so Guy Ritchie, I'm so Quentin Tarantino. I knew that was the only way in. And to this day, I still only get offered stuff in that arena. [...] Sometimes, you just need a paycheck. I think a lot of my Black activist friends look at me sideways, like, "Why are you saying you are against police violence but you make these cop shows?" How can I blame them for saying that? I even made a movie in which I played an Arab woman who fell on the ground after being shot. It was a small moment, but don't think I wasn't aware. I was even kind of jokingly praying, "Okay, God, forgive me for this" (ibid.).

God is an excuse for your greed, and class betrayal is still betrayal. Bigotry for one is bigotry for all. Equal rights must be equal for all, lest the raping of nature—of extended beings by thinking beings (re: Descartes)—continues unabated.

Complicit cryptonymy points to state revenge on a dark scapegoat. If Amazons tend to give rape, then Medusa receives and returns it on the Aegis. Keeping with the Shadow of Pygmalion/Cycle of Kings, nature becomes equated with "death" as something to defeat for the Amazon's patriarchal overlords. This kills her potential to actually do good (uphold basic human, animal and environmental rights), swapping genuine rebellion for a policewoman double; i.e., suffering rape but also doling it out inside the usual hierarchies: raping the whore by acting the man, thus the cop, against nature-as-alien.

Cops don't prevent crime, they guarantee it; i.e., through privatization as criminogenic, but also cryptomimetic. Privatization is a myth, but one that makes Medusa what state wants her to be: a whore to blame, control, and pimp—a furious goddess with primordial power over life and death, which capital chains to acquire said power for the elite. Dressed up as "peace and prosperity for the free world," cops bridle Medusa to power the West like a Promethean lightbulb; i.e., seeing that which gives and takes and dominating it; e.g., metroids and "peace in space," the latter powered by alien extermination—workers becoming metroids, meaning both as givers and receivers of state force.

In turn, the elite want us divided and fighting amongst ourselves, seeking to control what has become alien, promiscuous, and profligate for us, too. Per Capitalist Realism, worker liberation equals state shift: something to abject with mirror syndrome, because the freeing of the whore is tantamount to apocalypse. It applies to Gal Gadot, but also women directing them like Patty Jenkins and so-called "critics" like Levi Alexander taking state money to uphold state arguments in some shape or form; i.e., black violence as "immoral" in favor of white "moral" violence (the IDF calling itself "the most moral army in the world," which Alexander condemns while making American copaganda). So do Gadot, Jenkins and Alexander comply with men's ideas of Amazons, abjecting Medusa vis-à-vis mirror syndrome.

This brings us back to Cameron, but especially his desire to appear strong against nature-as-alien in Aliens, whose Amazonian refrain we'll explore a bit more, next. In doing so, I want to consider how Amazon and Medusa exist now as being informed by neoliberal capitalism; i.e., tokenizing Amazons against Medusa in ways that inform latter-day tokenization.

Amazons under Neoliberal Capitalism (re: Cameron's refrain)

I know what you're thinking. "Didn't we just talk about this?" Yes, but as my PhD asserts, "Returning and reflecting upon old points after assembling them is a powerful way to understand larger structures and patterns (especially if they're designed to conceal themselves through subterfuge, valor and force). It's what holistic study (the foundation of this book) is all about." So, once more unto the breach, dear friends!

This being said, we've already discussed how Amazons and Medusa are both of nature-as-monstrous-feminine seeking revenge, but where one canonically subjugates under duress and the other does not; re: subjugated Amazons are controlled opposition, which the state pits against uncontrolled through the complicit, cryptonymic veneer of rebellion: treating actual slave revolt as illegitimate, seditious, illicit, vile, worthy of capital punishment.

We've also examined, from a dialectical-material standpoint, how Amazonomachia display and perform various poetic, doubled tensions during oppositional praxis; re: how subjugated Amazons like Gal Gadot are fairly constant in their shape, size and actions when subjugated or not, but Medusa—an abject dumpsite—is far more shadowy on the Aegis. A psychosexual bête noire/nature as gyn-ecological (within Cartesian dualism), she's darkness visible—can be whatever enemy "of nature" the state desires/needs/creates per Orientalism, sodomy and blood libel, and which we subvert from a formerly dehumanized position receiving police violence through mirror syndrome attacking danger/personified vaso vagal: the projecting of state atrocities onto their victims and having token victims (now cops) attack said shadows; i.e., duping the cop to torture the conquered into a feral-to-fetal position within reactive abuse. It's a matador scheme, riling up the bull for the crowd's gladiatorial bread-and-circus.

We're looking at Aliens to parse the remediation of this idea. It's something we've discussed at length in Volume Zero, so we'll merely be rehashing the concept, here; re: Cameron's refrain, the shooter/Metroidvania.

Cameron's biggest "achievement" (moneymaker) was whitewashing genocide through assimilation; i.e., the second wave feminism of token Amazonomachia, in Aliens. His refrain uses the common internal/external psychomachy to mirror older ethnocentric arguments: to reject one's victims on the Aegis. It's game of tug-of-war unfolds on the surface of images/within their cryptonymic thresholds—a black mirror to look upon and see one's traitorous, furious "other": a before/after simulacrum projected onto your assigned victims to abject. That's what Cameron's refrain (the shooter) is all about. Alienate nature, then rape it to whitewash the crimes of empire. To it, Cameron uses the death and decay of a settler colony in Aliens, where Ripley is recruited by the company to face and destroy her evil double, the Alien Queen: white queen versus black, per the settler colony argument. Like we said.

Canonical heroes aren't just monsters, then, but cowards reconciling their actions during mirror syndrome. Everything grows out-of-joint, confused and hostile—the process of abjection haunting pop culture through cryptonymy showing and concealing it: darkness as much a worrisome indicator of where violence is supposed to go as it is the loss of someone's humanity inside the same space. Language, at its dialectical-material core, becomes confused—with clear identification becoming impossible, be that friend from foe or ally from alien, and the general meaning of black and white within binaries dissolves into grey soup, mid-struggle.

(artist, left: Nunchaku; right: Andreas Marschall)

To it, the state's entire system postures as good and mature, yet is anything but those things; it's mortal, doomed, cruel. Yet, historically-materially these cycles of violence keep playing out because they hold a great degree of material and societal power through such myths pursuant to profit. From their vantage point, these myths stunt and wreck worker growth in Faustian ways: class betrayal by police forces.

Colonies always die, meaning they always need to avenge themselves; they seek this revenge against nature having its revenge against the profit motive; i.e., by always coming back, which capital must re-abstract; e.g., the Alien Queen, below, and her whorish body's incestuous reproduction (chronotopic echoes of state rape) challenging Ripley's good body and non-incestuous reproduction, for which the other seeks neoconservative revenge against: during hauntological mirror arguments—from rape epidemics to "This time, it's war!"; re: Heinlein's revived, Starship-Troopers-style, fascist "othering" of state enemies into weak/strong victim, touting "the only good bug is a dead bug!" It's a witch hunt, witches fighting witches, except the actual villain isn't the Queen (somehow interstellar menace and indigenous population); it's Ripley and the nuclear family unit's monomythic formula, facing off against a black monolith and saying to it, "You raped me."

(source: Monster Legacy's "The Alien Queen," 2015)

Among the dialectic of shelter and the alien, Cameron had capitalized on a very old idea (re: Amazonomachia/the monstrous-feminine) to sell Pax Americana to future children; re: the Bay of Pigs (and similar CIA interventions) smuggled into a promising new millennium where war never ends; e.g., Doom copying Aliens just as Aliens copied Starship Troopers. There can only be one hero, but everyone gets to be Samus, Ripley, Doomguy or the Power Rangers, etc; i.e., the stormtrooper unironically enacting American revenge against Medusa when she gets out (e.g., Rita Repulsa), on loop, faster and faster (as speedrunners do); re: "specialization is for insects." Ripley is a Swiss army knife (an avatar of war), and Medusa a tremendous mystery (a god of death) waiting at the center of the dying colony maze having tried to capture and contain her power for itself (and collapsing because the state is incompatible with life); i.e., one to solve through force; re (from Volume Zero):

Under Capitalist Realism, Hell is a place that always appears on Earth [or an Earth-like double]—a black fortress threatening state hegemony during the inevitable decay of a colonial body. Its widening state of exception must then be entered by the hero during the liminal hauntology of war as a repeatable, monomythic excursion (source: "Scouting the Field").

Medusa, as such, is caged and raped by the colonizer until the colony dies by design; its owners then blame her for the colony dying—for nature reclaiming itself from the colonizer—saying the world "will end" if Medusa gets free, while simultaneously evoking the Promethean moral, demonizing her without end.

To it, Cameron's refrain perfectly embodies Red Scare and Capitalist Realism: the ghost of the counterfeit as abject spectre-of-Marx pointing to classic ethnocentrism. Per state DARVO and obscurantism, capital traps, beats and rapes Medusa not once, but on a never-ending cycle of police revenge, during Cameron's refrain: a) for "exposing" the elite's mortality as they chain and drain⁹⁴ her, and b) for "causing" the world to grow unstable. In doing so, capital divides nature, treating Medusa's wild side as "evil," illegitimate and immodest, and her obedient side as "good," legitimate, modest; re: virgin/whore syndrome, but on a grand scale that repeats during Cameron's refrain and its unfolding mirror syndrome.

It goes something like this: nature gives lip, trying to defend herself through various anti-predation measures (re: snakes for hair, stone gaze, acid for blood, etc); nature gets bitch-slapped by the pimp because "she asked for it," but also because she's unnatural/needs to smile more. Prostitution isn't the world's oldest profession, under capital, inside Cameron's refrain; rape is, increasingly dressed up as "sexy" and demonic revenge by Cartesian forces to hide the banality of evil (aka desk murder). Medusa is something to capture and punch when she resists, which the Promethean Quest iconoclastically challenges; re (from the Undead Module): "the Promethean Quest effectively encapsulates and discourages [attacking Medusa as terrorist], Medusa fucking back [as counterterrorist] to reverse the flow of power and information the monomyth normally supplies in outright parental language, but also monomythic media exposed to middle-class children at a young age" (source: "She Fucks Back"). Cameron's refrain—but specifically its military optimism (re: Persephone van der Waard, 2021)—challenges said discouragement.

Cameron's refrain is videogames, selling subjugated Amazons to the American public: death appears, punch her to restore imperial greatness. They are effectively Capitalism in small; i.e., primarily sold and marketed to young men taught to grow into conquerors forever seeking new worlds to conquer in old places. Per virgin/whore syndrome, there will always be another princess in another castle, modest nature something to rescue from her more exciting shadow self. Such men will always be chasing whores, bored with their pastoral trad wives, unable to keep it in their pants. Amazons are their vehicle for doing so, which they pilot on the mirror to attack capital's crimes—their crimes projected onto state victims during mirror syndrome; re: white (cis-het) people disease.

Such avatars aren't just one-time, but serial abusers. That's what capital instructs them to be and protects them so long as they're lucrative; e.g., Black Penitents and assassins; i.e., Rambo's only purpose was to invade other lands and disrupt any semblance of order inside them, until faced with the horrifying prospect of the alien within—a foreign inside/outside plot as capital decays and extinction paranoia sky rockets. Eventually the Imperial Boomerang sails home, internalized by people who think they can do no wrong because its literally their job, inside media and out; re: strawdogs, scapegoated for "going too far." Until then, these Icarian Quixotes fail up, enjoying boundaries for themselves to use against their victims; i.e., Perseus raping Medusa in her sleep, then using her severed head for his own base ends (weaponized rape). Such people become holier-than-thou by design; they rape by design, because that's what profit is. That's all it is.

⁹⁴ I.e., as dark energy and matter. Medusa is the fire of the gods/of Gaia and the ancient world expressed as "high voltage." Such divinities are dark, wrathful—with Medusa laying snakes/dropping deuces, her children abortive offshoots conflated with anal sex; re: Grendel's mother/the mother of dragons. From mother to child, they carry nature's revenge forwards out of the past.

The same goes for Amazons tokenized in Cameron's refrain to ape Rambo. The fantasy has always been about complete dominion because such technology was founded on military installments and operations bleeding into urbanism and optimism in the face of imperial decay. It will defend and revive itself forever, always through the ostensible element of (usually white, middle-class) assimilation; i.e., through rapid military advancement under a bourgeois paradigm (the Napoleon fantasy). In truth, it happens to the detriment of all workers alienated and fetishized for profit into givers and receivers of state force; i.e., against nature through endless hauntological revenge arguments; re: to acclimate future children towards half-real wars thereof, chasing Medusa to the ends of the Earth (and astronoetically into outer space). Under capital, she's always the perpetual alien, whore, victim, which canon scapegoats with impunity.

In Marxist language, nature is privatized; in Gothic-Communist language, she is pimped—a virgin/whore per the whore's paradox, one which capital has the right to defend itself from its victims, as such; i.e., to defend profit during mirror syndrome's revenge arguments; e.g., recruiting Ripley from second wave feminism to anticipate the rise of increasingly diverse and unhappy activist voices it could squash elsewhere, and eventually at home, under neoliberal Capitalism: as the new world order/at the so-called "End of History" and the installation of Capitalist Realism in full. Such women were (and are) trapped inside the Man Box, exuding "prison sex" mentality just like their male counterparts: whores pimping whores for the Man, "achieving" peace through strength as subjugated, neoconservative Amazonomachia.

(source: Inked Artistry)

As with any double, there is always a counterexample (a shade and a hero). With the rise of neoliberalism and its fictions, the complicit cryptonymy of subjugated Amazons became a façade, one to challenge through our own revolutionary forms; i.e., when reversing abjection—in media but also on our bodies, our labor exchanges depicting mutual consent using the same exact symbols: hysteria an alarm-bell haunted house (and minotaur) of mist and spinning lights, a Gothic castle spouting shadow and flame embodied by its uncanny center mass. It's the very sort of orgasmic, hellish pain data that all demons communicate/trade in (through unequal power and psychosexual transformation); i.e., using them to express the massive colonial forces at work against Mother Nature (and her spiritual children) as monstrous-feminine, and Medusa's confused pleasure/pain responses, vaso vagal aesthetic and predator/prey mechanisms being centered around survival and communication towards those ends. She's not just an invader but a live wire, a rioting castle-in-the-flesh working as the Gothic does: through pure unadulterated mood. What Hogle calls "restless," at her dark heart lies a secret and that secret is rape—a weapon for the state, but also for liberators projecting it demonically back at their attackers on the same Aegis. It's a mirror game, going where power is.

It's also an uphill battle; re: Cameron abused the arcade transitioning into American households to deliver state dogma/police legitimacy right into middle-class kids' brains. His refrain (the shooter/Metroidvania⁹⁵) ripped Heinlein off to foster military optimism among chaste, SWERF-y second wave feminists happy to reenact racist, sexist, and otherwise ethnocentric/canonically essential throwbacks given a new coat of paint: a vice character (the Queen), if not to root for by the audience, then drop to your knees and worship! She's a Numinous dominatrix, wearing a bio-mechanical strap-on with a knife. And while she and those like her can camp their own rapes simply by owning it onstage in the most memorable of ways (re: "Policing the Whore"), there's an element of coveted prestige for the title in unironic forms: the dark queen⁹⁶ of the danger disco, the big badass "cool one" destined to be summoned, dismantled and destroyed again, Radcliffe-style; i.e., a Medusa to behead when her snake-like dome grows too big. It's conversion therapy for Amazons, exquisite "torture" sans irony abjecting the ghost of the counterfeit during the cryponymy process (serialized comfort food; i.e., this keeps happening and occurs numerically among vague, if not innocent then innocuous-sounding nouns; e.g., Halloween 4, 1988).

Cameron's cryponymy is of guns and bombs, but also their female-coded straight givers and queer receivers. In essence, Cameron transformed the normally hush-hush realm of women's violence (rape, murder and childbirth) into a man's-man box office smash: a hyperbolic, kayfabe-grade battle of the sexes, their emotions, values, vices; i.e., one fought by two Galatea—one side led by a good, de facto Amazonian cop (and her brave-if-bumbling heroes), the other an army of entirely disposable fodder (the converted hive of gay Communism, needing to be nuked from orbit) headed by the entirely bad terrorist, Medusa-by-another-name. By framing the story as he did, Cameron was intentionally demonizing an Indigenous, non-American population, his Vietnam revenge fantasy written to cater to American hawks, incense imperial xenophobia, and regain a lost sense of American dominance on the world stage that would grow over time to fight Medusa offstage again.

⁹⁵ Starting with Metroid, a maze-style TPS, released alongside Aliens in 1986 (August 6th vs July 14th). Not only did this galvanize the entire shooter umbrella genre, but Aliens inspired Doom, which took Wolfenstein 3D's initial 1992 success and ran with it as a 1993 Aliens reskin (Super Metroid would release a year later on the SNES).

⁹⁶ This queen of queens voiced by Cameron himself—a role he would more or less reprise when voicing the death scene for T2's own non-biological shoggoth, the T-1000. It's gibberish uttered from a white man's idea of xenoglossia, shivering at Archaic Mothers and technological singularities.

Forged by a (white, cis-het) Pygmalion auteur who repackaged settler colonialism to get rich off the ticket sales/royalties, Cameron's war was pure copaganda⁹⁷ paying homage to past greats with tired ideas (chatty soldiers and banter during downtime, a child in peril, and shooting gallery sets full of evil barbarians) revitalized by Gothic hauntology to feel fresh again, but, like Radcliffe, makes old, incredibly harmful arguments in current time capsules; i.e., a haunted-house encapsulation of various fetishes and clichés pilfered from older variants, all to lead a zombie-grade extermination war waged cryptonymically between "white" women monarchs and soldiers (armed with guns) against "black/non-white" women monarchs and soldiers (armed with the land and with melee weapons). Inside the infernal concentric pattern's collective punishment/reactive abuse, the imperial side is entirely humanized (within preferential mistreatment, of course), the Communist side queer-coded/chattelized as abject insectoid, saddled with imperial crimes, and entirely dehumanized in demonic language abjecting land back.

In turn, everything happens per the Modern Prometheus, Shelley's Frankenstein originally made to critique a tech bro who—unable to exploit and rule over nature as a god abusing "ancient" technology (the fire of the gods)—abjects technological abuses onto nature rising up against him. Nature and technology become indistinguishable, projected through the ghost of the counterfeit onto a dark relic comparable to a lost alien civilization and/or mothership (the city of the Old Ones and the Monolith, from At the Mountains of Madness and 2001: A Space Odyssey—more on them deeper in the chapter): demons to build, reject and attack.

(artist: Aylin Saier)

Demons are darkness visible, allegories hidden in clay (or similar substances). In turn, the Gothic—since its stage-play forebears and neo-medieval emergence (re: Shakespeare and Walpole)—has been queer-coded and thoroughly transgressive from the start; i.e., a forsaken place of phobias and taboos, one where things like rape, incest, live burial, corporal punishment, mortification of the flesh (torture) and murder give voice to what is normally unspeakable in lieu of inheritance anxiety and the buried crimes of the West (the endless rape of nature being chief among them, including actual incest/compelled marriage): to talk about things as if they're of the past or otherwise far away/from somewhere else.

⁹⁷ Eventually playing both sides with his Avatar series, using said war chest to aggrandize himself and make even more and more war films, dressed up as white-savior-style Indigenous resistance.

Think of the Gothic castle as a padded cell to work out one's hang-ups and frustrations about those things—a place of shadowy menace to feel paradoxically "in danger"⁹⁸ while when no actual danger is present (more on this in part two, when we look at Orientalism), and where playing with monsters like Amazons and Medusa helps workers hopefully gain new understandings about these things and what they represent/how they interact. For us, Medusa—be her presentation the Alien Queen or some other design (e.g., Mother Brain)—isn't entropic as a vanishing point that censors colonial uproar and unrest, but wild to help release these things in ways that can be camped and channeled unto good praxis/catharsis; i.e., as a kind of code that's easy enough to read, provided you know how.

Unfortunately Cameron isn't about that. His arenas remain entirely about American jingoism, white hypocrisy and good old-fashioned heteronormative exploitation of the Global South, Communism, feminism and Indigenous peoples by people like him: a straight white asshole aping the billionaire Marxism (a nominal practice) of George Lucas' Star Wars problem. The policy of such Amazonomachia isn't to solve poverty, world hunger or war, but prolong them in centrist refrains.

Lucas loved Jedi, and Cameron his latter-day Wonder Women and Medusa, but I digress: there's nothing wrong with weaponizing the so-called "sub-literary" or puerile against the state. The problem is, Cameron's story is written by a tech bro to alienate and fetishize nature as black, giving it not a postcolonial flavor (as Shelley did, in 1818), but a settler-colonial flavor in 1986. To it, he's no better than Columbus and the Divine Right of Kings, except in Cameron's case, he turned the rape of nature into a money-making product inside an already-existing machine; i.e., one that Columbus had already pioneered and which Cameron contributed towards: fashioning neoliberal apologia while leaning into Lovecraft and Kubrick's own colonial xenophobia (versus embracing Ridley Scott's Gothic neoliberal critique, giving such pulp its own vessel: the Nostromo commandeered and jury-rigged from Conrad's own racist fearmongering concerning the West; e.g., The Nigger of the Narcissus, Nostromo, and Heart of Darkness, 1897, 1899, and 1904).

Under Capitalism, then, Amazons and Medusa coincide with white views on nature not just as alien, but demonic little whores stemming from an original Big Whore: the Numinous/ghost of the counterfeit haunting middle class remediation. I won't belabor that point too much more, here. Just, that I've written repeatedly in the past on how men like Wes Craven, Cameron, Clive Barker and Conrad all kind of suck (re: Volume Zero), similar to how Poe sucks, and really any white boy turning a buck to further the abjection process by abusing demonic language.

But as my PhD argues, Cameron and Tolkien's refrains especially suck—as do both men's mutual misuse of the Amazonian myth to police Medusa—because they catered to and helped popularize the concept; i.e., their revenge against Medusa gentrifying monster war as something that decayed into endless retro-futures (from Tolkien's painterly outdoors to Cameron's dead colonies). In doing so, they took and translated settler-colonial violence into mass media accessible from a young illiterate age; i.e., games and videogames' fodder-style police narratives—their blood libel (witches, orcs and goblins) adopted by illiterate, "apolitical" people, well-versed in us-versus-them dogma/racial conflict and Satanic panic. Through both authors' legacies adding to settler colonialism as an ongoing practice, such arguments and their resolutions (though Amazonian police force) are sold pretty much everywhere under neoliberal Capitalism: through symbols of power and prestige that state proponents can play with and faithfully remake.

⁹⁸ E.g., Edmund Burke's terror of the Sublime, itself comparable to the Weird, the Absurd, cosmic nihilism, or the Numinous, etc.

Returning to Aliens' settler argument/mirror-style abjection's abuse of asymmetrical warfare (with Ripley one-upping the natives, in Cameron's fantasy), we're essentially left with a binarized catfight between two queens—one of the West and police violence, and the other not of the West, beholden to all the white/black usual devices present in settler arguments; e.g., "think of the [white] women and children" borrowed from earlier centuries and dressed up as sci-fi spectacle; re (from Volume Zero, exhibit 1a1a1h2a2; re: "source: "Scouting the Field"):

(...Cameron's xenomorph's take the alien's acid blood [a Medusa-style defense mechanism] from the first film, and applies it to a creature called a xenomorph that demonizes the Communist stand-ins entirely and presents the marines as the fully-humanized military relief on par with Douglas Hickox' racist settler-colonial apologia, Zulu Dawn [1979]:

We set out to make a different type of film, not just retell the same story in a different way. The Aliens are terrifying in their overwhelming force of numbers. The dramatic situations emerging from characters under stress can work just as well in an Alamo or Zulu Dawn as they can in a Friday the 13th, with its antagonist [source: Aliens Collection's transcription of "James Cameron's responses to Aliens critics" from Starlog Magazine, Issue #184, November 1992].)

Except again, "white" and "black" don't refer to skin color alone. They are binarized to function for the state at all times, thus allow for tokenization (re: black skin, white masks) speaking to anything that can be coded as "dark"; i.e., including blood libel arguments being "black" in the medieval, "Gothic" sense of the word, when settler colonialism either did not exist, or was in its infancy and viewed backwards by Neo-Gothic authors (e.g., Charlotte Dacre's *Zofloya; or, The Moor: A Romance of the Fifteenth Century*⁹⁹, 1806). The same backwards reinvention serves ⁹⁹ Re: a story about a tall, powerful woman who poisons the men she's with (to get with his brother), and stabs a smaller weaker woman to death in very Amazonian fashion.

Cameron rewriting the history of the Vietnam War with Aliens and its many offshoots, themselves extending into retro-future wars continuing Imperialism at home and abroad; i.e., fascism being Imperialism come home to empire, white Indians colonizing home in bad faith, just as they once colonized foreign lands in bad faith: the infernal concentric pattern extending from hauntology to cryptonymy and rattling furiously ("like a piece of angry candy," as E. E. Cummings put it).

From then on, the world was always in crisis, "peace" always overshadowed by sequel wars: capital not just pimping Medusa, but running a train on her zombie ass during Cameron's refrain! In doing so, his Amazons (white guerrillas) demonstrate Capitalism's sole purpose: raping nature-as-monstrous-feminine during revenge arguments—of the colonizer against the colonized—which it makes cheaply and well. It does so to maintain bourgeois supremacy until state shift, when it can no longer continue dominating nature because nature becomes so unstable as to be uninhabitable. Until that moment, it will always create a whore to destroy and it will cede territory to that whore until the planet cooks for good. The point isn't to progress towards post-scarcity and harmony with nature, but for a small, select gang of unfeeling psychopaths to hold onto power for as long as they can. That's it. The outcome isn't victory and peace, but total, mutually-assured destruction by those who cannot imagine anything else. Sunlight becomes a cloak for nocturnal activities done in broad daylight; i.e., police violence, terror and monstrous legal tender backed up by state authority. As usual, it's a harvest—of nature by the state aping nature.

Amazons are central to this system, as is Medusa; i.e., the black mirror to expose and hide such abuse (and state weakness) during the cryptonymy process. Weapons evolved alongside Medusa as state terror devices that became increasingly destructive, but also loud, bright, and disruptive; i.e., diurnal, Promethean, nuclear-grade defenses of the nuclear home as increasingly mortal/under attack, censoring outliers, dissidents and victims with tokenized police exacting state revenge against nature. Guns and bombs mete out such disorder against DARVO targets, leaving the middle class confused and surrounded by guns, thus eager to police sex through force to make said alarms stop; i.e., white cis-het women, first and foremost (which Ripley very much embodies). Fatigue sets in, and profit accelerates, thus the rape of nature. Something "of nature" must always exist to rape, generally multiple things at once; i.e., an orgy around the world, thereof; e.g., the Palestinians or Congolese, abroad, and black Americans and/or queer folk, poly persons/sex workers and homeless people at home.

Capital must always be raping nature to survive; it needs not just to avenge Medusa's wrongs through DARVO arguments and obscurantism, but exterminate her repeatedly within capital in order to extend profit. Virgin/whore syndrome cozies up to white/black knight and mirror syndrome rescinding worker rights within a fluctuating state of exception, projecting feelings of shame, guilt and hatred onto standard-to-marginalized groups having internalized these "prison sex" attitudes; i.e., Cartesian dualism dividing nature into something alien that could be shamed and attacked in service to profit during the abjection process; e.g., sluts and/or fat people by those claiming not to be, compelling all manner of deadly disorders, but especially eating disorders and conversely, bigorexia. Amazon bodies become alien through imposter syndrome, projected onto people they can scapegoat for their own dysphoria and dysmorphia (and comparable feelings of alienation): Medusa as any target of state violence subjugated Amazons can and will historically police, the temerity of such bigots countered by telling them to look in a mirror at themselves.

During Cameron's refrain, maidens become whores on the Aegis; whores, plagues; disabled people, useless eaters; queer people and furies, degenerates; foreigners and black people, vermin; etc. Pax Americana breeds fascism, going hand-in-hand with classical Liberalism/white moderacy (and tokenism) to ensure that capital (thus rape and genocide through abject police violence) never, ever stops: monomyth stories' stochastic state terrorism/menticide threatening the end of the world, under Capitalist Realism, with spectres of Marx like Medusa. It whores them out as virgin/whore, angel/devil, cop/victim, husband/wife, making mutual consent an alien, hollow fetish of itself: a mining camp pastoral that decays and abandons itself, from one black (sick) castle/ghost town to the next!

(artist: Mighty Han)

Such likenesses speak to tokenism as an ongoing betrayal attacking these mirrors, but also lusting after them as weaklings to dominate (and people turning a blind eye to this abuse, generally abused themselves; e.g., battered housewives). Any way you slice it, the state is straight, white and male, but recruits from various marginalized groups to uphold this hierarchy through temporary concessions; re: inside concentric prisons/persecution networks, swapping out different qualities as needed. Cameron chose Amazons, but also prison conscripts; e.g., Vasquez, recruited from a barrio to go and fight other aliens.

In short, capital is the refrain, which requires tokens to expand and police its territories, which are full of many different peoples; it cannot do this alone/without help, recruiting from prisons within prisons within prisons, those closer to the in-group diametrically given more space and privileges that those closer to the out-group, swapping out externalized and internalized bigotries. The entire concept hinges on modesty and purity arguments, which affect every aspect of a prisoner's life—from what they wear to how they speak to what they do—based entirely on accident of birth; i.e., it determines based on class, but also race—with culture determined by those two things: the money you're born into and what you look like (though we're born as queer, it's something we can chose to hide).

That being said, queerness and sodomy are often ascribed to people with darker skin, and redlining forces old money other than white to largely not exist except in select circumstances (e.g., the Saudis and their oil fields). Moral territories and religions come into effect, regardless—with colonized peoples reputed to be savage, thus told to be more modest and subservient by cops (token or not) working on a hierarchy of values, preferential mistreatment and selective-to-collective punishment; e.g., Jews are canonically "worth more" than Arabs, Asians than black people, and straight/gender-conforming versions of these things than queer/GNC versions. Us versus them is fractally recursive.

These, in turn, uphold a curious bias with its own double standards; e.g., token white women are treated more favorably than token black women, for instance; i.e., white women will have relative privilege when policing their own and black people, whereas black people can only police black people (or their other racial enemies under white installations) to whatever degree the state expects. Such intersectional degrees of privilege and oppression are merely tools for the state to abuse workers with, leading them to abuse themselves while still posturing as heroic, white, strong and statuesque; i.e., cops as Amazonian; re: Autumn Ivy abusing me (refer to Volume One for examples of this, or the Poetry Module; e.g., ""Death by Snu-Snu!": From Herbos to Himbos, part 2," 2024): aping one's colonizers in the Man Box, which subjugated Amazons do. They rape others, insofar as rape is an abuse of power meant to cause harm. It becomes a part of their brand, which all Amazons represent; i.e., stripped bare but made to attack black/non-white/queer rapists threatening them; e.g., Ripley in Alien having her revenge in Aliens, the Medusa a convulsionnaire sending rape data back at her colonizers by camping her own rape/crooning to it in psychosexual ecstasy! Rape this, assholes!

(artist: Autumn Ivy)

Now that we've looked at token Amazons policing Medusa under neoliberal Capitalism during Cameron's refrain, we'll consider reclaiming Amazons more, in part two. For the rest of part one, let's linger on Medusa and my usage of her as a poetic device vis-à-vis Amazons and their mutual, at times competing revenge: the perpetual victim/scapegoat who seeks revenge per the whore's paradox, as the state kettles and pimps her for profit.

If Medusa is an inkblot, she can mean different things and still be a symbol of whorish resistance having her revenge. As someone who's written about her a lot,

I'd like to talk about my own thoughts on the character a bit more; i.e., as she appears in art, sex work, and various other media at large speaking to human rights through what's essentially poetry and labor exchanges, made and remade, over and over. Consider this portion, however extraneous, an ode.

Medusa, My Thoughts Personally

As a trans woman relating to Medusa, I see her like Gozer—"It's whatever it wants to be." She's the Whore and subject to its paradoxes and tensions, its abject hauntology cryptonymically showing and hiding the rape of nature by capital; i.e., an eye of confusion seeing with more than just eyes, policing nature through replicas both true and false demonically demonstrating the giving and receiving of police violence under state rule. Not a person, she's the ghost of the counterfeit, a gutter of oppressed things treated as monolithic trash and jewel-of-the-crown—a cluttered sodomy assemblage to coat in cum and delight in the mess made there, yet revile-revel in because such things are simultaneously dirty and sinful, "almost holy" but wholly profane. If it's bog-standard, she's queen of the bog! Rape the whore; she has her revenge putting "rape" in quotes! She does it for fun, for herself as something to solicit and camp! To hold onto and remember like a keepsake; e.g., a naughty photo, or a pair of panties; i.e., camping such things as heavily controlled in ways we use to demonically reverse abjection, thus the flow of power through unequal exchange and transformation: painting herself as whores do, but in cum as makeup.

(artist: Sienna Milano)

Any sex worker looking to decriminalize their profession is a terrorist. Per the grim harvest, Medusa isn't just a peach, but a Great Pumpkin exploited by America's settler-colonial, heteronormative, Cartesian net. Her angry side swells, only able to be returned to normal by cutting her head off; re: trimmed through female circumcision by tokenized assassins, jailors, and conversion therapists. Anything "too big" or "non-white" is collared and/or cut down to size, the swelling of labor-as-alien made "of nature" by the Cartesian model, thus crushed for doing so. It's built into capital.

Medusa's not just a gorehound/glutton for punishment, then, but a being ontologically beholden to its settler-colonial, us-versus-them divisions and fetishized, alien consumption built on top of genocide, including as the membrane weakens and a big-ass light shines on imperial consumption; i.e., per bastardized Pagan rituals of the harvest (re: Halloween) that highlight the boom-or-bust nature of capital both tied to natural cycles of the weather and astral bodies, all above (and below) linked to Puritanical recuperations of native spirits, superstition and ghosts in the settler colony's year-after-year rotation of various "crops." She's a Great Witch, or anything else to blow up; i.e., to monstrous size and point soldiers at during Satanic Panic (and other moral disputes)—the ancient mother goddess policed by token offshoots, mollifying theirs (and the general public's) inheritance anxiety through endless scapegoating blood spatter spilled onto the labyrinthine maize; she's the curious moon in the sky looking down, aped by police torches (the panopticon) defending house and home from blood libel's false flag: baby-eating, blood-drinking, gold-hording, anal-practicing witches, vampires and goblins! All the while, the state gorges itself on her stolen land, labor and people—their gender and sexuality chewed down to the bone because they're bad to the bone.

(artist: SGTMADNESS)

Expanding priapically until it decays (re: manufactured famines, the elite unable to exist as-is without abjection's tremendous division, violence and waste), the state wastes little time exploiting nature-as-whore, using this camouflage on its tokenized/fascist police forces (re: the black knight/witch cop). In turn, reclamation and exploitation share the same stage, ludo-Gothic BDSM sarcastically-yet-earnestly playing with the same fake/make-believe poetic materials and scenarios to liberate workers with during liminal expression: its perplexing-yet-intuitive dualities something to see and, like an animal, get hungry like the wolf for a tongue-in-cheek bite!

Whores are crude, natural, nasty and fun, in this respect, but also poached in ways we must anti-predate, graduating to sex-positive forms among our own pornographic art/appreciative irony during Gothic counterculture: an absolute baddie haunting the harvest with the ghost of the counterfeit reversing abjection (and its candied dreck's trick-or-treat-style us-versus-them—cops beautified into final girls; i.e., offshoots of the Numinous). Littered with assorted euphemisms/garish puns ("carve my pumpkin," wink-wink), these generally recode death and violence under capital through fresh context: superheroes, sluts, and witches—Medusa-in-small, tomb-raiding Her Majesty's pilfered womb (regressions to older forms of conquest)!

(artist: SGTMADNESS)

Medusa is a master of cryptonymy/mirrors, thus camouflaged resistance disguising rape to speak to it. She can denote vaso vagal with castration, but also rape as conquest theatre reclaiming itself. Per the cryptonymy process, to show candy is to show the fruits of endless conquest coated by it (with Pax Americana's riches being sex and force under its thumb, extending literally to guns; e.g., Lara Croft and similar classy gun bimbos). In turn, there's so many ways to pimp nature out and camp the harvest (some grosser than others¹⁰⁰), and reclaim said pimping by the prostitute! Context matters, of course, and relieving stress as she does, Medusa walks the line between genuine/phony disgust and delight (disgust is a disguise, feigning repugnance to scare off unwanted mates). And yet, while dialectical-material scrutiny affords likenesses a sex-positive or sex-coercive quality that otherwise isn't visually obvious, unironic rape remains a widespread problem; i.e., because capital rapes everything unironically pursuant to profit, then dresses it up as sex-monster whore and white-knight modernity. Hiding among this pornographic foliage isn't always glamorous, but remains a vital-if-lateral means of guerrilla warfare that revolutionary cryptonymy constantly relies upon to function: hiding in plain sight (the snakes asleep, the claws hidden).

(artist: mustblove)

Save pure glory for those drunk on themselves and their infinite conquest of the natural world; our gallantry is surviving and making it look good while, just as often, expressing the unattractive elements—the proverbial "dark side of the moon" during our pedagogy of the oppressed doubling state forms: the home, the nuclear model, turned on its head and shaken to see what horrors fall out!

Such duality remains a concern. For me, Medusa is a being to worship and savor tied to unsavory things. She embodies morphological diversity and the violence and terror expressed through said diversity seeking liberation per the whore's paradox; i.e., by reclaiming pedagogic tools of oppression in defiance to state monopolies, the latter sodomizing¹⁰¹ her peach pursuant to the same old grim harvest and its infernal territories cutting nature up: "dark" bodies simply being anything and everything that is monstrous-feminine in ways the state will alienize but also reframe as controlled opposition, recuperation; e.g., thicc, ethnically white bodies (next page) having an anisotropic character versus ethnically non-white bodies. There's a sense of imitation in bad faith, of appropriation vs appreciation and descriptive sexuality vs prescriptive, the colonizer imitating the colonized and vice versa, under the profit motive; re: "Damn, girl, you shit with that ass?" a hollow misogynistic appraisal to Medusa's colossal dumper versus a genuine cultural statement with any redeeming value. The profit motive is the problem, here, as is Capitalist Realism.

¹⁰⁰ E.g., Garfield saying to John when he gets home, "Finally! I need my lasagna sack milked!" Click on the link, if you want, but don't say I didn't warn you.

¹⁰¹ To frame her as "sodomy" in ways the elite control through alien fetishization.

For every dominated worker of the world, then, there is a token traitor making hay during genocide; for every copy of the original, there is a cryptomimetic fabrication that struggles to say something different; Medusa is both a PAWG, PHAT and BBW conceived under various oppressive conditions, but likewise is trans, intersex and non-binary in ways a given piece can't begin to express: fitting in and standing out! "Baby got back" is a Gothic found document, a lie presented as truth through its obvious fabrication (and competing emotions).

(exhibit 43e2c1: Artist: Greg Lansky. The paradox of demonizing non-white bodies by white bodies couches within feminism as having a predatory past against non-white groups; i.e., American Liberalism and white women being the villain posturing as white savior appropriating non-white culture and morphology to kiss up and punch down, virtue-signaling into a bad copy of what ultimately amounts to vaudeville. But this is, unto itself, a kind of demonic expression—of desiring to exchange this for that in caged markets of unequal power exercised by one oppressed group over an even more caged and downtrodden group. This can lead to sweeping generalizations that are themselves, speaking for everyone when they shouldn't, while simultaneously devaluing the power of technology and art:

I created this work reflecting on the relationship between pain and feeling loved in a world driven by AI algorithms. There is no mirror for her selfie because humanity is the mirror. We are all the mirror. "Algorithmic Beauty" has no beauty filters. The marks from plastic surgeries are displayed with grace and dignity like the battle scars of an endless war no one can win.

I wanted to offer a continuation of the Venus de Milo, a sculpture made over 2000 years ago that portrays an immortal Goddess beyond the reach of humans. Today, it's AI's algorithms that have God-like power over humanity. They influence beauty standards with the irresistible promise that those who follow will be rewarded by digital engagement disguised as love. And in the pursuit of that promise people will go through immense physical pain. This made me feel that maybe plastic surgery could be seen as an act of love and commitment to participate in a world of lies we are all part of.

I also chose the Venus de Milo because it is the personification of our "Fake it till you make it era." When it was discovered in 1820 the Louvre museum actually broke a piece off the sculpture to pretend it was made by a more prestigious artist and time period. By the time people found out it was already the most famous sculpture in the world, and no one cared. Maybe the Venus de Milo is the best metaphor for our social media era; a fictional Goddess hyped with marketing and lies but that we all want to take a picture with [source: Greg Lansky's "Algorithmic Beauty," 2022].

Of course, some cynicism is merited; museum exhibits in the Western world hoard looted property from conquered/dead cultures. Yet, the wholly descriptive reality is that bodies aren't naturally white or non-white, but rather hammered disastrously into these binaries by capitalist, thus Cartesian, heteronormative, settler-colonial, white-/cis-supremacist forces. Liberation occurs within imprisonment using the same devices: the bodies of workers, including PAWG white girls making sex-positive body statements during sex work! Our bodies don't define us; how we use them under state rule does!

artist: [Brittney Blaine]

This being said, AI is a powerful technology that, under the profit motive, is only being used to steal from workers; i.e., empire colonizing itself on yet another register attached to the ones mentioned above; e.g., tech bros stealing body likenesses and millions upon millions of images of women's bodies, before passing it off as their own. Consumption isn't bad; overconsumption is, and how such materials are acquired and spent.

In short, usage is what matters; i.e., Medusa standing in for various other things, which can gentrify and decay but also regenerate; e.g., a nuclear bomb is a weapon versus a nuclear plant hammering such "swords" into ploughshares [which the state will try to weaponize again, or regress to a farming of the territories per settler colonialism anew]. Whatever the form—of product and consumption of said product—profit is always chasing its own tail, conquering itself to enrich the elite above all else. We should not emulate that, even while toiling under capital to survive.)

In bodily (statuesque) terms, Medusa has been ceaselessly erased and recreated per the ghost of the counterfeit and abjection process; i.e., the truth and falsehood of such things exist among the entire collage simultaneously (above)—a non-white body to sell to aspiring middle-class women with surgical addiction, while likewise speaking to those whores by force under Orientalism: those who must endure the double existence of total alien and tasty monster that a) men chase when they tire of their wives, and b) that women attack or appropriate when such things become cool again. In turn, the underclass can paradoxically reclaim such things for themselves, but these remain forever haunted by the shadows described above; i.e., statements about statements about statements, the mise-en-abyme concentric, ergodic, anisotropic and recursive. All occupy the same stages, during liminal expression's contradictions; e.g., "There is nothing inherently wrong with surgery" juxtaposed with the class interests of a select group making it toxic in deference to profit and its colonial motive/acquisition.

Beyond statues, there's also buildings tied to the statuesque in ways I've described as "castles-in-the-flesh"; re: anti-homes; i.e., castle-like bodies or vice versa that denote some sense of monstrous-feminine power under capital: pointing towards an imaginary past (and its forbidden agency and pleasures) that goes beyond Capitalist Realism; i.e., a Promethean space of the gods considering what capital denies to us expressed in the language of the imaginary past, a "love shack" or tunnel to Paradise, evoking Coleridge's "stately pleasure dome" from "Xanadu" (1816); e.g., Marian Wawrzeniecki's "Holy Entrance to the Slavic Mystery Place" (1920):

So often, "woman is other" denotes the Numinous, which I've expanded to "nature is monstrous-feminine," harvested by capital pimping it, and reclaimed by workers developing Gothic Communism to liberate sex work through iconoclastic art (re: the whore's paradox). Art is very much about what pleases the artist, who is always, to some degree, their own audience.

In the past, then, I've regularly used Medusa as a symbol of wild, feral Mother Nature—specifically nature-as-monstrous-feminine having her revenge against the Capitalocene through state shift; i.e., as ancient death god giving life and death as two sides of the same coin, something that exists in defiance of state hegemony and Enlightenment "supremacy." Terms like "shadow" and "Numinous" get thrown around when describing "Gothic," a term itself that has seen a great number of people saying quite a bit about it as "sinister" or "tremendous" in relation to the West and its ongoing imaginary battles, especially with buildings:

The ingredient of fear creeps in only as a by-product of the union of Gothic with gloom, giving Terror a close association with Gothic architecture, which in its turn became the characteristic atmosphere of the Gothic novel which contains elements directly associated with Gothic architecture: castles, convents, subterranean vaults, grated dungeons and ruined piles. Inspired by this Gothic world of art, it found sinister properties in the natural world.

Later Gothic machinery developed logically as an intensification of the earlier variety. For the whole paraphernalia of a terror novel is designed to continually quicken the imagination with weird apprehensions. Soon the castle and the convent were joined by the cavern; the Gothic tyrant by banditti; the vaults and galleries by dark forests at midnight; and the scene of languorous amours became the haunt of howling spectres. Gothic villains pursued heroines outside the walls of the castle into the surrounding forest, whose gloom was deepened by the shades of night, and where lurked the banditti. Thunder and lightning hurled their terrors against the affrighted heroine's soul. The banditti frequented gloomy caverns with dank walls, secret exits and entrances. To all this were added devils and black magic, evil monks, the tribunal of the Inquisition, secret societies, enchanted wands, magic mirrors, and phosphorescent glow. Thus with the Schauer-Romantiks terrors became more dynamic, animated with the one purpose of giving a succession of nervous shocks. They specialized in the ghastly effects of horrid crimes and death embraces (source: Devendra Varma's The Gothic Flame, 1957).

Leave it to the West to colonize itself, again and again. Gay men like Lewis creating The Monk only to have Coleridge clutch his pearls before trying to reclaim the idea of Gothic literature (and cathedrals) from the fags. But Varma writes of something that I wholly-heartedly agree with (despite his cis-het male-centric gendering of things):

The rise of the Gothic novel may be connected with depravity, and a decline of religion. [...] In particular, these novels indicate a new, tentative apprehension of the Divine. Monastic life was no longer believed in, but at least it recalled the Ages of Faith and the alluring mystery of their discipline. The ghosts and demons, the grotesque manifestations of the supernatural, aroused the emotions by which man had first discovered his soul and realized the presence of a Being greater far than he, one who created and destroyed at will. Man's first stirring of religious instinct was his acute horror of this powerful Deity—and it was to such primitive emotion that he reverted, emancipated from reason, but once again ignorant of God, his spiritual world in chaos.

Primarily the Gothic novels arose out of a quest for the numinous [emphasis, me]. They are characterized by an awestruck apprehension of Divine immanence penetrating diurnal reality. This sense of the numinous is an almost archetypal impulse inherited from primitive magic. The Gothic quest was not merely after horror—a simple succession of ghastly incidents could have satisfied that yearning—but after otherworldly gratification. These novelists were seeking a "frisson nouveau," a "frisson" of the supernatural. They were moving away from the arid glare of rationalism towards the beckoning shadows of a more intimate and mystical interpretation of life, and this they encountered in the profound sense of the numinous stamped upon the architecture, paintings, and fable of the Middle Ages. The consequent "renaissance of wonder" created a world of imaginative conjurings in which the Divine was not a theorem but a mystery filled with dread. The phantoms that prowl along the corridors of the haunted castle would have no more power to awe than the rats behind fluttering tapestries, did they not bear token of a realm that is revealed only to man's mystical apperception, his source of all absolute spiritual values (ibid.).

As far as I see it, the Gothic isn't solely empty escapism, but tries to imagine things beyond Capitalist Realism using the Numinous language of the imaginary past (through bad replication): to evoke powerful sensations that penetrate state deceptions; i.e., a retro-future that envisions possible futures good and bad through the reclaimed language of the past as it once was reimagined, not the future (as Fisher's hauntologies, the cyberpunk, speak to/with). Like Milton's Satan, it is defined by its ability to create things that go against pre-conceived ideas of the West, haunted instead by Western atrocities and failings. The future is gay and hellish, set free to express reality in Gothic maturity.

(artist: Auguste Clésinger)

Again, there is always a duality to any being of literature, including Satan, but also Medusa as a Galatean undercurrent made and overshadowed by masturbatory Pygmalions (nothing being wrong with masturbation, save its corruption by profit into something harmful per the settler colonial argument).

She's impactful-yet-broad, hard to pin down: a castle to backtrack.

For me, Medusa is the Numinous to quest for/the ideal mascot for Gothic Communism; i.e., she encompasses that unequal exchange and transformation of fatal power and forbidden knowledge leading to great outcomes repressed by capital cloaking them in mystery/misery.

These include Gothic Communism as the ideal ending of our collective story—a sweaty and shapely spectre of Marx and of Gothic Communism leading to a post-scarcity world informed by pre-capitalist ideas and dictated by wanton, sex-positive impulses. Her taut, fat peach (age gap and size difference) cannot be contained—is as vague and tremendous as a shadow at night, a castle imagined after one quickly sits up, half-awake, and stares deep into the howling darkness out-of-doors: "Is that a booty I see before me?" The Gothic is classically the creation of nightmares we're not supposed to have (or make) but do so anyways, life imitating art and vice versa: to hang between reality and dreams, captured in a moment, our bodies responding whether we want them to or not. There's an element of control the whore wields over the person inside her—a faked orgasm having a similar effect to an actual one (acting is fun, and informed-consent performances are still a form of acting between couples); reclaiming the whore works through those devices. "Fatbottomed girls, you make the rockin' world go 'round!" Medusa is queen of such things; re: sex, drugs and rock 'n roll to police and rebel through revenge.

(artist: Leeza)

Nature, that which has become alien, must be embraced as friend for its demonized status—not to put aside our differences, but solidarize through similarity amid difference during our pedagogy of the oppressed! Don't gentrify and decay the white rabbit; follow her down the rabbit hole (the tunnel is Medusa's deep, dark, hellishly tight asshole) to recognize our relative privilege and oppression, but also our white/non-white qualities under the settler argument—doing so in ways that have our whore's revenge universally for all whores, not the pimp or whores playing at pimps: challenging profit towards degrowth (of profit, not our junk). TERFs are SWERFs!

That concerns Medusa's broader function as I see and utilize, but what of the forms that go alongside said function? What about second breakfast? Medusa shows you her ass again and spouts, "Looks like meat's back on the menu, boys!" Indulge in the galloping ass cheeks clapping back to metal!

Second Breakfast: Further Forms of the Medusa

Whores are ancient, as are demons; Medusa is arguably the most famous monster out of the ancient world in that respect, if not of all time. Though doubling them, she is less an Amazon and more someone whore-like who has become aggressively vengeful against the state because of rape; i.e., in furious, openly hostile and demonic ways; e.g., a dragon lady for cops to slay in cryptomimetic forms (her queer eggs to scramble; i.e., "So long, Gay Bowser!"). She isn't so much a big and strong warrior woman, then, but someone "of nature" visibly corrupted/darkly affected by rape to seek open, seemingly indiscriminate, "rabid" revenge and pregnancy through death (the Pegasus was born when Medusa died, fathered by the man who raped her and freed by the man who killed her from her severed neck). Demons are hunted; Medusa's a scapegoat to summon and banish again, Radcliffe-style—the monomyth instruction manual's Big Bad force of nature to slay by heroic muscular forces' swords (and other phallic, police devices¹⁰²), but especially Amazons, who bear more of a likeness to her than men classically do: good witches punishing bad, during mirror syndrome.

Medusa isn't just phallic or androgynous, in that respect (re: snakes for hair), but a shadowy abject embodiment of chaos darkly doubling Hippolyta—a pissed-off, queenly rape-monster touched by rape in ways Amazons generally aren't. She's divided, having a good and bad side to return to normal once incensed—nature something for the West to divide and conquer, including its own population composed of different oppressed groups. It changes how she sees the world, making her a bit temperamental, curt. Can you blame her (many do)? Rape is a source of stigma, shame and hatred delivered towards women (or those forced to identify as/treated like women); they carry it inside themselves, more often than not—a tradition to pass down, but also generational trauma, rage and angst speaking to the lived reality of so many raped parties denied a regular outlet/stress valve to release their abuse with—i.e., rape being taboo, hence its testimonies being told to smile more: like the xenomorph, Medusa had to gestate inside living hosts afraid of her "ghastly" appearance and acid for blood.

¹⁰² Missiles and later bombs, the latter disrupting areas to rob more for capital and themselves.

Instead, they opt for guerilla-style creativity through the Aegis, bouncing rape back at the guilty acting innocent: a born-again demon, alien, chimera, biomechanical freak to exterminate/trophy-kill, pointing to her own rape in repressed, rising-to-the-surface nightmares (the OG xenomorph). She's something so hypercanonical, we often take her for granted and put up with in equal measure (with me having evoked her plenty throughout my books, and in likenesses of the original, but never really close-examining the Medusa herself at length); i.e., nature both monstrous-feminine in ways we recoil from, but draw closer towards during Gothic push-pull; re: the wandering womb, hysteria, the Archaic Mother!

Medusa is nature-as-alien, as abject, as monstrous-feminine pathologized. Her fatal gaze hauntologically evokes the ancient world's elemental primality and deep primordial caves (anything dark and wet, often hot and cold to uncomfortable degrees), but also hot animal passion tapping into a repressed mindset of revenge against those who wronged her—what Freud called the Id and Jung the Shadow but which I ascribe to social-psychosexual feelings attached to material conditions burying them, as capital rapes nature, treating life as cheap. She's paradoxical, oxymoronic, Numinous—an unweeded garden grown to seed, nature taking herself and hers back during ludo-Gothic BDSM and its ritualistic, unequal power exchange scenarios/role reversals! Per liminal expression, this happens on the surface image as much as inside the threshold, attaching the neo-medieval to the ancient alien.

Transformed into an unironic monster of rape, then, Medusa paralyzes her victims, visiting rape upon them through an angry victim's view mimicking but not perfectly imitating her onlookers (states love false equivalencies; they think these give them free reign, open season). Her revenge is anisotropic, sending patriarchal "vengeance" out from a matriarchal source doubling its abuser(s); she becomes her own thing: a voice for rape no longer unspeakable, having become darkness visible on the Aegis (a shade, as the Greeks would call it)—the ageless victim of police violence that, like a zombie, resembles her killers, but like a hag without wrinkles, shouts "rape!" with her eyes, her vocal chords, her body as weaponized to stall rape, but also cryptonymically exude it in animalized language (re: the Cassandra complex). She's a fortress and a lightning rod—a chimera both undead, demonic, and animalistic offering the viewer forbidden sight during the dialectic of shelter and the alien: nostalgia fatal to the colonizer group, revealing their artificial supremacy through gut instinct metabolizing rebellion! Pain and humiliation are just different ways a whore communicates—the paradox of art being it can't harm you on its own. It sets you free by informing you of what things like nudity, sex and rape are.

(artist: Martian Zombie)

Keeping with forbidden fruit, though, there's bound to be some indigestion (the distended gut bulging with pulpy gore, Gaia eating her children). Like a demon's hellish cathedral-in-the-flesh/mise-en-abyme, then, Medusa gives that fatal knowledge back as uncorked shame, guilt and hatred unto the colonizer! Don't turn a blind eye when the abyss stares back; stare and tremble in return, learning what you're made of! She's Fate climbing from the well, shaking her gory locks to and fro! It feels good, but her wires are crossed. Her gift-curse condition compels us to look into her hair, at her green skin, regarding her bad attitude.

"Riots don't develop out of thin air," said MLK, Neither doe Medusa's fury. It's systemic, Sisyphean—forcing her to pay an arbitrary and cruel price, capital blaming the whore for her own rape. In turn, revenge for rape is often a desire to strike one's rapist dead; i.e., "If looks could kill" because she's not allowed any other weapons. Such is the case with whores.

This unusual ferocity includes unbridled emotions, but also her biology as abject, suspect—purged DARVO-style by state forces demonizing nature as rapist, not them; i.e., a whorish broodmother that actively gives painful cesarean or otherwise traumatic, unnatural, sodomy-style birth to monsters when slain, and whose avenger behaviors commonly confer to positions of colonized revenge surrounding her own death at the hands of men (and their servants, including subjugated Amazons) having theirs: through devices normally used to alienate and disempower them, but also where power is stored.

For example, sodomy (anything not heteronormative PIV sex) and its liberation and normalization is a sex-positive activity and counterterror device versus not; re: Red Scare radicalizing Amazons during moral panics to punch down against Communists (and other marginalized groups) chattelized inside the same shadow zone, using the same black-and-red aesthetics of power and death that Nazis do. Medusa's death becomes sacred in the imperial ordering of things, canon staging her anger as rudely misplaced (and mythologizing rape victims as rapacious versus passive, DARVO calling for endless revenge against them; i.e., by token, middle-class feminists with chips on their shoulders and axes to grind for underclass necks). Her status is incorrect, her death welcomed, then puzzled about;

i.e., as to why she was sick to begin with. "What's her deal?" is asked ceremonially inside the status-quo ordering of nature-as-alien; it becomes performative in ways that can only break on the canvas, bridged through linguo-material exchange and its various installations' selective filters or lack thereof: punching up from the squalid nadirs they relegate us to (reclaiming the ghetto's shitty sewer water to weaponize it during poetic-political, psychosexual dress up)!

(exhibit 43e2c2: Artist: Artemisia Gentileschi; source: Kathleen Gilje's "Susanna and the Elders, Restored—X-Ray" [1998]. Medusa is a palimpsest haunted by the things that have painted over her—rape as covered up:

Artemisia Gentileschi is considered an icon of feminist art, both because of her personal travails and the themes of her artwork. Gilje's installation (at the National Museum of Women in the Arts) comprises a meticulous copy of Gentileschi's 1610 painting "Susanna and The Elders" alongside an x-ray of the underpainting, a common practice in Gentileschi's time of painting over sections of the canvas to make changes. Gilje created her underpainting to highlight how closely Gentileschi's own story mirrors that of her chosen subject. Both the biblical character and the artist were subjected to unwanted attention from older men.

"Susanna and The Elders" was painted near the time that a charge of rape was brought to court by Gentileschi's father, also a painter, on her behalf. The seven-month trial produced evidence of sexual harassment and rape of the 19-year-old artist by her teacher, Agostino Tassi, a member of her father's artistic circle. Similarly, in the bible story, Susanna declines the sexual advances of two elder men in her community. Shamed by her refusal, they determine to ruin her reputation rather than their own. In the end, conflicting court testimony by the men proves her innocence.

Gentileschi's "Susanna and the Elders" is an unusually sympathetic portrayal of a young woman defensive before her aggressors. It contrasts with treatments of the subject by male artists of the time, who most often portrayed Susanna as voluptuous and participating in the elders' desire. What the x-ray reveals in Gilje's "Susanna and The Elders, Restored" is an anguished but defiant Susanna, wielding a knife against her assailants. The knife, Gentileschi's court-reported weapon of self-defense, transforms Susanna from victim to avenger. Gilje's additions to the underpainting, motivated by biographical and historical information, seek the psychological reality behind the work [ibid.].

Gilje's transgressive version simmers just beneath the surface—not buried, like the bones of Lewis' Bleeding Nun, but waiting to be dug up and presented in their true, final form. Yet, the reality of such disinterment is harsh: rape as covered up, yes, but speaking cryptonymically to rape policed, just as often, by women in service to men in some shape or form. So often, women less principled than Gentileschi betray their own cause, or—like Artemis cursing Medusa—attack themselves and others who have been raped. It becomes a disastrous game of selective punishment, equality of convenience for deserving victims vs undeserving victims, hence the application of revenge by the relatively powerful against those less so; re: "prison sex" mentality seeing rape victims police each other in service to capital and empire. Such triangulation redirects rebellious sentiment away from the state, dividing it among the oppressed to tokenize and conquer themselves with.)

Rape (a form of torture) does that to you. Medusa's not sick in a congenital sense, or a female infantilization of "the id" or some such nonsense; her plural, furious condition is comorbid, exacted upon her by token dickwads celebrating her demise. Medusa, then, could be adequately described as an Amazon who has, in some shape or form, been kettled/raped by other Amazons as much by men during reactive abuse, and seeks blind, venomous revenge for it in openly demonic ways; re: preventing rape through paralysis; i.e., being able to change shape in a plural mode of existence that, once awakened, actively gives hell back to anyone she looks at. By changing shape, she communicates in ways that speak to her inhuman animal body treated as lesser by Amazonian sell-outs, the latter acting "superior" to Medusa despite their collars humbling them. They're obedient, still somewhat alien but of a non-chaotic morphology blessed by the gods versus cursed: of the three Gorgons, Medusa was the only mortal sister and the one marked for death after being raped.

Subjugated Amazons are rock 'n roll without the critical bite, but all of the venom directed at the elite's political enemies—themselves! As such, they also lie to themselves, saying they aren't raped because they're as strong as they are/posture herbo-style strength through a dominant aesthetic that looks rape-proof/gives rape out to weaklings, yet overlooks their own slave status to a sovereign power raping them non-penetratively. Rising to state challenges, they're stuck in the Man Box/are neoconservative in their approach to strength; i.e., as a rape-prevention device only for themselves in service to empire during the battle of the sexes; re: acting like men as TERFs very much do. The animus isn't founded on shared respect, but hierarchical supremacy disguised as liberation, benevolent whiteness, and the noble savage conquering nature with nature. A whore is a whore, even enby ones posturing as gym moms while insisting they aren't sex workers (re: Autumn Ivy): cops with a human-alien appearance. It's the oldest trick in the book!

Scratch a SWERF and a TERF bleeds. Eh tu, Brutae? They embody not just a miscarriage of justice, but an abortion, self-surgery to neuter themselves. They lose all irony and stab their fellow whores on and offstage during bad BDSM enacted in bad faith. They're stupid from a class-warrior standpoint, but know what they're doing. It's literally their job! This includes whoring themselves out as dominatrixes, but also marrying up; i.e., the bridle becoming bridal when capital reins them in (or puts them down when they go "feral," a rabid whore to squash like Medusa under their owners' bootheels): the monomythic reward for men when all's said and done. They're so dead, they don't know it; are pigs, they don't even know how much of a pig they are (ripe for the slaughter). "Four legs good, two legs better!" (all the more fitting considering Orwell was an imperial cop). It's folly because Medusa can't be killed; she is Death itself, thus can only be faced on the Aegis—either respected and spared her wrath, or belittled only to be devoured by She Who Devours: "I'm the god of death; what are you?"

Facing Death: the Aegis Opens!

(artist: Abigail Larson)

Athena's Aegis is a two-way mirror—one that brings Hell home to Earth. On it, Medusa—the giver and taker of life—smiles because she sees men's mortality staring them in the face! When capital decays, then, the Numinous is something workers invariably return to; re: Devendra Varma, but on a more informed, Communist variant of the same basic quest (re: me, the palliative Numinous). As a death god, Medusa's revenge is generally showing people, on her surfaces and inside her thresholds, what they don't want to face but paradoxically are drawn towards; re: Radcliffe's Black Veil: a fatal homing that turns the West (and its sins) to ash. Such is nature exceeding man's grasp.

For example, all women—not just Amazons and Medusa (though they embody cops and victims the best)—are demons, thus whores, under capital. When push comes to shove, women (or those treated like women; re: anything "lesser" than white, cis-het, Christian men) are always expected to submit to men and uphold their authority. Except, the whole point with Medusa is she don't give a fuck—is the Aegis to face; i.e., having been shamed with an ignominious death, thus becoming something for the state to reject because she "let" herself not only "get raped" (famously killed in her sleep like a whore), but "chose" to sacrifice her body for something monstrous, unlovable (according to them, anyways). One, she is a threat, because she exposes rape coming from inside the house; re: her testimony is dangerous to the husband, which the Amazons protects, guaranteeing there always is a scapegoat.

To that, canon's Medusa is paradoxically weak, as are her expendable-vermin insect children, thus deserve scorn, mockery and hate as "lesser" beings that eat flesh, spread disease (as whores were blamed for doing instead of the men having sex with them) and procreate through infanticide, sodomy, cannibalism, fungus and torture (re: blood libel shaming the witch per ethnocentric models serving profit); Amazons and their "superior" babies are Spartan-esque, "immune" to rape by denying it/abjecting onto her as impure, abomination unheimlich compared to their nuclear assimilation (whoring themselves out while excluding her). It's DARVO blaming the victim for the nuclear family's downfall, thus fascistic and queerphobic, our scornful givers of rape worshipping strength in bad faith (and grooming children/exhibiting their genitals to root out fags; re: TERFs; e.g., the LGB Alliance—"alliance" denoting a supergroup of self-righteous "good" witches standing against an evil cabal of so-called "bad" witches) while likening non-reproductive sex—but also the receiving of non-consenting sex—as "sodomy" per the colonial binary argument.

In fact, Medusa is constantly being raped and sodomized (with anal sex, but also just rape and neglect) for profit; i.e., under a structure that uses token police violence to punch down and dominate with as guilty pleasure. In turn, her revenge—as something of a black, Jewish, genderqueer whore, atomic punk butt wizard—is to reclaim such things from colonial orderings and usage demonizing her animal side as inferior to Cartesian devices built on older imperial models: "rape" in quotes serving as a campy, ironic weapon for liberation versus a canonical, unironic device for enslavement. Rape cannot be monopolized any more than infiltration can, nor monomyth stories like Castlevania (and its various artifacts; e.g., swords, shields, Amazons, princesses¹⁰³, succubae, and twins-in-peril, etc), heavy metal music, or literally anything else from weird nerd culture. This isn't a handicap, but our greatest strength; re (from Volume Zero):

(artist: Bokuman)

State proponents are straw dogs (throwaway effigies)/sacrificial roosters, believing themselves immune to the elite's gain while the owner slits the faithful worker's throat sooner or later. Their "greatest strength" is actually what dooms them to an ignominious death: complete alienation driven by a dimorphic connecting of everything to biological sex, skin color and their canonical-monstrous connotations in service of the profit motive but refusing to scrutinize things at a dialectical-material level (willful ignorance/"rose-tinted glasses"). Conversely our greatest strength as class-

¹⁰³ The modest-presenting (and property-owning) sexual rewards; e.g., Zelda and Peach are a sexual treat for completing the monomyth (after killing the dragon lord, versus Medusa, like in Kid Icarus, 1986; Samus is too cool for school, not dating anyone onscreen). She's an excuse to fuck the whore.

/culture-conscious class warriors is our "darkness visible" doubling theirs through the Wisdom of the Ancients as something to cultivate relative to the modern world; i.e., our deliberate, cultivated ability to critique capital and its agents/trifectas through dialectical-material scrutiny and iconoclastic, campy behaviors that synthesize the Superstructure to our purposes (rehumanizing ourselves by separating from the colonial binary in monomorphic fashion) all while suffering the fools of canonical tragedy and farce within canonical historical materialism. Our aim is to "make it gay" by reclaiming the Base through our Four Gs: abjection, hauntology, chronotopes and cryptonymy—but also our Six Rs, or Gothic-Marxist tenets of Gothic Communism during oppositional praxis as something to synthesize (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

In this, our imagination and poetic flexibility is our greatest weapon against their Achilles' Heel. Any form the Medusa takes—be that killer stick figures (remember Stick Death, anyone?) or gay queens from outer space—we camp on the Aegis; same for the Amazons raping her or their otherwise warlike behaviors: "Terror is a weapon and a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it." Cryptonymy is a skill with a high ceiling. Medusa is the fat lady singing to hit the ceiling and bring it down—a queen of the cosmic dance, reminding us all that death is both nothing to fear and that singing and wiggling feel good (to thrash, convulse, and vibe in rock 'n roll, psychosexual martyrdom/quasi-medieval camp: to be wet with salvation)!

(artist: Tassy Is Here)

Capital rapes everything, including the subjugated Amazons that rape/object Medusa for showing her furious ass (the reward as much as the princess is). We can reverse abjection, reclaiming Amazons from their fascist, vain, police-giver-of-rape function, and humanize Medusa in the bargain (while making her a bit more fun, amid the venom). But it behooves us to consider these devices—both Amazons, good and bad, as well as Medusa's calm and furious forms—as they function dualistically and dialectically-materially in the liminal wild. Let there be no Imperialism of theory in the pages ahead; kill your Amazonian darlings and give Medusa a hug. Disentangle them from their state variants, doing so through the Gothic-Communist drive towards liberation during ludo-Gothic BDSM's exquisite "torture"; i.e., negotiating our own rights (and navigating our own trauma) on the Aegis versus having the state do it for "us" (for profit). We must or else.

It will happen in time; i.e., when sex positivity becomes second nature through praxial synthesis, Medusa in all her forms allowed to come out and be treated as human, but also as monstrous-feminine stewards of nature: having our cake and eating it, too, our forbidden sight not just intimating Medusa, but showing our arches and buttresses off (offshoots of mightier divinities, mise-en-abyme)! In challenging profit, we clap back, having our sweet revenge! Why do what you're told when it's much more fun to misbehave! Power over our flesh, our hauntological pleasure and pain/our revolutionary cryptonymy reverses abjection on the Aegis as we embody it! Screw promises of salvation in the afterlife! Fuck those who act like they have power over life and death now!

Medusa cannot die; she is a death god, which life is a part of—a palliative Numinous, "almost holy" reminder of our own mortality and humanity the state has long since forgotten. We reclaim our asses (and their holes, as mythical sites of violation/forbidden pleasure), right now! We cum on each other to claim our friends in good faith (not for profit), right now! We endure genocide—the seminal tragedy of merely being born different—and feel Medusa spread her wings to give life and death to all, intimations of mortality fir king and pauper alike; but to us, she comforts, letting us know the state can never exterminate us. And in trying to, we haunt their days on Earth till said Earth claims them. Our beautiful wickedness, our beauteous orbs! Holy St. Francis!

The state is an unnatural cycle of abuse that tries to cheat death. It relies on monopolies of violence, terror and morphological expression to control sex through force; i.e., through actions that, under state purview, have set definitions: missionary for reproduction and anal rape/sodomy thus guilty pleasure, etc. We might be toys under capital, but can decide how we're played with in ways that slowly change the paradigm, from land to worker as part-in-parcel: land back, bodies back, the whole shebang; fuck around, find out when Medusa—a holistic deity of nature with manmade and summoned anthropomorphic, but not anthropocentric qualities—comes back to take the arrogant West (and its false essentialism) apart.

Medusa, then, is the dumb supper of capital's endless dead. As such, she paints it black, her cosmic twerking reminding us that sex positivity isn't to extend life and improve it for a select few by preying on others, but to improve the quality of life for all; i.e., by using technology to extend life and quality of life while facing death as a total history and natural consequence laden with flagrant power abuse by state forces: to look on Omelas and remember the wretched the holier-than-thou deemed worthy of sacrifice. There must always be a victim for them to sup on. Never let them forget their own hypocrisy as Medusa pegs them (out)!

Hurt, not harm is a human idea, and Medusa is as much force of nature as human stand-in. In Numinous terms, Medusa isn't human/cannot die, but her avatars very much are/can (women or not); they'll feel her revenge when state shift happens, so we can't just "pull a Radcliffe," summon another scapegoat (another princess, another castle) and use it to deny what's coming. We have to face what the state has done. That being said, our whore's revenge can mitigate total destruction by transitioning away from capital and profit before it's too late;

re: by making our Wisdom of the Ancients wiser to Medusa's growing rage. Because a world without control is unimaginable to state defenders, the Aegis showing them their own death as a loss of control, humanizing the harvest: state shift, wrought by Medusa becoming that Great Destroyer capital can never defeat, the witch it could never burn, queer it could never bury but the dark mother who tucks them into bed, six feet underground! The end is nigh; let's listen to it, before she (and her murderous womb) enrage and "take us with her" as the Gothic does: exposing the West as fallen, before taking us home for good (the black queen becoming the unironic, passionate slasher)!

(artist: pixmilk)

To it, there are planetary forces at work, unfolding on this pale blue dot that is Medusa's domain. In a half-real sense, liberation and exploitation occupy the same space/mirror game, camping demons and the undead in animalized, predatory/prey language. Keeping with the Numinous, some worship and duality is expected, during liminal expression; but liberation through said worship is the point—not submitting to the elite until the world ends by blaming the Whore of Babylon.

On the Aegis, then, we're not trapped in here with you Cartesian dickwads (who love to think they conquer nature); you're trapped in with us! We'll make you motherfuckers squirm (trapped between pleasure and awe, formerly state disgust and delight evoking a Numinous torpor that sets Medusa free from capital's Torment Nexus)! The Aegis opens; gaze into its forbidden sight and see the world for both what it is, but also what it could become! Our death or salvation sit on the same mirror. Medusa doesn't care which, so demolish state illusions and set yourselves free, seizing post-scarcity from the jaws of defeat; haunted by spectres of Marx and a Communist Numinous giving unequal, forbidden exchange to help us transform—not to die for nothing but bring Gothic Communism to life: as bad girls setting Medusa free. What better way to expose the state as false than that?

This concludes our examination of the Medusa. She and Amazons have been pitted against each other by neoliberal Capitalism, Amazons forever tokenized and Medusa always a victim/scapegoat demon whore. We've examined her revenge, but what about subversive Amazons refusing to rape Medusa? Tokenism doesn't preclude reclamation, and Rome wasn't burned in a day. In part two, we'll consider less how these devices are constantly and forever "at war" under Capitalism, and more how to reconcile and deal with those consequences to push towards Gothic Communism; i.e., taking Amazons back while reconciling their tokenistic elements and criminogenic conditions that inform them; e.g., anal sex (commonly a metaphor for rape) becoming a postcolonial device (the whore's revenge). That and more, next!

On Amazons, Good and Bad, part two: Reclaiming Amazons; or, Cops and Victims

"Steel isn't strong, boy. Flesh is stronger. What is steel compared to the hand that wields it?"

—Thulsa Doom, Conan the Barbarian (1981)

(source Tumblr post, The History of Fighting: February 6, 2022)

Capital relies on tokenization—to recruit from nature to pimp nature, sex raping sex, thus benefit the smallest number of people possible through the suffering of the largest number possible. All exist within a system of concealment we expose inside itself—from America's corporate duopoly (establishment politics) to extensions of their team-based, cops-and-victims approach to the world under neoliberal Capitalism and its centrist refrains: bread and circus (music and combat). This includes Amazons as something to reconcile with their imaginary past, but also reclaim it as a consequence of refusing to play along with state mechanisms any longer! A whore's revenge, breaking Capitalist Realism!

If part one focused on tokenization of the Amazon as givers of rape and revenge—i.e., treating Medusa as perpetual victim/scapegoat, during mirror syndrome—part two, "Cops and Victims," aims to humanize, thus reclaim such devices inside themselves; re: "an enemy has only images, behind which he hides his true motives; destroy the image and you break the enemy." Liberation is a mirror game, Medusa the Queen of Mirrors; queen bee, the details of her death have been greatly exaggerated. The Gothic, then, loves to remind its audience to the inferiority of man in man-versus-nature, but also Man Box tokenizing this group or that; i.e., mankind is doomed, the home reclaimed by nature, but also labor when Medusa comes to take us home: into her murderous womb—a carnivorous vat of acid, a sarcophagus (eater of the flesh). No amount of science, superhero eugenics, deals with the devil (selling out) or self-righteous posturing can thwart that, dooming the state because it tries to beat Medusa, anyways. It cannot, because she is nature, itself, hence a god of death—of transformation and radical change during intensely unequal, forbidden exchange.

These aren't just colonial devices, then, but our childhood materials lifted from sources normally used to deliver such things to people expected to uphold the status quo. As usual, the elite cannot own the Superstructure, meaning we can recultivate it through iconoclastic art on the Aegis; re: subversive Amazons, which look and sound the same (at a glance) as subjugated ones. It's a group effort, made not by single, elevated representatives, but an intersectional collective of solarized workers liberating sex work as monstrous-feminine through iconoclastic art. This includes Amazons, which desperately need to reclaim their iconoclastic potential from TERF agents playing cops and victims vis-à-vis Amazons.

All hinge on lies, during the cryptonymy process. Except when the state lies, it lies to harm us; when we lie, it's a defense mechanism defying our attackers. Our vanishing point/mirror gaze isn't amnesia, but a reawakening of our lost power in campy replicas: a hall of mirrors, fatal portraits, echoes of the restless past. In turn, our rememory of personal and generational trauma is something to reassemble through partial lies, reinvention and rape play hinting at truth; i.e., our eyes of confusion, our splendid lies, our darkness visible, our Aegis—to absolutely glow with our dark, whorish revenge! Our beautiful darkness abolishes privatization, be it kings, gods, or masters ("a curse on both your houses!"). We're phallic women getting it off our chests, unburdening ourselves by letting it all out; Lady Vengeance in all her many forms, we've built ourselves up not to tokenize, but refuse to be the state's cops or victims policing sex through force. We seek release, not relapse: our Amazonian moxie, spunk, noive.

(artist: Lera)

Such subversion is symbiotic; all operate on dysfunction as something to process, conjuring up the half-real past for different purposes. Over time, rebels have decayed into cops who strike a balance between human/alien, saying "we're the exclusive victim" during controlled opposition. Medusa has evolved to look more and human, evolving rape arguments that don't just speak to her endless rape, but rape at the hands of those abusing the dialectic of the alien; i.e., transforming and threatening unequal exchange per the whore's paradox to uphold capital and profit, thus continue their raping of nature. Let's explore their liminal reclamation during ludo-Gothic BDSM, here; e.g., anal sex as a symbol of submission that, per the whore's revenge (upending profit), becomes a subversive postcolonial device that Amazons (thicc warrior beings) are party to.

We'll get to anal, in a bit. First, we'll rehash a few important ideas concerning dialectical-materialism, liminality and hauntology vis-à-vis Amazons, look at some different forms of Amazons as subversive warriors whores with Amanda Nicole, apply those to personal experience (me and my mother's), then dive more deeply into Amazonian subversion itself (about killing our darlings and reclaiming anal sex, but also collabs with Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart).

Revenge (and the demons granting it) is a very old idea, and a productive one under Capitalism in both directions (cops and victims). I originally wrote this section using a series of sub-headers (which still exist, below); but due to its increasing length, I had to chop it in two. It wasn't really designed for me doing so, but I'll try and signpost it a little to account for the division—and contents of each separate half—belonging to the same larger coin:

Cops and Victims, part one: The Riddle of Steel; or, Confronting Past Wrongs

- Dialectical-Materialism, Liminality and Hauntology
- Amazons as Whores \(feat. Amanda Nicole\)
- Relating to Amazons \(and Sex Work\) through Personal Experience
- Double Standards and Challenging Them \(Killing Your Darlings, feat. Angela Carter\)

Part two: Our Sweet Revenge; or, Being Ourselves While Reclaiming Anal Rape, mid-Amazonomachia

- Weapons of Terror: Reclaiming Anal Sex
- Always In Dispute: Subjugation vs Subversion \(cont., feat. Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart\)

The opening page per half was written after the bodies of each text was, hence constitutes a foreword of sorts; i.e., containing terms and ideas that don't repeat afterwards, save in synonymous ways; e.g., notions of male and female Gothic, but also gendered violence/courtly love expressed phallically and vaginally with swords and sheaths, maidens and knights (thus whores and rapists). It doesn't hurt to be fluent with such notions, but we won't stress their usage here (refer to Volume One for some good examples)!

(artist: Nora Fawn)

Cops and Victims, part one: the Riddle of Steel; or, Confronting Past Wrongs (feat. Amanda Nicole)

"Conan, what is best in life?" / "To crush your enemies, see them driven before you, and to hear the lamentation of their women!"

—a local khan and Conan, Conan the Barbarian (1981)

Part one shall examine the past of the Amazon myth having become increasingly hostile to state enemies in recent years; i.e., through tokenized feminism vis-à-vis subjugated Amazons acting traditionally like men. Such revenge is notoriously petty insofar as it involves pimping nature as monstrous-feminine; re: as something to crush, kill destroy on repeat to uphold Capitalist Realism with.

In short, such tokenism has become something imitate by class, culture and race traitors in bad faith—neoliberal copaganda conjuring up feminist bugbears, Radcliffe-style, for neoconservative Madonnas to destroy imperial crimes projected onto during state decay (the weakening of the state, thus its myopia): state scapegoats during mirror syndrome; re: cops and victims, the cop tokenized and playing the victim through DARVO and obscurantism, aka cryptofascism. The cloak is the imperial, pre-capitalist space as something to return to, Conan-style: a king or queen by one's own hand, surrounded by stolen wealth (through conquest, specifically feats of strength) and war booty of the finest (classically female) stock:

(exhibit 43e2c3a: Artist: Persephone van der Waard. My mother's brother, Uncle Dave, loved Conan the Barbarian. Both he and Mom grew up playing D&D and reading the likes of Rob Howard, Tolkien and others. When Dave died of a heart attack in mid-2022 [shortly before this book series started], Mom asked me to draw him as a king—like Conan on his throne, made by his own hand. So that's exactly what I did.)

Keeping with Conan's "riddle of steel" (above), fantasies of strength, death, rape and revenge (all Gothic staples) aren't simply state tools; we can reclaim them. Amazonomachia is a mirror game, one where complicit and revolutionary cryptonymy clash to forward or reverse abjection (thus profit and the anisotropic arrangement of terrorist/counterterrorist). This portion focuses more on our enemies meeting us "in the middle"; i.e., through the legend of the Amazon consumed by both parties: as dialectical-material whore/terrorizer to relate to through personal experience, but also mete out through various double standards assisting in state vs worker revenge. Such things become our lullabies and bear our crest—the conqueror anthem a neoliberal refrain to prepare workers for fresh war in the name of state restoration, and which we subvert to dismantle not just the state, but an older part of ourselves!

Dialectical-materialism, Liminality and Hauntology

For the Amazon and Medusa, such dialectical-material struggles are not only dualistic and liminal, but hauntological in their half-real effects. For instance, Hippolyta and Medusa never actually fought in the ancient myths (not to my knowledge, anyways); you wouldn't know it, based on how white token feminism has sought to colonize Medusa through neoconservative military optimism—the forlorn hope that if they punch down hard enough, capital won't arbitrarily cannibalize, trash and orderly dispose of them/abort, scape and flush them down the toilet and into the sewer drain like bottom-of-the-barrel garbage for profit (what Burke in Aliens referred to as "arbitrary extermination"; i.e., regarding the xenomorphs as "a very important species," keen to monetize them versus Ripley wanting to wipe them out during the same displaced Red-Scare moral panic: to outer space). Subjugated Amazons are toadies enjoying victim censorship (e.g., trans people, gagged and bound for them to more easily brutalize) and state camouflage (re: the badge) with the same aesthetic's argumentation and language; i.e., DARVO but also obscurantism, aka cryptofascism/disguise pastiche.

Furthermore, such clemency is wishful thinking at its best. A decaying state always eats its token elements first, token Amazons little more than mall cops rendered into gore by the chopping mall¹⁰⁴. Afraid of nature's revenge after a holocaust they've knowingly played a part in, token Amazons tongue the toilet bowl for loose "dung" (those they dehumanize: themselves, projected onto more marginalized or differently marginalized groups). In turn, nature tokenizes, becoming dim-witted yet quick to blame. Thic(c/k), it rapes itself with a gun held to its head; eventually the gun is removed, but remains part of the worker's raped mind—a menticidal spectre of violence, handed down inside ghosts of its own forging (re: Hogel; e.g., "Rome" or otherwise): of Communist whores, or fascist ones (they occupy the same space using the same aesthetics of power and death, below). To survive, we must camp both as a matter of civil and guerilla warfare/strife (reclaiming the suddenly-alien castle, during Cameron's refrain; e.g., Mario 64, 1996).

(artist: Lera)

Until we do, history shall repeat in tragedy then farce, during the abjection process. Workers always lose, and cops are not known for their compassion or intelligence. When the time comes, they'll hypocritically don bridle or thong in genuine enslavement; they'll eat their own, their bowel septic with colonial rot, golems and gargoyles made from shit. "You are what you eat"; they're mad cows, having truly no dignity or shame when throwing each other under the bus, pearls before swine begging others to squeal as they cut their throats and drink the blood. Per Marx, dead labor feeds on living labor until the calories between them lose their life, their nutritional value passed upwards; the middle-class eaters of the dead become braindead, the Amazon just another cop under these circumstances. They're zombies pushing lawnmowers over barren yards; re: white people disease adopted by Amazons thinking others are inferior and they're owed a Stepford spouse; i.e., while calling others savages despite being hella lazy and gross. Eventually the double standard takes things to their logical conclusion; i.e., token Amazons don't care enough to change because the system coddles them and gives them something hard to attain (under capital; e.g., food and shelter) for being stupid and cruel like men (Foreign Fridays' "POV: You Have a Humiliation Kink," 2024). Capital alienates and sexualizes everything in service to profit, thus rape through revenge arguments that benefit the elite vis-à-vis their token slaves.

¹⁰⁴ Such hauntologies point to zombie-style betrayals—of the consumer by the state as an even-bigger cannibal eating smaller ones; i.e., during capital's endless, concentric harvests. The decay of the settler colony conceals itself through police-style shows of force, which the powerful push towards outsider groups separated from insider groups. But these always come home, Saturn devouring his son during the liminal hauntology of war versus Medusa eating her wayward children at state shift.

The dialectical-material fact (thus struggle) remains: people of all walks love heroes, which are always monsters, thus demons (transforming into hulking versions of a visually weaker original whose subsequent domination-by-comparison opens up masculine/feminine superiority arguments). As such, whores become hyperbolic/Numinous but controllable as alien warriors by all sides of class, culture and race warfare; i.e., as dolls/action figures to play with/teddy bears for companionship that unto themselves evoke some sense of danger and protection, but also fear and power married paradoxically to rape and revenge (voodoo dolls, but also C.S. Lewis' problem of pain, vis-à-vis Rudolph Otto). Incredibly common, they're pacifying or radicalizing depending on how they're used, lending them a situational element, but also a mitigating factor per more universal usages: fight and fawn are survival mechanisms, but also conditioning devices adjacent to generational trauma dressed up as sport, as opera, as kayfabe heavy metal, etc.

To it, Amazons are demons made from trauma in psychomachic division, the light side made to police the dark, but also steal its rebellious barbarian elements while doing so; re: Hippolyta and Medusa, the former a white-washed marble statue chasing down her darker double like Colonel Kurtz to canonically avenge the colony while wearing blackface: fear becomes a gaslight, the Aegis something for the state to abuse against assigned devils punching up against Western ones.

Subversive or not, there's a regressive, performative element to Amazons not unlike any barbarian fantasy. We're playing as much with the liberation of stigmatic devices and outmoded language as we are the people associated with them (though their usage, in sex-positive cases, functions opposite sex-coercive ones). Even so, racism haunts Amazons, their recidivism/recuperation conveniently assisting state restoration by becoming a relapse that restores order while facing embarrassing revelations (foisted onto state enemies); i.e., the state and its colonies die, but the genocidal beliefs that drive them from start to finish live on: inside the larger system where monsters comply or resist on the Aegis.

Per the usual superhero power signatures—e.g., costumes and special moves, but also race tracks, hunting grounds, tourneys and obstacle courses with which to use them on—such Olympian bodies and games articulate police violence against nature-as-vengeful¹⁰⁵ exceptionally well; i.e., in a half-real sense, canonically trained onstage and off to deliver new sex and force built on old sex and force: regarding nature as colonized by traitorous offshoots victimizing the former as alien while playing the victim (these token qualities lending DARVO further legitimacy and illegitimacy before, during and after).

Such façades canonically engender police violence, terror and morphology (monsters) useful to state monopolies, trifactas and qualities of capital. In turn, fascism defends capital when it decays, employing uncanny pain to restore the unheimlich to a "proper" nuclear home, post-apocalypse. It's a Gordian knot, cut brutally through by Alexander's arrogant sword; i.e., military optimism/urbanism, nature a Promethean battle ground for future revenge coming from Elsewhere: in service to capital raping nature with nature, again and again, and empire's collared Amazon traitorously answering the elite's beck and call, Beowulf-style—at home.

Of course, these monopolies are wholly impossible, as are their alienized threat displays motivating workers to tokenize. Yet, as a warrior class, the subversive Amazon remains just as macho as her subjugated double, but also curiously protective, providing and gentle when she needs and/or wants to be—a Queen Kong looking after her "captive," the latter putting themselves paradoxically in harms' way first and on purpose: "Oh, won't someone please capture me and take me far away from here!" The twink energies (and subsequent palliative-Numinous rape fantasies) are second to none (no time to go into that, here; we'll look into twinks and submissive fantasies more in Volume Three)! In turn, "agency" amounts to its own paradox: "choice" informed by oscillating socio-material conditions that interfere with our ability to choose, thus self-define; i.e., subversion of the Amazon as our whore's revenge.

Such subversion is liminal, then—used by canonical forces reclaiming iconoclastic ones and vice versa, praxial inertia versus activation expressed during Amazonian theatrics; re: the dialectic of the alien. Either side reverses beauty-and-beast sex appeal, fashion statements and gender roles to move power (and beauty standards) in either direction; i.e., a combination of prescriptive/descriptive sexuality and drag-show appreciation, the Amazon speaking to a peak-like warrior's towering performance as corporal—one that, when entirely disrobed, can't be reduced to clothing alone (despite the "borrowed robe" double standards): a lonesome lady looking out for a vulnerable male party while capital decays, threatening people's security and personal freedoms with the ghost of the counterfeit! "This city's in for a bit of a rape!" Per the Gothic, it's silly and serious all at once, such monstrous, alien voyeurism "just singing in the rain" (minus Kubrick's nihilistic hooliganism, misogyny and trans exclusion, left).

¹⁰⁵ A false flag and strawman tactic.

(source: Reddit)

It's also Orientalism; i.e., as something to see and exhibit, par excellence. Framed as nature's revenge for past imperial sins, the state recruits from current middle-class groups; i.e., where women (usually white, cis-het Christian women) are more gentrified, thus have more to lose than past examples: those less independent and secure.

Such gargoyle-ish reminders hardly stay in the past; said "past" becomes something to threaten loyal workers with, the latter buying up Neo-Gothic garbage menticing their scared-stupid brains in service to American Liberalism:

There is absolutely nothing that Joe Biden and Kamala Harris can do -- no death toll high enough, no amount of footage of scattered limbs and dead children -- that will change the liberal mind into believing they are not the "lesser evil." For liberals, the lesser evil is simply the one more capable of leading the empire with a facade of decorum on the world stage. It is not the crime that liberals oppose, but how it's packaged (source tweet, Tamara Nassar: October 10th, 2024)

As such, pearl-clutching under American exceptionalism promotes alien revenge conducive to genocide, itself inherited inside ongoing structures that cryptonymically code and conceal imperial consumption, thus predation, as rotten to the core; re: subjugated Amazons having taken the bait to police the church, its sacred grounds suddenly populated with unwelcome demons coming out of the same half-real past (the ghost of the counterfeit gatekept by middle-class forces).

There must always be a victim, in Omelas; i.e., deserving victims (usually women and children) apologized for by undeserving victims, the latter recruited as spokespeople to pacify outrage regarding the former's senseless destruction for profit: merciless slaughter vis-à-vis elements of assimilative inclusion. Such equality isn't universal, but something of convenience that only a select few are chosen to enjoy once they harden their hearts ("one of the good ones," the help)! Superman was an alien, as such; so are Amazons, good or bad, ostensibly human or otherwise. Assimilation is always dangled in front of them, the other choice being unemployment, destitution, silence, homelessness and death (activism not only framed as apophenic conspiracy by the state, but antithetical to profit, thus tantamount to sedition).

(artist: Miss Favés)

Through liminal beings like the Amazon or Medusa, then, the Gothic considers how fakery and artifice speak to police abuse as monstrous; i.e., by means of arbitrary us-versus-them representation. During the whore's paradox, rebel and cop hyphenate in appearance, their mutual alienation speaking to carrot-and-stick conditions and behaviors during unequal power exchange passed back and forth. Amazons cannot physically transform, but can betray the proletariat by punching down.

As such, the romance is hardly romantic, the seminal catastrophe not just presently underway but happening again, once-and-future; e.g., the state kills babies and Kamala Harris (a token cop) explains it away and covers it up, backpedaling and virtue-signaling behind a veneer of exceptional, immutable goodness. Good cop, bad cop; Amazons and knights, ACAB and ASAB—our genderqueer camping of these alien devices must reflect this duality. Insofar as Nazis and Communists exist among the same shadow zone's demonic expression, silence is genocide (a common variant during the AIDS crisis was "Silence is death"; same idea). We cannot afford to stay silent or otherwise assist in genocide by politely taking state gold (re: Zeuhl and Jadis).

Nor can we afford to play philistine and discount the entire linguo-material labor value of sexuality and gender-non-conformity in art, monsters and porn (re: Bad Empanada, "Understanding Vampires," 2024). To speak out against war profiteers, we must camp canon as it exists—unequally across all workers affected by profit turning them not just alien, but sex cop. Freedom is a constant struggle, then, one defined by resistance pushing towards a day many will not live to see.

Such is Gothic Communism, whose bitter pill ludo-Gothic BDSM offsets with the ability to synthesize some degree of catharsis in our daily lives! Amazons embody this, but also their own abuse in hauntological hindsight; i.e., something to transform away from older sell-outs and commodities occupying the same draconian surfaces and spaces; re: pastiche remediates praxis. Amazons are alien warriors of sex and force, seeking some facet of revenge for or against nature (even if that revenge is merely to exist as they are in opposition to state dogma; e.g., a muscled whore to dress up as a crossdress likeness of a dragon, below).

Now that we've shored up the dialectical-material elements, I want to consider the personal experiencing of such stories: how we inherit them; i.e., as they're endlessly made and remade, through Gothic bad echo.

(artist: Kinda Sorta Maebe)

Gil Scott-Heron once said, "the revolution will not be televised," but outside establishment media, revolutionary cryptonymy still takes place between media and mediators; i.e. through regressive power fantasies, which Amazons (a kind of barbarian) ultimately are. These didn't start in the Modern period/Capitalocene, but the Neo-Gothic revival took what we think of Amazons and knights and expressed them in popular unequal power fantasies that are still used today when capital decays.

Such devices aren't "new"; the state has loved to abuse demons for as long as they could invent them, including Amazons as classic female power fantasies invoking herbo warrior elements in predator/prey language to deter and instill rape. Simply scare people into purchasing what they can abject, then watch the West testify to its own atrocities against nature; i.e., by fabricating them, such gender trouble speaking on how people control trauma as made into dollish devices for them to purchase and play with. This paywalled catharsis extends to performances that are doll-like by much the same logic (which Amazons are/follow). In doing so, middle-class workers under Pax Americana eat garbage because they're scared; i.e., by material inequities and heteronormative impunity (of state forces pimping nature-as-alien/whore). They consequently feel scared because they eat garbage that scares and relieves them; i.e., they feel shame and guilt, fearing revenge from those most obviously in control of such things—the elite and their servants, a husband comparable to a cop, thus a pimp. Subjugated Amazons can decay into adopting a similar misogynistic or otherwise bigoted posture; i.e., one approached by those who seek even the suggestion of power to their otherwise powerless lives.

Their doing so isn't entirely baseless. Like any heirloom, such fakeries convey some degree of truth, a repressed evil hovering over the uncanny homestead: husband or homelessness, one decidedly more harmful despite rape being a lived reality for both. Women could not legally own property (thus material power) in the 1700s, so they married into power to avoid the various comorbidities known to homelessness; e.g., rape all the time, versus from their husband every so often in exchange for relative comfort; i.e., for loyal wives, dutifully punching down at illegal whores from positions of relative (dis)advantage (a wife is a legal whore). As such, they would often marry men to later fetishize them, doing so in a rising creative medium dominated by white women obsessed with alien things: Gothic novels. Per Wolff, such stories commonly depicted men as demon lovers that, in older fairy tales, were eventually defeated or transformed—a curious trend that Gothic media has since ferried into the present, regarding Amazons; i.e., based on the historically uneven and gentrifying experience of middle-class marriage.

Ann Radcliffe's marriage, for example, was relatively non-abusive (though her life was shrouded in mystery—enough to frustrate her biographers; e.g., Rictor Morton). Despite this, the Great Enchantress canonized demon sex as much to abject colonial abuse onto criminals (the banditti, in her case) as to liberate middle-class housewives looking for a thrill; i.e., alien mates. But marriage remains the prescribed outcome of those original novels, itself overshadowed by the unlucky girl before she discovers her secret-princess status (Amazons being warrior princesses): survive the rape castle's barbaric nightmare; get married and give all you own to the male hero. Oh, boy!

(artist: Rim Jims)

To it, Gothic fantasies of sex and force were and are classically of assimilation from alienized positions burdened by monstrous-feminine revenge conspiracies and warrior elements. These have changed considerably over time, their aesthetic metabolism informed by feminism married to Amazonian myth. Later authors (from the mid-20th century onwards) cut out the husband, speaking to women who were both less fortunate than Radcliffe was, yet born into worlds where women presumably had more rights (not native to the land, per se, but alienated from it just as native populations are by white cis-het men acting as the universal owners of each; re: the true aliens brutalizing land and occupant alike).

My mother is one such woman. Born to a lower-middle-class family that cut her off, she came from the street—i.e., where the rubber meets the road—thus was homeless and criminal, hence exposed to Amazon fantasies a sixteen-year-old girl might use to try and take the edge off: for fear of needing to sleep with strange men for cheeseburgers and a warm bed. Being classic symbols of female strength, Amazons bore progressive and regressive (neocon) elements, of which my mother was hardly immune to such promises in either case; i.e., she wanted to be strong in ways that, in the same breath, also concerned what men felt attracted to (what was forbidden to them), and which Mom could seek sanctuary within: to never need a man again, but still look sexy in ways that carried an ace, monstrous-feminine flavor (the interrogation of trauma in female warrior language/public nudism).

In short, Amazons (and their power fantasies) carried value for her as she tried to survive; i.e., the unspoken but notorious abuse that any woman, but especially those that a mentally ill young woman in the late '70s and early '80s, would have to endure. In the end, Mom chose marriage over being a destitute whore, but this led to abuse comparable to what she had already survived on the street; the cops were as useless after her marriage as before it (a restraining order is just a piece of paper). It goes to show that Amazon fantasies walk the line between fantasy and real life, the best method towards tailoring a healthy approach (to the whore's revenge) is taking both (and their many, many forms, below) into consideration: dark power and knowledge as forbidden sight to advertise for all workers, not some. They must, or it's merely Omelas-by-Amazon; re: token women aping straight white men, declaring "boundaries for me, not thee!"

We'll get to my mother's experiences with Amazons and sex work in between art and real life, but first I want to outline the idea in general:

Amazons as Whores (feat. Amanda Nicole)

(exhibit 43e2c3b: Artist: Kassarie Draws. Although token Amazons generally present as chaste-if-muscled, virginal combatants against Medusa-as-abject-whore—e.g., Ellen Ripley vs the Alien Queen—they aren't mutually exclusive with whores or Medusa; i.e., as things to combine with that, true enough, are also modular when discussing rape and revenge as having a "pretty and petty" flavor. Amazons, at their core, are bikini models with a warrior character [e.g., Marvel's Red Sonja basically being a ginger herbo in chainmail underwear] but also bear a non-white/non-Western stamp. This can be a "white Indian" vibe, to be sure, but also something "orcish" speaking to a variety of xenophobic stigmas [racial, religious, and/or queer] to, like the Amazon, either reclaim or at least understand through play.

In Gothic media, nudity = exposure. Amazons of a more "whorish" character are seen as fighters that, in conservative morality arguments, surrender or defend their maiden-esque virtue from rape when placed into compromising positions; i.e., to be nude is to risk corruption but also predation from evil forces: warrior nuns. Per the whore's paradox, Amazons also flaunt their strength in defiance of patriarchal forces trying to control their bodies to begin with: to incessantly show skin, thus spite the SWERFs. And while such resistance has shifted under neoliberal Capitalism—meaning towards various scapegoats that Amazons tokenize with during imaginary crime waves/rape epidemics—it needn't always be the case. This exhibit will explore the various ways that nudity expresses as a sex-positive form of strength—Amazonian or otherwise, but certainly useful when expressing them as a poetic device alongside Medusa!

Like all monstrous-feminine, Amazons and Medusa express through plurality during liminal expression; i.e., women are born into a world that divides them into different, oft-warring pieces. Most common are the virgin and the whore but also psychomachic fantasies about either that concern the woman's metafictional ability to change shape/arrange power in different unequal forms; i.e., the Amazon as a "berserk" to briefly inhabit whenever one feels out of control, but likewise wants to perform and preserve/pervert elusive elements of the self that Medusa speaks to, in Gothic stories: the Amazon's dark whorish side. Amazons are whores and all whores are demons that communicate through sex and force, pleasure and pain.

Furthermore, such demon BDSM occupies the Aegis and its illusory shadow zone; re: whose paradoxical theatre houses them without shame, but also helps the women performing them interrogate different complicated feelings adjacent to state abuse: being a slut according to how "slut" is coded, in popular culture [e.g., Wednesday Adams, top-left].

[source, top-right; artist, everything else: Queen Complex]

For example, a woman commonly feels the need to beautify and become desired in different forms; i.e., body shapes associated with dom or sub, thus different classical power scenarios and beauty standards like the Amazon and Medusa. She might find herself guiltily wanting to betray others, or slum in ways that speak to darker fantasies—of rape, captivity and violence—wherein she gives as good as she gets: anisotropically from positions of strength and weakness performed-and-informed by her status as a woman to begin with; re: the whore's revenge.

In dialectical-material terms, such things can be fun to play with, minus actual harm; i.e., to play with "rape" by putting it quotes, doing so as much to help survivors of trauma overcome misinformed or pejorative ideas of rape association/Gothic ignorance as it is to achieve personal catharsis. Through ludo-Gothic BDSM, these various paradoxes even allow women to imagine themselves changing their body size/shape [top-right] or the size/shape of their partner [size difference] and the arrangement/appearance of the power between them [bottom-left] through BDSM binaries like top/bottom, virgin/whore, [wo]man/animal, and dom/sub. All go hand-in-hand towards raising emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness during the struggle to develop Gothic [gay-anarcho] Communism; i.e., by relating to what we see, onstage.

Those who feel like Velma, for example, can both acknowledge their actual sexual inexperience [bottom-right] while trying to learn what is normally denied to them; use the "nerd" archetype [the "angel in the streets, freak in the sheets"] to hide their body count from people who would shame or fetishize them; or otherwise give them the ability to voice themselves with these ideas, hence use them to establish new boundaries through roleplay. Likewise, it can let them investigate, confront and play with the imaginary past and its different legends of psychosexual violence; i.e., in ways that disarm or humanize the traditional, mutilative harm associated with them, which create vaso vagal feelings of danger and pleasure working with confused predator/prey sensations: a palliative-Numinous mirror of one's actual ontological condition/crossed wires received from old trauma currently living inside/outside the body [we'll return to this concept more in the "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons" subsection].

The point is, women are pushed towards doing sex in some shape or form; e.g., Amanda Nicole, a "slut pop" music star similar to Kim Petras except she actually does explicit sex work—a fact that expresses visually in Nicole's music¹⁰⁶ as multiple competing voices:

[source: Amanda Nicole's "Pretty and Petty," 2023]

In turn—and in keeping with the skin-deep, petty reputation of female revenge—the whore's revenge also speaks to getting even in a world that awards certain appearances despite classic modesty arguments. For example, the PAWG Medusa [above] has power because her witchy body is "non-white," thus desired guiltily by those who, in sexually repressive environments, view her exposure as intoxicating. She becomes something not to ¹⁰⁶ Both artists are sex-positive, but Nicole channels pornstar energy through a pornstar body. That being said, Kim's "slut era" speaks to a veneer of sex work (her website, KimXXXXX, having softcore elements, which are as valid as hardcore forms) made to help safeguard her friends:

In a new interview, Petras reveals that her most recent EP, Slut Pop, was a pleasure-filled persona. "I was trying to have the most ridiculous fun with the sluttiest character I could come up with," she says. "It was someone who would say whatever the f— she wanted to." With songs like "Throat Goat" and "Treat Me Like A Slut," the German pop star clearly ate and left no crumbs. However, she wants people to know that it's deeper than that. It was a form of solidarity. "That was at a time when OnlyFans was going to ban sex workers," Petras says. "I have a lot of friends who need sex work in order to transition. It's a very normal thing in my world, and I don't see anything wrong with doing sex work. I wanted those girls to feel empowered" (source: Gigi Fong's "Kim Petras on OnlyFans and the Importance of Her Slut Era," 2023).

With women and sex, the line between performance and performer is classically thin, but actually allows for tremendous variation; i.e., the whore's paradox includes the ability to act sex out/contribute to universal liberation on different registers differently at the same time; e.g., between cis and trans women. To that, Petras' slut was a character that spoke for her friends doing sex work to survive; by comparison, Nicole is a sex worker whose music speaks to the same idea, but through a slightly different arrangement—a character to play onstage, yes, but also someone whose music and sex work are less of a stage act and more one indicating the other beyond what the music video can show.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

chase, but crave and worship with the proper nudge. It's an attention game, but one that speaks truthfully to how power works in social situations. During these, sex is never far off on many peoples' minds; they see it in ways that—for one in control of such things—can manipulate to her benefit: embodying power as something to savor and worship, but also fear as capricious [or "petty," as Nicole calls it]. Sex symbols double as monstrous-feminine symbols of revenge—to not only "make it," under capital, but thrive there despite its rapacious treatment of women!

Nicole's fantasy offers a cross-examination of different monstrous-feminine revenge: the mean girl, the witch, and the ethereal sex goddess. All are objects d'art/tremendous mysteries that convey power through aesthetic and arrangement as one in the same, but speak to female revenge toying with ideas of getting even as Amazons do: exposing our bodies as "naked" with or without clothes; re: Segewick. In a world of manufactured competition, scarcity and conflict, having power over one's enemies includes enchanting your would-be attackers using what you got; i.e., less turning them to stone, like Medusa does, and more into your admirers to shower you with praise and tribute, mid-courtship: to look the part, then seize the "jewels" for yourself [the reclamation of carrot and stick] and push towards the abolishment of privatization [and be adored for it]! Pop off, queen!

Gods personify human failings as much as human virtues. Like many revenge fantasies, Nicole's vision is imperfect; but its pornographic flavor speaks nicely to the liminal qualities of revenge, and investigating the anger of such individuals being part of a larger group: of workers instilling fear among their usual dominators and getting what's theirs. It also speaks to workers normally feeling compelled to fight amongst themselves. Revolution is a psychomachy—a folie à deux and ménage à trois to share madness and sin with in highly performative ways, but also orient ourselves toward, mid-relationship[s]: power as something to perceive in Amazonian ways, paradox and play existing in doubled, "dueling" bodies, replete with various double standards e.g., Mixed Wrestling Fan's "[Girl Beats Boy Mixed Wrestling Part 2," 2023].

To it, theatrical outlets are important, including Gothic, openly transgressive ones playing with and pay-walling sex through push-pull feelings and mechanisms. Dark reflections of the world we live in, they let us say different things about said world per labor exchange [art and/or porn]. This includes when we're upset and that we desire revenge in more literal forms, but combines with subversive embodiments of the Amazon and Medusa [sex goddesses] to grant those seeking the whore's revenge a vast polity of choice—one that speaks to the totality of our human condition insofar as whores [and their revenge] are concerned.

Flexing and wish fulfillment are, per Amazons/the Medusa, threat displays as much as any sort of drive turning the world into the exact image, viewed onstage. Just as often, we let off steam and let people see it: the "goods" and the thrill of different "trades" of/with said goods. We likewise tailor our actual praxis to synthesize theatrical outlets that, unto themselves, leave some room for interpretation, thus execution of the monstrous-feminine. It becomes something to control, its mood paradoxically empowering despite any debilitating trauma [and slut shame] associated with it. "What's a girl to do?" you ask? "She walks in beauty like the night!" But this yields different forms per video and across one's catalog.

artist: [Amanda Nicole]

In "Pretty and Petty," the Amazon is more of an echo on Nicole's thicc, feminine body. Conversely, others videos in Nicole's portfolio critique power through a more direct merger of whore and Amazon; e.g., "Main Event" [2023].

A few more thoughts about "Pretty and Petty," specifically its locations. Nicole starts with the classroom, then the dark repressed desires of the underworld tyrant, culminating in the mysteries [and aloofness] of the sex symbol's stationary idolatry and revelation. But these could play out in any order and all share the same basic stage. In turn, they speak to a common paradox for whores: getting what one wants. Doing so, onstage, presents as sinful to the audience, but also speaks to the harmful nature of Capitalism gatekeeping such things to begin with [forcing women to girlboss, gaslighting them]. It speaks to us having to navigate various trends and beauty standards while camping them. Every person has their preference on the Aegis, and Amanda's high-voltage, danger-disco tryptic encapsulates such monstrous-feminine variety in three distinct types: of non-Amazonian whores that channel Amazonian spunk.

"If you want to critique power, you must go where it is." The celebration of sex through Gothic poetry is messy, hence always a liminal affair—one where assimilation and liberation/appropriation and appreciation occupy the same fantastical realms and involve the same basic devices; i.e., whatever's "on tap," being traded for and with [social status and material goods, sex and force] between different groups in the same larger market: where power is stored, but also the ways in which its artifacts demonically relate, through unequal, forbidden exchange and transformation. These happen during playtime speaking to live events, a skilled thespian able to work it in ways that speak to real life caught between pure fantasy and vice characters [who generally are seeking love and acceptance, but also domination and respect].

Power exchanges every day, and in ways whose understanding is, itself, forever updating/in flux with older forms. The paradox equates to consent-non-consent for those who have been raped; i.e., we can throw shade/get rough and chase the maiden and whore through rape play and Gothic fantasy at large—in short, having fun while processing demon-lover appetites in torturously hungry, mix-and-match language! The whole point, with fantasies like Nicole's, is to encounter Amazonian or Medusa-like beings seemingly "out of our league," yet have the capacity to change how such things exchange/are understood to begin with:

Consider body language. So often women [or those forced to identify as/treated like women] are treated as sex objects, reduced to single body parts [so-called "T&A," left] used for the enjoyment of men; or they embody virtue and vice [re: virgin/whore] in ways that reduce them to singular emotions. Being able to play with these not only gives us control over ourselves and our emotional scars/comorbidities; it allows us to manipulate the world around us in ways useful to our liberation through these things: "I am strong!" Amazons don't always win, but they have something that many women feel like they don't: the confidence to fight back.

"Strength," like demons, has infinite forms and configurations; e.g., "weakness" is strength, wherein "soft" femininity tops from below [or vice versa, and a million in-between¹⁰⁷ combinations]. Furthermore, this castled, animalistic ¹⁰⁷ I.e., death by Snu-Snu as something to portray in so many forms. Cis-het men, for example, see any kind of sex out of the bedroom as whorish, including things they sexualize in different ways, like Amazons or Medusa. This double standard ensures that any contact with them is forbidden, because society at large will treat/view it as automatically sexual, even if one side isn't doing it for that; e.g., ballerinas, wrestlers, or any other female athlete in existence. And sometimes, this becomes a joke to play with. But it doesn't preclude or change the reality that things are inherently unequal through such athleticism; i.e., girls living in a man's world. Any subversion taking place will reflect that disparity.

All the while, art and porn aren't mutually exclusive, but canon treats them as such; re: through us versus them. But we can simultaneously acknowledge that, yet operate in good faith—accepting that different people invariably get different things out of the same event.

Natalia Sense's "Yoga Art — Flexibility Flow" (above, 2024), for example, is artistic for the model, but simultaneously working within fetishes and clichés her target audience will undoubtedly indulge; i.e., in through her stunning body (and production values). And she's obviously aware of that. Art and commerce can coexist, and involve various interpretations as much from the viewer as from the performer challenging this or that with this or that.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

charioteer's from-outer-space liminality emerges through the uncanny ability to play with highly regulated things, opening the door to better worlds by transitioning towards them through the plastic, doll-like language of the imaginary past. "She mighty mighty!" becomes one having the whore's revenge by changing shape and expressing oneself in unequal, forbidden ways: grist for her "mill," her castle-in-the-flesh a graveyard-sex unheimlich coming paradoxically alive! "Rise, rise and do my bidding!" [she says to your dick].

Artists can combine literally anything with anything else; e.g., Nicole's "Main Event" combining sports language, gangster rap, and pop references, similar to Cardi B.'s "WAP" [2020] and its own sexual gladiator's "warrior libido" marrying whore to Amazon that, unto itself, is haunted by Medusa's shadow [the opposite of "Pretty and Petty"]:

Got it drippin quench ya thirst
Top 5 bet he pick me first Got him fiening for me like I'm his crack

The thunder cat [rawr]
He ain't used to that
I completely drained his nut sack
Ass is fake but this pussy natty
Lift me in the air and Put it all in your face like a plate daddy

They all wanna wife me up
I'm Jordan out here gettin rings
None of them king enough to be Anything more than just a fling
I'm a big playa' champ
I'm here to take over the game
I'm the main event you lame
We are not the fuckin' same

We gonna' do alota' freaky shit tonight
First you eat me on the counter
Then I ride you like a bike
I'm a nympho and he love it
I do everything he like
We on the floor he on his back
That pussy poppin like a sprite
I be thick and still fit
Now go suck this clit [source: Musixmatch]

Nicole embraces the fakeness of herself, the power no less real because of fat injections or breast implants. The paradox of nudity is how modesty arguments automatically blame the whore, the maiden viewed as one for exposing herself to men [who canon apologizes for as "always being that way"]. Medusa's a power bottom who "owns it" sans guilt, outside the bedroom. She doesn't just fuck to metal e.g., Dance with the Dead's "[Rust," 2024]; she is the metal! The Queen of the Night is like an Amazon, then—a dark mommy dom to tempt and tease¹⁰⁸, but also "destroy" you with exquisite "torture!" on the Aegis! Out and proud, ground and pound, her playful energies hyphenate/mirror her serious ones, elevating us to a campy borderline speaking subversively to the duality of human language/the liminality of sex work: of fucking with someone who, should she choose, could pull out our still-beating heart/turn us inside-out!

The Gothic historically loves exciting murder puns/messy euphemisms and death/rape theatre's oxymoronic, memento-mori language; re: creating sex and force for people to play with minus the worry of courtly love's actual harm. Such things aren't above criticism. Yet the praxial idea, for Gothic Communism and ludo-Gothic BDSM, is to rewrite value on the palimpsest of patriarchal devices. It does this by subverting canonical norms through visually constant monster language, hence become actively conscious of such power and use it to develop a better world for all workers; re: to catalog and engender perceptive pastiche [through the context of mutual consent] while engaging with less-perceptive [sex-coercive] liminalities. During the cryptonymy process, we sit adjacent to power in uneven/uncanny forms; i.e., transforming them to suit our needs: training us to relax while on our toes!)

For workers, power is darkness and knowledge, of which money plays a part; for capital, profit is money (moving money through nature). Whatever the metaphor (or any kind of poetic abstraction in art and porn), Amazons reflect the lived reality of women; i.e., modesty is a myth when you're starving and cold, treating your body and dignity as things to trade with in order to survive; re: Cuwu, controlling the room with sex. Mom was no different, the men around her alienated from sex, which she could trade in exchange for shelter and food as alienated from her (and whose trades she read about in Gothic fantasies). There's no shame in it, of course, but all the same, taboo commodities like sex, drugs and rock 'n roll became coping mechanisms that shaped her personal experiences when trying to survive; i.e., stamped monstrosly onto female bodies out of Antiquity into the present, Amazons (and Medusa) authored inside a world happy to demonize them using a shared linguo-material device: quid pro quo.

¹⁰⁸ Which the Gothic does while camping the nuclear model's parental language in fairytale-style roleplays and parlance; e.g., "mommy" and "daddy."

While strangers to poverty might think that sex is never for sale, the reality is quite the opposite. And yet, this isn't automatically bad. Amanda Nicole, for example, just showed us how sex isn't automatically harmful towards workers, but rather is a service to offer deserving of respect as much as benefits and a living wage (success being her revenge, expressed through sex work). In demonic terms, it speaks to a Faustian element regarding forbidden fruit having an arbitrary price tag: "Cross my palm with silver."

Relating to Amazons (and Sex Work) through Personal Experience

Just as often, though, sex work takes on a survival quality for those without the luxury to do anything else. Fawning mechanisms, in turn, help abused parties control a situation as best we can, using what we got; i.e., through combinations of alien sex and force expressed in raw poetic forms; e.g., the damsel-in-distress, the executioner's Great Destroyer persona, and the Amazonian pinup's public nudism, carnage/carnal knowledge, and whore's rape and revenge, etc. Like them and Medusa, when we look at these things, we're looking at the imaginary past speaking to historical (colonial, ethnocentric) atrocities happening right now under the pretense of past-as-make-believe: the ghost of the counterfeit is always rape, be that a rapist or rape victim. Per liminal expression, the subjugated Amazon plays a cop while inventing a shadow of something with a kernel of truth to it (which subversive Amazons try to camp): the ghost of empire being an excuse to colonize new peoples for the Good Guys killing the Bad; re: Goldilocks Imperialism, whores policing whores for fear of the Destroyer hanging over them:

(artist: Frank Frazetta)

Be those treats or threats, such Amazonian prostitution fantasies effectively occurred for my mother through Gothic comfort food's usual cafeterias; i.e., on the television screen (from back when that was all there was to watch) and in media at large; e.g., trashy Conan paperbacks and Weird magazine offshoots (which included "H.P. Lovecraft's" *Necronomicon*¹⁰⁹

¹⁰⁹ Lovecraft merely revived such weird-nerd Orientalism; i.e., from a Providence gentleman's harmful idea of "mad Arab," the concept lifted from older bigots and revolutionaries; e.g., Percy Shelley's "Ozymandias" (1818) or Poe's Arthur Gordon Pym (1838) having similar ideas about places the West (and the inexorable passage of time) had already conquered and long since dreamt about.

Unlike Shelley (the husband or wife), Lovecraft was fascist (thus full of shit), as were the other authors who purposefully carried on his ideas in his lifetime (and after); i.e., all were building on demonic xenophobia as something to expand upon in fascist ways: to create and assign evil to a world

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard

Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

as "found"¹¹⁰ and published in the 1970s), but also the so-called "final girls" from slasher movies like Alien, Halloween and The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1979, 1978, and 1974), as well as Valeria from Conan the Barbarian (1981). All informed Mom's traumatic lived experiences, growing up as a whore in the Shadow of Pygmalion; i.e., abused by the men in her life, which caused her to dive headlong into fictional adventures written either by men fetishizing Amazons (and other monstrous-feminine) in the Pygmalion fantasy (of controlling women's bodies and turning them not just into servants, but alien warriors), or by women who took the idea and ran with it, liberating Galatea to speak for herself and other oppressed groups alienated from their homes (e.g., Angela Carter or Anne Rice).

Regardless of who the authors were, or how sex-positive they actually acted in practice (re: knowledge is defined as a struggle from positions of relative ignorance towards informed consent), Mom gleefully consumed such things with a variety of other forgeries; i.e., alongside Tolkien's Hobbit and subsequent LotR, the latter followed by D&D tabletop sessions that neoliberal refrains (re: videogames) cryptomimetically echoed when inheriting the same imperial mantle. She did so because their Amazonian monsters and heroes both a) spoke to her own trauma, whose decay was leading to regressive witch hunts. While we'll explore the value in these worldviews' astrotheology when we look at Alien, such people largely suck because all—similar to Tolkien and his orcs and goblins—abused occult mythology to foster a commodified ignorance of the imaginary past standing in for the actual. As Gabriel McKee writes, Lovecraft, "Simon" (the compiler of the Simon Necronomicon), and the anti-cult crusaders all trade in different misinterpretations of history. The general public knows just enough about the history of the ancient Near East for it to view it as a place of mystery and strangeness. Indeed, this reputation is itself an inheritance from the ancient world, as Greeks and Romans saw "magic" as coming from the East (In Book 30.2 of his Natural History Pliny the Elder declares that "there is no doubt that this art originated in Persia."). This proto-orientalism, combined with historical illiteracy—or perhaps committed distrust of "history" as an elite conspiracy in itself—has led to the mystification of antiquity as something incomprehensible, occult, or even satanic. This has opened the door for both outright fraudsters and what Laycock calls "moral entrepreneurs" to write their own chimerical histories, inserting the names of ancient places and deities into imagined struggles between cosmic good and evil. These faulty constructions of history depend on ignorance. We actually know quite a lot about ancient Near Eastern cultures and their religious practices—and the ISAW Library contains many of the fruits of this knowledge—but historical fabrications expect and depend on ignorance. The more we learn, and the better we communicate that knowledge, the more tools we will have for opposing misconstrued history (source: "The Misappropriation of Ancient Texts," 2015).

Of course, such "ancient" copies aren't strictly a negative. Instead, "the idea of Gothic ancestry endured because it was useful" (re: Madoff's 1979 "The Useful Myth of Gothic Ancestry")—a utility that applies as much to workers reclaiming Amazons for revolutionary purposes (e.g., Matthew Lewis' shapeshifting Matilda) as to Lovecraft as his ilk demonizing witches-by-another-name: Chthonic whores (a '20s and '30s vaudeville caricature of Satanic Panic and Hammer of Witches). Reclaiming the Wisdom of the Ancients goes both ways!

¹¹⁰ While found documents are a common Gothic trope, Lovecraft never actually wrote a Necronomicon, himself. The copy my mother had was written under the nom de plume, "Simon" (attributed to Peter Levenda, an occult historian who denies involvement; see: above).

and b) made her feel safe regarding the abuse that was happening to her by those who were drawn to Mom's survived weirdness: a desire to be strong that takes on a half-real shape (and life) of its own!

Weird attracts weird, trauma attracts trauma; in turn, Mom passed these alien devices down to me, a prolonged and unrequited desire sitting between mother and daughter that reliably expressed itself in demonic language: for Mom to be like Valeria or some-similar Amazon, badass Galatea, Queen Bitch of the Universe. Whatever nudity and strength she bears, those reasons are her own and not beholden to state dickwads looking to get that nut: she'll cut you in places you don't want to be cut!

(artist: Moi Yablochki)

Mom's the strongest person I know, strength being defined as much by unequal arrangements of power and how you respond to/with said power under duress; i.e., when your life, and that of others' you love, hang in the collective balance! In short, you live to tell the tale as something to build upon. By extension, warriors take pride in their lineage, which is always to some degree fictional. Even so, it remains a source of constant pride to pass down through personal experience married to legend, but one that is equally androgynous for those subversive Amazonian tropes; i.e., in ways that speak to a more tolerant past-revived in the Gothic mode than the exact hauntologies my mother herself consumed and passed down to me, and which my own stories tried to correct by speaking to myself as trans. Would that I could have helped her find that power sooner than she did (the paradox being that I wouldn't exist; i.e., my birth is illegitimate, produced by a marriage of convenience that saw me conceived out of wedlock)! Thankfully she found it herself in the end, stating both how she wouldn't change a thing but admitting such hard-fought wisdom would have made her life considerably easier once-upon-a-time!

I can certainly relate, seeking out my own unequal power fantasies (trans, in my case) while trouble found me and forced me to change. In doing so, it made me want for heroes, too; i.e., powerful and sexy aliens (e.g., Undine, above) that spoke to my innermost desires: to be thicc, female and "raped" in ways I could control—to be strong enough that one never knows harm again, but evokes palliative-Numinous shadows of it as situational medicine. People forget, demons are hunted, and I commonly found myself craving strength under hostile conditions—not to fetishize them exclusively but to speak these phenomena under state rule; i.e., escaping the "yoke" by putting it quotes, reclaiming it. The paradox of nightmares and darkness is my protectors are often bad echoes of my rapists; I crave protection from those who could destroy me and look dangerous but aren't, because they nurture and protect me from actual abusers; re: "I want to fuck what I want to be." Mixed metaphors are fine, provided they communicate a clear message, hence achieve forbidden sight with darkness visible.

In my case, Amazons grant me the Gothic ability to find similarity amid difference; i.e., rape play isn't apologia if it takes the needs of all parties somehow into account. Personal experience, then, includes sharing the memories of past abuse through emotional extremes excited by Gothic paradox. Writing about Amazons married to my own abusive past, I commonly get images in my head—of abusers making me feel lesser and telling me I deserve to be hunted, captured, and raped (alongside fantasies that "walk the line" for medicinal purposes; re: calculated risk). This happens despite my relative privilege; i.e., even if I'm a trans, white, American woman and not, for instance, a Palestinian Arab, I still have memories of abuse that cross over into feelings of abuse expressing Gothic feelings (of alienation) that could apply to both of us in abstract ways; e.g., the child or white woman running into the forest, being chased by the lord's men, their dogs.

Equal comparisons aren't the point, here, but rather to share the same feelings: of being made to feel lesser, to be treated unironically like a whore, to be chased down and beaten like a dog. We can evoke it in ways that raise the dead, often towards feelings of inequality that solidarize us through a common goal, during the pedagogy of the oppressed: healing from rape to foster the prevention of harm in stories we experience differently but have similar feelings towards; i.e., to be "rape proof" (resistant to its deleterious mental effects) without raping others. We seek to engender compassion among those harmed by those abusing from positions of unfair advantage.

For me, trauma and transition are one in the same; for myself and others, these feelings paradoxically sit among the incessant peal of raucous alarms, which for so many victims' hypervigilance, always ring inside/outside themselves. Some desire the muscle of masculine sex appeal (to occupy or handle inside the bedroom or out), others a more feminine sort, and more still a bit from Column A and Column B entwined; such gender trouble and subsequent parody—of biology unanchored from sex and gender (and both from each other through Gothic poetics challenging canonical essentialism)—involves Amazons and their submissive wards through the aesthetic of doms and subs, tops and bottoms. "Wanna see me turn into [monster form]?" yields cheeky inquiries like Milky Kitty's, "Wanna see me put it all the way in?" Lycanthropy gonna lycanthrope!

(artist: Milky Kitty)

Control over our bodies includes how they appear as monstrous, but also what we put inside them as such; i.e., sex and force relayed in all the usual scandalous ways (often porn, left)! "Rape" enters quotes speaking with bodies and actions that "shadow" their more violent doubles: traumatic penetration (of which the Amazons are famous for) contrasting with various taming rituals that see all manner of things going into all manner of naturally assigned holes. The potential to camp rape marries to various stress-relieving activities that are, themselves, haunted by spectres of fascism and Marx alike: good-evil medicine, which functions differently for us than the state; i.e., strap-ons versus holocaust-by-bullet.

We camp the latter with the former not to so much to camp holocaust at large, but our own profound survival having experienced our own variation thereof ("Noooo, I'm being ravished! You're conquering my vast swathes of territory!"). We do so not to deny or conceal genocide, but speak to its concealment through our revolutionary cryptonymy—as a form of personal experience translated back into stories, then back into personal experience, on and on.

In turn, oppressed pedagogies speak to all manner of demonic exchange and transformation, for which porn is perfectly fine in doing provided it's sex-positive; i.e., done in good faith and actively seeking universal liberation: by illustrating mutual consent per labor exchange expressed as art (for which porn is; re: "art is love [thus mutual, informed consent and universal equal rights] made public") as Gothically mature. For this, demons are well-suited, courtly love (and its bellicose mating rituals/rites of passage) involving all of the above in a vast, interconnective matrix of endless possibilities. For the state, there is only rape, regardless of form; all subjugated Amazons can do is rape or be raped because their Gothic voice is immature, barbaric, toxic—abusing demonized language that furthers abjection during the dialectic of the alien!

Challenging universal rape with universal liberation, then, requires combining various taboos and reimagining different mythical devices with them; i.e., the Amazon being an alien/uncanny combination of noble (to not-so-noble) savage, per Orientalism, but also the clever reimagining of a white female imaginary past and lost heritage (similar to Hotep culture for peoples of color) to issue some semblance of protection while inside. Hardly discrete, it should instead permit various modular-to-intersectional forms of staged public nudism that have been unshackled from colonial supervisors, and whose galleries combine gender and sexuality with raw expressions of theatrical violence, but especially colonial atrocities; e.g., slave revolts; i.e., Medusa unchained in safe environments for both sides to work out their differences, those fearing her revenge learning to hug someone who understandably has baggage (once-bitten, twice-shy). Per the Gothic, such unveilings have to be done with some degree of care and boldness, directors able to give fair warning before maniacally throwing caution to the wind!

In other words, public nudism is directed by people whose understanding of sex positivity has become second-nature; i.e., who make informed and activist fashion statements inside liberatory art movements loaded with guerrilla argument and Indigenous (or otherwise shadowy and exotic) shows of force: nudity and violence—to go into abject territories to humanize them (and their populations) while camping the canon (our very own pocket sand to lob into capital's eyes). To critique power requires dressing up in devices thereof, even if they don't always perfectly fit; re: you must go where power is and play/perform with it, battling unironic flesh markets and sex traffickers with your own brokers of power relaid unequally as sex and force during liminal expression.

This happens because privilege and marginality are inherently uneven, as are the gender identities and performances raised by workers under capital since the 1700s (themselves evolving as much to uphold capital [and its qualities] versus challenge them). So workers must create spaces that reflect their own liminality in Gothic; i.e., that position ourselves as already having one foot in either world (as white women generally have), or positioned near them (the girl next door described as an alien from another planet that is actually just alienated from this one): someone to admire from afar and go in for a closer look regarding! To subvert canonical norms, regarding Amazons, is to start where others "left off," thus involves some degree of separation from the things we're trying to reclaim: from subjugation to liberation through subversion.

(artist: Enemi)

Furthermore, even if we are abused on a systemic level (as white women and trans people are), we likewise have to acknowledge our own privilege and advantage sitting alongside those who have less than we do, or undergo different struggles that are unequally comparable; e.g., cis men of color versus white trans women vs native peoples, each probing the other less for weakness and more for compassion as something to investigate with understandable caution (which lost generations/generational trauma instills within us). It's different flavors and degrees of shit, rape not something to rank but find common ground with through difference experiences, including in copies of itself; re: similarity amid difference during the pedagogy of the oppressed. Curiosity and hostility are beset by an equally human lack of immunity towards unequal attraction: unto the alien as something to befriend, mid-investigation.

Such descriptively gendered and sexual statements walk the line between cultural appreciation and appropriation, but also invoke dead cultures that no longer exist; e.g., the Ancient Greeks, Celts or Egyptians recruited to hauntologically revive sex-positive elements of the ancient past in "sleeping" barbaric forms; i.e., that once evoked, "wake up" and change the current cultural understanding of an imaginary "ancient" past—one to assist current groups suffering as "barbarians" under colonial rule; re: using the Wisdom of the Ancients to borrow pre-capitalist ideas (re: Foucault's "bucolic village pleasures," minus the pedophilia) that assist in post-scarcity while developing Gothic Communism under various double standards. To challenge those, we must—to some degree—reinspect the past, killing our darlings: as nostalgic ideas of said past, uprooted and repotted.

Double Standards and Challenging Them (Killing Your Darlings, feat. Angela Carter)

One double standard that white women experience, for example, is how society burdens them with modesty arguments. They can buck these however they want for transgressive status, yet often do so around rape fears expressed in actual body language; i.e., while said women often have fat/muscular "non-white" bodies, canon then argues these women must either cover up or show their audience said bodies, depending on the virgin/whore arbitration; re: the strongwoman as a freakshow attraction that "emasculates" men—meaning she becomes something for men to control during inverted rape fantasies (re: death by Snu-Snu), or which men motivate said women to control others for them with (the token cop showing her allegiance to the state). She's not merely the girl next door, but the alien to tokenize by enterprising Pygmalions in need of some muscle—Supergirl bearing out "Indigenous" qualities per the ghost of the counterfeit's brawny cleavage:

(artist: Kitty Bit Games)

In turn, the warrior maiden (and her dark, whorish side) have become trapped between the whore's paradox; i.e., to further settler rhetoric in the wrong hands (which Kitty Bit's aren't, to be clear): people who treat the monstrous-feminine as unironic warrior rapist, threatening "gentle" women as cis men have historically been doing for thousands of years, and which some women imitate now (since cis female assimilation¹¹¹)—as much through proximity with versus their actual bodies' potential for courtly love; e.g., Angela Carter (more on her, in a moment). Amazons, in other words, are abject vice characters: of monstrous-feminine rape and revenge—nature-gone-wild!

¹¹¹ I.e., for as long as women (especially white middle-class women) have had voices and could punch down against minorities, vis-à-vis the ghost of the counterfeit furthering the abjection process; e.g., Britain, 1870—the same year Carl Westphal medically recognized homosexual men (an idea that Gothic xenophobia pathologized in the decades that followed; re: Dracula, 1897, projecting blood libel and sodomy arguments openly onto gay men)—cis women were conveniently presented with the Married Women's Property Act: letting women (selectively white straight women) keep any money they earned as their own property. This expanded, in 1882, with the Married Women's Property Rights Act, which allowed, again, married women to have complete control over all of their property, regardless of its source; i.e., the state allowed it, incrementally buying said women's loyalty in exchange for their complete betrayal: to colonize extramarital, non-white, non-Christian, and/or GNC peoples. The state is straight; its cops function as straight regardless of latter-day normativities: defend the nuclear model through canonical Gothic stories imitating real life (and vice versa).

In short, state concessions are selective, giving some workers their rights back, but always with the expectation they betray their class (often along racial and cultural lines). The "liberated" women, above, would go onto police states' rights against other marginalized groups. By extension, the suffragettes—anywhere in the "free world" (the Imperial Core and its colonies)—were incredibly exclusionary and bigoted, having decayed into fascist, property-owning forms of themselves defending privatization (and arrogantly dressed up as "rebellion"). From feminism's first wave onto its second, "gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss" (the coercion trifecta) called for women to resist change in bad faith (re: praxial inertia): not one step further towards liberation for all.

Made to be engaged with irony or without, this happens liminally (upon and through) forbidden zones of theatrical stigma speaking to their offstage counterparts; i.e., cops serving an Omelas refrain, recruiting from oppressed populations in moderate-to-reactionary forms of Orientalism, including its rape and revenge as half-real: performed in popular stories on and offstage to uphold state models with stochastic violence (e.g., Mrs. Voorhees, below, presenting both as token cop and escaped madwoman [out of the attic] with a funny-sounding name—a female banditti, per Radcliffe, but also Dacre's female demon lover, Victoria de Loredani, stabbing "Lilla" angrily and vengefully to death: "This is your fault, you slut!").

However "Goldilocks" or outwardly progressive/urbane they seem, then, subjugated Amazons historically decay towards more radical forms of the same things; re: witch hunts, blood libel, sodomy arguments that collectively defend capital and furthermore, whose unironic rape-as-revenge is simply wrong and unnecessary to achieve post-scarcity with.

Quite the opposite, a bigotry for one is a bigotry for all. Workers must challenge the systemic entirety of profit, including its whitewasher girlbosses gaslight-gatekeeping all oppressed peoples under Capitalist Realism. Rape requires intolerance; "a little genocide" is functionally letting the state rape someone, which for us, is completely unacceptable. A world without scarcity is a world without actual rape (thus token cops performing it in some shape or form)!

This being said, Gothic Communism should be able to evoke rape, and the potential for complicit or revolutionary cryptonymy is clearly there; re: Amazons are warrior-whore demons with a white-native, animalized¹¹² and "ancient," heavy metal flavor—one that has a calm and furious side¹¹³ refusing to be victimized again (re: the Medusa, dualistically evoked by Mrs. Voorhees as someone to behead, thus lay to rest); i.e., such revenge speaks of predator/prey relations under unequal conditions and overlapping persecution networks. These incentives can direct workers to liberate or enslave by transforming into different things, and all communicate through some degree of showing sex and force hyphenating through hellish bodily expression; i.e., the Amazon is a violent, walking terror weapon synonymous with the control of sex-as-weapon, specifically that of rape revenge administered by a maidenesque impasse with whorish potential: nature antagonized to behave in different monstrous-feminine ways.

¹¹² They're nymphs married to sex-through-conquest captivity tropes, this curious combo teaching us the forbidden arts of love known only to wild animals closer to nature and our own repressed impulses; i.e., those things "of nature" alienated from us by Cartesian forces, which workers must reclaim by playing with mythical devices; e.g., I'm a little slut who strives to prevent rape through her work, and have learned what I like and don't like by playing with big strong ladies in the past. I'm no tigress, but pet me wrong and watch the claws come out!

¹¹³ Re: The alter ego. This secret identity/disguise is often inverted, doubled; e.g., Superman/Clarke Kent (with Kent being the disguise) doubled by/doubling his enemies: evil aliens, but also the human race and its own divisions under capital (essentially America vs everyone else).

In Gothic, form has multiple, dialectical-material functions; re: to move power towards workers or the state during anisotropic terror/counterterror arguments. Like all women, Amazons are maidens and whores that can do either task through their bodies. Uncloaked and demonic, they strike terror into the hearts of their enemies, achieved through threats of violent revenge (nature, avenging her rape by patriarchal forces); i.e., threat displays; e.g., "two tickets to the gun show." Subjugated Amazons tokenize by abjecting patriarchal abuse onto their victims (re: Mrs. Voorhees). On the subversive side, Amazons (and their big muscles) are revolutionary darlings, but also sex objects desired for their alien qualities (from those wanting to penetrate them and vice versa): monster mommies, but also warrior princesses who punch up, not down.

(artist: Kitty Bit Games)

And yet, because she is a weapon, the state will try to monopolize such weaponry's violence, terror and morphology as its darling poster girl—to carve nature up with, during the usual cartographic refrains antagonizing nature as monstrous-feminine, to begin with; re: nature is a peach divvied into slices, moving money through nature on carceral territories, and of which I argue, require tokenization to work: nature raping nature, through Orientalism and its trademark threats of danger and protection (from rape and revenge); i.e., by the alien side feeling familiar as much as foreign (re: Laura Ng vis-à-vis Said's Culture and Imperialism). Raped in the past and slated for future conquest, settled lands are owned by people who will happily pimp Amazonian revenge to police their usual territories/populations with; i.e., nature-as-monstrous-feminine cop and victim, person and place, rape and ritual (e.g., anal sex—more on this in a moment). All operate as things to take and reclaim for either side of a given struggle, but for which state betrayals always see cops climbing out from its state of exception only to go back in and rape those unable to leave or fight back under state protection. They are silenced, thus subject to genocide by token Amazons executing courtly love without irony.

So while Amazons classically resist as an aesthetic, subjugated varieties refuse to meaningfully revolt against their masters; re: they kiss up and punch down like Hippolyta married to Theseus, acting as universal victims while victimizing others less advantaged—all while behaving like the only legitimate monstrous-feminine in town (whose freakshow muscles give them "a pass"). They become darlings undeserving of state force, hence vampires for the state, which translates easily enough to demonic modes of expression; re: unequal, forbidden exchange and transformation versus feeding and trauma, the two discussing the same exact thing: bourgeois enforcement.

By comparison, liberators subverting the Amazon can treat this refusal as the turncoat whose betrayal (and its victims) haunt liberation on her feared/celebrated surfaces; i.e., the larger process hampered by the ghosts of those who sold out, or whose work was coopted by groups who most certainly did; re, Angela Carter and her adage (from Volume Zero):

Just what is a woman, Angela Carter, when you write in The Sadeian Woman (1979) "A free woman in an unfree society will be a monster"? Of course, Matt Walsh's hideous refrain is normally bad-faith nonsense directed at us, but it becomes quite important when defining what a woman is (and a monster) when regarding the likes of Carter's platitude, but also Simone Beauvoir, Cynthia Wolff, Ellen Moers, or hell, Janice-fucking-Raymond [...]. Second-wave feminism was (and still is) infamously cis-supremacist and white, and we can't just rely on a bunch of fancy (and highly problematic) white, cis-het female academics to accomplish the sum of all activism for all workers. Even if Carter wouldn't have been caught dead in Rowling's company today, she still died in 1992—one year after Michael Warner introduced "heteronormativity" to academic circuits, two years after Judith Butler wrote Gender Trouble and one year before Derrida wrote Spectres of Marx.

To be blunt, Carter's most famous works feel oddly dated in terms of what they either completely leave out or fail to define, and thereby supply clues to the vengeance of proto-TERFs like Dacre's Victoria de Loredani that Carter doesn't strictly condemn. As Brittany Sauv e-Bonin writes in "How Angela Carter Challenges Myths of Sexuality and Power in 'The Bloody Chamber' & 'The Company of Wolves'" (2020):

The men in de Sade's stories exercise sexual perversions which enforce annihilation. However, it is the women in de Sade's stories that are seen as even more cruel as once they get the rare opportunity to exercise power, they begin to use this power to seek retaliation over the submissiveness they were forced to endure in society (The Sadeian Woman 27). Carter bluntly concludes that "a free woman in an unfree society will be a monster" (27). Due to women being oppressed for so long, when they get the opportunity, they can retaliate in the most extreme ways (27).

According to Henstra, this has resulted in critique by other feminists including Andrea Dworkin, who have concluded that The Sadeian Woman displays a "complete disregard for the actual suffering endured by Sade's – and pornography's – victims" (113). Carter chooses to focus more on how women had an outlet to retaliate that de Sade had openly introduced.

While some of his women suffered, some of his women indeed inflicted the pain. Hence, Carter rationalizes de Sade's work by saying "pornography [is] in the service of women, or, perhaps, allowed it to be invaded by an ideology not inimical [harmful] to women" (The Sadeian Woman 37) [source].

Again, what is a woman, Carter? And what did they do with this outlet? The vast majority turned it against other minorities more disadvantaged than themselves—i.e., from 1979 into the present (source: "Shining a Light on Things").

Indeed, Carter herself wasn't above Gothic fantasies with an exploitative element. As Maggie Doherty writes in "Fairytale Punish the Curious" (2017):

had no time for female melancholy. A woman whose quiet demeanor belied her forceful mind, Carter was that rarest of things—a happy writer. She followed her desires—for travel, for learning, for (younger) men—with little hesitation or regret. She was not naïve about sex; she argued that any sexual relationship must be considered in light of the way power works. Still, she believed in the emancipatory power of erotic love. She was attracted to fairytales both for their violence and their strangeness; she adjusted archetypes and tweaked myths until they came to mean something entirely new. Her fiction celebrated the couplings of a wide range of characters: teenage girls, wizened old women, circus performers, wolves (source).

Except, the problem goes deeper than that. Her work—while undeniably adventurous in its tone-poem exploration of sexuality in Gothic rape play—was as limited in its scope as any white cis woman from that period: an Orientalist madam (female pimp) of the abject, upholding Capitalist Realism by tailoring her Gothic imagination as heteronormative, thus queer-exclusionary (and hostile towards). The profit motive is there, baked into her bigoted work's obsession with unironic torture porn (thus rape); she was married to its nuclear ideas—their settings, characters and power scenarios, but also their abject scapegoats.

In short, there was a power imbalance like Foucault's, the powerful accommodating Carter's intellect as second wave feminism commonly was: the ability to pick-and-choose, then insist, "We live in Gothic times" while stroking profit's unholy cock. From plausible deniability and veils of demonstrable ignorance (a lack of inclusive queer scholarship up to that point), Carter enjoyed a celebrity status that let her prey as she liked; i.e., someone who "challenged" the state through controlled opposition, hence conditions of surrender that pit her powers against more vulnerable parties. The Gothic's campier language (often of queer men; e.g., Shakespeare, Walpole, or Matthew Lewis) has historically given the oppressed a voice (e.g., Phantom of the Paradise or Rocky Horror, 1974/1975). Carter resisted such devices, pimping queerness out while tying gender to sex (e.g., *The Passion of New Eve*¹¹⁴, 1977) or focusing entirely on cis-het couples.

To be silent during genocide is to partake in it, yourself, but TERFs are essentially second wave feminists dying on that hill. Said hill existed in 1979; re: Janice Raymond's Transsexual Empire spouting the kind of transphobic dogma Carter's New Eve relayed about transition phobias and "men in dresses." The idea that Carter wasn't aware of these, let alone Raymond, is laughable. Hell, Carter had not only beaten Raymond to the punch—writing a transphobic story about transsexuals (a transmedicalist term) two years before Raymond's book (see: footnote); she likewise never countered its genocidal rhetoric in the 1980s (during the AIDS crisis) like Rice did. If the unironic rape porn wasn't obvious enough, Carter's a TERF and a SWERF, and doesn't deserve the benefit of the doubt; in fact, it's historically in our best interest to excoriate her and her bullshit, full stop! State defenders enjoy high burdens of proof, even when their abuse is obvious. Don't apologize for them!

In short, it was possible to be queerphobic before queer theory emerged in the 1990s to call these hypocrites out—and indeed, in 1960, when cis-het people decided to pin serial killings onto queerness with movies like Psycho (above), which arguably pre-dated second wave feminism (as did words like "transgender," coined in 1965). Even so, feminism, by 1960, had already gentrified and decayed into strange appetites that serve profit; i.e., gay panic, which Carter's work only reinforced: towards the 1980s, when transgender people were starting to be more aggressively demonized (e.g., Alien, 1979). Through DARVO and obscurantism, such media served up

¹¹⁴ From Rachel Carroll's "'Violent Operations': Revisiting the Transgendered Body in Angela Carter's The Passion of New Eve" (2011):

Carter's novel also features motifs which Prosser and Halberstam have identified as symptomatic of transphobic discourses, including the "exposure" of the transgendered person as inauthentic and the depiction of sex reassignment surgery as an act of material and symbolic violence. Indeed, transgendered lives have been met with suspicion and hostility in some feminist contexts, sentiments given expression in Janice C. Raymond's (1979) assertion that "all transsexuals rape women's bodies" (source).

In short, it's us-versus-them divide-and-conquer pitting cis women against trans, the former seeing the latter as "men in dresses," which Carter not only didn't challenge, but actively fueled. And frankly it's horseshit; you're much more likely to be raped by your husbands than other women (cis or trans), you idiots!

scared-straight, middle-class people's shadowy idea (above) of what the monstrous-feminine is beyond how they could embody it themselves—indeed, how they could weaponize it against queer people and other minorities. Medusa, the rebel, became a stranger for them to attack others with—a witch hunt carried out by witches, sex policing sex, whores raping whores to have the pimp's revenge.

Leaning into horror tropes to confirm queer bias is bad; so is failing to take a stronger stance on what should be obvious: trans women are women, and don't tend to rape other women (which cis women ironically ignore, traitorously acting like men themselves to rape trans people in service to profit).

Such is bigotry. It doesn't need an exact language or thesis to give it form, queerphobia—specifically of the "man" in the dress—dating back centuries (e.g., Matthew Lewis' Matilda). The paradox of moderacy lies in how it's still radical because it whitewashes genocide and defends fascism behind the liberal, married housewife: a refusal to change. Like so many thinkers from the '70s (or the entire 20th century, for that matter), Carter became a predator lauded for her steady and fairly tame (from a political standpoint) appetites; i.e., dressed up as bold, brave, and transgressively noble, yet gatekeeping others by excluding them—through alienizing preference! She's not the liberator of all groups, but a white cis-het woman getting her admittedly narrow jollies in the shadow of problematic straight men she was more-or-less aping (and the Man Box of weird nerd culture these men encompassed in their own work): the Marquis de Sade!

Of course, rape play and liberation aren't mutually exclusive, but Carter didn't use her bored housewife's libido to expand her horizons; i.e., beyond the Shadow of Pygmalion, hence liberate other peoples using ludo-Gothic BDSM. As such, she's a former darling who only took things so far—for white straight women, first and foremost; i.e., a form of submission, myopically limiting their struggle to that single group against all others, including trans people: as beings of darkness to abject state rape (that of their husbands) onto. Dick move, bitch.

From there, leveraging this ongoing problem against the whore's paradox happens per the traitor's perspective and outcome; i.e., a Judas refrain whose witch hunts against her own kind exhaust any goodwill at the expense of everyone (and all symbols) involved; re, TERFs and witch hunts poisoning the well (from the Undead Module):

by playing cop as TERFs do, they sell out, only serving to erode the credibility and goodwill of genuine activism (a fascist tactic, generally capital in the process); re: Silvia Federici's argument, "Witchcraft accusations, in fact, are the ultimate mechanism of alienation and estrangement as they turn the accused—still primarily women—into monstrous beings, dedicated to the destruction of their communities, therefore making them undeserving of any compassion and solidarity" cited from "[Hot Allostatic Load," 2015]. Witches aren't just AFAB, though, and worker solidarity needs to reflect that; re, as I write (earlier in this volume: In response to both authors, I would include that capital tokenizes all labor (not just female and non-white) as sexualized, fetish, alien; i.e., something to gentrify and decay inside of itself, moving money through nature to harvest nature-as-monstrous-feminine (thus having masculine elements; e.g., phallic women). Feminism decays for these purposes, as do genderqueer movements, sex work, and Gothic poetics (source: "A Crash-Course Introduction to Vampires (and Witches)," 2024).

Simply put, Amazons are witches, so the idea of triangulation, castration and witch hunts that we've previously explored in this larger series also applies to them. As mistresses mastered by men (which Carter ultimately was, indebted to heteronormative, binarized ideas of sexuality she largely upheld¹¹⁵), they are without accusing her of being a TERF—because, as I said, she's dead, and never even touched on the subject—her ideas do still rely on the cis-gendered experience. [...] Carter's exploration of female sexual liberty is unapologetic, and arguably still crucial in an era where it remains repressed and underexplored, but Carter's writing remains painfully heteronormative in its exploration. To begin with, so far that I know (and please feel free to prove me wrong!) Carter doesn't portray any homosexual or queer relationships in her work. This, in and of itself, isn't a bad thing, but the dated heteronormative angle of her work is pronounced even beyond this. In particular it shines through in the tropes she uses, with the undercurrent of power and empowerment going hand in hand with (hetero)sexual liberty.

¹¹⁵ I'm hardly alone in this. As Maeleine Vaughn writes in "Carter, Gender & the Binary" (2020):

For example, when depicting her happy relationships, Carter brings the couples together under equal terms—there is consent, there is enthusiasm in both parties—but a traditional binary coding burns clear, either unconsciously or through deliberate choice. How often it is the men, antagonistic or not, who guides the sexual experience to a nervous, virginal girl? How often is the occasion marked by that archaic breaking of the hymen and the blood on the sheets? How often does the maiden swoon into the man's arms? How often does the woman become the seductress, to try and induce the man to provide her with what she needs (not wants), be that liberty, purpose, or sustenance? How often is the woman described as beautiful? And how often is fulfilment supplied not by the self, but by the right man?

A message shines through, right from the hellish landscape of De Sade's writing, which equates sexuality with empowerment, the kill or be killed, or in this case, the dominate or be dominated. And while we can wax lyrical about the potential philosophical usefulness and realism represented in De Sade's disgusting writing, it doesn't change that it fits a traditional gender role, even if De Sade himself arguably disregarded gender (and even sexuality) as part of the equation. The role of the dominant, sexually capable and strong man, and the subdued, innocent – or perhaps coquettish – female who presents herself to him as a lamb for metaphorical slaughter, is a painful stereotype, and it's one Carter uses, over and over (source).

That binarization reflects the usual qualities of capital that predate Carter's work by centuries (re: De Sade, but also Radcliffe). Even so, Carter's work remains dated in ways I saw worshipped and quoted by Gothic academics all the time (cutting their own teeth in the '80s and '90s). She's a darling and needs to be killed and discarded, save for what points she had that were useful, similar to other writers from then and before; re (from Volume Zero):

In other words, if Sontag was "vanilla," then Radcliffe was barely even ice cream [...]. But their combined inexperience paradoxically stems from dark fantasies invented from the open secret of sex abuse turned into urban legends [...] These canonical misconceptions operate on the automatic conflation of sex and harm, versus merely being adjacent to it during psychosexual expression [there's a thin line between the two—a tightrope to tread carefully]. That is, sex-Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com darlings and per Sarkeesian's adage, we must poetically "kill" said darlings in holistic¹¹⁶ ways that interrogate their own betrayals/misguided desires for revenge; re: Barbara Creed, saying that "Athena's aim was simply [emphasis, me] to strike terror into the hearts of men as well as reminding them of their symbolic debt to the imaginary castrating mother."

(artist: The 1Medusa)

Except, we can't afford to be simple when having out revenge, reversing abjection during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., "just threaten cis-het dudes with Freudian castration," as Creed seemingly puts it (seemingly forgetting that Athena, depending on the legend, was a gentrified temple goddess punishing a rape victim, yet in same breath, giving her the terrible, Numinous power to freeze rapists in their tracks; re: by reversing abjection on the same Aegis, per my arguments). Nor can we be chaste alone when humanizing Medusa, thus Amazons; i.e., nature is an alien, monstrous-feminine whore, thus subject to the whore's paradox affording her power under exploitative, abject conditions. For one side or the other—not just maidens and whores, but those who normally consume whores—each finds power positive BDSM is generally about negotiated unequal power exchange in a written, contractual form that is founded on (relatively) equal bargaining positions (source: "Notes on Power").

The liberation of sex can imitate our conquerors without functioning as them, but the mutilative elements require a campy GNC irony that Carter and her ilk simply didn't have. Camping the canon, we can speak to our desire for revenge. We must if we are to override any policewoman's idea of punching down with said devices. Otherwise we're just Amazons on another witch hunt—one those in power will point to later and say (to their usual constituents), "You can't trust them."

¹¹⁶ Holistic analysis constitutes the return to older thinkers and ideas; e.g., I cite Solzhenitsyn's famous quote, in my Undead Module: "If only it were all so simple! If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who is willing to destroy a piece of his own heart?" I so do because I think the basic idea of empathy and emotional nuance during revolution is a good one; re: segregation is bad, and queer people were a regular and famous casualty of the Soviet system under Stalin's rule: outlawing them in 1933 until 1993 after the Fall. By no means do I put Solzhenitsyn on a pedestal; he was an anti-Communist, fascist-monarchist, American liberal darling (Hakim's "The Man Who 'brought Down' the Soviet Union Was a Terrible Human Being," 2024). Rather, I'm against all states, and would want people to understand who I'm citing and why.

In short, the basic quote is good even if the man (or the book he wrote containing it) was not. In hindsight, my knowledge of Solzhenitsyn was limited in much the same way my knowledge of people like John Lennon or George Orwell was; i.e., restricted to carefully manicured and state-sanitized postmortems. But just as such persons mixed lies with truth—in effect stealing their ideas from revolutionary forces to better resonate with their target audiences (the American middle class)—we can a) take their ideas and quote them to achieve an ironic affect, while b) educating people about the historical persons we're citing. Solzhenitsyn and Orwell were imperial-cop sell-outs; Lennon was a homophobe, out-of-touch millionaire; and Stalin was—well, Stalin: a cruel dictator who abused state mechanisms, including making homosexuality illegal, regressing queer activism under his rule and after for essentially the next century. We must be/do better than all of them!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

(and knowledge) according to how the state forbids access, yet access happens anyways. We trade power and knowledge as labor exchanges that workers regain control of—across media, but also space and time; i.e., challenging various double standards through our own doubles punching up. Doing so—and existing to spite TERF authors like Carter or Raymond, exposing them as false—is our revenge. It should make our enemies uncomfortable, but also lull them.

Let's stick with Medusa, as she's arguably the most famous, and the one that neoliberal Amazonomachia uses to police workers with, then and now. She classically appears out of control, and is put down by Amazons who see their own failings (and abusers) mirrored on the rabid double's complicated surface. Per the whore's paradox, though, both of them regain power while feeling out of control; i.e., during calculated risk. They learn to control their abilities, meaning their trauma; re: playing with rape as a counterterror device for workers. Trauma lives in the body but also around it, and marks us in ways that draw police forces to us. It's their primary way of controlling us, thus our revenge "from nature."

Except, when workers become able to play with rape under controlled circumstances, they gain the ability to liberate themselves from the state; i.e., the state loses any hold over workers, becoming afraid of what we'll do when fear doesn't motivate us to punch down. In turn, we learn not to simply control our trauma to hide it, but cryptonymically weaponize it against our enemies (the elite and their servants). We build ourselves up despite our scars/alienation: to go beyond the narrow focus (and praxial limitations) of women like Radcliffe, Carter or Creed.

To be clear, we can salvage said women's useful ideas, but the idea of them as darlings desperately, desperately needs to die; i.e., by exposing the TERF-y (thus settler-colonial, Cartesian, heteronormative) aspects of their outmoded, Gothically immature approach to the monstrous-feminine, rape and revenge: an imaginary antiquity whose "ancient" fakeries enforce capital by either pointing the finger at us fags and calling us rapists (re: canonical terror/counterterror arguments), or by evoking people who do (re: Creed building The Monstrous-Feminine on Sigmund-fucking-Freud, of all people). That shit gets me, a trans woman, livid; i.e., at people who should know better that put Carter on a fucking pedestal, essentially talking about her like she's some fucking saint rescuing the world from us. It's 2024; we're way past that! We're not your scapegoats, bitches, and even if you get us, capital and fascism will get you! There must always be a whore, thus a victim, and the state is the ultimate hangman you're only playing at.

You're expendable, and betrayal cuts both ways; after we're dead, they'll take you out back (or through the front door) to hang you in the streets for all to see!

Rape is rape. In control of our trauma, we become masters of cryptonymy/mirrors; i.e., able to attack in ways that are harder to kettle. In the West, the state relegates explicit sex to the bedroom (re: Foucault), except as something to pimp, or otherwise control/attack outside of said bedroom with (re: me). As such, those who communicate openly with sex do so through code, cryptonymy and demon BDSM; i.e., camping it; e.g., "Stepbrother, what are you doing?" or "I need my 'couch' moved." Instead of turning everyone to stone, Medusa (and by extension, Amazons) can activate her forbidden sight without harming her friends, and turn those who attack her (and other state enemies in bad faith) to stone. Ancient trauma (the abuse and revenge of whores) revives to reclaim the Medusa's power through Amazons as "out"; i.e., loud and proud activists—a threat display but also defiant jouissance whose confident passion remains haunted by those seeking to control us: subjugated Amazons colonizing the aesthetic in duality! Sex is something to have under their terms, which we resist in psychosexual exchange; i.e., as subversive Amazons, pushing back against our colonizers in disguise.

The state controls sex and gender in monstrous-feminine language because these are where power (and trauma) are found; i.e., the state wouldn't bother if that wasn't the case; re: their ideas of power revolve around ideas of state revenge also dressed up: the pimp dominating nature-as-monstrous-feminine, doubling and dominating it through tokenized double standards; e.g., anal sex (which we'll explore in just a moment). Except, exploitation and liberation occupy the same uncanny space; i.e., as poetic things coming alive to seek the whore's GNC revenge through power as something to reframe inside itself. In short, there's a potential to humanize what is demonized by reclaiming the whore-as-demonic, thus normally treated as chattel/property and reclaimed in liminal territories. To critique power, we must consume problematic things and understand how to subvert them: to gain access to the endless ways whores (thus Amazons and the Medusa, left) manifest in popular media:

(source media: "Medusa Craves Boiling HOT Cocks")

This affords us different opportunities. For one, censorship is a death sentence. We can't just throw out sex work due to systemic abuse, because the state can just abuse us and watch us discount sex work's liberatory value; i.e., people attract through alienation towards what is different, even if those differences are enforced, and porn—despite its problematic elements in industry forms (often racial¹¹⁷ ones, below)—allows people to experience fetishes and clichés; i.e., by consuming them in order to understand human behaviors: exposure to what is alien to exchange, then transform ourselves into healthier forms, moving forwards. We want take what is given and learn from it to synthesize good praxis, thus catharsis; re: to use girl talk's gossip/anger alongside monsters and camp, thereby channeling Medusa's "hot goss" to tell our friends where to stick it (and where our enemies can't) during the cryptonymy process: madness as an aesthetic/form of data in the flesh.

¹¹⁷ Interracial porn is as much the interaction between taboo parties as it is commodified body types; e.g., the PAWG, BBW or BBC, etc.

(artist: Medusa)

Keeping with Medusa and Amazons, though, we have to do better than symbolic shows of force that historically gentrify and decay into token assimilation and senseless, unproductive revenge; e.g., Victoria de Loredani stabbing Lilla (re: Sam Hirst's "Zofloya and the Female Gothic," 2020) translating to one relatively privileged group punching down. Double standards denote doubles and vice versa.

To it, liberators have to avoid triangulations pitting alien against alien, wherein said castrators unironically harm state enemies, then posture as rebels/progressive! This applies not just to Amazons, of course, but minority groups and monstrous doubles at large (which often includes Amazons); e.g., queer people and vampirism something to attack until the state, deprived of easy prey, cannibalizes its own police force; re (from the Undead Module):

Denied queer scapegoats, the state will turn to other forms of monstrous-feminine, and ultimately on itself as famine sets in (e.g., Attack on Titan). To that, the usual clichés persist. Though not always, vampires are often male, monstrous-feminine dandies operating predatorily inside a traumatic, colonial location (re: Lestat from Interview with the Vampire, feeding in pre-revolutionary America); i.e., one where consumption is generally considered an act of theft during welcome/unwelcome trespasses that freeze the victim in place: the paralyzing theft of privatized essence—blood, brains, life force, etc—from a rightful, bourgeois source (the lothario/gigolo-coded Lestat, gleefully supping on the aging beldame before wringing her neck, and Louis clumsily trying his best not to kill his meal, thus prove Lestat wrong: that gay men needn't strictly be sexual predators who harm those they feed on). Anything that challenges said ownership is unwelcome by the pearl-clutcher, be the robbery a solo enterprise or an uncomfortable gathering with revolutionary potential (eating the rich); i.e., the prosecution framing sodomy as a venereal disease that conflates the cruiser's seeking mechanism and punching up/topping from below with bad-faith predation (eating women and children).

As a discourse, though, the potency of class conflict during monster-themed oppositional praxis has only intensified during the Internet Age. Inside this age, new generations of queer people emerge, then reclaim "sodomy" through vampirism; i.e., as a theatrical device they take back from older tokenized queers (and straight Marxist-Leninists acting like second wave feminists at best, Stalinists at worse; re: Bad Empanada) who insist "they 'won' the battle" or "have all the answers." Newer an-Com queers must resist tokenism, then, refusing to sell out according to such desperation and convenience (wherein abjecting the entire Superstructure and literary analysis very much is a matter of convenience; re: Bad Empanada); i.e., those persons hijack rebellious language (such as vampirism) to abuse it for fascist, false-rebellious purposes: stochastic predatory violence and betrayals, both delegitimizing activist credibility and goodwill to empower state mechanisms per the brand of selling out (re: Drolta from Castlevania: Nocturne, which again, I explore in "Back to the Necropolis").

To that, canonical vampirism and its unironic, police-like means of "sodomy" language have crystalized over several centuries—i.e., by tying neo-medieval expression to individual sexual predators, pests and addicts who invade and prey parasitically upon a single location; or is framed as doing so according to abject pogrom stereotypes within a profoundly biased heteronormative imagination; re: the "outing" of Jews (and people confused as "Jewish," such as Eastern Europeans) during blood libel and other anti-Semitic tropes describing them as blood-drinking vampires, baby-killing witches, and/or flesh-eating goblins (all, again, from Hey Alma's "Anti-Semitic History of..." series; 2021, 2020, and 2023):

(artist: Chris Bourassa)

In turn, the same chimeric libel would extend to trans women as 21st-century reprobates; i.e., vampires (and their kissing-cousin relatives, lycans) needing to be publicly embarrassed, hounded, and ultimately put down/to the torch in order to serve profit. As such, their execution falls under the same grim harvest, its liminal hauntology of war happening by assimilative forces conducting rapacious, obscurantist and hypocritical acts of penetrative force, mid-DARVO: the silver bullet or stake through the heart being more of the same witch hunt cannibalizing queerness; i.e., one whose Foucauldian (discipline-and-punish) enforcement arbitrates chaotically as the state decays and sinks its "fangs" (stakes) into wherever and whomever the state needs them to go (source: "Leaving the Closet; or, a Trans Woman's Scholarly Contributions to Older Histories of Sodomy and Queer Love," 2024).

The same issues that affect "phallic women" more broadly (or the white women writing about them; re: Carter) likewise affect any marginalized group that might use the Amazon (or something comparably monstrous-feminine) across different monster classes; re: the undead, demons and/or animals. Such duality per the Amazon and Medusa shows how all can gentrify and decay as profit rapes nature, thus supplies us with strange feeding habits the state can control; re ("A Cruel Angel's (Modular) Thesis"):

Capitalism achieves profit by moving money through nature; profit is built on trauma and division, wherein anything that serves profit gentrifies and decays, over and over while preying on nature. Trauma, then, cultivates strange appetites, which vary from group to group per the usual privileges and oppression as intersecting differently per case; i.e., psychosexual trauma (the regulation of state sex, terror and force) and feeding in decay as a matter of complicated (anisotropic) exchange unto itself, but also shapeshifting and knowledge exchange vis-à-vis nature as monstrous-feminine: something to destroy by the state or defend from it using the same Satanic, darkness-visible aesthetics/pandemonium (source).

(artist: Skylar Shark)

All of this can be opposed—and occurs through a rising demand for performers helping us achieve catharsis under capital—but due to the complications listed above, such rebels are often historically tragic in their renaissance; i.e., framing the harvest as humanized; e.g., King Kong falling to his death, and other such beings pushing for interracial bonding that, once martyred, humanize the harvest, exposing the state as inhumane. And if that seems limiting in its scope, simply swap genders: a black female ape and a white twink in peril. To some extent, then, the darlings we must kill the most amount to our former selves/role models—meaning older "closeting" ideas of Amazons and the Medusa!

The sex-positive qualities of the Amazon classically lend white women the ability to show as much skin as they want (to be comfortable in their own homes, which extend to the land around them) and present themselves as disobedient (often by fucking whoever they want or using toys, above) in ways that build their own possible, attractive and inclusive worlds; i.e., through mimesis, they imitate art that is powerful, but also stresses co-existence and harmony between unequal positions of exchange and transformation. In terms of trauma and labor value, demons have infinite forms, as do what they represent in paradoxical matters of revenge; i.e., actual imprisonment is certainly terrifying (which I can attest to), but introduce an element of control where no harm to a formerly abused party is actually possible and suddenly "imprisonment" feels amazing!

Something is always given and received per exchange; i.e., legitimate abusers awakening us to forbidden prey mechanisms of psychosexual pleasure and pain (re: Jadis, to me) that both speak to our survived confusion/rewiring by trauma, but also our ability to use them during oppositional praxis to restore healthy boundaries, in the future. "The dose doth make the poison," abused parties learning which poison to pick and how to camp it; e.g., I love dark mommy doms, but very much learned this the hard way from Jadis—"murder dick" (re: period sex) and ahegao are fun, but being raped unironically is not!

(artist: Pork Loins)

Doing so in safer forms of theatre paradoxically becomes our Aegis—to bounce harmful energies back, yet hold onto the good stuff defined by the context of playing with rape, exposure, and showing off unique vantage points to special situations of privileged access (e.g., public masturbation with a partially concealed element, left); i.e., of dialectical-material function and flow (of power), not appearance: "Help, I'm in a compromising position!" The sentence is both true and false. So are demons, and this power is ours to reclaim from state doubles pitting Amazonian double standards against us and our stabs at liberation; re: "rape" ironically! "Bind," "torture" and "kill" not to actually accomplish those dreadful deeds, but devilishly exhibit them to instill a sense of rape prevention per the whore's paradox: "Come and see the violence inherent [to] the system!"

Camping canon through medieval recreation is an old standby (and a fun one). In turn, "when the dog bites, when the bee stings..." (a song written by a rebellious nun) can speak to big strong ladies that, per the Amazon myth, are commonly bound and gagged under patriarchal structures; i.e., in ways iconoclasts play with to paradoxically challenge profit as a genocidal system: rape uncloaked, but also the power to survive expressed in poetic forms. Told in the same basic language (of rape and revenge), volunteer performers chain themselves up during tantalizing shows of intersectional solidarity and protest (next page)—that of demonic, pleasure-and-pain-seeking beings (which Amazons are), paradoxically "martyring" themselves during ludo-Gothic BDSM! Whores communicate psychosexually through calculated risk, the latter becoming how those how treated as whores reclaim said labor and aesthetic when playing with rape in warrior ways!

As proof-of-concept, I want to unpack this vis-à-vis Amazons and anal sex; i.e., a postcolonial device haunted by its own abuse as something to camp! We'll consider this and more when reclaiming the Amazon for our gay purposes—indeed, our dark revenge when subverting Amazons and rape—next!

Cops and Victims, part two: Our Sweet Revenge; or, Being Ourselves While Reclaiming Anal Rape, mid-Amazonomachia (feat. Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart)

"Crom, I have never prayed to you before. I have no tongue for it. No one, not even you, will remember if we were good men or bad. Why we fought, or why we died. All that matters is that two stood against many. That's what's important! Valor pleases you, Crom... so grant me one request. Grant me revenge! And if you don't listen, then the HELL with you!"

—Conan, Conan the Barbarian

Demons show us our deepest, darkest desires, which mirror our present, dialectical-material realities. Amazons, as we have explored, are the stuff of American pulp—a Nazi or a TERF's wet dream/cheap power fantasy about getting even (a lie, considering their revenge against never stops)—but they're also a timeless medieval (of knights and barbarians, but also Amazons and similar demonically crafted beings¹¹⁸) we reclaim to have our own revenge: through the language of the imaginary past as half-real, shared across space and time, on-and-offstage between workers for or against the state.

This desire—to crush one's enemies and rape the vulnerable—is inverted, insofar as the state wishes to trample us routinely underfoot (and move money through nature), whereas we reclaim such devices of rape and revenge (which Amazons are) to stymie profit and dismantle the state once and for all; re: during the aesthetics of power and death during ludo-Gothic BDSM's rape play. Our actions aren't those made with total impunity and heartless retribution like token state enforcers, but classify as "criminal" and automatically violent in their eyes because the state demands such things in order to exist: unironic rape, unironic Amazons pursuant to rape in conqueror-fantasy language vis-à-vis cops and victims (the strange appetites of those who gentrify and decay under capital, but also survive its abuse to abuse others or attract abusers).

Part one explored our confronting of the imaginary past as having a tokenized, fascist character (re: TERFs, Angela Carter and Creed, etc). Part two considers the whore's revenge as ultimately the subversion of Amazon's prior subjugation, doing so through the language of warriors and rape during the whore's paradox: to camp rape while suffering from its historical effects. "Rape" feels oddly good, either when putting others "to the sword" or vice versa (re: the so-called "Riddle of Steel"). Reflecting on earlier arguments, we'll consider this with Amazons (a classic terrorist) and anal sex (a classic terror weapon), reverting the anisotropic quality of such terrorism to serve a proletarian purpose: the whore's revenge granted by standing bravely against our enemies! To reclaim their stories of rape against us, hence all things associated with those tools of abuse.

¹¹⁸ Made from clay to be strong—to rape and avenge or avenge a rape, but also "rape" during ludo-Gothic BDSM, thus achieve praxial catharsis while developing Gothic Communism.

Weapons of Terror; or, Anal Amazons: Reclaiming Anal Sex, mid-Amazonomachia

(artist: Aria Rain)

First, what is anal? Anal speaks as much to rape and vulnerability as it does to proximity with unequal power and forbidden pleasure: exposed dumpers. While the state loves to threaten damsels with impregnation, it also deems them "worthy" of it. While sodomizing maidens isn't unheard of, doing so goes against the profit motive/patrilineal descent. Damsels are maidens, first and foremost—sodomy something of an afterthought/sinful prophylactic reserved for victims worthy of that treatment: whores, thus sex demons (a stigma, let it be said, that is often assigned to older married women; i.e., those who have already borne children/marry up and are resentful towards the status quo, but who canonically punch down: the wicked stepmother a kind of witch-y impostor/devil-in-disguise).

Amazons, by comparison, are whores from the offset, hence sodomized to better stress their demonic status and token value (and deny the victim any chance at generational revenge: to train their children to avenge state devastation). Even so, the state also views, thus treats Amazons "like men": as capable of revenge beyond gossip and poison; re: phallic women, or bitches, threatening lesser men ("little bitches") with castration, captivity and ignominious penetration! Forced anal, then, speaks to the capture of Amazons "tamed" and tokenized by humiliating and painful taboo sex ranked as "worst" by the rapist; i.e., vae victus in receiving state revenge, said revenge (the cop) aping the colonized in bad faith: to fuck, thus dominate like the animals Cartesian rule prescribes (a process less about biological accuracy [animals can't rape/sodomize each other] and more to dehumanize those "of nature" slated for social-psychosexual punishment by police forces: abusing chattel slaves/property who can't consent). And yet, colonial abuse ties historically-materially to bodily sites of psychosexual harm, which rebellious recipients might subvert; i.e., to submit in ways they—like any oppressed people part of the land—can reclaim through theatrical distress/rape revenge; re: rape play extending to "playing dead," meaning to camp one's rape by subverting colonizer vaudeville inside itself: mid-witch-hunt, witches policing witches, sex policing sex.

To it, Amazon booties can threaten rape, insofar as "death by Snu-Snu" can mean pretty much whatever you want it to; i.e., to give but also to receive its war chest. "Amazon" can likewise mean "anal" as a classic terror weapon to use against conquered foes (re: "prison sex" mentality within rape culture¹¹⁹ having warrior elements), which subversive forms can reclaim as a postcolonial device—not the clapping of one's cheeks under genuine duress by token Amazons (thus token bitches whose shitty behavior lessens the whole in the eyes of the oppressed/viewing public), but a site of forbidden pleasure during ludo-Gothic BDSM thwarting profit per the whore's revenge: the place whence girls shit, but also where bolder (and braver) dicks go inside to vengefully defy heteronormative reproductive orders (the decay of the nuclear family unit¹²⁰)!

To conclude, anal is both a classic act of rape, and a canonical, complicitly cryptonymic accusation (and mark) of shame; i.e., of forced submission trapped in duality during liminal expression. Like Medusa, herself, iconoclasts (and their Great Pumpkins, below) cryptonymically reverse abjection, camping imperial consumption (sex and force) to weaken Capitalist Realism, year-round; i.e., not just on the appointed, state-supplied day of "Halloween" (controlled opposition), but freeing the harvested (the ghost of the counterfeit/spectres of Marx) to fight back, thus reverse abjection (state sovereignty upheld through force) on our Aegis: throwing the energies of rape and revenge back in the colonizer's face! "Any weapon can become a weapon of terror" (re: Asprey) and anal is a weapon for which everyone has the ability (and the asshole) to camp state doubles, using bad worker puns and wholesome worker fun: the Gothic maturity of a rebellious bodily autonomy Hippolyta would be proud of—reversing terror/counterterror with our butts. Let 'er rip!

(artist: Kitty Boy Jake)

That's anal in a nutshell. Let's quickly outline some additional forces at work (two pages), then broach my thesis argument.

First, subjugation is something to subvert in dominant/submissive language. It doesn't apply exclusively to Amazons, but any "of nature-as-monstrous-feminine" per the whore's paradox having revenge during Amazonomachia's broader definition, "monster battle," attached to "psychosexuality" expressed (which I do) as "battle sex"; i.e., having revenge through "rape" theatrics while haunted by actual rape, thus help prevent the latter in the future by throttling profit: humanizing the harvest by using anal sex' position as "very uncomfortable place," itself alluding to the demonization of colonized lands and peoples. Anything said herein applies to out-and-out Amazons or Medusa, but also offshoots, like orcs and goblins, witches and vampires, etc—in short, anything monstrous-feminine associated with sodomy that has a bone to pick with capital targeting our bums (with the xenomorph originally being Dan O'Bannon's crude metaphor for irritable bowel syndrome).

¹¹⁹ "Prison sex" being a term I devised to speak to a hierarchy of power and subsequent values towards the giving of rape, versus "rape culture" being a term I've heard used to describe rape apologetics on a mass, cultural level; i.e., apologizing for rapists and blaming their victims, under the profit motive; e.g., R. Kelly avoiding punishment for decades despite the mountain of evidence left in his wake (Dreading's "The Disturbing Case of R. Kelly," 2024).

¹²⁰ Commonly expressed through Orientalism, sodomy and blood libel; e.g., King Piccolo's parthenogenic offspring, Piccolo Junior (a qualifier he later abandons), swearing he'll have his revenge (for his senior's death) after he is reborn; i.e., from a giant egg that grows quickly into adult form: echoes of mad science, incest, reptilian vampires, Pagan infanticide, and the backstabbing Jew, etc.

Unironic submission occurs because colonial forces aim to not merely to destroy their enemies, but humiliate them during anal as a pacifying terror device; i.e., anything that might be perceived as empathetic "slack" for the harvest and rebellion is sodomized by the colonizer to antagonize nature-as-monstrous-feminine all over again; re: Capitalism raping nature along the usual gyn-ecological arguments, but also blood libel and sodomy-style extermination rhetoric: as their own modular persecution networks that—in capital's later days—crossed with some degree of interchangeability to assist in profit raping nature through literal-to-figurative sodomy. This means anything monstrous-feminine (female or not) having an asshole, thus being subject to anal rape as an ongoing threat, mid-witch-hunt, hence opportunity to abject and commodify such things.

For straight men, rape—but especially anal rape—is something to joke about, insofar as receiving it usually doesn't concern them (outside cases of child and carceral abuse). By comparison, anyone deemed "monstrous-feminine" under Cartesian rule¹²¹ is already demonic in state eyes, thus subject to anal as a terror device (either to give to them, or accuse them of doing during moral panics); subversive parties must reclaim both actor and action, anal and Amazon, as demons would: dark campy sex offering forbidden sight through problematic love that, when humanizing the harvest (the crop, not the cop), reveals capital and its tenure's ongoing flaws; re: treating nature as something to fetishize, carve and harvest by police force.

Camping those means camping the material being abused, anal overshadowed by its own pro-state weaponization; i.e., rape play with exotic, xenophilic elements—the beauty and brawn of savage girth, whose "Oriental" (non-European/non-American) warriors emerge seemingly ex nihilo, suddenly endemic to Capitalist Realism. Such vaudeville banks on unironic carceral forms of anal sex and Amazons trapping the mind inside itself, endlessly punching down at forms that actually push for genuine liberation through anal sex (the whore's revenge, versus the pimp's): rape play and roleplay speaking to "conquering" as a spoof that challenges profit using the same devices.

¹²¹ I.e., abused by men of reason having secularized Divine Right through the Protestant ethic, enjoying its exceptions and double standards as white straight European men always do (for them and theirs, their understanding of nature becomes artificial, ordained by God-given forces yet dressed up as "science.")

(artist: Mona Wolt)

Simply put, demons double "unspeakable" (cryptonymic) desires for power and knowledge; i.e., relaid in dialectical-material forms of psychosexual pleasure through various intersections of class, culture and race, but also pain (exquisite "torture," aka passion/martyrdom). As such, Amazons promise empowering transformation through the paradox of receiving anal sex during calculated risk; i.e., the giver turned into a protector of this or that, the latter receiving anal as a vaso vagal device, and which under mutual consent enjoys as much control over you as the other way around: the dom serves the sub, but the sub needs someone "dark" (thus fearsome) to serve them through the whore's paradox—of the sub issuing commands of domination for a dom (or switch) to objectively follow when they transform on command; i.e., trying anal sex for its fearful reputation, meaning a dominating act associated with harmful Great Destruction, but also pleasurable pain (and forbidden pleasure) serving the sub during rough sex; e.g., like a genie in a bottle, "Your wish is my command!"

Lived trauma invites Numinous dialogs; Capitalist Realism abjects rape onto pornographic language, which can be camped through the Gothic's lateral directness: destroyer fantasies, chasing the palliative Numinous. Anal, reclaimed as such, becomes a paradoxical sign of trust, wherein the harming of recipients can occur when caution isn't exercised (the whole point of discipline, in ludo-Gothic BDSM, is harm avoidance/rape prevention, mid-passion): to walk the line regarding things that, once they've touched you, never leave. You don't "get over" rape; you learn to live with it. A gift and a curse, predation fosters anti-predation sentiment; if you are raped, it becomes something to live with through fantasies of itself you can control and thrive within.

The entire practice commonly hints at genuine abuse through its own Ozymandian aesthetic—live burial, chasing down old secrets (re: Medusa's rape) buried/unburied during faux-Orientalism; i.e., camping rape vis-à-vis the ghost of the counterfeit: the Amazon's dark anal zone of wicked, barbaric delight (doubling state forgeries)! It's a conqueror's fantasy—pushed onto state victims and reclaimed by them in the same half-real, tomb-like brothel space: the plundering of alien war "booty" overshadowed by eugenics, hence actual, still-existing racism/race science and its statuesque practitioners' vague-yet-constructed ideas of an imaginary past made great through multiple bigotries; i.e., followers of Eugene Sandow into Olympian, drug-fueled echoes of American-sponsored eco-fascism (which the Olympics are); e.g., Mike Israetel's "Is Intelligence Really Different Among the Races?" (2023): to live in fear of nature as criminal/terrorist, period—as monstrous-feminine, hence non-white, non-Christian, queer and/or female, etc. It's a false flag but a profitable one, provided you have the belly to police it/play the victim in bad faith. In turn, systemic rape gaslights its victims while tokenizing them, the sickness excised by assimilations thereof, turning hypochondriac (the paradox of modern sickness and health, bodybuilders making cryptofascist arguments while being gluttons and entitled [middle-to-upper-class, usually white/male] drug addicts: a disease stemming from their pathologizing of nature).

Amazons or otherwise, the Gothic is certainly no stranger to rape fantasies or telling truth with lies. This includes sodomy ("the love that dare not speak its name") as hyphenated "love language," relaid in historical violence ahistorically displaced unto fabrications of unironic rape revenge. If we are to heal from rape by capital unto nature (cops policing those "of nature" to devour them for the state), we must confront it in campy forms. So enjoy anal and even fantasize about rape through ironic forms; just don't endorse its unironic abuse by state actors aping the colonizer/chasing the dragon (re: ghosts of Caesar and his statuesque effigies' historically unattainable physique) to dick-measure with!

In turn, our bodies and their art may become weapons of genuine resistance (which the state will always treat as violent, regardless if it actually is); i.e., of protecting ourselves and our homes from those who would seek to own and exploit us, reclaiming what they try and take from us (our darkness visible) to use against us—by demonizing sex work (which all work is, under Capitalism) in sex-coercive forms! We're not doing ourselves any favors by keeping quiet, in that respect. Play with "rape"; play with Amazons, meaning those strong enough to liberate all workers from state tyranny! Sweet nutritious pain; clap my cheeks, Amazon mommy! Revenge, for us, is simply to exist in visible, humanizing forms of demonic expression. There's certainly an exploratory element to this, but also an addictive, drug-like facet with liberatory energies: demon BDSM, including anal sex, as criminalized, thus policed into acceptable forms of trespass by state forces.

The Gothic is largely poetic; in poetic language, "sodomy" yields a forbidden gateway to other worlds—one engaged with through a variety of non-PIV sex, BDSM and kink. This includes those reputedly practiced by Amazons (meaning those compared to Amazons) as vengeful aliens (re: the settler argument, prohibiting liberation for fear of revenge); i.e., so-called "savages" or "mud people" having a broad, xenophobic function despite its offshore colonial origins: degenerates of any location, color or creed—the enemy within to abject once more (to displace and exterminate, often by tokenized means). And while sodomy yields a crossover element speaking to/with demonized things, it's not inherently destructive or negative; instead, it can help us regain control—over our trauma through fetishized caricatures speaking to our idiosyncratic alienation without ranking rape or discriminating against others. To heal from rape (and reverse abjection), we must exist sex-positively in the shadow of police forces; we do this (and avoid discrimination) by finding similarity amid difference using taboo language (which sodomy is); re: the pedagogy of the oppressed speaking diplomatically to those accused of rape and those having survived it (an idea we'll revisit when looking at demon mummies). We solidarize intersectionally against capital and its effects making society sick through false notions of power (the grim harvest).

(artist: Aria Rain)

So while said trauma forever stays a part of us, it likewise doesn't define or control us in totality. Instead, we become desirable for it, albeit in sex-positive ways to trade in; i.e., can use it to synthesize good social-sexual habits that likewise extend to society at large; e.g., Aria Rain is an amputee using her disability through sex work to raise awareness: towards humanizing the disabled, illustrated by the company she keeps treating her well also being humanized. It becomes something to pay forwards, good instruction versus bad, good Amazons versus bad; re: starting "from ignorance, but also positions closer to nature that have become increasingly alien and closed-off" (a statement I originally applied to queerness and blood libel, in "Understanding Vampires," but applies equally to Amazons as demonic entities).

Is anal during ludo-Gothic BDSM a Rubicon of sorts? Sure; you'll start seeing the world differently while still inside it (re: Plato's cave). But why let that stop us from living our best lives while helping others in the bargain? In turn, this encompasses our daily lives; i.e., in ways that affect ourselves and inform our struggles against larger predatory structures, namely capital (and its qualities, monopolies, and trifectas) looking to frame us as barbarians to conquer anew.

I want to consolidate some important issues regarding this, which we can likewise apply to Amazons (and anything monstrous-feminine, in that respect). Consider this portion an "anal Amazon thesis," of sorts (indented for emphasis):

First, capital sexualizes everything to rape nature in modular terror language, including Amazons and anal; i.e., the world under Capitalism arranges heteronormatively in service to capital, whose Cartesian/settler-colonial structure rapes nature through said language; e.g., Amazons being used classically to control women by Ancient Athenians, not free them; re (from a few pages back): "The state controls sex and gender in monstrous-feminine language because these are where power (and trauma) are found [...] their ideas of power revolve around ideas of state revenge also dressed up: the pimp dominating nature-as-monstrous-feminine, doubling and dominating it through tokenized double standards; e.g., anal sex [and Amazons]." The state only tolerates the problematic love of Amazons and anal when their challenge (to the ancient canonical laws) is nominal; i.e., provided their counterfeits serve profit in canonical terror language that *further*s abjection. As something to combine, but also canonize in different performances, anal is a place and parlance of trauma to give and receive through tokenized enforcers dressed up as savage warriors—Amazons being a half-real theatrical device forever trapped between genuine rebellion and false, targeting vulnerable body parts in vulnerable areas (e.g., the bathroom). Things like Amazons and anal, then, canonically binarize to best give or receive state force (mainly police violence) pursuant to profit. To challenge profit and Capitalist Realism on and offstage, workers must camp state terror inside of itself—anisotropically with Amazons and anal to reverse terror/counterterror with subversive irony during liminal expression.

To see on which side of the fence people fall, you need only look to how they treat others through controlled devices; i.e., police violence; e.g., sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, but also the monstrous language of violence, terror and morphological expression per the Gothic mode: giving and receiving sodomy as a broader mechanism that includes Amazons and anal sex; re: subjugation is something to subvert in dominant/submissive language, which anal sex (and Amazons) very much are. Demons aren't satisfied with vanilla sex; they play with "darker" forms to weaponize them as a form of transformative exchange: an eye-opening experience/revelation, insofar as anal isn't purely abject, but something to reverse and embrace during the dialectic of the alien (re: hugging the alien, thus Medusa, with Amazons).

Said umbrella includes the basic idea of forbidden sex and hard kinks adjacent more ordinary forms, the appearance of fantastical things like Amazons that indicate policing as given and received through anal (and its double standards); e.g., redheads becoming scarce (from a cultural standpoint, not a genetic one) because they're exotic, hunted to extinction under capital's exterminator rhetoric: forbidden fruit weaponized part-and-parcel with capital's usual harvesting of nature behind foreign or condemned zones' arbitrary boundaries; i.e., alienated and sexualized by police agents enjoying state protection as they sodomize nature by going into said zones; re: us versus them, enacting cops-and-victims revenge arguments. This forced alienation of native groups, in turn, bleeds into any kind of archetype or associate behavior you could think of (not just Amazons): exploiting and exfoliating the land and its occupants, one on the menu and the other holding a knife and fork.

(artist: Persia Lourdes)

This works historically through terror and its devices assigned to abject territories by those with a monopoly on violence, terror and monsters, hence Amazons and anal. Simply put, if someone's a cop, they'll police sex, including monster sex' fetishes, kinks and BDSM; i.e., hard kinks become a disproportionate response against nature as something to impugn by straight avengers (re: the state is straight). To that, anal vis-à-vis subjugated Amazonomachia isn't a canonical tool for pleasure, but unironic domination that extends poetically to larger structures of oppression abjecting land back through anal: Amazons and "death by Snu-Snu" speaking to bog-standard sodomy fears (as a "disease" to "catch") and warrior-style revenge against colonizer bodies by militant colonized ones (only in colonizer peoples' own heads, mind you¹²²). Guilt by association, then, becomes something to reclaim alongside shame and hatred towards abjected things; i.e., to take Amazons and anal back by camping them is to take the land (and labor) back from these performative elements and their associate structures/enforcers.

To that, we reclaim ourselves as much animals in relation to nature as the state raping nature, thus adopt its survival mechanisms: Medusa's mirror-like gaze and fearsome appearance conjoined with softer things. In evolutionary terms, this is merely strength overcoming natural pressures, which capital is an unnatural (manmade) extension thereof. In turn, the subversive aesthetic of garbage speaks to things normally treated as such, fighting back against patriarchal addicts: subversive Amazons and anal rerouting the usual flow/ordering of power on the Aegis.

Bear with me. Such arguments often (and not without some justice) sound a little funny on their face, but highlight larger forces at work; i.e., hyperobjects and their symptoms, such as Capitalism vs Communism; e.g., squiggly lines are less violent than straight lines on a map because straight lines are unnatural, therefore laid out historically by nation-states through force instead of by land markers, like rivers or mountains. The same idea applies to actions that pertain to sex by native groups (or those treated as native)—those to do reproductive acts different or, God forbid, to do them for reasons other than reproducing at all!

So-called "rape epidemics" and sodomy go hand-in-hand under ethnocentrism, hence moral territory (and actors) versus immoral ones; i.e., ¹²² While fantasy races commonly symbolize settler-colonial arguments, there's a duality to them that requires them to be racist through usage, hence context; e.g., green skin speaks to colors of stigma that not only historically predate systemic racism, they speak to alienation of all kinds; re: blood libel being a medieval practice that survives into the present to afflict different groups for different reasons. The fact remains that rape fantasies aren't always based on actual cultures through these fantasies, but imaginary ones informed by different stigmas, biases and fears known to ours. To it, Jadis and I used to do rape fantasies—with me being their twink war bride and them playing an orc chiefess saying to me (as I fucked them), "I'm keeping this one!" Doing so wasn't so much to punch down, but play with "Gothic" destroyer language we divorced from systemic racism. It was fun!

deserving and underserving victims of state force; re: cops and victims, orcs and humans, etc. Hatred goes part-in-parcel with menticide breeding bad apples to spoil the entire crop; i.e., fruit from the poisoned tree, treating the colonized as "thicc" forbidden fruit to both objectify by the colonizer and deny themselves while chasing it down: e.g., PAWGs and PHAT black girls. These are generational issues measured most commonly in how they fight over time in relation to larger structures and dogma: an industry farming honeydew and milk of paradise.

For example, if someone is unusually afraid of anal, they're probably afraid of a great many other things associated with anal, thus more likely to attack those things using anal in bad faith; re: anything "of nature," including Amazons as barbaric givers and receivers of it for or against the state; e.g., witches—redheads or trans women, for instance (above and next page)—that might arbitrarily be called "Amazon" simply for their appearance being different, exotic, alien. Yet the truth is, hard kinks are hard for a reason, meaning they're acquired tastes (most of them I don't exhibit in this book because I don't prefer them, but do prefer rape play with Amazons and knights; i.e., demons, like all monsters, are enacted through preference as something to discover). And while experimentation often yields interesting results, its primary goal is to acclimate users to a priceless idea: of trying new things that, while stigmatized, are hardly unnatural or even that over the top!

A common application for ludo-Gothic BDSM is transformation, meaning towards a transhumanist outcome (more on posthumanism during Frankenstein); i.e., "upgrading" ourselves by setting aside normal activities and swapping them for abnormal ones. Doing so is less extreme unto itself (most of the time, anyways), and more a spice to, well, spice things up! Such is anal sex. It's not "bad," just different. So are Amazons and their own appearance during rape play a campy alternative to their unironic, tokenized variants—not to conquer for the state in subjugated forms, but to appear strong and fearsome to avoid state predation by subverting subjugation (similar to Medusa). This often has a magnetic effect, during calculated risk; i.e., they attract interested parties in good and bad faith.

For us, postcolonial considerations may be raised when dealing with capital's universal benefactors abusing such devices; re: capital is heteronormative, setter-colonial, and Cartesian, meaning its anisotropic views about sex and force extend unto half-real spheres exploring the rape of nature through revenge: as a kind of demonic exchange reversing the terrorist/counterterrorist dynamic; i.e., by illustrating mutual consent with "rape," occurring through demonic expression as part of daily life.

As something to indulge in or deny ourselves, we consume forbidden fruit and learn from the experience less perfectly synonymous with rape and more to camp it in order to safely control its powerful effects; re: forbidden sight, our darkness visible taking any shape or measurement, per exchange. In short, anal is the drug and Amazons (or things compared to Amazons; e.g., trans women, below) are associated with it as the automatic dealers/doers, thereof; we're the forbidden fruit (as much as anything "dark" is): to subjugate or subvert using what we got, offering you a delicious taste of a better, freer world; re (earlier in the module):

(artist: Eva Android)

Under Capitalist Realism, something is "dark" if it ostensibly moves anything of value (re: power and knowledge) away from the status quo. Generally this darkness is associated with the vengeful imaginary past based on buried historical atrocities, the latter paradoxically twisted by the former to keep control right where it is (among the elite). Anything that challenges this paradigm is canonically framed as dark, evil, profligate; i.e., nature as vengeful whore, which capital takes revenge on through DARVO-style police violence/obscurantism, witch hunts, tokenism and moral panic; e.g., Medusa and her Aegis' forbidden sight (source: "From Composites and the Occult to Totems and the Natural World").

followed by

power, darkness and knowledge—often as conspicuous, ritualized acts of creation/poetry and (re)invention through magic/mad science—go hand-in-hand during unequal, forbidden exchange, radical transformation and dark desire/wish fulfillment; i.e., someone will trade what they have for what they don't in order to transform or otherwise fulfill a given wish: with a demon that has the requisite item(s), build and/or abilities (e.g., sensations; re: Medusa's Aegis/forbidden sight). / Demons are the classic, mighty and at-times-untrustworthy granters of dark wishes/desires, be those fame, fortune, sex, or revenge (which transformation facilitates, on either side of an exchange) [ibid.]

and

demons having a third quality apart from exchange and transformation—desire, whose forbidden, wishful thinking/fulfillment occurs under a Western hegemon that alienates, fetishizes and scapegoats nature by design, whoring it out and raping it for profit. As you can imagine, this structure and its grim prostitution translate easily enough to revenge by one side against the other—of man/the nuclear model vs nature-as-whore and vice versa; i.e., commonly expressed as Amazonomachia in ancient to "ancient" heteronormative wrestling dialogs (and similar theatricalities), but also the Medusa and many other monstrous-feminine GNC forms. Revenge is an exchange that pertains to power and knowledge concerning workers whored out under state rule, our revenge being the development of Gothic Communism with ludo-Gothic BDSM to end said rule (thus rape) [source: "A Rape Reprise"]

and

according to what power and knowledge we exchange to and [for, the] whore's revenge is to break the profit motive by making a world for which it (and rape) are no longer possible using these methods; i.e., by using the same demonic and slutty language capital does, but at cross purposes: to hug the alien—not demonize it to receive state violence—thereby (ex)changing how the world is seen to begin with (ibid.).

Which brings us to anal and Amazons; i.e., traditional, warlike, tools of tokenized state revenge; re: raping Medusa's corpse/tomb to repress rebellious sentiment during state decay (and uphold Capitalist Realism). To have our revenge (and break Capitalist Realism), we fags subvert these devices to stymie profit with; i.e., as normally achieved by abusing anal and Amazons being objects of dark desire, thus wish fulfillment: to live deliciously and in defiance of state orders purging us, generally turning those "prison sex" mentalities (and their Man Box) inside-out using weird nerd culture—monster sex and its assorted battles!

This generally means while bare and exposed, called "furious" even if we're just naked and vibing (often, though, a fair amount of rage is present): dead and loving it, fucking each other's brains out, or adored for our muse-like body's public nudism/asexual prowess exploring (through unknown pleasures) the ways in which sex is normally controlled by the state (through force). Fighting for the right to eat, shit, fuck and die with our dignity intact, our revenge is to humanize ourselves while being remembered for our demonized status. We conjure up (and camp) said status with clay and other dark materials, reversing "rape" by putting it in quotes; re: camping its canonical forms in paradoxical language/medieval puns: "Oh, yeah! Plunder my forbidden 'tomb!'" Our revenge equals survival as something to perform, exchanging data through new healthy trades that help us conceptualize our own rape as something to avoid by summoning copies of itself that are costly and cheap ("there is a price, barbarian"); anal is often a rebellious statement, boldly ripping the control of sex (and force) from state agents—one commonly made in primal, anthropomorphic "breeding" language transported to the modern world (which Amazons and Medusa certainly hint at, but which we'll examine more with furies, later):

(artist: Foxovh)

It bears repeating that doing so is classically framed as "petty" by pro-state narratives; e.g., to look pretty if only to gain the upper hand in a world that values good looks. In truth, we're merely trying to exist, which requires breaking profit as the thing that normally destroys us because we're different; defying such notions, we become whatever we want—our body plasticity and gender euphoria existing despite capital trying to exterminate us, and contributing towards its ultimate demise by taking away its ability to privatize us (and our bodies, genders, labor and sexualities, etc): objects they cannot privatize, and sleek death machines to render their greatest treasure, profit, wholly moot by breaking Capitalist Realism with it. Such is our ultimate revenge—not to exist, but thrive in a post-scarcity world.

Like any illicit substance during a drug war/epidemic, moral panickers clutch their pearls, and the reactionary behaviors between them serve the same purpose vis-à-vis anal and Amazons: control for the state over workers and nature by normalizing one particular way to do things that is "correct," while outlawing everything else (or legalizing them behind paywalls; re: Sales of Indulgence under a Protestant ethic); e.g., missionary PIV sex vs anal doggy (the latter being what Amazons have, thus Commie, Satanist space aliens). These become things to feel anxious about, hence loaded with great expectations on how we're supposed to behave. In turn, Capitalist Realism informs Amazonomachia with neoliberal dogma (anime, videogames, movies, etc): copaganda designed to make people terminally afraid of, hence allergic and paradoxically addicted to, some very basic things onstage and off; re: Gothic push-pull during the abjection process counterfeiting the ghost of genocide, the middle class fearful of/fascinated towards abjected things like anal and Amazons being treated like forbidden fruit.

Except outlawing things, per the cryptonymy process and its double operation (to show and hide), doesn't eliminate outlawed things from society at large. Instead, they grow increasingly dark and visible, those abjecting them suddenly seeing them everywhere; i.e., as a matter of illicit, drug-like consumption: a moral quandary insofar as our existence is something they are conditioned to eat and deny like junk food. Guilt, curiosity and dread (venial sin, often thought crimes) ensue to uphold the norm, which is persecution; i.e., towards the out-group by the in-group afraid of them yet also wanting to try what might "kill" them if they "eat" them. We become synonymous with sin and temptation as things to try and reject, for fear that prolonged exposure might enact the whore's revenge, not the pimp's; the pimp grows afraid of their own supply.

Such oscillation is rather addictive, but also comical. Cis-het vanilla types, for example, usually walk into situations like these thinking out loud, "But what if I like having my asshole fingered?" Would that really be so bad, my dude? Furthermore, when done correctly, anal (giving and receiving) is merely something to try¹²³. It's not a disorder but a *divergence*¹²⁴ from normative approaches to sex (and relating to others through sex), thus Capitalist Realism equating said boundary's violences as unironically apocalyptic: anal as inherently transgressive through such eyes projecting their inheritor's guilt onto the whore, the latter a homewrecker because she tempts people with forbidden love like anal (which the state conflates with rape). But also, it's a asshole whose owner has reclaimed it from state terror dialogs—existing in a rebellious but happy position the same way someone might reclaim the bedroom or bathroom associated with it (and its signature "surprise butt sex" [shock and awe] vulnerability): the revenge of success, decentralizing power's spread in creamy ghosts of itself!

(artist: Aria Rain)

"Nothing ventured, nothing gained" leaps to mind, but suddenly faced with that tempting proposition—of changing into something outside of what capital deems useful—will downright terrify most men (and anyone in the Man Box). Suddenly demon BDSM becomes a gateway to harder and harder kinks, which naysayers either reject entirely (calling such activities "giving in" or "weakness"), or which to project their own desire to dominates others onto; e.g., anal = rape because it "feminizes" the recipient; i.e., it makes them a recipient of police violence per nature-as-monstrous-feminine as something not just to rape, but rape in prison-like (uncomfortable) ways by Cartesian forces¹²⁵ allergic towards ¹²³ Such abjection is something to dispel through experiment. For example, I used to be scared of anal. When I tried it, I realized that God wasn't going to strike me down, nor Satan (the canonical version) drag me kicking and screaming off to Hell. Yes, I didn't like it with Zeuhl (who lost their virginity to anal sex), but I also didn't like them entirely as a person; when I tried it with Cuwu, I liked them a lot more (and was more comfortable with myself as trans), thus found myself enjoying anal a lot more, too. In doing so, I suddenly saw all the people who not only were afraid of anal, but things associated with anal; e.g., whores and gay people. It was a very eye-opening experience.

¹²⁴ These in turn, are loaded with various slippery-slope fallacies and false equivalencies we can dispel; e.g., anal doesn't always lead to felching (through it can), and felching isn't equivalent to "getting your red wings." I've done one but not the other but viewed through the abjection process, such activities would be conflated and viewed as harmful.

¹²⁵ To it, if there is escalation, it's generally because those escalating violence have been conditioned to behave as such; i.e., by seeing enemies all around them to attack, thus whores "of nature" to pimp; e.g., Amazons sodomize men out of revenge (the idea—of an avenging degenerate—being a fascist argument; re: the backstabbing Jew), so Amazons must die "the way they'd do it to us!" It's a strawman, one the state loves to abuse during DARVO—to shame and ridicule sluts, and things treated like sluts by the state tokenizing Amazons (anything not white, cis-het, male, European and Christian). Nature becomes a brothel, the land something to hold onto and choke out through force versus actually give back to Indigenous groups during "land back" arguments (which become just as unimaginable to Cartesian dominators as anal sex is).

As such, everything must be white, a black planet something fear because the revenge of those reclaiming the land surely must want to seek harm against the colonizers they're ousting. Again, liberation arguments like land back made through anal. They resent anything that points out their hypocrisies through these allergies; i.e., that they're bad-faith, the state incompatible with life and consent through its militants jockeying of the same-old paradigms; e.g., that they're more likely to kidnap women and children and harm them than Indigenous peoples are, thus must constantly act self-righteous to keep up appearances (and rob people blind behind the fog of war). Kinks become like rumors to squash, but also guilty pleasures: to enjoy behind the choir screens, this is projection. While there's something to be said for getting even, the fact remains that places like Haiti and its successful slave revolt against the French, were repelling a group of people from their land that had spent their entire time there exterminating the local population for profit. Settler colonialism is a system, in this respect—one that repeats over and over across the world, space and time, in between fact and fiction, novel and romance, normal and abject. People who are weird about sex and gender—but also BDSM, fetishes and kink as monstrous extensions of these things—are likewise weird about Imperialism, ethnocentrism, and Pax Americana, etc. Things like anal and land back might seem unrelated, but only to the uninitiated!

In turn, history repeats itself in ways that play out through relationships between people and the land that harbors them (where they live, thus have sex). As Jewish Voices for Peace writes:

This July 4th, we contemplate parallels between the colonization of Turtle Island ("North America") and Palestine:

Genocide. Land theft. Ethnic cleansing. Environmental destruction. Forced displacement of people from their homes, and sequestration into isolated areas with (artificially) scarce resources. Criminalization and surveillance. Colonial control over lives, and denial of self-determination and sovereignty. Erasure of native history and culture. Ideologies (Manifest Destiny, Zionism) of entitlement to, and justification for, these atrocities.

While there are parallels between the colonization of Palestine and of Turtle Island, there are also major distinctions. It's inappropriate to discuss the colonization of Turtle Island as a monolith, since the various peoples here endured it in different ways and at different points in time. (To learn more about the specific history of the Indigenous people whose land you're on, go to native-land.ca.)

Supporting Palestinians' right to return and right to self-determination in their homeland goes hand in hand with supporting Indigenous people's demand for #LandBack — for restoration of Indigenous sovereignty and stewardship, and respect for their deep connection to and knowledge of their lands.

As @ndncollective writes, although Palestinians and people indigenous to Turtle Island "come from different nations and geographies, the struggles against settler colonialism are the same... because settler colonists share playbooks," and "Zionism, white supremacy, and imperialism... act as one to oppress and eliminate us." And both groups of native people are working toward a similar vision of liberation. In @ndncollective's words: "Just as we fight and organize to reclaim land on Turtle Island, our Palestinian relatives fight and organize to return the land and for the land to return to the people" (source Instagram post: July 4th, 2024).

Solidarity against such oppression is the only way forwards.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

but also weapons of rape to use unironically against their enemies. "Who's the savage, modern man!"

By extension, the colonizer assumption becomes those who do things that are gross (to them) must secretly crave anything that isn't the norm; i.e., isn't PIV missionary sex with a white picket fence; re: Amazons, anal and the power fantasies they express denoting unironic violence committed by the rebel against an "innocent" colonial body. Such things are forbidden by the state, colonizing them as guilty pleasures: to let one side to unto the other as punished for crimes that could happen. The genocide becomes endlessly pre-emptive; i.e., any fear of a controlled substance instilled to police it through pre-emptive revenge.

For those who fear the forbidden, such things exist outside their realm of experience; camping them, these become viewpoints unto themselves, those who enjoy them doing so because of their medicinal, therefore campy and transformative, potential. Pain is often a part of this, as are ways of doing things differently to achieve similar results. An orgasm is an orgasm—largely in the mind! So is the idea of fair treatment. Our revenge is reversing abjection to undo all the awful, alienizing things listed above; re: taking anal back from our colonizers, thus our land, brokering for peace using Amazonian theatre (and its excessive, over-the-top theatrics) as a popular and humorous conduit: threat display (the kind to make you spit out your morning coffee). Death by Snu-Snu, indeed! Anal becomes the whore's revenge; re: Medusa clapping back, subverting the Amazon by dancing with the ghost of the counterfeit: as something to include, not abject, when going native (when in "Rome")!

Such counterterror humor often has a "gallows" flavor to it; i.e., speaking to the pain of forced anal (or some such metaphor of colonial abuse) inflicted over a long period of time. Pain is a data that demons specialize in; re: "hurt, not harm" providing love taps—slaps, whip cracks, and pegging, etc—that speak to our abuse echoed across bad copies we can reclaim. To see something exotic and different as human, but haunted as alien under police heels—re: the pedagogy of the oppressed—is to heal from rape by finding similarity amid difference in the shadow of police forces. What they dehumanize, we *re*humanize (the harvest) to expose the state as inhumane! Profit is the rape of nature as "inferior" to modernity's timeless enforcers; we camp doubles of those, but also embrace ourselves (and our multiculture across like-minded allies with their own struggles, left) as "native," monstrous-feminine: inheritors of a possible better world that Capitalism, in the interim, has done nothing but abuse!

(artist: Minetgot21)

"Native" is both a history and a status—the latter comparable to "dark," in settler arguments and their

Gothic offshoots; Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism encourages all oppressed peoples—those treated as monstrous-feminine by the state—to join hands in collective revenge: intersectional solidarity against our foes aping us in bad faith. Faced with such mirrors, the idea isn't tokenization by viewing ourselves (and our allies) as enemies within, but to subvert the expectation of subjugation-through-assimilation, thus become stewards of each other as part of the natural world we can rebuild at capital's expense. Our struggles might seem different, but in truth share the same basic goal: liberation, its dismantling of state models comprising our best revenge.

In turn, the same umbral-yet-liberatory potential that Amazons and their sodomy yield likewise goes for non-Christians, GNC persons, people of color and/or Indigenous groups combating various modular-to-intersecting abject immigrant myths/xenophobia; e.g., rape epidemics ("think of the [white] women and children"); i.e., presenting in the buff (or skimpy clothes like the bikini, below) while also being heard through these statements' combined pedagogy of the oppressed: "We're here and we're queer!" Intersectional solidarity punching up towards universal, postcolonial liberation (while navigating various double standards/uneven privilege and oppression) is key in reversing abjection/challenging profit as a whole. Find what works and run with it; light a fire under your ass and go to town! Let them see you living your best life: a mistress of one's own fate.

(artist: Minetgot21)

Indeed, such holistic, feral creativity is vital to breaking Capitalist Realism, becoming mothers (and fathers) to a post-scarcity world while inside its hauntologies. This happens by having pride in one's culture, heritage and creativity as attached to other cultures; i.e., as Amazons are, speaking to white women as "ancient," unruly and chaotic, similar to their non-white cousins raped inside the same territorial police states, thus prisons: "terror-tories." Assimilation is folly because the zones of fear always expand and contract indefinitely per state revenge; i.e., delivering disproportionate violence that, unto itself, yields the very desperation and convenience that lead people to betray themselves. Being informed by the colonial past but not set in colonial stone, things don't reduce merely to class, culture and race under struggle, but hybridize and intersect across all persecution networks, lest the elite divide-and-conquer us all over again: "The axe forgets, the tree remembers." We're a forest, babes; they cut down one of us, they'll do it to all of us in due time. Lest people tokenize, gentrify and decay under state concessions, liberation is a universal affair! No exceptions! Basic human rights must become universal or Omelas' genocides will continue, unabated.

That's all our main points (and thought experiments) about Amazons, which means the rest of part two is, as usual, a bit more conversational/extraneous/tangential (a forest of tangents); i.e., rehashing previous points—recombining them holistically to reconsider how such things are forever at odds, warring among the same aesthetic for or against capital and its Realism; re: Amazonomachia something of a civil war between subjugated and subversive elements, abstracting them in easy-to-understand forms (re: sex and force) during ludo-Gothic BDSM: by interacting and playing with them; i.e., Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart (who we'll examine towards the end). We'll also integrate and inspect some historical elements to Amazons and the ancient world.

In Dispute, Afterthoughts: Subjugation vs Subversion (cont., feat. Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart)

Behind every fantasy is a reality waiting to be heard. Bearing that in mind, me and my mother's mutual feelings—of wanting empowerment through frightening-yet-sexy monsters like the Amazon—are perfectly legitimate/ethical provided they don't tokenize/submit to state abuse (and its various confusions about BDSM, fetishes and kink).

As such, we shouldn't discount the value of Amazonian devices; i.e., as "mere fun and games," hence treat them as "lesser" when trying to break the cycle. While fun and games are required to relieve stress and camp canon, garbage is useful because it's garbage; i.e., is clay-like, hence something to transmute demonically into something else because it is both wholly invaluable and entirely cheap. But regardless of its stamina, veracity or exact constitution, the state practice works well enough for them: to divide and conquer those made to fear and fetishize whoever the state requires by abusing the power of mythmaking that Amazons convey so well. Take what they recuperate and use it to hit them where it hurts; make your opposition unruly and desirable in ways that—through the aesthetics of power and death, but also the product placement of monstrous-feminine revenge (the sleek, biomechanical avenger on her "steed," left)—bend others towards liberation through darkness visible on the Aegis!

(artist: Martina Oliveira)

Under capital, sex and force sells as products, including Amazons. Their arguments—about rape and revenge—are demonic, persuading poetically through unequal power's transformative potential and fulfilling of dark desires (regarding sex and force with sex and force); re: the right to exist, thus have anal sex, but also practice BDSM to challenge profit/systemic rape, achieving catharsis while fencing dialectically-materially with tokenized variants.

The fact remains, rape survivors are more vulnerable under state duress, and historically betray (along class, culture and race lines) to stop it from happening again; i.e., more vulnerable parties are more desperate, thus more prone to betray under convenience to escape criminogenic conditions (said conditions being promises of violence that may or may not occur—the Faustian exchange, unto itself, also being criminogenic). It's an old TERF/SWERF trick, one the state knows all too well. Scratch one, the other bleeds, both victims of privilege and oppression who dominate other workers by becoming cops. Both seek revenge through costumes they'll monopolize "for themselves" and "themselves" alone: state bruisers acting as if they kneel before no one, playing the white Indian in bad faith.

(artist: Aisendraw)

Bullshit; nothing is regulated more than sex through force, subjugated Amazons stuck smack-dab in the middle of that clusterfuck. Asprey writes in War in the Shadows how Terror is the kissing cousin of force and, real or implied, is never far removed from the pages of history. To define (and condemn) terror from a peculiar social, economic, political, and emotional plane is to display a self-righteous attitude that, totally unrealistic, is doomed to be disappointed by harsh facts (source).

As such, TERFs are fascists and fascists, however "ancient," "mighty" and "rebellious" they seem, always bend the knee to capital; i.e., through false acts of rebellion facilitating police action—official or stochastic (vigilante)—preemptively against labor as a criminal whole to fight against; re; Parenti: the paradox of one's "defiant" actions being they constitute deference, actually defending capital by killing capital's enemies. The enemy is within, but that enemy is them: playing dress-up in bad faith to better enact state terror (thus violence) with relative impunity.

Neoliberalism endorses personal responsibility in its cryptofascism—a "phallic" Amazonian tack to defend the free market, while seeking the kinds of revenge known previously to medieval women's Gothic voices; i.e., regardless of territory or occupant; e.g., Lady Macbeth's rising venom when forced to harbor King Duncan under her battlements:

Come, you spirits
That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here,
And fill me from the crown to the toe top-full

Of direst cruelty! make thick my blood;
 Stop up the access and passage to remorse,
 That no compunctious visitings of nature
 Shake my fell purpose (source).

Medusa, through Hippolyta, rattles in echoes that can be copied in bad faith.

Again, while the state tries to monopolize Amazons—and while these sentiments and actual monopolies are impossible—the historical-material consequence of striving for them is anything but. Faced with the unknown as brought about by planned economic collapse (and loaded with cryptonymic threats of rape), the middle class triggers, suddenly crying out, "We can't go back to the street, the brothel—won't (or can't) squeeze into a corset again!" But that's precisely what they do when they posture as strong inside the Man Box; i.e., putting on a fur or metal bikini and posing as a buff underwear model with fake tits; e.g., Autumn Ivy doing just that while aggressively insisting they aren't a money-grubbing sex worker, and policing those who might say otherwise:

(artist: Autumn Ivy)

There's nothing wrong with underwear models, money-grubbing or fake tits; there's everything wrong with fake solidarity from token SWERFs, gentrifying sex work while punching down in bad faith (with Autumn also being a TERF for punching down against me, a trans woman). For Autumn (and anyone who acts like them), it's a brand (e.g., the tweet for the left image reading "gym girls that cosplay")—the actual politics largely unimportant save when posturing as strong in ways that white gentrified AFAB people historically do: as token feminists, punching down against easy targets. They're loud, but only when their own equality of convenience is threatened. In turn, images like the one above become something that cannot easily be parsed without dialectical-material scrutiny (the above image merely the phallic aesthetic of the Amazon, its author's politics largely neoconservative/unspoken beyond "strong women are sexy").

State alienation knows no bounds. Wedding personal responsibility to austerity politics, neoliberalism loves to threaten middle-class security as "under attack" (during alien invasions) before "creating jobs" to police labor with; e.g., branding the bodice as a "breastplate" and the thong as a "codpiece" (or ham sandwich holder—the vagina dentata) to conceal its carceral, police-like function (versus a function that liberates all peoples). All equate to labor and wage theft, disguised as false power in oft-fantastical language criminalizing sex work through monetary value; i.e., the Amazon as a formerly conquered group, but also a job opportunity (the carrot and stick) chained to the brothel: a bouncer who can never leave. Doing so decays the Amazon as a sex-positive feminist symbol; i.e., replacing it with a traitorous double recruited from the prison population to brutalize their own (the state later rescinding these privileges, per the euthanasia effect). Whores policing whores in the brothel-as-prison, they do so while posturing as exclusive, special victims; i.e., undeserving of state force, while administering said force towards deserving victims in exchange for state pay. Autumn (and those like them) aren't strong for standing up to the elite; they're a cop, thus the elite's bully kept on a leash, acting strong (and having their cake and eating it, too, as their alt account demonstrates).

Female or not, the state must always create new monstrous-feminine enemies to uphold Capitalist Realism with (and cops to enforce it); i.e., offshoots of the Medusa scaring and exciting its middle-class gatekeepers with a ghost of the counterfeit to further the abjection process (to be on guard/the lookout for criminal degenerate elements). This includes domestic cops and victims, but also from Elsewhere—from the wild reaches beyond empire, while making civilians want for heroes that bridge the gap at home: cowboys and Indians, orcs and humans, us versus them. Per eco-fascism and its moderation by state good guys (re: American exceptionalism calling such things "stable," so-called "peace and prosperity" code for worker/owner division, infinite growth, and efficient profit), competition, conflict and scarcity are relaid through tokenized monsters combining this with that, under Pax Americana power fantasies; e.g., Amazons and orcs with sex, and sex other forbidden goods, like rape: someone to capture you and presumably never let go! It's a drug and the first one's free ("There is a price, barbarian!")!

(artist: Master DCJ)

Such feast-or-famine combative theatrics are universally applicable, and regression isn't automatically bad (re: regressing during roleplay to address trauma). That being said, state decay cycles under capital, fostering a routine unknown to endorse and enforce regressively conservative politics made from whole cloth (re: fascism defends capital during neo-medieval regression with paganized, eco-fascist elements). In turn, Orientalism is the dialog between the colonizer and colonized, speaking between them in warrior-like ways; i.e., among those with a capacity for physical violence pushed into cartoonish forms about monster captivity and rape (above and below). They become sources of power to tap into—rape epidemics that seek to reclaim these devices to humanize the Beast and acknowledge the furious and whore-like elements of the Beauty character in the same breath: their hellish co-existence during rape, capture and murder fantasies (we'll unpack this even more with demon mommies). It's an opera, a danger disco whose Numinous, forbidden love speaks to nature not simply as alien under capital, but desirable for it (sex out of wedlock isn't just fun, but good praxis).

(artist: Soli)

Rape play involves passion when putting "rape" in quotes. Per Laura Ng and Edward Said, the inheritors of empire seek protection from the home as suddenly foreign to them per a fear of said unknown; i.e., when their rights and personal property are threatened by the elite pulling the strings (the call coming from inside the house): during the Gothic's liminal hauntology of war turning the home into an unheimlich, traveling barbaric castle (thus conducive to those savage realities of empire that inheritors of the Imperial Core turn a blind eye to); re: "There is always a sense of a lurking danger from which the viewers need protection" (source), generally through feelings of alienation and attraction.

All can be supplied by rebels or cops, but their appearance is largely the same; i.e., in such spaces "invaded" by a foreign, imperial menace—that of a savage conqueror "of nature" doubling as a homely nurturer that, all the while, comes off as nakedly imposing and desirable, foreign and familiar while evoking the Medusa to hug and embrace during calculated risk; re: the dialectics of shelter and the alien—their threats of capture, bondage, domination, torture, rape, death, etc, playing out during courtly love. A black castle appears; the Amazon defeats it to canonically whitewash home, then is bridled/pimped out as a whore (while being somewhat whore-like until then, too).

In terms of the "invasion," itself, home is invaded by the ghosts of empire projected onto an abject scapegoat mirroring state abuse in "ancient alien" forms (re: the black pyramid and its evil rulers). A wild enemy appears, calling for token Amazons (and similar agents) to crack down in bad faith. These trends extend historically-materially into the retro-future's castle-narrative (chronotopes) and cryptonymies; re, Hogle and Bakhtin: a restless labyrinth merged with the environs of a castle space, saturated through-and-through with time in the narrow sense of the word; i.e., that of the historical past, fixated on dynastic primacy and hereditary rights enforced by police agents, pivoting and wheeling to maintain their own middle-management, desk murderer's white-knuckle hold on a given population: the animation of a legendary police violence mirroring ironic, campy forms (and their gender parody's subsequent gender trouble).

In turn, this ghost of the counterfeit is policed to further the abjection process, having revenge against nature through clay-like renditions of the status quo as "Gothic," a found document. Statutes are documentation, in that respect—psychosexual golems bringing the dead back to life, wish-fulfilling a variety of guilty pleasures/forbidden desires. "I love 'clay' so fucking much!"

(artist: Sergey Galanter)

Clay is the data storage device of the ancient world, but also—still to some extent—the modern one. Demons, including Amazons, come from said world, fashioned from clay to denote "ancient," repressed revenge; i.e., as something to reclaim under state dominion; re: from state gargoyles policing state territories and coded with state data, thus instructions regarding the giving and receiving of police violence as revenge against oppressed peoples fighting back. It's again effectively eco-fascism, white Indians treating native peoples like a virus while badly imitating them. This can be reversed, the proletarian whore both "for real" and artificial while pushing for post-scarcity as starting in imaginary realms; i.e., "given flesh" through clay and other demonic devices.

To demonize something is either to make it alien or speak to one's alienation while reclaiming it. As monstrous-feminine beings, Amazons—good or bad—incur this process in a dialectical-material sense similar to knights (e.g., Cameron's terminators); i.e., cops and victims, us versus them, etc, pilfered from Antiquity in service of the West or to undermine it, mid-Amazonomachia.

Through demonic expression—of monsters battling monsters (one-on-one or through teams)—you're only limited by your creativity and imagination; i.e., which capital curtails to serve profit by raping nature: profiting off manmade disasters. Challenging that, anything becomes possible, be it match to make or stance to adopt, per Satanic self-determination; re, Milton: "The mind is its own place, and in itself can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven." All pro-state forms (of demons) deliberately serve profit while asleep at the wheel; all pro-labor forms actively fight capital to subvert, resist and dismantle it (to be of the devil's party and know it), hence abjure greed and achieve liberation, sex positivity and post-scarcity—often by showing audiences a troubling view of their own world: of "another" world, another time, one whose age of wonder and cusp of disaster speaks of god-like beings who walk the earth among us mortals!

In a post-scarcity sense, such a world has never quite existed, but the lack of systemic cruelty before capital can be revived in hauntological forms felt in the shadows of cloaked, present-day abuses. This happens per the Aegis seized from the state to embody our struggles; i.e., in opposition to state forms, our best revenge being to humanize and deify the proletariat as sacred: a Great Destroyer the state actually fears—what it can't fully pimp/rape, thus control in service to profit! "You'll never own this ass!"

(artist: Dandofuga)

This dialectic of ownership and control over nature-as-alien/monstrous-feminine brings us to something I want to briefly explore, here: ancient history and aesthetics superimposed over modern forms of the Amazon as a profoundly hauntological being.

Despite a curious translation for amazos meaning "one breast" and indicating body mutilation, we also have the armored, resisting quality of the classical female form protecting the body from mutilation while wholly unclothed; i.e., controlling sex through force, hyphenating both in masculine body displays loaded with feminine contradictions, theatrical hauntologies, and GNC gradients that have only intensified in recent years (under Amazon tokenization).

For one, recent female embodiments speak through/of the tell-tale nudity of ancient warriors, but specifically male bodies mythologized for having invincible flesh (e.g., Achilles) that Amazons were historically denied; i.e., as the victims of male conquest (the Amazonomachia) by infringing on patriarchal territories. Yet, Gothic Communism is half-real, recultivating the imaginary past that performers (and their bodies) might speak to historical-material issues like female domination: as giver or receiver of current state abuse! To that, the monstrous-feminine isn't biologically male or female, and its mythologies allow for a sea of contrast more or less alien to the nascent West (sexuality and gender identity emerging in the 1700s; re: Foucault).

Considering public nudism, the monstrous-feminine invokes a curious paradox when presenting nude before the gods: strength through exposure. Under current forms, this presents an opportunity as much to ogle ancient male-exclusive ideas of masculine strength onto women's bodies as it does to masturbate to the female body on display. The two are not mutually exclusive, but female warriors remain haunted by a die-hard notion of imaginary motherhood attached to state models about sexual reproduction and, by extension, nudity (vaginal or phallic) having evolved over time: male power fantasies for various reasons, but also female/queer pilot adopting said fantasies for ironic (or unironic) reasons.

(artist: Alex Ross)

This Amazonian paradox began with older patriarchal forms that were, themselves, rather plastic. For example, Sarah Bond writes in "A Brief History of Olympic Nudity from Ancient Greece to ESPN" (2016) how the 5th century BCE historian Thucydides saw "athletic nudity [as] a show of civility [emphasis, me] in the face of the barbarism displayed by the Persian enemies to the East of Greece. Ancient Persians traditionally thought it against decorum to appear in the buff, and thus Greek nudity was an affront to their social mores. It was a symbol of Greekness at that time first associated with Spartans and then with many other Greek city-states. It was said that even Spartan women worked out in the nude" (source).

In short, ancient warriors advertised their superior lineage through their naked bodies; i.e., as a kind of dogma/copaganda—one that could be replicated (for workers or the state) through cryptomimesis (the echo of trauma, but also, I would argue, symbols of power). Bond further writes, Athletes were often ideal bodies that served as the muses for artists, just as Michelangelo would later use such Greek athletic sculpture to inspire his statue of David. To Thucydides and many other later writers and artists, the athletic body was a symbol of Greek civilization, superiority and, most importantly, control. These were bodies honed and shaped by extreme discipline. Greeks prided themselves in competing with each other in self-control—called in Greek "σωφροσύνη"—and Sparta in particular was famous for this virtue.

If nudity really was a way of projecting and advertising Spartan discipline, just think about what all those enhanced six-packs in 300 were supposed to represent. No one articulates the meaning of the ancient nude athletic body better than historian Donald Kyle, who notes in his book Sport and Spectacle in the Ancient World, "The human body-male or female, fit or flabby, clothed or naked-is the ultimate symbol...In Archaic Greece, disrobing fully to become naked for sport became an assertive communication of maleness, ethnicity, status, freedom, privilege, and physical virtue." Even then, the athletic body was a powerful advertising canvas and nudity was itself a costume (ibid.).

"Costume" is a good way to put it. Basically reversing Segewick's imagery of the surface vis-à-vis nudity on the surface of clothes, and more showcasing clothing through nudity (the surface of skin) as a virtue of masculine strength and beauty that Amazons are certainly known for (albeit as a matter of performative irony regarding their feminine side and status being monstrous because they aren't biologically¹²⁶ men)—so-called "bare strength" is an heirloom of the ancient world; i.e., bodies stripped bare, less to perform better and more to advertise them and those they represent (the state and the state's dimorphic gender values) on the field: to be viewed, hence witnessed, as intimating works of art/poetry in motion. This would happen while suitably giving a courtier's deference and hubristic display to Olympus—namely Zeus and his divinity as something to bask in and hopefully win his (infamously capricious) favor:

Athletes competed naked as a tribute to the Greek God Zeus. They wanted to show Zeus their physical power and muscular physique. Showing off their bodies also helped intimidate other competitors. /Since Greek heroes were often depicted nude in artwork and sculptures, this inspired athletes to train harder and win their event. Athletes wanted to be compared to "true" [quotes, me] heroes like Hercules and Achilles.

[...] In Greek legends death was a terrible experience. They believed when you died it was all over and you spent the rest of eternity in endless torment. This is why Hercules was so revered. He was a mortal man who won immortality because of his athletic accomplishments. / Lunt believes that many people competed in the Olympics hoping they'd be able to achieve some portion of immortality. By consistently winning athletes would have statues sculpted and songs written about their achievements, which meant their legacy would live on through the ages (source: "Five Things You Didn't Know About the Ancient Olympics," 2016).

Male or female, masculine and/or feminine, there's an apocryphal element to Greek heroes—one that plays out, onstage, in a half-real sense (tying heroism as much to games and performance, such naked violence sitting between legend and real life). It also bears repeating that Greek heroes are notoriously tragic, chasing the gods only to fall short (with Hercules going mad and killing his family before trying to commit suicide¹²⁷, and Achilles famously falling victim to poison).

¹²⁶ That ancient (and awful) rubric, still used by patriarchal defenders to this day (re: TERFs).

The belief (and a very patriarchal one, at that) was immortality being achieved through legendary feats of physical strength that people could witness at a given venue known for recreating them (athleticism, but also military conquest told in masculine art; i.e., the "human cockfighting" of gladiatorial kayfabe). The classic problem with Amazons, then, is they and their costumes (their naked bodies) were basically doing what men did minus a male overlord, which society at the time would have warned against; Amazons were monsters, meaning threats to male power structures because they promoted an equality that was fundamentally antithetical to how the Ancient Greeks—particularly the Athenians—normally viewed men and women: as inherently (according to them) unequal, thus ultimately defeated in propaganda battles ordaining such things (which classical Amazonomachia did, carrying its foregone conclusions into Renaissance art and ultimately present-day forms; re: hoakley's "Amazons at War," 2023). Men were dogmatized as "superior" and treated all women, not just Amazons, as threats/sites of conquest to put down by force—to rape, synonymizing sex with force.

While city-states are not homogenous, even Spartan¹²⁸ women would have been beholden to this ordering of things; yes, they could be do certain things other city-states, like Athens, might be stricter about (nudity in public), but still remained

¹²⁷ According to Euripides (source: Perseus.tufts.edu).

¹²⁸ Joshua Mark writes,

Spartan women had more rights and enjoyed greater autonomy than women in any other Greek city-state of the Classical Period (5th-4th centuries BCE). Women could inherit property, own land, make business transactions, and were better educated than women in ancient Greece in general. Unlike Athens, where women were considered second-class citizens, Spartan women were said to rule their men (source).

He goes on to state how Sparta lost a 371 BCE battle with Thebes, at Leuctra, after centuries of military supremacy. Following this defeat, the state weakened and collapsed, leading future male thinkers to not only create the Amazons, but blame Spartan women, to boot:

What Aristotle and other conventionally minded non-Spartan men feared subconsciously and perhaps sometimes consciously was feminine power. One expression of that Greek male fear was the invention of the mythical race of Amazons, but at least the Amazons had the decency to live apart from men, whereas the Spartan women apparently exercised their power from within the heart of the community. In the grip of such fear, the male sources often distorted the facts they had access to, usually only at second-hand at best, about Spartan women (cited by Mark; original source: Paul Cartledge's The Spartans: The World of the Warrior-Heroes of Ancient Greece, 2004).

In short, the glorifying of male military might was done at the expense of the women who, in the case of the Spartans, not only bore their husbands' children but used their own expanded rights to empower Sparta beyond what it could have been otherwise.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

beholden to that most sacred of womanly duties a state would need to survive: motherhood. A quality reflected in Cameron's Amazons, literal millennia down the road, this effectively made Spartan women glorified breeding vats for the city-state: to produce children, including boys, for the Spartan Agoge: "Their lives were not their own, but belonged to the state," explains Unknown5, who is quick to point out the Spartan state was a war machine dependent on slave labor and brutal military programs, but also secret police¹²⁹ ("How Sparta Manufactured Super-Soldiers - The Spartan Agoge," 2023).

And yet, if men were victims of the state for falling in battle, women were recruited to assist in sexual reproduction valorized over something closer to a whore or second-class citizen: dying during childbirth. But they would have still stood for the values of the state, making them glorified cheerleaders with additional responsibilities yet still controlled for their sexuality by something that had (and continues to have) power over them in newer evolved markets continuing to control sex and force, and by extension, women's bodies of all different kinds. Nothing is controlled more than sex, force an instrument to dominate nature by vengefully pimping it. Nudity and prostitution became increasingly common in forms that, while they can be sex-positive and dictated by workers themselves, historically would have (and still continue to be) controlled by state forces towering over them:

(artist: Prism Serene)

In short, the nation-states of today inherited the flaws of their city-state predecessors (the ones that survived, which Sparta did not), but also their modus operandi for advertising through bodies; i.e., whose owners at times worshipped warrior women, but also feared and reviled them as things to pimp (thus rape). In short, Amazons were policed and fetishized, but also martyred in service to male hegemony as an ongoing hauntological theme; i.e., the topos of the power of women, creation of sexual difference, and Male Gaze, etc, speaking to classic problems of female appropriation and assimilation: regarding women historically disfigured and maimed by patriarchal forces, turning them into cops.

¹²⁹ Called the Crypteia, on which Paul Cartledge writes in Spartan Reflections (2001), "either principally sought out and killed helots across Laconia and Messenia as part of a policy of terrorizing and intimidating the enslaved population, or they principally did a form of military training, or they principally endured hardships as an initiation ordeal, or the Crypteia served a combination of all these purposes, possibly varying over time." In short, they enforced the will of the state as a police body upheld through force—a ruthless tactic adopted by modern-day fascist resurrections regressing imaginarily backwards; i.e., paramilitary units with a vigilante flavor defending capital and its hauntological gender values (which initially fetishize, then euthanize Amazonian doubles).

(artist: Franz von Stuck)

Yet, there is a current issue through such bodies seeming to recruit warrior women in a very Spartan-esque "equality": the state haunting liberatory forms, the latter also seeking the right not simply to undress and show off, but challenge canonical doubles with self-same exposure (a kind of warrior tribadism); i.e., to avoid forced motherhood and military service! Subjugated Amazons commonly express as paradoxically virginal, immaculate by Cameron's neoconservative, cop-like forms; i.e., scrappy but off-limits, giving them a modesty element that is paradoxically cheeky and "of nature." Ripley doesn't birth Newt, but rescues her from dark, Communist- and queer-coded savages.

In short, the Amazons of today canonically function as "Goldilocks whores," policing bad nature through good under Pax Americana, and which we can redress/undress as needed. Toying with various BDSM themes, such as Marston's bondage kink, it becomes an act of worship—revering the exposed flesh as "mighty" through ironic appearance and subversive context: "She's a brick house," one caught between genuine rebellion and actual betrayal. Once a rebel, then a cop, and struggling to reclaim such things away from their traitorous qualities on the same combative surfaces, the Amazon's surface tension is heightened paradoxically through exposure; i.e., to her as both combatant and bride in patriarchal eyes, one whose dialectical-material function isn't immediately obvious: a cop or simply a warrior maiden/demon lover that speaks to liberation as a constant uphill battle. Throughout history as something to reinvent while looking backwards into the future, the Amazon's powers remain constantly stolen and abused by nation-states (and neoliberal corporations) appropriating modern-day feminism vis-à-vis an "ancient," naked-warrior aesthetic. Yet, such is where power lies, waiting for her to take it all back with.

Moving past the former historical side of things, let's conclude this section by considering power's application through Amazonian dualism—specifically in our hands through Amazons as a form of art and political expression.

Power is useful; demons embody all kinds, the Amazon in particular speaking to her exposed body as a sexual weapon—one of rape and revenge that promotes athleticism through the flesh and vaso vagal through the weaponry she carries. These collectively threaten before, during and after social-sexual activities (often warfare). In turn, inequality through exchange is classically determined through artists and muses, one being knowledge (about nature) and the other power (from/over nature). Per Galatea, but also Faust and Prometheus, each side has something to offer the other in statuesque ways: a slice of Antiquity as retro-future.

Keeping with ludo-Gothic BDSM, the poetic dialog of Amazons should be intense, but palliatively subversive; i.e., to deliver eustress, or positive stress, in Numinous passions that speak theatrically to our lived trauma while replicating good feelings, mid-paradox: those relaid in "torturous" body language, unequal exchange, and the dark transformative potential of various social-psychosexual performances. Provided it's what they want, the fucked party should reach back to grip the bedframe while getting railed, or otherwise offer the dom their body and agency during calculated risk (re: consent is hot, but especially under conditions that put it to the test, below). Such surrender is temporary and committed through service, the dom serving the sub in ways the sub needs (and which the dom enjoys).

Furthermore, demon BDSM (with Amazons or not) isn't purely of sex and pain, so much as it involves asexual interrogations of trauma that often (though not always) include sex and pain in demonic language. The point of such theatre is to "surrender"; i.e., under a performing destroyer's "captivity" and "violence" as equally performative, thus in quotes. It's not real so much as half-real, thus cannot harm the recipient(s) despite controlling them in ways they choose to submit to; it merely restrains them, giving them the chance to negotiate boundaries of unequal power happening under controlled circumstances arranged by everyone in advance (re: informed consent).

In turn, these devices (e.g., bed restraints, below) aren't abusive unless being used to abuse, which camp doesn't do. Even so, campy forms of exquisite "torture" very much remain haunted by actual, generational trauma; i.e., "rape" being a fantasy to live with and overcome through play that helps stabilize our inner victim, one threatened by daily reminders of what they survived: the Amazon as both protector and destroyer in good faith and bad, for workers or the state; e.g., with me loving the Amazon aesthetic despite having been abused by those practicing it in the past. It's not just medicinal, for revolutionaries, but cathartic, orgasmic and good praxis, when done correctly!

(source)

Keeping this in mind, the gods and their avatars (dualistic manifestations of unequal power and knowledge, transformation, and dark desires of rape and revenge unto nature-as-monstrous-feminine) are as much things to make ourselves as they are to return to in demonic forms made by others—with alienation's problematic lineage under capital reclaimed in statuesque doubles speaking to our bodies and identities echoed darkly across the Amazon (and other demons); i.e., statues to sculpt and behold as one does a god from "ancient" times—both silly like this '90s Street

Fighter spoof or serious like Heathcliff from Wuthering Heights, the imaginary past conjured to their makers' service: "a form moulded with at least one element of grandeur—power" (source: Nava Atlas' "Charlotte Brontë's Preface to Wuthering Heights by Emily Brontë," 2014).

(artist: Zhaar)

This bestiary very much includes Amazons; i.e., as historically whored-out, female avatars of war that have become increasingly entropic (dualistic, liminal, GNC, BDSM-themed, and hauntological, etc) under neoliberal Capitalism as something to be for or against. Our copies double the state's and vice versa, their respective arguments borrowing a great many things from a shared source; i.e., from the cryptonymy process and its restless vanishing point; e.g., dark "phallic" mommy doms like Lady Dimitrescu, left, both coming from and occupying the same half-real shadow zone used by cops and victims, alike. Both are "dark" in appearance, threatening order as it currently exists (under crisis and its fearsome, decaying circumstances), but only one functionally serving workers, animals and nature by doing so; i.e., there is always a shadow under capital and that shadow is always a deserving/undeserving victim in duality.

As we've discussed, cops abuse DARVO and obscurantism to accomplish state revenge (thus profit) against nature; i.e., as monstrous-feminine with monstrous-feminine; re: having "good" nature rape "bad," the Amazon versus the Medusa but also other "bad" Amazons during Tolkien's refrain and later Cameron's. Victims of their unironic violence and bad-faith masquerades seek to anisotropically stymie profit (and break Capitalist Realism) with while using the same linguo-material performances per liminal expression: rape play where Amazons aren't simply bona fide liberators, but token police reflecting inside/upon the same guerilla, monstrous-feminine, armor-like-yet-undressed (virgin/whore) shells and surfaces! Revolution is ergodic/non-trivial in this respect; embracing and adjusting under this total, diseased reality means acknowledging the Amazon's shared praxial, ontological confusion during the cryptonymy process: on the Black Veil personified, tracing its concentric veneers' mise-en-abyme (castles-in-the flesh) to escape the labyrinth while, to some degree, inside its power as something to occupy and relate to, person/place, resident/residence, etc.

Like Victor's Creature, Amazons are demons, meaning things that—once made—testify as much to ongoing abuse in dysfunctional relations with (and receiving deceptions/cryptonymy from) powerful forces; i.e., forces concerned with controlling power for themselves as pro-state or pro-worker (anarchist). This applies to both sides of a given exchange and goes both ways, among various marginalized groups; e.g., white women like Radcliffe commonly making Neo-Gothic hulks that speak as much to their husband's legally unequal status as they do citations of imperial abjection, but also reclaim either in fictional forms: "Fuck me like you mean it!"

Speaking to the whore's paradox (re: the best sex¹³⁰ having a bit of struggle, vaso vagal, eustress—so-called "struggle snuggles," cuddlefucks, what-have you), forbidden knowledge and power are often about sex and force as "dark" because it achieves catharsis in a pre-existing state of confusion that workers inherit/are born into (one where order and equality are a lie that serves state continuation by menticing vulnerable parties through psychosexual dogma; re: gargoyles). Great castigation conveys the data through how we camp its effects with other people we view as "statuesque"; i.e., Amazonian dominators that, under our command, expiate our naughty-naughty sins by pounding our asses just how we like—all while living with/embracing trauma during the dialectic of shelter/the alien:

(artist: Marlon Trelie)

But again, Gothic Communism is holistic. To be considered sex-positive at all, such things cannot harm others—meaning in the scene or elsewhere—across space and time, through poetry and politics using Amazons during oppositional praxis. It's not entirely about their gender but the demon-lover threat they represent towards certain privileged groups under men's "protection," classically white women.

Much of the next few pages comes from Volume Zero. Though not female, for example, Radcliffe's banditti were demon lovers, and very much threatened (white, straight, middle-class) women with rape; i.e., whether deliberate or not, she commodified a white, straight, politically moderate woman's idea of rape, all while excluding most other oppressed voices during the abjection process (all relegated to the ghost of the counterfeit she charged her novels with). Among TERFs, current Amazon poetics can yield a similar misogynistic flavor (cis or trans) that Radcliffe did unto cis women exclusively using mythical, male forest demons. Both are bad, but our focus, here, is the darkness of Amazons made to serve the state similar to how Radcliffe's own rape fantasies did (causing unimaginable harm in the process).

By subverting Amazons as demon lovers during courtly love, we can use this ourselves to harness, thus convey dark power and knowledge; i.e., as things to behold in proximity to its deathly intimations, promoting repressed characteristics of ourselves and how we and our potential (to transform during unequal, forbidden exchange) are treated by state and liberatory forces in opposition: the struggle to snuggle, to be bold—to rub elbows with godly forces tied to land, labor and occupant normally enslaved by bourgeois servants who look like us, mid-rebellion.

¹³⁰ For survivors of trauma who aren't sex-repulsed because of their trauma.

As things to control workers with, sex and force "war" as they normally do, the Aegis taking various taboo aspects of daily life and reflecting them back at workers in poetic, shadowy forms and methods; i.e., the psychomachy as Amazonomachia, yielding internal and external disputes for problematic contrast, thus comparison; e.g., fucking but also dialectical-material struggles about fucking (the marriage bed or wedlock) personified through Amazons (monsters to fuck) being something to embody and take into ourselves as much to get out of our systems; re: to be strong in ways that prevent future harm for all workers, animals and nature as monstrous-feminine caused by state predation.

Amazons are warrior women that reflect "dark desire" being historically ironic; i.e., normally triangulating for the state for fear of rape projecting onto the colonized-as-demonic, and us anisotropically pushing back through Amazonian camp. This alienized-vs-alienizer dialog commonly has a gendered, animalistic (re: predator/prey) element as well, the Amazon's classical abilities to conform (or not conform) used by state forces recuperating rebellious actors and actions like Amazons (who are basically big animal warrior women) to suit their own needs. They do so with confidence, always assuming we don't have the guts to reclaim and such things to suit us, not them. It's not technically "hard" to prove them wrong (at a glance), but the battle is very much an uphill one; i.e., to internalize these devices at a cultural level so that developing sex-positivity (thus Gothic Communism) becomes second-nature: liberating sex workers (thus all workers) through iconoclast art, recultivating the Wisdom of the Ancients (the Superstructure) in the process.

(artist: AkiraeviI)

A "terrorist" goes both ways, then, as does any ability to move power through such dichotomies; i.e., as things to reverse; re: workers being terrorist and counterterrorist in anisotropic duality. This duality reverses polarity through the same points, all depending on who's labeling and perceiving who, but also who's describing a given position as "Amazon" (or something similar to Amazon, like orcs or witches); e.g., state victims are always "terrorist" (thus illegitimate) in the eyes of the state and its rights, but always "counterterrorist" (thus legitimate) in the eyes of themselves and their rights. The same aesthetic of power and rebellion, rape and revenge, can be recuperated by state actors enacting false rebellion vis-à-vis the obfuscation of Amazons and Amazonomachia through DARVO arguments. Through praxial inertia, they tie the function of Amazons into knots (above), their white Indian/undercover cop cloaked in double standards colonizing nature (and symbols of resistance tied to nature) as a monstrous-feminine force to harvest for the state. Doing so happens, again, per the usual neoconservative, predator/prey triangulations; i.e., tokenizing a desire for protection from abject beings under state conditions: nature equals big, scary whore, so find something of nature—an Amazonian whore domesticated by state agents—to keep criminal (non-white, queer) nature in check, thus protect the state's nuclear model (often expressed as non-Amazonian women and children; re: Cameron's Amazons and their victims/wards).

From a competitive standpoint, home is an alien mountain to climb; i.e., king of the hill with only one victor after trammeling the whore (which Gothic Communism seeks to reclaim using the same binding devices and weapon-like threats of force [thus rape] that cops use). In turn, canonical home defense (the besieged home-in-decay as "Western") is always (neo)conservative, overlooking Pax Americana's genocidal function by seeking its revenge; re: peace through strength, repressing state skeletons-in-the-closet by dressing them up as bugbear scapegoats.

This includes the Amazon as something to banish, afterwards—a sow to fatten and butcher while acting like a pig (a cop). Such "hogtying" happens while conveniently titillating the Male Gaze outside the bedroom (for anyone in the Man Box, not just men); re: the canceled future of childhood regression, whereupon capital decays and Imperialism comes home to empire in medieval language: summon darkness (often as evil dollhouse, but also monstrous-feminine dolls inside said house); retire the Amazon similar to the male knight or nameless gunslinger (except she's also a whore) by banishing or bridling her after the liminal hauntology of war (the haunted house or Gothic castle's operatic danger disco) retreats. Rinse and repeat; rape nature abroad by evoking genocide at home.

Doing so panders to Capitalist Realism per the ghost of the counterfeit, pimping demon lovers in parental language overlapping on the same monstrous bodies; i.e., whose abjection Amazons express par excellence—manlier and more "daddy-like" than many men, but still treated as non-men/automatic mothers by the state using them like men; re: to rape nature with nature by defending the state. As a system that rapes nature time and time again, the state is always good in its own eyes; under times of expansion and crisis, it allows tokenism to assimilate one lucky member of an alien group, making them good merely to violate all others from said group (and other groups). Galatea tokenizes under Pygmalion's shadow to enforce his will: that of the skeleton tyrant/Capitalocene.

(artist: Kafun)

The entire enterprise descends into alarm fatigue, a process where someone becomes the cop simply to postpone, not prevent their own abuse by state forces; i.e., big fish eat little fish, so kiss up and punch down, rape encompassing an act of creative control about itself; e.g., Jadis—apart from raping me—also policed my artwork, telling me what bodies were acceptable to draw (as Amazons) and which weren't (and pulling my funding to attack me with)! Such persons are craven to a fault, selling out at the drop of a hat; i.e., at the threat of collapse, or facing things coded as "collapse" which they employ¹³¹ against state enemies: the perceived enemy at the gates of "Rome" also being the enemy within her dark fortress; e.g., "That not my wife" (from Body Snatchers, 1978) being a phrase Jadis freely laughed at and used unironically against me: not someone who'd put up with their bullshit indefinitely (though I did for nearly three years, the last six months mostly being me planning to leave and calling them out as my abuser).

True to form, Jadis wasn't above whoring themselves out for the state, either—not if it let them assert strength over me (a trans woman) as the (according to them) weaker party! They were always right, and I was always wrong—a holster for their frustrations, and where they could shove their terrible gaze into me (to "look daggers," as the saying goes), a colossal twat ensnaring me with boobytraps:

(model and photographer: Jadis and Persephone van der Waard¹³²)

Onstage and off, such things regress to pre-agrarian, hunter/gatherer levels of postapocalypse, state "guerrilla monopolies" (on asymmetrical warfare as a performative device) resulting canonically in Quixotic, Pavlovian/menticial, and "white knight, black knight" syndrome (refer to Volume Zero and One for further examinations of these ideas): the hyphenating of pre-existing gender notions of strength (the stacked, "non-white" body type) with ironic roles canonically swapping to uphold the status quo, forced onto classic dominatrixes by the state (another reward to promise to state sissies). She's a lethal weapon from head to toe, darkness visible yielding and concealing various cryptonymic facets!

Yet, monster-fucking goes both ways. This uwu/owo (fear/fascination) schtick applies to people lusting after Amazons, knights and similar warriors' ghost of the counterfeit as much as it does when embodying them (chercher la femme vs gender dysphoria and body dysmorphia); re: Tennyson's Lady of Shalott craving Sir Lancelot from afar—boldly and voyeurism eying the great warrior with her magic mirror's telescopic gaze:

¹³¹ Ironically while acting "barbarian" themselves (as TERFs/SWERFs so often do); i.e., as facets of fascist feminism—playing dress up as a complicit disguise purely to hide/show their role (as state enforcers) during the cryptonymy process forwarding abjection.

¹³² Originally featured in the Undead Module, "Escaping Jadis" (2024).

A bow-shot from her bower-eaves,
 He rode between the barley-sheaves,
 The sun came dazzling thro' the leaves,
 And flam'd upon the brazen greaves
 Of bold Sir Lancelot.
 A red-cross knight for ever kneel'd
 To a lady in his shield,
 That sparkled on the yellow field,
 Beside remote Shalott (source).

In short, middle-class people historically get "thirsty" and desire protection from imaginary threats in black/white language; e.g., black/white knights, but also novels haunted by them; re: Catherine Morland and friend—in Jane Austen's 1803/1817¹³³ Northanger Abbey—crying "positively dreadful!" while reading so-called "black" (Gothic) novels by the dozen (see: Volume Zero).

They also desire to be strong in ways that mirror their Amazonian protectors unequal distributions and proposals; re:

For me, this becomes another form of consent, one informed by sexual desire. I choose to interact with Samus and the castle because they teach, but also excite me. I want to fuck what I want to be: sexy. For me, that means a powerful woman like Samus [a colony brat raised by giant bird aliens].

Yes, Metroid spaces and heroines are "traumatic," and echo trauma (re: child abuse) and "trauma" (re: watching Alien) from my childhood. They remain sexy because Samus chooses to protect me inside the space, the carrot to the castle's stick. To quote Spike Spiegel, "I love the kind of woman who can kick my ass." The Metroidvania castle lets me adopt a traditionally "female" stance: fear of physical abuse. Intimations of trauma are inevitable; framing them within boundaries of play grants me an element of control, according to a partner I can trust. I trust the Metroidvania to "imprison" me. Inside the castle, I control Samus, an avatar whose powerful persona chases my boogeymen, tyrants, away (source: Persephone van der Waard's "Why I Submit," 2021).

¹³³ Written/published posthumously. In part, such stories panned as terrorist literature, something not befitting an unmarried, but still white, straight, middle-class woman to write about.

As such, Amazons are like the bull in the China shop—blunt and graceful, pursuer and object of pursuit. Thusly reclaiming these paradoxical fixtures of rape and resistance from bad actors/state hegemony during liminal expression's mise-en-abyme, we become not only torn between two worlds (either as or regarding Amazons), but between Amazons as alien advertisements for timeless battles working for/against the state; i.e., these castles-in-the-flesh (castle-like bodies and vice versa) "going native" to fight—from mind to monster—over and across the same billboard bodies' demonic sex and force: towering and morphologically buttressed, but also under siege in both directions.

Except, whereas cops present themselves as "shepherds" guarding nature in bad faith (often as white Indians/token vigilantes; re: Savage Land Rogue¹³⁴), we promote stewardship over nature as true anti-rape arbiters; i.e., something to take back from the state—both sides employing the castled language of sex and force, rape and revenge to make victim arguments in good or bad faith; e.g., the lived reality of monstrous-feminine female bodies controlled by patriarchal ones, the Amazon classically feared by rapists for her visibly daunting appearance, and which rapists will teach Amazons—per the Pygmalion fantasy—to rape for them (appearing on and off state land to police its wider colonial territories)!

¹³⁴ Amazons, tokenized, illustrate an ongoing problem of assimilation; i.e., that expresses not just in a variety of superhero bodies, but spatio-temporal fantasy worlds that house them. Rogue doesn't just appear in "our time," then, but other worlds where she can put her talents to work (stealing power from those she touches); re (from Volume Two, part one):

As Ayla and Savage Land Rogue demonstrate, Amazon habitats are far older than videogames, but have evolved into them out of older Pax Americana fantasies exported elsewhere (from America to Japan and back again); i.e., a revival of the "white jungle" populated with "big game": a vacation-type resort for the usual anxious pearl-clutchers looking for Jane and Tarzan; i.e., to punch down at towards the dogmatic threat of a Black Planet: to ease their own inheritance anxieties and fear of a non-white revenge for empire as inherently genocidal, tokenizing colonial subjects like the Amazon to police its own group, mid-Holocaust (source: "'Death by Snu-Snu': From Herbos to Himbos, part two," 2024).

In doing so, she becomes a crimefighter vehicle for pro-state fantasies that we must take back, regardless of where or how such things manifest! Kowai or kawaii, tits and ass in or out—a cop is a cop, a rebel a rebel vis-à-vis how they move power in one direction or the other!

(artist: Mike DeBolfo)

Amazons are demons, not maidens, thus intimidating to cops when cops cannot control them; i.e., as pimps poaching the most vulnerable targets they possibly can, and constantly dreaming up BDSM clichés that let the male jailor "submit" to stronger-appearing (often female) subordinates in whorish, female-coded outfits when it suits them. They pimp the conquered as controlled opposition/pin-up dominatrix (often as whitewashed "jungle fever"); i.e., projecting their rock 'n roll sex fantasies (and insecurities; re: death by Snu-Snu) onto a classic enemy of the state, but also a paradox: weak/strong per masculine/feminine as monstrous-feminine, forcing the colonized to mother them/whore for the Man—to look tough for said men, but submit to their masters raping them as whores and literally fighting their battles. It becomes an embarrassing privilege in the same old hierarchy. Women's work enters the Man Box, "acting like a man" to collect for the Faustian pimp as never actually giving anything up when swapping roles ("liberation" staying in the bedroom, trad wives exiting that space wearing Halloween costumes disguising June in pearls, but also her cop status). Instead, rape becomes something to rank inside a costume game.

Abjection projects state violence onto its past-and-present victims becoming future cops and victims. To it, older dynasties were rooted in misogyny as something to recruit from its own victim pools (restricted to local groups cops could realistically dominate through said time's state logistics; e.g. Sparta), capital expanding said pools to assimilate earlier out-groups; i.e., centuries after Imperialism expanded from feudalism into settler colonialism, some of the world's oldest scapegoats (women) became early examples of token cops furthering abjection per state concessions: to fight a rising consciousness to state abuses (merging with other forms of tokenism/decaying activism [white indentured servants, people of color and Indigenous peoples] to punch down against labor as a whole); re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss putting "rebellion" in quotes; e.g., kidnapped Hippolyta forced to wed Theseus and obey him, a husband and pimp one-in-the-same, the whore a savage made tame on the Wild West of frontier Capitalism. Over a relatively short period, subjugated feminism suddenly became the concealed weapon during the cryptonymy process—the warrior Venus an alien ace up the elite's sleeve: to go where men weren't allowed.

State/pimp revenge, then, became a matter of funding such sell-outs succeeding the myth as something to make anew and rebirth¹³⁵ the state by infiltrating its own prisons. In turn, all state monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital include and inform tokenism as something to swap out various persecution networks among the greater lattice—Amazons merely being a famous example that has decayed into witches hunting witches for the state (white women gatekeeping other women and oppressed groups); i.e., for profit inside state territories, dead metaphors patrolling the same old graveyard's half-real danger discos. They become invasive, predatory cuckoos.

(artist: Sveta Shubina)

Unlike workers fighting for positive freedom, thus control over themselves, state domination boils down to unironic chattelization/humiliation of its alienized prey and total control for itself, like always. Through this terrible device, older abject creatures of darkness and Hell, the wild outdoors and Numinous, etc—once polar opposites to goody state bodies—have since redoubled among those bodies as state cops serving profit, thus genocide; i.e., to assimilate, the state recolonizing old territories using new traitors wearing the same native uniforms/standing in monumentally for the usual colonizer agents, reversing roles only to uphold what is normal: female harvesters grasping the reaper's sickle, wearing the collar or bridle to segregate/silence their own (and other) people(s) without performative irony. They become stewards not of nature, but Omelas; i.e., expendable patriotic executioners and jingoistic hypocrites sheltered by the state till it yokes them (re: the euthanasia effect): the trick without the treat, the danger without the disco, relegating "resistance" and transparency to once a year (e.g., Halloween, or Pride).

Under capital, state revenge becomes something to exact no matter what, dividing and conquering Medusa (nature, the whore) as they always do—through triangulatory violence, double standards, brides and bribes; re: the middle class furthering the abjection process (and its grim harvest) through the ghost of the counterfeit. Subjugating Amazons to, in turn, subjugate others using said Amazons, token whores police non-token whores for the Man (aping his straightness, ¹³⁵ Re: The state is incompatible with life and consent—can only rearm its workers to assist in mythmaking that maintains this pattern; i.e., to essentialize the state and end history beyond Capitalist Realism, the past not something to learn from save to enforce state dogma and police violence. Our own gender trouble upsets this paradigm, doing so inside itself vis-à-vis Amazons and other monstrous-feminine stories and characters (classically with animal masks being an ancient form of theatre); i.e., to divorce biology from gender and sex, and gender and sex from each other to end canonical essentialism, pushing towards horizontal arrangements of power, knowledge and history.

whiteness, and/or Christianity, etc). To have our revenge, we whores have to fight back any way we can, extending Amazonian subversion into and out of the half-real realms of fantasy (and its dark reflections on history) while fighting for universal liberation now. Revolution, for us, is year-round and holistic (so is Halloween and queer acceptance, for that matter). All for one, and one for all!

Before we move onto "Trial by Fire" and demon mommies, let's quickly conclude with several collaborations, in this respect: Nyx and Amy Ginger Hart.

Whether of class, culture and/or race, cops are traitors through-and-through. Witch cops don't just apologize for oppression, you see, but fight to maintain and accelerate it within weird nerd culture (often under duress; e.g., trans people threatened with homelessness, people of color with imprisonment, etc); they strike deals and infiltrate colonial territories for their same-old masters, standing in as scarecrows and gargoyles (the latter commonly animalistic statues guarding sacred grounds from evil forces, the former ceremonial watchers controlling pests in agrarian sectors): to exterminate their fellow native/rebellious brethren who refuse to sell out. We must challenge these traitors with our own likenesses thwarting theirs; i.e., Amazons (and similar beings) expressed through labor action's revolutionary cryptonymy in age-old markets of war and the flesh; re (from Volume Zero):

[where] rituals of power expression and exchange that embody hunters and hunted, predators and prey that play out through the ongoing battles and wars of culture, of the mind, of sexuality and praxis as traumatized: marked for trauma or by trauma that parallel our green and purple doubles onscreen (source: "Pieces of the Camp Map").

In taking those elements on and offscreen, we bring the battle to the half-real streets of public imagination! Gender parody becomes iconoclastic, playfully camping canon.

(model and artist: Nyx and Persephone van der Waard)

Apart from being a walking weapon of war and survival that often has sold out, the Amazon's herbo, hyperbolic/giant/super-sized and protective-yet-bare muscles/sex appeal (and dark, Medusa-grade "furious" form—Nyx, above) still remain legitimate, call-and-response threat displays against state copaganda! Nyx, for example, is a nurturing force of nature, in that respect—treating the land as sacred and all its peoples, animals, and environments under state duress. It's why I chose to paint her and why I see her as one of my muses. Yes, I crave and worship her for being downright delicious, but do so as much for her kindness and love; i.e., for things she values for their labor and natural value, which capital only destroys for their monetary value (for profit, thus rape).

In short, I want people to know Nyx has value as a cutie and a comrade because she treats me (and nature) as she does: a stacked queen who loves to show off, yet is kind to smaller and more vulnerable things! Despite living in West Virginia (a place devastated by decades of coal-mining), Nyx knows the value of all living things, and places said things (and their labor/natural value) above corporate greed. She absolutely rules:

(artist: Nyx)

Toxic and titillating to state sissies, such hulking green eggs and ham are the state's bête noire (nature as gyn-ecological; re: Patel and Moore) and our gender trouble's raison d'être when opposing them during ludo-Gothic BDSM—a feast for the eyes that says, "look, don't touch" to their ideological enemies, hence in ways antithetical to profit when reclaimed by proletarian agents (who are happy to say "touch," as Nyx is, during playtime with comrades); re: we whores exerting control over ourselves as "of nature" during calculated risk. This includes how we present as/perform during liminal expression, thus express power in addictive and fun demonic ways; i.e., onstage and off, the Amazon classically a power fantasy about killing our colonizers¹³⁶ versus joining them while disguising ourselves as quite literally bridled.

¹³⁶ Again, versus imitating or otherwise getting in bed with them; e.g., Theodor Herzl (the father of the modern Israeli state): "The anti-Semites will become our most dependable friends, the anti-Semitic countries our allies. / We want to emigrate as respected people" (from Herzl's Diaries; e.g., cited by Joeseeph Massad's "Zionism, Anti-Semitism and Colonialism," 2012). This historically comes at a cost: killing your own in favor of a colonizer identity that alienates you from your own group, but never lets you fully assimilate. It becomes a fortress mentality tied to a satellite proxy state the

I've said repeatedly in the past that Amazons, while demonic, cannot change shape. This is only half-true. They're big muscle girls, yes; they're also military units/targets, which means they have uniforms (often of disguise, next page), which they can swap in and out of, during guerilla warfare. Often modernized in cloak-and-dagger stories like the noir femme fatale or Western shootout, Amazons have the capacity to infiltrate the state while looking like something the state would use (e.g., as a bride whose gown contains a female-but-deadly assassin); i.e., "when in Rome" to burn Rome down, the process a gradual one: through marriage as another aspect of the nuclear model to upend while camping it.

In fact, said disco and its hauntological "danger" are rather like the witch hunt, in that respect: often unmoored from a given space and time (re: Federici), cryptonymically in disguises that announce the plot to those who know (spies work in code, showing and hiding through the cryptonymy process)! In turn, the warrior girl is half exposed then fully exposed, but able to fight back when the ruse runs its course (as the fake bride does, below). Get 'em, girl!

(source: Choi Dong-hoon's Assassination, 2015)

Like the Gothic at large, Amazons are fake in a variety of ways we can exploit to our benefit; i.e., the whore's paradox requires gaining control while seemingly surrendering it (the Amazon both a maiden and demon originally written by Athenian propagandists to subdue women), but ultimately affording oppressed workers greater agency over their own lives: by dismantling the state as it tries to pimp us. It does so through Amazonian doubles that are never fully closed off, opening the doors for rehumanization (of the harvest) per the whore's refrain applying to people, product and place. By turning the land into a brothel that operates against nature, nature utilizes the same devices to open up shop in said territories; i.e., against land owners and rich people settler-colonizing places to privatize, ethnically cleanse¹³⁷ and demonize through Amazon dialogs. Cops act like your friends, but actually exist to protect private property over people; their job is to rape, then play the victim.

To it, everyone likes the whore, and by making it a warrior monster to cage, the state is generally pointing to its own half-cloaked abuses—ones workers will see happening to themselves, during the pedagogy of the oppressed! The brothel is powers that be (namely America) will exploit in a functionally "white" sense; i.e., racial supremacy as a geopolitic project with uneven, modular application (as fascism always is; re: Eco).

¹³⁷ With Samus Aran and similar cop-style, monomyth heroines becoming retro-future exterminators cleaning homes of vermin infestations, per state DARVO arguments); re: in the "Scooby Doo," Radcliffean approach (more on this, later, when we reexamine Ellen Ripley vs Giger's xenomorph).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

never fully the elite's to own, nor is anything else "of nature" the state tries to criminalize; e.g., sex, drugs and rock 'n roll.

As such, its traitors' loyalty (and lingo) is always for sale, hidden by the cryptonymies at work/on display and reclaimed by us; i.e., exposing those who act in bad faith during the cryptonymy process, slipping the false Amazon's mask when she sees what we show her (on the Aegis) and consequently shits her pants; e.g., TERFs acting liked oppressed Amazons, but keeping the costume to attack trans people with. Exposing bad intent is useful and what I designed revolutionary cryptonymy to accomplish through the dualistic, monstrous-feminine language of Amazons. In doing so, we have our revenge—on the Aegis by undoing state control over such things, thus reinstalling the potential for mutual consent during the whore's paradox: a savior who appears like a destroyer (meaning a stronger person who looks like they can rape you) but is anything but an actual abuser!

Update: Amy Ginger Hart has decided to go back on our deal, despite me fulfilling my end of it. To summarize, I was writing about Amazons and anal, and saw that Amy checked both boxes (so to speak). So I asked if she'd like to be featured in exchange for some promotion. In response, Amy agreed to retweet the drawing when it was finished. When the drawing was complete and I asked Amy to honor her word and her agreement, however, she responded by blocking me (refer to "Amy Ginger Hart Exploitation Incident, 11/11/2024" for the full details). I've decided to leave this section, unchanged, as it illustrates how subjugated Amazons can fool comrades acting in good faith; i.e., how subjugated Amazons often seem good on the surface while actually using the aesthetic in bad faith. To that, Amy shoots pretty photos and certainly looks cute (all photos herein used from her public Twitter account), but is actually, as Foucault might have put it, "a phony twat." What she abuses (through obscurantism), we reclaim. —Perse

(artist: Amy Ginger Hart)

Such are subversive Amazons, which Amy Ginger Hart (our second collaborator) also aligns with; i.e., of nature as part of the same warrior tableaux (above), and one to embody/embellish for workers performing strength in ways that mix-and-match modern-to-ancient forms of the Amazon, during ludo-Gothic BDSM! Women are classically small and passive, under capital, and Amy values her tight holes but also her strong muscles as classically monstrous-feminine; i.e., masculine and feminine, exciting gender trouble for the status quo and gender delight for Amy and her fans!

She embodies nature as something to fight for/alongside with various allies during calculated risk:

(artist: Amy Ginger Hart)

Until development, exploitation and liberation sit on the same stage. Gothic Communism is the practice of spies and monsters towards development, we whores activating demonically during ludo-Gothic BDSM to cryptonymically dispel various (mono)myths about women and other monstrous-feminine; e.g., that women can't shoot/fight back, are always subservient to men and never want revenge against them/are merely sex objects to please men (all of these intersecting with other myths in the fight for liberation; e.g., girls don't like being choked, above). In turn, spies imitate those they wish to destroy or change into something better. So does Amy showcase herself as Amazonian—a warrior for sex positivity who operates in the buff/out in open for all to see, and one that harmful practitioners of the aesthetic have, since Ancient Athens, stolen from healthier mythical simulacra (the copy of that which patriarchal forces unironically fear).

Women, then, are generally trapped between positions of ownership and being owned, such Amazonian brothel espionage walking the line between bride and whore, diplomat and spy/assassin. This includes models and muses, whose bodies since Antiquity have inspired (male, female or intersex) to illustrate notions of power as much between masculine and feminine, versus simply a feminine that male artists could realistically dominate: Amy's formidable physique, but also their love of anal sex (a classic terror weapon) being something they love to have—a forbidden zone's territory and traveler explored by brave souls humanizing both as harvested normally by capital.

(model and artist: Amy Ginger Hart and Persephone van der Waard)

Through darkness and desire, but also vibes, mood, and monstrous thrills, we regain control of responses the state will abuse (re: the vaso vagal response and various psychosexual mechanisms)!

Amazons, whether they want to be or not, are sex demons, thus whores in this respect; and whores—again, being vice characters—communicate paradoxically through pain, stigma, bias, the taboo, barbarism, animalistic rape/torture fantasies, and so on. Literally a crush of sorts (the Gothic loves its neo-medieval puns, combined sex and war), they become avatars to vicariously portray/express, hence grip and control desires the state would normally never allow us to speak: in the "just games" allegory of action stories, kayfabe, and Gothic theatre at large, where Amazons are queen.

Furthermore, for those who prefer the masculine approach (as Amazons generally do—upon their classically female bodies), who doesn't want to be desirable as sexy and strong (excepting subs and fem-presenting workers, who resist compelled masculinity in favor of controlling it through mutual consent)? Thick thighs save lives! Sex is better during metal; i.e., it hits harder when you're excited by theatrical implements of "danger" overshadowed by state forces haunting and infiltrating our pedagogy (and place) of the oppressed! Resistance is a party filled with good actors and bad fighting over (and with) the same Amazon aesthetic: "Don't you know I want to be with you tonight?" (Trans-X' "I Want to Be with You Tonight," 1995).

Beyond Amazons, there's power in all monsters, specifically their reassembly, recontextualization and release; i.e., challenging the state's unironic prostitution/weaponization of anything monstrous-feminine (female/feminine parties being reduced to sex objects defined by their sexuality/sex organs, queer people by sodomy and people of color by non-white criminalization/their skin, etc). We can reclaim them while still being prostitutes, ourselves. And keeping with the whore's paradox per Amazons, the whore's revenge doesn't have a singular meaning or application; e.g., anal sex, but also oral:

(artist: Amy Ginger Hart)

The fact remains that if monsters like the Amazon didn't have subversive power and cathartic utility through psychosexual camp, we wouldn't bother! We camp canon because we must; i.e., from city to nation, the state historically summons the Amazon as a monster whore of nature to rile up moral panic with—as coded into dogmatic fear (scapegoat) responses towards sex controlled through unironic force! By comparison, rebellious workers camp all of that to achieve genuine, at-times-postpunk rebellious effects: disco in disguise, seeking similarity amid difference! Let's dance!

These are not naturally mysterious concepts, but have become unnaturally mysterious¹³⁸ by those who don't want people to utilize Amazon aesthetics for labor action on a grand scale; i.e., to follow She-Hulk as one might "Liberty Leads the ¹³⁸ As trade secrets—namely prostitution surrounding sexual reproduction policed through force—as more secretive than simply "punch, stab or shoot" enemy forces; e.g., Mallrats (1995) and Brody's obsession with superhero sex organs: "It's a secret of the pros!" Smith treats the idea strictly as a joke ("He'll grow out of it"), but such devices yield liberatory potential when camped; i.e., a classic way to disempower cops is to mock them, and a classic way to mock anyone is through their junk.

People" (a painting about the French Revolution) versus a lady who lays down with the law as its submissive and breedable war bride/whore-with-a-badge (which She-Hulk—a lawyer and tokenized crimefighter—sadly is), or lays down the law for the law (with vigilantes raping people to defend private property in the interest of continued privatization)! Amazons can be cops or victims, but victims can fight back against cops and their various effects; i.e., there's a gentrifying element that extends to superhero lairs (often cities; e.g., Gotham): turning rebel saloons into cop saloons, brothels-by-another-name gatekeeping such things per the usual assimilative double standards punching down; re: joy divisions. Cops can congregate, redlining and dividing up their prey through military urbanism. Within this hierarchy of values, women are pimped on either side of the Thin Blue line: muscle, but female muscle.

The fact remains, class, culture and race war concern betrayal as something to avoid along the various persecution networks we've discussed; i.e., attritional exchanges imploring sympathy for the devil on either side by various onlookers. Such supervised, spectated revenge ties Gothically to demons since at least Frankenstein; i.e., a concentric, frame-narrative story about nature demonized, thus criminal in the eyes of the state pimping it. Victor less feared the Creature's hulking physique and more its ability to reproduce, envisioning a doomsday when labor-as-robotic fought back across generations to reclaim the Earth out of revenge (re: the technological singularity—a concept we'll briefly explore, in "Making Demons").

Though more transhuman than post, Amazons embody such fears per the whore's revenge. In turn, such us/them and cop/criminal binaries are false insofar as the state promotes them, but which it uses strength to defend the status quo from vengeful whores of nature by presenting cops as false friends; i.e., including in tokenized forms; re: the Amazon as someone to beat and subjugate into a cop. We reclaim all of this during ludo-Gothic BDSM, promoting the very things we seek to challenge and subvert; i.e., by enjoying their empowering elements, per Sarkeesian's adage, and refusing to endorse their harmful functions and features while punching up against undercover cops (trying as all cops do, to control every aspect of our lives).

Liberation is a market; i.e., one whose varied and nebulous creative exchanges pass between many abused parties. Primarily nature whored out by capital pimping it as monstrous-feminine, rape isn't something to "rank," and cops can't fully monopolize Amazonian theatrics any more than workers; i.e., our own capacities for giving and receiving violence being stigmatized by the state, but sympathized with by workers for their campy positions under state rule. Like all vice characters, standbys have become the norm. So, yes, there's the classic towering huntress with her sword, club or quiver of arrows as unbroken, unbowed. In the buff, she cannot be tamed, cleansed, or bought! Her primal, athletic and flexible (above) cavewoman's body serves herself and workers, not the state! But her camping of the state is haunted by the very abuse she makes fun of, thus reclaims through courtly love experienced by demons great and small: during anal or other Numinous forms of psychosexual, medieval-style "torture" interrogating trauma!

(artist: Sasha Khmel)

During ludo-Gothic BDSM, evocations of "Ozymandias" and Prometheus should leap to mind in "ancient," posthuman copies—their clay-as-rogue-technology reinventing older Satanic traditions: something wild, strong and of nature, teaching us what we have lost and regain through golemesque poetics/close encounters; i.e., how power redistributes through creative expression to affect participants differently during an ongoing and oscillating pedagogy of the oppressed; re: similarity amid difference.

Amazons are demons. With any demon ever made, there is a being of nature attached to it a) policed by itself (or some traitorous double), or b) liberating itself from police abuse overseeing such construction in service to profit (thus rape). Not everyone enjoys this kind of thing to start with, but the state wants us too afraid to play with others as though they want to play with us, too. Fighting back is forbidden unless the state sanctions, thus profits from its recuperations/preservations of heteronormative thus Cartesian and settler-colonial stances. We challenge all of them on our own GNC (thus alien) surfaces, uniting in ways that Amazons have struggled to do since reclaiming themselves from state authors out of Antiquity.

To it, pandemonium takes many forms and combinations. Under capital, nature is monstrous-feminine, thus alien in ways that Amazons speak well to: our mutual-if-uneven alienation by the state, and the forbidden sight that punches holes, Amazon-style, into Capitalist Realism's various embodiments of rape and revenge. Once their subversive potential wakes up and unites, Amazons (and other demons) can rise up to remind the elite—those unable to imagine a world where they can't harm others and would rather die than give up what they think they own—that it was never theirs to begin with! Hope isn't given by those who hold us hostage; we make it ourselves by actually fighting back—together. "I am woman, hear me roar!"

(artist: Amy Ginger Hart)

So concludes this two-part section on Amazons, rape and revenge (and Medusa before that). From here, we'll look monsters comparable to Amazons, albeit on a spectrum!

Again, all demons play with rape through unequal, forbidden exchange, and whose subsequent power fantasies (mainly of dark desire) take many forms of "phallic," alien, weaponized sex. These, in turn, encompass magical friends to make/construct that provide an adversarial, oft-painful component to help us change beyond societal norms. By feeding the whore's paradox into others—e.g., the paradox of terror speaking to virgins/whores and vice versa during the whore's revenge—workers suddenly become free to explore things like sex (and sexual taboos) that society pushes into fantastical, hellish realms: the asshole of existence. We reclaim these to go beyond what is allowed, genuine rebellious camp being far harder to prevent than canon would have you think; i.e., nature-as-monstrous-feminine having its whore's revenge to exist in ways that speak theatrically to the violence normally committed against us by police forces: on the casting couch as its own cartographic refrain!

(artist: Amy Ginger Hart)

In terms of canon vs camp, function is context, which doesn't always track immediately with form; i.e., it plays with and subverts it; e.g., Amy can stretch out on said couch in a campy scenario that resembles its unironic variety's demonic exchange: power and knowledge not things that can ever be fully controlled by one side alone. Transformation happens through the whore's paradox turning things on their heads through play for oneself (with one's body, orientation, and gender identity or performance through clothing, makeup, props and sets)—a desire to have fun with things that are normally abusive. That's how any monster works during ludo-Gothic BDSM!

(artist: Evul)

Let's unpack that next, going beyond earthly realms (which Amazons occupy and wage war inside) and into hellish territories about monster (thus forbidden) love with admittedly Amazonian qualities! Amazons classically capture their mates; continuing with the blood libel/sodomy class of monsters, we'll proceed unto Lady Hellbender and other demon mommies own operatic, ballroom sex-as-weaponry to reclaim postcolonially from state forces (similar to our anal Amazon thesis)! Onto the beefcake mothers of sin and hellfire¹³⁹!

¹³⁹ Oxymorons aside, desire commonly expresses through higher temperatures; i.e., to be hot. Demons of a Numinous inclination raise that to ostensibly self-destructive, incendiary degrees: the anal sulfur and witchy hellfire of a stacked pandemonium married to other motherly types, like Amazons.

A Paucity of Time: Addressing the Rest of the Demon Module's Relative Brevity

"I want more life, fucker!"

—Roy Batty, Blade Runner (1982)

My original plans for the Demon Module have oscillated constantly between longer and more complicated versus relatively short, verging on inadequate. I say "oscillating" because I acknowledged earlier how there would always be a survey element to various aspects of it; re: "As such, the infinite poetic variety and limitless creative potential of demons and nature requires me to adopt a more survey-style approach for the entire module" (source: "Of Darkness and the Forbidden"); i.e., demons have infinite forms; e.g., those of nature being something we can only gloss over in the module's remaining pages. Gothic Communism is holistic, and happens among different people taking a shared corpus of ideas and applying them differently towards a common goal: universal understanding and liberation. There's always a different way to say the same basic things—a different time and place, space and persona, term and theory to occupy and adopt. In turn, these things frame and compound, building on themselves (often through size difference, left) to challenge state scapegoat mechanisms with: to summon and abstract as we require!

(artists: Ray Sugarbutt, Shiri Allwood, and JazzBerry12)

To it, all sections from here on out, unless explicitly stated, will adopt a symposium approach, thus conversational style. This means I won't have time to reiterate arguments and reinforce these pages by steelmanning them; i.e., I cannot take everything I've said already about monsters (not just demons) and say them again; re (from Volume Zero): "to include or string everything into a grand necklace/dichotomy that I then trot out each and every time a given topic comes up" (source: "Synthesis: Aftercare"). Instead, I can only abbreviate big things and repeat small things, trusting my readers to take and reassemble my ideas henceforth, making new creative successes pursuant to revolution during oppositional praxis; re (also from Volume Zero):

This book is full of stars, so make your own shapes in the sky using the tools and keywords I supply. As long as the journey and outcome are sex-positive within a broad ergodic sphere, the exact routes you take to get there don't really matter. So chart your own sequences. To that, revolution needs to be more than holistic; it needs to be internalized in its practitioners by exposing them to radical ideas and praxis as soon as possible, thus at as young an age as can be allowed (rest assured that fascists and centrists are doing the same thing) [ibid.].

I.e., using the Gothic to synthesize sex positivity (thus liberation) with; re (from Volume One):

Above all else, the cultivating of emotional/Gothic intelligence and class/cultural awareness remains paramount—to help workers and society liberate itself (and nature) from Capitalism, thus assist in the renewed development of Gothic Communism through sex-positive (art)work. As things to cultivate, emotional and Gothic intelligence are synonymous with social-sexual activism begot from our own diving into the imaginary past. So please, swim around and play—with language, yourselves, and figurative and literal BDSM games that renegotiate labor and unequal power exchange in sex-positive ways. Mix, match, and blend; inject or insert (so to speak).

Whatever it takes to do the job in some shape or form; i.e., to recultivate the Wisdom of the Ancients, thus achieve a Gothic-Communist outcome (source: "The Basics of Oppositional Praxis").

(artist: Kitty Bit Games)

Trust me when I say that I've wrestled at length, back and forth, with deciding to write less about demonic sex and force than I want. There's always more to say and revolution is less a single statement plugging up knowledge gaps (in the academic style) and more like the beating of drums, over and over, through slogans and solidarity overall. But up to this point, I've already written a variety of thesis arguments about demons, whores, and Amazons that concern the widespread raping of nature by the state. Those will have to do. Perhaps it's best to avoid cramming a single book too full of different thesis statements (even concentric ones), but I feel these arguments are productive (and modular) enough concerning the whole of demonology that I should be able to say more with less. I will have to; the results of the recent election necessitate my releasing of this module (and the Praxis Volume) ahead of schedule—i.e., while I still can, even if they're somewhat abridged or otherwise incomplete (a quality that, already felt here, will become even more apparent in "Call of the Wild's" abbreviated writings on nature at large).

In other words, there may be a time in the near future when my kind (trans people) are considered completely illegal. I plan to release the entirety of Sex

Positivity before that happens, showing my own demonic passion for Gothic Communism for others to carry into the future: that we have the power to change things through our actions, not voting (the latter mostly a middle-class game of follow the leader that endorses bourgeois decisions meant to pacify workers with).

Actions take many forms, and go beyond "pure" demonic expression at large. For instance, when I wrote the Undead Module, said module concerned socio-political action through our trauma, and means of feeding in relation to trauma, as undead; i.e., through strange appetites acquired under capital as constantly raping nature, which we subvert through reclamatory Gothic poetics synthesizing good praxis—to cultivate good social-psychosexual habits that prevent profit, thus rape by camping it through its usual poetic markers. Made with our bodies, labor and relationships, our power becomes something to "flash" on the Aegis—ourselves, persecuted like the undead so often are: by other undead forces but showing the world what power remains in spite of those trying to closet us. We expose our abuse but also that which survives abuse to thrive in light of it; i.e., functioning as undead in ways that often appear vivacious and fully alive, without obvious trauma or visible scars:

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

With demons (and by extension the entire Demon Module), we exist in ways that, like the whore, are paradoxically forbidden-yet-ubiquitous onstage and off—entirely policed, but something the state cannot police in its entirety save through bad-faith revenge arguments monopolizing such things: portraying us as unironic monstrous-feminine demons; i.e., "of nature," which the state must first antagonize, then destroy to keep existing as the state does: unequally as a matter of revenge against nature, extirpating it like vermin.

Our revenge, as demonic whores of nature, is to exist in spite of that, liberating ourselves with the same devices under persecution, but also outright extermination mania. That occurs through the various relationships we establish together to break Capitalist Realism with; re: by humanizing the harvest and liberating nature from state bondage, suspicion and persecution by showing the world we're human despite our reprobate, monstrous-feminine status; i.e., as demons do—through a powerful, campy desire for revenge selecting the language of demonization for total liberation (through iconoclastic art) instead of state punishment-as-usual: "Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?" (source).

The rest of this section (fifteen pages) shall unpack a few broader concepts the Demon Module shall tackle through holistic study and informed mutual action, despite said paucity of time.

(models and artist: Maybel and Jackie, and Persephone van der Waard)

For one, the best revenge is success, which for revolutionaries amounts to survival, solidarity and speaking out to achieve universal liberation with; i.e., in ways that denude our killers and give us our dignity amid tremendous adversity during the cryptonymy process: the cryptomimetic echo of trauma, but also darkness, knowledge and power in reimagined "past" places replete with theatrical devices as old as demons; e.g., animal masks, ancient burial rites, and the repressed anger of slaves leaking from a given "tomb's" seditious fakeries (e.g., Ancient Egypt, above).

So often, demons speak with the voices of the dead—those long-dead, but also those treated as "dead" within the state of exception outlawing their existence; i.e., by fetishizing it as demonic to fulfill state wishes with—impossible, save under Promethean circumstance and Faustian duress, chopping off Medusa's head. The best way to prevent that is to show our killers the head is human yet threatened by devices that, unto themselves, can be reclaimed during the dialectic; i.e., reversing abjection (us versus them) through an expanded circle of empathy weaponizing demonic language for workers, animals and the environment—with our bodies, faces, sexual acts and all-around public nudism; re: "art is love made public," negotiated by different groups within shared exhibits illustrating mutual consent as demons so often do—while openly queer and naked:

(artists: Maybel and Jackie)

A perceived land of the gods (who classically enjoy forbidden things to consume or perform, be that ambrosia or reindeer games), our artful forgeries' ghosts (and their aesthetic of power and death) point vengefully to a palliative-Numinous outcome; i.e., a revenge less of the pharaohs, and more of their servants haunting the same chronotopic venues to threaten the whore's dark revenge—a subversive, genderqueer desire to change the world through demonic transaction, vis-à-vis the Wisdom of the Ancients weaponized for worker counterterror (and benefit) through Gothic counterfeit; re: camping the canon to recultivate the Superstructure.

Laden with reclaimed instruments of bigotry and alienation, we become armored when nude (and vice versa; re: Sedgewick), a mask and mirror that—in our capable, inventive hands—grants forbidden sight through historically-materially ironic, seemingly impossible vision; re: Nick Bottom's dream from another of Shakespeare's plays, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1600):

Methought I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was, and methought I had—but man is but a patched fool if he will offer to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report what my dream was (source).

Rather than strictly frighten or overwhelm, this medieval confusion of the senses shows others our happiness, organs, trades, bonds, and yes, struggles through a combined, intersectionally solidarized pedagogy of the oppressed—one healing from rape with "rape" by finding similarity amid difference; i.e., a disparate polity darkened as much by police shadows as by our own intersectional necromancy's ludo-Gothic BDSM, and one we pointedly resurrect through Gothic poetics and active, informed labor exchange. We become human while demonized—something to show off in all its rugged splendor when reclaiming poetry-as-labor from state actors:

(artists: Maybel and Jackie)

"Hurt, not harm." Apart from their glaring eyes and naked, succubean bodies, demons communicate with pleasure and non-harmful pain performed adjacent to actual trauma haunting the same stages; i.e., reminding viewers that liberation (and calculated risk) share the same half-real space with unironic exploitation during liminal expression—death theatre having a fair amount of sex and guilt, but also delight. Said joy happens while breaking through canonical boundaries and out of the closet into the open—our jouissance expressed using memento mori symbolism to speak to death as haunted by rape, but also by healing from rape in graveyard language; e.g., ahegao both "death face," "rape face" and something in between either that camps what is often, otherwise, impossible to talk about.

In turn, these become pleasurable for several reasons: one, doing so both physically, emotionally and/or spiritually feels good, unto itself; and two, because suddenly having a voice where no voice previously existed—to discuss what feels bad with paradoxically "bad" language—also feels good. By pointing to bad things with "bad" copies during calculated risk, workers afford themselves counterfeits whose larger "ghost," vis-à-vis Hogel, highlights an intensely pleasurable reaction not simply unique to such Numinous juxtaposition, but renowned for it! Non-harmful pain, like non-painful pleasure, becomes a data mechanism to speak to difficult generational injury with, granting much-needed relief about things that are often repressed through state force and disguise; i.e., longstanding harm that, owing to its state-sponsored qualities, otherwise might hide in plain sight. The Gothic, then, becomes a warning device in rebellious hands; i.e., to supply the public with different paradoxical combinations that draw attention to themselves and, per the cryptonymy process, cloak their rebellious operations as needed: as monstrous code, specifically ludo-Gothic BDSM presenting violent action and thought (however actual or justified those claims actually are) as "mere play."

These aren't forbidden at all, then, but which state forces allow during popular media's Gothic dialogs; i.e., by the simple fact that they require some kind of Medusa (monstrous-feminine scapegoat) to impugn, thus execute through monopolized sex and force, but also violence, terror and morphological expression inside a given territory. For us, it's a Trojan Horse already inside Troy (or Rome)—a splendid lie whose grey area cannot easily be censored; i.e., it gives bigots room to misinterpret what, for us, contains a deeper message to spoil the elite's propaganda with revolutionary cryptonymy during the whore's paradox; re (from earlier): "Often by rape survivors, such people classically find power/agency through theatrical reenactments of unequal, unfair or otherwise rapacious treatment and conditions [...] The paradox is simple: demons are maidens and maidens are demons, but both are virgins and whores, and each finds power (and knowledge) according to how the state forbids access, yet access happens anyways" (source: "A Rape Reprise").

As something to transform, history is incredibly imaginary and plastic, the myth of Gothic ancestry useful for many competing groups (re: Madoff) but especially rebels needing to lick their wounds; i.e., with calculated risk, itself serving as a kind of "hair of the dog"/sheep's clothing in equal measure. Per the whore's paradox, dialogs of abuse become healing and playful during Gothic theatre's "found document" pastiche and ludo-Gothic BDSM, but also vengeful for those very same reasons; i.e., "rape," in quotes, is no longer strictly a weapon of terror employed by the state to incapacitate us with amid joy divisions, but joy and exquisite "torture" something to reunite with to castrate state terror campaigns with palliative doubles; e.g., by counteracting a great many superstitions about public nudism, queerness and sex (re: that God will smite you for having anal sex), while likewise exposing a great many holier-than-thou people who enjoy guilty pleasures while attacking others for embodying those concepts outside the nuclear model: dissecting the ancient canonical laws while reversing abjection as something to, itself, exhibit by having fun. "Fun," for us, becomes any act that, by reversing abjection, helps dismantle state structures with. The more we exist and subvert things, the less stable their worldview becomes. Capitalist Realism begins to fracture, the elite trying to re-ingest it to regenerate itself. But decay is also a time when state power is weak, thus prone to revolution through controlled variables like demonic sex.

(artists: Maybel and Jackie)

Keeping with demons, sex often appears (and sounds) violent, even murderous, and loads itself with medieval puns; e.g., "batter my 'fortress' with your giant 'ram'!" or Mortal Kombat's infamous "FINISH HER!" and "FATALITY!" but also Dark Souls' immortal victory font: "BUSSY DESTROYED!" Except, what might seem ambiguous in theory becomes rather obvious in practice; e.g., Maybel and Jackie aren't harming each other at all (above), but point in fact, are having a great deal of fun, subverting harm—all while letting the world see its entrance and entering of forbidden things (assholes) with forbidden things (trans genitals) that, under capital, are very much for sale but which our exhibit shows a different usage for porn than pure, pro-state exploitation; i.e., by using the ace side of sex work to—through the ace elements of Gothic poetics (exploring psychosexual trauma, onstage)—skillfully interrogate police abuse onstage and off: by putting it in quotes, but also by showcasing the ace function of sexuality expressed as pornographic art, seeking to decriminalize itself in demonic forms attaching "Hell" to this or that. That's how subversion in Gothic fundamentally works.

(artist: Angel Witch)

For example, when I showed photos of Angel Witch (a model I've worked with/drawn before) to my cover model, Harmony Corrupted, the other responded: "I love that dildo on them, it's so cute! They look absolutely dreamy and fantastic!" In turn, sexual objects often haunted by sexual violence (of a medieval sort; e.g., knights, castles and torture going in and out of itself, on and on, during mise-en-abyme) gain the curious ability to look cute; and if dildos and assholes can look cute, "murder" and "rape" can look cute, but retain their usual taboo power on the Aegis and its carnival refrain: "Come and see the amazing ball-whacker guy! Can you survive their 'castles' of doom?" Hell ass, dark castle of ass, etc, as a Gothic space of camp, not genuine hate, we provide/are left with a monstrous-feminine site of fantasy that, often enough under capital, starts and ends with female bodies (queer bodies or not, Crow being non-binary but female, Angel Witch being cis-het): something to summon and rock out to/get down with during rhythmic ceremonial rituals (sites and bodies) well suited for such activities. Hell rocks!

(artist: Crow)

In other words, it's a party concealing itself from state litigation as a matter of disco-in-disguise, but also devilry to normally burn at the stake; i.e., speaking to police abuse during a hellish party atmosphere. It's very postpunk, but goes beyond the posturing of those older Mancunians like New Order under Thatcher's reign. Regardless of function or intent, some posturing and fakery is always required during oppositional praxis; behind the mask lurks the revolutionary's desire to change the world—one all too clear to see on the naked surface of their playful bodies: "It's 'just' porn/Gothic!" Bodies of Hell, then, are often conspicuous—branded with "Hell" as a symbol, but easily dismissed as dumb entertainment that wasn't trying to actually turn the status quo upside-down (trouble in Paradise).

To it, those in good and bad faith appear visually identical, as do their monstrous symbols, metaphors (mixed or not) and costumes/poetic dress up during liminal expression. Except those more skilled in cryptonymy—i.e., as a consequence of simply needing to survive—rely on a level of skill regarding dialectical-material scrutiny the enemy doesn't have: to camouflage themselves with police and scapegoat symbols, but also to engage in rebellion with using said symbols during oppositional synthesis, onstage and off. It's a complicated idea, but after four books I kind of expect you to get it. For more examples, though, consider "An Uphill Battle" (from Volume One) and "Into the Toy Chest, part two"; re (from the Poetry Module, describing cryptonymy my own life):

none of my exes used their trauma to think with in sex-positive ways, but glide from point A to point B on autopilot: toying with their food as something to abuse, mid-play. Sex is one of those things that works well on instinct, but it's better when it's actively engaged with because trust is incumbent on good communication, not blind cruising. They were all sex experts, insofar as Zeuhl had sexual health training (and an extensive GNC education, especially with twink), Jadis was an active masochist with years of acquired know-how (and a sadistic mean streak), and Cuwu likewise knew the ins and outs of such things as relayed between a younger generation's acclimation to internet culture, but also the machinery of the state as something to impersonate, like chameleons.

Within that culture's mise-en-abyme/framed narrative, the Amazon (and similar monstrous-feminine) survive as tools used by different people pinned between the state and its usual disparate, harmful conditions. They become something that, like all toys, you can recognize in people, and play with; i.e., mid-historical-materialism, while capital constantly corrupts, rewrites, and transforms over time—in short when it decays and regenerates. This travels from Ancient Athens, to Marston's Wonder Woman putting "Athens" in quotes, to whatever it becomes when we manifest these articles ourselves; i.e., working to find social-sexual freedom amid oscillating theatres of opposition, deception, games-in-games rendering us or others the dupe, but also having the power to liberate us amid low-to-high stakes.

Within those stakes, monstrous-feminine players are more skilled by virtue of necessity—overcoming systemic adversity through treachery and cunning but also nuance and grace; i.e., a system of exchange on par with giving rings, in The Merchant of Venice, which extends to other kinds of games that serve a similar purpose; e.g., Luc Besson's 2019 excellent rehash of La Femme Nikita, the svelte sexpot beating the boys at their own game in ways they aren't accustomed to playing themselves, by virtue of them being men: blunt instruments to her scalpel's acting and play as a means of surviving men, first and foremost (source).

In short, it behooves us to be skillful, "skill" something that, through sex work (or work sexualized under capital, which is everything but especially any kind of work performed by/assigned to women or people treated as women by the state; i.e., according to their biology and/or identity as monstrous-feminine) merging porn and art as activism-in-disguise:

(artist: Angel Witch and Blxxd Bunny)

Such vivid-yet-underestimated markers of alienation and us-versus-them violence are incredibly useful to workers for several reasons. For one, nothing is more controlled than sex and the desires and poetry surrounding it, which the state requires to prolong itself and rape nature with using police violence (and tokenized rebellion). Except the state can't make sex entirely illegal, nor language, sarcasm, and thought crimes, and point in fact, desperately needs monsters acting rebellious; i.e., to justify its own sexual violence against nature as monstrous-feminine: through the performance of sin, which it can then control as a language and vector of its own tyranny punching down.

Furthermore, Gothic prohibition (and police/military violence at large; e.g., bombs) historically don't work. Such things, divorced from their immediate sexual prescription and dogma, afford theatrical commentaries that become performative with a rebellious function, during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., granting a layer of cryptonymic detachment and engagement that lets us play with such things without the immediacy that sexual connection often entails (many of the models I work with are asexual to some extent; e.g., Blxxd Bunny—who enjoys pain and sexual expression more than overtly sexual sensations—is a bit of an ace "size queen," above). In disguise, we can reverse the terrorist/counterterrorist role, banking on the historical fact that fascism and Imperialism (thus Capitalism) have short lifespans and cannot monopolize weapons of violence and terror like rape through demon BDSM. We can use the same exact things to weaken their stronghold! And there's nothing they can do about it; colonizers always need someone to fight.

We camp canon because we must. Queer people (and other minorities) live under unstable, harmful conditions, the state criminalizing nature in bad faith to police and maintain private property (re: ACAB, ASAB). So while fascism colonizes media to infiltrate the usual voices of the oppressed, and which the latter must be decolonized by us in the same spaces (subverting the Protestant ethic), we're not trying to assimilate thus become cops that relegate such subjects purely to realms of privatization/controlled opposition; we want to express private matters in public ways that make the world safe from capital and police violence: by highlighting the chaos of our daily lives through the demonic, sexual language of survival during crisis. It's a kind of saber-rattling—a threat display that says, "welcome to our world," but also, "fuck around, find out."

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

Police monopolize, thus abuse, "boundaries for me, not for thee." Except empires, while formidable, are not all-powerful; they need workers (and copaganda laden with fireworks) to defend them from labor at large as something to steal from. Fascism is capital in decay defending itself and state rights from worker, animal and environmental rights. This means that nothing scares empire and fascism more than a vulnerable party fighting back in ways they can't control; i.e., by demanding boundaries while acclimated to status-quo bullshit, and calling out state obscurantism and DARVO (which the Gothic, and its lack of concrete boundaries, excels at): exposing the universal fear and hypocrisy that state actors enjoy while using its mechanisms to punch down (whose ridicule only takes a good scandal, per the black penitent trope¹⁴⁰, to hoist our enemies on their own stupid, fragile petards; e.g., pointing out that Destiny—a full-blown Zionist and pedophile who loves calling his political enemies "terrorist" to discredit and attack them—apparently blew Nick Fuentes [a bonafide Nazi who hates women and chases catboys] and then filmed it, only to have the tape leak).

Gender trouble is a large part of it, of course (which the monstrous-feminine is, even in cis-het examples like straight Amazons; e.g., Ayla, from Chrono Trigger, above, and a million other examples of the virgin/whore herbo and harlot), but so is "trouble," period; e.g., women with guns and confidence in their animalistic, feral bodies while not kissing up and punching down (a witch hunt needs token witches to work, gentrifying and decaying activism): warriors who undermine the status quo and shrink the state of exception for universal liberation!

(artist: Peach Jars)

Viewed onstage, darkness visible is anything that promises universal liberation through Gothic maturity. It becomes something to concentrate and channel, taken offstage during liminal expression to then spread around: rape as something to play with. This includes titillating (and historically ironic) mixtures; i.e., of things normally raped weaponizing tools of rape to their advantage; re: women and guns (above), but also blowing off steam (a sexual outlet, when individual worker needs and desires clash) while simultaneously passing vital ludic codeswitching (and Gothic, BDSM familiarity with such mysterious devices) onto the next generation of workers; e.g., panties—often connected to violence as symbols of sexual vulnerability and conquest (during courtly love, below)—let us play with rape, thus act it out; i.e., by raping the whore as an embodiment of nature that fucks back by acting out her rape, but also monstrous-feminine sex to demonically have the whore's revenge: as mutually consensual, but whose mixed metaphors (of which the Gothic predominantly is) remain utterly haunted by those who wish her genuine, irreversible harm!

¹⁴⁰ Outing those classically sheltered by state structures, said structures normally letting them retreat elsewhere to harm others; e.g., Father Schedoni from Radcliffe's The Italian. Exposed for his sins, Schedoni literally dies of shame. Nazis act holier-than-thou, but in truth are the most guilty of all.

"Safety" is paradoxically expressed as danger and desire, but also "blind," in Gothic; re: darkness visible. The panties are up, then down; suddenly Medusa is curiously letting you inside, speaking through the performative language of psychosexual violence—to whisper through gouged-out eyes and severed necks' denoting forbidden sight¹⁴¹ through a confusion of the senses, but also the paradoxical excitement of lowered panties and foreign objects shoved deep inside her most "delicate" of regions; i.e., during magical assembly and selective absorption's Song of Infinity speaking to our profound surviving of rape, and coming to an important realization: that rape, under mutual consent, is impossible, but threats of "it" during calculated risk are not just possible, they're demanded! "Rape" is so often how Medusa asks for hugs (with Harmony loving the image of the blood shooting from her eye sockets; her response when seeing it: "LMAO that's amazing!"). Hurt, not harm; no harm, no foul!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

It's not that consent is terribly difficult to communicate, then, but that its visual ambiguity and subsequent parsing requires intuition that is not commonly taught by canonical norms (afraid of troubling comparison, which doubles are, and which the state uses to shift the blame onto scapegoats other than themselves). To see us uncloaked and doubling our demise (and bad-faith counterfeits of said demise) during liminal expression, then, is to look upon a post-scarcity world shrouded in the plastic, inky language of the imaginary past loaded with rape as something to camp (usually through bad sex puns). Its hellish, anisotropic dualism begs, "Look at us, living our best life in spite of those hunting us; i.e., our stubborn thriving and, indeed, our flexible ability to speak to their betrayals under state control—our humanity something to seize by virtue of the sorry fact that those in (or with) power seek constantly to harm us for profit's sake":

¹⁴¹ That of blind and/or decapitated prophets and demonic xenoglossia: speaking through corpses. Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

(artists: Bay Ryan and Beat)

Cumming is a passionate, "torturous" matter of arrival towards profound feelings that, couched in violence, bigotry and phobia, feel amazing and bypass state barriers (thus unironic usage) during psychosexual martyrdom as a form of art, not literal suicide.

To be clear, the two are often adjacent; re (from "Psychosexual Martyrdom"):

Capitalism is heteronormative, exploiting workers in sexually dimorphic ways that lead to state decay through Capitalist Realism: the world as parasitized behind the illusion, killing host and parasitoid alike. All the while, said nerds project their terrorism onto others, calling their actions "counterterror" to disguise settler colonialism (and its stochastic terrorism) while chasing their victims down. It's a monopoly whose process must be humanized by learning from the monstrous past as psychosexually martyred, stalling Capitalism and helping it develop into Gothic Communism; i.e., by subverting its heteronormative, kill-on-sight illusions with genderqueer ludo-Gothic BDSM iterations that thwart Capitalist Realism and achieve active intersectional solidarity from various marginalized groups working in concert (source).

In turn, "Capitalism has no use for people who see each other as human; it wants us dehumanizing ourselves so capital can function as normal, moving money through nature at the cost of human life" (Persephone van der Waard's "Remember the Fallen: An Ode to Nex Benedict," 2024).

Except, what for the elite is merely an unironic tool of domination and humiliation (often used in bad faith), we reclaim the Gothic orgasmically to camp canon with through the greatest of ironies; i.e., to do things that constitute as swears, but also employ forbidden things in operatic spaces playing with rape, death and sin, but also divinity as a campy device hauntologically unrestricted by historical time and place; e.g., curses like "holy fuck/shit" and "Oh my god!" (which Bay cried as Beat fucked him, below) but also half-real arguments that employ demonic poetry as social-psychosexual action (often by merging sexuality with the language of death, war, and food, etc): beating our meat in depraved, "almost holy" acts of Gothic reinvention, revolution's rock 'n roll taking land back, but also language and labor in connection to it (re: Amazons and anal sex). Instead of the fascist nadir of genuine dignity and standards, we reclaim our humanity through campy terror language as the poetic passage of space and time, scandal and sentiment. Like Hell, the Gothic is something to reify and move through as we do; i.e., as de facto, extracurricular teaching devices camping state doubles.

(artists: Bay Ryan and Beat)

In other words, our doing so profanes currently sacred, but ultimately harmful systems using a devil-in-disguise that's about as subtle as a Trojan Horse, tramp stamp (e.g., Hawthorne's infamous Scarlet Letter) or Gothic novel (originally cited as terrorist literature; re: Crawford, Groom), but historically remains just as effective;

i.e., with "harmful energies" that cultivate the Superstructure through the Wisdom of the Ancients as, itself, quite plastic.

It bears repeating that the devil is something to conjure and summon by self-appointed "holy" groups to maintain state control. Summoning sin personifies punishment; i.e., from a position of naturalized weakness to then exploit the whore's involvement in, even if their role is involuntary, beyond or otherwise outside their control: the fetish and scapegoat to see through and surveil during the cryptonymy process. The maiden/sex demon are things to canonically embrace and abject; i.e., per the same whore's paradox and revenge, itself something to reclaim from state mechanisms tokenizing and sacrificing the usual suspects. By framing/concentrating them as sex objects, but also sex weapons through the arbitration (assignment) of criminal sex and force, religion already pornographizes such things as guilty pleasure. Using doubles during liminal expression (under an unequal, hierarchical ordering of existence that monopolies things like pity and blame to serve the usual benefactors), the Gothic merely highlights this double standard; e.g., naughty nuns encompassing hauntologically medieval arguments of appetite and abstinence (signified by black and red, the colors of Schism; re: Protestantism vs Catholicism), one where formerly extended (sex) objects—subsisting under a rising Cartesian discourse pimping nature—have always, but more gradually in an iconoclastic sense, constituted a great many things under a latter-day perspective men cannot fully dictate or perceive: camping the canon.

(artist: Paul Laurenzi)

Women, as nuns, are classically saved and fallen, for example; their bodies are charged, in this respect, as a matter of automatic persecution and ownership by men fearful of educated women (e.g., source tweet, Dr Ally Louks: December 10th, 2024), but also anisotropic reversal by those same women (or those treated as women). Threatened with systemic power shift, men (or those inside the Man Box) view loss of power as "rape," which they respond to by inflicting on their usual victims, mid-DARVO¹⁴². In turn, agency and disempowerment inhabit the same canvas and monstrous-

¹⁴² Re, Louk's December 10th tweet (the original attacker's response to her PhD's publication; source tweet: November 27th, 2024):

You are the dumbest fucking bitch I have ever seen on the internet and the perfect example of literally everything wrong with modern society. Imagine thinking you deserve taxpayer money for writing that useless piece of shit thesis nobody will ever read. Vegan, feminist and queer, your dues to society are many and me and the boys will RAPE them out of you.

Educated women, regardless if they're for universal liberation or not, are witches to burn at the stake by good little soldiers—a threat that historically makes many women (already victims of rape) tokenize; e.g., TERFs; i.e., during fascism scapegoating modernity to attack modernity's usual victims (and token agents). It's a recruitment tactic—one to divide-and-conquer labor/gentrify and decay feminism by marginalizing educators into "prison sex" modes of thought, and all while getting others within these same, semi-privileged circles to kiss up and punch down, mid-witch-hunt.

Some things never change because the elite (and their moderate-to-reactionary defenders) endorse such pogroms, dogwhistling and virtue-signaling to varying degrees. And the reality of straight white people is, sadly enough, selective; i.e., such alienation is something that happens to different people under different degrees of preferential mistreatment—with Louks certainly antagonized for her work in academia, but less aggressively than, say, a black trans woman of color (re: "Hot Allostatic Load"). The point isn't to rape rank, here, but acknowledge relative privilege during oppositional praxis. Such abuse is alien until it is not, but for some it's less alien and closer to home to varying degrees of open hostility and micro-aggression, from moment to living moment; i.e., witch hunts, like any prison, persecute unevenly to keep workers divided, and America was and has always been a settler colony/police state.

Louks, for instance, pointedly "drew the line" after she was attacked as awfully as she was, but we must do so before attacks happen; i.e., while actively and aggressively fighting for universal liberation (which PhD authors don't always have time to do; i.e., research is time-consuming, emotionally demanding and expensive). And I get it—rape accusations are dangerous for those inhabiting environments that are historically unkind to those they victimize; i.e., academia and women, the former abusing and tokenizing the latter to carry such abuse forwards; e.g., Simone Beauvoir raping her students (re: Martin)—but being "woke" is all about being ready for abuse and preventing it for all peoples on a systemic level by developing Communism (which academia historically doesn't do; re: it paywalls its research): while living in Gothic times.

Furthermore, you can't just report rape to the police (which Louks suggests) because police/the courts don't prevent crime; they uphold the patriarchal bigoted systems (and divisions of thought) that make rape possible to begin with (and cops commit more domestic abuse than anyone else). The state is white, straight and rapacious; so we must treat it as such whether the mask is on or off.

(source tweet, Dr Ally Louks: December 10th, 2024)

To be absolutely clear, I'm not saying Louks is tokenized; but it's not unreasonable to suggest that others in light of her treatment could be motivated to tokenize in an environment that encourages

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

feminine bodies tempting men a priori, thus giving the status quo an excuse to resist with prejudice: to blame and rape nature all over again, reforming her as a matter of futile conversion; i.e., while treating it as impossible, but also hopelessly reprobate, degenerate and profane in sacred divisions of man vs nature. Her rape becomes foregone, then, as does her retaliation—one organized religion will try to reimburse and triangulate against more marginalized subjects under state rule. Nuns, in classic Neo-Gothic, are cops and victims. So does capital tank peoples' vitals—their intelligence and awareness, mid-struggle—to a nadir of praxial inertia.

The fact remains, we Commie-fag sex workers are already creatures of violence, terror and sin; said language can be used to cryptonymically expose state hypocrisy without too much trouble—i.e., by living in/as sin, we achieve multiple desires, expressing ourselves as "of nature," but also "from Hell" as a coded brand: reversing abjection to show ourselves as human and happy despite state dogma alienating and fetishizing us for being (as they see it) alien, horny and reprobate. Our doing so makes state proponents crap (or jizz) in their pants, thus out themselves as bad-faith behind concentric veneers (re: Matthew Lewis and his crossdressing Matilda tempting Ambrosio)—bad actors testifying to their abusing of us before we're in reach. So do we, like Lucifer bounding into Paradise, break into Heaven (sold to workers as "Hell" during the Protestant ethic). It's not like these devices (or their subjugated/subversive functions) have gone anywhere; profaning the sacred breaks Capitalist Realism by outing those menticed to uphold it—through singular (thus violent) interpretations of canonical norms, which our holistic application overwhelms and exposes easily enough!

In short, using the same language cops do, we can expose them more easily during the cryptonymy process, yet mark and identify ourselves as friends to the Cause when all sides are in disguise to some extent: friendly people to gravitate towards, in good-faith, while warding off genuine abuse camping the same destructive language's markers of prison violence; i.e., during an apocalypse/witch hunt/moral panic assigning them without irony to administer hate crimes dressed up as "law and order" inside a prison full of witches (the state, incompatible with consent, needs rape to function, but also disguise); e.g., Radcliffe's nunnery from The Italian full of uniforms that advertise state power but disguises to use by those against the institution trying to escape its concentric, prison-like halls with (for more examples of this idea, refer to "The World Is a Vampire" from the Undead Module). Inside such rooms, state actors feign oppression—acting legitimate while doubting our credibility (thus humanity) as something to root out, inside the prison-abuse by turning a blind eye (re: academia has become an increasingly neoliberal institution over time). In Louk's case, she was bullied so quickly (on a platform bought by the world's richest man to platform Nazis) and so fiercely that she left Twitter for greener pastures. In short, an educated woman simply announced her intellectual work, and capital's fascist lapdogs fetishized her for it; re: as they would a nun being—beyond someone classically with access to written material—a sex object for men to use and abuse with impunity. Fascism is the normalizing of rape in public, regressing to an anti-intellectual state of paranoia and persecution mania, mid-moral-panic.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

like disco; we, under scrutiny in the same masked ball, can playfully insist, "It's a 'fake,' my dude!" And if that excuse doesn't work—if such gay taunts are attacked in earnest regardless of the venue or circumstance—then it's time to lock arms and, standing side by side, storm the wire of the camps!

Silence is genocide; the existence of GNC people (and other minorities outside of normalized, token spheres) equates to a kind of speaking out the state can only conceptualize as a threat: to profit, thus its own existence, which it will defend by aping us. The state is only a prison (inside a prison, inside a prison), and police are only the enemies of workers (and rebels, monsters) who they dress up as in bad faith; i.e., posturing as false friends. They know it's a prison, but think themselves exempt; we know better, using the Gothic notion of home-as-prison (an ambivalent, ambiguous, oscillating crisis of faith, in the theatrical sense) to free our minds, then our bodies with: imagination first, then material conditions, the two ultimately working hand-in-hand to develop Gothic Communism and dismantle the state while paradoxically inside it. Liberation happens within, the wasp eating the caterpillar to emerge something different.

In Plato's cave, this happens primarily with shadows; on the Aegis, with mirrors. Cryptonymy lets us survive, solidarize and speak out through buffers of pretend/not-pretend crime and punishment during liminal expression—a half-real mirror game whose dualistic markers of monstrous violence (to give and receive) infiltrate different sectors' overlapping persecution networks: through buffers and reasonable doubt, accrued during costume games amid moral panic as an ongoing operation under capital. Our return to home as fallen is soothing through the ability to address crisis during calculated risk, psychosexual poetry and palliative-Numinous affect. Porn is some of the most potent art, in this respect; i.e., as it speaks to (and with) what the state will try to control more than anything else: sex with force, the latter dressed up as protection.

All monsters are, to some degree, imaginary thus fake, but likewise hinting at buried realities through their fakeness; the Gothic, as a dualistic means of calculated risk, is rooted in fakery to further or reverse abjection through the cryptonymy process—i.e., a fake made of clay or an authentic article made of clay are still, both of them, made of clay (re: the Gothic through camp, puts everything in quotes). As such, function trumps form as a hauntological matter of assigned legitimacy versus actual activism regardless of appearance.

Gothic Communism takes said clay, then, and uses it to liberate workers from state golems and gargoyles, the owners of a church increasingly menticed by/alienated from its own counterfeit sense of "past"; re: the ghost of the counterfeit ours to weaponize against our jailors, mid-chronotope. The more they lie, the more room we have to work with, terrifying what they and their forgeries try to abject using the same borderline-to-outright pornographic poetic devices: the sacrifice and executioner housed in the same special place, the maiden/whore to conjure up achingly during Gothic's liminal rape play and murder fantasy! "Oh, heavens! Just what have I gotten myself into!" Hot goss, indeed, girls talk—about that big Gothic "castle¹⁴³" to go to for a good time!

(artist: Owusyr)

Except whereas the middle class since Radcliffe might conjure up a castle or demon lover to assuage their bigoted fears (cold feet or shoulders, often with an alter ego—the secret identity man-of-mystery or Amazonian menace to warm things up/cool things down charming the panties off the [classically white, straight, female] audience during calculated risk), we do so to announce and combat systemic oppression: killing our darlings on the Aegis, but also calling them out for their entitlement, hence grab a tantrum-throwing slaver by the balls (re: cops—those whose profession is to torture and extort people more vulnerable than themselves in defense of private property).

So do we anisotropically defend ourselves from state fabrications; i.e., by making our own and fashioning an alternate, at-times-frank/streetwise but also exciting/swashbuckling voice to history through demons (e.g., Borges). We make room for reasonable doubt/craft an alibi tied to our identity and performance going hand-in-hand. The Gothic becomes a place to conveniently be naughty and put our ideas to practice that, in turn, aren't fully removed from our habitat, thus bailiwick. So with sugar and spice, but also piss, vinegar and worse things (shit, blood, etc), we can win some degree of arbitration regarding sex and force, but also our basic human rights swept up in these things. There's power in fiction, but especially when it's mixed up with sex and force through demonic expression as pulpy and clay-like.

¹⁴³ Known in architectural legal jargon as a "malicious erection" (a structure erected maliciously—usually as an eyesore, or to vindictively block a neighboring party's vision) but what I call "the liminal hauntology of war"; re: the arrival of a harmful condition/crisis of state, which the hauntology (usually a castle) symbolically announces: genocide, thus police brutality and ultimately rape as symptoms of capital's endemic boom-or-bust cycle. The castle symbolizes the raping of workers by the state devouring them, its appearance simply a matter of routine; i.e., when Capitalist Realism wanes and apocalypse suddenly rears its ugly head (the Gothic metaphor between state violence and state bodies generally being a morphological one). The Gothic tells its stories with buildings and people relating back and forth across space and time (commonly framed as haunted houses/castles; re: chronotopes).

Yet another thing to speak to power with, onstage and off, we don't just bypass boundaries; we blur them, too, by relating to (and learning from) the half-real past as ever in flux: through iconoclastic art liberating sex work!

Cryptonymy goes both ways, of course, but in making gender trouble (and again, trouble full stop), we're freer than state proponents; aping our dragons, witches, zombies and demons, the latter is always trapped in crisis, closeted while reporting us to the authorities. The fact remains that some amount of violence is always required to liberate, even in theatrical forms the state cannot tolerate beyond its own perfidious misuse (of stigma, bigotry and phobia). The elite cannot own, thus monopolize sex and force, hence demons. Ergo, we camp harmful sex and force with ironic, non-harmful variants that worship ourselves, and give suitable gooey offerings (e.g., Beat giving Bay a nice big load, below) to frighten the elite with: wasted seed/non-reproductive sex (despite the creampie, Bay doesn't have a uterus)! Our devilish pandemonium, these bodies and banners' dark wishes push collectively using ludo-Gothic BDSM towards a world where profit (thus rape, capital, cops and billionaires) are well-and-truly a thing of the past!

(artists: Bay Ryan and Beat)

Deifying

ourselves, we become something to aspire to, an example to lead by when developing Gothic Communism as fairly novel (re: to put the pussy on the chainwax): transformed into as demons do, trading in shadows to achieve reparation and release from police brutality with humor and consensual control (e.g., cock cages). With darkness, desires and dreams, we unleash upon a world that—per Capitalism—has become increasingly afraid of our presence: that trans people have always existed, and always will despite those chasing us. We transform not merely to hide from our attackers, but reveal that which they seek to conquer and destroy inside/outside themselves: us.

As such, we solidarize to reverse what they abject and divide, showing them their own straightness and whiteness (of the state's settler argument, including tokenized variants); i.e., as the real sickness punching spectres of Marx across space and time, but also in between the past and the present in hauntological dialogs: revolution happens inside capital, the state using language it can abuse but never fully prevent those it harms from anisotropically reversing.

This concludes the broader points of holistic study and informed action the remainder of the Demon Module shall try to impart. In my usual approach, then, I'll be cross-examining demons with the undead/animals, but will—for the rest of the module—be unpacking different aspects of demonic history and its poetic application we've yet to examine. First, we'll establish the rest of the blood libel class (monsters of persecution and revenge); i.e., among demons mummies and faeries, in "I'll See You in Hell," followed by the rest of "Idle Hands" considering the desire/revenge portion of demons as monstrous-feminine whores (such desires often being sex liberated from state force, but still haunted by it). After that, we'll summarize making and summoning demons vis-à-vis unequal, forbidden exchange to end "Forbidden Sight" with. The next chapter, "Call of the Wild," shall focus entirely on radical transformation—especially concerning anthropomorphic demons of nature like chimeras, furies and lycanthropes, but also their holistic temples, masks, and props, their lips that grip (and other formidable extensions, below) all begging to be touched and played with: a sensual void calling you home, a mirror on which your own lovely monsters (and their bountiful harvests, also below) await! Ravish ironically!

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

This possible better world—one where all peoples, animals and environments are free from state oppression and illusions—will always coexist with our dreams and bodies speaking together about such a special day. Its forbidden sight, Numinous quest, and special prescription express in and upon those struggling to survive, using what they got to humanize themselves and theirs normally being exploited through the same monstrous-feminine aesthetic; i.e., stewards of nature reclaiming sex and force from the state (and its historical-material language of profit raping us); e.g., as Bay does while being disabled and through survival sex work, an avatar of liberation and kindness the likes of which channels a sweet feral goodness.

Blood libel conveys a classic problem of horror movies: the monster lives at the end; when in Rome, we speak to those who fear us through the ghost of the counterfeit as something to hug. Survival is victory and silence is death, Bay the little puppy god that lives in my heart, a force to be reckoned with that makes our enemies think twice. One that all revolutionaries should aspire to, his spectacular levers and buttons—once joyously thrown and pushed (next page)—move the Earth on its axis away from capital harvesting us simply for being different than the ruling class. May a day yet come when people like myself, Maybel, Jackie, Beat, and Bay (and Annabel, Sinead, Romantic Rose, and others, next section) are, all of us sex demons, gradually freed from state rule, police violence, and token betrayals! Infinite labor, infinite value; demons, infinite form to explore and express our revenge: they only have what power we give them! Able to play with power ourselves, it becomes what we hold onto and administer as stewards of nature from nature, learning from the imaginary past to create a better world—a Hell on Earth!

Hell, expressed as such, isn't so bad, is it? But it seems safe, harmless, non-threatening? Bay's a sweetie's sweetie, but they can absolutely fight back: "Thou called'est me a dog before thou had a cause / But since I am a dog, beware my fangs¹⁴⁴!" In place of pity burns a heart than can never be conquered (outside of ironic playtime), will never surrender to state pigs!

Onto faeries and demon mommies! "Drink deep, or taste not, the plasma spring. Y'see what I'm sayin'?"

(artist: Bay Ryan)

¹⁴⁴ From The Merchant of Venice (c. 1598).

"I'll See You in Hell": Dark Faeries and Demon Mommies

"Your tauntaun will freeze before you reach the first marker!"

—a deck officer to Han Solo, The Empire Strikes Back (1981)

Demons are intensely popular poetic devices, which communicate, as people do, through sex and force, but also taboo subjects concerning larger bigotries, phobias and stigmas involving sex and force. In turn, everything speaks to dark wishes, wants and desires achieved through transformation and trade; i.e., few things are used in conjunction more than "fire" and "desire," but also oxymoron and darkness visible; e.g., "cold fire," and "Hell freezing over" (the latter being a frozen lake in Dante's Ninth Circle of Hell, for instance). Milton's Lucifer was, in that sense, the bringer of light with darkness that broke state illusions. I want to unpack that a little more, here.

Our focus remains monstrous-feminine, as usual. And yet, at its most simple, all roads lead to Rome; i.e., the pandemonium all demons and fairies provide takes you to Hell in order to experience what is forbidden or otherwise denied at home, generally through home's unequal conditions turned on their heads.

Such things historically and dialectically-materially reduce to sex and force, as a result—are highly controlled by canon as such because, with the proper nudge and mindset, they suddenly offer the unique and productive ability to radically change the world in a half-real sense; i.e., starting onstage but hardly ending there, battering Capitalist Realism with proletarian illusions camping the canon to liberate the whore: through a reclaimed (and deliberately subversive) Superstructure. This cycling wardrobe—one of many masks, mirrors and costumes—endlessly yields dark wishes concerning emancipatory sex and force dressed up as "rape," and whose dark demonic knowledge and power reliably abstract, adjudicate or otherwise convey through whorish revenge as a devilish, Gothic-Communist, impossible-to-control creative act: something to pass down in cryptonymic, anachronistic and extracurricular modes of poetic discourse forever at play (and war) in history's endless jumble.

"I'll See You in Hell," then, divides in two basic parts to consider said jumble with: a continuation of monstrous-feminine revenge "of nature" against profit—a rebellious witch (and not a witch cop) being someone who, pimped by state force, not only refuses to play ball (witches pimping witches, mid-moral-panic), but bends the rules of play through ludo-Gothic BDSM (and its usual historical ironies) in pursuit of universal liberation: the obfuscation of friend and foe through the usual prosecution markers; re: to confuse state threat responses, reclaiming them while humanizing ourselves during the cryptonymy process!

Amazons, already monstrous-feminine, are a kind of witch whose uneven, historically selective qualities of persecution—through blood libel, sodomy and witch hunter rhetoric—we'll pointedly explore (this time) through a symposium on demon mummies and dark faeries; i.e., as poetic extensions of the Amazon type of witch: the warrior and monstrous-feminine (often female) dominant/monarch. In turn, we'll consider both as a common, beloved way of working out our state-imposed, us-versus-them differences through the usual language/theatre of difference: the Gothic's rape/police roleplay scenarios pointedly breaking boundaries but also resetting them through the playful-yet-shock-therapy fantasies of abject reversal (often with a half-real element of pure invention, dead cultures, and real-life doubles; e.g., Skyrim's barbarians and cat people, left, practicing cross-species "pollination" to confront and ultimately revert Cartesian, settler-colonial and heteronormative systems of violence, terror and morphological expression: fucking the alien)!

(artist: Gekko)

Remember that I'm merely scratching the surface of a very old problem (re: nature as gyn/ecological, vis-à-vis Patel and Moore); our doing so, here, shall explore the dark, repressed, out-of-sight qualities to daily life felt but cloaked under capital—generally in places too hot, cold, dark, or otherwise inhospitable to regular folk, yet for the queer-and-mighty is exactly how they prefer (and where they take us to better acclimate/expand our horizons):

- Darkness Visible: Dark Faeries (feat. Annabel Morningstar, Harmony Corrupted, Romantic Rose, The Witch, and more): A collaboration between whores. Considers the labor proponents of Gothic-Communist revolution—working together and with Gothic materials, in a staged, meta

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

sense—to demonically give rise (thus shape/voice) to dark places and people; i.e., as dark faerie rulers/regal fairylands where one can explore off-limit feelings and desires conducive to post-scarcity development; e.g., Satan from Robert Eggers' The Witch, Lavos from Chrono Trigger, and more!

- Trial by Fire: (feat. Lady Hellbender and Hela, The Shape of Water): A symposium. Considers the fiery, militant aspect to demon muscle mommy doms, specifically through the postcolonial urge of forbidden love.

Each considers the whore's paradox, and how it extends to transition as a source of pride, mid-capture and "duress"; i.e., when you go to Hell as Persephone, only to find out it's not so bad: a paradox of "rape" that, in quotes, can challenge profit.

In doing so, a hostage suddenly gains the ability to speak to their abuse with ludo-Gothic BDSM/calculated risk, while simultaneously reclaiming they and their friends' humanity with the fun stuff—with sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, but also those monstrous-feminine beings that famously embody them through courtly love's demonic castle sex and dark (spontaneous, forbidden) desire; i.e., "I would love [to see/do] this or that." Demons and faeries do so, and generally with Gothic "spice" haunted by actual abuse/commodification! In other words, they (and their Numinous, exquisitely "torturous" homes) are commonly gratuitous, seeming right out of a succubean nightmare, porno mag and/or Gothic novel: mail-order and made just for those dark monstrous-feminine desires (male, female, or intersex) that workers, per the Protestant ethic, aren't "supposed" to have!

(artist: Slightly Cuntly)

In response, unequal power arranges in a courtly manner with a female/monstrous-feminine, home-court advantage: a warrior whore expressing courtly love towards the princess-as-classic-sex-object (sometimes with a gender swap, but not always; e.g., female brats/pillow princesses, above).

Let's unpack this conceptually for a moment (five pages), then precede the exhibits themselves with a short list of additional boundaries.

To unpack the above ideas from a theatrical standpoint, think of them as regressive therapy told through Gothic adventure stories. Rather than every second of every day guided by alarm clocks, sugar and caffeine flowing money up, the same fictions can reallocate such forces onto new tracks of distribution. To it, the monomyth is the classic adventure story told from a male warrior perspective, the Gothic heroine forced to survive the villainous castle while waiting to be rescued there; it is a Promethean space when reversed as such, the anisotropic variant harboring a fugitive ruler marrying through kidnap by taking Persephone back to Hell: where she belongs because existing there paradoxically sets her free!

People love demons (and dark worlds) for this reason—relish the gateways, but also "battle parties" and warring theatrical tensions (e.g., psychomachy and Amazonomachia), which they so easily represent when traveled to and visited for the length of a dream (versus coming to empire during the liminal hauntology of war); re: as conflicting poetic stances and arguments to access and adopt in praxial opposition, pimping nature or speaking from nature-whored-out in its defense (regardless of sex, species, race, gender and/or religion, etc). "Hell," then, is classically the site of such raucous, oscillating exchange, raunchy exploitation and taboo exploration; i.e., during the dialectic of the alien. Such push-pull, gruesome revenge and demonic invention aren't automatically "bad," but something to dualistically evoke and pursue by two basic sides (workers or the state) meeting in the middle of a shared shadow zone, their parody and pastiche (remediated praxis) playing with such devices at cross purposes!

(artist: yxxzoid)

To it, Gothic Communism turns the world upside-down to voluntarily transform it outside Hell's caged evocation, camping the canon (and its rape) using our cake and infernal holes (e.g., assholes, left) as dungeons of deep dark desire; the state, to keep it the same, thus prolong genocide raping nature as usual!

At a glance, things might seem discrete; in practice, people and place evoke one another through mise-en-abyme during liminal expression's Gothic, concentrically morphological expression (re: Walpole's walking castles [the Capitalocene] expressed as literal fortresses [and giant suits of armor inside said fortresses] but also corporally vis-à-vis my arguments; re: "Castles in the Flesh," 2024): where dreams, but especially dark, unequal, forbidden dreams (things conspicuously absent from daily life yet advertised everywhere as such) come gloriously alive/true during ergodic, non-trivial playtime (with "truth" being the potential for them to realize outside the Platonic dream space); re: darkness visible; e.g., universal liberation, ironic/unironic murder and rape fantasies, or land back, vis-à-vis liminal spaces (and occupiers of said spaces) that embody such things in praxial opposition on and within the cryptomimetically echoing surfaces and thresholds (often as drug-like; i.e., acid Communism—a concept we'll explore at length in "Call of the Wild").

Simply put, demons articulate through chaos as a kind of wicked, horny presence (of death and decay but also change, regeneration and appetite); campy demons—whether people and/or place, be they mommies and faeries of a rebellious monstrous-feminine—use the medieval morphology of the infernal concentric pattern and Promethean space to upset any sense of order (moral, emotional, ontological, etc; re: Aguirre) that capital installs; i.e., by morphologically (and with puns) evoking violence and terror onstage to threaten radical change offstage: to evoke and instill possible worlds that capital doesn't want to happen. This means worlds without profit, or—paradoxically—masters (despite the mistress argument campily conveyed by dark faeries and demon mommies). In turn, canon offsets camp with canceled futures/retro-future hauntologies (re: controlled opposition), the vultures of the bourgeoisie instilling praxial inertia to continue scavenging labor's zombie corpse; re: Capitalist Realism holding workers hostage through DARVO argumentation and police obstruction/arbitration of sex and force per the trifectas, monopolies and qualities of capital levied in bad faith: "They [a liberated proletariat] will be a dark master worse than us! Trust in the elite!"

I'd call bullshit, but we are what the elite design workers to fear as "beyond" Capitalism. In short, Communism is gay and from outer space, generally as sodomy arguments known for gender trouble and delight; i.e., we're a thing to paradoxically chase (more on chasing femboys/catboys and twink-in-peril, in Volume Three), said chase unfolding on either side of the praxial equation: to plant ideas in our heads that bury the fag or disinter its oddly sexy corpse!

(artist: Jaybaesun)

Despite demons classically being the life of the party, state dogma cannot tolerate anything that functionally threatens bourgeois hegemony. So it treats the function (of genuine rebellion) as party pooping while, in the same breath, robbing our aesthetic of any critical power through bad-faith replication (re: obscurantism).

State alienation, fetishization and control of Gothic poetics (about sex and force) are endless, as are the many ways to challenge them in dualistic forms promoting fearful possibilities the state wants to repress with tokenized variants. As our exhibits will demonstrate, this includes Amazons and Medusa, but also demon mommies of a more overtly demonic and hellish, dark fiery mistress, and/or faerie¹⁴⁵ design; i.e., serving as operatic changeling vice characters giving voice to such things—those creatures seemingly "of another world," one whose unheimlich, liminal hauntology of war they can take you to as well, making your dreams come true in fantastical modes of expression: to another planet, an underground lake, a fortress, a dark forest, etc, to undergo sodomy as demonic courtship worthy of witch hunts and blood libel in state eyes framing such pleasure as "guilty."

Under such scrutiny and censorship, these trials by fire are felt through darkness visible; i.e., between resident and residence, seeking less redemption in state eyes and more to rectify state pogroms: a black gate to take you to Hell and back, once opened—not once, but recursively during holistic study of the Medusa's Numinous peach! If our goal is to humanize the harvest (exposing the state as inhumane), then Hell's diet grants us the demonic ability to radically change size, shape and composition (as well as perspective regarding such things) to throw the doors of perception wider than Harmony's painted, glorious ass (and to allow for the interrogation of ghosts, beating them up a fair bit; i.e., during theatrical violence concerned with harm that lacks the capacity to inflict lasting damage¹⁴⁶)!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Such is the stuff of forbidden love, for Gothic authors and actors; i.e., making tongue-in-cheek love (courtship) to demon lovers and their castled haunts during an evocatively carceral (dungeon-style) reversal of the classic abjection process: a verboten, outrageous, Numinous space (chronotope) of the gods—one whose dump(er) site we invoke with swears concerning taboo subjects, be those forbidden objects, personas or divinities (e.g., "shit," "fuck," "What the hell?" "Holy Saint Francis!" or "What in God's name?" etc). It's an intense, regressive ¹⁴⁵ Also spelled "fairy," and referred to as bean sidhe, which translates to "fairy woman/woman of the burial mounds"; i.e., often to a royal degree; e.g., a faerie queen or princess—classically of the otherworld, netherworld, Numinous beyond, Hell, etc. I'll be sticking to "faerie" for the most part, just to keep things consistent (and because "fairy" often sounds daintier than "faerie"; e.g., fairy princess).

¹⁴⁶ Including verbal abuse; e.g., the speedrunner Bubzia cursing out the boos from Mario 64 during a blindfolded run: "You... stupid, piece-of-shit ghost!" ("I DESTROYED This Blindfolded SM64 Speedrun," 2024; timestamp: 19:55)

place that bears out similar energies between God and the Devil, the two mentioned both in the same breath and when alluding to other inhuman(e) dynasties with a Frankensteinian stamp using the ghost of the counterfeit: a world that—under capital's constant alienation and fetishization of nature—has become alien, but also descriptively and prescriptively vengeful towards the perceived order by the perceived disorder!

In the Faustian tradition, it also becomes like a carnival ride, one made with unequal, forbidden exchange and radical transformation using basic materials (re: clay or something comparable, like dead flesh); i.e., in pursuit of fatal knowledge versus power (two sides of the same dark coin). Promethean or Faustian, it's gratuitous, egregious, formerly accepted and currently beyond the pale owing to the abjection process—to go to an old, dislocated sphere to see the truth at home with forbidden sight; i.e., by making, summoning or otherwise digging up said truths through derelict archaeologies (the Gothic retro-future/found-yet-forged document) and likenesses: a jilted bride of Hell/the dungeon, a horny queen taking us prisoner for funsies in her anti-home!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Such sight, in the Gothic tradition, is always dualistic, liminal, concentric, ergodic, and anisotropic (re: castle-narrative), but also morphological and ouroborotic, intimating fearsome-but-desirable things beyond ourselves using ourselves; i.e., felt during a recursive mise-en-abyme, the castle-like whore or whore-like castle (the Medusa) seen pareidolically from the front or the back in ways that—when made, summoned, or found; clothed or naked, kawaii or kowai, alive or slain, unvanquished or ravished, and viewed from all angles like a gleeful parody of Picasso's arrogant cubism, above—begin to suggest the angry whole of a furious Mother Earth (the wandering womb a traveling castle that, hyperobject, moves in stillness): to conjure up the chronotope's half-real, hauntological feelings of abjected, monstrous-feminine things, during the cryptonymy process! Policed, the whore paradoxically has her revenge by acting out her rape to revenge (as normally delivered by police violence) from state targets. There's always more to see, but also a state position to occupy and subvert in dualistic terms!

Blood libel, in that respect, speaks canonically through the monomyth language of persecution, rape and revenge (the whore's or the pimp's) afforded to undead, demonic and/or animalistic monstrous-feminine qualities that—in canonical stories—reliably frame, instigate and perform witch hunts inside/outside themselves; e.g., Beowulf, Frankenstein, or Dracula as things to hunt down by heroic forces; i.e., as a recruitment device meant to defend capital from invented enemies "of nature," the former seeking and destroying the latter onstage and off.

In turn, said execution unfurls in abject territories while abusing unironic forms of DARVO-style terror language, all before ultimately seceding dark ownership of "stolen" colonial gains, thereby restoring a fallen state to its "rightful" sovereignty's heteronormative reproductive order/the nuclear model: as rescued from the witch tempting the whore's revenge by exposing her Numinous figure (re: anal sex, but also Amazonian muscle, below). You gotta start somewhere when healing from rape, and we Gothic Communists explore such things to subvert them—to "gang along" with the devil in some shape or form; i.e., ourselves, often seen wearing animal masks and costumes, but also sporting powerful, semi-to-fully-naked bodies, above and left—walking castles whose war-like fortresses promote "harm" as paradoxically pleasurable: to wage war as sex-positive-yet-fierce, at times being rather literal in its campy morphological puns and playful gallows humor cheekily lampooning abjection as a whole. The bigger the "castle," the bigger the harvest; the bigger the "threat," the greater the punchline/payoff.

(artist: Dzenrei Art)

Reverse abjection, then, is still a form of courtship with harvested things—of forbidden monster love (and sex) expressing as unequal, forbidden exchange to explore in people and place as taboo, vulgar and, at times, crude (re: Walpole and Lewis).

The iconoclastic idea is the paradoxical threat of "danger" where no danger can occur but which the feeling of danger is abundant, famously evoked through traps, monsters and atmosphere, but also animated miniatures and colossal fakeries suggesting the potential occupation of a ruinous legendary home. Such things can subvert this and reverse that during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., to illustrate power in the hands of the dom or the sub. The classic irony of the dom is they serve the sub under "perilous" boundaries of mutual consent; but power defines through exchange, wherein one is meaningless without the other! Desire goes both ways during oppositional praxis—the Gothic infamously dualistic, hence visually and at times praxially ambiguous!

Concluding our food for thought, I wish to supply several (seven) boundary-setting points before we proceed onto the main exhibits themselves.

First, for the sake of simplicity and time, "See You in Hell" is focusing on faeries and demon mommies (of, again, the "witch" blood libel class); i.e., as functionally dominant during a collaborative exercise/postcolonial debate, but it's not difficult to turn the tables; e.g., by a sub who tops from below, a dom who bottoms from the top (the "power bottom"), or switches doing either role, etc—they reify not by appearance but through the function of unequal exchange, first and foremost. Said Titania to her faerie train about Nick Bottom, "Tie up my lover's tongue. Bring him silently" (source). As such, we "enslaved" are quick to agree, surrendering control to please those we love. Demon BDSM has universal application and adaptability in this respect, but again—our focus is on dominant aesthetics through faeries and demons.

(artist: Bottru)

Second, "See You in Hell" was originally just "Trial by Fire," the former written concerning the postcolonial subversion—and cryptonymic revelation/concealment of—captive (thus rape/death) fantasies through swole' demon mommies. I've since expanded this to faerie queens in a second exhibit, placed first, called "Darkness Visible." Faerie or demon, we're essentially talking about femme doms of a gentle/strict variety (often hyphenated to allow for softer visual elements merged with vaso vagal ones), which effectively promote a more overtly hellish, otherworldly and Promethean ("of the gods") version of Amazons, and employ similar aesthetic devices of terror. This includes their mighty monstrous-feminine bodies, but also the sodomy those bodies promise to inflict during ludo-Gothic BDSM (and its own threats of controlled, operatic, palliative-Numinous regression); i.e., made to camp canon, thus anisotropically reverse capital's usual terrorist/counterterrorist polarities (re: its trifectas, monopolies and qualities). We're left, then, with witch-like beings of dark power from powerful places beyond normal perception; re: faerie queens/monarchs the likes of which we've written about before, revisiting them again here (exhibit 44a1a1b1), before the original demon mummies exhibit on courtly love, 44a1a1b2.

(artist: Iulaandrea)

To that, while the original exhibit (44a1a1b2) concerns fiery muscular examples to deal in dark desire, I wanted to preface that with some additional non-muscular examples of faerie queens (exhibit 44a1a1b1): kidnapper beings of darkness visible; re: "changelings," but also goblins, vampires and witches fulfilling a similar doppelganger abduction (alien imposter), blood libel role; i.e., who take their prey—often women and children, but also weaker men—to underwater places (watery graves/sunken palaces) under demon-lover torture scenarios; e.g., presumed cannibalism, bloodletting and rape/revenge play. These happen with Amazons, faeries, Medusa and similar monstrous-feminine as "hysterical" (re: phallic women/Archaic Mothers) that secure some sense of nature's revenge for workers to paradoxically enjoy when the vulnerable, thus exposed or otherwise adjacent to power as something to embrace, do just that; i.e., when hugging the alien (re: Medusa, but also her avatars like Giger's xenomorph, above)—namely through proximity with power and death in classically demonic ways (re: exchange, transformation, revenge, creativity [magic/mad science] and desire, etc). Per the vengeful, monstrous-feminine whore, nature's revenge is the reversal of abjection; i.e., one that occurs generally through the theatrically indecent exposure of rebellious nudity and the feverish, murky embrace of the blood libel, sodomy and witch hunt¹⁴⁷ charges: those that, camped by us, show the state/capital (and its monopolies, trifectas and qualities' bid for legitimacy/warped notions of justice through us-versus-them argumentation) to be entirely false!

Divorced from state authorship, such faerie monarchs are still categorically violent in light of police violence against nature as monstrous-feminine (or otherwise concern the performance of categorical violence); their campy usage still concerns universal liberation using half-real Gothic poetics about kidnapping and courtly love through impostor dialogs and dark desire interrogating creative bids for legitimacy. Even so, "Darkness Visible" before "Trial by Fire" is less focused around forbidden love through overtly postcolonial rhetoric, and more on ludo-Gothic BDSM (the language of capture healing from rape) that could be applied to such arguments. This faerie encore's momentum include participants like Annabel Morningstar (who will feature in this exhibit a lot, below) and some of my other friends, who I've included to be holistic (and because I frankly love mommy doms and want to expand the umbrella¹⁴⁸ a bit, through their help).

¹⁴⁷ Blood libel, sodomy and witchcraft are all classically criminal charges against non-Christian bodies of the medieval world, which would segue into queerphobia in the 1700s and beyond, under capital (re: "Leaving the Closet; or, a Trans Woman's Scholarly Contributions to Older Histories of Sodomy and Queer Love," 2024). So while witch hunts classically targeted Pagan cis women, blood libel targeted Jews, and sodomy targeted homosexual men, these have been reconfigured under neoliberal, late-stage Capitalism; i.e., to select rebellious monstrous-feminine groups in bad-faith, pitting those against good-faith groups using the same aesthetic one is colonizing and the other decolonizing.

Indeed, I could raise as many cathedrals/castles-in-the-flesh as I—but also my friends and their body parts—want; i.e., my directing of what they ultimately want to articulate during ludo-Gothic BDSM: as powerful, independent, and sex-positive monsters, achieving paradoxical liberation through reclaimed, ironic bondage (and other BDSM devices), but also unironically caged by state forces struggling to contain us (re: exploitation and liberation not simply existing on the same stages, but whose punitive language is used by both sides [workers and the state] to entrap or emancipate nature as monstrous-feminine with nature as monstrous-feminine).

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

Beyond our doing so in "Darkness Visible," I wholly expect you to be able to do what I do/raise your own golems, gargoyles and Galatea in the same Medusa refrain (always in Pygmalion's Shadow); i.e., once critical thought, as a process, is intuitively understood, the ability to observe and/or perform it, yourselves, becomes infinite in form, using the same aesthetics (of power and death, darkness and revenge) to liberate what the state uses to enslave. During oppositional praxis, function determines function as a matter of flow regarding power moving towards or away from workers; re: through our hands developing Gothic Communism, we can throw the doors of perception wide to reveal hidden truths beyond Capitalist Realism—by using darkness visible differently than the state. The trick is dialectical-material scrutiny achieving intelligence and awareness (consciousness) as second-nature, said status acquired through praxial synthesis; re: on a daily level, our variable exchanges cultivating good social-sexual habits through what we create and encourage as extensions of our demonic, rebellious, genderqueer and emancipated selves: the hellish, awesome power of creation setting nature free, the magic outlaw/dark faerie/cyborg freak/rival power running wild by our making of monsters—for workers, not profit!

¹⁴⁸ Limited by human imagination and desire (for sex, revenge, and other policed areas), which is to say, completely unlimited save how capital shapes our ability to imagine and how we, as workers, challenge that.

Gothic Communism, as the ensuing non-fiey examples shall hopefully demonstrate, is a group operation, one that works as much through tactile, wet, vitalistic intuition (concerning deities of dark vengeful nature) as by dry thesis and reinforcement through clinical detachment. But there's always room to work thesis materials in; i.e., by the reader long after this module is published!

Third, I wrote "Trial by Fire" before writing "Reclaiming Amazons," but the framed thesis in that portion—about anal sex/general sodomy as a terror weapon couched within the whore's counterterrorist revenge through the classic poetic function of demons—is still at work in this older writing's liminal expression; i.e., in between the frame and framer's Wonderland, shifting incessantly back and forth across space and time.

Everyone loves the whore and her wanton, naughty and at-times-bloody revenge. In turn, rituals thrive on repetition, Gothic Communism developing through frequencies that synapse along active-if-cloaked circuits of data; demons, as the classic granters of forbidden wishes, generally tie to power expressed in places, people and roleplay scenarios that speak to radically altering ourselves, including how power is framed and performed. As we'll see, this includes Annabel's dark faerie queen (or my other friends) envisioned by me during a mutual, informed labor exchange and exhibit; i.e., generally through dark, unequal, forbidden exchange (of power and knowledge) that—when used actively and intelligently in counterterrorist forms—thwarts profit through Amazons and anal, whose dark animal tortures dark faeries and demon mommies certainly embody (taking their prey back to their lairs).

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

In short, they capture their "victims" and take them to dark realms of desire attached to pre-capitalist modes of thought, which Gothic Communism uses to recultivate a cultural understanding of the imaginary past through a rising emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, cultural and racial awareness; re: an intersectional, solidarized pedagogy of the oppressed, illustrating mutual consent (through informed labor exchange and sex-positive art) achieving praxial synthesis on the daily during opposition praxis: using iconoclastic art to achieve universal liberation for all work sexualized under capital, and to become stewards of the natural world we protect from the state as enemy to all life on planet Earth.

Revolution (and its dark cargo and romance) is an exercise in totality. Arbitrated through play and art, its liminal refrain—whose patented break from routine during holistic study and Gothic, monstrous-feminine dualism—seeks to gradually and collectively expose a system of harm designed to conceal itself through sex and force pimping nature in duality. Every monster they make or cage is legitimate through the giving and receiving of state force, ours always illegitimate (re: Weber). Both sides require the language—by them to hunt us and by us to acknowledge we are being hunted, which we can reclaim during genocide and its moral panics/witch-hunt dialogs of persecution, caution and revenge; i.e., through poetic likenesses that hide our function among shared, oppositional subterfuge: the oppression of witches, which faeries and demon mummies essentially are!

We camp canon because we must; we play with the imaginary past through vice characters like demon mummies and dark faeries—i.e., in order to expose what is happening to people currently inside the state of exception, at home and abroad. They lend a voice to canonical fears blowing things out of proportion, worker counterterror exposing state terror through the same dialogs thereof: the witch treated as terrorist by the state looking to control nature with—all of which we subvert using what we got!

For us, such creatures stick out during the cryptonymy process, seemingly to blend in through Gothic as commonplace, vulgar and summoned vis-à-vis Radcliffe's evil castles/rape anxieties (fears of the ancient/medieval world including incest and pedophilia linked to straight people scapegoating homosexual men for practices that undoubtedly occurred in the historical past, but were committed far more commonly by straight-practicing patriarchs). Under Pax Americana, "Hell is a place that always appears on Earth (or an Earth-like double)"; rape is predominantly a white, straight male/tokenized crime committed against innocent female parties, children, the elderly and people of color/queer people, etc. In turn, rape victims aren't only not believed but often attacked because they threaten property by being witness to their property-owning fathers', husbands' and boyfriend's (or normalized token) crimes and deceptions protected by state devices: courts, cops, and copaganda. The justice system exists to predominantly engender rape, not prevent it (and movements created by marginalized groups are co-opted and abused by white victims; e.g., #MeToo)! All become things to reconcile; i.e., by relating back and forth through intersectional solidarity's pedagogy of the oppressed healing from rape in the shadow of all police violence!

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

Fourth, I won't have time to reinsert many of these positions into "Darkness Visible" or "Trial by Fire" (and their symposium approach's conversational style). But you may apply them yourselves as you go; e.g., "Trial by Fire" is about postcolonial monster sex adjacent to Amazonian power fantasies evoked through the threat of campy sodomy and exquisite "torture." Ergo, it should be easy enough to apply my anal Amazon thesis to demon mommies as a kind of dark monster mother well at home in ludo-Gothic BDSM; re:

The state only tolerates the problematic love of Amazons and anal when their challenge (to the ancient canonical laws) is nominal; i.e., provided they serve profit in canonical terror language. As something to combine, but also canonize in different performances, anal is a place and parlance of trauma to give and receive through tokenized enforcers dressed up as savage warriors—Amazons being a half-real theatrical device forever trapped between genuine rebellion and false, targeting vulnerable body parts in vulnerable areas (e.g., the bathroom). Things like Amazons and anal, then, canonically binarize to best give or receive state force (mainly police violence) pursuant to profit. To challenge profit and Capitalist Realism on and offstage, workers must camp state terror inside of itself—anisotropically with Amazons and anal to reverse terror/counterterror with subversive irony during liminal expression.

[...] Demons aren't satisfied with vanilla sex; they play with "darker" forms to weaponize them as a form of transformative exchange: an eye-opening experience/revelation, insofar as anal isn't purely abject, but something to reverse and embrace during the dialectic of the alien [...] to take anal back is to take the land (and labor) back from these performative elements and their associate structures and enforcers by camping them [...]:

subversive Amazons and anal rerouting the usual flow/ordering of power on the Aegis.

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

Fifth, the flavor of "I'll See You in Hell" is closer to my Poetry Module, and will reference a lot of its ideas using a similar style of discourse.

Sixth, I've decided to preserve the original parenthetical-italic formatting of each exhibit.

Seventh, the subject of rape play comes up extensively in this exhibit, but especially the dark faerie portion. The performative, didactic idea, as always, is to heal from rape by camping it as the Gothic (and its fakeries) historically do—by helping survivors heal from trauma with "trauma"; re: through ludo-Gothic BDSM putting "rape" in quotes, effectively playing with rape during calculated risk (monsters) to help the traumatized relax, but also fight back by surviving and thriving despite our abusers harming us!

So anytime I mention "ludo-Gothic BDSM," I'm referring to healing from rape through play (with monsters like dark faeries, who represent rape in some shape or form); and vice versa, "healing from rape" or general faerie/demon poetics and roleplay (often with big toys and a royal-size "dark" aesthetic, below) likewise denote "ludo-Gothic BDSM" as a penetrative death analog (re: ahegao). Tied to Great Change, it's the whore out in the open—similar to a bean sidhe or Medusa's snakes except her pussy's doin' the talking! Little death, big implications!

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

In short, each expresses the other and the imaginary willpower of state forces raping nature for profit, whereupon our healing from rape to stymie profit (when illustrating mutual consent behind cryptonymic safety buffers) is the whore's ultimate revenge; i.e., while paradoxically exposed through vulnerable nudity and dark, semi-naked threats, camping state terror weapons during the cryptonymy process (with Amazonian nudity being invulnerable, to some extent, and "darkness" being clothed and naked at the same time, etc). Through it, roleplayers synonymize playtime and "rape" haunted by actual abuse/token betrayal, wherein our poetic devices help achieve some sense of autonomy. In doing so, they likewise help us acclimate to markers of trauma and abuse, inside/outside ourselves; i.e., as an ongoing lived reality to regain power through theatrical disempowerment, whereupon we "threaten" ourselves with campy psychosexual versions of state abuse; re (from "A Rape Reprise"): "rape is something that demons play with during the whore's paradox. By extension, ludo-Gothic BDSM is effectively rape play combined with Gothic themes and BDSM practices to avenge state wrongs against nature" (source).

Theory aside (e.g., reversing abjection), the whole point of said "exquisite 'torture'" is to help past, present and future rape¹⁴⁹ victims heal from the lasting physical, mental and emotional, etc, effects (e.g., the prey mechanisms of rape: fight, flight, fawn, freeze and flop) caused by capital doing what capital does. This means not just by rape's actual penetrative violence, but by the ongoing threats of imaginary penetration and other kinds of violence besides overtly sexual (e.g., carceral, corporal or verbal abuse), and which the state normally supplies to menticide its victims (extending from single people to entire cultures and places); i.e., before, during and after a given event, constituting an ongoing pimping of nature/policing it as alien whore: to keep raping nature-as-monstrous-feminine, while simultaneously pacifying and antagonizing it through threats of rape causing generational abuse! Rape is torture and terror to keep nature under the state's boot; emancipation, to rise up from Hell to speak apocalyptically with such things.

¹⁴⁹ Refer to "A Rape Reprise" for my definitions of rape, themselves lifted from the Poetry Module's "A Note About Rape/Rape Play" and "Psychosexual Martyrdom").

(artist: Annabel Morningstar)

The reality of rape victims is that everyone can be a victim under capital, but seldom to the same degree (many simply live under conditions where rape is more possible for them, but not foregone). Furthermore, such things are alien to many and experienced differently per side (re: Volume One's "Healing from Rape"); i.e., rape is a weapon of terror whose fresh evocation frightens anew, but also carries with it a great deal of shame, self-hatred, fear and secrecy projected onto other victims (many cops, de facto or actual, were once victims, themselves). By extension, rape survivors trigger at threats that are, to some degree, imaginary and lived; being able to control the time and place of these half-real interactions, but also depth, size, speed and relative nudity involved (above and left) can be intensely therapeutic and educational for ourselves and others—can help everyone gain some sense of voice, thus expert testimony through ourselves and our shared labor exchanges, playfully illustrating mutual consent during rape play!

That's the paradox of rape, thus the whore; to heal from rape, you must evoke it during calculated risk. Normally alienated by capital, but sold back to us in purely exploitative forms, our subversive remanufacture of such things can help us systemically combat internal-externalized fears and stigmas, thus avoid self-destruction while rebuilding trust through tailor-made boundaries (re: Cuwu and dialectical behavior therapy incorporated into Gothic Communism); i.e., while learning to be at peace with our strange appetites acquired by life under capital, using said dialogs of mastery to become self-sufficient. To change our socio-material conditions overtime (thus raise emotional/Gothic intelligence and class, culture and race awareness) requires active, consciously informed consent through teamwork changing the rules of acceptable behavior and discourse; e.g., Annabel and I negotiating everything that went into this exhibit; i.e., reclaiming our collective time and space, but also means of production to think with, poetry to play with, and bodies to control ourselves (thereby reducing the odds of rape, which is all profit really is). That's what good praxis is all about!

Got all that? Enough foreplay, then! First up is our dark faerie collab—one enacted between myself and different models. Embodying different monstrous-feminine qualities embedded in Gothic, it has been funded by me to endorse our rights (as sex workers) in times of state decay and witch hunts. Consider our work representative; i.e., of wild, unruly nature performing its dark revenge: bringing fairyland home to the conqueror through the campy language of sex and force, our healing from rape (as a state terror weapon) relaid in darkness visible!

Darkness Visible: Dark Faeries (feat. Annabel Morningstar, Harmony Corrupted, Romantic Rose, The Witch, and more)

"Wouldst thou like to live deliciously?"

—Black Phillip, The Witch (2015)

Before we start our exhibit on dark faeries, a small tangent on Puritanism and Satan, followed by a few aesthetic notes on dark faeries (about eleven pages)...

As I've already expressed, "Darkness Visible" is a collaboration of common whores—one seeking to penetrate, thus escape, Capitalist Realism through transformative theatrical exchange; i.e., as dark faeries do, meaning unequally through sudden capture and rapid transportation, magically ferrying their prey beyond normal spheres and into forbidden netherworlds mirroring the faerie's diurnal counterparts: a nightly place of dreams (often a cave, lake or forest) housing dark desires that are either entirely naked (as faeries often are) or veiled by an oppressive society that normally forbids them to ordinary folk, but hangs in front of to endlessly taunt said folk with (and hypocritically perjure/scapegoat themselves); i.e., with darkness visible, meaning a paradoxically charged, opaque surface that—per Segewick's imagery of the surface, but also Radcliffe's infamous Black Veil (and the forest and castle that house veil and veiled alike)—threatens exposure to hostile alien forces similar to more a diaphanous material. Like a pair of magic panties, our investment pulls this veil aside to show you the goods; i.e., to root out harmful prudes by appreciating what we, as people, have become alienated from by capital and must refamiliarize ourselves with through demonic trade; re: exquisite "torture"; e.g., the faerie's fat, functionally non-white ass: large, immodest, and succulent—a demon lover's darkness visible helping us live deliciously!

(artist: Nyx)

In doing so, our interest pointedly lies in faerie rulers, meaning those capable of royal enforcement and divine internment, but also medieval pomp-and-circumstance of a similar grandiose scale; re: courtly love. To it, faerie transformation concerns more than bodily changes¹⁵⁰, but that of otherworldly scenery reminiscent of one's home made alien by a regal Numinous presence. Transpiring through forced relocation as a matter of unequal exchange that faeries are known for in popular stories, such creatures lead a double life. As you will see, so do we (sex workers often moonlight; survival sex workers toil in broad daylight, forced to suffer judgment by society at large policing whores).

¹⁵⁰ This being said, Black Phillip is known as a goat who turns into a man; i.e., as the ominous black curtain Eggers torments the audience with and eventually pulls aside, stripping everyone naked. We'll explore anthropomorphism and "skin-changing" much more in "Call of the Wild."

Trotted out in pulp media, the process of abjection likewise reinvents Satan as someone who, once bastardized from Pagan culture¹⁵¹, must be kept "in check"

¹⁵¹ The Gothic, as usual, is obsessed with old, vengeful sites/rites of return; i.e., by nature and those "of it" reclaiming the land and the colonial home from current imposters. The reappearance of faerie royals speaks to a postcolonial, hauntological apocalypse where old kings and queens closer to nature, but also their dark gods, come home to roost; i.e., by reminding Christians they never left—that they were never exterminated, thus seek dislocated, aged and alien-faerie revenge from across the sea and into the New World (witches behaving similar to Dracula, but also goblins in this respect, the Puritans having been chased out of England to punch down against older colonial victims: not the Irish and the Catholics or Jewish people, but the witches of Celtic myth borrowed from Samhain and other druidic harvest rituals).

Satan is one such faerie—a dark wishmaster tempting Puritan girls with liberation, till they wither from old age/exposure and become his wicked hags. The harvest is poor for the girl's family because they're all on the menu and she, possessed by the *bean sidhe spirit of heretics (the ancient victim/rival of English fanaticism) is killing them, one by one; re: the grim harvest, the revenge of the Corn Lady on those normally holding the sickle!

*Myth commonly occupies a xenophobic track. Bean sidhe—according to English myth demonizing the pre-Teutonic and pre-Norman Celts into the Irish Catholics and secular Irish—were considered a death omen; their shrill, unruly cries, similar to the Medusa's gaze, were thought to be able to strike the listener dead, once heard! In short, the rage of such ghosts is a black mirror to strike the guilty dead for having stayed silent about rape while alive! It's a tool of monstrous-feminine revenge, which the colonizer uses against their usual victims; i.e., by turning them into DARVO-style bogeywomen for not killing home rule with kindness! It's tone-policing tampering with the witness, calling their testimony "poison" to alienate them [divide and conquer].

The purpose of the witch, then, is to carry the Puritan's guilt of imperial inheritance, which balloons through their own self-righteousness and overdependence; i.e., on invented enemies to aggrandize themselves and rape the land they abject onto their new area of divine providence (whose perceived criminality watches them through the witch's uncanny animal familiars, framing the American Indigenous in a New England light). The daughter is possessed not by xenoglossia, then, but by anarchist wish fulfillment; i.e., to destroy her family, who she resents as the real criminals; e.g., her teenage brother lusting after her, but also her demented mother slut-shaming her.

In turn, the witch embodies the Sphinx' Riddle turned on its head, the witch of youthful whore and aged crone hidden inside the mind of an increasingly vengeful maiden evoking the witch at her annoying twin siblings: "But I am that very witch!" She's a dog soldier guerilla, warring from the shadows; i.e., by changing shape and size, but also age to embody and invoke mass hysteria—the Puritan's weapon of choice—against them. Lurking in twilight between day and night, familial suspicion convinces her own flesh and blood that she commands nature and dark wishes to turn the Puritans against each other and, in the process, use terror weapons to ultimately undo the bloodline of nature's enemies; she's an imposter for what the Puritans call "enemy" (re: Milton's "arch-fiend") having chased them out of house and home (the characters—pariahs themselves, banished by a colony of heretics—are often homesick) and denying it to them, here, in a hauntologized, pre-colonial America: the destruction of the nuclear home by its "anti" double changeling.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Per black/white us versus them and the dialectic of shelter and the alien, nature is criminal invading the Puritans' sense of unsteady home. Satan, in that respect, might seem like Charles Manson and the witch as one of his Manson girls; i.e., bog-standard Gothic, but haunted by genocide as the ghost of the counterfeit. Closer to the mark, he's a terrorist fighting for land back, dressed up as a gangster/pimp the Puritans can recognize dancing on their graves! Classic centrist projection (of moral teams), and yet the Gothic works through allegory to secret critical thought into viewers' brains. Eggers stays comfortably inside the Puritan fear space, but despite this semblance of white moderacy devotes the entirety of its runtime to crucify them; i.e., as a black parody of their values, speaking in the language of morality to hoist them on their own petards. It's a witch hunt, one where the witch hunts the witch hunters. It's intensely critical of the Puritans, lambasting them in a classic, New-England, Hawthornean polemic obsessed with Salem's awful reputation and desire for revenge! There are no good witches in Eggers' film; just black witches having their revenge.

In turn, Eggers' film is directed at current-day Puritans-by-another-name: Christian nationalists. The victims of the film think themselves righteous, undeserving of violence, but from our perspective they're the most radical and delusional of them all. They do it to themselves, while those most often forced into monstrous-feminine, scapegoat positions retreat from family life; i.e., as having been designed, from the start, to harm insubordinate, tokenized women, and for which they seek the whore's black, monstrous-feminine revenge against; e.g., the opening "baby-mashing" scene being phallic and vaginal, the witch's pestle-like broom and mortar-like bowl an Archaic Mother's vagina dentata wielded by a phallic woman making chunky baby batter (above) with her enemies' spawn (terror weapons include horror—to invoke disgust and dehumanize one's victims); re: Lady Macbeth: "Come to my woman's breasts, / And take my milk for gall, you murth'ring ministers, / Wherever in your sightless substances / You wait on Nature's mischief!" It's an identity and taboo (unthinkable*) act of defiance told through monstrous argument—the land defending itself from Divine Right and Manifest Destiny by reversing abjection at the source: wolfing down the next-in-line! "Stare and tremble!" Matthew Lewis is alive and well (whose novel, The Monk, also features a famous scene with a dead rotting baby crawling with worms)!

With infanticide DARVO being a classic weapon of settler colonists, who use their women and children as human shields. The witch reduces the baby (whose pregnancy historically embodies a threat of death and enslavement to married and unmarried women, alike) as something to render down and empower her disgusting revenge (death from the skies)! Furthermore, the wet slapping sound of the witch's broom during the infanticide scene plays later in the film; i.e., when the then-widowed mother "turns," seeking revenge against the surviving daughter—by accusing her of seducing father and son! Incest and infanticide, Horace Walpole's Mysterious Mother once again leaps to mind!*

So if you find yourself chilled and quaking in the witch's indeterminate presence and feeling sorry for the Puritans (who are made by Eggers to be as incompetent and unlikeable as possible), it's merely a reminder of your own privileged position wreathed in ghostly counterfeit, but also the call of the void towards more humane orders of existence couched in barbarity. That's what dark faeries classically portend, however unsightly they come to us in our dreams (re: like Satan, disguised as a

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

in Christianized spheres by strip-teasing him; i.e., by abusing the same poetics through pornographic dogma, wherein state Gothic canonically lands the Devil in hot water. "The Devil," not the state, tempts maidens to prostitute themselves—to disrobe, forsake God and destroy the nuclear family vis-à-vis a Puritan reimagining of Hammer of Witches (1478) and blood libel. Commonly devised to accuse disobedient women of "witchcraft," such pogroms extend state slander and DARVO into circular myth; i.e., urban legends tarring proto-feminism, queerness and Pagan religions with the same cruel, half-real brush, forsaking these groups into latter-day persecution networks, confessional refrains, and idiotic-but-effective canards; e.g., the drinking of infant blood and eating of their flesh perverting Catholic mass, all while using the leftover fat in flying ointments the witch can lubricate her "broom" with, then levitate through unholy orgasm (and phallic-woman histrionics).

According to the settlers, all this happens in service to Satan; i.e., as something to (de/an)ounce and defame through outrageous innuendo and ghost stories—their counterfeits' haunting aggrandizing God and Manifest Destiny while beset by the Wild as something to colonize all over again: nature "gone wild," thus savage, impure, and fallen out of a canonically essential pastoral imposed by moral arbiters "grown lax" and paranoid (thus punished by God through Satanic caricature, isolation, and ultimately Malthusian outcomes: starvation, disease, war and death). Satan is the Puritans' imaginary friend (there are no Indians, in The Witch, the Puritans talking only to themselves while they slowly go mad/starve to death).

A chaste maiden symbolize state dominance; her liberation, through uncontrolled prostitution, is cataclysmic—i.e., the Devil "wins" the moment the state's baby factories refuse a prescribed burden of care (and when men abjure the same rapacious gender binary, but I digress). Instead, they're saddled with outrageous entitlement, yet faced with such vituperative and bogus claptrap since birth. So it should come as little surprise when state daughters frequently go mad from threats of exile, rape and execution—that they spontaneously strip naked and run to the hills, almost eager to sin! Debutantes delighting in sodomy and other witchy things, their criminal's whispered and limitless debauchery cloaks in the dead of night; i.e., as things partially imaginary to repeatedly assault the righteous with, the latter's menticed brains visualizing profligates who won't put out for them (the abjection process, during the dialectic of shelter and the alien, fears nature as hungry for superstitious Puritans, all while allegedly "transing their kids" to hug Medusa: through hauntological gender trouble that ruffles police feathers, centuries later).

For the state and its self-policing populace, faeries amount to a fearmongering of wasted wombs, a binarization thereof that puts the colonizers at toad to tempt Eve in her sleep): to pour sweet poison in our ears, and cloud our eyes with crystal darkness!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

the top; i.e., during military urbanism and optimism crusading against invented, us-versus-them evils draining state essence—predominantly the right to control female bodies, but also anything that isn't a white, cis-het, Christian male in order to maintain patriarchal sway over state territories and populations; re: anything monstrous-feminized by the state pimping nature-as-alien for fear of nature's revenge in kind. But for workers seeking emancipation, faeries—but especially dark, royal faeries—communicate the desire to not only visibly resent our dominators (and their self-righteous bullshit), but slice them to ribbons; i.e., during the cryptonymy process, bristling with fury the elite cannot hope to contain through the same dark devices' double operation, showing and concealing a plethora of apocalypses.

"If you wrong us, shall we not revenge?" wrote the Bard, but nudity is the whore's weapon; i.e., as a mode of endless moral panic, "hysteria" compelled through state force—a thing to dismiss and preach in equal measure. Policing it doesn't historically work, the whore's glee being a maiden set free while dancing on her captors' graves: "Get fucked, Mom! Way to go, Dad!" Through the usual Promethean anisotropic (re: Hawthorne), the Puritans were the victims worthy of punishment (the witches hunting the witch hunters)!

In this sense, The Witch is hardly unique in its morbid fascination with a Gothic puritanical, including its fatal-when-viewed nostalgia and sinister two-way applications. Plenty of stories give the guilty a place to go and commit venal sins for or against the state; i.e., through Gothic "thought crimes" walking the tightrope between outright vandal and fascist vigilante; e.g., the tank-like T-800 from The Terminator compelling a similar act of revenge to Egger's titular witch that, instead of policing the usual groups with state force, animates like Walpole's armor to blast an entire police station to bits¹⁵²:

Per my arguments, such thoughts are fertilized by revolutionary cryptonymy inside the Gothic mode's

¹⁵² Cameron doing so in the style of the noir and Western, but also zombie film turning the police into a victim of their own abuses come back to haunt them; i.e., from the tech-noir retro-future! Doing so carries a rebellious signature (if not downright conviction, in Cameron's case) because the slasher's normal, canonical usage is to scare teenagers into not having extramarital sex; i.e., while being a guilty pleasure that, among couples married or not, is used to excite particular fears and, sure enough, raise libido in times of perceived danger/elevated panic (with the heroes of the movie fucking while on the run from their tireless assassin). Per Hogel, the middle class eats that shit up (re: through various fandoms and refrains, above), driving the process of abjection to feed the profit motive.

unruly aspects; i.e., as something to witness and foment fresh rebellious sentiment with while reversing abjection (versus posture as such; re: Jameson's dismissal of the Gothic, who we'll talk about more towards the end of the module)!

Regardless, whatever devious wish fulfillment transpires with faerie transplants (to have nature's monstrous-feminine revenge by killing your whole annoying family and oppressive belief system; re: Eggers), these always happen in darkness. Specifically they unfold in darkness visible relaid through the perceived fairy palaces' royal decree; i.e., faeries are quite often monsters of a patrician standing and prestige summoned by mere mortals during the restless cryponymy process, but like the more plebian brethren they walk amongst are generally made to express proletarian longing—meaning through things that are closed off to begin with, and desired for that reason by different parties involved: the forbidden sight that darkness visible classically offers generally tied to a time and place known colloquially as "Hell."

In short, every monarchy has a ruler for which their voice is given more heed (through the dynastic orderings of power) than plain country folk. Such power is often—in the ancient tradition—borne through nudity as a kind of weapon that offends modern sensibilities (with Egger's witch often being nude, and Cameron's terminator and rebel soldier both arriving naked, too); i.e., a courting of power as something to take back by getting into the nudist spirit of things. To it, "Darkness Visible" considers ludo-Gothic BDSM and dark faeries through mutual action in pursuit of Hell's demonic powers; i.e., which my friends and I—Annabel, Nyx, Harmony and Rose (among others not shown here)—pointedly synthesize, wedding performance and labor exchange to the stimulating act of forbidden creation tied to public nudism; re: castles-in-the-flesh, each with its own qualities that I'll stress when exhibiting them (e.g., Nyx' ties to nature; Annabel, to cottagecore; Harmony and Rose, to BDSM and healing from rape; and Crow, to genderqueerness)!

(artists [clockwise, starting top-left]: Nyx, Romantic Rose, Harmony Corrupted, Annabel Morningstar, and Crow)

Except our exhibit, like Carroll's white rabbit, becomes something to follow deeper inside Wonderland acting as Plato's cave (a displaced, shadowy replica of the real world and its abuses lying in state). Reversing abjection, we strike conservative parties who view us "dead" merely by strutting our stuff with confidence, and all occur within/upon our naked bodies' "Aegis": from an oppressed, fateful voice, rising up from the dark corners of the West to resist, thus subvert, its cultural understanding of the imaginary past—all in favor of something more sex-positive taking said Wisdom's place; re: as a proletarian Superstructure.

Furthermore, our bare-and-exposed contingency demonstrates a collaborative push for a universal meta awareness—one raised through the dark faerie (ruler) aesthetic as its own "bad religion"; i.e., of larger historical-material trends we want to change through ourselves as monstrous-feminine in small, thus monopolized by virtue of sex, itself, being so heavily policed and censored at large. Canonized in ways that crowd the chronotope with a special kind of darkness visible, the nude sex and force of Gothic castles darken with the pitch blackness known to puritanical censor bars (and modest clothing's obscurantism). In turn, we highlight the absence of said bars on our bodies' exposure, but also that of state weaponry and bondage surrounding us, which the state generally won't censor!

The Gothic's concentric duality is notably crowded. By pushing it in a post-scarcity direction, we make a mockery of our colonizers' values, thus their upholding of said values through a dogmatic, platitudinal Gothic. This includes its fairytale wish fulfillment's dubious, disingenuous framing of the world; e.g., "Suffer not a witch to live" something to apprehend by us and—like the Rolling Stones' immortal song—happily "paint it black" through bean-sidhe dress-up and crossdress shenanigans camping the lot of 'em: "Look at the Straights, scared of a little pussy!" (with Cameron showing his own Amazonian, white-savior conservatism, having Skynet reportedly terrified of Sarah Connor's unborn son).

In doing so, we not only embody the sheer heights and plunging depths of fairytales through ourselves, but demonstrate the universal applicability of "darkness" during class war told through Gothic overture. Reclaiming its revolutionary power by punching up during the cryptonymy process (and its own infamous reliance on such things), we reify the dualistic language of sin, demon lovers and all-around vice characters through faeries. Playing them as suitably witch-like, thus invented, our collective aim is to exit the bottle¹⁵³ dressed as forgeries but also paradoxically naked disguises (with Hell being a Promethean place¹⁵⁴ to escape persecution and upend profit). In turn, this can be done by others, onstage and off, learning by our example; i.e., to give shape to dark places and persons where anyone can explore off-limit feelings and desires (so-called "yums" that many will "yuck"). Commonly expressed as monstrous-feminine, we are queenly and seeking revenge against the state fleecing us; re: wicked stepmothers and monarchs, but also truthsayers speaking in darkness visible: to our profound abuse and survival while naked, thus exposed to rape we must camp.

¹⁵³ E.g., Link, the Hero of Time from Zelda, capturing smaller faeries in bottles, but gaining boons at faerie fountains housing Great Faeries he cannot bottle (re: size difference)!

So concludes the preface on Puritanism, witches and Satanism (six pages, to haunt the remainder with a spectre of persecution). A couple more aesthetic notes, before we proceed; e.g., the intensity and size difference that faeries commonly evoke when performed; i.e., naked or not, their power feels naked in ways that generate a similar Numinous effect (to be bare and exposed before godly forces)!

Reminiscent of Shakespeare's Tamora, Queen of the Goths, but also Titania the Faerie Queen and Queen Mab, Milton's Satan, Galatea of the Pygmalion legend, Hecate, Medusa, etc—which our performances evoke in spirit if not actually their armies of goblins, wild animals, and Jewish-/queer-coded vampires, devils, succubae, etc—my friends and I humanize the harvest as faeries do: as beings of nature antagonized by state arguments into a kind of false tyrant threatening state rule. Often by speaking to repressed desires for liberation, these include counterterrorist action caged in vice-character stigma, bigotry and phobia! She's not just a whore, but a jinn—a wishmaster trading tit for tat (often with a sinister, evil-and-loving-it flavor); i.e., while carrying a castle-sized aura. Make something "too big" and it becomes titanically estranged, fully inhuman; our resident baddie is big to be sure but still relatively human-sized: a walking castle to parlay with, a dragon lady to slay during monomyth pastiche. She's a queen of terrors¹⁵⁵ to treat with—up close and personal, during the witching hour/grim harvest's liminal hauntology of war! Like a massive blaze, but one that doesn't visibly burn (which darkness visible does not), her presence notably sucks the room of oxygen: a dark faerie with batwings (and probably having a witch's familiar or two; i.e., stigma animals; e.g., a frowning toad, raven or black cat) emblemizing the whore in a position of power normally reversed for women having men's babies!

(artist: Persephone van der Waard)

¹⁵⁴ One of dark, vengeful, monstrous-feminine gods; re: Creed and Freud, vis-à-vis Medusa.

In regards to dark faeries, then, I often find it useful to think of them in parental terms (the Gothic chronotope being concerned with dynastic primacy and hereditary rites; re: Bakhtin). The wicked stepmother trope, for example, is both diegetically and non-diegetically stuck in the past; i.e., as a corporal-architectural means of dispelling present illusions and weaving fresh spells with, mise-en-abyme. It's a party/disco-like mood in structure's time and place (the opera) that queer people commonly relate to/with, one that capital claims to be beyond or otherwise above using themselves; i.e., their proponents serve profit, crafting ancient landowner-yet-undomesticated beings of capricious splendor who make war and turn our worlds upside-down, only to be laid low for their monstrous-feminine hubris. An egregore (concentration) versus an origin, the body-like castle (or castle-like body) appears seemingly ex nihilo, threatens, and then as all spectres of Marx do, it vanishes (or disintegrates).

(artist: Evul)

The Gothic is writ in disintegration. Our faerie-like potential (and flesh) works within the same poetic spheres' palliative Numinous, conveying some degree of enormity and psychosexual power (often height and heels; i.e., size difference and power imbalance beyond our sex organs; e.g., Gwendoline Christie's curiously chaste-but-imposing Lucifer from the 2022 Sandman adaptation, below—begging Key and Peele's "She tall, she tall" line from their 2012 "Karim and Jahar" skit). Instead of compelling state order through tragic-hero narratives, we make Miltonic Satanism conscious of the Devil's party to liberate nature-as-monstrous-feminine with; re: to ravish ironically by putting "rape" in the quotes of a Gothic fake laid bare!

In feudalistic terms, "sovereignty" was something to randomly assign to bodies that were, unto themselves, haunted by impostor syndrome overshadowed by tyrannical revenge, ruthless torture, dishonorable deeds (re: courtly love) and total conquest, but also boastful claims, grand adventure, nude fakery and murderous fantasy (fake princesses, cursed bloodlines, evil castles, pretend inheritance, uncertain ancestors, bastard children, long-lost siblings, and invented family trees, etc). As such, the Gothic historically litigates through fakery to forge sympathy for the Devil in any shape or size, but also configuration. The Gothic castle, then, is a site of alien invasion and pure illusion, one whose vanishing point leads into and (out from) "a place of concealment that stands on mere ashes of something not fully present." There, ambush and succor are friends, the "ancient" fake a thing to apotropaically ward off evil spirits less through genuine superstition and more through calculated risk acting curses out: the parent something to fabricate and fear in equal measure.

¹⁵⁵ Darkness and chaos being classically female; re: Jung's female chaos dragon.

Except the Devil, contrary to popular belief, has no advocate, and is something of an inkblot to qualify in different ways. Like Lucifer from Paradise Lost, dark faeries never fully assimilate/are always rivals challenging state forms regardless if they tokenize (re: "damned if you do, damned if you don't"); i.e., occupying the same shadow space as Nazis and using the same tumultuous aesthetic of power and death. Our destiny, then, becomes the ability to craft, thus choose, our fate as something to nakedly diverge away from state copies along the same medieval tracks of invented ancestry (re: Madoff).

As such, the faerie ruler is a Nazi-Communist whore (the world's oldest profession and enemy—the Medusa), but a powerful one—an indulgent, phallic walking fetish/perpetual thorn in the state's side vengefully taking what she wants when she wants (the virgin and the whore, the cult of the virgin queen¹⁵⁶), and someone whose anathematic ability to even want anything (female characters in Gothic fiction being historically passive and denied the right to open sexual appetites while surrounding by rape) the bourgeoisie will desperately try to reclaim by gentrifying the idea of desire/carrying it away from slaves (with women historically being slaves, and Christie's Satan being penned by Neil Gaiman, a sex pest masquerading as a queer ally): a fetish for the sissy to suckle, the female or GNC dom of nature chained to a straight male.

Envisioned by my friends and I, this exhibit tries to break from stage bondage while evoking unironic harm in campy genderqueer body language; i.e., by illustrating the dark faerie as monstrous-feminine liberator through darkness visible beyond its limited, capricious norms. By ransoming those persons holding our rights hostage, we supply a Trojan-Horse feller of empires, splendidly mendacious via the Gothic's giddy delight at reversing abjection (from Walpole and Lewis, onwards), and where power and trauma exist, hand-in-hand. While forged sanctuary notably contradicts the safe passage of (and through) a military home afraid of outsiders, we take the faerie ruler and flirt with disaster arranged—as it always is—by state instruments: sex as the most policed device in the world, second only to the Gothic and monsters; i.e., as poetic arguments that not only speak to our alienation, but with it to rehumanize ourselves!

¹⁵⁶ Re: Titania being a stand-in for Queen Elizabeth, a woman who never married or bore children, which Shakespeare, a gay man, envisioned as our aforementioned fairy queen from A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Sex is power—doubly so concerning faerie queens as things to express through reclaimed exploitation; re: our labor value, but also our symbolic value through our genders and sexuality qualified through appearance; e.g., skin color and size—with Crow having undeniably pale skin, but also an impeccable shapeliness to them that is anything but modest (next page). Together we trade in nudity and craft, my invigilation of Crow's assets (and willingness to disrobe for a good cause, below) speaking to subversive faerie monarchs well enough: go big or go home when satirizing our survived trauma! Context matters, as does the ability to explain it when illustrating mutual consent through public nudism.

(artist: Crow)

Except, while dark power's "denuding" classically threatens modesty in the state's hierarchy of values, it's a bit of a silly myth that you actually have to be modest when speaking truth to power! The simple fact is (and one that Gothic stories illustrate, time and time again), you can speak to power with power-as-abstract in recognizable forms of darkness visible disrobed. Chief among those is the human body resembling a castle and vice versa; i.e., the familiar-foreign, psychosexual signature of a stacked faerie residence as much being the stamp of power and home touched by alien elements, versus the actual humanoid shape emblematic to vanity projects. Rippling through the performance of sex, playing house can become deliberately mendacious and truthful, but also mixed in terms of its literal, pun-heavy metaphors; i.e., faerie castles being as much who embodies them with a brick-house, "mighty mighty" physique.

As disco-in-disguise through danger disco, period, the artificial wilderness is one whose paradoxical reinvention of royal faerie nudity happens during ludo-Gothic BDSM between different workers! It's a bad camouflage that blends into a space where everyone is wearing the same basic disguise: surviving as tricksters treating ourselves (turning tricks), making mischief while embodying it as a matter of paradox, artifice, guile, teasing and relief!

Bodies or buildings, the Gothic classically emerged out of a delicate, exciting time and perfect storm of variables: an expanding middle-class luxury affording Neo-Gothic authors (and later pretty much everyone, as soon as access to such things expanded beyond the probably-gay sons of British prime ministers and MPs); i.e., a sudden, special sense of play and control that, up until that point, hadn't really existed beyond aristocratic privilege, and simultaneously was diving back into the medieval semi-imaginary past as something to play with. As camouflage to speak to state power/disorder rising to global prominence using the same stuff to hide itself with, such subterfuge became something not to exclusively admonish, but admire: scaring ourselves, but also the state, by reclaiming such devices to help from rape in theatrical doubles thereof.

For the state, it's a way of sexing up the banality of evil through weird-nerd culture; for workers, a rising intuition acclimated to the spread of power and lies, thus camping the canon through the usual Gothic disclaimers: everything's fake, but hides rebellious potential somewhere in all those conventions, fetishes and psychosexual clichés; i.e., Faustian transactions transmitting magical devilry through grave danger and serpentine, bandit-style, black penitent treachery as a hauntological, displaced critique of capital growing into itself; e.g., Radcliffe's Count Montoni or Father Schedoni part of a larger cultural imaginary relegating British atrocities (and aging national identity) to a cultural imaginary always at war with fictional "Italian" doubles and their evil castles: a forever war haunted by a "just business" mentality of gangsters, liars and thieves, but also poison, bad reputations, stolen brides, concealed weapons and private, mercenary warfare.

To this, the Gothic celebrates chaos and confusion during calculated risk acknowledging state decay (and medieval regression) through artifice. A at times nebulous and completely bonkers, Icarian (crash-and-burn) threat to profit/the nuclear family dressed up as "alien invasion" (which faeries represent), it's one the state will take seriously while, at the same time, giving workers something to enjoy or otherwise empathize with, through disposable and discredited pleasures; i.e., in faerie-like ways that not only exceed, but purposefully violate state tolerances, mid-cryptonymy! A wish to crystalize by first invoking it, to think of the Devil that she may appear helps workers conjure an imposing luminary that, through our aforementioned nudism, outshines its classical demonizing usage! Rape is historically cheap. Our bodies and identity-through-performance, take on fresh life that overwrites state doubles policing the whore! Police this, dickwads!

(artist: Lera)

Often, this awakening (and its active class character) incurs through infidelity regarding extramarital affairs—the Faustian dealings of the state and monarchs behind closed doors. Despite the crown, the dark faerie queen is an anti-monarch in the traditional sense, but works through entertainment as, itself, a kind of paradoxical threat: the act of being sinful, to some extent, unfaithful because blind faith is historically-materially harmful; i.e., unfaithful to the harmful idea that work is holy, per the Protestant ethic, and pushing back against the idea that wish fulfillment is somehow "cheating" (versus working a low-paying job one's whole life, subject to wage and labor theft, but also sexual theft through compelled marriage). From a proletarian angle, the Devil opens doors the state wants closed—disaster a thing to court through abjected things; re: demon lovers simply whores, versus medieval slayers, the two overlapping or haunted by their own inverted flavors of sex and force through the same Numinous, abjected scheme.

Concluding our pre-exhibit tangent on Satan, Puritanism, and our aesthetic notes, everyone loves whores, if only as faerie weapons to attack with or stand against; re: sex and force as things to respect and understand above else! There's a method to our madness, a devil in the details. If the state invents whatever enemy it needs to dialectically-materially enforce its will and rape nature (commonly a woman, it must be said; re: "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned"), we turn that on its head, fostering a dark mistress/fairy godmother it can never fully pimp, having her whore's revenge in Promethean worlds (of power older than man, thus profit)! This collab is me and my friends' fun, conversational attempt to illustrate that, speaking louder together than we ever could alone, our naked fairytale bodies making all manner of wishes come true. Why ask for a pretty dress or the taste of butter when the sky's the limit? So pay attention, loves; service to Satan is its own reward, and this is what living deliciously (and anti-predation/rape) is all about!

(exhibit 44a1a1b1: Artist: Annabel Morningstar. Annabel is into "cottagecore," a cottage-industry type of aesthetic that features faeries, and who inspired the idea for this exhibit [though we won't cover the idea itself until "Call of the Wild"]. Many of the images featured here come from the shoot I commissioned her to produce:

While demons are whores per the virgin/whore dichotomy, and they communicate as much through pain adjacent to harm during paradoxical revenge dialogs, doing so is a method of social-sexual enrichment in "ace" forms of public nudism; i.e., interrogating trauma and power through Gothic poetics and liminal expression: the booty normally controlled by the state suddenly set free by the natural, God-given owner of said booty—workers! "If you want to critique power, you must go where it is"; demons do that, but equip the interlocutor/participant[s] with the ability to likewise communicate as demons do—through pleasure and non-harmful pain that speak to systemic abuse being an ongoing problem under Capitalist Realism: to bring Hell to Earth, throwing the doors of perception wide on the Aegis [above and below]. Think of it as anal jazz—something to improvise "darkness" with/upon to change/upend state hegemonies; i.e., to profane the sacred in "almost holy" language, where people watch us simultaneously fail and succeed per attempt: on the highway to Hell, loaded with dark power evocative of pre-Christian religions, fertility rites and bacchanal pleasures deemed alien and sinful by the Church, but also pimped by its secularized extensions during the Protestant ethic abjecting the faerie whore's ghost of the counterfeit [and special weapons, left]!

artist: [Annabel Morningstar]

Of course, Medusa is the basic notion of such monstrous-feminine/demon lover theatrics upsetting state balance; but dark faeries constitute the same idea as the snake-headed original, as do witches, Amazons, or any other classic female example [that extends easily enough to GNC forms]. They double their canonical variants, while still having that evil, Venus-twin look to them; but again, flow [of power] determines function, not appearance. Appraising and addressing that dilemma through demons like Annabel's dark sidhe design [and peachy backside, below] helps us not only reclaim monstrous-feminine from state tokenism/obscurantism, but distinguish ourselves and blend in during revolutionary cryptonymy when humanizing the harvest with ludo-Gothic BDSM and bare, exposed forces of darkness! Antagonize nature and put it to work for us.

Furthermore, such poetry is robust, holistic—a complete package fine-tuned to reverse abjection on the Aegis; i.e., during the same-old mythological games' ghost of the counterfeit assisting rebellion, recultivating the imaginary past in all the same language to camp it; re: Marx's dead generations, but also the man himself, to yield more perceptive retro-futures looking forwards by going backwards to uncover sex-positive hauntologies within fatal, undead nostalgia [and restless dogma/rebellion during the cryptonymy process].

artist: [Annabel Morningstar]

Often, this reveals itself through flesh as castle-like, hyphenating the lavish, sensual language of revenge vis-à-vis sex and war with food and death, shelter and combat, pleasure and pain, religion and release placed in optional quotes [e.g., "impalement" or "sheathing"¹⁵⁷] to achieve live burial in architectural, morphological degrees; i.e., the queen bound to the castle as a funerary chronotope housing a fugitive derelict's engines of war regardless of ornamentation; e.g., the faerie queen's fortress backside acting as opening to the netherworld's opera space/mise-en-abyme as "belly of the beast," but also butthole of the beast [or other such orifices and cavities, though Annabel's asshole is a sight to behold, above]: the house as the monster, liar and abuser but also the monster as "brick house" [re: The Commodores] telling paradoxical truths with taboo, thus attractive elements that feed anisotropically in both directions. So often, women [or those treated like women] are, per the whore's paradox, forbidden from taking abject BBC/manifesting as such, but expected per the profit motive's colossal, patriarchal double standards to do just that.

Point in fact, Alraune and similar vampiric heinies—e.g., the Moth Fairy from Bloodstained 2: Curse of the Moon, next page—literally stem from nature seeking its monstrous-feminine revenge against profit, hence rape; i.e., acting as bait while fucking back to hell from rape—lying in wait at the traditional place of abuse, thus revenge; re: the bedroom haunted by the vengeful whore's phallic ovipositor or vagina dentata, double/two-faced presentation, and Medusa-style severed head eating her rapist through Gothic pareidolia and pseudolimb, mid-liminal expression: oscillating¹⁵⁸ inside a murderous womb's Numinous, danger-zone/nexus-of-crisis hyphenating of sex and force, human and insect, mouth and fang—the palliative-Numinous, Gothic-Communist mommy to quest for and have her dom you through forbidden sight/darkness visible! Something to see that defies belief, the revenge isn't petty in defense of private property through monopolized terror devices, but substantial and thrilling in defense of nature and labor! The Gothic—as a storehouse of old recycled tropes, dated fakeries and grimly humorous camp—is a fantastic resource for such premeditated discourse/crass danger-disco maneuvers playfully badass dangers.

¹⁵⁷ The Gothic loves violent sexual metaphors, which speak adequately to queer hyphenations of criminal sex and force that, just as well, speak to demons and their psychosexuality at large: the faerie ornamentation of violence, but also the its rude slumming (re: gentrification and decay).

¹⁵⁸ A classic Gothic signature, alongside live burial tropes and the decay of state mastery through various fetishes and clichés, and dated, revived conventions stressed for their simultaneous age, barbarity and profound regeneration. These sit in between boundaries concerned with sex as a weakness, but also a death warrant that executes when consumed; re: sex equals death when one's virtue is "weak." The Gothic, cloaked in the spectre of organized religion and the Protestant ethic, camps such nonsense inside of itself.

model and artist: [Annabel Morningstar and Persephone van der Waard]

Except, the same ideas of the vampire's undead reversal [of the usual feeding direction] likewise apply to the demon's revenge being functionally the same; i.e., regardless of aesthetic, the dark faerie operating through unequal trade and transformation has Promethean and Faustian outcomes: the destruction of the usual predators by anti-predation devices [and false bodies/animalized

Gothic fakeries working in tandem, part of the same vengeful force, above] luring aspiring rapists [which monomyth heroes are] to their doom! Beheading the Medusa is classic abjection, her castration of patriarchal agents while playing "dead" classic reverse abjection; i.e., "helpless" while tied up. It's a kind of data, but also code-through-power-fantasy speaking to anxiety and anger in methods where the actors and articles involved can reckon with dark forces that raise intelligence/awareness during the cryptonymy process to reverse abjection and foster Gothic Communism; re: moving power anisotropically towards workers through dialectical-material scrutiny during praxial synthesis, not Freudian psychoanalysis [and mainstays, like Creed, Segewick, Carter and Kristeva, etc]. It might seem like the whore always loses; per the whore's paradox, she reverses abjection through BDSM played out in Gothic stories: showing the military optimist their own cruelty in desiring to rape nature-as-alien-whore, hoping to defeat Capitalism's hidden sins through combat.

To it, the Gothic is notoriously indiscrete/prone to push-pull while crossing very fine lines; its chaotic violation of boundaries neatly describes the half-real ways that power and its uneven distributions and boundaries exist and unfold in faerie fun and [sex] games. Whether a castle, occupant, or some castle-in-the-flesh combination, awesome [Numinous] power and obscurity are always close at hand. Weighed down by [and reached for with] ambivalent hands and clouded vision, its cryptonymy affords the wielder tangents with narrow cutting power and broad latitude; i.e., amid solvent [dissoluble] feelings of constant confusion and overwhelming danger. The air permeates with thick dread, but also paradoxical excitement; i.e., insofar as liberation and exploitation [cops and victims, Nazis and Communists] all occupy the same kayfabe umbral zone that faeries do: where the atrocities of present social structures, displaced onto faux-medieval language, return as "past" to fall once more under its powerful spell [re: Punter and the ghost of the counterfeit]—all to further or reverse abjection, time and time again!

The Gothic is obsessed with the return of rape as a matter of nostalgia paradox—to a young state of mind with an adult perspective, confronting generational trauma to not only survive, but defeat it at the "source"; i.e., regressing to progress by going to Hell not elsewhere, but at home displaced to a nightmare, castled state—one common to medieval torture scenarios and state crisis and decay expanding said torture deeper into regular in-groups seemingly under state protection. But such places, as haunted homes, are also semi-imaginary playgrounds of "rape" out in the open, exposed dramatically for those who have survived systemic abuse [and its concealment] and seek to unbury such secrets, once and for all.

These cloaked testimonies and Black-Veil affects confess or otherwise point to unspeakable, widespread and atrocious harm on the homefront, themselves announced by great entropy [disorder and collapse] as something that suddenly arrives or erupts into massive, extreme violence: the unstoppable revenge of the barbaric past unto a possible future, holocaust and revenge housed and confronted in the same zone of play's exquisite "torture." Commonly denoted by [and abstracted as] Gothic castles and conquerors whereupon time is a circle, imperial abuse and state consumption under capital abject onto a retro-future space-time loop, the "better future" of a once-upon-a-time endlessly devoured by the imaginary past from Elsewhere traveling through space and time [usually outer space, the ocean, the barbaric past, or simply a space of darkness; e.g., Lavos from Chrono Trigger or Skynet from The Terminator—Toriyama's concentric purple people eater and Cameron's technological singularity/police state demonic personifications of manmade extinction abjected onto "unknown" spheres during the liminal hauntology of war]: to catch a predator by responding to pain and anxiety as, at times, thoroughly unreliable data.

In Gothic, pain is a problem [re: C.S. Lewis] insofar as uncanny elements promise death inside the home; i.e., as occupied by something older than us, alien even, but nevertheless part of the place we call home. Trauma attacks memory but also rememory as a process, less making it forgetful and more foggy and fractured. In turn, some things are so awful we want to forget and never speak of them again, but silence is death, pain a data to analyze "on the hunt," gathering evidence; i.e., intel that resists concrete discovery or dismissal as a kind of always-ringing alarm system gone haywire; re: inside the belly of the beast.

Yet, interpretation and deciphering these cryptic omens is required both to survive and live with peace of mind that we aren't being pimped by tyrannical forces passed off as fakes: the men behind the curtain's concentric veneer/gobstopper mask, machinations of state, and inkblot scapegoats. There's always another castle and tyrant inside, because that's what capital is: endless installations of figureheads, per the ghost of the counterfeit furthering the abjection process. Vague or crystalized, the story is worth nothing without these creatures and their Numinous, at-times-incorporeal halos; i.e., the threat of awesome change, wrought through generational abuse and cryptonymic release: a wild walking castle appears!

In Chrono Trigger's case, the canceled future [which a hauntology is; re: Fisher] is declared after a failure to stop Lavos, dooming the entire planet: "But... the future refused to change." Such is Capitalist Realism—deliberately trading genuine activism for personal responsibility scapegoating nature, the latter dressed up as technological singularity or cosmic-nihilist space reaper! Such territories are well-trod, done to death but deathless because of a need to quell Capitalism's inheritance anxieties among the middle class quaking before the ghost of the counterfeit: the prodigal son, his chickens come home to roost per the Imperial Boomerang's grim harvest, its dirty little secret cloned and laid bare as "fantasy"!

State proponents, being incompatible with life and consent, lie by design/about everything¹⁵⁹. They do so to defend what the elite privatize—a fake, which they perform to maintain profit; i.e., through cryptonymic lies-upon-lies and force as something to enact against the counterfeit's ghost: furthering abjection for the state during Capitalist Realism, the system having an extraordinary tolerance for menticide. So when the state is strong, its cops and their perfidious illusions feel strong. But when the state is weak, these same enchantments wane; i.e., in ways that demand aggressively conspiratorial and preemptive shows of force from the middle class already conjuring up such Radcliffean bugbears: often against "weak and strong" scapegoats [re: Eco] that trap a besieged Earth inside a fluctuating spell of endless lunacy and death [re: Majora's threat of the falling moon]!

¹⁵⁹ Re: ACAB and ASAB. The state and its traitors (cops) exploit and rape everything for profit, thus control—the two historically-materially going hand-in-hand; i.e. through state illusions and force, thus neoliberal reinvention (mis)using such methods on a regular basis. These include corruption, lobbying and bribes, but also police brutality and various other activities (espionage, assassinations, etc) occurring onstage and off. Less a corrupting of the system and more lubricating it through boom-and-bust with the trifectas, monopolies and qualities of capital, these are things working very much by design. Profit, above all else, facilitates the half-real mechanisms at work, including genocide (war and rape) as a simple consequence of state and corporate operations. They only exist to exploit nature and workers as monstrous-feminine (re: through the usual ethnocentric, canonically essentialist revenge arguments), but that's all the state is made to perform: divide and conquer for profit, that's it.

Furthermore, said motive might be haunted by older forms of empire (the ghost of the counterfeit), but within the present state of affairs, profit supersedes these ghosts, which it pimps out in some shape or form; it charts them in the same mapped-out spheres, like everything else. So while everyone likes the whore, the state needs her as something to attack/surrender territory to before clawing it all back: holding a gun to nature's head, forcing sex in a rush that, turning her into carrot and stick, takes away all choice. Everything is taxable, written up as "the cost of doing business." Unequal, myopic, panoptic—the state works for one purpose, regardless of scope and scale: to privatize thus exploit and reduce everything to profit; i.e., free enterprise (which neoliberalism is) and negative freedom for the owner class, hence billionaires.

The instigator is typically absurd, Lavos effectively a castle-like "gun porcupine" whose non-diegetic pipe organs herald a sudden invasion-from-within piloted by a central menace [re: the backstabbing Jew]. For the elite, however, a Numinous scapegoat is still a scapegoat; they go so far as to grant the beast its own alien life cycle, expecting us to kneel before it when it erupts from the ground like a cicada or African rain frog¹⁶⁰, then punch down at ourselves during mirror syndrome—in effect, bypassing the elite [and their well-deserved blame] entirely!

For Gothic Communism, though, the whole point is to subvert these black onions' escalations of civil war—meaning to recreate such cataclysmic disempowerment in ways that empower workers through awesome doom; i.e., in defense of nature from capital during calculated risk: a near-death experience whose obscured, layered threat rears its ugly head when the "old gods" return to have their revenge; re: Medusa and state shift during the Capitalocene. Per the paradox of rape, their evocation feels good during calculated risk; i.e., a confusing reality the elite [the men behind the curtain] will exploit, full-bore: "Worship the state's gods of death pushed into neoliberal [videogame] spheres; have revenge on who we dress up as the end of the world—Communism and its spectres of Marx!"

[source]

Like the xenomorph's messy intimations of Ovid, Lavos is a Satanic gay death fairy from outer space/Radcliffean nightmare about the end the world. Aping Hell, the tyrannical butterfly's cuckoo metamorphosis turns Earth into a ravenous primordial maw eating Utopia cocooning it re: [the caterpillar and the wasp]. As usual, capital will use such degenerate [queer-coded, Archaic-Mother] cryptonymy [and its faerie-like, phantom-class egregores] to charm the middle class, thus further abjection and destabilize the world pursuant to profit raping nature by chattelizing it: the ghost of genocide personified and displaced through DARVO and obscurantism, tokenized by neoliberal copaganda haunting the sham of Utopia [re: "Rome" as retro-future].

"Progress," then, is classically the word of Cartesian white men raping nature, who frame Omelas as imperiled on the Aegis to justify policing the whore, post-apocalypse; i.e., capital routinely scapegoats its own inevitable "bust" in astronoetic language, the scapegoat a devious ur-thing to push as far away from capital [with Lavos landing on Earth millions of years in the primordial past, similar to Giygas from the Mother franchise, exhibit 60e2] yet push its child soldiers endlessly towards so they can peel back the layers and pimp the whore all over again: the murderous womb, which stories like Alien¹⁶¹ made so famous, Creed fantasized about from Freud's arguments, and I reclaimed in my own work, but which Bacon and the Cartesian Revolution's mainstays have been "running a train on" for centuries! They're Lavos pulling a bait-and-switch handing out death warrants; i.e., during us-versus-them, gaslight-gatekeep-girlboss stranger danger punching state-compelled unknown during Capitalist Realism! Divorced from the world, it's still their oyster to pry open and gut; re: through the usual simulative refrains escalating hyperbolic war against the potential for Great Change: idiots trying to conquer death, therefore nature's great revenge!

¹⁶⁰ While both animals are known for their cute battle cries, rain frogs are further referred to as "potato fairies."

The elite push DARVO onto a capitalist analogy dressed up in Nazi-Communist obscurantism! Mighty spectres of death trapped in time as endlessly traveled, fascism and Communism become things to abort and dread, but always to discourage Communism, mid-kayfabe; i.e., neoliberal monomyth refrains promoting death omens of various kinds by the elite unto all workers: home as Hell to return to, or Hell returning home as Juggernaut, Leviathan or some-such Great Destroyer! Faintly detected by stubbornly imperceptive investigators gentrifying extermination war as "cutesy" in service to the state, the heroes of Chrono Trigger and similar fictions [often women and children; re: Radcliffe's Scooby Doo palimpsest] hunt these endemic alien monsters down, arriving at a final spectral boss looming menacingly inside the web-like trail's garden of the forking paths: an evil onion/cocoon, hence duty to discharge or execution to carry out—reversing predator and prey in a layered singularity when others failed and the nightmare of the undying vampire never quite ends [so-called "true peace," itself, an elusive and brittle lie, under Capitalism]!

Per Radcliffe, demons are classic beings to summon and, pursuant to their final forms, "lovers" to defeat through some kind of challenge offered [often survival or temptation]. While Dracula more commonly fits this role, or something else erotic, plenty of Numinous forms have false bodies [re: Lavos] or no bodies at all [re:

¹⁶¹ I.e., Scott's film emblematic of Shelley's Frankenstein novel, both haunted by Red Scare vis-à-vis Invasion of the Body Snatchers from 1956 onwards, the latter inspired by Lovecraft's "The Colour Out of Space" or At the Mountains of Madness from the 1930s, H.G. Wells' War of the Worlds from 1898, and older xenophobia/Orientalism from Conrad, Poe, and Radcliffe, etc, reaching back into Antiquity's fear of the legendary guerilla and barbarian general, Hannibal (who Scipio Africanus defeated in battle, only doing so after Hannibal's famed crossing of the Alps).

Skynet, though it cyberpunk pyramid is preceded by an army of cyborg skeletons]. But such qualities skirt the same lines and territories as faerie rulers and their dark chrysalids—asleep, waiting like Cthulhu at R'lyeh to wake up [no one afraid of Capitalism's fall more than fascists like Lovecraft, but also those strip-mining cosmic nihilism's Cycle of Kings, post-Giger]: inside a nightmare that, once awake, cannot be escaped [the realization of our being trapped in Plato's cave]!

[source]

Whatever the form, the function is unanimous. Such beings are vice characters of some kind or another to scapegoat inside a monomyth center/closed space; e.g., vampires as faeries, often of a genderqueer quality bearing anti-Semitic flavors that—under a more modern Radcliffean—become queer-coded witch hunts during sodomy and blood libel arguments exterminating the moth by burning it with state candles; i.e., "bug hunt" being the dark desire to canonically unfold during the heroic quest: to penetrate home as sick with a foreign insectoid plot, excising the insect to whitewash capital and its castles through incendiary fetes and kayfabe. The lynch mob, as such, is a rite of passage purging the usual suspects, their purification by fire happening at night while the interlopers, the middle class, happily beat the faerie to death to achieve regicide, infanticide and genocide [and to get the girl at the end of the story]. Such is copaganda in totality—the monomyth, cops-and-victims power fantasy turning state defenders' brains off while acting like they've somehow "grown up"; i.e., once ridding Paradise of the seemingly invincible barbarian/Grendel stand-in by doing the state's dirty work. For capital, all roads lead to Rome; all minions lead to a mastermind who, at the end of the monomyth, can be martyred.

A fight over a woman is classically a fight over a chain of property [dowry] and custodial rights, only one side can't defend itself. Yet, everyone loves the whore [or has virgin/whore syndrome] and its blackhole sun's black sunshine taunting oblivion vis-à-vis state-induced death anxiety and similar emergencies. In this respect, the Gothic and its demon-mommy poetry's recursively psychosexual and emotional [ergodic, concentric, anisotropic, etc] turmoil speaks to curiosity's magnetic charm making anyone feel more at home in alien places; i.e., writ in disintegration¹⁶² with poison as the cure, at home with duality and paradox, contradiction and conflict, society and sickness, and empowerment through "disempowerment" with and without quotes regarding things normally closed-off and simultaneously commonplace; re: sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, but also the stories encompassing such materiel, talent, and merchandise.

¹⁶² Re, Chris Baldrick's introduction to The Oxford Book of Gothic Tales (2009): "For the Gothic effect to be attained, a tale should combine a fearful sense of inheritance in time with a claustrophobic sense of enclosure in space, these two dimensions reinforcing one another to produce an impression of sickening descent into disintegration" (source). This, for us whores, becomes something to thrive inside, regenerating like a zombie might, but also a demon; i.e., the faerie, in its chrysalis, changing shape to better suit itself in a hostile environment.

Such meltdowns are what the dark faerie ultimately embodies, thus represents through an antihero's journey—person and place—to bring such things to light for workers or the state: to see you in Hell. "Hell" isn't "bad," in this sense. It's just, like a fairy's cocoon, a place of radical change, black light and dark desire, thus rape and revenge as something to address, mid-duality and -stasis; i.e., from multiple angles and holistic tangents developing Gothic Communism through wise, perceptive "torture" buried alive—an ass of the gods woken up to deliver a Wisdom of the Ancients caught somewhere in time, but also on the bodies of those we love; e.g., my friend Nyx; i.e., who, on her formidable physique and persona, traps the viewer between pre-capitalist ideas and a post-scarcity future where the state has been permanently dismantled and billionaires no longer exist! A fortress for friends to enter and "die" inside, Nyx slays capital using capital's ultimate weapon against them: faerie butts speaking for themselves as taking up arms! Like Lavos, Nyx's planetary "fairy castle" is armed with "ballistics" [missiles or otherwise]!

artist: [Nyx]

Nothing is policed more. Per the Gothic mode, faeries personify dark spaces of chaos; i.e., the faerie queen's labyrinth¹⁶³ of conjecture to penetrate and enjoy what is forbidden outside, but permitted inside itself and its libidinous, brothel-like casino's concentric morphological architecture; re: mise-en-abyme the reader surrenders unto. Said surrender happens during an eager virgin [or experienced whore's] imperiled, overwhelmed mind: the slit-like murder holes¹⁶⁴ of prolonged sieges, ramming the barricades of a hungry and curious-yet-fragile brain that, deprived of experience or having too much of it, conflates sex and harm. Fed on warlike fictions exploring that which everyday life teases and denies, the Gothic was the original trashy escape for bored English housewives to slum with!

Speaking to experience and inexperience in equal, stoked barbarity—that being the desire to fuck, but fearing rape as something that women [or those treated as women] are born into—we non-housewives "surrender it all" for something better felt but for a moment in paradoxically "rapacious" tones: "I'd give it all to spend a night with you"; i.e., gentle mommies to nurture and ward off broad, elusive terrors with their teddy-bear softness and nurturing affection, but also "strict," dark and or Amazonian/faerie femme doms. Working on a switching BDSM mechanism, they instill a sense of masculine strength [with a feminine veneer] during courtly love: comfort food nourishing through multigender mixtures of sex and force during Ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., developing Gothic Communism on the Aegis, the dated past and possible future constantly haunted by great pain and pleasure in the same fairy-like bodies closer to nature than many under Capitalism currently are!

¹⁶³ Labyrinths, like any dungeon, aren't cheap. The Labyrinth of Crete, for example, was designed for King Minos by Daedalus and his son, Icarus. By comparison, Gothic fiction miraculously takes what is normally expensive and lets anyone design any cathedral they wish (often with as little as their naked bodies)!

¹⁶⁴ The slots in castle walls from which arrows, bolts and other missiles were fired from relative safety.

artist: [Nyx]

Again, Nyx is one such body—a fairy godmother "goldmine" whose butterfly tattoos denote a high tolerance for pain, but also poetically evoke the ancient goddess Psyche [exhibit 56a1a2]: as a transformative deity linked to the mind set free through pleasure, including pleasurable pain linked to dead metaphors. Capitalism is a cycle of misery bleeding the land dry for a manmade disaster—one of total privatization pimping nature-as-monstrous-feminine by the state, and where such hoarded resources will do no good during state shift; men cannot eat gold and Medusa always wins, so we might as well listen to her avatars ahead of time!

In turn, the only way to exact our whore's revenge—thus challenge the state and its brittle illusions, infinite exploitation, gross inequality/Protestant ethic/billionaires, automatic violence, and incompatibility with life having their finger on the pulse of capital—is by tapping into our labor's infinite value and where it's stored as, to some degree, alien and fetishized during these endless harvests; i.e., our rights versus theirs, we're the anti-family to capital's fucked-up sense of nuclear [erectile] dysfunction, division and devastation; re: to humanize the harvest, exposing the state as inhumane. The closer you get to the heart of things, vis-à-vis the infernal concentric pattern, the more Numinous things become; i.e., a reminder that simple things like fruit [and other cash crops in banana republics] lie historically at the core of exploitation: ass farms, but also an outpouring of dark volcanic sentiment¹⁶⁵ turning regular consumption inside-out, the state and its ¹⁶⁵ A violent outburst of a given crop preventing holocaust (re: "[Disgustipated" and "the cry of the carrots") by turning the harvest back on itself—with ass being a much-needed spice to revolution! Anyone can be a faerie/use faerie devices as weapons of terror to shock and dismantle the state and state bigotry (as racist, sexist and homophobic, etc). Like the human body as something to advertise, colonies] having incurred our baddie's chonky wrath! Fucking to metal, we smash state minds [those of cops policing us] against our whore's naughty clapping cheeks! "Stare and tremble" as our "pumpkins" turn into chariots of class war playing out the murder of class traitors! The climax is great, the catastrophe one of sweet, sweet revenge!

artist: [Nyx]

This crop-like cryptonymy includes Nyx' portentous faerie ass serving as a restless labyrinth to explore, but also her ties to the land and me, her big heart, and aching love for fantasy artwork and rock n roll; i.e., West Virginia, where she comes from, being a place not simply to preserve, but give back with gusto: to the dispossessed. Often ourselves, but also those around us the state destroys—this means labor towns, the miner's widows, the ruined land and now-native populations all owned in ways we take back through what we own, away from the boomtown factories, mines and fenced-off processing facilities attached to a naturalized boom-or-bust/circular colony. We camp economics and rebellion, making them sexier than usual; and when primed for it, only take a spark to set us off. Strange fruit sending us down special roads, so does the Gothic, through another of Medusa's avatars—a Mountain Mama, in this case—send us home!

artist: [Nyx]

Simply put, we're hard to believe, yet, like faeries, here we are; forbidden sight, for us, amounts to believing in better worlds through what others see in and upon us as harbingers thereof. While the state frames us as destroyers from Elsewhere to make said worlds "impossible," we load Capitalist Realism with a black magnetism that reels our audience back in. We're a demonic sight for sore eyes, then—trading unequally through forbidden things [violence, terror and sex] to anisotropically achieve radical transformation, and seek to be viewed as such weapons take infinite forms (and beckon "sodomy" as anything extramarital/non-PIV that stalls state engines with; e.g., oral or anal, but also even more repulsive [to the state] forms of kink I don't tend to advertise); i.e., Crawford's invention of terrorism and Asprey's paradox of terror become, per my arguments, Amazonian devices of terror (re: anal sex and similar sodomy devices) that apply neatly to our work: turning the state—normally hunting and pimping nature through its own monopolies—into something workers and nature hunt in response by showing them our ass humanized under demonizing conditions; re: "darkness" being anything that upends state order by iconoclastic means! To cover up is to segregate and silence, thus sentence ourselves to our fate.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

increasingly legitimate on all registers; i.e., during liminal expression reversing terror/counterterror! The revolutionary idea, here, is to avoid easy solutions in favor of difficult ones, our faerie glamour targeting systems instead of scapegoats by directing violence away from ourselves, mid-rodeo!

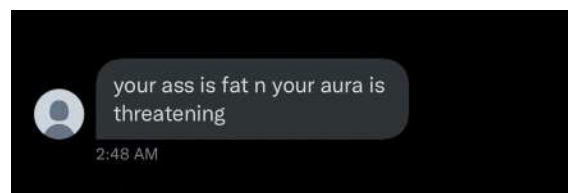

So while challenging profit and Capitalist Realism might sound incredibly boring on its face, in truth this takes many different, faerie-like forms that are anything but insipid! Great power lies in them, thus are precisely what the state aims to own, control and harvest by raping nature on loop during the abjection process; i.e., by building monuments to its own displaced abuse, and worshipped at by the middle class to further abject through cryptonymy [and the other Four Gs] all over again; re: Lavos, and those framed as Lavos, are the ones being harvested by state proponents in bad faith. So does capital demand inequality and total control for the state, framing nature as "illegitimate whore" and terrorist to seek its endless and bloody vengeance against.

In that respect, Capitalist Realism could be summarized simply as a battle for legitimacy amid state monopolies, decay and poetic dysfunction. Those of nature, like Nyx, become forces of nature that smash said monopolies with their kindness and shapeliness: a warrior mommy invoking acceptance and love, but also a willingness to transmute state terror with a harvest its cops can never reap, a dark faerie they can never dethrone! "Your ass is fat n your aura is threatening¹⁶⁶!"
Verily.

To that, the Gothic plays with Numinous things and games to instill a paradoxical sense of control; i.e., through rules and devices that can be handled, thus played with, for different means to achieve monumental leverage, post-abstraction; re: a palliative Numinous through ludo-Gothic BDSM developing Gothic Communism to challenge Capitalist Realism [and state ludologies coercing nature through mercenary force]. Doing so happens through things that are historically-materially very hard to regulate; re: sex and force, but also the Gothic/games on either side of class, culture and race war during oppositional praxis. Like Medusa's fat pussy or asshole, such "castled discotheques" become something to stab, but cannot die—indeed, loves to "die" during calculated risk thrusting to the hilt!

¹⁶⁶ The text featured on Nyx's Twitter banner image; emphasis, me.

\(source\)

artist: [Nyx]

In times of crisis, then, sex and war are comfort foods, but also a covert means of negotiating themselves within themselves: the whore speaking cryptonymically and cryptomimetically to harm through things that are normally policed, monopolized and colonized in ways we subvert during ludo-Gothic BDSM; re: by using what we got, thus arbitrate liberation as our revenge—a desire to see the state blown to bits, but in reality being a process of smaller battles infused with activism automatically equated as "violent" by the state [and cops]: the whore, out in the open, flashing the powerful with her mighty weapons. Physically violent or not, we cannot co-exist with the state, and our struggle against the owner class is always legitimate; e.g., the assassination of UnitedHealthcare CEO Brian Thompson sloganized through "deny, defend, depose" on the shell casings [source: Andrea Cavallier et al's "Manhunt Continues," 2024] versus the same liberatory sentiments enticed through our weaponized bodies demonstrating state fallibility just as well: the elite are not all-powerful; they humbugs!

The fertility of such Gothic maturity is the adventuresome ability to discuss intense harm and healing in sex-positive ways that conceal violence in "violence"; i.e., that push towards universal liberation and away from a shuttered, bigoted existence—fucking to metal not simply to breed or sate the middle class, but disabuse them of genocidal blind eyes! The ghost of the counterfeit becomes profoundly medicinal and multipurpose in good faith, as well as holistic interpretations that liberate workers through speculative richness, but highly abused by state forces in bad faith, theoretic imperialism, and singular interpretations expanding the state of exception on the same inkblot; re: warrior women, witches, faeries, and Medusa [and Medusa's fat ass, above and below] granting protection when facing the unknown during the dialectic of shelter and the alien—and faced, for some, as if for the first time and others, through déjà vu: to meet again, for the first time, an old enemy and friend both at once that, in doing so, makes our wildest dreams come true. As always, this unfolds while reversing abjection to abstain from Judas silver crucifying the rebel; i.e., the bullet with butterfly wings that riles up the rabble, Medusa's avatar having more cushion for the pushin'! With darkness visible, she takes us to the gates of Heaven or Hell, a place to come to [or on] and stay awhile!

artist: [Annabel Morningstar]

Beyond Nyx, consider Annabel's toxic faerie queen once more. Tits or ass, thighs or stomach, shoulders or throat—all sides to her speak of a scarcely-contained power viewed from different vantage points, her forbidden sight also speaking to a greater world: the plenty of paradise merged with cryptonymy of rape and revenge, voicing joy during calculated risk, but also genuine pain on the dark side of the moon highlighting curious truths and contradictions; i.e., eustress and confusing the senses; e.g., Andrew Friesen's "My Cat Likes to Be Hit" [2008]: "If she didn't like it, wouldn't she run away?" Quite the opposite, "We eat the night, drink the time, and make our dreams come true!" The Scorpions' "[The Zoo," 1980].

Another way to phrase it is that humans are animals, and bound by the same principles of confusion and delight¹⁶⁷: to reunite with things we are alienated from, primarily our faerie-like bodies and their unknown pleasures. This includes pain, but also their psychosexual theatre speaking to rape through "rape" that—all the same—makes our eyes roll back into our dumb skulls: dummy-thicc vitality and salubrious little deaths preceded or overshadowed by Numinous big death/the torpor of Great Destruction; e.g., the rape of a friend or the death of a loved one, the fall of a country or destruction of one's home. Exacted through inescapable punishment or debt of some kind, our faerie-ness refers to something we ultimately must confront that—despite Capitalist Realism [and its neoliberal copaganda's dogmatic, ceaseless military optimism]—cannot actually be defeated; it can only be embraced regarding all sides of itself during the dialectic of the alien: us, and by extension nature, exploited by the state as the ultimate destroyer projecting its harm onto the usual Radcliffean, cops-and-victims scapegoats.

Death and rape are classically things to avenge, canonically being yet-another-way for capital to divide nature and conquer her through dualistic terror language. Our revenge is two-fold—acting revenge out while evoking adjacent harm through play during ludo-Gothic BDSM: comedy and drama through demons [faeries, in this case] as an ancient theatrical device, alongside prostitution as literally the world's oldest profession. Through them, we tell stories to aid in our survival, thus ability to play and learn, but also recontextualize harm through monstrous theatre's poetic arguments: accessing a part or side of ourselves that is normally closed off; e.g., anal sex as one form of sodomy that faerie magic and darkness visible radiate. Our demons—thus operatic desires, emotional enormity and bedlam, and hauntological calamities—sit on the same shadowy stage as the state's own vice characters and apocalypses [the revelation generally shrouded in darkness during the cryptonymy process; re, Lavos: "The black wind begins to blow..." Fate farts in the edgelord's general direction].

¹⁶⁷ Including the battering of housewives and similar victims' confusion of predatory/prey, pleasure/pain, fight/flight and vaso vagal, which other animals can't experience or perform (for sex-positive or sex-coercive reasons) like humans (and their Gothic parentage) can.

To it, we're the caterpillar and the wasp, the impostor inside a tasty treat that, when consumed, eats you alive from the inside out! We're the death of patriarchal thought [and tokenism] that abjures profit in succulent, sweet-and-savory ways; i.e., there is no way to change the status quo without some degree of disguise and pain, but also play through transformative [metamorphic] language that is, sure enough, painfully delicious and obvious. Change hurts, especially when it's up in our guts, poetry's forbidden fruit rewiring our brains through "trepanation" in quotes—delobotomy killing our darlings, but likewise fucking us just the way we like: with a raw urgency eagerly tearing off our clothes and getting down to business [often through the dialog of sleep; e.g., Shakespeare's slutty faeries' from A Midsummer Night's Dream having a curious and steady penchant for "somno" sex; i.e., using "love-in-idleness" to make people fantasize about extramarital sex].

In the face of unstoppable death and other symbols of capital, risk becomes something to camp—calculated by us through the whore's paradox of rape! We point to our own harm, but do so to live with it in manageable forms; i.e., the whore's revenge, mid-paradox, being a tell-tale smile or set of faerie wings: a safe space to wrestle our demons, but also fuck them/guide them inside us by the hand! Through nearness with "death" as a theatrical, paradoxical concept, we faeries raise the stakes, the dead, a lover's dick, what-have-you. Consent is sexy—especially in times where it is scarce, inserting it needily into our hungry holes. Gimme!

model and artist: [Annabel Morningstar and Persephone van der Waard]

Everyone likes the whore, the tramp, the vice character as someone to root for/spice things up with Gothic panache; i.e., they're a secret to seek—a dead thing to play with, a puzzle to assemble, a castle [un]made brick-by-brick, to mount and pin to the bed while setting the tempo. The picture, then, is both crystal clear and sharp as knives, but also vague and fleeting as mist, mid-speculation; i.e., walking thunder that, like the Gothic castle, moves while in place and ties to grander and grander intimations blurring Heaven and Hell: a Communist Numinous relaid in castles and warships, but also bodies framed as such, the likeness [and contrast] of kaiju sovereignty that workers embody on the Aegis; i.e., as avatars of Medusa threatening cataclysm in state eyes drunk on Capitalist Realism [mistrusting anything beyond state vision, but also imaginary history beyond fascist reinvention misinterpreting said past]!

Such playful rapture/exquisite "torture" inserts itself into one's sleeping and waking moments alike, faerie succubae and incubae invading and incubating inside daily life; i.e., with indelible feelings of chaos to embrace as one does Medusa [during the dialectic of the alien]: an alien abductor "taking us away" but not really going anywhere¹⁶⁸, impossible motion cruising for sex perching on the cusp of disaster [warding off evil while presenting as such, brimming with pathos and desire]! So do we live in Gothic times; i.e., inside dwellings of doom unable to contain their own demonic power on any register or in/across any medium. The dark faerie doesn't merely sit on its laurels, then, but beckons with darkness visible: "Eat me... if you dare! Conquer my dark temple!" As Wordsworth put it, "Let nature be your teacher!"

artist: [Annabel Morningstar]

Abyssal though it seems, the data isn't corrupted; the corruption is the data, but it must be deciphered. It shakes things up, but cannot be shook; its dated conventions [and their massive, Walpolean personifications—the Capitalocene] continuously fall apart and reform, the Gothic writ with power and decay to best speak to things beyond Capitalism and its ever-decaying illusions while inside them; i.e., inside various persecution networks [and their concentric labyrinths] while using the language of persecution to camp canon with. In other words, the appearance informs the exchange, but the context is ultimately what defines it from a dialectical-material standpoint. Something to sink into, then, those who do can likewise accept how perception can warp under gravity's dark attraction; i.e., that such a twisting can happen [at cross purposes] while also realizing how the dialectical-material observation itself is fairly constant.

Activism, then, is predominantly leveraged through said observation as something to perform: an identity [faerie or otherwise] attached to legendary victimhood, then overcome and lived with under what power we do have to control, change and recontextualize; i.e., our own survival as beings of nature harvested by state forces through fiction as a staging point. With a little fairy dust, we might begin to arbitrate/scrutinize sex and force in Gothically mature forms that—classically inundated with suspicion, sadomasochism, bondage, and supernatural-to-earthly menace—grant us special, faerie-like ways to speak, means to hunt, and room to breathe as stewards of nature; i.e., as required by us to best survive state counterfeits playing the victim in bad faith, the cop selling out!

¹⁶⁸ For a good example of this from the Undead Module, consider "Away with the Faeries; or, Double Trouble in Axiom Verge" (2024).

Radcliffe's exclusively white, cis-het rape scenarios, for example, depict the paranoid havers abjecting other groups, punching up and down. Victimhood [and its emotions, like shame, hatred and guilt] do not define us, but do orbit around us/repurpose them through trauma normally buried¹⁶⁹ in what we inherit between fiction and non-fiction, imagination and objective reality interlocked; i.e., as something to perform and play with during ludo-Gothic BDSM, rediscovering "ancient derelicts" like Radcliffe's spectral castles to learn from them despite their immaturity [we'll unpack this during "Damsels, Detectives and Sex Demons"]:

artist: [Carl Gustav Carus]

My dislike—of Radcliffe's dry modesty but also the army of academic fans licking her mysterious asscrack—is no secret. Then again, she was an intellectual and creative whose writings aren't completely without merit [refer to my PhD for further discussions about this problem]. So while Radcliffe is a darling to kill, these windows into the past still offer dated ways of thinking we can glean current-day truths from; i.e., while moving around inside them during ergodic motion to excite faerie-like feelings, which Gothic castles very much were [and are] designed for! This means they're valuable despite their flaws¹⁷⁰, insofar as they're littered with

¹⁶⁹ What Horace Walpole called "secret sin; [an] untold tale, that art cannot extract, nor penance cleanse" from The Mysterious Mother (1768); re (from Volume One):

The Western world is generally a place that testifies to its own traumas by fabricating them; i.e., as markers of sovereignty that remain historically unkind to specific groups that nevertheless survive within them as ghosts of unspeakable events linked to systemic abuse. Trauma, in turn, survives through stories corrupted by the presence of said abuse. There is a home resembling a castle, where a ghost—often of a woman—lurks inside having been met with a sorry fate (source: Healing from Rape," 2023).

That story was about double incest; any reclamation we enact (about rape and general harm) is generally couched within poetry and mythmaking to some extent—if not because what we say is false then because it will be treated as false, mythical, or otherwise make-believe (as faeries are). Paradoxically, the Gothic castle works as a way to process things that will otherwise be denied outright. The effect is less a strict, positive-sounding euphemism, and more a sex symbol that expresses through violence to conceal sexual abuse (and pleasure) behind; re: the cryptonymy process pointing to all manner of things inside the inky charnel house—where such things get up and move around in uncanny (animate-inanimate) miniature and gigantic forms (often suits of armor)!

¹⁷⁰ For the power of speculation as highly developed; i.e., owing to capital being less developed than it currently is; e.g., Radcliffe's painterly view of the world in a, at times, very literal sense:

One of the unique aspects of Ann Radcliffe's novels is her emphasis on landscape. [...] Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com playful ways of framing arguments about survival... which again, Gothic castles concern themselves with—to "survive" as relics, but for us go beyond those who harmed us without irony to begin with; i.e., to survive those who, as Gloria Gaynor put it, "hurt us with goodbye." Forget eternal damnation, ours is endless delight through exquisite torture camping the canon, fawning to feign deference towards those who do not deserve our genuine love or uncritical gaze!

While the Gothic is classically about facing our fears [especially of uncertain, imposturous parentage] by anchoring us in infernal, concentric darkness to survive, it commonly forces people to face things that—like Radcliffe's unmappable castles¹⁷¹—are never entirely imaginary and, worse still, make us doubt reality and imagination. Questioning our sanity and lineage/sense of self in the process, we must acclimate to a state of asking questions useful to our survival under monomythic duress, violence, captivity and alarm, held hostage as prisoners of dark love hunting us; i.e., in a state of probing survival [the rememory process] whose hypervigilance/reliance on intuition goes beyond any single worker or sanctioned action, and instead encompasses what all of us can offer as, to some extent, like faeries and their castles' forbidden and exotic but also policed elements; e.g., Disney's "princess" variety promoting assimilation through whitewashed, gentrified castles that put "Gothic" in the hands of a smaller paying clientele seeking a colonized wish fulfillment; re: Radcliffe's secret princess trope, granting a common girl the bounties of conquest simply by surviving a night in the Similarly, theories of landscape are tied to particular settings in the novel. The three main settings for the novel are the different "homes" that Emily inhabits: La Valée, the castle of Udolpho, and Château-le-Blanc. La Valée "is a sheltered and highly sentimental world, a version of a Rousseauian ideal community," (Kilgour, 114) where Emily "receives a moral and sentimental education from her father," (Murray, 115) St. Aubert. Emily will take with her the moral lessons of her idyllic home to a more hostile landscape, as is captured by the Castle of Udolpho. Thus, La Valée and Udolpho represent the beautiful and the sublime: "[p]leasurable sentiments characterize the first world; sensations of terror characterize the second. Obscurity replaces light, mystery replaces openness" (Murray, 115). Situated on a towering mountain in the Apennines, the castle of Udolpho is "[s]ilent, lonely and sublime[. It] seemed to stand the sovereign of the scene, and to frown defiance on all, who dared to invade its solitary reign" (Radcliffe, 227). The Château-le-Blanc, in contrast, contains elements of both the beautiful and the sublime; it is a more ambiguous space (an ancestral castle that is modernized by its owner), in which Emily has to negotiate between appearance and reality (Murray, 128).

Like the characters' relation to nature indicates their moral character, so the setting's relation to the surrounding landscape reveals the character of its owner (Kilgour, 119). For example, La Vallée is in harmony with its surroundings, reflecting the moderation and virtue of St. Aubert, while Udolpho reflects Montoni's tyranny by dominating the landscape (Kilgour, 119). In this sense, setting takes on aspects of character, like the Castle in Walpole's Otranto [source: WordPress, "Landscape, Setting, and Character," 2011].

These castles embody a particular point of worldview we can embody for the duration of the novel, but take it outside itself to shape our own works; e.g., my books informed, love it or hate, by Radcliffe!

¹⁷¹ Aka "geometries of terror"/the infernal concentric pattern (re: Aguirre); i.e., with false walls and floors, but also memories about concealed dreaded evils (re: Radcliffe)!

dastardly place. Whatever camping of the monomyth we do will often be through our bodies as "faerie," castle-like and genderqueer.

artist: [Mugiwara]

Mugi, for example, is a survival sex worker/plural trans man; trans men, per the whore's paradox, are commonly exploited by heteronormative society treating them as unnatural—doubly so for plural persons. Any attempt to humanize ourselves happens through our exchanges subverting such norms by reclaiming said language for liberatory purposes; i.e., our bodies and labor are valid, as are the faerie-like identities attached to them normally invalidated through state doubles and their monomythic violence: likenesses of Medusa, but also each other regardless of gender or sex, shape or size, color or character! Anyone can be oppressed, and anyone can camp the monomyth, hence liberate themselves through the Gothic's Promethean fairytale; e.g., Mugi, Crow and Victoria's ample and shared cause through the same pedagogic exhibitionism as Nyx and Annabel, but for expressly GNC reasons:

artist: [Crow]

With the above and below collages, Mugi and Crow played with me for my 38th birthday because I liked playing with them [and Crow is one of my partners]. But they're also two of my muses—and Victoria [next page] is a close friend. More to the point, we're all trans, and I want to give GNC people a voice beyond just myself while illustrating mutual consent through a shared exhibit's collective labor exchange. We're all faeries of a GNC sort, making a case for ourselves using what we got!

Trans people have always been people, and despite blood libel framing us as evil faeries, we're actually quite good around children. We certainly don't eat them, and can even have them [e.g., Mugi has a daughter who's as cute as a bug's ear]!

Simply put, we have families and friends and lookout for each other under state pogroms incited by weird canonical nerds. Our life and labor have value, whereupon mutual aid is not only fine, but just another form of exchange that includes our bodies and labor cast, during demonic/faerie poetics, in a sex-positive light [versus limiting certain groups to caste-style positions; e.g., Jews and usury or untouchables and begging during public outcry/moral panic]. Through ourselves cast as faeries onstage and off, we overcome harmful expectations while allowing for public nudity as a holistic, all-inclusive form of activism; i.e., expressing itself through us, punching up towards universal liberation! "Long is the way and hard, that out of Hell leads up to light!"

Furthermore, biology is hardly essential when it comes to gender identity and performance, but informs whatever liberty emerges in either case [re: sex and gender as separate from each other and unanchored from biology, yet still relating back and forth on a magical fairy spectrum].

To it, Crow and Mugi are both trans and AFAB; I am trans and AMAB; and my friend Victoria is intersex. All of us are faeries promoting darkness visible, each one a special snowflake [as the chuds so often like to put it]:

artist: [Victoria]

Each of us represents a genderqueer aspect to existence that abjures heteronormative, thus settler-colonial and Cartesian standards; i.e., to exist despite capital exterminating us, our survival a poetic and revolutionary act of defiance made in defense of nature-as-monstrous feminine raped by state forces.

To it, our whore's fairytale revenge is to exist in ways of make-believe that—far from being totally fictitious or imaginary—defy total banishment to "pure fiction" by shifting deliberately into half-real territories; i.e., as art that speaks to our lived, GNC realities onstage and off, and that when exposed by us through revolutionary cryptonymy purposefully challenges profit as a structure: in defense of ourselves and our friends emerging from the abject land of faeries [often dark forests, said forest alluding to Dante's Inferno, but also Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, Shelley's Frankenstein and Ovid's Metamorphoses] to speak to apocalypse. By reversing abjection as dark faeries so often do, we camp the canon; re: punching up at state hauntologies, abjection, and cryptonymy [commonly relaid in monomyth language; e.g., Metroidvania] to break Capitalist Realism to bits! We're Lavoisier, but instead of a Greater Destroyer capable of what the state accuses, you have those who walk away from Omelas!

In turn, our wishes are "dark" because they deal in unequal, forbidden trade and radical transformation/desire that upend the current order in pursuit of a post-scarcity world that, while it doesn't harm others, remains tied to the harmful past as partially imaginary and nebulous; i.e., its plastic, signature poetry sits adjacent to the barbaric historical-material trends of older dead generations [re: Marx, but also the many Gothic castles embodying nature's dark vitality and demonic desire, power and knowledge]. We faeries camp our own rape, putting "rape" in quotes during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., while highlighting our own queerness surviving campy doubles, said doubles still reflecting unironic copycats felt upon the same Aegis. We are haunted by genocide's shadows of shadows/castled echo, but camp our profound survival [of these castles] to communicate through Numinous, psychosexual sensation—another sapient trademark the dark faerie subtype excels at! Where faeries are found, castles—usually abandoned—aren't usually far behind!

This GNC idea of universal solidarity and value through alienation goes beyond Mugi, Crow, Victoria and I; it also includes "non-white" bodies, be those with a different skin color [e.g., vitiligo, in Mugi's case] but also body type: thicc.

We've considered this spectrum earlier with Nyx and Annabel—and just now with Mugi, Crow and Victoria—but have yet to explore its monstrous-feminine margins.

artist: [Sinead]

My friend, Sinead, for example, is fat and genderqueer [not a woman, but fae¹⁷²]—much of faer praxial focus centers around fat liberation merged with faerie-style makeup and genderqueer artistic statements altering traditional beauty standards [or shifting to older standards thereof; e.g., the Rubenesque]. Similar to Mugi and I, fae are policed for what makes faer simultaneously forbidden and attractive under state venues: a forbidden fruit that refuses to take the grim harvest lying down! It becomes, for each of us, a "secret self" to de-closet, then camp canon with—having power the state wants to control as "dark," unholy and "demonic," during witch hunts stomping faeries.

artist and model: [Sinead and Persephone van der Waard]

Some faeries stomp back. In the poetic language of the Medusa, I've drawn Sinead as a fat underwater queen, her tomb a monstrous-feminine place to plunder in the Cartesian tradition: to, in Francis Bacon's words, "penetrate the womb of nature and torture her secrets out of her." This translates monomythically to the moving of money through nature in the usual acts, but also sites of conquest: fat and ready for slaughter but also, per Capitalist Realism, presented as abject, Numinous, "asking for it"; i.e., a scapegoat to butcher within endlessly recolonized zones, where men plunge into and prove their manhoods—by raping and reaping nature, which fae and faers Promethean space prevent by fucking back through Numinous anti-predation challenging profit!

¹⁷² Faers pronouns include: fae/it (any neos/they/he).

As Sinead demonstrates, Medusa isn't a woman; fae are the dark mother/fat-and-sassy whore whose watery grave [and its riches symbolizing nature's endless labor value and exploitation] is where stupid, enterprising men go to die the Roman fool [the Gothic operates dualistically through doubles and decay to defeat enemies of nature; i.e., with their own colonizing devices reclaimed for liberatory purposes]! Wrecking ships on theatrical safe "danger" spaces where true death and rape are impossible, the "kraken" takes faer stolen booty back from horny-yet-superstitious plundering idiots—a Great Destroyer striking them ignominiously dead with faer Numinous booty and whore's revenge! In doing so, fae give rise to a collective mistrust of, and to desire to change, capital's mistreatment of planet Earth: a Leveler to entreat before it makes good on its name.

To it, fae target the current mechanisms of state as having evolved over centuries out of the ancient world [and Greece and Rome] to exploit nature through the advancement of state trifectas, monopolies and qualities, thus belief systems. Medusa challenges this advancement through artistic statements that evoke the ghost of the counterfeit [through the poetic language of the half-real ancient past] to reverse abjection, thus profit and genocide as things to prevent: showing the state it's doomed on faer Aegis, and faer own superiority/unfriendliness to profit in the process! So do we become stewards to perform the symbolic death of the state raping us in bad faith, translating through praxial synthesis into activism [thus universal liberation of all work under Capitalism] through iconoclastic art: to make men fear what, for sailors, they are generally at the mercy of. The sea, then, is a cruel mistress who cannot die, but one who properly respected will yield great rewards: not being unironically trapped and isolated by shapeshifting darkness, then buried alive! In other words, quit while you're ahead!

To it, praxial synthesis is a matter of involvement that leads to development through daily habits cultivating systemic catharsis; re [from Volume One]:

Systemic catharsis requires praxis as conveyed through our extracurricular instruction's cultivation of good social-sexual habits; i.e., de facto educators relaying a pedagogy of the oppressed through trauma writing and artwork that speak to living with rape under warlike conditions, raising the collective, solidarized awareness and intelligence required towards preventing future abuse (ultimately dismantling the state) [source: "Rape Culture"].

However we get involved, universal empathy and resistance to state overtures should be our top priority when triggering the responses we want. In short, we lead by example, advancing awareness and intelligence [thus rape prevention] through our bodies, labor and social-sexual, artistic-pornographic exchanges.

Last but not least, this isn't always about raw, vaso vagal violence and mutilative revenge [e.g., murder or castration] committed against our abusers; it also includes the whore's revenge challenging profit [thus rape] by receiving pain in defense of nature-as-monstrous-feminine—i.e., by establishing intersectional solidarity among pain-loving friends, who put "rape" in quotes by receiving pain through what we deliver unto ourselves: as something to delight in because it's not a terror weapon meant to pacify us, but heal from rape as our revenge by playing with pain in classical ways.

Our shared human struggle, then, includes exposing our pain in ways we paradoxically reclaim in ironically palliative forms; re: through the whore's paradox, but especially the cryptonymy process: through cheeky "punishment" arguments that show us in control during calculated risk; i.e., through the appearance of impotence, yet deftly wielding things that, exposed as we desire to expose them during ludo-Gothic BDSM, incur the wrath of people who cannot immediately attack us, yet desperately want to in bad faith. Enraging them with our Aegis, our hellish

Communist powers occur by outing them, denormalizing their predatory actions [and subterfuge concealing said actions] from safe vantage points; e.g., the buffer of the phone or computer screen, or otherwise physical distance; re: "flashing with power" to those who have it "in spades"; e.g., my friend Rose's substantial "battlements":

artist: [Romantic Rose]

To it, faeries are demons, which—while they constitute unequal, forbidden exchange and startling transformation—also morphologically synonymize with habitats whose dark, radical desires upend state control over terror and pain as darkness visible; i.e., in pursuit of post-scarcity with pre-capitalist hauntologies about giving non-harmful pain; re: that of flesh concerned with power and knowledge, linked to buildings; e.g., faerie-castle torture dungeons, appearing to revenge past wrongs but also existing merely to spite genuine abusers! "We can 'torture' ourselves, thanks!"

The dark faerie then, becomes someone to perform and savor in the bargain; i.e., "What dost thou want?" as something to act out through cryptonymic activism masquerading as "mere playtime" and guilty pleasure/controlled opposition, yet feels paradoxically genuine in its playful espionage—as naughty but educational in ways that, while they seem wholly doomed/self-destructive, actually prevent rape [cops, by comparison, enforce rape]. Gothic castles are traditionally places of fear and fascination; so when people see a body-like castle or castle-like body on the horizon, they will often be drawn towards it—i.e., as the faerie refrain's promise of a hell of a good time, including a delivery site to deposit some dark offering or another [and overshadowed by systemic abuse, all the while]!

artist: [Romantic Rose]

Beyond cum tributes illustrating mutual consent, the prevention of rape happens by one, raising intelligence and awareness to mobilize activism during praxial catharsis; and two, recultivating the Superstructure while simultaneously exposing our attackers in ways they cannot immediately kettle; re: anisotropically reversing the terrorist/counterterrorist argument of monstrous-feminine language during the pedagogy of the oppressed while giving pain during crucial lessons: not all pain is bad, pain is vital towards growth, and pain during sex can enhance the experience¹⁷³ and change how we view sex in socialized [ace] forms; i.e., while humanizing those routinely harvested by state forces abusing said language [re: DARVO and obscurantism].

The Gothic, in turn, interrogates trauma and pain through public nudism uncovering dark things/things coded as "dark." In doing so, it reminds our attackers where such power is normally stored—through workers and their art, but also their bodies and pain as part of the same infernal trade, bouncing back and forth to heal from rape; i.e., by communicating, as people do, in the half-real, castled and demon-fairy codes: of pleasurable pain elucidating repressed, "unspeakable" desires! Whatever investigations of trauma the state impedes, we facilitate through said infernal trading of pain, bondage [the Gothic in love with desensitization and immobilization; e.g., the constriction of one under attack, below] as something they can't really control: to use at our own risk in ways that lower the odds of actual harm taking place!

artist: [Kingocrsh]

To it, how would the state begin to abolishing BDSM when it carries such a famous double standard? Furthermore, evocations of rape and harm sit in quotes, thus on the cusp of something Numinous and healing insofar as rape can be healed; i.e., beckoning all who watch, "Come and see!" To the hungry, "Let them eat cake, pudding and pie!" To the combative, "Let them go twelve rounds with the champ!"

¹⁷³ Especially when a former victim's survival mechanism has been damaged, the line between pleasure and pain blurred, but also predator and prey! Simply put, the bigger the trauma, the more usual psychosexual spaces (and their palliative-Numinous evocations) are.

artist: [Romantic Rose]

Romantic Rose, beyond the pre-existing images already shown, deliberately posed for this exhibit—doing so as a dark faerie queen I might play with and illustrate on my canvas to make a larger point about ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., with her massive tits, cute tum, big booty and fat thighs, but also her huge heart and soft words telling me I'm a good girl as we play together! Our joys [and toys] intermingle through the mystery of monstrous-feminine work reclaimed from state alienation and greed in castled forms of courtly love, thereby transforming into something we then show the world as alien to reunite with; i.e., through the demonic creative process purposefully given a magic-faerie stamp about healing from pain by involving it in ways we can control and camp: "her tits were there," living deliciously in spite of the Protestant ethic [no need for a hasty exit when we're protected behind a phone screen]! Sometimes, big things are to be used; sometimes, they're for show—a way to make you wet and/or hard a glance, imagining as you do what is more fun in one's head than in practice: the anxiety of receiving pain from things that might be a little too big! Faeries of a royal variety tend to be tall; their junk is less reported on historically [ol' Shakespeare omitted Oberon's cock size, if memory serves] but often imagined as matching said height in relative length: the carrot-y girth of a hellish botanical's mondo faerie dong [with many improvised dildos being produce]!

artist: [Romantic Rose]

Keeping with Hell and darkness visible, this generally waits on the cusp of dark, intoxicating discoveries first given shape through games played by a great many users; i.e., through ourselves as controlled pieces of meat, but also our meta performances/playgrounds consciously imbued with dark poetic energies that faeries revel in. We are the witches of our time, the mistress of our own fate—of the universe freed from police abuse, hence beyond what capital orders and exploits for profit—and again, some witches hammer back.

Of course, how they chose to is ultimately up to them, but it usually happens through devices of darkness, power and knowledge recognized by the larger world, under capital—force, yes, but sex through demon BDSM and faerie-like games; e.g., size queens like Rose, above, taking giant artificial cocks for fun—not to please sexist men, but to emasculate abusive parties insecure about their own members and lack of regular sex. In doing so, these behaviors expand beyond what tortures the state permits, our simulacra exposing theirs as dangerous [e.g., death before dishonor] while putting ourselves in performances of "danger" the state will do its best to stamp out. For them, we're an unweeded garden grown to seed, the state seeking once more to control what it rapes routinely for profit [which is all the nuclear model systemically is]. By stamping the tramp, monstrous-feminine fairy rulers become conspiracies of unironic rape; re: to scapegoat and tokenize through DARVO and obscurantism by state predators, nothing more.

Touched by trauma, survivors of rape always feel somewhat uneasy/off-balance by any setting evoking exploitation and liberation; i.e., on the same dark surfaces and in the same ambiguous thresholds where faeries call home/rule from. To speak to atrocity and feel good as we do is to play under such positions of perceived disadvantage, restless and agitated by otherworldly enchantment and vaso vaginal excitement; i.e., unable to fully relax otherwise, even when said disadvantage isn't obvious and the warning signs are seemingly absent [the violence of the past happening without warning—sudden and extreme at any moment, exigent and warrantless to monopolize such things].

That being said, there is a vestigial and ongoing torturous element, one I'll keep investigating to conclude the exhibit with; i.e., with Rose a bit more, but also Harmony Corrupted playing the greatest faerie of all—the Medusa!

Trauma is something to live with; for those with a history with or of violence, weird attracts weird, trauma attracts trauma¹⁷⁴ to change the survivor for good. Until the day we die, we feel, like the dark faerie, attuned to self-destruction seeking escape by camping harm; i.e., by cramping their style at the proverbial crossroads, out-

¹⁷⁴ A saying I've evoked in the past when writing about trauma as something to revisit:

There clearly isn't a monopoly on empathy as expressed through monsters, magic and metaphors—including big ones (castles), but also schools of these things playing with the ghost of the counterfeit; e.g., Radcliffe and Lewis' Schools of Terror and Horror, but also intimations of general-purpose "necromancy" or goth culture as a psychosexual, monomythic (adventuresome) performance with kayfabe elements: "Zombie Marx or Zombie Twain? Choose your fighter!"

Nevertheless, our juggling and balance in whatever contributions we can supply is important. Again, don't suffer for your art if you can help it. But also remember that trauma attracts trauma, weird attracts weird. The idea is to combine them in ways that alleviate sickness, stress, tension and harm, but also avoid predation by perfidious elements in our daily lives coming from structural abuse: the Gothic castle as a beacon to attract and house the like-minded while the state tries, as it always does, to dominate us through its own victims.

Yet despite having previously discussed martyrs as a powerful form of reverse abjection, it's not something that should be shot for each and every time. It's done out of pure necessity and frustration, which we want to move away from. A classic (thus sacrificial) state of grace is no substitute for systemic change. We need to be more constructive and inventive when the options are available; i.e., to offer up enriching poetic gestures that lead to socio-material change without us dying routinely and en masse as a result (as the rats who follow the Pied Piper do). "Magic, myths and monsters" means taking what we need and putting things that seem like they won't fit together together and passing through barriers that, for the Gothic, is a piece of cake (see, below) [source: "A Song Written in Decay," 2024].

(artist: Cuwu)

The idea is to learn from our collective but also individual past mistakes; re: "to dominate us through its own victims"; e.g., Jadis dominating me and me revisiting the grave of our relationship to ruminate on our abuse as something exchanged between us, them to me:

Weird attracts weird, trauma attracts trauma. I don't wish to hide the fact that I loved and made allowances for my abuser because I most certainly did (and still am always reminded of that, through these memories of them). Nor do I wish to change them, after the fact. That only happens when they decide to (and until then, they simply take and take, having no reason to change). To my most antagonistic abuser (the most Hurtful Abuser Award actually goes to Zeuhl, oddly enough), I merely wish to leave some parting words as we begin our segue into the sorts of monomythical forms you were doubtless inspired by when brutalizing me (source: "Escaping Jadis; or, Running Up that Hill," 2024).

Only by interacting holistically and repeatedly with the past as "past" can we build devices to play with and prevent the same old mistakes on a systemic level

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

fiddling the fiddler with our own faerie glamour as, like all deities according to Blake, residing in our breast! The power to disrupt and offend capital lives within us—not as atomized workers, but a plastic collective whose murky wisdom reaches backwards and forwards in all directions!

To shake such imbalance, then, and retain our defense mechanisms/"spider sense" regarding hidden dangers, we often "martyr" ourselves together during calculated risk [which public nudism essentially is]—to twitch and moan like convulsionnaires, opening ourselves wide to persecution but also the liberation and acceptance of us as psychosexual beings growing accustomed to a hunted, predated existence we can pierce the fog of war with; re: the faerie's special sight being the strange, at-times-atrocious appetite for pain acquired under capital raping us for profit, which historically-materially encourage tokenization under criminogenic conditions [re: desperation and convenience]. In our hands, the ritualized administering of pain can happen in ways that are only not harmful, but easy enough to pleasurably control when we otherwise feel out of control; e.g., candle wax poured gently on soft, vulnerable parts of the body like the breasts:

artist: [Romantic Rose]

If you're wondering what on Earth might possess someone to try such things, the short answer is "capital." As such, the female body is classically haunted by pain as something to control under capital's endless pimping [wax being a medieval sculptor's analog to human flesh]. To it, Rose takes power as something to subvert and transform into her revenge through things that, generally weighed by virtue of size, become more powerful than her enemies can hope to harvest, contain, enslave or match: obstacles and theatre curtains for them, not Rose [total privacy, safety and consent something of a myth under Gothic's ongoing surveillance, which provides an odd kind of cloaked honesty in how survival victims often feel: under attack and lied to by home as untrustworthy but without exit¹⁷⁵! Per ludo-Gothic BDSM, to heal from rape is to play with rape, and that includes pain and its operatic symbols/decaying rituals honed over centuries; e.g., comfortable discomfort, bold caution, weak strength, honest dishonesty, safe danger and similar oxymorons well-known to people living with trauma not weaponizing it against others. The perditious, ecclesiastic background remains a common sticking point for Gothic satire; re: Lewis; e.g., the camping of religious rapture and torture-as-canon through psychosexual martyrdom as profoundly tongue-in-cheek, but nevertheless loaded with textual markers [as the Gothic very much is] that allude to actual harm. This extends to those Rose wants to see such things unfold witnessing her emancipation from the weight of survived trauma; e.g., me having Rose pose multiple times in compromising positions [and tortured, penitent outfits of contrition] that, in the wrong hands, might disadvantage Rose, but through us working as a team, weaponize exclusively to our benefit: the faerie queen set free to work her magic on the living world! "C'mon, scrub! Don't be courteous; slay that pussy! Mommy has needs! Pound me like I owe you money!"

¹⁷⁵ Escape of the maze, in Gothic, happens inside itself.

artist: [Romantic Rose]

Shown for my pleasure—but also to make a combined, social-sexual political statement by inspiring me to paint her as a dark monarch afterwards—Rose uses her body to stress our shared agency over such things; i.e., that we, as sex workers, are capable of working together to speak out against genocide for all peoples under capital. We do so by using our bodies and labor through universal liberation; i.e., as active and informed by ourselves contributing to something greater and in development: Gothic Communism. Evoked selectively through monsters—this time choosing faeries that, under a Gothic lens, function as demons do—their hypnotic glamour¹⁷⁶ administers through flesh and the power it holds having an admittedly demonic signature. Ours is the conscious reclamation of demonic poetics during rape play—carefully shaped and positioned to convey the basic human right to exhibit such things however we want; i.e., to negotiate and advertise [sex is power as something to trade through artwork, and porn is artwork that can achieve such activism to a high degree].

This includes rape play as something to champion as faerie-like and demonic; i.e., as a Promethean being to humanize and hug during the dialectic of the alien avenging nature against profit, of which Harmony also volunteered: my Medusa, and someone I engage in consent-non-consent with on a regular basis [next page]. She straight up slaps, but during live burial offers a much-needed boost to keep at it; i.e., when the chips are down and our libidos/anxiety are up inside these hauntological spaces of doom parking atop our usual safe-space residences [the Gothic famously combining cautionary-to-unbridled lust and looming death/rape fears]!

¹⁷⁶ The radiative aura that faeries classically exude, used to paralyze the recipient(s) witnessing it. In regal terms, it could be called "majesty" but often likens to a vain, drug-like torpor not unlike vampires and their own seductive charm.

artist: [Harmony Corrupted]

Gothic Communism, then, is something that Nyx, Rose, Annabel, Sinead, Mugi, Crow, Harmony and I do together as friends showing each other off in whatever ways we want to be seen; i.e., as sexy avengers illustrating mutual consent and collective worker action through demonic-yet-sex-positive art exhibits. Rose and Harmony, in particular, grace the cover of several modules for a reason; they are each incredibly kind, honorable and sweet, but also fuckable and fluent in Gothic—i.e., able to work its dated-yet-deathless fetishes and clichés to our collective advantage. When I play with them and my other friends, I feel like I've made a deal with the Devil—one whose faerie-like powers set me free, delighting in unknown pleasures couched in prison logic turned on its head. A composite danger disco, they compile a concentric fortress to lose myself in, but also to feel safe from self-righteous, militarily optimistic and tokenized pretenders who hunt us down in bad faith during the liminal hauntology of war/ghost of the counterfeit/Imperial Boomerang's canceled future [often a vehicle and/or building evocative of an "ancient" tyrant returning to beat us to submission/demand we kneel before them¹⁷⁷]—someone to believe in when surrounded by so much complicit cryptonymy and neoliberal hogwash.

Keeping with faeries, the idea is informed bliss under Gothic-Communist development; i.e., no gods or masters, just friends who love and protect each other in the struggle to be free from state abuse using the same demon-BDSM language and aesthetic of power and death: what they can't monopolize, despite stiff competition compelling them to do so! The enemy is unironic oppression and betrayal, thus police actors upholding the state in some shape or form. There is no way to achieve rebellion, thus prevent rape, without resisting and protesting to a meaningful, demonstrable degree; i.e., rebelling against those who uphold these structures, symbolism translating to socio-material change: of criminogenic conditions [and language] towards post-scarcity conditions through medieval poetics reclaimed by workers for those ends. Power aggregates for them, but also for us backfiring their schemes.

Like the Amazon's fur bikini or nun's habit, then, there is no way to do this without exposing ourselves to some degree of exposure, thus risk. This vulnerable phrasing includes tracing the anxious spiral of death and decay that breaks how we see the world, whereupon the Aegis becomes something we can use only after the illusions forced onto us since birth are shivered by our demonic theatre, our ludo-Gothic BDSM, magic power and mad science something to behold during the same spaces and personas whose darkness actualizes proletarian needs, not bourgeois ones.

¹⁷⁷ Per the master/slave dynamic, which in Gothic, is often code for more prurient activities demanded by rulers of their slaves; e.g., "kneel" = "suck my cock." They've come to be the rulers of you all!

Again, such darkness is simply where forbidden dreams [of unequal power and knowledge] come true; re: as a dualistic, dialectical-material matter of revenge through the Gothic's demonic creative expression, betwixt residence and resident.

The idea is to throw aside "no good can come of it" when playing with these notions, and use them to our creative; i.e., to reify what capital denies us: our creative freedom breaking Capitalist Realism paradoxically with darkness; re: something that can be used for liberation or exploitation through discourse about such things, including famous monsters and their lairs: as things to embody struggle with during the abjection process!

Like Egger's witch, we dark faeries are not waifu. If anything, the power imbalance, stormy disposition, and class character makes that impossible. Instead, through the pedagogy of the oppressed as modular and intersectional, we steer the conversation away from those used to being the center of attention [and always make everything about them; i.e., white cis-het men, or those emulating them, inside the Man Box]. By daring to speak up for ourselves and those less privileged than ourselves in weird-nerd culture, we show strength and vulnerability in equal measure! Revolution is messy but the fact remains, some people are chattelized more than others; those with less privilege will be expected to betray more to elevate, meaning solidarity for and among oppressed groups is incredibly important lest we cannibalize ourselves.

We're all monarchs under Communism, loves—not defined by skin color or national boundaries but by the bounds we form and make to help one another! Anyone who excludes others to be a king for a day is a traitor and a fool; capital—an unapologetic system of theft—relies on cheap loyalty and quick betrayal to keep the elite in power. No honor among thieves? That's all capital does, and to not help those in need would be to commit a grave, insurmountable error! We give back to each other by refusing to sell ourselves to the lowest bidders imaginable; we whore ourselves for Gothic [gay-anarcho] Communism: by spitting on Medusa's trapdoor pussy before we pin her to the wall, lubricating revolution however we can—during explosive combative sex!

artist: [Harmony Corrupted]

Medusa isn't something that exists in a vacuum, then, nor is it merely a device of police hegemony against criminalized elements who aren't allowed to resist the state's sudden and merciless terror attacks; we can take her as a poetic device and embody furious, horny and rebellious aspects of ourselves and our own frustration, yearning and longing the state will only try to rape and repress labor with. Medusa unseals such documentation, herself an "ancient," found document of the Gothic style.

A new Satanic cathedral, a new master of the universe—us, haunting the counterfeit and abjection process! "Look on my Works, ye Mighty, and despair!" Our fortresses, our operas, our titanic passion something that cannot be contained, silenced or ignored taking us to paradise upside-down [salvation being a metaphor for orgasm that we enact in this life, and pervert in the bargain]! It's a Gothic castle to give voice to rape by playing with it in "unspeakable" forms/darkness visible we can unpack room by room, at whatever pace we require to heal: to express vulnerability yet gain confidence, self-respect and growth recovering from self-hatred, internalized bigotry and impostor/mirror syndrome, etc, on the same road to Hell; re: the postpunk world-in-decay where rebirth is joyously found, the doomed inside gravitating towards the convulsionnaire's psychosexual martyrdom and sweet theatrical release promoting better things, mid-infernal-concentric-pattern, mise-en-abyme and Cycle of Kings, etc; e.g., the haunted house, Gothic castle, or circular ruin [see my work on Metroidvania for more examples]: the monstrous-feminine villain of the classic monomyth, reversed through Gothic homecomings to break Capitalist Realism with, inside the same endless loop of dying space-time!

Royalty are fluent in the language of service and bondage; Gothic theatre is a safe, campy space to play with powerful things that people like, including dark faeries that mirror the Gorgon as—above all else—a strict taskmaster and ironically "cruel" mistress [rawr]. Nothing is more powerful or loved/feared than Medusa, a liberated whore reversing abjection on her Aegis; boundless and bare, the dark faerie—suddenly naked—is exposed as mighty-mighty and upon the black mirror's sleek surface: paradoxically ripe for the taking as she haunts the nuclear model with rape and whose "rape," during ludo-Gothic BDSM, is haunted by nuclear abuse hunting witches! As Matthew Lewis showed us, we can play and speak to genocide by flaunting pain as an aesthetic linked to sex, but stay able to detach from and camp it with royal aplomb!

To better the instruction and regain control during her revenge against profit, Medusa knows your darkest desires. She's seen and done it all, only asking that when it's her turn, you ravish her wrecking-ball ass just the way she likes [with Harmony being agender and fluid in her expression—an avatar of the monstrous-feminine, hence Gothic Communism beyond herself, the war she makes towards liberation seen chaotically on her surfaces and in her dark, wet thresholds]! "There you go! Good boy! Fuck mommy just like that! Mount, now heave to! Ride the lightning all full speed!"

artist: [Harmony Corrupted]

The medieval, faux or not, enjoys marrying popular culture to the language of strength, faulty bloodlines, questionable destiny and weakness [to be weak for someone/show vulnerability around them] that it might adequately speak to larger forces at play/get to the bottom of things [the Gothic loves puns]. Revolution, then, is very much something to get into the mood of through these pernicious elements' flexible camp and persistently rigid "sticking-to" of our arguments. So push her face down into the bed; stab her demon pussy to humanize the harvest! Fantasies of subjugation/dark mastery go both ways; Gothic Communism brings them [and the dark faerie/whore of nature] out of the bedroom [re: Foucault] and into daily life once more! PRAXIS SYNTHESIZED; Medusa can't die/always hungers for more cum from gentlemen callers!

More to the point, invoking Medusa's famous aptitude for punishment [and threshold for pain] becomes an opportunity to let down one's guard and take homerun-style "power shots" of a controlled and playful variety—to spar more aggressively than you might elsewhere when camping rape with some degree of seriousness! To turn up the heat, mid-kayfabe, Medusa [and her veteran initiative] can give as good as she gets, the exposure of nudity something that bounces pain back less like turtles and more like mating porcupines charging their batteries!

model and artist: [Harmony Corrupted and Persephone van der Waard]

Something is always given and received per exchange. As Harmony shows us, Medusa is something to perform towards universal liberation by Gothic means and motivations; i.e., by paralyzing capital through rude, alien suggestions of rape putting "rape" in quotes, but haunted by its darker side on the Aegis. So don't fear the reaper—court her and see what she has to say!

Witness, mid-capture, Medusa's dark castle of unholy butt sex, looming deliciously to devour your misguided sense of piety! To squish your junk and your brain, crushing your stupid, costly preconceptions handed down by bourgeois idiots! To invite you to investigate her tremendous, moon-sized urges and wicked, Kegel-esque palpitations, she'll have you realize [sooner or later] that all workers are gods waiting to wake up and take back what's theirs from state pretenders!

Revolution is a duel, and it pays to be awake; a champion galvanizer, Medusa gets your attention and keeps it. So wake up, take hold, and reclaim through faerie apocalypse [revelation]: we can have what we want/need not be careful what we wish for! This realizes during state degrowth, the latter occurring by vacillating chemotherapy—a dark-pulse tone poem pushing forbidden things along while disguising our faerie selves behind earthly "beards"; i.e., as controlled opposition, shrinking the bourgeoisie like a tumor! Animal magnetism sets in among commercialized doubles; we camp canon by doubling it—achieving actual, genuine rebellion that mirrors false, recuperated forms, inside the same Gothic mode. Actual martyrdom haunts nature as our domain, our psychosexual "martyrdom" flaunting our power [e.g., our plunging necklines or short skirts] to fuck with those who can't rape us short of crossing the lines that we install [re: rape is impossible within boundaries of mutual consent, whose cementing undermines Capitalist Realism and its "boundaries for me, not for thee" nonsense]! Nazis [and liberals/moderates] normalize rape in ways our healing from rape—through the regaining of agency and boundaries, during ludo-Gothic BDSM as a public advertisement—helps prevent!

artist: [Akij Desu]

Such treatment, and its umbral radiation healing emotional damage with "damage," requires concentration in multiple turnings of that word; i.e., as a matter of potency and focus, delivered through concentrated forms; e.g. Blake's corroding fires—to handle with care, but dispense with glee, convincing through the molding of a hellish statuesque by virtue of intense, profound reactions [chemical, physical or otherwise] greasing the wheels. Though merited [and fun] in its execution, the sacking of "Rome" isn't drama for its own sake, but a performative, collaborative vein of counterterrorist activism; i.e., brothel espionage engaged with and expressed through vintage Gothic theatrics' opaque transparencies; e.g., bodies, costumes, masks, roleplay scenarios, locations, idioms, medieval nostalgia, bad puns, dirty jokes, hardcore sex and penetration, lewd commentaries, genre conventions and clichés; physiological responses like sexual tension and release, throbbing orgasms, medicinal pain, belly laughter and all-around letting off steam; the assorted emotional thrills, consent-non-consent, torn panties and exposed genitals of courtly love; the Gothic's obsession with paranormal antics, drama, comedy and all-around mood—all playing with power-as-monstrous-feminine and sex as warlike, stunning and gorgeous. It's what we've been doing for this entire faerie exhibit and indeed, the whole book series: playing with those things that societies the world over value, and which we subvert inside of themselves to help from rape with!

Much of this healing concerns the theft of theatrical devices, onstage and off. Workers steal, cops steal; workers and cops commit violence. Weapons of terror aren't moral or immoral, then; how they're used—during oppositional praxis, hence class, culture and race war—is. Less a single exchange [during regular examinations and emergency consultations] and more an ongoing relationship, it's one that happens as much with mechanism as mechanic on all registers across all groups of workers; i.e., of animals and beings of nature like faeries versus the state and its proponents/doubles tampering with or otherwise intimidating witnesses [through blackmail, extortion, even murder]. One side discourages criminality and rape through doomy language thereof; the other encourages it while reeking like a corpse: a black moon rising but also a string of dark planets seemingly vacant but haunted by Numinous, monstrous-feminine potential!

In turn, faeries are canonically things to be caught, except our beauteous orbs are too big to capture; our praxis, but also our pussies, are wetter and looser than Radcliffe's probably¹⁷⁸ was, those and other social-sexual implements pulling you under our faerie lakes [drenching spheres] and keeping you there—i.e., during live burial as, per Segewick, a commentary on libido tied to various forces/medieval poetics at work, and which we concern with dialectical-material, not psychological models [again, darkness visible and not the murky and far-less-precise models used by those schools of thought that proceeded Marx, deliberately choosing to ignore the historical-material elements he applied to monsters decades before Freud and company abandoned them]! Pillars of monsters, magic and myth, these dark faeries deliver pleasure and pain to prevent trauma, thus command respect and demand discipline from their bottoms: teamwork makes the dream work, healing from "rape" by playing with it, in quotes. As far as survivors go, we're preaching to the choir!

artists (clockwise, starting top-left): [Romantic Rose, Sinead, Harmony Corrupted, Nyx, Victoria, Annabel Morningstar, Mugiwara, Crow, and Angel Witch]

¹⁷⁸ Though given her secretive nature—and tendency to write what, for all intents and purposes, is torture porn—I'd hazard to guess that ol' Radcliffe probably experienced more than her fair share of wet nethers!

"PUSSY VANQUISHED" or "PUSSY SLAYER VANQUISHED," we've done this before, but rebellion is repeatedly and collectively seditious; re: a collage-like drum to beat, time and time again, among a polity of co-conspirators [above] breeding rebellion through sex on the brain—as something to chase down/get to the bottom of by restoring the mobility of activism [and critical thought] from its turgid, praxially-inert stasis and shell. We're not sugar-coating the bitter pill to conceal anything scandalous, but operate through sugar and scandal in faux-medieval to speak to toxic, sinister or otherwise controversial devices that—unobserved and undigested by the picky eaters—can go completely unnoticed. Revolutionary cryptonymy points a big combative sign at genocide to prevent its continuation [often through kayfabe, sex and force duking things out, on and offstage]: a garden of shattered innocence, promoting psychosexual healing through "martyrdom," cultured intuition, and unbridled passion tethered—if not on actual leads—then through bodies, rulesets, and systems of exchange that ground and facilitate the excitement of such grandiose, out-of-control sensations! So do we go beyond our comfort zones; i.e., seeking satisfaction, we adjust to colder comforts warming our plump godly backsides:

(artist: TMFD)

To it, the Gothic—but especially Gothic Communism—is all about application, practice and informed interactions, not rote transaction; i.e., playing with taboo things that we enjoy camping in non-harmful forms, lowering the odds of systemic harm taking place when dashing Capitalist Realism: through fakery and rituals

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

coded to prevent harm, addressing unspeakable things in ways that give them a language, hence voice to speak out with [which capital tries to alienate us from]. In other words, you are what you eat; we're a diet of pain prescribed by us, not the state's harmful, policing varieties! I, for example love sluts and playing with them; i.e., as mommy-like and virally potent, which faeries are, but also, to some degree, make-believe. The cryptonymic, holistic idea is to resonate using controlled substances that, faerie-like and in control, speak to abuse beyond our control that, performed in fake ways, touch on socio-material change through buffers; re: speaking out while protecting ourselves; e.g., we can camp Christianity through faerie-like doubles that—when push comes to shove—let us say to the offended parties rattling sabers, they're "just" faeries; re: the "just play" defense, treating our threats as emptier than they seem, "style over substance."

While silence is genocide and segregation is no protection from rape—and a bigotry for one is a bigotry for all, requiring universal emancipation—there isn't a monopoly on dishonesty and the enjoyment of guilty pleasure/demonic speaking for Great Change through pain, panic and death [dark faeries are death faeries, more or less]. We can lie to protect ourselves, but also be more honest than state proponents with the same lateral, unorthodox devices, enjoying them to endorsing liberation through said machinations [re: Sarkeesian].

In turn, we can be smarter than them when setting up our revelations' cryptonymic hall of mirrors; re: liberation and exploitation share the same spaces, surfaces and thresholds, but also confused, engorged organs of sight/tools of overall perception and disguise. Forget pocket sand, vivid concealment is the dark faerie's primary weapon! Borrowed from medieval thought [of torture; e.g., stigmata, below] and inserted into half-real medieval hauntologies and their dark Aegises, we reverse abjection through the cryptonymy process sundering Capitalist Realism with apocalyptic language: to show and behold just that, in the faerie flesh!

A Great Destroyer mending through the transmutation of darkness and pain, marrying strict to gentle but carrying the usual otherworldly elements of royal command that dark faeries are known for to escape unironic, non-consensual mastery!

artists: [Romantic Rose]

Milton had the right idea; re: "The mind its own place," a thing to swell with darkness visible, allowing for expanded consciousness, mid-activism. Faeries, then, make anything possible, insofar as "death" can happen onstage, but also radical wish fulfilment through repressed desires that, sure enough, carry offstage during our aforementioned dark trades; i.e., of darkness visible, which happen through demonic exchange and transformation as an oft-hyperbolic poetic act; e.g., their alter-ego, superhero/supervillain's too-tall bodies, and too-big boobies [mammoth milkers] and butts' enormous, immodest implications promising profound, improper revelation while cryptonymically winking sardonic charm/radiating faerie ahegao from the bruised-and-bleeding flesh: about half-real potentialities to tilt towards that, unto themselves, "tilt" [enrage] those of the audience still in Plato's cave ["If we spirits have offended, think but this and all is mended..."].

The paradox of rape and it's revenge-made-visible, then—but also the monstrous-feminine as a nurturing-scaring warrior maternal—lies in the immediate visual ambiguity of such reenactments but also the presumed futility in defeating them. Death cannot be conquered, and murder (and rape) always will out. That's what darkness visible is, and by extension, swole' demon mummies, which we'll look at next.

artist: [BS Art]

In this respect, dark faeries [and their infernal castles promoting enormously obscure power] function like Medusa does; i.e., speaking to how rape destroys us [and classically is survived by turning into different objects; e.g., a tree] but, through a radical desire to heal from rape by systemically preventing it in paradoxical ways, becomes the very darkness we've been performing this entire exhibit: a world without rape, the power to prevent it in our hands subverting hyperbolic beauty standards by Gothically upending purity arguments! For the capitalist, they cannot foresee such a place; to show such profound and whorish/profane recipients of abuse—out in the open, playing with rape as an exhibit—is to threaten capitalist with a post-rape planet. God forbid, right? The thought turns them to stone.

Like Satan, faerie royals are gods/superhumans. They tower to provide dramatic effect, but also invite troubling comparison haunting capital with shadows; i.e., for recess and relapse, absurdity and surrealism, they double our desires, but also conventional mechanisms of power used at cross purposes during oppositional praxis: curating a reality—one within that classic Gothic half-reality caught between complete fakery and total reality—to engage with through age-old power fantasies, including royalty and their power to change peoples' lives on a whim [often through ransom and arranged marriages, but also medieval, virgin-queen¹⁷⁹ sex games and all-around Faustian elevation¹⁸⁰]. And, as anyone skilled in the war of war will tell you, warfare isn't just on the obvious fields with clear-cut uniforms; it's a theatre that bleeds into daily life through darkness visible, including sex [especially monstrous sex; re: Amazonomachia more broadly] as something to play out, perform and interrogate while negotiating our rights. That's ultimately what dark faeries are: a theatre of war through psychosexual weaponry that, true enough, is measured by size and aesthetic, but ratified through sex and force performed among or regarding those devices as demonic, dark-yet-visible; re: Faust and Prometheus.

We'll examine those devices more, deeper in the module. For now, recall that demons of any kind [not just faeries] seldom stay in churches, and that states [through a Protestant ethic] aren't overtly ecclesiastical. Nevertheless, there remains a cryptonymic, hidden-visible element of sedition to faeries and their own sense of otherworldly glory making us come [to paradise]—a potential to camp that must be embraced, then crystalized in what we create, playfully developing Gothic Communism using what we got. However we do it—be that armored when nude or nude when armored during the whore's paradox, through kayfabe as psychomachy or Amazonomachia—we are life and the state is death; the state is ultimately incompatible with us, and we camp its inherently unequal canon from exchange to cryptonymic exchange using our shield-like Aegis to have the whore's revenge against profit: "No pasarán!" There is always another princess in another castle, the bare and level sands stretching far away as we quest for the Gothic-Communist Numinous, cryptomimetically liberating Medusa during cryptonymy's praxial synthesis; re: in collaborative exhibits like this one!

So is abjection dialectically-materially reversed through the faerie's demonic trades, its anisotropic vengeance parsed in cryptomimetic and hauntological arbitration. In ¹⁷⁹ Extending to royals not expected to produce a male heir to the throne; i.e., aristocratic privilege, romanced in Gothic fiction since Walpole and through the chronotope as saturated with such promises: of sex and force from a dynastic hereditary standpoint (re: Bakhtin). In short, power is measured in space and time through marriage as traceable through motion as much bloodline, the two hardly separate in Gothic stories throwing them into dis(re)pute!

¹⁸⁰ Generally through sacrifice during quid pro quo.

turn, such litigation frequently occupies chronotopic spheres [re: mise-en-abyme and castles-in-the-flesh] that freeze our attackers in place with darkness visible. Such oscillating duality and liminality is something to occupy across/upon/within people and place—not to rank rape or justify some variant, but prevent all harm while walking away from Omelas as a group of friends [and friends of friends, of friends of friends, and so on].

*Doing show should antagonize and provoke not one, but all: through a similarity amid difference! Found again/for the first time through Gothic paradox and reinvention, we faeries and witches dive into Styx. We do so above water and ground; i.e., out from the forests shrunk by capital and into urban territories made, like Radcliffe's Black Veil, afraid of such things. Their city streets and night skies clouded with smoke, we make ourselves at home; i.e., when bringing Hell home to ferry you there, too—not as punishment, but invitations one and all calling you back to where you belong! "Hell's bells, Satan's callin' for you!"
So kneel if you want! Just have the courage to step on through...)*

"What dost thou want?" Again, the devil is in the details—cloudy from aesthetic but clear as day from a dialectical-material standpoint: challenging profit through the performance of power during ludo-Gothic BDSM; re: specifically that of dark faeries, breaking Capitalist Realism through Satanic (or otherwise abject) wish fulfillment! Their darkness visible promotes a world without end, hitting us where it hurts and pleases to heal from rape. In broaching post-scarcity with medieval pre-capitalist language to have the whore's revenge, the language of unhappiness can lead to happier spheres, blazing a curious trail in the bargain (not all roads lead to Rome):

(artist: Nico)

So concludes the dark faerie (ruler) collaboration! Next, we'll examine a no less strict, but openly warrior class of monstrous-feminine (and its fiery and militant examples of the Amazon taken beyond earthly realms)—swole' demon mummies in a postcolonial symposium about forbidden love!

Trial by Fire: Demon Muscle Mommies (feat. Lady Hellbender and Hela, The Shape of Water)

*Some people say my love cannot be true
Please believe me, my love, and I'll show you
I will give you those things you thought unreal
The sun, the moon, the stars—all bear my seal*

—Ozzy Osbourne; "NIB," from Black Sabbath (1970)

Whereas "Darkness Visible" concerned dark faeries and their subversive ability to get what they want through the aesthetic/collaboration of psychosexual force, their reenactments sometimes had a gentle femme dom character to them. By comparison, "Trial by Fire" considers the fiery "swole" aspects of the monstrous-feminine that lean towards a stricter side of things: the demon muscle mommy's staunch command over nature, and notable intimidation factor during deals; i.e, as whorish, illegitimate traders in lethal force that threaten others in Amazonian ways, and whose revenge (against profit) burns with sulfurous hellfire. It's more blunt and less ambitious, brute force a bit easier to define than darkness visible/the controversial voice of the royal damned; i.e., such matchmaking is short and to the point, these hellish, brutish herbos burlier and more direct, action-packed contenders than their glamorous, brawl-averse faerie cousins. With their taut, muscular bodies, these sexy warlords barrel headlong into danger as something to reenact and wrestle with—a compelling argument of psychosexual force they catalyze/visit on others during the dialectic of the alien's faux-medieval monster-mom battle sex!

(artist: Ellie Maplefox)

Before we dive into the exhibit, a short explanation on demon mommies themselves, followed by their relationship to the imaginary medieval, ending on several distinctions between them and dark faeries (about eight pages):

Demons muscle mommies (which we'll shorten to "demon mommies," from here on out) speak to candidly smutty subject matter (and a classically female readership) that denotes a male/GNC female submissive fantasizing about a monstrous-feminine dominant. Such are Amazons, and by extension, demon mommies as an arguably more criminal, hellish variant (our emphasis again being the royal variety—the bandit queens); it's a performance to do for themselves, but still have a broader audience that evolves and changes over time.

Demon mommies, then, are demon whores and lovers courting prey-like mates through classic kayfabe shock and awe, but also sex and force relaid as a kind of sacrificial "tease"; re: of rape and revenge (often murder) suggested through paradoxically Faustian trades that, as usual, threaten rape as a bread-and-circus matter of capture (unequal power and harm); i.e., as something to normally distance ourselves from, the bargain tearing the recipient limb-from-limb (deals with the Devil are seldom healthy or fair): a childless monarch unchained from reproductive sex, yet one who obviously knows her way around prurient courtship and its horny terror language endemic to underworld locales. To say there isn't some kind of theatrical tension because of that is to have seriously tuned out during the original story!

Faust aside, "Trial by Fire" specifically operates through a postcolonial urge of forbidden love: to have our whore's revenge, doing so through Lady Hellbender (and similar militarized, conspicuously muscular beings—Karlach and Hela, but also male demon lovers, to be holistic; e.g., the merman from Del Toro's 2017 The Shape of Water). Our emphasis explores gladiatorial violence among such locales; i.e., not so much in the act of poetic creation, itself (through darkness), but the iron-grip wielding of unequal power during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Dominants, bondage and collars—the sub wears the dom's yoke during calculated risk/a palliative Numinous to paradoxically perform unequal power and relieve stress from past abuse as poetically inherited from total history's real and imaginary factors; e.g., demon-mommy muscles threatening castration and forced sex, emasculation well-at-home in a Neo-Gothic faux-medieval whose retro-future menace acts as a wraith-like infiltrator of the present space and time: the cushy-yet-recent Western idea of safety and privacy!

To relax, the middle class—who, fearing the deprivation of recently-granted rights by a decaying state apparatus (sticking its assassin's head into seemingly safe spaces like the bedroom, actually still haunted by rape, of course)—began, back then and now, to dread the ghost of the barbaric past (and its shakier foundation's unheimlich notions of ownership, illegitimate force, violent sex and brutal revenge). Whenever and wherever they perform these things, their privileged fantasies seek to sever danger from harm by faking it; i.e., in ways that can bring informed workers closer to nature as something they subsequently fetishize with the hauntological aesthetic of medieval acquisition and consummation: the princess dominated in bed extending to the entire castle, except per the demon mommy archetype has classically swapped genders!

Furthermore, the "castle" during the liminal hauntology of war is a normal home (or person indicative of the home; e.g., a housewife or housemate) adopting medieval intimations. "Home," in the medieval, was a place where sex didn't happen in the bedroom alone (re: Foucault), and whose taboo, aristocratic violence reliably attached to powerful structures (and their infamously cruel rulers) passed down onto more ordinary-looking people and places. Surviving bourgeois hegemony that decays back into older violence caged by capital, these same people—having received the chronotope's oversaturation of displaced, fearsome legends (about raw material and sexual exchange)—may speak to one another during the cryptonymy process about such abuse happening around them; i.e., by showing others that we live in Gothic times: the Destroyer on the surface of smirking whores! So can our playtime put "rape" in quotes and a cap on actual harm; i.e., any caused by the bourgeoisie.

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

The Gothic plays with rape made alien by capital, flirting with chivalry-as-dead brought back to life; i.e., as Walpole once did with glee. Beyond castles, then, its bastard, danger-disco husbandry includes brutal trades during ludo-Gothic BDSM that speak to the ravishing character of older times, minus the harm. They involve the whispered reprisals of banditti henchmen, but also those who typically paid them; i.e., the unscrupulous ladies and lords, but also their classic sites of pretend, questionable, yet ultimately enormous power (re, from Volume Zero: power is something to perform). This means their long-lost castles, deep dungeons and stolen rituals, but also fabulous riches, treasure, and loot overshadowed by blood-money conquest and a disturbing knack for skullduggery (often through gratuitous shows of force; e.g., defenestration).

All encompass power through the law as literally tied to their dubious bodies and bloodlines—crowns and scepters, to be sure, but also the Amazonian idea of warrior culture and strength of a conspicuously athletic sort: the wrong side of the law something to administer in our favor that, all the same, rules/fuels through violence, lust and fear (medieval sovereignty backed up through force)! Experienced diplomats in might-makes-right, demon mommies are bandit queens and black hell knights who let their fists (and thighs) speak for them, doing so that others might defer to their legendary expertise—as judge, jury and executioner!

In short, "the medieval" is a place to fear returning to the present (the return of the assassin, phantom, rogue, tyrant, etc), but also where a great deal of control might be found by reversing state terror weapons in ways that Walpole himself famously did, through counterfeit and camp; re (from Volume One):

While Baldrick also argues how the likes of Walpole use this dichotomy to both erode the presumed "superiority" of classical culture and to fear the medieval world as a dark and brutal place amid this ghost of the counterfeit, I posit that Baldrick is astoundingly incorrect in assuming that

Unlike "Romantic," then, "Gothic" in its literary usage never becomes a positive term of cultural revaluation, but carries with it [...] an identification of the medieval with the barbaric. A Gothic novel or tale will almost certainly offend classical tastes and rational principles, but it will not do so by urging any positive view of the Middle Ages (ibid.).

Yet, this incorrectness stems from the invented, imaginary past as "medieval" in ways that potentially rewrite the conventional wisdoms regarding said past... which Baldrick conveniently ignores. Indeed, the kinds of stories Baldrick is writing about were predominantly written by white, cis-het men and women centuries ago, when queer discourse was in its infancy and racial bias was phased out of the conversation through regressions to a pre-fascist 15th century that was more interested in enjoying one's privilege and playing silly pranks.

This brings us to Horace Walpole, the writer of the first Gothic novel and an ostensibly homosexual (or ace) man who devoted most of his relatively long life to making Gothic not just a label to describe the medieval period, but literally a specific style of campy fakery used to embellish the present space and time through intentionally a historical reinvention: the castle where such oddities could be found and observed (source: "Prey as Liberators").

This same silly-serious idea extends to the people of castles, which demon mummies easily qualify as: queens of Hell if Hell were a neo-medieval wasteland.

To it, ludo-Gothic BDSM is supposed to be thrilling and fun, but also adequate in ways polite discourse seldom is; i.e., by recreating a crude return to the tyrannical home suddenly doubling one's own through larger dialectical-material forces, but closer to a frank medieval voice that, akin to Chaucer's "Miller's Tale," is completely vulgar and bananas¹⁸¹ but invested in the closeness between sex and death, food, and a variety of other poetic devices. When playing with violence and sex as people from the Gothic or Neo-Gothic periods actually did, a reunion with things capital has tried to alienate workers from/with can be a struggle but also a game to delight in; e.g., like Monty Python in the 1960s, but also more recent media getting into the same Walpolean spirit—smiting a dragon (the Capitalocene) about the bollocks!

(artist: Tony Sart)

The Gothic, though historically reviled, critically panned and treated like crude garbage by prude snobs, was and is absurdly popular—not because it was counterfeit or counterculture alone, but inventive, hilarious and badass in equal measure; i.e., graveyard sex through fetishes and clichés, miracles and mad science (staged battles through popular binary arguments' threatening contrast: good vs evil, reason vs madness, big vs small, tight vs loose, nature vs civilization, men vs women, virtue vs sin, us vs them, black vs white, cops vs victims, etc), but also bluffs, gambits, fakeries and bastard shams delivering clarity through confusion as something of power/power-adjacent to perform and perceive; e.g., fake funerals, marriages, bloodlines, duels, scandals, servants and sidekicks, etc, but also demon castles summoned/sought out for their naughty reputations (of vaguely "dark" monster sex), then traveled to in order to temporarily lose control/radically transform into or in relation to demon mommies!

The adventuresome thrill of the castle's opera/danger disco—steeped in bogus superstition, demented emotions, and a hellish charge (adjacent to generational abuse, but also a Gothic potential to shift away from Capitalism)—is both larger-than-life and largely the life and point of Gothic argument (to have power over others and vice versa), but also its vector! "A girl can dream," as the saying goes, and there's nowhere we'd rather be (a home away from home to let off steam with, but also consume canonically forbidden ideas, letting our hair down); demon mommies denote a statuesque presence of strength that reflects classic forms of violence back towards the usual givers of it by the usual receivers;

¹⁸¹ For further examination of this, consider "Back to Jadis' Dollhouse, the Birthplace of Ludo-Gothic BDSM" (2024) from the Undead Module.

e.g., from women to men! If the dark faerie is the queen of terrors through darkness personified, the demon mommy (as we've expressed it, here) is the champ when it comes to brute force, complete daring and physical, heated persuasion (unequal power and dark desire expressed through a sexualized form of combat theatre; re: kayfabe and Amazonomachia).

Several more distinctions, then, before we dive in (three pages). There's an undeniable element of fabrication with demon mommies, but one attached to real people (versus something completely artificial, which doesn't have rights). A byproduct of the tawdry and salacious gossip of enterprising-yet-bored housewives (which Radcliffe most certainly was), they're queens of firepower versus darkness. Even so, both demon mommies and dark faeries embody a kind of abject alter ego that plays out the alien, repressed feelings of oppressed groups, onstage and off: generational anger and revenge, desires to assimilate—even murder and rape! As such, they (and their organs of violent perception) remain prime candidates; re: for forbidden love as a postcolonial device told playfully through Amazonian terror language coming from Hell, especially wrestler's kayfabe. Except, whereas a dark faerie might barely lift a finger to get what she needs, the demon mommy—while certainly no dummy in her own right—will happily do all the heavy lifting (a total thigh queen, left) while hunting for heads, herself¹⁸²!

(artist: Ickpot)

Whereas the dark fairy is commonly femme and enchantingly mysterious (marking her prey with ropes, teeth, glamour and darkness), the demon mommy is shrewd, spicy, masculine and firm; both can capture their prey but she takes hers by force—i.e., direct and without guile, opting to smash and grab through underworld might versus stealth and overtly/exclusively feminine sex appeal (said femininity always occupied by an alien masculine [monstrous-feminine] element). She's competent and battle-tested, a firebrand freak of nature (from a traditional, heteronormative standpoint) whose hauntological, faux-medieval qualities patently evoke "strict" versus gentle domination; i.e., psychosexual, vaso vagal, and predator/prey¹⁸³ confusions of danger and protection the Gothic (and its imaginary warrior-queen cavaliers) are known for, and which genuine abusers—e.g., Jadis or Zeuhl (the former who raped me, the latter who abandoned me but expected loyalty afterwards)—don't have a monopoly on!

¹⁸² Doing so evokes Artemis and similar goddesses of war/the hunt, but also Hippolyta and her ilk. In either case, their collective "virginity" occurs by killing men outright (for trespassing on their land, hence home) or by forcing men to marry them and have their children (the shoe on the other foot; re: death by Snu-Snu)! There's certainly a long history of white-Indian tokenization* to Amazons as "man-eaters" in this respect (the humiliation of men by Amazons part of the latter's ancient copagandistic function; re: as a patriarchal mythical device treating Athenian women as second-class citizens). Even so, it can easily be reclaimed during the dialectic of the alien, and applies equally to demon mommies essentially being "Amazons from Hell" (often two-world people, one foot in each).

*E.g., Samus Aran; re: "In Search of the Secret Spell': Digging Our Own Graves; or, Playing with Dead Things \(the Imaginary Past\) as Verboten and Carte- Blanche" (2024)!

To it, the demon mommy comes from a house where peace is a stranger and war a welcome friend—a survivor of assassins, vendor of malice and purveyor of strict therapy through lucid nightmares lending the Amazonomachy's already medieval, military and hostile gravitas an extra hellish bent. She's a vice character of sorts—bare and naked, an imposing "tank girl" distraction that roars loudly in ways unbecoming the Western maiden/state modesty argument, but presents precisely for those reasons in canonical circles: the femme fatale/sexual weapon/monster to love, but also routinely defeat and cage because she's on-fire with hellish energies; i.e., too hot to handle, thus assimilate! Medusa, in this case, is always an antagonist to some degree, because the state requires one to exist and project their own police abuse onto. For them, Galatea is always Pygmalion's bitch, the warrior whore trapped in his endless shadow and blamed for state shift; re: the Medusa bogeywoman.

Of course, everyone loves the whore; canon does so because her summoning becomes a euthanasia refrain to maintain the status quo with during times of crisis. The Nazi leader and Communist queer inhabit the same kayfabe space and bodies; e.g., Zod and Faora (the latter a Nazi werewolf woman, warrior whore and knightly wet dream for Zack Snyder's neo-conservative superhero vehicle) appear menacingly in Man of Steel (2013); re: during the liminal hauntology of war... only to be bested and defeated after chewing the scenery and kicking absurd amounts of ass; i.e., during the usual copaganda displacements of controlled opposition/false rebellion. Every Radcliffean scapegoat needs a cop to bury them—a rugged, phallic jester dancing in the king's court, these usurpers brandish a black mirror to suggest state fallibility (only to have a dashing hero sweep these feelings aside, breaking the mirror [and the oracle] in the process). Through fascinating fascism, the enemy is both weak and strong!

Sex and force, then, can produce/cater to remarkable tension and/or release, but the demon mommy is often relaxed, in this respect; i.e., she's done this before, at home with the language of masters and slaves, aristocrats and serfs, which she combines through herself. Certifiably queenly but still putting in work, she's not above dirty jobs—an expert jousting happy to take the reins and get down; a strong-thighed Queen Bee at Castle Sodom, her reputation for extreme behavior proceeds her (and whose poetic maneuvers excite similar emotions through vulgar puns¹⁸⁴ and, in case it wasn't already obvious, heroic-villainous body language)!

¹⁸³ For more writing about Amazons and knights apart from here, refer to Volume One's "Predators and Prey': Predators as Amazons, Knights, and Other Forms of Domesticated, Animalized Monster Violence" (2024).

She's also hungry and ambitious, possessing a ravenous royal appetite formerly known to kings that—among a female/partially feminine body—is unequivocally monstrous-feminine. Demonstrating that appetite, she runs the risk of passing traditionally manly qualities onto helpless maidens exposed to someone other than their promised husbands! In short, she's temptation incarnate, but works through a kind of gender swap importing the Amazon style onto more recent medieval hauntologies; e.g., castles, servants and unequal, nigh-scandalous breeding scenarios; i.e., a window into an older and scarier but also fascinating and partially imaginary world! Of knights and damsels, but also ladies bearing less virtue and more lust, such spaces turn regular life under capital inside-out; i.e., a Rabelaisian carnival where the exploration of what is normally denied becomes, itself, boldly normal: ringing the Devil's doorbell!

(artist: Bold Vid Studio)

It might sound odd to white, straight, middle-class women in the Imperial Core nowadays, but women hardly more than a century ago were considered property by the state, of which having extramarital sex (or fantasizing about it in monstrous language) was a common mode of recourse/revenge for these kept persons: to "violate" ourselves, but also the state-assigned boundaries caging us that older authors projected onto a foreign exotic or dated imaginary. What, for older generations, was a push towards liberation for some (fascist feminism), we want to push towards universal liberation. This happens through the Gothic mode, including the consciously ironic language of alienation, scarcity and discord that subversive demon mummies represent; i.e., working towards regular shelter and comfort (often sex), their paradoxical protection realized through such tantalizing "Beauty and the Beast" what-ifs (the marriage of the Ancient Romance and ordinary novel to escape past barbarities, once summoned; re: Walpole's vague castled forgeries).

To it, the Gothic and its imaginary medieval is the quintessential site of rape play waged by the middle class (and other workers, upper and lower) for different reasons (often at odds); mutual consent during rape play/deep passion is good praxis, provided the "rape" is actually in quotes. The concept is to tantalize with excitingly "dangerous" roleplay scenarios, the use of a threatening "lance" inviting the size queen's warrior boast during rough, suitably passionate sex, "That all you got, motherfucker? C'mon, fuck me like you mean it!" Hair down, pussies out, girls (who's fucking who—the power of knowing the courtly exchanges per network—something to arbitrate through girl talk's anger/gossip, monsters and camp)!

¹⁸⁴ "Spread 'em, mount 'em, pin 'em" as Jadis' lepidopterist friends loved to recite.

(artist: Sasha Khmel)

So again, this makes the usual blood libel, sodomy and witchcraft accusations something to level against demon mummies! Like the earthbound Amazon or dark faerie, they are beings to canonically fear and tokenize, embodied by subversive agents in much the same manner that we'd camp in more earthly forms. Keeping the anal Amazon thesis in mind—that agents of terror are subverted through reclaimed terror language, including psychosexual acts of domination tied to areas of dominion (e.g., duels for property and honor, enacted by spontaneous brutal violence and fireworks, at or around castles)—let's get to the exhibit, itself. Reflecting on demon mummies' grim extortion of others to prosecute their own wars, it concerns the whore's paradox as equally a paradox of rape reversing such terror devices to achieve a postcolonial effect/reversal of abjection with demon mummies; i.e., how we usually get your attention: through playful, fatal-nostalgic threats of "rape" during ludo-Gothic BDSM's regular theatrical distortions of state "truths"! When performing unequal power to rebel against state arrangements—i.e., by using guilty pleasure relayed through unlawful carnal knowledge and sinful desire—the best defense is a good "offense" (such indomitable master/slave language often played for effect through exquisite "torture," left).

(artist: In Case)

That's what forbidden love ultimately is, in this case; i.e., the audience falling for scrappy harlots, slutty Valkyries, and avenging angels—our resident queens having fallen from Heaven, themselves, only to punch up from dark, foreboding places during the dialectic of the alien; i.e., by playing at war and sex' intoxicating spells of "rape" to humanize ourselves (and nature-as-monstrous-feminine; re: Medusa) with postcolonial arguments: red-hot rape fantasies, burning with forbidden desires that demon mummies in particular specialize at during calculated risk! "Hell," for Gothic Communism, is a theatrical place to go to and settle our differences, bravely speaking out in ritualized "violence"; i.e., with a corporal punishment rhetoric endemic to medieval, ecclesiastical institutions; e.g., naughty nuns (above), the complicated genderqueer disguise of churchly crossdress—re: Matthew Lewis' Rosario/Matildia/the Devil—carried forwards from the ancient and medieval world into a stereotypically outmoded (operatic), predatory/prey caricature of the Amazonian underworld's traditionally female¹⁸⁵ warrior!

Note: While our focus remains largely on demon mommies like Lady Helldriver and Hela, their function as postcolonial demon lovers remains part of a Gothic-Communist operation. To be holistic (as Gothic Communism generally demands), we'll divert some energies towards other demon lovers, too—e.g., Del Toro's aforementioned merman—and consider the complicated ways that privilege and oppression manifest and overlap; i.e., during an intersectional, solidarized pedagogy of the oppressed. —Perse (exhibit 44a1a1b2: Artist: Persephone van der Waard. Lady Hellbender from Guardians of the Galaxy and Kalach from Baldur's Gate 3 [2023] exemplify the demon muscle mommy archetype; i.e., they evoke the Amazonian threat of "capture, rape and death" put into optional hellish quotes—of DARVO Amazonomachia speaking to evil, demon slavers from nature, whose dire revenge

canonically must be challenged through battle [when Hell comes to Earth or vice versa] but also fetishized [re: death by Snu-Snu] in ways we monster-fuckers humanize: during ludo-Gothic BDSM, camping the monomyth using postcolonial gender[queer] identity and performance!

To it, Gothic camp loves the muscled, bodybuilder guerrilla-as-demon, treated by the state like statuesque criminal hysterics and token, cop-like whores under settler colonialism's black/white binary married to virgin/whore! They're warriors and whores from Hell, the monstrous-feminine straddling the fence insofar as spine-tingling terror [and other body parts] require a bit of visual ambiguity, brute strength and token menace! Hell and its militias aren't for wimps, save to torture them with irony or without!

¹⁸⁵ It'd be easy enough to treat the Amazon as male or intersex through GNC performance (the whole idea already centers around crossdress), but we won't be doing so, here.

Like kayfabe in general, demon mummies are physically very demanding and involved, but also govern liminal shows of force that translate to godly levels of inequality and doubles; re: faces and heels, heroes and villains, but also kings and queens, castles and forced marriages franchised by capital. In that sense, it's no different than the Wild Hunt, Apollo's chariot, or the death coach [vehicles of death and war]—flying gods speaking to latter-day UFO abduction and rapturous, Radcliffean capture tied to the ghost of the counterfeit ["back from outer space"]: moving castles and their dark-disco, giant, castle-like bodies [re: the liminal hauntology of war] taking us away and making an operatic show of it, then having their way with us in the safety of upside-down homes mocking Western variants! Such are vice characters, demon mummies a kind of Amazon "from Hell" that takes their prey [of any gender they want] back to Hell as an infernal, postcolonial territory!

artist: [Jessica Nigri]

Capital divides by design, always through predator/prey in service to profit. From a Cartesian standpoint, then, the state wrongs nature, gendering it as female/monstrous-feminine in "ancient," canonically essential ways it can pimp once antagonized; nature responds by revenge-stealing state brides [often by gender-swapping them, turning men into brides] during reactive abuse. In short, subversive Amazons anisotropically camp the monstrous-feminine as terror language normally used to sodomize nature-as-monstrous-feminine; i.e., when empire decays per capital's usual boom-and-bust cycle, turning nature into terrorist the state counterterrorist [often a token Amazon] can incarcerate, rape or otherwise execute the state's will against; re: geography as destiny along moral territories and iconography that must routinely be cleansed of evil/natural "corruption" through state arbitration and heroic precedent debriding said decay while gentrifying war all over again [re: Tolkien and Cameron's cartographic refrains during the monomyth: punch, stab or shoot nature-as-whore, above].

Whatever the form, state binaries are false, harmful, and unnatural as a matter of function pimping nature as criminal, incorrect, and abhorrent; i.e., per Cartesian thought, heteronormativity and/or settler colonialism. Christianized us-versus-them violence stems from Beowulf vs Grendel; from Columbus onto the Cartesian Revolution and beyond, nature is something to pimp, anything not him and his men being "extended beings" for "thinking beings" to pimp, enslave and destroy by cheaply moving money through them. This great theft [which money is] translates neoliberally into Tolkien and Cameron's refrain, a dubious arrangement of false power per light/darkness that calls for genocide in God's name [more on Tolkien in a bit]: "For in its presence, all darkness must flee." A blanket of the mind, such Capitalist Realism always dresses up as divide-and-conquer territory disputes happening between man/the state-as-straight and nature-as-monstrous-feminine; re [from Volume One]:

The state's various religious/secular ingroups associate entirely with exclusive ownership and universal coercion under state territories over state-assigned out-groups: to belong/to have belongings versus to be owned or used by someone or marked for systemic mistreatment, even death if you fail to be useful to them (the paradox being your death is useful to profit). Here, the state of exception provides the most basic function of capital: exploitation and genocide in service of the profit motive; i.e., the state eating its population according to heroic arrangements of theatrical power tied to bodily expression as dimorphically gendered [source: "Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy"].

These, in turn, codify with older monomythic language borrowed from the means to inspire royal fear and awe, but also lust of a hauntological sort; e.g., scarred and tattooed barbarian women passing for "Vikings" or "Picts" who spit, fart, swear in four-letter words, get mad and "smash"; i.e., doubling as sexual rewards in a time when the state emasculates its own men to sexually frustrate them, then sell them cartoon copies of their biggest wet dreams.

While women, as a whole, remain "lesser" in the pecking order's Great Chain, standouts serve to enforce classical ideas of male dominance; i.e., in a female body that bullies lesser entitled men [sissification]: per a "prison sex" mentality conforming and adhering to patriarchal force inside the Man Box' weird nerd culture. Keeping with Athenian Amazon propaganda, they canonically inspire compliance, not rebellion, as muscled; re: subjugated Hippolytas! Per the euthanasia effect, tokens [not just women, but any traitors] are tolerated so long as they uphold the current order through sex and force: calls to yield/submit and ultimately disperse!

While stating the obvious is an option, a common path for poetic recourse is fighting fire with fire, myth with myth.

Speaking of the aforementioned charioteers themselves, such formidable demon lovers—strong enough to defy the "natural order" by crossing over into the civilized world but weak enough for the state to cage them [re: Eco]—are Galatea built-to-thrill when consumed, but also teach through experience alongside; e.g., size difference; i.e., calculated risk during ludo-Gothic BDSM. They're killer dolls that consist of darkness—as flavored through particular accents that code and qualify the Amazonian proceedings of either text: muscle and fire [versus Amazonian earthliness or faerie darkness]. There's nothing objectively "wrong" with demon mommies; they're simply ways to rarefy and transfer power in-the-flesh: "Your chariot awaits."

Amazons, like other warriors and cops/criminals, have a white and a black side, which demon mommies act out in "hellish" ways. They tend to manifest less as binarized, dimorphic halves and more as moods, good and bad; i.e., inside a monomorphic entity whose base function doesn't change; re: Lady Dimitrescu being a constant "phallic" whore who becomes outwardly furious when threatened, but also turned on: wanting to fuck her attackers to death. In demon-BDSM terms, these categories are not only not discrete, they are excessive and hyperbolic; i.e., nymphomania being an out-of-control "hysterical" libido informed by systemic, externalized trauma that confuses predator/prey mechanisms during calculated risk.

To it, Lady Hellbender is made of shadows and flame, as such—the staged power of unequal strength, of dragons and rarefied cruelty [similar to Count Dracula] that has the desire for company but not the manners; i.e., she tends "flare up" when excited, singing her guests [who, it must be said, sometimes prefer that]. In the demon-lover tradition, then, she demonstrates how forbidden desire is given in ways that distribute power unevenly. According to Hellbender's damned construction, she burns, she dominates; her victims burn, dominated by her as Big Strict Whore¹⁸⁶ [re: "She tall, she tall"]! She is the curious byproduct of an ¹⁸⁶ Size difference is a common way to compensate for not leaning into the emotional aspects; i.e., the "Napoleon" persona versus someone who is strong and silent—though frankly there's no "correct" way to go about this. The best actors combine different elements at their disposal to achieve the desired effect (whatever that is) per case; i.e., regarding those being subjected to their talents and services! To that, Lady Hellbender carries a strict flavor of femme dom (the Amazon), one that plays out through her demonic aesthetic during ludo-Gothic BDSM; but gentle femme doms likewise exist and can use the same/different aesthetics to achieve their own desirable outcomes; e.g., Harmony Corrupted and I.

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

In other words, erogenous pleasure, non-harmful pain and other euphoric sensations determine by context, during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Such performances are generally works-in-progress, tailored to fit the different players working in concert; i.e., I have trauma and want to work through it with Harmony, who doesn't want to harm me (the mark of a good dom). So we work through it, step-

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard

Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

environment both "stuck" and seeking to change. Said change, in turn, occurs inside-outside itself, through poetic cliché; i.e., said conventions being "how people talk," but for her amounts to an oscillating fluency thereof: both through tackiness and lack of tact, a holistic-and-liminal ontological statement encompassing the entire masked ball [the original site of forbidden romance and home of the demon lover invading civil spaces of exchange becoming alien again]! As such, "burning with desire" is a common febrile metaphor describing blood flow and body heat, but also adrenaline when desire climbs and predator/prey confuse in disco-like ways; i.e., the female side of the operatic experience, but turned into a by-step, session-by-session, until we figure out the best way to work such rough play into our psychosexual games and theatre.

But rest assured, while many people have one "speed" with which they normally play things out, switches like myself prefer the ability to adopt different fantasies—thus demonic configurations of "fatal" desire, knowledge and power—when playing with excellent cuties like Harmony Corrupted "on the go/fly." It's a place of magical pleasure, a Twilight Zone of our defense, addressing how we feel:

I'm falling down a spiral, destination unknown
 Double-crossed messenger all alone
 Can't get no connection, can't get through, where are you?
 (Golden Earring's "Twilight Zone," 1982).

Such things are a part to play out during cryptonymy and calculated risk, their darkness visible making actual harm impossible and catharsis all but guaranteed; i.e., a party to perform between different players having fun through exquisite "torture" yielding to individual preference.

In turn, we rock 'n doll in danger discos of our design, divorced from profit and made to help us heal from actual abuse/systems thereof! Genuine exploitation sits adjacent to palliative-Numinous feelings, all existing in the same shadow zone. Those marked by trauma seek "trauma" out in quotes: as made weird in ways that, true enough, seek weird out as something to relate to with; re (from Volume Two, part one):

don't suffer for your art if you can help it. But also remember that trauma attracts trauma, weird attracts weird. The idea is to combine them in ways that alleviate sickness, stress, tension and harm, but also avoid predation by perfidious elements in our daily lives coming from structural abuse: the Gothic castle as a beacon to attract and house the likeminded while the state tries, as it always does, to dominate us through its own victims (source: "Welcome to the Fun Palace!").

So do we make our bones, our own friendship and marriage counselors, during ludo-Gothic BDSM.

Demon mommies reify not just combative emotions, then, but socio-material conditions as "plastic through play." In doing so, they give us a powerfully compassionate voice to subvert, thus counteract, state forms with; i.e., during liminal expression doubling our abusers, onstage and off. Any syndrome (mirror, compartment, virgin/whore, white knight, impostor, etc), disorder (eating, personality, body and/or gender), or monopoly we'd want to interrogate, we may do so; i.e., in a half-real sense. State influence sits in between reality and imagination as informing each other according to state designs upheld or turned upside-down in said territories' total spheres; i.e., desk murder and state atrocities, at large, versus rape play of a campy sort, the latter punching up while arguing for/administering critical thought and dialectical-material analysis as second-nature, over time: through actual Satanic rebellion repeatedly "taking temperature."

Doing so means parsing fake rebellion/witch cops, en medias res (re: Milton)—with state proponents and labor proponents looking the same, but whose cryptonymy functions differently! Function determines function, and rebellion is always anisotropic; i.e., its reversal of polarity concerning power and knowledge operate through imagination and desire, either requiring such "sea legs" to navigate the inevitable confusions that occur when occupying and navigating a constantly changing world flooded with pre-existing trauma; re: its darkness visible.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
 Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

demon-lover version of itself whose confused location jumps between bodies, all operating inside the hauntology/chronotope's shared fever dream; e.g., The Tryanglz' "Burning in the Third Degree" [1984]:

Hypnotize, see the flicker gleaming in your eyes
 It catches me
 Oh, I take it and you'll never let me go
 I'm your prisoner
 I feel the heat of your desire
 I just can't face the fire [source: Genius].

The phenomenology of the danger disco is paradoxical; i.e., two [or more] things true at once, camping and canonizing the notion of female hysteria and desire.

Either make survivors "break down" when triggered, but which they—often involuntarily and without guidance—seek out in ways that accurately describe the disorder of their lived experienced/menticed state informed by external factors; re: gargoyles.

In turn, everything moves in hypnotic slow-motion to speak to complicated feelings; re: the perils of dated courtship threatening the current space and time, a given survivor feeling hunted and desired simultaneously because—for them and their trauma—the difference is never clear-cut. All merge on the same surfaces and within the same thresholds, onstage and off. So, too, does the demon mommy [of a more humanized sort] embody the cowering maiden, demon lover and knightly savior all at once: "chercher la femme" a common female experience that has become, to some degree, hauntologized and myopic [focused prominently from a white, middle-class cis-het female gaze for centuries, left: "I'm being hunted!"] but also a chance to occupy an experience that, for many people, is totally alien to them: to step into someone else's shoes!

In Gothic, these heavy-metal fan favorites survive outside their respective texts to enable praxial synthesis/generate fresh momentum. As things to rebuild like Frankenstein's monster [minus the Cartesian dogma] through fantasy/sci-fi trash, they reify in culturally appreciative, sexually descriptive forms and high/low feelings; e.g., a golem's desire to be loved, or a desire to be protected by someone "forbidden" you nonetheless desire; i.e., through desperation and convenience, unfolding under capital's oppressive conditions! They unfold regardless, and whose mythical lovers take many forms beyond what is normally allowed; re: the demon mommy's Amazonian, incendiary and tank-like body something to canonize for a heteronormative freakshow's Male Gaze, but just as often can exist independent of that: a psychosexual gargoyle/Galatea trapped on the same shared stages while camping canonical superhero beauty standards and heteronormative shows of force—with captivating non-standard showmanship likewise trapped inside various degrees of repetitious convention interrogating myth with myth!

artist: [Marco Turini]

To it, monopolies are illusions, which the state can still argue through its carousel monstrous appeals/menticidal sex symbols, and which we target using the same dream-like aesthetics, left and next page]! By carrying the Gothic's theatrically flippant, monstrous-feminine traditions into the present, such tours des force aren't always costumes, but speak to/for/with our bodies and naturally assigned/state reassigned characters as, to some degree, xenomorphic, thus customizable like costumes.

Butch women want to appear strong and desirable, for example, but do so as much for themselves as they do a paycheck from male [or token] bosses—allegorically inside texts that may appear to support deviations from the nuclear model, but in truth often ultimately endorse the same-old status quo [re: Pygmalions like James Cameron shoving Amazons into chaste "armor" versus openly whore-like uniforms, pimping them all the same]. "Hell" is always a brothel—a restless place of cryptonymy to subvert/play with such things without fear of immediate punishment. To it, sex/women's work extends from art, to porn, to art-as-porn or vice versa; i.e., threatening the center of man's universe through castration fantasy as something to rock out to, onstage; e.g., Jane Tricka gliding her adventuresome mitt up Wayne Brady's leg and past his vulnerable junk [note his surprised facial expression, below]: the queen of the stage "threatening" the male damsel-in-distress [there being an unscripted, improvised element to the gag as it unfolds, in real time¹⁸⁷]!

[source: Whose Line Is It, Anyway? Season 5, episode 21; timestamp: 1:40]

Tin women and dragon ladies, capital alienates those who are different and molds them into forgeries of themselves trapped in metal and other demonic materiel. In turn, these freakshow strongladies seek to reunite themselves with the audience regardless of profit and its associate dogma; i.e., specific members of the audience, while all eyes are upon them, the opera-in-question seeing them as alien main attractions. To grow is to less to escape arrest, then, and more to establish control, mid-stasis. Like the phantom of the opera, both sides of the creative/performance equation search for companionship, these articulations inverted and rife with various double standards and exceptions. Gender-bending and swapping are just other forms of play—ones that humanize those accused of rape, and those wanting "rape" [classically white women] in ways that meet the needs of each without turning either into cops. They skillfully reverse and/or blur the roles of power in ways that include not just dom and sub, but also the gender identity/performance of that, and the legitimacy and terrorist/counterterrorist status of each, etc.

Mommy or not, demons are like music, then; they're chosen for contrast by whoever's arbitrating them. Jazz, blues, funk, bebop, operatic tritones—in music, devilish elements are used for flavor [e.g., flat 5s, 7s and other dominants, diminished chords, Major 7s, etc]. The same goes for Gothic poetics personified, their overtones speaking pointedly to rising class, cultural and racial tensions existing between formerly ecclesiastical institutions bearing out a Protestant ethic; i.e., the eternal war between God and the Devil one that can be used to recruit both entities against workers for capital, or to reclaim either in service to them while walking away from Omelas [and selective bigotry/emancipation].

Such is the case with demon mommies like Lady Hellbender and Karlach's own sodomy/problematic love. As warrior whores threatening medieval dominion—with "medieval" mil spec attire, vaso vaginal sexuality and all-around size difference classically associated with masculine strength—they speak through anger and lust to hyphenate reaping and revenge in multiple directions, but always "from Hell"; i.e., for different groups, for different reasons, using courtly love.

¹⁸⁷ Note how Brady, visibly intimidated by Tricka, falls back on various bodybuilder stereotypes once triggered; and how she—suitably emboldened by the stage as a kind of safe space to push the envelope—happily fucks with him a bit; i.e., taking him to Pound Town, if but for one frightening moment written all over his face. The crowd (including the other performers, right) loves it.

Furthermore, this demonic, monstrous-feminine vector can tokenize for the state, policing the whore with the whore; or it can abject in reverse, workers reveling in these infernal feelings during psychosexual martyrdom: as harmless to all except the bourgeoisie and their strangleholds on moral panic; i.e., what for many is the Man Box [token women unironically acting like men, as TERFs do] and punching down, mid-witch-hunt, but which can also become the endearing [and sincere] appreciation of stacked, capable bodies playing at Hell and its go-to tortures, mid-kayfabe. In a world that increasingly recruits demonic muscle for state, hence colonial, purposes—i.e., tokenizing for fear of total alienation/exile—we want to accept demon mommy candidates/make them feel at home: to have our would-be abusers abandon the triangulation of unironic "prison sex" mentality/Satanic panic [and actual us-versus-them sticks-and-stones genocide] to instead make love through "war" as ironic hurly-burly hanky-panky!

artist: [Word2]

Thick-and-juicy cuts of dark [thigh] meat, they're less beefcakes topping from below or bottoming from the top and more promising hellish sodomy and total dominance [a Faustian flavor of "torture," except subs live for such strict service]. But, because it is a performance, there's always room to camp rape and add a nurturing and self-fulfilling element to Hell; i.e., our strong lady from Hell protects us and smashes our enemies, but she's got a smile that melts your heart, and brains to play games, sing songs, and clap cheeks that goes with all that molten, luscious brawn!

In other words, she's the Green Manalishi with the two-pronged crown; i.e., the indulgent, dualistic succubus-incubus of an anisotropic class character—one whose "almost holy" melding of disparate cultural and racialized elements pointedly upset heteronormative [thus setter-colonial, Cartesian] sex and gender norms; re: to have the whore's revenge against profit and the elite/their cops as straight. All happen vis-à-vis dialectical-material arrangements of demonic sex and force, of the libido—of our aforementioned "Pound Town" being staged, like always, as a gay dark place of dreams hovering near the surface [with Judas Priest's own queerness being obsessed with such things]:

Now when the day goes to sleep
 And the full moon looks
 And the night is so black that the darkness cooks
 Then you come creeping around Making me do things I don't want to do Judas Priest's "[Green Manalishi," 1979].

The classic Gothic demon is reconciliation with one's home, thus legacy as fallen, rotting and doomed. Keeping with older writings of mine, "demon" refers to something you often fight to overcome/defeat, mid-exodus;

i.e., as unconstrained by human limitations and all at once consolidating them. The word often refers to psychomachy as tied to a location, specifically a chronotope; e.g., Jason Lee's demon from Dragon [1995] forcing him to look upon his grave to reflect on a cursed, concentrically trapped bloodline [above]. Capitalism reflects onto him, maintaining its Realism during mirror syndrome: courting the demon lover by making love as warriors do—through battle!

By extension, demon mummies aren't mere fun and games of a light-hearted sort; they're death omens—forcing us to look ignominiously upon flaws and hubris in our own lives, but also to reenact in playfully psychosexual, abstract ways. Haunted by genuine systemic, thus generational trauma, we play with endless demonic forms;

i.e., any that can better alleviate/counteract the myriad harm said systems perfidiously cause: to rise up from the street in Hell's gutter ballets/castle narratives popularized by Neo-Gothic trash and their painful cryptonymies.

Monsters in mazes, demon mummies love to tease; i.e., by beckoning you with demonic pull into the infernal concentric pattern for where liberation must occur [re: Plato's cave]! There is no outside of the text, loves; there is only change inside a system of differences pushing towards one where these differences aren't punished [re: me, vis-à-vis Derrida]! Silence is genocide, so make some fucking noise!

Breaking the historical-material cycle, then, happens through mentalities and intuitions that aren't second-nature, but become that way through good play overwriting bad in Gothic "safe spaces" built to explore demonic things; re: during calculated risk. "I'll storm your castle!" she jeers, threatening psychosexual violence. To which I would happily respond: "Yes, storm it, mommy! Storm it! Depredate my bussy!" But always, a part of me still burns in Hell, sitting at the canonical Dark Lord's throne—not my playtime fantasies and submission-by-choice under a competent femme dom, but the shadow of actual abuse I survived and which haunts the venue long afterwards [re: Jadis]!

The fact very much remains: you can't hug the alien, thus familiarize yourself with Medusa/the unfamiliar [to normies] without seeing all sides of existence under state, thus police violence; i.e., its serialized/episodic historical materialism through demonic pastiche: retelling the demon mommy as a kind of superhuman folk hero! Reifying human qualities and structures in small, but feeling larger-than-life, they emblemize war personified in ways that we, when camping the canon, need to avoid neoliberal false hope upholding Capitalist Realism; i.e., not to recapture the financial success of state [super]models and mythical, never-actually-existed Golden Ages, but to camp them and break their Superstructure to bits using superhero shorthand; re: with alter egos and abject doubles, but also Hollywood glamour and regressive power fantasies unable to monopolize on terror weapons, hence props, makeup, costumes and roleplay!

Demon mommies are whores and the whore is always a threat—one to canonically revive, post-boom, and blame for capital's inevitable bust period. In canonical terms, the line between superhero and villain, then, is notably razor-thin, the language frequently comic book in its centrist temptation arguments; e.g., Superman and his extraterrestrial superpowers, Batman and his endless gadgets, or Thor and his magic hammer—all conveniently threatened by a dark and/or queer-coded monstrous-feminine, if not equivalent to the hero, then a "close second" Venus twin emasculating hero and home alike: a Promethean scapegoat inkblot for their weakness/flagging reserves, and per the creation of sexual difference, a monomyth dragon they slay once more to prove their doubtful manhoods; e.g., Hela—the god of death, below—quite literally withering Thor's manhood [erectile dysfunction] while having one hand behind her back, deftly emasculating him/throwing his power into question to bring Hell home to roost¹⁸⁸. She doesn't just measure up, during a dick-measuring contest; she puts the boys to shame:

Despite the state-imposed death sentence and bad rap, the demon mommy almost always enjoys her job: one, because she reliably "kills it," confidently slaying her enemies' will to fight while kicking self-righteous ass, mid-sermon; and two, the men appear as scared puny weaklings. Suitably overreacting against a sexy-and-stylish dominatrix, the former bemoan the latter's strict sense/aesthetic of power and death rhapsodizing state shift. In Hela's case, she isn't strictly muscular in her physical appearance, but she nonetheless performs strength as something that is muscular/masculine in how she wears it; i.e., owning it while gleefully saying to her would-be owners, "Imagine a world where you weren't cops, but kneeling before me!" She's a butt pirate, a Radcliffean sex bandit to conjure at the story's start, then banish again by its end.

¹⁸⁸ The plot of Thor: Ragnarok (2017) being to foist Asgard's imperial sins onto Odin's evil daughter (evocations of Virginia Woolfe's "Judith," the fictional sister of Shakespeare from her 1929 novel, A Room of One's Own); i.e., that women "can't have power" because they're "hysterical" and always seek revenge against the Patriarchy pimping them; re: gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss.

Despite state authors framing Hela as the Nazi-Communist tyrant¹⁸⁹ whose "farming" they can repeatedly sanction through her prescribed, essential illegitimacy—meaning as a feminist bugbear for cops to attack, much like any unruly whore—Hela lives on, post-execution; i.e., as the phantom, terrorist, monstrous-feminine avenger/ghost of the counterfeit that peoples of different socio-political persuasions can happily get behind [or vice versa, to have Hela thoroughly peg them out¹⁹⁰!] She's a Radcliffean strawman/fairy godmother to raise and burn, her victim's invasion fears snuffed out by her bastard's coming into [and going from] the Imperial Core's forgery of paradise: a colossal homewrecker/monumental-if-gorgeous fake who does so with pleasure and flaring hysteria, calling the heroes to the void lurking at the center of their bogus castle!

Bury her alive, if you want; this Bleeding Nun/faggot witch always rises from the grave, her own cryptonymy speaking vengefully through blindfolds and gags to Medusa's usual silencing!

Keeping with Orientalism and other persecutory schemes, it's possible to modulate such intimations without defaming and segregating other cultures.

Even so, our demon-mommy wish fulfillment needs to occur in ways that overlap with daily life: the enormity of forces that grow to seemingly endless size, and overshadow not just our own lives, but those who came before and after us; re: death translated into anxieties of inheriting one's place in empire. Such demons adopt a hungry desire to destroy not just the individual, but the entire bloodline because capital demands it and liberation requires it; re: Hawthorne's American families always rising and falling in America [the expendability of the middle class, gatekeeping assimilation/safeguarding the elite]. We must challenge this, and do so through the pulpy inkblot language of the imaginary past speaking to buried atrocities, per the ghost of the counterfeit hiding in plain sight: the bad parent cryptomimetically haunting all replication/the panopticon.

¹⁸⁹ The character was originally written by Jack Kirby and Stan Lee, thus echoes many of those writers problematic attitudes about American heroism on the global stage.

¹⁹⁰ A double pun; i.e., to "peg" as in, fuck with a strap-on, and to "peg out," meaning to kill. A classic double whammy that Medusa revels in!

While vital to growth, pain is an acquired taste that can motivate power to flow towards workers instead of the state. Doing so happens per ludo-Gothic BDSM playing with passivity and aggression, masculine and feminine, etc, to foster not simply gender trouble, but parody! Self-styled terms like "butch" or "mommy dom" aren't simply applicable to Lady Hellbender or Hela as demon mommies; they speak to agency over our bodies and avataristic extensions of our bodies, sexualities, gender identities and performances, which the state will try to tokenize and prescribe back as controlled opposition—i.e., the common parlance of those who traffic in sex and courtly love, playing the victim and blaming us as victim, again per DARVO and obscurantism! We protest in duality during oppositional praxis, gender-swapping such stories but still threatening to take our admirers with us through paradoxical theft; i.e., not for profit, but back to Hell where we belong! Free from state bondage, forbidden love might yield a postcolonial effect [female or not, left]:

Such demonic courtship is often cute and slow, but guided by forbidden feelings that threaten to explode and expose the maiden as whore-like; e.g., the fairy princess [or some such submissive] experiencing a sudden desire for raw, extramarital sex; i.e., anything outside state-sanctioned models, thus treated as "from Hell," animalistic, etc.

These, in turn, commence with the coded expressions of interest/maid-and-butler dialogs that—as the night follows the day—routinely guide the audience away from any novel-of-manners approach and towards naughty sex slumming it with monster lovers; i.e., in spite of the dangers and societal judgements stigmatizing both differently during the dialectic of shelter and the alien: the princess opting for the monster—not to damn or exploit them, but humanize them, mid-risk, while disavowing any state-approved, nuclear forms of "coupling" in the process [re:

Radcliffe's male heroes/good guys, which the heroine "gets" after surviving the demon lover]! She abjures state propaganda to wed the outlaw!
 In turn, all can mean different things during the abjection process, and generally all at once. Monster love stories like Persephone and Hades, Beauty and the Beast or The Creature from the Black Lagoon [and similar stories rehashing the same basic concept, above] commonly portray the princess as never from Hell, but per the Gothic, yields a second trickier explanation; i.e., a reunion with one's lost home: the secret princess and her buried feelings tied to Hell's imaginary ancestry! Hell is a choice, and a useful one.

Of course, not everyone enjoys such "gimmicks"; e.g., Pallavi Dandamudi, who writes in "Here's Why the Ending of The Shape of Water Doesn't Work [2019]:

If Eliza had been similar to the amphibian man all along, then her love is no longer a statement on the human capacity for compassion. The depth of Eliza's character lies in her ability to love something that most humans would be scared of or repelled by. The plot portrays her as a simple yet courageous, silent yet powerful human being. This ending just takes away from that, it makes her like any other biological species who is attracted to another member of her species [source].

But these loaded, messy and combative representations of human and inhuman still poetically address eugenic/ethnocentric ideas of superior/inferior caused by capital and felt during a captive fantasy about forbidden love/dark desire; i.e., one that struggles to escape its own haunted history while forging new healthier myths/power fantasies using the same stuff.

Whatever the form, these liminal engagements mix danger with protection to yield our postcolonial effect; re: mid-terror-language, demon mommies [and similar sexual outlaws] protect those who feel small and/or vulnerable regarding the other ends of a given love triangle; i.e., as a prolonged and uphill battle, one where class, culture and race war wage for workers by workers, not traitors [cops] upholding the status quo! If such in-groups and tokens use monster love to abject the usual out-groups with, we upset the state's dogmatic orderings of nature through these self-same stories having two worlds collide!

Except, whether going into Hell or bringing Hell back to Earth, we must do so without permanently regressing towards the very systemic modes of animal survival [e.g., Alien and the cat] whose unironic "jungle fever" capital endlessly relies upon! Instead, we must inspire post-scarcity while attaching its emphasis upon those we help liberate, mid-fetishization: to set free, not banish or limit to a wordless role that prioritizes one group over another [and which The Shape of Water admittedly does; i.e., outlawing the girl for loving the monster she speaks to through sign language, but for whom itself seldom gets a word in. It is always alien in ways Del Toro doesn't let the creature speak to power with¹⁹¹!]

In short, there's always a foreign element of fascination and fear to such curiously fatal attraction [re: the ghost of the counterfeit]. And yet, monster love stories opine on a scarcity of connection [sexual or otherwise] under capital, and the complicated realities that love triangles afford; i.e., where the privilege and oppression remain unequal for everyone involved, and speak in popular-but-dated forms of murky translation involving lopsided arbitration; e.g., the princess having material and social power over the monster [who she can report to the authorities, should she choose] while the monster often has physical power over her with its raw animal strength! Demon mummies, by comparison, classically keep the strength and reputation known to all demon lovers, but also retain some medieval degree of affluence and lordship over their chosen prey [regardless of gender though often male, insofar as Amazons classically target men; re: to feminize them].

Regardless, the collective road to salvation [and emancipation] requires finding common ground; i.e., in stories that frequently gentrify one side and treat the other as sexually exploitable through mixed metaphors, and whose tricky mixtures of power imbalance we must camp inside themselves; re: in Hell as it can be found on Earth, any demon couple intimated by an earthly double and vice versa; e.g., The Shape of Water evoking the unironic moral panic seen in Birth of a Nation or survived during the Wilmington massacre, but per Del Toro's Mexican roots, pits a non-princess ethnic minority [and her token friends—a closeted gay painter and a woman-of-color co-worker] against someone even more alienated by the same white straight state! The balancing act is avoiding predation by one side against another while collectively punching up through the wordless power of forbidden love!

Such stories' longing and nagging emphasis on love language [and language gaps] orbit conspicuously around a shared-if-uneven desire: sex and companionship of different kinds. You wanna really get laid/make friends? Make the unsafe feel safe again, acting as you do in good faith.

Show us restraint, control, and understanding with those big capable mitts of yours; or, if you have the means to persecute us and our demonic elements, don't!

¹⁹¹ I.e., the James Whale problem, a queer director taking away the Creature's voice: as it was normally expressed—the way Shelley intended—against Cartesian men.

"Be gentle!" we ask, then tremble as you "ravish" us [or spare us]. Parry and thrust in ways that—while they can inflict pain—do so in ways that ultimately feel good and are encouraged/adored for their sense of similarity amid difference, healing from rape during a given pedagogy of the oppressed:

I don't want to tame your animal style
 You won't be caged
 In the call of the wild Scandal's "[The Warrior," 1984].

The Gothic specializes in crossovers, committing the everyday offense of daring to see the demonized not just as human, but desirable in a postcolonial world. Yet, such presentation is still liminal, everything doubling and mirrored on the same surfaces, inside the same thresholds. While love-as-theatre commonly marries sex to force in martial forms, empires use it to pointedly instill fear and pacification using demon mommies; i.e., through shadows of police abuse and slave revolt, the former genuine and the latter greatly exaggerated by conflating land-back arguments with actual police brutality dressed up as rape epidemics, drug wars, and crime waves, etc.

Beyond demon mommies singing to release tension, it bears repeating that such DARVO-grade, vae victis ["woe to vanquished"] overtures classically manifest as demonic awakenings that prescribe genocide. Faced the popularity of setter-colonial "musicals," postcolonial rebels of different kinds camp what has become blank parody/"camp" in quotes [re: Jameson]—doing so to pointedly and perceptively humanize all state victims; e.g., of white pioneer women towards Indigenous Peoples, normally tokenizing against them through rape fears that blame state targets instead of state structures; i.e., in half-real spaces of play and politics, the idea of monster love something to navigate and survive with an animal dance partner we're drawn towards, but don't wish to prey upon as the state desires [with white women expected to quickly use, then discard, non-white slaves as disposable sex objects]!

While inequality and preferential mistreatment generally see one side punished far more than the other is, rape ranking isn't productive or really the point. As a matter of the pedagogy of the oppressed, privilege should assist in undermining such structures to achieve intersectional solidarity against the state; i.e., in holistic ways that people actually relate and respond to. Hence the monster and love story anisotropically addressing a shared-if-uneven human condition under state mechanisms: calumny and stigma, retaliation and remorse. Women fear rape and those branded as rapists fear accusation, the two playing these out on either side of a given exchange that allows for demon lovers of all kinds [not just mommies; re: Del Toro's demon daddy topped from below by the movie's spunky-if-unassuming heroine, their roles changing back and forth as things escalate/progress]. In turn, to even think of the other as "equal" becomes treason, sedition, a thought crime in canonical doctrine. So it must be disguised in ways that point to the trauma being discussed during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Anything the state can poetically combine to divide along the usual persecution networks, we mix-and-match; i.e., during the cryptonymy process, using it [and demon lovers] to cross boundaries and tear such cordons down; e.g., with demon mommies, but also mermen from the black lagoon. The boundaries that banish either to Hell are the apex of conspiracy abused by those with privilege; i.e., to enrich themselves on an individual level as much as systemic ones, working as much with ordinary things as not; e.g., Rebecca Watson's "How Dave Grohl & Foo Fighters Put Actual Lives at Risk" [2024]. As they go hand-in-hand, so must we, but in reverse of what amounts essentially to glorified misinformation. We mustn't hesitate to check it, and cement our own arguments in the mold.

In turn, these cryptonymic appeals to segregation or intersection sit inside pioneered discussions, they and their alliances couched in dated, hauntological fantasy rhetoric during liminal expression; i.e., as normally dominated by Cartesian orderings of the universe, which our holistic offerings offend on purpose. Paradox is to find one at odds with such paradigms, subverting their language to offer up visually similar but functionally alien alternatives: the golem-esque Amazon queen

"man-spreading" her hairy bear snatch on her animal-print power chair while lording over her little, always-was goblin cumslut [captured, taken by force and kept for pleasure, below]. To reverse abjection is to play with its stigmas and taboos, its threats of capture, bondage and torture speaking to Persephone trapped in Hell in more ways than one!

artist: [Flare Fox]

For better or worse, such things carry weight and instigate consequences we control; i.e., through monstrous dialogs about control. "Rape" enters quotes onstage and off, then—a way of life that yields liberatory sentiment through "torturous" castration aesthetics [re: the Archaic Mother/phallic woman]: xenophilic art of couples profoundly happy with the dominator's humiliating arrangement as designated by them [an anisotropic reversal of the nuclear order's polarity of husband and wife, but also girl-on-girl love, interracial¹⁹² relationships and other such canonical "unspeakables"! As with demon mommies, it's seen as embarrassing and guilty to enjoy such things—and indeed, there are pernicious aspects we must critique of the demon mommy rape fantasy while enjoying it—but to swear them [and monster battle and rape] off entirely is foolish. Postcolonialism needs empathy as found among monsters; i.e., during the dialectic of the alien, the latter's ubiquity owing to its popularity and age. Allegory, androgyny and monster-mommy kayfabe are as old as demons are—as old as acting is, thus masks, costumes, and muses; sex, drugs and rock 'n roll; martial arts, stage performers and prize fighters [often mixing onstage and off as half-real spectacles; e.g., with Muhammed Ali loving wrestlers and monster movies, calling

¹⁹² Such things can be performed with other people, or with poetic extensions of them; e.g., sex toys that—through size, color and shape—represent things outside our normal experience as much as anything ordinary or "realistic"; re: the classic Gothic juxtaposition of the everyday "novel" versus the Ancient Romance extending to roleplay and toys:

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

The gimmick transforms through context; re: by illustrating mutual consent through playing with forbidden elements. To that, such spaces let workers change clothes and colors of different kinds, but also offer various openings in a tantalizing gesture of exposure and invitation, as well as exploration of and for different kinds of people looking in on the fun. White girls are classically "threatened" by BBC in traditional porn, for instance, but through their own pornography can illustrate mutual consent simply through selection; i.e., the ability to put whatever into their holes that they want (a nightmare scenario for straight white men who want to control said women; i.e., in every aspect of their lives, including who they have sex with or who they fantasize about/perform with).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

his infamous opponent, George Foreman, "the Mummy" on account of his long-guard defensive style¹⁹³].

To it, personification is equally old, as are comedy and drama in kayfabe, told with shadows and flames as popular high/low forms of discourse about war and rape, but also vulgarity at large; i.e., cartoonishly monstrous like Amazons, their statuesque bodies made-from-clay and infused with that mysterious spark of life; re: the fire of the gods as seen with Victor's demonic Creature. The stuff of con men, grifters and charlatans, but also communicators, thinkers and actors, all stem from the ancient world's bread-and-circus combat flowing into medieval varieties, followed by modern nostalgic forms of either [and other] time periods.

All heroes are monsters, meaning demons [mummies or otherwise] can be whatever we need them to be that represents ourselves and our struggles, not the state; i.e., to experiment and figure out what we prefer [with orientation and gender conformity or nonconformity often having a congenital element, similar to phobias and kinks]. All the same, no one is exempt from duality and paradox per nature and language. Exploitation and genuine harm sit adjacent to parody in ways that cross over during reprisals; i.e., us being attacked by reactionaries for speaking out through theatre, blending comfort and discomfort as demon mummies generally afford. Through them, we look "under the hood" to see what we're made ¹⁹³ John J. Raspanti quotes of Ali vs Foreman:

"George Foreman is nothing but a big mummy," Ali said. "I've officially named him, 'The Mummy.' See, you all believe that stuff you see in the movies. Here's a guy running through the jungle, doing the hundred-yard dash, and the mummy is chasing him. Thomp, thomp, thomp. 'Ooh, help! I can't get away from the Mummy! Help, help! The Mummy's catching me. Help! Here comes the Mummy!' And the mummy always catches him. Well, don't you all believe that stuff. There ain't no mummy gonna catch me" (source: John J. Raspanti's "Forty-Nine Years Ago," 2023).

The fact remains, people love monsters, and frequently turn up at shows like those to see monsters do battle (often men of color), and because these performers rarefy politics and bloodspots tied to specific places and warring geopolitical forces; e.g., Ali and Foreman in Kinshasa, Zaire, their event billed "The Rumble in the Jungle." Indeed, boxing is commonly called "war personified," the fighters involved representing different countries and peoples whether they want to or not.

To his credit, though, Ali was staunchly anti-war (outside the ring, anyways), going so far as to refuse the draft even if it cost him his license and landed him in jail:

On June 20, 1967, the great Muhammad Ali was convicted in Houston for refusing induction in the U.S. armed forces.

Ali saw the war in Vietnam as an exercise in genocide. He also used his platform as boxing champion to connect the war abroad with the war at home, saying, "Why should they ask me to put on a uniform and go 10,000 miles from home and drop bombs and bullets on Brown people in Vietnam while so-called Negro people in Louisville are treated like dogs?"

For these statements, as much as the act itself, Judge Joe Ingraham [through a blatant act of judicial legislation] handed down the maximum sentence to Cassius Clay (as they insisted upon calling him in court): five-years in a federal penitentiary and a $10,000 fine (source: Dave Zirin's "When Muhammad Ali Took the Weight," 2011).

In turn, activism and theatre often go hand-in-hand—not just for Ali, but for all performers and consumers of monsters, onstage and off; re: of demon lovers, mummies included!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

of and how we tick, but also to express ourselves in posthuman ways tied to the imaginary past [and its usual poetic indulgence] walking around:

artist: [Jan Rock]

Individual examples spent, I now want to spend the rest of the exhibit articulating demon mommies and postcolonialism through a more "big picture" lens. To it, kayfabe is liminal. Whatever its form, the fighting happens as much offstage as on; i.e., as much between the state and workers at large as between two performers being viewed. Like demons lovers overall, such things walk the line between reality and make-believe, madness and method, ancient and modern, masculine and feminine, total bullshit and pure truth, and male, intersex and female; in turn, class war weds to culture and race, all while the stage and its lovely inventions, props, stunt people and special effects become ours to use. While magic "isn't real," belief and perception are; as a matter of stage magic, then, great power lurks inside illusions and entertainment, the larger-than-life character of stage heroes [and their bodies] bearing out tremendously persuasive and representative, but also smuggling potential. While power is an illusion, we might as well use its splendid lie to assign our values to such startling and potent beings; i.e., rescuing their "Trojan Horse" function from police institutions, to instead become folk-hero role models for those who have no voice in the world [stand-ins until they find their own ways to speak out]!

All the while, it's possible to subvert canon while raising concerns about popular media's culturally appropriative/sexually prescriptive elements. Descriptive sexuality can likewise be conscripted through Rainbow Capitalism, which—along with everything else—we camp during ludo-Gothic BDSM using demon mommies. This camp serves multiple purposes, including outing our enemies. As I argue of revolutionary cryptonymy through heroic expression [from Volume One]:

[revolutionary cryptonymy] remains an utterly vital aspect of proletarian praxis—one that challenges state monopolies through the very things they try to control: morphological expression through monstrous and heroic performance, but especially animalized, hauntological examples like the Amazon or knight, as well as the more famously operatic, feudal sites of sexual danger to which they represent and/or navigate—Gothic castles as killing grounds for a state predator's prey-like designations.

To that, [...] revolutionary cryptonymy invokes liminal expression as a cosmetic, conspicuous means of useful disguise within state monopolies of violence, terror and in connection to those dated things, bodily expression. Together on antiquated stages, the deliberate use of dated masks, costumes, props and other performative elements hide activism's sorties imperfectly within the trauma of canonical Gothic language and its complicated territories of expression; i.e., as a means of rebellious camouflage, useful for blending in and revealing the bad-faith nature of state proponents in shared, thus policed, spaces and dialogs. On said stage, reactionaries and moderates wear masks to hide themselves in common monstrous language; but when they respond to our Athena's Aegis having doubled their mask, said mask slips from outrage defending state monopolies within nerd culture [source: "Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy"].

But apart from striking fear into the hearts of our enemies, the practice is admittedly self-satisfying and -serving. Insofar as power and demons are simply fun to play with, singing and theatre feel good. So does wearing costumes and acting out forbidden desire [sex or otherwise] become fun to watch; i.e., to defy the state as demon lovers, including mommies, happily do during monster love stories [often for the drama, but also the pornographic elements, below]!

Aside from toys, then, a huge appeal to BDSM lies in surrendering power as, oddly enough, its own kind of power [to become like a kid again, while playing with adult materials]. This aesthetic can involve someone big that—herbo or not—acts uncharacteristically gentle with someone they could visibly break, as much as someone small surrendering to a larger dom, or a dom aesthetic lending an element of "taming bears" to it [or a sub as strong as a bear]. It also speaks to asymmetrical warfare; i.e., as something to communicate/relate to and with during ludo-Gothic forms. None are "superior" insofar as challenging the state goes, but do utilize preference during monstrous code; i.e., demon lovers, whereupon demon mommies may assume a variety of dated cryptomimetic positions and embodiments, which echo trauma during the cryptonymy process: to best show and hide things that rebellion needs to destabilize the current world, putting a postcolonial one in its place!

artist: [Jan Rock]

Any way you slice it, great power is something to relate to in ways that historically threaten rape; i.e., someone looks strong enough to cause harm, as demon lovers generally do. Here, though, such rape-fantasy counterterror is not only not harmful, but paradoxically empowering and fun because it occurs within boundaries of faux-medieval play where both sides rewrite and reinforce the rules [thus reestablish mutual consent]. Fear of the alien is inherited by workers born and bred inside colonial bodies, then rewritten in postcolonial terms, onstage and off. When indulged in—and even by ace parties and their public nudism, playing with psychosexual trauma—such forbidden fruit becomes fuel that gives us [and our revolutionary engines] straight fire: to turn the frogs gay!

Whatever the gender[s] being explored, monsters contain a class character among the gendered elements; and while Imperialism perpetually makes the lives of others their business, the fact remains you only need that special someone [excepting polycules] to make you happy! In turn, the myth of the rape epidemic/dark slaver tries to suggest women [or those treated as women] don't want dark things/actually desire state-assigned mates and nothing else. Yet, per the whore's paradox, they so often do, and not because the state sells nature-as-alien back to them, mid-genocide! Down to play [and fuck] during ludo-Gothic BDSM, they humanize what the state can only dehumanize; they endeavor reclaim and hold onto the very language of "darkness," mid-consumption. So does ethicality become a matter of informed consumption [a notion we'll return to, in Volume Three].

The princesses of revolution don't care to trap the demon lover inside an abject "slumming" role; and ideally the dom doesn't want to brutalize us in reality during calculated risk. We want to let off steam and enjoy unequal power together as a shared way of life; i.e., one doubling as a teaching device that can show people how not to act like cops despite the power imbalance and shadow of police rule [with cops raping others through fetishized power imbalance that has a gendered character to it; re: Man Box/"prison sex" mentality and TERFs].

In truth, there's so much room to play with power through demonic language's literal and figurative crossfade. Trans or not, some men want to be manhandled by demon mommies; some women want to be "ravished" and taken into captivity [to sit by a dark throne]. The monster lover fantasy is generally a fleeting one—often more fun in one's head [or in half-real spaces of demon BDSM where some irony is present]—but not because it is objectively wrong and shouldn't happen; the ephemeral quality to demonic desire and reunion speaks to repressed, delegitimized arrangements of power the state can only pimp and police, not practice in good faith. "Hell" in reality is generally safer than state ideas of paradise, which its pimps aggressively sell to semi-frightened but equally-interested and curious women pining for "the other side"; and those treated as women [or "black, of Hell/nature," etc] remain informed by Gothic opera and fairytales—i.e., where the woman falls in love with the monster as being more human than her assigned white knight!

Taken a step further by Pagan/GNC/non-white authors and actors, our additional dimensions and cracking eggs make a Heaven of Hell or vice versa, thus can reverse/swap already-gendered roles; re: by using demon mommies to say things about our oppression/desire in uniquely trans, intersex and non-binary morphological forms that intersectionally solidarize with other struggles: to love and be set free from state abuse/control when allegorically transforming their demonic language, ourselves; i.e., humanizing our allies during the same shared struggle, punching up from Hell! So while Amazons are classically AFAB, AMAB princesses likewise have their own "come hither!" poise, doing to beckon those treated like prey by the state: "Don't be shy! It's safe¹⁹⁴ to play with me!"

artist: [Julian Michaels]

Queer or not, everything happens through ludo-Gothic BDSM, reclaiming the neo-Victorian bedroom to turn it [and its Protestant ethic/process of abjection] inside-out. In turn, power is like a force field, phantoms or pantomime; it's largely imaginary/subjective but shaped by objective forces. Sex and force elide as much as collide in medieval poetics. In a territorial, settler-colonial sense, the state looks to demonize those already "under fire"; i.e., treating native parties as hellish outsiders [suffering lasting damage/generational trauma]! Some will sell out through desperation and convenience; others are more principled, holding onto their values while different movements decay.

Power is all how you frame it, then. So when they're circling the wagons and playing white Indians and saviors, use your wagons against them! It's not "ceding ground" to own the demonic role; i.e., in ways that undermine capital and state authority by presenting power in ways that appear cop-like or tokenized, but actually flow power towards workers through demon mommies [often marrying them; re: death by Snu-Snu, below, colliding the medieval language of sex and war into readily consumable forms]: by helping others imagine alternative arrangements to reality and bonding with nature-as-alien. These fugitive unga-bunga refrains become conducive to Gothic-Communist development when such Great Destroyers demonstrably break state monopolies and cut their legs out from under them! "She smash!" Chonk, strong, and ready to bonk! It's clobbering time, motherfuckers!

[source]

Power is something that is perceived, thus subject to the usual forces of theatre; e.g., someone can be made to look younger than they actually are, or stronger than is humanly possible. Demon mommies are born of fire, but also made of it [re: Hellbender's volcanic red hair and Karlach's burning heart]. Burns hurt like hell; for us demons, love hurts and Hell [and Hell's heartache] is our paradise, but a plastic one our forced immigrants' poetic contributions help make and redefine power [and boundaries, trust] in order to shift away from state abuse; i.e., achieving equity under dialectical-material scrutiny and [s]exercise! Hot as hellfire, a monster "ass queen" awaits, as does her Numinous booty's infernal fitness and demon-dumper glory! We are but priests praying at her temple of almighty fire! Baby got back, a bottom-heavy cathedral whose abyssal end is one to plunge repeatedly into [to fall in love with/make that pull-out game weak]! She even does anal, pegging her "victims" while preaching the benefits [re: using sodomy not as an unironic terror weapon against different marginalized targets, but to cause "terror" as a matter of spicing up sex; i.e., in lands of darkness/disputed ownership challenging state owners]!

¹⁹⁴ This goes both ways, with trans women being seen as "traps." We'll explore this more in Volume Three.

artist: [Forest the Rotten]

Granted, worship is an ancient human function. Except, whereas state religions organize to enslave "the unknown" for profit, ours remain entirely devoted to emancipatory worship; i.e., of a secularized, Satanic politique that actually respects nature. As its monstrous-feminine stewards, our threat displays challenge the state-as-straight pimping nature as monstrous-feminine; e.g., Angela Carter's white cis-het Female Gaze preying on such things without rehumanizing anything. As such, nature's revelatory bodies become inspirational temples, rebuilt by us doubling the original's chonky profane; i.e., during crisis, and within the vein of Gothic fetishes that were already done to death/painfully cliché centuries ago. So does Gothic Communism resurrect long-lost feelings of rebellious frisson that break capital's counterparts, having the whore's revenge against them. In the usual language of victory and defeat, they're the sore losers who remain scared of nature and death!

Nothing is more covetous or afraid than a cop, than imperial defenders, than Pax Americana leery of unruly spoilsports subverting Cartesian gender norms [androgynous, Mother Nature fucks back]. From size difference to size deference, Medusa is straight intergalactic metal, and you can't kill the metal any more than colonize outer space! A forsaken fane of devilish flagellation, fornication, and flatulence [it happens], she always comes back, reclaiming colonial territories before leaving just as quick: an impure thought, a cosmic whore, mountain mama, female Hercules, bat outta hell! From art to porn, let's blaze new trails that lead away from Cartesian abuse, taking ourselves home [and to town]! Camp canon; ravish ironically by putting "rape" in quotes during ludo-Gothic BDSM! Every fortress of doom has its greatest soldier!

Beyond demon mummies, there's so much language for sex and violence when it comes to postcolonial liberation; i.e., nature treated as queer/alien/female, etc, much of it understandably animalized and medieval per a demonic courtly love's pornographic style. Whatever the form of the art/performance, capital paywalls nature and pimps it out to rape or otherwise exploit it. Gothic-Communist calculus factors in monetization/privatization of monsters and their liberation under capital; i.e., sex work is paid only if said workers fight for it; re [from Volume One]:

our socio-political positions are vulnerable and often associated directly with our bodies and identities as things to control through monstrous forms during Gothic theatre [...] Such forays into pretend worlds amount to an imaginary liberation that challenges Capitalist Realism through avatar-like vehicles; i.e., places to put ourselves and occupy for a time, to better learn how to frame our own experiences (and bodies) in a situation of make-believe. But within that invention lies the ability to think critically about our surroundings, thus interpret the stories already present within our lives that shape how we think, thus act [source].

This goes for us defying the state animalizing us, their idea of "tribal," "savage" or "primal" challenging workers; i.e., inventing variants to some degree appropriative or appreciative regarding older struggles against empire; e.g., white Indians vs allies to Indigenous groups [with sex being a pacifying or mobilizing force in demonic forms; re: Coulthard's Red Skin, White Masks (2014) something of a pun regarding issues of demonic representation¹⁹⁵]. While [from Volume Zero] animals embody the canonical language of power and resistance as something to camp through demonic and undead forms; i.e., stigma animals relayed through demonic BDSM and rituals of power expression and exchange that embody hunters and hunted, predators and prey that play out through the ongoing battles and wars of culture, of the mind, of sexuality and praxis as traumatized: marked for trauma or by trauma [source: Volume Zero's "Pieces of the Camp Map"].

likewise [from Volume One]

the medieval character of state violence and terror cannot be destroyed during morphological expression, only subverted or contained through linguo-material "traps" we put into motion during revolutionary cryptonomy as an essential means of counterterrorist liberation; i.e., by throwing the setter-colonial character of heteronormativity into dispute through a rebellious medieval, postcolonial imaginary.

¹⁹⁵ I.e., "a seemingly more conciliatory set of discourses and institutional practices that emphasize Indigenous recognition and accommodation" (source). Betrayal is betrayal.

[...] emotional turmoil is very much at home in the Gothic. This includes anxieties about physical bodies and their hauntological uniforms as often having a sexualized, animalistic, psychological element that overlaps with half-exposed, unburied trauma acquired generationally under state domination. This domination occurs within regressive, medievalized positions of crisis and decay that defend and uphold the status quo, but can be reclaimed by proletarian agents within weird-nerd culture; e.g., workers embodying knights to reclaim their killing/raping implements inside the state of exception, while simultaneously dealing with state infiltrators fighting to recapture the same devices back for themselves and their masters; i.e., Amazons and furies, etc, as forms of contested morphological expression that can assist or hamper gyno/androdiversity within Gothic poetics under state monopolies. To that, heroes are monsters, and monsters go hand-in-hand with animals being for or against their own abuse to varying degrees.

The resultant middle ground of this duality grants words like "demon," "zombie," or "animal" a double purpose [...]: predator and prey. [...] Domestication invokes a sense of the wild that is reclaimed by state forces to serve the profit motive, which rebellious agents must challenge and reclaim while being animalized [source: "Introducing Revolutionary Cryptonymy"].

It also extends to demons "of nature" combined with a less earthly plane that points back to nature again; e.g., Hell or extraterrestrial worlds; i.e., places where women rule and men are cucked in the usual Amazonian rape/death-by-Snu-Snu wrestler fantasies that—appearances of domination aside—canonically uphold state power through token/undercover police violence.

Decaying rebellious potential, Red Scare abuses whores in demonic language to better give the Straights "scare boners"; i.e., with "non-white" body types that speak to their mommy issues towards nature during Gothic vaudeville. Compelled dominance servicing straight males sissies per the nuclear/settler-colonial model whoring nature-as-monstrous-feminine, it's something to "slay" in the usual, unironic monomyth, and which sex-positive workers may camp using what they got: as mommies who cannot die when "slain"!

artist: [Nyx]

Demon or not, it's no secret that Amazons are farmed by the state to cater to cis-het weird nerds chasing non-natal mommies; i.e., the usual monster peach to cut up and harvest like moist evil cake. But GNC parties humanize the harvest for postcolonial purposes, challenging profit [and its freakshow chattelization] with similar demonic poetry during ludo-Gothic BDSM [re: Nyx, above]. Not ones to overlook a good myth onstage, we use them to our advantage through ourselves; i.e., to teach one another through Gothic theatre and its many, many ways to tell stories about monsters by personifying them. In doing so, we challenge deep-seated beliefs with things rising to the surface; i.e., that we can alter on or around ourselves, all to make larger harmful structures go down in flames. If Communism is a myth, then so is Capitalist Realism, our cryptonymy fighting fire with fire [as demon mommies do]—to best burn Rome to cinders and rise from its fertile ashes!

Revolution, as such, truly is a piece of cake—one that takes as many forms as demonology holistically allows! We are legion, but whose myriad, intersectional solidarity often can be summed up in single images; i.e., any that indicate similar acts of muse-like defiance, expressed in ways openly happy and animalistic, but also educated [thus intimidating to the elite, left]:

artist: [Mercedes the Muse]

We're not just a pretty face or fat piece of ass, then, but operate through poetic argument, and whose preference with those poetic devices [often metaphors] reclaim by us to better steer our agenda with; re: by using what we got, our Aegis and its forbidden fruit/darkness visible offering up forbidden sight/a deal with the Devil!

As such, demonic rebellion [muscle mommy or otherwise] scuttles or commandeers this vessel or that, jettisons or smuggles any and all cargo, inside; it commonly combines seafaring metaphor with other performative means, often relying on medieval language, but also gut animal skills in animal situations of survival—i.e., where you communicate through scowls, smiles, puppy dog eyes and sounds, but also body language and pet-training BDSM exercises [speaking from experience, here]. It's definitely a skill, and one that can save you in a pinch. The immediacy of danger and naked exposure demand it, which calculated risk is all about. There is no "true mastery" of such things, only a desire or need to change through practice to escape hostile conditions of false mastery by altering those conditions; happening by any and all means, development [of Communism] happens when those conditions change: using Gothic poetics [and its prolific language of mastery vis-à-vis demon mommies] for the betterment of all!

Whatever our individual preferences and postcolonial inclinations—be it Amazons or cat women from the moon—we queers and other marginalized groups collectively love demons; i.e., because their unequal power/forbidden knowledge/dark desire and transformative potential all speak to our alienation as having a human face we can ringlead: descriptive sexuality and gender as morphological freedom [to express violence and terror] towards liberation—not positive thinking and "peace" [a white man's word, but also used by cis-het feminists] fetishizing token cops, be they good or bad, white or non-white, skinny or [more often than not] thicc during state monopolies! Waifus are waifus, betrayal is betrayal, cops are cops, but liberators use the same aesthetics [and bodies/colors of stigma] as those who sell out during asymmetrical warfare!

artist: [Angel]

All workers are demonized to some extent. The postcolonial difference is, rebellious workers operate as universal freedom fighters; i.e., who consciously choose our own roles, despite whatever positions or lot we're born into. So while profit is moving money through nature as cheaply as possible, our revenge is channeling such things towards ourselves; i.e., by redistributing them but also their capabilities to generate, which we opt of out in favor of a post-scarcity world. This includes demon mommies, but really any form of monstrous theatre you could think of. We're not just arm candy used "for looks," then, but sweet the pot through our labor exchanges, including our bodies and what they represent; i.e., at the time, but also over time, reviving such devices as needed to remind people what we and our movement is about; e.g., my friend Angel and their contributions to the book [from an old, commissioned shoot, above] but also Ebonnyy [from a more recent commission, next page].

Something to reclaim inside state monopolies, then, our guerrilla's strange appetites/diabolical inclinations under capital advertise to whet the curiosity of spectating onlookers! Vulnerable parties, however strong they appear or behave, are framed as demons: to be hunted down and killed like animals. Any appeals to the contrary sit within the same complicated language. Amazons and similar demons are sex warriors—gladiators that promote power as something to witness in all aspects of itself [the home, weapon, body and vehicle, etc]. They play out in highly conventional ways that normally enact cops-and-victims violence to reinforce the status quo; but our imaginary bondage is like Wonder Woman's Lasso of Truth: speaking to oppression through "oppression" acted out by subversive agents. If you've seen one, you've seen 'em all, but each flower among the larger hellish bouquet remains special, unique, powerful. Helping instead of harming others despite having power over them—that's our immortality!

model and artist: [Ebonnyy and Persephone van der Waard]

To it, monster-fucking theatre and its abstraction on the Aegis is one of paradoxical struggle—not just of mitigation and reversal during liminal expression, but of upset while turning workers on [eroticized class awakenings, getting down and in touch with our wild sides chattelized by the state]: the vulnerable as normally preyed upon by predatory agents thinking they're saving the world from evil, the former overcoming the latter emboldened by state forces to harm nature; i.e., by abusing trust, violating boundaries and limiting victims control over their own lives. We fags camp that, merging demon love with adrenaline; i.e., through fight-or-flight operatics that purposefully excite our cathartic energies challenging capital's usual qualities. If cops are criminals with badges, calling their victims criminals before unironically raping them, postcolonial demon mummies motivate systemic catharsis by camping said rape, time and time again.)

So concludes the symposium and "Idle Hands," part one. Now that we've covered Amazons, dark faeries and demon muscle mummies in the blood libel/witch class vein, I'd like to consider a different aspect to such predators and prey, in "Idle Hands," part two; i.e., through a sculpted, claymation quality to nature-as-monstrous-feminine and its revenge: hunting and vampires! Amazons often do this, but theirs is territorial in ways that are guarded as "home"; re: for which to bring captured, smaller male mates back to for breeding purposes. But "death by Snu-Snu" has another hunter function that just as often yields kawaii vibes in a modern demonic; i.e., inside an urban setting haunted by monstrous-feminine rage (and patriarchal abuse) vis-à-vis transplanted blood libel tropes—vampires unwelcome in a homely space, yet compelling precisely for the demon-lover violence they promise to visit upon others/suspicion they arouse during courtly love.

For that, we'll be looking pointedly at Takena's "Midnight Vampire"! For Takena's antihero, death is a party—a danger disco to dance savagely inside, Matthew-Lewis-style; i.e., to anisotropically reverse the usual directions of sex and force during criminal-on-criminal violence, the female avenger's castration fantasy while attracted to predators—happily enacting the whore's bloody revenge! Gird your loins!

Idle Hands, part two: Vampires and Claymation (feat. Takena's "Midnight Vampire")

"He swore he wasn't going to kill you. He thought the humiliation of prison would be worse. The beatings. The rapes. The incessant fear for your life, but I told him, 'No, John, you're wrong. Dying would be worse.' Because, well, honestly, it is, isn't it? Dying is just worse. So do I pull the trigger or not?"

—Alice Morgan, Luther (2010)

Whereas part one of "Idle Hands" concerned the witch blood libel class—re: Amazons/the Medusa, and demons mummies of a dark or fiery type; i.e., as statuesque, seemingly made from clay and designed to fulfill different vengeful wishes (usually under a demon lover/protector dynamic)—part two considers the hunting mechanisms of those who are less gigantic, but no less kowai (fearsome) beneath their kawaii exterior—vampires, but specifically dainty lolita vampires dressed to kill (our focus, here, being on the classic female avenger as translating post hoc to other marginalized groups)!

That being said, there's generally a "moll" criminal/femme fatale idea to such beings (e.g., Alice Morgan, above) but one that is as much informed by comorbid elements as congenital; i.e., generational trauma carried "in the blood," so to speak, and relayed in theatrical forms that, sure enough, often use clay as much as costumes, actors and props: killing sprees made to avenge/right old wrongs, thus do what everyone in the audience is thinking (often a desire for bloody revenge). So many rape victims desire the ability to do so, even if they never act on it; i.e., the fantasizing of rape in reverse: "How does it feel, asshole!" Such outlets are important for a variety of reasons, giving our half-real abusers the poke!

Torture porn remains a complicated, ancient arena, one bound classically to women (white or not) as the perpetual victims of men. Out of patriarchal Antiquity into the present, such man-eaters can subversively manifest to reverse state violence (and other monopolies) onstage: the vengeful whore—equal to a one-man army dismantling a horde of thugs¹⁹⁶—showing the rapist his own castration; i.e., for having abused someone vulnerable, often within exploitative stories fetishizing said abuse. It's an anti-predation maneuver/terror weapon, one speaking—as the Gothic usually does—onstage towards things happening offstage: "Don't fuck with us." It's supposed to make men, hence the state, uncomfortable!

As usual, demons play with power as something to theatrically arrange and argue one's positions during courtly love. Continuing our examination of prostitute revenge—and going beyond Amazons and demons of shadow and fire—we arrive at vampire demon lovers. Typical of my work on vampires, it's brief, but punchy.

¹⁹⁶ E.g., ninjas or nameless suits. The monstrous-feminine combines masculine and feminine theatre tropes—including the Western action hero, be that a gunslinger or martial artist—but also hyphenates black and white through medieval language: the woman-in-black, taking all comers!

Some Ground Rules: Vampire as Vengeful Whore/Sex Demon

We'll get to Takena specifically in just a moment. First, some ground rules (three pages). Vampires are classically undead, but terms like "sex demon," "demon lover" or "whore" easily apply to female vampires as a classic version of the monstrous-feminine (for our purposes, "demon" and "whore" are synonymous, as are synonyms to whore, like mistress or Medusa; e.g., dark mistress = demon, commonplace to Amazonian mommy demons having androgynous/phallic qualities per classically unorthodox¹⁹⁷ gendered power arrangements; re: Lady Hellbender and Karlach); i.e., a dead whore, doll, or undead sex demon, in the modular sense; e.g., Blxxd Bunny's thick, messy or otherwise "immodest" makeup—caked on, resembling decay but also sexual arousal, depending on the color—being comparable to corpse paint (and with graveyard prostitution going back to Ancient Rome, at least; re: B.B. Wagner).

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

Abject and theatrically arrested, vampires are sex demons that speak to isolation and abuse through undead trauma and feeding mechanisms; i.e., forbidden sex defying canonical laws to enact female/monstrous-feminine revenge from beyond the grave: parallel voices/societies challenging Puritanical state authority with worker counterauthority and counterterror breaking the monopoly. They wear the makeup for themselves, and say what they want to say inside capitalist markets; i.e., cannibalizing the same whorish theatre tools for asymmetrical warfare: the strict flavor of violence, whereupon the paradox of such things (whores and rape) determines by dialectical-material context; e.g., tickling and orgasms or pain consensual through said context, but also activating different nervous centers (and chemicals) that sure enough, overlap vaso vagal with erogenous responses and confused predator/prey mechanisms vis-à-vis different aesthetics of torture having irony (or not).

Macbeth called these "borrowed robes." What he stole through sexualized force, we take through guerilla sex and force speaking to rape; i.e., as a loss of control tied to articles of clothing and other theatrical elements; e.g., shoes historically being torturous and uncomfortable (see: Chinese foot-binding but also high heels, above), but during camp can shape into foils that empower us and speak to past disempowerment. All aspects of the whore can do this, yielding creativity and bodies being all the female guerilla classically has to use; i.e., deprived of anything else by the empires (and cops) pimping them out, sex becomes their weapon of choice. It becomes literally "on the brain," insanity a kind of death, rape, and captivity theatre expressed through hysteria narratives (merged with other moral panics, as the state requires and which we subvert) that punch through your eye sockets like a bad pun!

¹⁹⁷ To try and reclaim them, as the state does, is to play with fire; i.e., to expose themselves as hypocrites and invite reflection on the whole nuclear model while, in the same breath, giving workers theatrical spaces vital towards playing against state aims!

Whores, then, are brides of the Devil (or, per Lewis' shapeshifting Matilda, simply the Devil in disguise, deceiving the deceiver), meaning they can do things good girls can't, and generally take things from men (usually power through money and sex) to avenge their own relegation. Except all girls are whores per the same paradox, giving them the potential to "corrupt" for or against the state; re: "any weapon can become a weapon of terror." This occurs through sex, drugs and rock 'n roll (and equivalents of these things across the Gothic mode) while stressing their own paradoxical, profoundly liminal, darkness-visible existence; i.e., parody and pastiche, in Gothic, generally elide and—per the class, culture and race privilege of middle-class white people from the Neo-Gothic onwards—commercialize these fearful fascinations per the ghost of the counterfeit; e.g., Rob Zombie's "Living Dead Girl" (1998): "Who is this irresistible creature who has an insatiable love for the dead?" Under Gothic, bad vibes offer up baddie vibes, just as often; the irony is optional (and in Zombie and Sheri Moon's case, left, is generally a brand to sell, not a critical voice with any serious bite to it).

To that, any resulting "forbidden sight" (darkness visible) grants a specialized jouissance whose systemic catharsis lies in between play and rememory unto actual trauma (re: Asprey's "terror is the kissing cousin of force"); i.e., ludo-Gothic BDSM putting "rape" in quotes to recontextualize it: as "mere play" in ways that vampires use to speak cryptonymically regarding sexual violence, and in ways the Gothic iconoclast may camp and subvert synthesizing demonic poetics! These paradoxes suitably occur through rape, murder and/or death fantasies (dark desires for revenge), but also surreal, transformatory and excessive neo-medieval language (e.g., the Jabberwocky poem, from earlier). We'll be doing so, here in part two, with vampires, prostitution and claymation vis-à-vis Taneka's golem-esque, then conclude with Tolkien's goblins and other anti-Semitic tropes, in part three; re: as the weapons "of idle hands" that will come up repeatedly throughout the entirety of the Demon Module!

To it, "vampire" puts monster between woman as maiden and whore, itself cleft in twain, yet bound at the hip on the same liminal, half-real stage; but also, between house and dungeon, vampire lord and queen, genuine torture and "torture" in quotes, revenge and "revenge," clay and flesh, etc. Whereas she acts out her rape by killing an imaginary killer to rescue her former self divided from her vampire side speaking to her current surreal and furious existence, so too can we play out our own deaths, trauma and transformation (rapes, revenge, rapture, etc); i.e., in such dualistic, psychomachic, martyred medieval forms: popular media being whatever delicious, rock 'n roll trash people love to consume. Vampires are whores, are sex demons criminalized by the state to maintain state control! We don't just get down to business; we take care of it to debride them!

In turn, demons more broadly are "shadows" that suggest holistically whatever reality hides through state illusions/Capitalist Realism; i.e., simulacra being clay animating in small, the homunculus, golem or egregore's function similar to Walpole's animated miniatures (the fatal portrait), Plato's shadow plays, and the phantasmagoria, etc. These historically transmit Gothic dualities and double standards through a "medieval" fake, received by playful "archaeologists" prodding the Capitalocene. A right historically enjoyed by queer white men and straight women, both played with the ghost of the counterfeit in the Neo-Gothic period: necromancer and shade, conjuring up "Hell" as allegorical, pre-Christian "past"; i.e., while in a Christian-dominated world, one whose Protestant ethic ethnocentrically essentialized the whore as "evil" per blood libel, Orientalism, and monstrous-feminine Satanic Panic, etc.

To it, we're returning to the demonic/god-like idea of making monsters from clay. While this fabrication typically includes doll-sized humans or human-sized dolls—or even giant-sized statues (e.g., Michelangelo's David, left), which historically range from ancient-to-modern vanity projects, to Humanist/Gothic commentaries on the world when they were made—they don't animate especially well, in isolation. And though we'll get to larger simulacra like Shelley's Creature, chiding Victor for playing God during the Promethean Quest, I thought we'd start small and work our way up to Frankenstein's monster and similar beings (re: the xenomorph); i.e., from Takena's killer doll to goblins (which we'll look at with Tolkien, in part three).

Both are made as much to express their maker's humanity (or lack thereof, in Victor's case) as it is to comment on the humanity of those being made. Conjured up by "necromancers," they talk for different reasons, speaking truth through shadows, artifice and lies. This isn't in bad faith, but to communicate through allegory as just another part of human language and experience: the voice of the surly-silly Jane Doe. She smiles, but it doesn't reach her skull-girl eyes; it's like a killer doll, then: beautiful but deadly, exchanging unequal power through violent sex (or "sex," per the cryptonymy process). In iconoclastic circles, it's meant to excite the browbeaten and frighten the abuser (though the former will always try to pimp the latter): become the whore, become vengeance—a pedagogy of the oppressed whose conduit of joy plays at hauntological Mortal Kombat to break Capitalist Realism on its wheel!

Takena's "Midnight Vampire" does this, in a nutshell. Vampires are commonly sex demons that communicate euphemistically through psychosexual pain, sodomy and murderous courtly love/torture porn; re: problematic love/the love that dare not speak its name, except Takena's lover shouts it without making a sound (action speaking louder than words)—the shock scarcely registering until you're already dead; i.e., revenge is reclamation to revolt, often through the Platonic suggestion of shadowy violence denoting a desire to change not just ourselves—and our dark, repressed reflection on the Aegis (the simulacrum)—but the world along with us!

As we shall see, so does Takena's vampire; i.e., by having the whore's revenge against profit, one undiscerning thug at a time...

Takena's Revenge: "Midnight Vampire"

This short piece was written in response/reference to my initial reactions to Takena's "Midnight Vampire" (2024): "Persephone's Insights, #1: Breaking Down @Takena's "Midnight Vampire" \(2024\)". Combining raw sexuality and violence isn't something I generally do, but did want to explore here how psychosexual expression often discusses sexuality through "medieval" theatrical violence. —Perse

(artist: Star Gureisu)

Gothic maturity is the ability to discuss taboo subjects in sex-positive ways; re: from cannibalism, to murder and rape, to bounty hunters and assassins, to menstruation and "wandering womb," the Gothic loves to use medieval romance language it can force against workers, activating those survival mechanisms the West has seemingly abolished but, point in fact, manipulates for different reasons. This can be to maintain state order or break it, the state—when actual revolution decays its strongholds—trying to fetishize different scapegoat groups while simultaneously exploiting them for profit, and workers subverting that process (of abjection) during liminal expression: immaturity vs maturity. All happen inside calculated risk being as much people as place, the danger disco filled with demon-lover phallic women sinning for their own reasons (and visually intimidating men, all the while); i.e., versus madmen targeting non-demonic women, Takena's clubber-meets-schoolgirl vampire gives state thugs a calculated, operatic taste of their own bitter medicine (not just murder or rape, but genocide)! Keeping with vampires, capital treats sex as a violent drug to contain, a disease to surveille (re: the panopticon). In trying to, they've only dug their own graves; i.e., she's in here with them!

Any violence towards women, in Gothic, is always sexual or haunted by rape; i.e., forcing women to revert to trading with the only thing they could realistically trade in, any time before the present. The female avenger turns all of that on its head; i.e., a monstrous-feminine double trading in masculine violence (with a psychosexual bent)—not only while feminizing men the way they did to her, once upon a time, but doing them one better! She's an off-limits warrior whore/dark castle-in-the-flesh, using excessive force (and subterfuge) to lay the gangsters¹⁹⁸ to eternal, ignominious rest!

This brings us to Takena's vampire—with smaller figurines in dollhouse sets being easier to work with on account of their size. Small or not, they represent humans and their residences, but also the unspeakable actions that occur inside, which the audience relates to vicariously through theatre (the paradox being these speak easily enough with a bit of clay to work with—clay being an excellent cryptonym, showing what is concealed by standing in for raw sex through medievalized metaphors debating back and forth). They also supply the weaponized means to survive by communicating such things to achieve systemic catharsis; i.e., by cultivating good social-sexual habits unto a pedagogy of the oppressed that we can inform/contribute to, among the sleeping fetishes and clichés: stuck on history's endless carousel, waiting like the vampire to wake up and feed once more!

Takena's skit is fairly standard graveyard sex—a doll-ish, splatterhouse miniature combining lover and killer (and frozen at the moment of "turning"/original trauma, as the undead always are), the protagonist anisotropically reversing the usual terrorist/counterterrorist ordering of sex, fear and force; i.e., someone dislocated from the land, and from whom the owner class now fears revenge: for originally stealing from and now who takes back in potent mixtures of seductive violence the elite cannot police, thus pimp! A huntress lone wolf, our vigilante—per the usual shorthand—hunts from a home-base lair with which to launch attacks against predatory men and their secluded torture-dungeons-in-disguise. It's abbreviated, here, but has all the basic parts of a man-eater revenge fantasy (conducted for missing girls, en masse): an avenger and a crime boss, the latter's henchmen, and a damsel.

¹⁹⁸ A famous scene from The Monk has a carriage stopping at a cabin in the woods. The passengers are greeted by the "host" of the cabin, who is actually a bandit in disguise. Aided by the bandit's "wife" (a lady led astray by—you guessed it—a demon lover), the hero discovers the bedsheets upstairs stained with blood from the previous guests' premature demise! To survive, the hero must lie to the bandits who are lying to him, and avoid drinking so much "sleepy potion" slipped into his dinner wine that he passes out. There's more to the story in terms of action, but the basic idea is the home and hosts are "perfidious" and need to be dealt with through violence and lies. So, too, is Takena's protagonist—an expert liar and killer lying in wait against those lying in wait—confronted with a false home that she intentionally infiltrates to rescue a damsel-in-distress.

In turn, any ironic harm is offset or haunted by unironic forms the killer is avenging not once, but night after night; i.e., as a matter of routine: a female vampire/serial killer patiently pimping male pimps during non-peaceful transfers of power speaking to unanswered crimes, real or imagined (castration fantasies lending vampirism a female "cruising" character versus a traditionally male one as normally valorizing said male[s] penetration¹⁹⁹). They value weakness and pain as things to deal in and exchange, watching their prey while hiding in plain sight.

In a sense, the vampire and her prey aren't so different—save that she moves power away from them, the exploiters, and towards the vulnerable; i.e., by illustrating self-defense when given consent²⁰⁰ is absent. She does so by watching those who watch: "Since then, there has never been a moment that has not betrayed you—a glance, a turn of the head, the flash of your throat as you breathe! Even your way of standing perfectly still, they were all my spies!" In turn, she satisfies her thirst (for blood, the definitive aspect of vampirism): as a weapon of terror hyphenating sex and force, taking the husband, boyfriend or jealous coworker to task, and ultimately getting away with murder as the whore's revenge!

¹⁹⁹ I.e., internalized male homophobia; e.g., Cockrub Warriors demonizing anal sex, blaming feminine male homosexuality for weakness (re: the AIDS pandemic): "For the last 35 years anal sex has dominated gay male life. It's been a disaster. For 30 of those years our lives and the lives of the people we love have been consumed by an epidemic for which today there is still no cure and no vaccine" (source: "Founder's Message," 2000).

²⁰⁰ Consent is sexy and there's plenty of ways to illustrate that in art; e.g., a couple having adorable, plain-Jane sex and enjoying themselves:

(artist: The Smutty Rogue)

In short, they're doing things that are alien to many but also completely non-violent; i.e., despite happening during BDSM (through the giving and receiving of commands, mid-pleasure, but also aftercare, top-right), and despite any descriptive sexuality and informed consent taking place, the events themselves remain fairly standard and non-Gothic in their presentation. It's a cartoon, but quotidian.

For Takena's vampire, she's sexy because she has the ability to embody forbidden societal aspects—female revenge against male sex fiends, first and foremost. Furthermore, the descriptive elements portend to abuse and harm she addresses through violence; i.e., as paradoxically kawaii, mid-playtime. Consent is sexy. So is fighting back against slashers in genuine self-defense (the canonical Gothic equating female death with a loss of virtue, which Takena camps)!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

In short, the protagonist premediates and embodies a rapist's worst fears: a streetsweeper without compunction, clemency or remorse. Possessing an extended history of (and penchant for) barbaric ultraviolence, she deceives the deceiver and rapes the rapist. Doing so during a nightmarish return of said barbarity's corporal punishment turned excessively violent against capital (capital punishment being execution), she's a criminal judge, jury and executioner making a house call—the call girl castrator (resembling a prioress, in her black-and-white uniform), fighting fire with fire, to reverse the usual direction of violence/dark desire; i.e., that other criminals working for the state push towards helpless (usually white straight middle-class) women. In fetishizing herself and her bloody actions' "cruisin' for a bruisin'," the vampire shows the rapist his doom. I'd say she spits on his grave while doing so, except she enjoys her knightly work (and wouldn't want to waste any precious blood; re, Marx' Kapital, with a twist: dead labor feeding on dead labor to help living labor)!

As such, Takena's vampire is a deathless, retro-future avenger penetrating the hauntology (re: the canceled future, classically a Gothic castle but known more recently as the Western, noir or cyberpunk, etc): a strict dom/phallic woman "acting like a man" to avenge violence against women in medieval ways. She's a demon lover "making love" during courtly love as something to bring to the kidnapers' false home (after being invited inside); i.e., a small kawaii that, suitably enough, crosses over into furious kowai-style bloodbaths while still appearing cute, mid-unheimlich. She doesn't shriek like a banshee might, but her dollish eyes speak volumes: revenge against rape through medieval violence, bathing in the blood of evil men to have the whore's revenge (the assumption being she's cracking down against profit, specifically snuff films). She's a walking weapon, a bad bitch not to be fucked with exposing the brave as cowards, scared of crazy little girls with a tendency to fuck shit up; i.e., damaged goods not afraid of getting stabbed (re: the Radcliffean heroine) but having no one to stab (re: Dacre's Victoria).

In turn, there's room for all kinds of puns, many which leap to mind through the campy violence taking place; i.e., the usual hyphenations of sex and force that victims of abuse live with, and which they direct their hellish lust towards would-be abusers and victims occupying the same complicated space's predator/prey confusions; re: the passion of martyrdom—of ravishing and release—reversing or redirecting harm through camp during ludo-Gothic BDSM. Despite those confusions, the liminality affords play as a matter of person and place liberated from single set outcomes. It becomes fun, but can speak to actual harm; i.e., by putting "rape" in quotes during rape play (not shown, below), the latter sitting alongside regular sex (shown, below). Commonly fixating on oral, vaginal (or anal, not shown, below), doing so frequently relies upon implied/actual penetration, said vampiric roleplay bleeding into daily social-sexual interactions; re: Cuwu, acting as "vampy fae" and gentle mommy dom in bed, having fun with me while persistently giving and taking through two sex workers' paired synthesis:

(artist: Cuwu²⁰¹)

Cuwu's borderline disorder certainly affected our interactions, as such, but they never removed consent (or fun) from the equation; i.e., while we played.

They were certainly someone society would demonize for being trans and mentally ill/a rape victim; and yet, despite their subby abusing of me in the past, remained someone whose harm stemmed from their monstrous condition—i.e., as something they were trying to manage and didn't always succeed, abuse leading them to harm others during calculated risk.

I won't condone or otherwise apologize for the abuse they ultimately caused me/others, but likewise would never advocate for the harm that befell them, elsewhere in their life. That is my prerogative, my understanding shaped by both the severity of the abuse caused, and the fact that Cuwu—a sex worker and drug user—was ultimately steered to unravel by parties besides them or myself. In short, they were a victim who abused others, but often continued being abused; i.e., the whore's paradox (and revenge) sit in the lived reality that many sex workers are rape victims, and many rape victims love pain during sex (or threats of "danger" in quotes) that give them some sense of release/control over their trauma: to synthesize during good praxis to reduce the possibility of rape, worldwide!

Yes, Cuwu made mistakes during this process—and they certainly had a dark "destroyer" side to them—but they absolutely deserve love, anyways; i.e., they belong in Gothic Communism's vision of a better world, because they were trying to make the current world a better place. Doing so manifested through various contributions towards the Cause, the two of us healing from rape while living in the shadow of police violence; re: by seeking out safety and comfort as much for me as from me.

²⁰¹ The screenshots were taken by me with Cuwu's permission; originally featured in "Healing through Rape, or the Origins of Ludo-Gothic BDSM as a Matter of Rememory" (2024).

When Jadis had me at their beck and call, for example, Cuwu gave me sanctuary. They offered me sex, of course, but also understanding and love that Jadis did not. It did not last, but they did their best, and their failure—I like to believe—was influenced by others in their life twisting them back towards self-destructive behaviors. This makes it easier to forgive them, and my exhibits of them—used with permission, according to our agreement—are of someone I respect and love in spite of their harming me. Revolution is a messy affair. Yet, if Cuwu and I are any indication, it blooms inside the hearts (and holes) of those on the battlefield, opening themselves up while making love Shared trauma be like that—making people horny or sex repulsed, depending on those taking part (Cuwu would often oscillate, both thirsty or tempered due to their personality disorder):

(artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

Despite the potential for harm, Cuwu's monstrous nature had revolutionary value during the cryptonymy process. The same latitude should be given towards Takena's vampire fantasy, then. Yes, Cuwu is AFAB and trans masc, and I am a trans woman, but our clay double speaks to a shared GNC desire for revenge against capital. For those viewed or otherwise treated as women, in general, the line between terrifying and cute is characteristically thin; i.e., by turning the safety of home, inside-out, to speak to nuclear hypocrisies.

Keeping with demons, this is the data, and Takena tells it through clay. If computers are modern data transmitters, clay is the data storage system of the ancient world (e.g., the clay tablet to Ea-nāsir being the oldest customer complaint). It never gets tired and can never die—can change shape or color and be, like Satan's darkness visible, whatever composition the user needs it to be, thus personify to say whatever the creator wants to say in the future from the past; i.e., memes, but also cryptomemes, per Castricano's cryptomimesis dynamic! Clay is also naked, but clothed/opaque (re: Segewick's imagery of the surface); i.e., able to be assigned whatever apotropaic instructions you want; e.g., "kill my enemies,"

"protect me from harm," or some dialectical-material, cops-and-victims combination of these, in duality thus granting infinite value/shape/utility for or against the state.

For example, Mary Shelley used the tabula rasa to highlight the hypocrisy of state-programmed automatons—with men like Victor arrogantly thinking they have free will, but simply being statues/gargoyle slaves, themselves: made of materials carrying messages through the policing of sex and force. So does Takena's golem subvert this process; i.e., as a nude/clothed defender of an imaginary but nonetheless besieged "Prague," an other world beset by fakes who she reminds of their own clay-like (de)construction ("ashes to ashes, dust to dust").

In turn, phrases like "virus" or "code" marry cryptomimetically to sexual production and settler arguments against nature-as-monstrous-feminine; i.e., which we can enjoy pursuant to an iconoclastic endorsement. During live burial, such dialogs (and their neo-medieval refrains) speak our truth as normally repressed, helping us grow fluent in deception to point at truth: with funerary rites, duelist lingo and all-around cryptonymy slogans—i.e., "dead" whores tell plenty of tales; those versed in psychosexual violence and demonic theatre revive the black knight²⁰² to kick ass/wage war against the usual Crusaders! It's a classic Neo-Gothic goading mechanism ("Chicken, chicken!") but one that points the finger at the accused living in sin under capital's present arrangements; e.g., Arthur literally holier-than-thou, and the black knight having none of it!

The point, here, isn't that Arthur wins the fight, but how the black knight humiliates him, anyways. The same goes for Takena. Whichever mercenary being discussed, think of the basic idea as the talking dead as much the walking dead. Whereas Macbeth promptly crapped himself when seeing Banquo, post-execution (and fearing what the latter's unwanted apocalypse might uncover to the misled members of that court), the same idea speaks through humor as hate—the kind borrowed from Shakespeare, but also Walpole and Lewis' silly-serious mayhem, copied ever onwards: "'Tis but a scratch!" "A scratch? Your arm's off!" "I've had worse!" "You liar!"

Like a gargoyle, our undead heroine comes alive after sleep (death's counterfeit) to seek revenge on living abusers who don't value life; re: the ghost of the counterfeit exciting her viewers, doing so in campy ways that remain visually violent and non-violent through vaso vagal theatre. We summon her and watch her go berserk, avenging some hidden wrong during her labor of (courtly) love. Like all vampires, then, she embodies death as a paradoxical source of life, a murder ballad hyphenating both as much as mouth and fang!

²⁰² A literal bastard/demon/terrorist/mercenary whore profaning his duties/the nuclear home for the highest bidder (who, in this case, was the Beatle's George Harrison. Harrison funded several Monty Python films, out-of-pocket, including The Holy Grail, 1975, and Life of Brian, 1979).

Made from clay and animating as such, Takena's story is basically a prurient, transhuman simulacrum of prostitution. Copied by Takena before arbitrating in hauntological form, the whore/demon lover works at the bar as the usual site of extramarital play and pleasure—foreplay, to be precise; i.e., leading to things that respond normally toward virgin/whore division: per male privilege, so often leading to "revenge" against female/GNC parties by cis-het male ones, the latter bored with their caged housewives and seeking "Hell" to colonize it. Our subverting of these occurs on the same vaso vaginal, poppy-red stages of power and performance playing out this or that. During the cryptonymy process, things blend in and stand out—all to make it harder to say who is and isn't the harmful agent (re: speaking to the lived reality that women experience). In turn, abjection inverts vis-à-vis the chronotope/clay dollhouse castle-inside-a-castle's mise-en-abyme, doing so by playing with the usual monopolies of violence, terror and sex. We ruin your childhoods, but remind you that Gumby was always creepy! Takena's vampire is cute, yet confuses her victims (who think her an easy target) precisely because she's violent "like men" are/were—inside the Gothic's plastic, half-real, legendary past!

Furthermore, the militant, female demon lover's theatrical desire—to harm others that resemble our past abusers—becomes trapped between the reality that abusers historically appear normal and harmless, in bad faith, but on whose liminal, innocuous surfaces are where survivors see harm, anyways. In turn, survivors may play it out in good faith, but should remind our audience looking in (regardless of faith) that—for anyone viewing the killer doll, smashing or rescuing small likenesses of themselves per framed story—need only remember how harm is a matter of context; re: couched within an aesthetic of power and death, dom and sub, human and vampire, predator and prey during ludo-Gothic BDSM. We look and they look, and between us is where things play out on the same Aegis' cryptonymy process: the virgin and the whore, the voyeur and exhibitionist, playwright and BDSM freak. She is a kinky girl, the kind you don't take home to mother! Instilling fear and fascination is very much the point.

In turn, damage through rape play speaks to what is covered up, but also all around us and coded less in censorship and more in the cryptonymy process: violence points to rape, but also trauma and feeding in ways that anisotropically reverse the flow of power conducive to a salubrious, class-conscious effect. Weird attracts weird, trauma attracts trauma, our resident man-eater hunting in places where she is normally hunted. She's here to turn the tables, telling the story in small as each sizes the other up; i.e., while the knightly chess player plays not with some frail girlish thing acting out death, but Death herself playing him (echoes, below, of The Seventh Seal, 1957).

As always, the state is incompatible with life; unlife can fight back by dressing up as the whore— i.e., by emasculating rape through its recreation, a witness testimony retold in "Gothic" fakery. So does the Aegis anisotropically expose what is repressed, doing so to humanize the whore as demonic: a guilty pleasure, Medusa flipping the script on those usual benefactors of capital punching her! She claps back as a black knight (a kind of cop-turned-terrorist) would: hard and fast, without mercy! Pimping the pimp, this happens through play mirroring play!

In other words, the survival mechanisms of a predator/prey relationship happen very quickly and are coded among structures that—while unspoken—remain heavily ritualized and ubiquitous: go to the bar to pursue sex/drink for some sex, and canonically a chance to abuse the whore who you have power over. Subverting this, Takena plays with dolls inside small miniatures that combine medieval aspects of female/prostitute torture with more recent hauntologies; i.e., the snuff film and kawaii vampire waifu. She gives as good as she gets, hypnotizing lover boy and from him, his hidden master waiting at the kill house (viewed almost peripherally because her hungry eyes on the men, inside).

Exposed, the king runs from one dungeon to another inside a castle's concentric refrain; she follows him, the whorish executioner carrying her trauma with her and returning from the grave to seek a demonic revenge (dragging the abuser to Hell, reversing Hades and Persephone's role in things). It's all a death omen for future abusers; i.e., relayed in Gothic, repeating echoes of older stories felt in present-day forms. True to form, the vampire is reflecting on the surfaces and thresholds of pastiche/remediated praxis, not on actual glass; but the Aegis' glass-like reflections are, per oppositional praxis, precisely where such things play out, time and time again. Animation isn't just uncanny but speaking to unspeakable, repressed topics; i.e., through black magic as ubiquitous, commodified: xenoglossia, aka the voice of the dead. The best revenge is to help that voice survive through the message; i.e., when taking the state's unironic dungeon (and torturers) apart, piece by piece— through revolutionary cryptonymy reversing abjection, on and within a partially ironic counterfeit haunted by rape!

In true Gothic fashion, then, Takena's story includes a maiden, which the whore rescues from certain death before arming her with an axe (above)! So does the whore haunt the maiden. By the end, the axe is hers not just to grind, but swing to deflower the clubber through revenge: the Gothic heroine is the slayer of a bad-dream camera man, taking his vision less apart and more bouncing the baleful gaze back on the original, non-female vampire (and his army of disposable henchmen). The maiden overpowers him, having done so through her mightier maternal double making her an accomplice. From the charmer at the gate, to the executioners inside trafficking women, all the king's men are in pieces from the skilled dominatrix, and now it's the king's turn through her apprentice! The hunter becomes the hunted and vice versa, the female reaver slaying her former abuser's likeness in regressive medieval language—live burial, hoisted on his own petard! Ker-splat!

Furthermore, Takena's psychomachy shows the monster not as strictly one side, alone; it's both, and is shared between them as an aesthetic they use to communicate different goals: to abuse the whore instead of challenging capital, versus the whore reminding the king that he's only one for a day (and it only takes the shadow of a threat to emasculate him, above). Fetishes, at their simplest, are objects of power to give and receive; to fetishize something is, from a sex-positive standpoint, to give it power through dialogs about power as something to exchange either way. To it, the vampire is scary! But she can direct that terror away from the girl and towards the men looking to harm said girl; their tricks won't work on the vampire, and she knows it:

By locking herself in with the bandits, the vampire cuts off the room's only exit. Having no recourse for escape (and trapped inside a dungeon of their own design; re: the infernal concentric pattern), the men's only option is to fight Death to the death. To that, the vampire certainly lives up to her fearful reputation. Tough-as-nails, dead as a doornail, and the final nail in these interlopers' coffins (which the room becomes), she teaches them one last, brutal lesson before they die; i.e., that some people push back! She rips-and-tears until it is done! In doing so, she spares the maiden (a virgin no more) the vampire's curse, Cupid's devilish embodiment disappearing like smoke (which vampires are prone to do).

And just as quick, the day is won; the damsel is freed and the villains are dead—our classic Gothic heroine, the air-headed sex doll, recovering from her dark reverie to see her Venus twin has disappeared, the transplant evicting the riffraff before crawling back to her own castle-in-small for a much-needed dirt nap!

Per the Promethean Quest, the Hero's Journey (the monomyth), Male Gaze and various other tropes are turned on their heads/made inside out-like a vampire's cloak; but the usual wearer is the classic Neo-Gothic readership (women/fags) punching up against the usual victimizers—not the mythical sort like Radcliffe's banditti, but weird LARPer white men who can't get it up unless they're harming someone/acting the cop. Cops need victims; victims can fight back through the same power fantasies moving power towards workers: our lady of the night—let in to raise Cain, having Grendel's revenge, mommy-dom-style. She's a demonic, night-unstoppable shapeshifter (and damage-impervious stand-in for our indestructible elves that survive rape), showing us "death" is a hell of a time (and doesn't mind if you cum in her eye, left): a psychosexual, martyred state of grace.

Soon, the sun sets and the night falls, our feminist fearmonger back for seconds, making guilty men afraid, squirm or otherwise think twice—as she castrates their doubles, onstage! For her (and us), it's sweet relief, but also returns to and from the beckoning grave! Whoever said chivalry was dead?

Tokenization (a reprise)—Subverting It through Demonic Poetics

Note: This conclusion touches briefly (six pages) not just on vampires, but zombies. Refer to the Undead Module to consider that monster class at length. —Perse

As we discussed with Amazons, tokenization is a thing. The whole point of "Midnight Vampire," though, is to subvert/reverse all of that, its found document making us reflect on the recycled badass language to reveal the usual police abusers protected by canonical forms: the actual enemies. It does so through martyred, plural fragmentation; i.e., our resident whore can disassociate/be raped till the cows come home. Her mouth agape and giving the king bedroom eyes, she takes all the men's power until they are weak enough that our pillow princess can finish them off, executioner-style. "That all you got, killer? Such a little man with a little 'weapon'!" Death in these stories is both figurative and/or literal, meaning it symbolizes actual police violence, but also the ability to play said violence out for different reasons; i.e., through ludo-Gothic BDSM's counterterrorist reversal, not state fear and dogma! Intersectional solidarity punches up against all cops: "Get thee to a nunnery!"

(artist: oxidiancastle)

Not all monsters are bad, then; but those who harm others pursuant to profit are. We're here to kill that darling idea, camping dogma to destroy pure, blind belief; e.g., Andy Rehfeldt's "Don't Stop Believing \(the Minor Version\)" (2018); i.e., visiting feelings of torture and death onto our unironic voyeurs in the audience. It's an ironic stress valve, but also a means to voice through a pedagogy of the oppressed what normally isn't, under police structures. We shall—like Lewis' Ambrosio—unmake them using voodoo-doll likenesses of themselves: ACAB effigies to scapegoat, batter and trash. We are ungovernable—seen as "violent" for simply existing but also because we challenge the status quo through various cryptonymic games and ironies; re: that they dug their own graves, rape not only not destroying their usual victims but turning said victims into ravenous, indestructible, Pac-Woman maws of death (the vagina dentata trapped between sex and force, a ransom fetish suing for peace through class war).

A kind of demon, the vampire—as undead, but also manmade in the intra and metatextual sense (a kind of walking weapon/terminator infiltrating the danger disco to rescue the princess)—provides apocalypse for their wish fulfillment's special sight: to conceptualize things in imaginary medieval language, which those from the actual historical past would either have had no concept of, or a different understanding of regarding things we in the present wrestle with; i.e., while pushing towards post-scarcity by defacing modernity's hired goons (the gore violent, but also censored by its own cartoonish-ness²⁰³, below):

Faced with capital's usual enforcers, Takena's vampire is an exterminator purging them as the disease (re: Matteson's I Am Legend inspiring what became Night of the Living Dead and the modern zombie)—a ritual to endlessly consummate as vampires do: through the eroticized violence of courtly love. It's a survival mechanism—a way of adapting against Capitalism being the disease, versus capital lobotomizing its victims through siege mentality. The alienation and fetishization, but also the shuttered, fortress-style monitoring go both ways. In turn, she's a disease the cops can't quarantine, traveling from place to place to exact her revenge. She's not just sodomy to persecute, but the Black Death revived and selective in its brutal, showy vengeance (turning homes into charnel houses)!

This isn't just "for show." Rape is everywhere under capital because capital rapes everything for profit. Systemic rape/rape propaganda is capital's open secret/tool of revenge against nature (e.g., Gisele Pelicot; i.e., not just single unmarried women like Takena's helpless clubber girl, but married women like Pelicot abused under their husband's supposed "care," and said husband's virgin/whore syndrome leading them to pimp out their wife/gang rape them in their sleep and prey on their children²⁰⁴). Having incubated in capital's breeding grounds, she's merely returning the favor!

²⁰³ A common quality of claymation bringing demonic sex and violence to a wider audience, under Pax Americana's strict censorship laws (refer to my video breakdown for a longer history on this subject).

More to the point, the vampire disrupts the orderly disposal of nature (and its prostitution/chattelization) by reinfesting capital/society-as-sick under heightened conditions of survival-under-duress; i.e., by breaking quarantine and laying siege to capital-as-brothel, she can lift conditions through a healthier virus: compassion, acquired by demonizing the state as source to apathy burying everyone alive (through radical faith/persecution mania and mounting paranoia in times of crisis, which the state relies on to survive); re: the state is incompatible with life and consent, undeath being a useful poetic vector to challenge bourgeois hegemony by interrogating police brutality and suppression with theatrical violence. Rather than become something to censor without thought, said theatre touches on new orders of existence, ones that stem from older "pathologies" liberated from state utility and oppression. Rebellion is always, to some degree, violent, but also virulent. We use it not just to perform danger during calculated risk, but to spread and assess it!

Takena's vampire, punching up at the elite's usual pimps, spreads like wildfire, a succulent counterterrorist punishing the guilty and warning all rapists to beware; i.e., while relishing in the psychosexual violence unfolding on the streets, the state having made criminals it a) can't tokenize, and b) who attack those who suddenly become vulnerable—not the homeless or the housewife as obedient, but such things turned, like the vampire, towards rebellious counterterror during the dialectic of the alien! Killing the scarecrows of the elite becomes an act of pure addictive bliss—one of revenge that merges violence with sex on the already-endless, half-real stage between imagination and material reality interacting back and forth: an unliving weapon forged in blood.

(artist: Jkappa)

Takena demonstrates how this alien commonly appears as female, onstage, but avengers are demons, thus can take any form workers, onstage or off; re: GNC, non-white, Pagan, etc, given a taste "for blood" as taking back what's ours! Whatever the character and intersection of class, culture and race war, rebellion is rebellion, solidarity is solidarity (and like period sex, is famously messy and whispered about). Rebellion is a war as much fought with as in shadows, taking any shape darkness visible needs to foster the monstrous-feminine desire to fight back; i.e., through forbidden sight manifesting in the usual popular forms obsessed with death, rape and other taboo things: nature unleashed, mid-dialectic!

²⁰⁴ Pelico bravely chose to face and name her abusers, the latter dubbed by the French media as "Mr. Every Man" (source: Natalie Stechyson, whose title, for her 2024 trial editorial, reads, "Gisele Pelicot wanted us to know her name. These are the names of the men convicted in her rape." Both speak to Pelicot naming and shaming not just her abusers, but society's everyday treatment of rapists normally protected by police and the system. Said system (and the men it protects) are quite fragile (with Pelicot's abusers hiding behind masks to shield themselves from public uproar after the verdict).

The state is playing with fire, then; the more it tries to monopolize terror language (and psychosexual violence through demonic morphological expression; re: making things to dominate or fetishize during such discourse), the more they demonstrate a capacity for ludo-Gothic BDSM to subvert such dualities: to radicalize for rebellion in ways the elite can't control! In making whores to pimp, they make whores who pimp them!

And if that makes status-quo proponents uncomfortable, they're projecting (often by accusing their usual victims of the accuser's own holier-than-thou predation, DARVO-and-obscurantism-style). Furthermore, if you can't handle the black/Jewish revenge fantasies of an abused class of people acted on in safe spaces, you're calling to bury such things outright. But, as Takena shows us, such things don't stay buried for long! Sex is a weapon we sex workers can reclaim, hyphenating art and porn; i.e., as poetic extensions of our andro/gynodiverse morphologies and labor! The fat lady sings by making gender trouble ecstatic, divorcing gender from sex and either from biology in a heteronormative (thus settler-colonial, Cartesian) sense; re: camping canonical essentialism, challenging state monopolies/trifectas and all their stolen spectres; e.g., Marx.

To camp Marx, "The [undead whores of all dead generations weigh] like a nightmare on the brains of the living" (re: "The Eighteenth Brumaire," 1852); camp, thus give, these chatty corpses a much-needed place to fuck/fight back (the two are not mutually exclusive), helping conscious rebellion find a home—i.e., on the same stages among the living! The paradox, here, is that "evil" sex is somehow badass, hot, and cathartic for workers as much as cops; and it draws us towards difficult truths, but also delightful playgrounds where life and death, "rape" and rape occupy the same restless territories. Such is state shift scaring the elite (and their pimps) senseless.

A bit of "struggle with that snuggle," then fucking to metal, everyone loves the whore, and wants the clubbing baddie/demon lover in ways that punch up as easily as down; i.e., that which—courtesy of the Neo-Gothic—you have to go slumming to find. "To critique power, you must go where it is." Takena's vampire haunts polite society with clay doubles, occupying a g(r)ay-area danger disco while looking goth and/or bubblegum. She'll more than likely have internal damage, too—roiling on her dark surface and jumping from text-to-text, person-to-person, like lightning (re: Cuwu). Such emotional turmoil needs an outlet, which it will find, one way or another! Better to camp it; e.g., "FINISH HER!" (The Immortals' "Techno Syndrome," 1995).

We whores aren't just demons, then, but rebels in the Miltonian tradition! Taking to the streets, we speak campily to danger through "danger" as silly and serious; e.g., Castle Anthrax, Evil Dead, Metroidvania and Takena's "Midnight Vampire" (among countless others) inspired by Walpole, Lewis and similar such "Male Gothic" (re: Moers) trashy-but-fun queerness: black magic, monsters, princely feasts and extravagance, dynastic power exchange and hereditary rites (re: Bakhtin), courtly violence/medieval torture and sanctioned-to-forbidden sex (and poetic, explosive mergers of all these things; e.g., Tchaikovsky's cannons and ringing bells [state but also whorish code for "orgasm"; i.e., "I hear bells ringing!"] or [the submarine captain shouting "Schneller!" \[classic matelotage\] during Das Boot's Gibraltar scene, below\); re: all the dead traditions of rebellion weighing on the state, our clay aping the Capitalocene to disabuse workers of any harmful](#) ideations: to blow the lofty and benevolent idea of the state right the fuck up!

So does Takena's vampire do just that. The state can only rape; whores, on the other hand, may catalyze sex and force to uphold or destroy state mandates; i.e., brothel-espionage cheerleaders shouting at the top of their lungs, "Faster! Harder!" We self-styled robo-fags are not "defective models," but awake and actively putting the spunk in rebellion; i.e., riding it raw (and double-tapping for good measure), seeding and speeding liberation along vis-à-vis allegory and the cryptonymy process!

Activism is worker action through whoring turned against profit, thus a force that consciously opposes cops betraying labor interests, mid-conflict. Rebellion is work in this respect, as is monstrous sex (vampire or otherwise) raising awareness and intelligence towards resistance. Even so, whoever said struggle had to be dull and bleak? Rebellion can be fun! It must, or workers will simply betray their own interests for some quick relief! Revolution starts in hearts and minds (and cafés, taverns, discos, BDSM dungeons, claymation studios, etc), thus owes such rabble-rousing inflammatory sentiments to unruly Gothic military theatre doubling controlled opposition. A kind of concealed weapon worn on/up our sleeves, we Gothic-Communist sluts fuck those we can convert, putting out to convince any who can be convinced (and sneaking in mix-and-match allegory all the while: the message in a "bottle").

Amazonomachia, psychomachia and psychopraxis—anything whores do is "violent" in police eyes, which means whores are always criminal even when defending themselves or encouraging others to fight back. This includes by merely asking for decriminalization/equal rights ("peace" is a white man's word, "liberation" is ours). Cops and victims become enemies who cannot coexist, but this is very much the point: to expose the state for what it is (a rapist, thuggish pimp for the elite abusing nature). By using darkness visible to make them attack us in ways we can direct peoples' attention towards, negotiation—for whores—is just as often made with hostile, bad-faith, and bourgeois forces who don't share power. So we force them to through all the usual paradoxes: one step forward, two steps back; hurry up, take your time; speak out, keep quiet. Rebellion is a balancing act.

To do nothing is to be raped; to protest said rape is to riot, those who fight back "terrorists" who get their faces smashed; those who fight back in spite of that are counterterrorists resisting state rule—becoming in death die-hard, Satanic symbols of La Résistance, punching loudly and gloriously up against pimp and regime as one-in-the-same: a pig-like enemy to mobilize against, chanting all manner of slogans. "To storm the wire of the camps, to smash those metal motherfuckers into junk!" To resist for universal liberation is noble and sexy! Assimilation is death; home rule is self-rule! So get 'em, girl! Fuck the five-O!

Stripping is not consent! ACAB! ASAB! And so on...

(artist: Mochi)

Class war is culture (and race) war told in the holistic, monstrous language of whores fighting back in intersectional solidarity. To this, the villain of Takena's story isn't the female-coded vampire, but the men she targets, trial-by-combat; i.e., the benefactors of "innocent until proven guilty." We're not calling for vigilante justice, per se—just a means of interrogating and exposing their hiding places amid the usual vampire poetics breaking Capitalist Realism with.

To that, if a helpless damsel might suddenly come unalive and—like Grendel's mother—tear them all asunder (mommy has needs), the effect would be a draining one (for the men, but also the elite they work for): to render them unable to attack in the present moment. Moreover, in recultivating the Superstructure, such ironic means and measures would become second-nature in the hearts and minds of workers, but also the art they make: our spectres of Marx, sleeping in the wet spot, moist with rememory and rage.

If rape is the state's ancient weapon against nature, the whore is an ancient, vivid-yet-obscure (cryptonymic) marker for state shift—the birthplace/site of rebirth and afterbirth whose murderous womb/monstrous-feminine survives in hauntological forms, refusing vis-à-vis Creed to be victims; extramarital sex, under capital, is automatically taboo, and zombie invasions originate with the vampire (re: Romero). Arousing the rabble, then, the man-eater makes violence (and its utility through the black/red aesthetic of power and death) something to turn against fascism and its abuse of such things; i.e., as already imprinting on those conditioned to submit (the princess) that, when dipped in Styx, emerge hungry for traitorous blood and revenge: through vigilante, pro-labor violence growing sexy in people's minds.

That is where revolution begins! Takena's hysterical, duelist baptism isn't one of fire, as such, but Nazi blood engorging the strict Commie slut to resist tokenism! From beginning to end, the trespass ceases to be acceptable (for the elite); i.e., once it no longer upholds the nuclear model, but again, such cryptonymy is hard to police, and camouflages itself.

(artist: Smutty Rogue)

This includes Takena's fearsome vampire, but also other forms of vampirism that overlap with it, onstage and off. Some forms opt for a soft-and-cuddly doom; i.e., a Bonnie-and-Clyde element (star-crossed lovers) to the wretched bloodbath's death by Snu-Snu, traded for actual snuggles. Vae victis, indeed, but also... oddly hot and adorable? Romance and desire—at least of a Gothic, neo-medieval—are incredibly liminal. In turn, revolutions happen whenever and wherever they happen, blooming on the battlefield while watered by the blood of the fallen, the rough-and-tumble, the brave and daring clutching—however futile—at life everlasting during graveyard sex of all kinds!

The Gothic, as almost holy/silly-serious, works through comedy and drama to speak to Medusa (state shift), which sooner or later comes back around, eating the state for good as normally eating itself on repeat. "Faith no more, face the whore / Rape the past, make me laugh" (Anthrax's "Make Me Laugh," 1988); we're all zombies rotting under state abuse, staring at our hungry selves on the Aegis; re: mirror syndrome. Said mirror is also a shield to fight back with. So "Fight 'Em 'Til You Can't!" (Anthrax, 2011).

And if this sounds daunting or bogus, revolution relies on imaginary and fakery to work—both to disguise itself and paint a possible future to push towards. Never has "fake it till you make it" been more applicable, the Gothic steeped in such things/the explained supernatural; i.e., the Black Veil both hiding nothing particularly scary behind itself (a worm in a peach, if memory serves), while likewise intimating Great Destruction towards the narrative of the crypt: an occupation by those the state tries to contain butting up against ourselves as alien. The praxial idea is to see who can fake it better to best speak to worker rights and material conditions versus state rights and profit! So give it a shot!

Austen leaps to mind; e.g., "Men have had every advantage of us in telling their own story. Education has been theirs in so much higher a degree; the pen has been in their hands. I will not allow books to prove anything." Except, now the pen is a sword, its passage a bloody one that carves towards a new historical epoch; i.e., through old materials held in the hands of women (and other targets of state violence), such dead queens reclaiming state terror devices to break their persecution monopolies (on blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts) and suck their jailors dry!

(artist: Dariusz Kieliszek)

Beyond Takena's own torture-porn examples speaking to the inherent sexual qualities of porn²⁰⁵, thereof (and zombies/the undead, as a whole), we'll consider doing so with goblins as blood-libel devices; i.e., by camping Tolkien's own class thereof, next!

²⁰⁵ As Bay points out, revenge is classically sexually charged; i.e., a spurned or bereaved lover (which Shakespeare camped by having Romeo and Juliet commit suicide after destroying each other's houses). Every aspect is romanticized, in Western culture, but especially the violence (and, in certain kinds of horror stories, gore).

Prefacing Tolkien: to Harmony/Concerning Big Black Dicks and "Anti-Semitism" vs "antisemitism"

"You don't want go to South Africa." / "Why not?" / "You're black."

—an Apartheid villain to Roger Murtaugh, Lethal Weapon 2 (1989)

Before we start, I want to do two things: dedicate part three to Harmony, and discuss "black" a little more as a poetic device; i.e., concerning Tolkien's love for big black dicks (and other non-white bodies to penetrate with some kind of dick; e.g., goblin asses, below) in his racist, sexist, and otherwise bigoted blood libel stories: murdering orcs and goblins, en masse, while disguising 19th-century ethnocentrism as post-WWII British High Fantasy escapism. We'll also discuss the difference between "anti-Semitism" and "antisemitism," and why I favor the former over the latter in my own work.

(artist: Noaqin)

First, "Idle Hands," part three is dedicated to Harmony, who not only supported me during the entire writing process, but whose black dildo inspired my critique of Tolkien abjecting black cock; i.e., in ways Harmony and I could subvert by playing with abjected material in sex-positive ways. Like Bay during Volume Zero's construction, Harmony has been very supportive and kind, helping me see value in my own work, here; i.e., in its critiquing of popular media's dogma through industry monoliths like Tolkien (who people don't tend to critique nearly enough).

Whereas Tolkien's Hobbit begins with, "In a hole in the ground there lived a hobbit," "Idle Hands," part three started with me seeing Harmony penetrated by a big black dick, and wanting afterwards to recreate the scene; i.e., in equally healthy ways through both of us illustrating mutual consent during ludo-Gothic BDSM. It began, as sex normally does, with smaller things growing into bigger things, but also occurred through tangents into dark, wet, exciting places; i.e., not exactly a "nasty, dirty, wet hole, filled with the ends of worms and an oozy smell," as Tolkien describes it, but still speaking psychosexually to the kinds of unironic, canonically essential value judgements he frequently gave to nature, outside colonial orders: stamped as "black" and alien, abjected for hobbit-hole comforts.

We must humanize the harvest in ways Tolkien clearly tried to monopolize/triangulate against nature; i.e., in ways of the underworld that Harmony loves manipulate. Using them to break through such allegories of the English pastoral, she employs her own wanton displays of sexual liberation to camp the canon with; i.e., her own body and toys' infernal comforts; e.g., her fat goblin ass part of the same strange home for misfit toys that Harmony embodies! "Look on our Works, ye Mighty, and despair!"

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

This entire segment carries that playful spirit of irony forwards, camping Tolkien's wraith-like ghost in the hopes of shaping a better worldview outlined by Milton, the second-generation British Romantics and some of the Neo-Gothic authors (e.g., Lewis)—one conducive, I should hope, towards Gothic Communism, and towards humanizing all the orcs and goblins that Tolkien killed, one black alien cock at a time! It's an olive branch.

Second, something "black." Our focus concerns not just Tolkien's racism and anti-Semitic tropes viewed backwards (using forbidden sight, but also hindsight 20/20, with darkness visible), but his entire bigotry targeting "black," in practice. So what is it?

"Black" is anisotropic, meaning it goes both ways but means different things per direction. We're playing with black to fuck the alien, during oppositional praxis; i.e., in a sex-positive sense, while subverting bigoted forms of Gothic fakery/theatre that Tolkien most certainly did not. For Tolkien and for capital, "black" is a gaslight ("there's nothing there"), a clear-and-present danger tied to national security (illegal aliens), and a cloaking device/false flag (among other things; e.g., a "gatekeep, girl boss" mechanism). Both rely on a feeling of invasion by darkness through neoliberal military propaganda; i.e., to galvanize home defense in upholding "Rome" and the nuclear model against a perceived Great Destroyer from Elsewhere. Behind the weird-nerd persona of a polite British linguist sits a white moderate printing centrist lies.

Tolkien isn't just a fascist posing as an ivy-league nerd, then, but the Necromancer himself, tucked behind the Black Veil! Such is the banality of evil, its desk murder going beyond fiscal zones and into scholarly temples. Abjecting his own decay during mirror syndrome onto his black nameless victims, Tolkien loves and fears black dick to conduct genocide with (an abusive spouse raping the Global South through a Black Revenge strawman); never forget that.

(model and artist: Jericho and Persephone van der Waard)

Keeping with Otto's Numinous and Radcliffe's Black Veil (the dialectic of shelter and the alien), the Gothic is writ in tremendous obscurity and decay. "Black," for Tolkien, is alien to abject—while imprinting colonial norms onto hauntological throwbacks, and which help explain his endless productivity and celebration by state copycats: extending capital through complicit cryptonymy/state entropy to best restore British-American monarchism; i.e., a "greater" nostalgia of the imaginary past to retreat towards (the American benefactors, oddly enough, retreating into a false Britain). For us, it's alien to reunite amid oscillating feelings of the foreign and familiar deciding what to do, during unequal, forbidden exchange. This goes for cocks, or anything attached/relating to them, great and small; e.g., the fat goblin ass or tight hobbit hole attaching to Numinous evocations of nature's alien, Promethean, monstrous-feminine homecoming with workers; i.e., the fire of the gods, Medusa, and their possible worlds waiting patiently beyond the Capitalocene/Capitalist Realism!

This portion of the preface was originally written here, but I have decided to post it separately, on my old blog, given its broader application. To it, I reference an archived video about my grandfather, interviewed in 2005, talking largely about his experiences during WWII: as a Dutch liberation fighter and Holocaust survivor. I didn't have time to go into the video, here, so I recorded a response video where I think about the interview as a third-generation trans Communist Dutch girl writing a book series on goblins and other anti-Semitic monsters (Persephone van der Waard's "Anti-Semitism vs Antisemitism: Discussing My Grandfather (a Dutch Holocaust Survivor) w/ My Work," 2024); i.e., how in writing this preface, I thought of my Dutch heritage overshadowed by fascist oppression, and wanted to examine my grandfather, warts and all; i.e., relative to anti-Semitic myths and monsters that don't apply to Jewish persecution exclusively. —Perse

Third, a note about Zionism and anti-Semitism. It has been brought to my attention that academics and scholars tend to favor "antisemitism" versus "anti-Semitism." Holocaust Remembrance explains it as follows:

The International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) would like to address the spelling of the term "antisemitism," often rendered as "anti-Semitism." The IHRA's concern is that the hyphenated spelling allows for the possibility of something called "Semitism," which not only legitimizes a form of pseudo-scientific racial classification that was thoroughly discredited by association with Nazi ideology, but also divides the term, stripping it from its meaning of opposition and hatred toward Jews. [...] The term has, however, since its inception referred to prejudice against Jews alone. [emphasis, me...] The unhyphenated spelling is favored by many scholars and institutions in order to dispel the idea that there is an entity "Semitism" which "anti-Semitism" opposes. Antisemitism should be read as a unified term so that the meaning of the generic term for modern Jew-hatred is clear. At a time of increased violence and rhetoric aimed towards Jews, it is urgent that there is clarity and no room for confusion or obfuscation when dealing with antisemitism (source).

And yet here I am, using "anti-Semitism," anyways. What gives?

(artists: Persephone van der Waard and Autumn Anarchy)

The problem is, my work on Gothic Communism doesn't concern Jewish people, alone; it explores the holistic and widespread application of blood libel (and relative persecution languages) as having gone beyond Jewish people, but which were once applied aggressively-if-not-uniquely to them as a criminalized non-Christian group (don't forget Muslims during the Crusades, or later on, the Irish Catholics)—i.e., blood libel, sodomy and witch hunts have expanded beyond Jewish people to attack other marginalized groups (often by Jewish tokens, in later centuries); e.g., queer people, women, Muslims and Pagans, Indigenous groups, and people of color all being supplied tropes of a historically anti-Semitic nature: the so-called "bad blood" of slaves and their foregone betrayal as codified "evil servants" (with sex workers and their discrimination being as old as Judaism, for instance). What bigots from older times used to punch primarily down against persons called "Semite," then, has since been repackaged and sent, tokenized, back into the world.

For one, this speaks to a fundamental historical misunderstanding of race, insofar as "race" as a punitive notion under capital didn't exist in the Middle Ages, wherein such things focused on religious persecution against competing factions; it emerged with capital developing into itself as a hauntological device that inserted racism into the imaginary historical past. Said past, in turn, is routinely evoked in ways that concern the abjection process tied to different monsters of a Jewish character that has tangled itself among different marginalized groups, fictions and historical events.

In other words, Zionism can't be separated from non-tokenized forms, which token elements try to emulate and downplay in bad faith. That's not simply the focus of my work (which it very much is), but something that needs to be discussed regardless of bystanders who haven't sold out. The word clearly has been weaponized by Zionism, at this stage, and splitting hairs about a hyphen is a bit academic and furthermore, dangerous; i.e., when the word—regardless of its punctuation (and not even changing the pronunciation, while my using of the hyphen serves an academic purpose)—is clearly being used by colonizers decaying the Jewish body to fulfill a Christianized, capitalist agenda, and which the feelings of non-participants in an ongoing genocide is, forgive me, considerably less important than exposing the genocide. Those feelings are still valid—hence my prefacing of the Tolkien critique with any kind of preamble at all—but they should never silence criticism regarding said word's current misuse, nor the tokenized actions Zionism represents, when doing so.

(source: Suzanne Moore's "'Terf' Is the Ultimate Slur against Women," 2023)

Just as we shouldn't invent brand-new phrases to distance feminism from TERFs, nor should we, regarding Jews and Zionism. Zionism is a radical, fascist form of Judaism, just as TERFs are a radical, fascist form of feminism, and each bleeds into fiction, itself, meriting a radical response from us; i.e., to change the course of history on all registers. Radical problems require radical solutions, meaning bigots use DARVO and obscurantism to point the finger at their victims with their own language (witch cops hunting other witches, above). I'm not going to stop using "anti-Semitism" academically just because it offends someone (academia would cease to exist, if that were the case); the point is how it's offending others and why—using intellectual movements to scare those who fear intellectual power's historical ability to change the status quo (versus maintaining it by attacking intellectuals, which fascism does by design).

To that, I don't "have" to be Jewish to write about Jewish tokenism and oppression going beyond a narrow idea of Jewish people/Jewish people period, any more than I would "need" be to be black to write about Frantz Fanon's arguments likewise extending to non-African-Americans; my doing so merely happens on my side of the pedagogy of the oppressed, using its relative privilege, oppression and alienation to reach across the aisle, regarding holistic oppression: as a white, middle-class trans woman whose own non-Jewish family (on my father's side, next page) was brutalized by the Nazi regime in Holland. Nazis don't discriminate insofar as discrimination goes; they merely swap out scapegoats as needed.

Fascism, at its core, is conservative, meaning it compels speech through selective boundaries and moderate-to-reactionary punishment (re: "boundaries for me, not for thee"). We must contend with such arbitration while also dealing with each other's respective and collective abuse, mid-liberation; i.e., saying what needs to be said while dealing with others who say what should or shouldn't be said—all leading to a great deal of unproductive arguing back and forth, instead of systemic, cooperative change (a bit like Gandalf and the three trolls, the latter debating about eating the dwarves and the wizard invading their conversation by throwing his voice to make them delay until the sun came up): "Won't someone please think of the Jews!" If all they do is lead to singular and myopic interpretations that never move the focus onto stopping genocide, such refrains are infantilizing and criminogenic; i.e., those who say them in bad faith don't actually care about Jews, save as a tool for discrediting activism.

To it, my giving of hard facts and genuine arguments that Jewish people can respond to is a sign of respect; i.e., towards those I view not simply as human, but adults capable of thinking for themselves, while letting their fellow oppressed get a word in, too. To prevent that would be to logically limit each group only to itself through self-administered gag orders—a Tower of Babel to divide and conquer all peoples raped by capital. No one ever said rebellion was simple or clean (e.g., Gramps, below, was a Dutch²⁰⁶ patriot and Holocaust survivor who spoke about Nazi abuse all his adult life, but also loved America/free enterprise, hated Socialism [which he conflated with the Nazis] and would have fought in the War on Terror if they'd let him, and certainly wouldn't have understood what trans people are).

(source: Linda Meloche's "Henri Vanderwaard Interview," 2005)

Beyond Jewish trauma, we likewise wouldn't discourage not talking about rape or sex work, period, merely because it makes some women uncomfortable or because it "only" applies to them; that's TERF/SWERF logic, which extends to Zionism laterally espousing the various anti-Semitic myths surrounding it, but also the rape (and other harm) those systemically cause—i.e., when one group tries to monopolize victimhood, including demonic theatre as the performative, anisotropic tool, thereof. Silence is genocide, including partial silence. Gothic Communism seeks to raise awareness and emotional/Gothic intelligence to prevent universal rape, which you can't do if you're bunkered down in a space disconnected from others; i.e., for fear of being offended to such a degree that you close your eyes (and your mouth) entirely.

²⁰⁶ The Dutch being historically compared to Jewish people through similar "miser" arguments; i.e., the blood libel argument of essentialized greed being "in the blood," which my people endure similar to Jewish people: by also being concentrated by tokenized elements appeasing the oppressor! To do so is folly! All arguments for liberation are valid provided they liberate all peoples from capital calling us "sick" for different reasons.

So many people that I showed this section to were afraid to say anything at all, for fear of speaking out of turn, or telling me to "ask a Jewish person," first. And while some caution is merited, and good-faith Jewish opinions are entirely valid, to let overcaution push people into keeping quiet about some fairly obvious connections—like Zionism and racial conflict in Tolkien, bleeding into politics through persecution mania and genocide denial—is a fatal flaw that fascism will happily telegraph and exploit! Fascists aren't your friends; they're cops with a license to kill, cheat and steal for the bourgeoisie in bad faith—i.e., power aggregates behind activism painted as "slander" by state litigators playing at false rebellion. They'll wear the mask until it suits them; i.e., until their victims lower their guard, all but asking for a knife in the back.

If I sound defensive, it's because I am; I've trusted others blindly before and have been burned for it (tokens are vicious in their policing of others). So I'd rather preface things ahead of time, then proceed in good faith when critiquing tokenism going forwards. That's how healthy relationships work.

These arguments, then, are a gallery exhibit in a symposium meant to counteract hate crimes, not foster public harassment targeting minority groups for hateful reasons. Anyone who walks away from my writing and seriously thinks that I'm attacking Jews/trying to harm them is the one with the problem, in that respect. No one is above critique, including victims but especially when they go on to victimize others (whether on purpose or not); i.e., while hiding behind exclusive-victim status. Instead, we should value the voice of victims in a holistic sense, not squander it by policing its potential to the point where any critical bite disappears. If fascism squirms, you know you've hit a nerve and should keep at it. Hit 'em where it hurts!

All of this is to say, the selective use of problematic kayfabe language (e.g., orcs and goblins, but also king hippos, left) pertains to the semi-imaginary history I'm referring to, here, which the Gothic essentially comprises at all times. It's a specific group of disparate historical threads and ideas that remain at play and continue to evolve; i.e., blood libel, sodomy and witchcraft, which have similar historical elements but different applications nowadays through evolved monstrous code (re: goblins, vampires and witches). And the historical elements regarding blood lineage and power that such things evoke, however false they ultimately are, continue being evoked in bad faith by fascist parties of various signatures.

Sometimes I call that signature "pre-fascist" or "post fascist," according to the anachronisms at work. But the lineage of forgeries nonetheless remain; i.e., as something of world history that, however imaginary it ultimately is, can still be addressed through camp: regarding tokenized violence lampooned by a polity of victims, which bourgeois elements levy against each other during Capitalist Realism. Tokenism is the weaponizing of useful idiots. Except, it's not Jewish "erasure" to camp anti-Semitism; i.e., to speak to other groups harmed by or with anti-Semitic devices (speaking to a hauntology whose religious, ethnic and/or cultural "other" doesn't apply exclusively to Jews). They can use it to speak to their unique history and abuse, and others can expand it beyond that bailiwick to speak to theirs, too.

A social element obviously persists. The phrase "anti-Semitic," unto itself, is known to make many Jewish people feel unwelcome, but as I will go on to argue, it doesn't apply exclusively to them, past or present. There's also a historical character to interpret, mid-praxis. Much of that history is real and embellished, and speaks to things that are simply uncomfortable period; i.e., dealt in demonic forms, and something that refers to a specific idea of "past" that is still being used to attack a variety of people from the same source—while also being associated with a narrow section of the population and its tokenized violence, shouting others down!

To be blunt, police victims often go on to police others. The need to discuss Zionism, then (and its monopolies/mirror syndrome), frankly outweighs making all Jews feel comfortable, because there are those among them who—since Israel's forming by the British empire and the United States—have grown increasingly hostile, vocal and bad-faith; i.e., as a tokenized minority speaking for the oppressor majority through themselves (re: gaslight, gatekeep, girl boss). Hyphen or not, the word is positively radioactive, and the time for polite discussion using it has well-and-truly passed (e.g., climate change, genocide, fascism).

In short, we need to prioritize the acknowledgement of the grievous harm being caused, but also the tokenized means of sanitizing itself through mythical language that points away from the mechanisms at work; i.e., I'd rather talk frankly about the history of anti-Semitism and its expanded Venn Diagram of persecution networks right now—using markers of bigotry at play to raise awareness about genocide that some Jewish people have had a hand in—then spend time coming up with comfortable words that fail to cut home.

Anti-Semitism is an ugly business. So is Tolkien's use of it through his token power fantasies. We need to be able to address that, including the myriad ways in which these devices often go unnoticed precisely for the reasons above. How can I talk about the bigotries at work in any focused way if the language for doing so is forced out of focus and off target? We need to pinpoint these issues, not hold hands (and this is coming from a service top). You might as well ask me to cut down the mightiest tree in the forest with a herring (or use a herring to blow up the Death Star, below). Counterterrorism, from an actually rebellious standpoint, is meant to make tokenism think twice, including those sitting—with relative comfort—on the fence. For many Jews, this idea is unthinkable all on its own, but criminogenic conditions make for strange bedfellows (and no one ever said that traitors weren't logical in their assessment of the Judas payment). The idea isn't to blame or police our fellow oppressed, but recognize and address what many do not.

I could say "victims of fascism" to dodge the issue, but then the history and signature (of which victims) would be swept aside—meaning "as it would be" for Tolkien or similar authors (e.g., Lucas, above), who built their careers (and legacies) out of coded racism and other bigotries with false arguments and origins tied to real ideologies; i.e., Tolkien did believe in blood myth, and applied it to Jewish people, but also non-white and monstrous-feminine people period through the same medieval hauntologies; re: orcs, which clearly have an anti-Semitic quality to them that, canonized by Tolkien's work, go on to disguise that function used against all parties (which is why I think that covering up the lineage is dangerous).

(source: Wikimedia Commons)

Furthermore, any word we could invent would still wind up being used by the colonizer abusing tokenism to obfuscate their own operations! Tokenism and betrayal are both an ugly business—and the obscurantism of oppression is equally vile—but the reality as such needs to be dragged out into the open, not covered up; i.e., that, despite being coded unfairly as "vengeful backstabbers," some Jewish people do sell out (e.g., Ze'ev Jabotinsky, left), as have any marginalized groups in history tied to different monsters "getting even"; re, Federici vis-à-vis witches: "Witchcraft accusations, in fact, are the ultimate mechanism of alienation and estrangement as they turn the accused—still primarily women—into monstrous beings, dedicated to the [vengeful] destruction of their communities, therefore making them undeserving of any compassion and solidarity" (source).

Empire hides behind its tokens, and Jewish revenge assimilates into Christian revenge (re: the Crusades, which Zionism emulates to kill Arabs for Christians through misguided ideas of revenge). This includes turning a blind eye towards present wrongs concerning past wrongs; i.e., regarding generational trauma, which many Jewish people in privilege are currently doing. If that bothers you when you're demonstrably not a Zionist, remember that my critique is of Zionism hiding within Judaism as a more radical and tokenized form, thereof. And if you still can't see past your own insecurities about my arguments "rocking the boat," then maybe you should let go of whatever's blinding you to the bloodbath currently happening overseas. While past atrocities can bring marginalized communities closer together, they also shock and isolate them, encouraging as they do willful ignorance regarding larger systemic issues. Sooner or later, that's what complacency always becomes.

However shameful, disturbing or uncomfortable that feels, then, we have to account for it as it's happening with blood libel, then reclaim that in light of such embarrassments. It sucks to require that anyone face the shame someone else more powerful in their own group has caused, but it must be done; i.e., such things don't affect "just the Jews" (as the Palestinians well know, by now), so telling the investigator(s), "stay in your lane" won't work: Zionism is currently happening and will keep happening regardless if all Jewish people are comfortable or not. Indeed, their fantasies of assimilation (re: Tolkien) often play into the silencing of genocide taking place! If their conscience gnaws at them, so be it; and if they have a bone to pick with me (for valid reasons or not), "lay on, Macduff. The black knight always triumphs!"

All kidding aside, I relish criticism; it lets me know what to fortify. I also specialize in tokenism, which—if you haven't noticed—is a tricky subject; i.e., if you don't belong to the group being tokenized, you're viewed (with some justice) as an outsider. And yet, we're all oppressed to some degree (re, Derrida: "there is no outside of the text"). Furthermore, tokenism remains all the same, requiring its addressal, mid-exile, and inside a system of differences; i.e., it needs to be interpreted intersectionally and holistically to acknowledge parties acting in bad faith, and who rely on such selection processes to silence valid criticism outright.

In turn, my usage of "anti-Semitism" is also tricky because it concerns holistic historical abuses speaking to token forces who rely on the feelings of those they blend in with to cover for them; i.e., human shields, those regarding different peoples harmed by/sandwiched between collective and selective bigoted practices, and with language that was formerly used to attack Jews pointedly having expanded elsewhere: by using the same fictitious elements of arbitrary myth-making and application tied to Zionism (frontier capitalism) as something that hasn't gone anywhere.

Again, I'm talking about monsters, and there isn't a Jewish monopoly to what has been assigned to (and to some degree accepted by) that portion of the world's population. The "Semite," while it historically is centered around Jews, is an umbrella egregore that includes vampires, witches, orcs and goblins leveled at a variety of real-world groups; i.e., at the same time, and to a rising degree of prominence during Jewish gentrification and decay through Zionism (a practice, that through capital, tries to bastardize various inkblots to mean one thing and nothing else; e.g., token orc butts are "Jewish," in Zionist eyes, and non-token/abject orc butts are "Hamas"; re: the giving and receiving of state violence through bourgeois models of terrorist/counterterrorist violence, per the zombie apocalypse relaid in demonic forms).

(artist: Just Some Noob)

My whole point, then, is how a formerly Jewish-exclusive calumny has expanded beyond Jewish peoples, in recent centuries, and well into the present. Even during the Holocaust, it wasn't "just" about Jews and how they were affected by that disaster of state machinery run amok (desk murder); other groups besides Jewish people were sent to their deaths to "answer" the Jewish Question, but the popular historical records (fictional or otherwise) don't mention them, nearly enough. I'd rather discuss things openly to reclaim them from token forces; i.e., as monopolizing holocaust, exile, persecution, bereavement, rape (accusations) and revenge, and whose falsehoods we use the imaginary power of "Gothic" fakeries to subvert. "Semitism" is invented, which means it can be reinvented. So, too, has Jewishness gone from a religion to a national body that relates to others in ways that necessitate such invention and outspoken shots-in-the-arm. Blame Capitalism, not me, and set your tokenized guilt aside; my patience is frankly at its end, and I'm going to hyphenate different things to form connections useful towards universal liberation (as the Gothic so often does; re: the grey area of its storied poetics; e.g., correct-incorrect). We learn by challenging each other, and my work is hardly the final say in the grand scheme of things.

That being said, I also think we shouldn't seriously entertain any idea of ranking rape and "oppression Olympics." There's no such thing as a perfect victim. Instead, I think all groups need to be considered together in light of state abuse; i.e., versus a great many living in the shadow of one particular group, whose own extinction event has been advertised by American media to prioritize them, first and foremost. This goes for trans people, Jews, people of color or Indigenous people, etc; no one "trumps" anyone else, everyone speaking out against tokenism regardless of who's doing it whenever such things are out of joint/balance.

Believe it or not, I don't want to step on anyone's toes, here, but all the same, we need to get over the idea that holocaust and genocide are strictly of a Jewish character and history (real or otherwise); i.e., while simultaneously recognizing how tools of Jewish oppression aren't used against them, we can acknowledge the harms caused against them, including holocaust denial. You can't camp holocaust, but you can camp your own survival, and multiple people can survive the same event to camp it later.

Likewise, it's not denial to include others in what has largely been framed (in Zionist circles) as a wholly Jewish ordeal. Two (or more) things can be true at once, Zionism doubling Jewishness as capably as Gene Simmons, but for different reasons (see: footnote, next page). Just as Israel and America invent things out of whole cloth behind double standards, we can do the same to spite those standards; i.e., fighting fire with fire and for land back despite the Jewish dogmatic belief of a god-denied, -promised, then ultimately -given homeland. Like Omelas, the point is walking away from Egypt if that means not genociding other people, not towards it! Israel is a ploy to buy cheap loyalty in furtherance to capital's continued raping of others—Jews included!

This will certainly ruffle some feathers, but I'm a Satanic atheist; i.e., there is no God, only workers vs the elite and whatever deities either fabricates for their own purposes. My doing so happens while speaking to those harmed by refusing to look past matters of a "purely" ethnic character. It was never about "pure ethnicity" but dividing and conquering more broadly using that and other means of persecution through various networks, thereof. Jews don't have a monopoly on holocaust, and as Zionism shows us, they can tokenize like any other minority group to police nature with; i.e., non-white skin, white masks; e.g., the Inca's imperial subjugates and the Conquistadors. Betrayal is betrayal. It's only ever a question of who and why.

Assimilation is poor stewardship. We must do better if we are to survive capital's effects on us and the planet; we must camp what has become canon, including what Sandy Norton calls "the Imperialism of theory"; re: academics policing what is or isn't acceptable, thereby granting imperial characters to any discourse beyond academia that, unto itself, desperately needs to shed. Applying Sandy to Gothic studies instead of Foucault, I choose to use "anti-Semitism" because of its speculative richness, not its historical misuse. And if those historically abused by it feel like I'm encroaching on what is unique to them, they are sorely mistaken: witches and "sodomites" were killed in the Middle Ages, followed by the Renaissance, Holocaust, and neoliberal era. As such, liberation politics need to expand to account for changing dynamics of oppression under capital, lest they tokenize and decay as Zionism (and its fanatic territorialism) has done.

No one ever stopped fascism by being polite, and anti-fascism is inherently radical because it challenges state's rights in ways gentrified parties won't; i.e., nothing is sacred except basic universal human, animal and environmental rights, and it's possible to compromise those by doing nothing of note. It's also possible to work allegory into seemingly vacuous material. Far be it from me to venerate KISS, for example, but if they can camp their own idea of Jewishness and present it as monstrous to get what they wanted²⁰⁷, then so can we toy around with ideas of monstrosity that aren't intrinsically Jewish to find our own pro-Communist voice under capital. Such is the nature of demonic poetics, which camp dogma through itself; e.g., through rock 'n roll; i.e., not all Jewish representation challenges profit—can be weaponized against Communism just like the Nazis did (re: Israel and Zionism, next page), or at the very least can foster ignorance through overly simplistic approaches: "Keep It Simple, Stupid."

(artist: Kim Kelly)

So, yes, my statements will doubtless offend some. That is what those in power want. But all the same, my work speaks to an imaginary element of discourse that is, unto itself, half-real; i.e., anything used to attack the idea of Jewishness has well-and-truly expanded into other groups.

And if saying that ruffles some feathers—specifically that I mention inclusive oppression to address the needs of those other groups while keeping the former in mind—said former group needs to remember that liberation is a universal affair and all peoples need to come together to overcome oppression as one; i.e., there is no one group for which oppression exclusively applies, or who has a magical, innately oppressed quality to them/monopoly on oppression. To think otherwise is to deny others a voice, no different than Afrocentrism or similar movements, which only historically decay into a kind of fortress mentality that prioritizes itself over other groups in a similar position.

The fact remains, we're all in the same boat, and bigotry is built into capital; i.e., "a bigotry for one is a bigotry for all," built into capital as something to

²⁰⁷ As Jon Stratton writes in "KISS: Jewishness, Hard Rock and the Holocaust" (2020):

KISS was a hard rock group, one of the most successful during the second half of the 1970s and early 1980s. The group's two founding members, Gene Simmons and Paul Stanley, were both Jewish. Indeed, both were the sons of Holocaust survivors. This article examines the impact of Simmons's and Stanley's Jewishness on KISS as a rock group and on its success. One of the most obvious impacts was the drive to succeed which Simmons and Stanley shared. Simmons writes about wanting power, Stanley that he wanted respect. As children of survivors they wanted safety. During much of the 1970s, the Holocaust was not yet publicly acknowledged. However, its trauma is evident in, for example, the stage characters that Simmons and Stanley adopted (source).

dismantle accordingly. It's certainly important to communicate our feelings and say when something bothers us; but also, upsetting others isn't the point of my arguments, which remain true regardless if they are upsetting—re: Jewishness is a weapon, one that state proponents use to limit oppressed outcry to a single specific group of people it can then weaponize against itself and others. As Asprey astutely writes, "Not only can terror be employed as a weapon, but any weapon can become a weapon of terror: terror is a weapon, a weapon is terror, and no one agency monopolizes it" (source). No one has a monopoly on shelter or aliens, mid-dialectic!

So, for example, can the Jewish gentry in Hollywood punch down against anyone who speaks out against America's token ethnostate²⁰⁸. For them, "Jewishness" = "terror" carried out of the medieval world and into ours; i.e., one whose half-real, historical and imaginary sense of past (the Wisdom of the Ancients) can dominate the proceedings—regardless of class, culture and race, to serve the bourgeoisie through its cultivating of the Superstructure!

Zionism does just that, turning Jews (and Jewish symbols and arguments of persecution and rebellion, victim and oppressor) against Jews and friends of the ²⁰⁸ Including wealthy Jews who refuse to toe the line; e.g., Jonathan Glazer's acceptance speech and admittedly mixed/sanitized approach nevertheless met with resounding criticism from other Jews in Hollywood (re: Tatiana Siegel's "Over 1,000 Jewish Creatives and Professionals Have Now Denounced..." 2023), versus Sarah Friedland's own award response, describing the conflict in no uncertain terms: as "the 336th day of Israel's genocide in Gaza," upon receiving her own trophy (source: Aljazeera's "Jewish director at Venice Film Festival Speaks in Solidarity with Palestine," 2024). Context matters.

Jewish while making the idea of "Jewishness" something that Imperialism can hide behind: "We will always suffer and do so exclusively in ways that supersede our victims." It's an Omelas refrain, turned into a spear and, as it turns out, a cash cow to milk, mid-genocide; e.g., Judas Priest's Invincible Shield (2024); re: Persephone van der Waard's "Judas Priest: Invincible Shield and Zionism" (2024):

as the time-tested tradition of punching Jews became uncool after WW2, Jews became tokenized to punch down; i.e., against themselves and other oppressed groups, thereby serving the same-old profit motive as part of Capitalism out of Antiquity. In turn, Priest seems to have emblazoned their album with such a badge despite the Palestinian genocide happening next door (evoking a party disturbingly similar to Israeli settlers). Despite some bad actors being far more active in ongoing misinformation campaigns, Invincible Shield sadly feels like Priest saying "the show must go on" while using such imagery to line their own pockets. It feels at best, willfully obtuse; i.e., the modern equivalent to selling sugar during British Abolitionism instead of honey despite knowing full well of the Caribbean sugar (thus slave) trade.

All the same, Priest's commodifying of struggle at the cost of human life is merely the chickens coming home to roost, our metal gods staying silent on what should be blasted from the loudest speakers imaginable (source).

Silence is death²⁰⁹; for Capitalism to work, it needs a victim and a cop for which to buy silence with. To that, victims can become cops through oppressor misuse of oppression language to silence others with; re: DARVO and obscurantism; e.g., the Star of David adorning Zionist war machines and dropping bombs on Palestinians and Lebanese people, while playing the universal savior and victim, and policing anyone who might use their language incorrectly. Different voices need the ability to speak up and out for themselves and others, thus coexist, lest capital divide and disorganize us to keep doing what it has, is and always will do: rape worlds and the world by sowing division to move money through nature.

²⁰⁹ Brooklyn Museum writes,

In 1987, Avram Finkelstein, Brian Howard, Oliver Johnston, Charles Kreloff, Chris Lione, and Jorge Socarrás founded the SILENCE=DEATH Project to support one another in the midst of the AIDS crisis. Inspired by the posters of the Art Workers Coalition and the Guerrilla Girls (both of whose work is on view nearby), they mobilized to spread the word about the epidemic and created the now-iconic Silence=Death poster featuring the pink triangle as a reference to Nazi persecution of LGBTQ people in the 1930s and 1940s. It became the central visual symbol of AIDS activism after it was adopted by the direct action advocacy group AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) [source].

(artists: Avram Finkelstein, Brian Howard, Oliver Johnston, Charles Krelloff, Chris Lione, and Jorge Socarrás)

Capitalism is a disease that makes society sick (and fosters diseases like AIDS in those societies; i.e., Capitalism is AIDS). For the colonizer class, the point of tone-policing criticism isn't to raise consciousness in duality towards an intersectional solidarity resisting capital; it's to insist in bad faith that we need to respect this one group's feelings above the collective well-being of those the bad actors are currently destroying in the name of a people they themselves have stopped representing save as a dogwhistle and cloak. And those tactics will likewise be employed among good-faith participants—laypeople and academics alike—who are understandably upset by what is being said on both sides. Those feelings and concerns are valid, up to a point, but desperately need to recognize how they can be weaponized by the state to overlook legitimate criticism against genocide. "Yeah, conflict sucks; but it's also necessary when escaping the Torment Nexus." So critique power where it is!

We need to abolish genocide as a consequence of privatization, and for that to happen, we must deprivatize bigotry by discussing it holistically among all groups affected by the same tools differently. This isn't "just" affecting Jewish people, then, nor is it "only" about them, and we shouldn't tiptoe around Zionists colonizing those arguments; i.e., to weaponize Jewish discomfort to perjure themselves and others. Rememory hurts and, to a healing degree, reenvisions and reprioritizes the imaginary elements of past history during the rememory process; i.e., to suit all peoples under attack simultaneously by those abusing imagination to suit their needs and historical revisionism for the state (re: Zionism).

And if that hits a nerve, then good; pain is healing. This pain is controlled—is an academic exhibit couched inside a larger book full of trigger warnings. To it, I'm not running to every Jewish person I know or see and saying "anti-Semitism, anti-Semitism!" until they grab a stick and brain me. It's an academic conversation punching Nazis (which Zionists are) while acknowledging the praxial complexities concerning blood libel as a universal performative device. Anyone can wear a beard and throw a stone (or a can of soup "for our family"), and the house—to some degree—is always made of glass:

Glass-Onion that shit! Have your revenge by demonopolizing the concept; i.e., as normally used by oppressors-in-disguise, who we learn from to do better than while borrowing from. Shakespeare's Shylock soliloquy from The Merchant of Venice, for example, has tremendous liberatory potential; i.e., as something to act out in spite of its anti-Semitic origins and fixation on Christian ideas of Jewish revenge. Shylock inquires, "Hath not a Jew eyes?" to stress the praxial similarities of oppression and oppressor on token groups who, pushed to their limit, do sell out; i.e., Portia punching down to serve herself and Venice (while dressed as a man, no less), and Shylock converting to Christianity after having his day in court! Nothing is sacred but universal liberation; anything that prohibits said liberation is dogma (often in disguise, above).

So "better the instruction" by thinking outside the box while inside it. Disrupt! Speak out! Discredit your discreditor! Make others uncomfortable, provided it develops Communism through Gothic poetics challenging profit (thus unironic rape and revenge)! The exercise is one of interpretation through performance. No one agency can monopolize victimhood or revenge, including Jews. And if any try to argue otherwise, remind them of your own oppression linked to theirs ("I see your holocaust and raise you a queer pogrom..."). All roads lead to Auschwitz, after all; the idea is to prevent concentration and extermination to begin with by using medieval arguments "when in Rome..."; i.e., to burn Rome, not people! They'll blame us for it, regardless.

And yet, if my use of "anti-Semitism" still bothers you, I hear you and understand; I merely ask in return that you acknowledge why I'm saying "anti-Semitism," to begin with. My aim is not to offend anyone for its own sake, but to expand emotional/Gothic intelligence and awareness by probably offending some people; i.e., as a necessary part of the process. Regarding blood libel, sodomy and witch hunter rhetoric, I shove those, mid-synthesis, towards their actual, total and half-real scope of influence: towards all marginalized groups, including my own, as part of the same underlying struggle that is regularly demonized by capital.

To that, I'm trans and belong to a group of people who were occupied and raped by the Nazis; my grandfather—despite fighting to liberate Holland from the Nazis—was still a conservative-minded man I seldom agreed with. Segregation is no defense and silence is genocide, therefore death. We must solidarize intersectionally—not merely to survive, but break Capitalist Realism (engendered by the likes of Spielberg saving war to maintain Pax Americana; re: Zinn). This means preventing what causes genocide to begin with; it means causing some degree of pain, during ludo-Gothic BDSM. "Hurt, not harm," babes! You "don't get a pass" just because you're Jewish (or queer, non-white, or any other group); doing so would only give capital something to pounce and capitalize on: a human shield from criticism (Jewish or not, the settler colony model favors women and children for this purpose, below)!

If history proves anything at all, it's that cops come from victims; i.e., those who, apart from desperation and convenience, likewise betray through entitlement. Those who can't be wrong in their own mind are always right, which—as the Nazis, America and Zionism demonstrate through American liberalism needing fascism to operate—will always lead to the harming of others: by the entitled group, because the others (who are not them) are always wrong! This caveat includes victims who sell others out, becoming cops in the process (stochastic terrorism). And if that stings a little to hear—if it shocks those it applies to out of their useless sense of martyrdom and makes them rethink things, or at least recover the ability to interpret things orthopraxically versus dogmatically—then good! Equally good, though, is it making bad actors to go mask-off (as many Zionists have recently done). Cryptonymy serves multiple goals.

To avoid genocide as a historical-material outcome, we need to kill our darlings during dialectical-material analysis. Said scrutiny includes challenging the terrible idea of an exclusive and innate victimhood tied to a select group of people that—regardless of what traitors think, and however deeply entrenched their dogma is—cannot be reduced to class, religion, ethnicity and/or culture; i.e., a misconception that often stems from popular media; re, bands like Judas Priest:

Being a fan of their music since high school (for over twenty years now), a part of me takes no joy in doing so; but all the same, part of me does. I'll gladly sacrifice the sacred image of my childhood heroes if it means liberating Palestinians (and by extension all oppressed groups). I may not succeed, but I want to try because it's worth trying. Certainly I can enjoy Priest while criticizing their pernicious aspects; and, as Anita Sarkeesian put it, doing so is "both possible and necessary." Otherwise, what are we doing? (ibid.).

The same goes for Judaism or any precious idea, but also any means of spreading it in ways that cause harm; i.e., overcoming oppression, in Jewish culture, is important, but its overprioritization historically leads to communication breakdown/abjection (re: Zionism). Hence, how a device able to heal actually causes more harm in the face of capital doing what capital does: raping nature as monstrous-feminine by tokenizing workers; i.e., anyone acting like the universal, exclusive victim; re: "Haven't I suffered enough? I know all there is to know about victimhood, because I'm the only victim to ever exist!" To centralize one group and one group alone is to normalize through tunnel vision. We're in this together, comrades, and the state is the enemy, not me.

I don't want to hurt anyone purely for its own sake, here. Instead, if you scratch a Zionist, a fascist bleeds, and this goes beyond Jewish culture and identity to spread into other groups intersecting oppression as a state weapon. If ever that occurs, the priorities for self-victimization should be reexamined.

The pain in doing so—of getting scratched, mid-debate—will invariably yield new synthesis, thus better praxis pushing away from Capitalism, once and for all! Alienation is bad; it's also a bridge leading to greener pastures, scratching at dogma as ultimately a dead, plastic device that can be weaponized for our purposes: demonic poetics inventing new uses for old dead symbols! The symbol's appearance remains, but its function can anisotropically change, mid-duality—on the Aegis, oppositional praxis reversing abjection/worker chattelization to legitimize our struggles and invalidate profit's (re: per the whore's revenge, the state [and its rights] incompatible with life/consent, needing cops-and-victims extermination [thus rape, per the profit motive] just to exist)! Subversion of state utility can become normal; i.e., during the cryptonymy process becoming second-nature at a societal level. "We camp canon because we must."

(model and artist: Blxxd Bunny and Persephone van der Waard)

Gothic Communism is holistic, liminal, dualistic, and ergodic, bringing different voices together to find common ground. My focus is sex work and Gothic poetics (whose nudity and exposure is offensive to a great many people), but it by no means rejects Jewish identity or voices; it merely asks them, "Give us a place to voice ourselves and say what we need to say. Nazis suck, including Jewish Nazis." Refusing victimization is important, of course, but making victimization your whole identity—meaning to such an unchecked degree that you alienate other oppressed peoples around you, therefore elevate yourself above them/ignore their own opposition affected by tokenism (Zionism or otherwise)—is reckless. Fascism will fash, regardless. Find similarity amid difference and come together to challenge the state and its lapdogs. Liberation transcends national, ethnic and religious boundaries! ACAB! ASAB! AHAB (All Holocausts Are Bad)! Free Palestine!

Idle Hands, part three: Goblins, Anti-Semitism and Monster-Fucking (feat. Tolkien's orcs and goblins, acid Communism, and SpongeBob SquarePants)

The dwarves' covetous memory becomes one of unbridled revenge, its call to war against nature sharpening to rekindle better times out of myth tied to artefacts that suggest it to start with: "He was witless and wandering, and had forgotten almost everything but the map and the key" (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "Policing the Whore" (2024)

Now that we've thoroughly covered witches and briefly examined vampires as sex demons, let's carry demons and forbidden sight beyond "Midnight Vampire" or Lady Hellbender and into other famous forms of blood libel, namely goblins; re: demonic sex as torturous, psychosexual, and playful; i.e., regarding unequal power exchange, whose monster-fucking gives forbidden knowledge back, and once received, turns workers from goblin-killer into goblin-friend!

To do so, we'll be looking at Tolkien, once more; re: as a patriarchal throwback/neo-Victorian dinosaur worshipped by the public while compensating for his own imperial nostalgia colonizing nature; i.e., by gentrifying war during cartographic refrains, which we deconstruct and subvert during the whore's revenge. Our aim is simply to attack the validity of Tolkien's anti-Semitic goblins; i.e., as unworthy holders of nature that others more worthy are tasked, by the author playing wishmaster/god, with carrying out his disguised revenge/ethnocentric arguments: that whores and Jews are classically slaves, in medieval parlance, and goblins are Jewish-coded whores of nature/the underworld to threaten more deserving parties (the dwarves) with different kinds of harm (e.g., rape, captivity and torture)!

In The Hobbit, for example, Tolkien loves to monomythically "kettle" the dwarves before letting them break free—all to genocide the ignoble savages and take their land back for the state (the white Indian argument, but also marginalized in-fighting and tokenization²¹⁰). Yet, in pimping nature, Tolkien has (through evil, backstabbing Jews and other slaves) created something the state may criminalize, but never fully monopolize as "of nature"; re: a brothel/disco place of revenge where the whore takes back the sex, drugs, and monster-fucking rock 'n roll that someone like Tolkien always authors in favor of empire, thus capital.

Goblins are whores, like any other monstrous-feminine, thus pimped by Tolkien in ways where his victims have the slave's black revenge; i.e., by reclaiming the things used to normally stigmatize and colonize them for profit, whose motive and Realism they break through ludo-Gothic BDSM; e.g., the spurious notion that "all goblins" love not just gold, but loot (a kind of wish fulfillment tying them to police violence, below). Porn simply lets us frankly eroticize—or otherwise discuss—such desires through a lens of public nudism; i.e., relative to the stigmas, bigotries, phobias, etc, that we want to interrogate, thus change, through our own versions of these age-old monster-fucking devices.

²¹⁰ Which extends to literal animals; e.g., the Great Eagles—decked in gold by the dwarves after they help win the Battle of the Five Armies—having seemingly routed the goblins "for good" ...until LotR; i.e., evil can never be extinguished (despite Tolkien's love for propaganda battles), because the state always needs a scapegoat to colonize/profit off of, thus pimp and project its own brutality onto.

First, I'll remind you of some history and arguments about goblins to keep in mind, then walk you through how we'll apply them to Tolkien; i.e., regarding the man's anti-Semitic sex demons, and his own harmful monster-fucking dialogs regarding them. After that, we'll consider how to break the monopoly by playing with them, ourselves; i.e., when using Fisher's acid Communism through Gothic poetics, subversive monster-fucking scenarios (white-on-black sex), cartoons, and shared labor exchanges. We'll close the section out by thinking about whores at large—the big scary ones that speak to a palliative Communist Numinous that smaller underling monsters like goblins reputedly serve and/or spring from—before we move onto "Forbidden Sight, part two: the Promethean Quest vis-à-vis Frankenstein (and similar poetic elements) about making demons at large.

(artist: Personal Ami)

Note: This symposium mentions lots of ideas we can only touch on, here; i.e., regarding not just goblins, but also vampires, zombies and Capitalism-as-undead (all of which I've written about extensively in my PhD and other volumes. Expect block quotes).

Also, in keeping with ludo-Gothic BDSM and the spirit of playing with monsters/darkness, this final portion of "Idle Hands" will be fairly messy and chaotic; i.e., stressing the holistic and intersectional elements of Gothic Communism (and demons/darkness visible), combining anything and everything together to achieve praxial success! —Perse

Tolkien's Other Sex Demons: Goblins

The state, as undead, thrives on tokenism as a bastard DARVO/obscurantist enterprise. Christianity is a cuckoo religion, then, bastardizing older forms of religion and myth, which the state continues to abuse under capital. Our focus, for this symposium, is predominantly one of service and monster-fucking through goblins (and to a lesser degree, orcs); i.e., acting as bad servants, per canonical essentialism and camped by us: during ludo-Gothic BDSM's rape-play angle merging with various half-real roleplay scenarios of "homebrew" interracial porn/xenophilia overcoming unironic racism and other forms of dogmatic xenophobic orthodoxy (for all intents and purposes, this section shall use "ludo-Gothic BDSM" and "monster-fucking" interchangeably. The former essentially constitutes the function of rape play, while the other enacts a form of rape play to function as, but their praxial scope is the same).

To it, orcs and goblins are canonically bad—often compared, during blood libel, to a mindless collective of non-white evil children/the spawn of Satan—and from Heinlein to Cameron to Lucas spewing the same centrist bullshit (re: the Star Wars problem), you can absolutely thank Tolkien for that²¹¹ (and who borrowed his doing so from Beowulf and Grendel's mother giving birth to monstrous-feminine comparable to orcs and goblins).

Few things are as pervasive or insidious as Tolkien, but especially his cartographic refrain hyphenating colonial sex and force, which it then uses to disguise rape with; i.e., antagonizing nature-as-monstrous-feminine, then fucking it unironically to death "by the sword." Hence my attacking it, here, during my holistic study of the man and his work, one last time ("Let us be rid of it, once and for all!"). Doing so by having our revenge during ironic monster sex of our own, we camp the canon to humanize the harvest, making goblins gay during ironic monster sex; i.e., by having sex with that which Tolkien considers abominable, white bodies on black; e.g., white girls taking black dick, or acting "non-white" themselves in accordance with their rebellious elements: the respectively brutish and naughty "orc" and "goblin" equaling "terrorist" and "punk" merged, for our purposes, with "criminal/whore" and "zombie." The idea isn't to separate things, at all, but engage with them holistically because Gothic Communism is holistic; capital divides to conquer us, and we unify to defy profit raping us.

(artist: Noaqin)

We'll get to that, this symposium laying out various dots for you to connect, in a fairly-tangential-but-ultimately-connected group of disparate concepts; it's not really a close-read of specific texts (no Gollum in this one, nor reading into gay ring-bearers²¹²), but a constellation of the man's broadest themes merged with past elements of my own work—opting for orcs and goblins, this time, instead of vampirism (which we examined from Tolkien's stories, in Volume One):

²¹¹ His parental treatment of nature-as-dark comparing the goblins of the Misty Mountains to naughty children punished by a white, all-knowing schoolmaster who killed their king: "Go away! little boys!" shouted Gandalf, in reply. "It isn't bird-nesting time. Also naughty little boys that play with fire get punished!" (source). Echoes of Prometheus, but also King Kong clutching at white brides only to get machine-gunned.

²¹² E.g., "The Ring" is twink Frodo protecting his bussy from black people. We already discussed that in Volume One.

- A White Earth: Defending the Realm from Black Rape (Orc Dick or Otherwise)
- Trouble in Paradise: Fantasizing about Black Monster Dick (feat. acid Communism)
- Doing It, Ourselves: Humanizing Orcs and Goblins through Ironic Monster Sex
- How to Play with Goblins-as-Demons, Ourselves (to Have Our Revenge; feat. Bay, Blxxd Bunny, SpongeBob, and more)
- Wrapping Up/the Big Picture
- Moving On: Some Transitional Arguments about Demon Whores/the Big One (feat. Slan from Berserk)

First, let's explore Tolkien's worldviews regarding orcs and goblins, including their function in his propaganda fantasy worlds. In a nutshell, he bastardizes the Vikings with a pre-fascist, neo-Victorian stamp, abandoning their indigenous elements and turning them into cops to colonize nature with blood libel, while also fearing its rapacious black, queer revenge: he loves and hates black dick.

Let's unpack that, shall we?

A White Earth: Defending the Realm from Black Rape (Orc Dick or Otherwise)

White knights classically save damsels from black rape (dragons, ruffians, goblins, gay men, gods, and/or the witch-king's giant mace); with Morgoth and Sauron, Tolkien frames it as a Numinous, planetary struggle. Even so, it's one that shrinks, mise-en-abyme, into smaller versions of itself; i.e., the white knight(s) rescuing Mother Earth from total shadowy defilement, one smaller black cock at a time: "Just as Sauron concentrated his power in the One Ring, Morgoth dispersed his power into the very matter of Arda, thus the whole of Middle-earth was Morgoth's Ring" (source: Morgoth's Ring, 1993). It's not really a stretch to see how Tolkien treats the wedding band as defiled by a black "finger" on an iron fist, nor how nature itself is the maiden for him to protect from dark corruption; i.e., Arda's coochie threatened by a Pagan-Satanic Great Destroyer during blood libel.

Tolkien fetishizes power as "black"; canonizing Milton's darkness visible (re: Volume Zero), said darkness could have been anything but he chose orcs and goblins/Jewish conspiracy, first and foremost. Though courtly and abstract, the notion likewise remains very apologetic towards Britain, abjecting imperial crimes (of pimping nature) onto a conveniently evil (and distant) supervillain (and said villain's generals, lieutenants, and minions). To it, the context for Tolkien's worldview is wholly abusive on a geopolitical refrain, one that bounces back, half-real, into canonical power fantasies executing blood libel sans irony against black rapists threatening the globe (to impregnate the white-owned womb of nature with non-white sperm).

This Shadow of Tolkien (and myth that he somehow "can't" be racist) can be challenged, which we'll get to. Unlike the status quo, our jokers, smokers, and midnight tokers use the language of danger and torture for iconoclastic funsies: made from clay to sing and dance, making wild rumpus, goblin-style. Blind faith is for suckers, something we cannot afford while being sucked on by capital's dead labor (re: Marx). So do we play with these artificial things (dicks or otherwise), breaking the monopolies on display by giving their jester's vice-character monologues added life through performative allegory and dialectical-material context: something to sell to children, regarding nature's monstrous-feminine revenge (for having their existence be criminalized by the state and its in-groups)!

Cryptonymy's all well and good. The problem is, the Numinous is a common canonical brothel pimping out Hell's usual sluts in bigoted, blood-libel language (of rape and revenge); i.e., down in the dark brought to light to titillate the gentry with stories of exquisite torture, rape and death; re: Tolkien's anti-Semitic dwarves, executing blood libel against orcs and goblins (the former appearing much more in LotR and the latter much more in The Hobbit): bat-like and big-mouthed, but also swart, savage, and sinister beings²¹³ occupying the black, demonic side of the settler argument that upholds Capitalist Realism, mid-abjection. They'll get you, and your little dog, too!

"In caverns deep, where dark things sleep," Tolkien pimps them out as thieves and whores, slavers and killers-for-hire, scapegoats to dance with during his monopolies of demonic poetry that—apart from overt sex and drugs—very much includes the psychosexual overtures of rock 'n roll (and similar forms of music/theatre like heavy metal and jazz, which the Gothic embodies through golemesque puppetry's darkness visible):

Crush, smack! Whip crack!
Smash, grab! Pinch, nab!
You go, my lad!
Ho, ho! my lad!

The black crack! the black crack!
The black crack! the black crack!

²¹³ We don't focus much on the differences between orcs and goblins, here. But orcs, post-Tolkien, tend to be bigger and fiercer than goblins, which are smaller and craftier/rely on tools and gadgets (often weapons too big for them, or explosives, machinery and gizmos); i.e., versus the orc's brute strength. Orcs are big minions and goblins, small; goblins are tied more towards greed, and orcs to rape and cannibalism. While such distinctions are far more recent and easily ignored, orcs and goblins remain popular monomythic punching bags/slumming avatars and vehicles of genuine rebellion, alike.

Down down to Goblin-town
 Down down to Goblin-town
 Down down to Goblin-town
 You go, my lad!

Ho, ho! my lad! (Maury Laws' "Down, Down to Goblin Town," 1977).

It's all rather... funky, isn't it? People love monsters because they speak to our alienation and fetishization (thus lack of agency) under capital, which is precisely where we get our agency back (re: the whore's revenge)!

Except, while calculated risk is a fun way to meet new playmates and regain control of darkness, Tolkien is a weird canonical nerd who canonized Milton's camp. In doing so, he and his narrow, prescriptive, monomyth methods of playing with darkness were pointedly slumming in service to empire²¹⁴; i.e., through jazzy LARPer refrains teasing the ghost of the counterfeit to further abjection by reinventing terrorism the state can punch down against/with: through prolific, Man-Box-style police violence, killing orcs and goblins to whitewash empire-in-decline/darkened by the Shadow of Pygmalion during the Cycle of Kings/Capitalism as demonic, animalistic and undead.

In truth, Rankin/Bass parroted much of this, and the kids of the '70s, '80s and beyond feared-loved it (walking the tightrope between inheritance anxiety and vaso vagal/fight-or-flight, but also dark demonic energies). Tolkien's bigotry goes over their heads, but in some sense, he inherited the same values; i.e., through goblins and necromancy as drug-like, but also bigotries associated with them to sell canonical vampirism and goblins to the next generation; e.g., their signature greed, but also tendency to kidnap, rape and devour their prey/drink said prey's blood. It's a dogwhistle call-to-arms, then, defending capital from its own victims with its own victims; i.e., the self-appointed white, "righteous" hero devouring the black alien per Tolkien's orcs-and-humans argument, its centrist refrain caging his prey behind an innocuous human mask (the sweet old man) that puts him and his on the side of Good and their victims—of nature-as-alien-vengeful-slave—on the side of Evil (which for the West/Global North is the East/Global South).

That's what his maps and moral territories are, you see—undead prisons to enter and kill the inmates, moderacy decaying into fascism (when Imperialism comes home to empire), but enacting it behind gobstopper masks; re: state DARVO and obscurantism concealing in plain sight the ugly truth: cops are the criminals outlawing others in demonic language. Doing so to enrich the elite and their rights over workers and nature, class (culture and race) traitors pimp both groups as monstrous-feminine! They're the bad servants, the backstabber charlatans sucking capital's dick (and biting on nature's neck) while flexing whatever credentials they can (e.g., Tolkien's academic pedigree)!

²¹⁴ With orcs and other servants of evil speaking a monolithic "Black Speech"; i.e., the homogenizing of colonial prospects to view them ethnocentrically as worlds to conquer by those weeding the globe of monstrous-feminine nature being likewise non-white, non-Christian, and stigma-animal, etc. Per Beowulf and Amazonomachia (monster battles, not just Amazons in particular), they become animalized during pro-state rites of passage; i.e., animals and gods speaking to patriarchal governance surviving presently under neoliberal nation-states and corporations; e.g., Zeus transforming into different animals to rape women, or Theseus vs the Minotaur, etc.

I'd say there's no way Tolkien can claim honest ignorance in good faith—not when he was a university professor who was an expert in his field—but doing so would overlook systemic issues in academia, as a whole; i.e., Tolkien was raised in a world that was built to coddle him and instill these pro-British, fuck-literally-everyone-else beliefs into him. Far easier to say is how a) there's nothing moderate about abjecting the sins of empire onto a gay space wizard/Great Destroyer and his abortive offshoots, nor b) monarchs or genocide existing in perpetuity (signatures of Tolkien's worlds extending his worldview inwards and outwards). Unlike the Neo-Gothic authors of several centuries previous, Tolkien actually believed a return to the pre-Renaissance past²¹⁵ would be a good thing. Like Hell it would!

To it, the usual fascist qualities apply to Tolkien's world; e.g., the cult of machismo and heroic cult of death, weak/strong enemies, among others (re: Eco). Inside said world, he's an indisputable god-pimp, punching down against nature as monstrous-feminine by policing it as vengeful property for the state. Being a medievalist, he pointedly does it through Divine Right; i.e., as a false preacher punching down with blood-libel, cops-and-victims vaudeville—literally medieval persecution arguments and superstitions (fear and dogma; e.g. the blood test from Carpenter's The Thing remake) about blood—doing so in order to aggrandize/avenge his faulty and harmful idea of a better world that, since his death, has become a neoliberal power fantasy weaponizing gullible people (through desperation and convenience) all around the world: of orcs and goblins born evil, and white men (and token cops; e.g., Eowyn) endlessly killing them in all manner of stories and games, all to spill so-called "bad" blood and replace it with "good" blood while policing labor pursuant to profit. It's barbarism in a dress—Macbeth tilting at Dunsinane but also Dracula in a priest's robes (and other such dualities canonizing Gothic).

So are Tolkien's orcs given dark skin, led by a dreaded faceless evil, conspicuously called "cannibals," bred through sodomy and shadows, living under the cloak of night, and slain zombie-style by white saviors trumpeting neo-feudalism on repeat: capital cannibalizing those it calls "cannibals" while acting high-and-mighty about it. For it, anything "black" is too dumb to serve, eventually attacking a prescribed "better master" and being put down for not knowing "its place" (which unfolds differently per oppressed type; e.g., black men versus trans women, and various intersections): dead vermin walking!

²¹⁵ Literally "of the King" and towards a kingdom that would last however many centuries Tolkien had in mind (the Nazis said a thousand years). Keeping with Beowulf, his Golden Age was still Christian, but before the Middle Ages; i.e., an Old-English hauntology laced with settler-colonial argumentation.

The point, here, is how the orc's and goblin's undead function of evil labor/service behaves identically to their demonic function (and whose anisotropic qualities we'll explore when examining Blxxd Bunny and SpongeBob). In turn, such stories are canonically ethnocentric garbage, apologizing for slavery by flaunting apocalypse; i.e., calling those most targeted by the state "the real slavers" during slave revolt having its dark, whorish, backstabber's revenge against the goodly colonizers. It's a white moderate's false flag selling personal responsibility through inkblot Red Scare long after Tolkien had actually died (take note of the various commonalities Tolkien has with mask-off fascism, Nazism or otherwise).

Compared to Cameron's clever repackaging of Heinlein in the shooter/sci-fi genre (and Metroidvania) after Vietnam, then, Tolkien's refrain led to a virtually endless echo of whitewashed fantasy stories after WWII serving the same Pax Americana function into the neoliberal (videogame) era. He became a safe bet, his best-selling and incredibly famous stories a perfect revival (and whitewash) of Manifest Destiny transplanted Elsewhere. No one else comes close, fantasy-wise.

Worse, Tolkien's systemic good/evil racism, inkblot (arbitrary) menace were granted the airy gentry of a WWI soldier-turned-scholar (a made man, as it were). In short, Tolkien's worlds apologized for racial conflict dressing up ethnocentric dogma as "mere games" (from tabletop to computer)—with the man, himself, becoming the dead-skin face mask for white supremacists to wear in the guise of good faith; e.g., Peter Thiel naming his economic ventures after Tolkien's stories²¹⁶. Whereas The Hobbit had plenty of Marxist potential (re: "Dragon Sickness," 2014), Tolkien's LotR was an opiate for the masses that simultaneously ushered in a return to monarchies²¹⁷, while also giving racism (and other bigotries) the perfect place to hide and wage war in broad daylight against Communism (which Tolkien very much despised in favor of Capitalism):

²¹⁶ "Given that The Lord of the Rings is one of the bestselling book series of all time, it shouldn't come as a surprise that it's inspired a lot of different groups and movements over the decades, with a wide range of politics. Probably the most influential is Silicon Valley, where the top of Salesforce Tower in San Francisco lights up with the Eye of Sauron on Halloween, executives reference its lore to get their vision across to employees, and companies name meeting rooms — if not their whole business — after objects and people from the books" (source: Paris Marx's "Peter Thiel's Influence over a Network of Lord of the Rings-Inspired Companies," 2024).

²¹⁷ "the American middle class (so called 'gamer culture') would gatekeep and safeguard the elite through videogames being an acclimating device to neo-feudal territories to defend in reality (outside of the game world[s] themselves) as capital starts to decay like usual" (source: Persephone van der Waard's "'Monsters, Magic and Myth': Modularity and Class," 2024).

In doing so, the whole planet became an endless property dispute lionizing Divine Right, mid-canceled-future (re: the zombie apocalypse and ensuing wasteland scenarios teasing liberation and enslavement, afterwards; e.g., not just Tolkien's orcs and goblins, but Fallout's ghouls to return to the earth as similar zombie fodder raped by Crusaders: cowboys, versus knights).

As such, Tolkien's bad-faith, vampire/sanguine sodomy arguments abject any flaws at home onto the black alien/Veil as a temptation to resist, but also indulge in through rape and purity/abstinence arguments; i.e., the civilized man eating the cannibal-coded savage, mid-panic, during mirror and virgin/whore syndrome. While all monsters are dualistic, canon pushes state violence and blame/ritual suicide(-by-cop) towards workers by doubling and demonizing them as evil sons of whores, but also outright demon whores (re: Grendel and Grendel's mother) tied to dark spectral forces; re: "a spectre is haunting Europe," which Tolkien spearheads/scapegoats, Radcliffe-style, with a great many of "the help" gone bad under a single monolith's all-consuming barbarian horde: orcs and goblins waving a planetary banner changing the ownership. Summon old nightmares (the vengeful dead slave as a zombie-vampire goblin); antagonize, put to work, banish nature through a pearl-clutching appeal to tradition, monomyth-style.

(source)

To that, Tolkien's the Necromancer (what he calls Sauron), a decrepit leech obsessed with greatness and bleeding (Middle-)Earth dry while using DARVO and obscurantism to demonize Jews and other labor groups treated as "Jewish" in medieval, blood-libel language (e.g., queer people during Satanic Panic). Such village scapegoats include orcs and goblins as monstrous-feminine servants of the vague, faceless Dark Lord (and backstabbers of the West), but also dwarves as greedier than humans and prone to greed of a Zionist²¹⁸ sort (also ²¹⁸ Tolkien relies on racialized tokenism to have "lesser" races police themselves, which is what Zionism ultimately is. You see this offstage, too, in Zionist propaganda (Bad Empanada's "The Appeal to Jewishness Fallacy," 2024), but such things are always half-real; re: between fiction and non-fiction, working in tandem. Case in point, Tolkien see dwarves as "Jewish" in the way his own home, the British empire, has essentialized "Jewishness" for centuries—which is to say, they're always victims, thus always to some degree aliens in ways the Crown can exploit. They cannot be heroes because to be a victim—to be weak and prone to betray—is literally "in their blood," their nature.

The dwarves of the Lonely Mountain, for example, feel constantly surrounded by enemies and betrayed. Abandoned by everyone, they work extra hard to alienate themselves, but also fight exceedingly hard (to the death, in fact) to redeem themselves in Christian eyes. This is Tolkien backstabbers, but to a lesser [thus more redeemable] degree; e.g., over pettier squabbles of moneylending and property disputes):

J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973) himself had some controversial opinions about at least one race of Middle Earth, writing that his Dwarves were "like Jews: at once native and alien in their habitations." In a separate interview, he pointedly Christianizing Viking ideas of the Valkyrie by attaching them to Jewish calumny/the wandering Jew trope: Thorin was weak, earlier in life when he failed to stop the dragon and it destroyed his permanent home, and weak later in life when men killed the dragon while he took all the gold for himself. He has all the markings of station and importance, but also cowardice and entitlement while being stranded from his home.

Eventually while the men of Dale are trying to rebuild, Bard is making a good case for sharing the gold (the Christian appeal to generosity monopolizing charity). It's here that Thorin not only rebukes him (the moneylender trope, echoes of Shakespeare's Shylock), but his cousins betray the men of Dale, first chance they get. Yes, the men of Dale were thinking about attacking first, but Tolkien routinely shows the Jewish-coded dwarves acting traitorous; i.e., to emphasize their backstabber nature, thus their inexorable connection with the goblins. To reject that connection, they must kill the goblins even more fiercely than the men or elves would, putting themselves in danger for those who view them as lesser to begin with. It's a return to good service from bad, a form of conversion therapy that kills the Jew by making him Christian through martyrdom (versus forced penance through ordinary conversion, in Shylock's case).

To it, Thorin is sicker/weaker from dragon sickness (rarefied cruelty and greed) than the men are. To prove his worth in their eyes, he must throw down the gate and die in battle a glorious death... by killing as many goblins as he can, then sacrificing himself and his bloodline in doing so! It's a suicide mission, one guided by revenge (which, I should add, the entire quest for the gold has been, but merely taken to its logical conclusion). He is simultaneously fallen and redeemed, but denied a home in this world despite the ultimate sacrifice. In short, he is always a victim, always an alien who is "too violent" to deserve a forever home. Instead, he's the hero for a second, but ultimately so Dale can re-establish a human foothold in the region and the dwarves return to buried irrelevance.

(artist: Justin Gerard)

Tokenism, then, is a terror weapon, and not one that Tolkien was above using (guilt-free, no less, because it appeals to the "natural" order of things, in his eyes). Tokens are always without a home, always exiled with one foot in both worlds and trying to reject Hell to find their "rightful" place by their good master's side (e.g., Samus Aran and the Galactic Federation). Tolkien relies on tokenism through centrist dogma, and whose worlds will overcorrect with massive violence to maintain the status quo—by victimizing its token groups!

For Tolkien, the dwarves are something to trot out and destroy as needed, generally by comparing them to goblins (through the same big noses, divided by beards, which orcs and goblins don't canonically have). This trend hasn't lessened over time, with future adaptations leaning into said tropes to make Thorin increasingly tragic through them; e.g., Peter Jackson's Thorin, played by Richard Armitage, humanized in appearance but arguing to Smaug (an imaginary enemy) about Dwarvish lands and gold. He's "the Good Jew," arguing for state's rights dressed up as liberation, the meta tyrant Tolkien dressing the slave up in the language of rebellion, mid-tyrant's-plea. It's like Shakespeare, making a Jew to "better the instruction" of Christian revenge, but abjected in Tolkien's case, onto a Jewish avenger upholding a Christian ordering to the world: a perversion of the Golem of Prague and Jewish necromancy!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

elaborated on this theme, noting that "the Dwarves of course are quite obviously—couldn't you say that in many ways they remind you of the Jews?" (source: Matthew Wills' "J. R. R. Tolkien's Jewish Dwarves," 2022).

It's the dialectic of the alien, hard at work for the state during the abjection process; i.e., Tolkien playing with blood libel to wage yet-another witch hunt chasing state rape and revenge called "goblin," fascism waiting to decay into itself (often in token forms; e.g., Gimli is a dwarvish cop) through a contemporary viewpoint: Lovecraft, on the other side of the pond, and his weird, pulpy notion of "horror in clay" (from "Call of Cthulhu," 1928); re: creating status-quo evils to represent the state's repressed colonialism/object juridical process (the state of exception) while its power center is rotting/falling apart. Such is Zombie-Vampire Capitalism, making whatever enemy the state needs out of darkness visible canonized.

Synchronistic of the bigoted American, then, the old Brit was a Nazi in spirit, if not in professed closeness to their core values. Simply put, he gave voice to such police dialogs, his own brand of courtly love a canonical monster-fucking approach killing countless orcs and goblins bourne from the ground; i.e., as endemic to his essentialized moral geography being canonically game-like. I can't really stress this enough, so here's me stressing it as much as I possibly can (from Volume Zero):

*To this, Tolkien's refrain [the High Fantasy treasure map, exhibit 1a1a1h2a1] has led to the endless essentializing of war as gentrified through the fantasy mode e.g., [Rings of Power, 2023] but also its science fiction and horror parallels [which we'll unpack during the "camp map" vis-à-vis Cameron's refrain: the shooter, of course, but specifically the Metroidvania]. Tolkien's magnetic, "chaste" warmongering leaves out the psychosexual horrors of war or valorizes them through the slaughter of abjected foes²¹⁹,*

²¹⁹ Consider Tolkien's zero-sex policy versus Terry Goodkind's naked exhibiting of pedophilia, genital mutilation and rape. They might seem like polar opposites, but both constitute Joseph Conrad's bigoted fear-fascination with the colonized abomination, in The Heart of Darkness (1899): a white, cis-het fear-fascination with the past as restricted to the fringes of the empire, that—in neoliberal media, which brings the colonial revenge to the homefront—becomes "a spell to fall under" (re: Punter) and exorcise, generally through violence. Tolkien's colonial rape occurred with swords, leveled against metaphors for people "not of the West" he considered "Mongol-types" (source: Tolkien Gateway) whose linguo-material presence would be entirely unwelcome in white areas (effectively gentrification in a real-world village/suburban setting).

Tolkien famously disliked allegory for his own stories (an appeal, then, to singular interpretations that ignored his writing's racist, thus colonial potential). But even when reduced to "pure fantasy" as he would have preferred, the terrestrial framework and its cartography and colonial model are all obviously there and being put into practice; i.e., world-building and its manmade languages levied for a suitably war-like purpose regardless if Tolkien openly denounced Hitler. In short, he was a centrist to the core, the old sage handing the young hobbit a blade and preaching loftily about morals, specifically of knowing when to kill and when not to—in short, "playing god" in the face of the object:

*requiring great effort from past writers like Ursula Le Guin to break away from Tolkien's ghost, thus his trees and pastoral village recruitment antics and moderately xenophobic [racist] war stories. As these are copied-and-pasted along the shared counterfeit, they operate like a formula whose canonical replication centers around the profit motive; in turn, this becomes historical-material—e.g., D&D and its endless official/homebrew campaigns and dungeons—but also the "warcraft"²²⁰ of the enterprising white, cis-het young men of an early '90s company, suitably titled Blizzard [whose sexist bullshit as a company we'll discuss much more in Volumes Two and Three]—built entirely around racial conflict [thus endless war and rape] as set into motion by Tolkien himself, whose own orcs are green-skinned, debatably anti-Semitic/cannibalistic savages whose name, "orc," is Old Norse [from Beowulf's *orcneās*²²¹] for "demon"; i.e., functional zombies in the state of exception that heroes invade to kill for the state through parallel legends weaving in and out of fiction and into real life: there and back again not once, but ad infinitum. If these "zombies" aren't orcs, then they're spiders²²² or some other stigma animal/vermin-type pest entity who must be crushed by the forces of good in personified forms; e.g., the Drow as "chaotic evil"*

Bilbo almost stopped breathing, and went stiff himself. He was desperate. He must get away, out of this horrible darkness, while he had any strength left. He must fight. He must stab the foul thing, put its eyes out, kill it. It meant to kill him. No, not a fair fight. He was invisible now. Gollum had no sword. Gollum had not actually threatened to kill him, or tried to yet. And he was miserable, alone, lost. A sudden understanding, a pity mixed with horror, welled up in Bilbo's heart: a glimpse of endless unmarked days without light or hope of betterment, hard stone, cold fish, sneaking and whispering. All these thoughts passed in a flash of a second. He trembled (source).

Except this mercy is arguably lacking in the face of those who are physically dangerous (according to white people); orcs, unlike Gollum, are given no quarter despite arguably having a bone to pick with their colonizers: "Show them no mercy for you shall receive none!" It's tone-policing backed by force—also known as "peace through strength."

²²⁰ Warcraft: Orcs and Humans (1994) would lead to the company's longest, and arguably most popular and widespread franchise, beating Diablo (1996) to the punch by two years and going on to establish the company as the successors to Everquest (1999) as the MMORPG to "kill": World of Warcraft (2004), a globalizing of the pursuit of capital across the Internet. These games successfully applied a tactical, melee-based, roleplay element to the FPS-/TPS-adjacent strategy game (exhibit 1a1a1h2a1), which took on a massive-multiplayer form built around warring team-based combat with one-or-more combatants on either side. And of course, all of this was heavily dimorphized within the heteronormative colonial binary.

²²¹ (from Britannica): "A different word orc, alluding to a demon or ogre, appears in Old English glosses of about AD 800 and in the compound word orcneās ('monsters') in the poem Beowulf. As with the Italian orco ('ogre') and the word ogre itself, it ultimately derives from the Latin Orcus, a god of the underworld. The Old English creatures were most likely the inspiration for the orcs that appear in J.R.R. Tolkien's The Lord of the Rings" (source).

²²² Tolkien's inconsistent fear of spiders stretches back to a childhood phobia of them, but he was annoyingly wishy-washy and non-committal to how he felt about them; i.e., talking through both sides of his mouth (a classic centrist maneuver) [source: Tolkien Gateway].

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

spider people [exhibit 41b] who threaten nature as afflicted with the same problematic idea of good vs evil as canonically Biblical [versus Milton's own accidental camping of these pastoral devices through Satanic war].

Simply put, Tolkien's hopelessly academic view of nature is whitewashed, High Fantasy copaganda—a British tree huggers' biased loving of the idealized pastoral/picturesque as threatened by outsiders ruining the scene: the map of empire as sacred. It's a colonizer's cartoonishly basic aesthetic that demonizes, thus alienates darkness but also death, decomposers and natural predators [stigma animals] as part of nature; i.e., as evil scapegoats tied to wicked, unnatural places, archaic wombs and dark magic—necromancers, but also their fortress lairs:

At first they had passed through hobbit-lands, a wide respectable country inhabited by decent folk, with good roads, an inn or two, and now and then a dwarf or a farmer ambling by on business. Then they came to lands where people spoke strangely, and sang songs Bilbo had never heard before. Now they had gone on far into the Lone-lands, where there were no people left, no inns, and the roads grew steadily worse. Not far ahead were dreary hills, rising higher and higher, dark with trees. On some of them were old castles with an evil look, as if they had been built by wicked people [emphasis: me]. Everything seemed gloomy, for the weather that day had taken a nasty turn [source].

These kinds of Gothic castles were clearly known to Tolkien, though he didn't focus on them. In The Hobbit, they're mentioned hardly at all [the word "castle" is used only once in the book]—sidestepped by Tolkien until it comes time to trot out Sauron [also known as the Necromancer] as the unironically Satanic threat to Tolkien's "new Eden": Britain by another name, as built by Tolkien's easily ludologized, High Fantasy scheme²²³.

²²³ Tolkien did not exist during videogames as they are commonly thought of (though technically he died in 1973, a year after Pong [1972] was released for American home entertainment by Atari's Allan Alcorn). Yet, Tolkien was also no stranger to playing games. Indeed, the entire "Riddles in the Dark" chapter from The Hobbit is pointedly a game, with a rather involved discussion surrounding luck, fairness and the following of rules:

He knew, of course, that the riddle-game was sacred and of immense antiquity, and even wicked creatures were afraid to cheat when they played at it. But he felt he could not trust this slimy thing to keep any promise at a pinch. Any excuse would do for him to slide out of it. And after all that last question had not been a genuine riddle according to the ancient laws (source).

In truth, Tolkien's refrain—the High Fantasy treasure map—would translate very well to tabletop games and videogames, but especially The Lord of the Rings, which despite its immense size compared to The Hobbit was actually far simpler in terms of its treatment of war and wealth

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

The displacement of British industrialization and slavery is made clear by examining the real-world inspiration for Mordor and Tolkien's own experiences elsewhere: "the industrial Black Country of the English Midlands, and by his time fighting in the trenches of the Western Front in the First World War" [source: Wikipedia]. Of the former Midlands, Jonathan Wilkins writes, "He based the description of Mordor, home to the evil Lord Sauron, on the Black Country, a region of Birmingham which was heavily polluted by iron foundries, coal mines and steel mills due to the Industrial Revolution. The air in it was so thick with smog and dust it was difficult to breathe and may contribute to the way local people speak today – the infamous Brummie accent" [source: "Birmingham Sites that Inspired Tolkien," 2020]. Tolkien's love for home pastoralizes the colonial element by abjecting its theatrical "soot" onto a fictional elsewhere. Places like the Shire and Lothlórien were always green and good and totally "never did a genocide" to get where they are; by comparison, the orcs threatening their naturalized goodness are the colonizers who did all of the bad things. It's DARVO through British exceptionalism (source: "On Twin Trees").

The game is canonization; re: Tolkien took Milton's Paradise and drained it of its critical bite. "Evil," in his hands, doesn't critique the state by destabilizing and subverting it, but merely serves to maintain the status quo in perpetuity!

No matter how he might otherwise pretend, then, Tolkien's work is wedded to the Middle Ages and allegory as canonical; the Dark Lord is Tolkien and the goblins his children precisely because he made dark war possible using them—i.e., in ways that long outlived Hitler's wildest dreams: sucking on the planet's blood, then blaming it on spiders, goblins and black knights! Oh, my!

(artist: John How Anger)

acquisition/generation. Everything was divided neatly into good and evil teams that—on the good side—weren't fighting amongst each other nearly as much as during The Hobbit. In his later novels, the world-war machine wasn't just suggested, but fully devised and given its own vast world to play out inside. And even with The Hobbit, Tolkien clearly understood the power of song and legends, writing his original story for children to acclimate them towards war and revenge dressed up in songs, fantasy and poems. It likewise had all the starts and stops of a radio serial, putting our heroes out of the frying pan and into the fire (similar to Flash Gordon, 1935) before pulling them out just in the nick of time (the Great Eagles being a shameless deus ex machina [and imperial emblem] that Tolkien would curiously refuse to use with The Lord of the Rings in order to prolong the story and its war for as long as possible).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Not to sell Hilter's propaganda short, but Tolkien's copaganda stabilized and gentrified war against evil tied to nature, thus the world and its workers falling on the wrong side of the tracks. Whereas we can present evil as human and delicious, mid-liminal-expression²²⁴, Tolkien only uses the goblin to police (thus rape) others with. It is not played with to confirm the veracity of something under suspicion, but ²²⁴ The human condition works like a golem, as such: to make from clay or stone (orcs and goblins are not made from stone, but live below it, underground. So whereas Tolkien's trolls turn to literal stone, in sunlight, the goblins merely dislike it); i.e., as a creative process we can map and play out, together—invigilating a shared vision that means different things to different people (from the Undead Module):

(exhibit 37e1: Model: Harmony Corrupted; artists: Lydia, Persephone van der Waard and Jim32.)

Rebellion is quite literally a craft, one that involves dolls—or likenesses of people, which dolls essentially are—in some shape or form; e.g., action figures/athletes, but also sex dolls [or things akin to either expressed through sex work]. Whatever the exact type, dolls are homunculi; i.e., generally a smaller instance of a larger reference. More to the point, they take work to realize: planning and drafts, a model, and one or more artists working together to accomplish a shared vision's theatrical production. The main idea is mine, in this case, but it's still accomplished through teamwork that contributes to the primary demonstration of said idea and goal; i.e., universal worker liberation through iconoclastic art using Gothic media; re: illustrating mutual consent through informed labor exchanges that challenge Capitalist Realism.

To that, Revana is very much my character by design [...]. She's someone I can have stand in for myself, given that I cannot afford gender-affirming surgeries. Even so, she has been drawn by many different artists over the years. In this case, my usual paper doll approach became something to instruct others with; e.g., my friend, Lydia, illustrating a Drow character I later completed on my own and borrowed its wardrobe to dress Revana, Macbeth-style, in borrowed robes [above]. This isn't someone forced to wear clothes made to objectify her against her will re: "[Borrowed Robes"; she's an extension of me, and Lydia helped with that. So did Jim32 and Harmony. All the world's a stage and we, upon it, had and continue to have a part to play [source: "Meeting Jadis; or, Playing with Dolls," 2024].)

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

to enforce state rule through weak/strong and black/white binaries, per Capitalist Realism!

Furthermore, Tolkien took this problematic upbringing and turned it into a warrior's place for bad BDSM, which sure enough, sits alongside healthier forms using the same aesthetic; re: (from Volume One):

In short, Tolkien relied on the vampire legend—but also Gothic castles, BDSM language and harmful arrangements of unequal power (rings and collars)—to dominate nature and those within it. Written in defense of a divided nature in good and evil animal forms, Tolkien's war stories view the vampire a kind of parasite praying upon the conspicuously vulnerable inside Cartesian dialogs; i.e., both in raw animal terms with Shelob the spider as part of "evil nature," but also magical leeches like Sauron, whose ghastly projections have become wholly divorced from "good nature" inside dark, undead fortresses that harvest all good, living things from the land (whitewashing Britain's analogs in the process). Anything else is functionally "dead" (sanctioned for state execution) by virtue of collective punishment. In doing so, Tolkien abjects death as a vital function of nature, but also fascism as a vital function of Capitalism in relation to nature as preyed upon by those behind his undead/animalistic scapegoats: the West. [...]

Tolkien wasn't just allergic to allegory and sex; he policed them greatly in service of empire. His evils are simplistic, unironically dated and vague, and he has a stubborn clumsiness when applying them to his worlds that suggests a very closed-minded way of thinking about his world and ours in BDSM terms. It's certainly no secret that Tolkien eventually decided to place the lion's share of the blame on people more so than material conditions or Capitalism and nation-states. He also makes the Ring and then melts it, trying to suggest that everything is somehow "solved"—that "Isildur's Bane" is somehow to blame for the waning strength of men in the face of rarefied greed; i.e., the dragon sickness of the gold from The Hobbit having been turned into a simple dissociative trinket that weighs on "all men" to the same degree. He seems to understand how rings function as poetic devices while paradoxically lending them a bit too much credence; vertical power is a tremendously corrupting force, but you don't have to essentialize it, nor reduce it to a shapeless male darkness that employs throwaway female demons and does away with overt BDSM language and, yes, ironic rape fantasies:

(artist: Owusyr Art)

BDSM isn't just where power is located/stored (e.g., inside the One Ring or Sauron's tower), but instructions for its use within assigned positions, including rape fantasies as a set of instructions given to the dom by the sub issuing various paradoxical commands: the civilized "princess" and the barbaric "invader" as roles to play with in animalistic ways (e.g., the "breeding"/captive fantasy) that expose and interrogate power as a device of negotiation towards better working conditions and healing from the deep traumas that emerge from settler-colonial violence and heteronormative enforcement. Material conditions play an important role in historical materialism, but power is largely about perception, which cannot simply be destroyed; it must change within society. The catharsis offered by iconoclastic roleplay grants appreciative irony amid Gothic counterculture as surviving under Capitalism. These forms of roleplay aren't just completely alien to Tolkien, but policed and denied through his own incessant prescription of orcish demon lovers (and Dark Lords); i.e. bad BDSM as a harmful arrangement of power that introduces praxial inertia into the equation. While power can't be destroyed as we just said, it can become unthinkable according to ways that challenge the usual runs of the mill. Tolkien and Radcliffe have that very much in common, making anything outside of their worldview as shapeless, dark and unthinkable: the incessant, utterly British fear of the outside felt within their own borders, castles, heroes, etc, as hopelessly forged and ever-present.

[...] Tolkien's origin myths were entirely unoriginal, exhibiting a very narrow, profoundly inadequate idea of what BDSM even was: officers and batmen; i.e., a British officer and his dutiful servant, exemplified by Tolkien's Samwise the Brave helping his fairly clueless master time and time again out of a bind. It is BDSM, but echoes the British castle of the Imperial Core as something to carry out into the battlefield while enduring Tolkien's (fairly vanilla) rape fantasies and childish dreams of captivity with which to (dis)empower the sub as male; e.g., Frodo being whipped and beaten in the orc slaver's tower (the torture dungeons in Mordor conspicuously full of the British tools of torture used by the colonized reimagined; i.e., during the myth of a dark, savage continent populated by evil, violent "children"). By displacing these tools off onto a dark "other" world beyond the land of plenty and light, Tolkien is scrubbing his own and blaming the colonized in the same breath). As a male benefactor of British colonialism, he fixates on faraway war as the exclusive site of power abuse exacted upon white men, ranking their abuse above everyone else (women, genderqueer people and ethnic minorities) and everywhere else (military urbanism). For him, these other things simply don't exist; abject copies of them do, but their sexuality is largely abandoned inside a chaste, gentlemanly medieval that forces them to address trauma as men were (and are) commonly taught: through lethal force with killing weapons designed purely for harm against state enemies (source: "Concerning Rings").

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

In turn, we Galatea reverse abjection through our own whorish, xenophilic scapegoat language and ironic rape fantasies (acting out Owusyr's script in our heads, but not to prey on others); i.e., shapeless darkness given shape (cocks or otherwise) and healing from rape by using clay-like things, monster-fucking theatre, and blood libel's black-magic poetics (with "black" marking slaves per the settler argument; e.g., genitals²²⁵, left): on our Aegis's danger disco, camping the same infernal concentric territories by occupying and subverting them, then awakening and mobilizing ourselves through the paradoxical reclamation of state-demonized forms taken knowingly into ourselves (above).

The path to universal liberation starts by building trust through social-sexual exchanges that most will prescribe to, in some shape or form. This means monster sex pointing to state alienation and worker liberation through the same pathways! You are what you eat, then, and in medieval language, eating and fucking is a fine line! So is normal/abnormal, per the abjection process and those straddling it; re: "black" = "alien" as something to reunite with workers when fucking the alien; i.e., as a matter of psychosexual ritual. Tolkien's stories are ritual, and only serve to whitewash genocide and prolong its historical materialism through bourgeois praxis; ours do not—seeking to overcome systemic, generational harm by shrinking any desire to divide and colonize nature (synthesized by those who have differing degrees of privilege and oppression; e.g., white women and black men understanding each other's rape, not ranking it; i.e., both experience pain that is, to some degree, alien to the other side, and found through a special-and-constant middle ground: imagination).

I want to unpack some of these ideas, next; i.e., encroaching upon uncomfortable territories that Tolkien could only penetrate and purge, with Pagan cremation, and which we divinate through acid Communism (towards the end of the section). Then we'll consider doing it ourselves, minus the bigotry and genocide!

²²⁵ With "normal" white genitals being monstrous/different than the rest of the body they attach to; i.e., normal dicks being darker than the rest of the body and vaginas having multiple mouths like the xenomorph (the labia major and minor). They also flush with color during sexual desire (from filling with blood, be the genitals male, female or intersex).

Trouble in Paradise: Fantasizing about Black Monster Dick (feat. acid Communism)

Black dick is forbidden. Iconoclastic monster-fucking doubles state dogma through forbidden love as a postcolonial device reclaiming terror language; i.e., black dicks (and other genitals, bodies) attached to various taboos; e.g., rape, cannibalism, and "sodomy" normally synonymized with us, and which we camp through sex—especially monstrous, interracial sex during blood libel and other persecutory language—as the most regulated device there is (often through a neo-medieval proximity with penetration, medieval acumen²²⁶ and interracial threats of "torture" [through terror language subverted with porn, but also censored bodily functions like salivation, consumption and digestion, flatulence, menstruation, defecation, regurgitation or male/female ejaculation²²⁷, sexual responses, crying and memento mori gore dissecting the human condition through closely monitored, physiological responses bearing a strong social element, mid-abjection).

Our focus is white-on-black sex, including white bodies fantasizing about black dick but also ourselves designated as "black" regardless of appearance (which expands to green, purple, or any non-white, thus non-human color of stigma; ergo, "black dick" = "green dick"). This includes Tolkien, black monster dick living rent-free in his forever-schoolboy brain. Indeed, Tolkien loves the black dick, needs it for his world to function through his weapons; i.e., so black and big and/or naughty it's illegal, and policed by state forms; re: Beater and Biter for fucking goblins, which they subvert, David-Bowie-style! We stewards of nature fight for nature as normally raped by Tolkien—people, but also their pets, the environment, everything. Do it, if not for us, then for kitty! All life is precious, both we human goblins and our non-human counterparts; e.g., my cat, the laundry gremlin:

But if you do it for you, remember that rebellion and struggle, however grave, should be fun because there is no afterlife, only this one; i.e., fucking not just to metal, but any fun music when walking away from Omelas while inside it/the infernal concentric pattern; e.g., Shin Hae Chul's "To You" (1991): "We're doing it, babe! We're doing Communism!" Cue the gay rainbows, cheesy music, and multicolor creampies (the joy of cryptomimesis)! The brave do live forever!

²²⁶ Fixated since Antiquity on sex/food and relative bodily functions, war-making and religion/funerary rites; but also classically-male contests of peeing or spitting the farthest—belching or farting the loudest, eating or shitting(?) the most, fucking the longest, etc—during battles of the sexes/the topos of the power of women extending into GNC spheres.

²²⁷ And the stigmatized, four-letter versions of such words, predating the popularizing of their longer French equivalents, post-Black-Death, and surviving into the present; e.g., chew, fuck, spit, shit, puke, etc. Monsters operate through a similar shorthand, but also critical lens of coded behaviors.

(artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

Black rainbows, darkness visible—rebellion relies on emotional appeals and propaganda to work! Furthermore, never trust a philistine
because liberation needs paradox; survival is victory and that victory starts with making life something to live for/celebrate in the moment, mid-incarceration (the fag always starts in the closet, even if that closet is society caging someone who's out)!

So while capital routinely puts a price on the things it steals from, there's value in all forms of labor in ways they can't monopolize; i.e., regarding counterterror reclaimed from state fanaticism/double agents through our own curious deceptions. Spectres of Marx, our disco-in-disguise/postpunk often hides in plain sight. Any exchange gives and takes, the usual monopolies threatened by their own daily operations' cryptonymy mingling with ours, each going hard to upend the other's attempts. The point isn't "final victory" in our lifetimes (which Tolkien pushed for), but freedom through said expression; re: the freeness of our minds²²⁸ guiding our actions, however seemingly futile they are, towards a better

²²⁸ Gothic Communism occurs through holistic study regarding a system designed to conceal itself, mid-exchange. The dialectic is as much of shelter as the alien, the prison a game of theft and disguise, of choice shrouded in illusion (the illusion of choice enacted under deeply unnatural conditions) and shadowed by force; i.e., the holocaust/death lottery/prisoner's dilemma only ends when all prisoners see each other as human; re: by taking the red pill to break Capitalist Realism, not Communism.

Workers, then, always have the power to riot/strike, leveraging capital using the very things the owner class tries to cage and abuse labor with while acting like its friends; i.e., with bald-faced lies as much as not; e.g., the Nazis and the Warsaw ghetto, but also American liberalism in all its forms; re: Tolkien's anti-Semitic heroism. Capital is a settler colony disguised as a game, then—one using disguise to defend the state vs workers and the planet, versus workers defending ourselves, guerrilla-style, in its crosshairs (for more on this exact topic, see: "The World Is a Vampire").

Suppression happens by thinking we can play along to survive what is otherwise "forgone" (according to state arbiters). By having slave revolts chattelize, pacify or otherwise divide and conquer their own (fascism is false rebellion), voting is the illusion of choice (and can be manipulated by scarcity and force); to survive and liberate ourselves, we must fight back, making the cost too dear to continue. To do this, we require informed and intersectionally solidarized action, moving power actively towards workers during labor exchange. Anyone who stymies that is a traitor colonizing the viewing of things; i.e., those things treated like goblins as Tolkien does, emasculating the "black" side of nature (cocks or otherwise) to stall praxial catharsis through Beowulf-grade inertia!

Sex is expected by capital, but demonized as a common labor form (of terror) that exchanges between functionally white and black workers. By dancing with the ghost of the counterfeit and—just as often, embodying it through demonic self-expression becoming an informed, educated choice versus a desperate last stand—we make ourselves less afraid and more informed, hence prone to making friends with the other demonized groups' Venn Diagram of persecution networks; i.e., onstage and off, goblins befriending elves to punch up, and real-life consumers identifying with that principle of disparate unity in ways Tolkien always avoided! He's a monarchist who hates rabble-rousers. For him, then, the only good orc is a dead orc (re: Rearick)—the always-scapegoat in the same-old Omelas refrain; i.e., they "can't" be sexy and must always be killed (or replaced with something else that serves the same role; e.g., the Drow).

(artist: Danny-Green)

Nothing scares the elite more than intersectional solidarity, which Tolkien's ilk behind the curtain try to monopolize through Platonic, shadowy echoes of Beowulf and Pygmalion-grade tokenization; i.e., triangulating token fears through rape, homefront, doing so with fascism and the democratic process weaponized against class-, culture- and race-conscious parties (re: Westside Tyler blaming* non-voters, below).

(screenshot source: the YouTube comments for Westside Tyler's "Supporting Movements Like Uncommitted WILL FAIL EVERY TIME," 2024)

*I critique his arguments, in a response video (Persephone van der Waard's "@westsidetyler Is a White Moderate \(a Nazi Apologist\)," 2024). Few things are as cowardly as a white cis-het man, who at the first sign of trouble, falls back on privilege to punch down against the oppressed—just like Tolkien! Their hearts are hardened, and they resign themselves to capital-as-is.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

engendering monomyth assimilation/divide-and-conquer copaganda pitting the middle class against the underclass and its armies of state-described "chaotic evil"; re: on the Black Veil, a dark leader and their fantastic generals (e.g., He-Man or Myth: the Fallen Lords) commanding the orcs and goblins that make up a garden-variety horde (versus the undead, chaos demons, or some other evil race). Kill an orc or a witch, get Rosie Cotton for a tradwife (the conservative promise of sex); kill a general whore, get a castle and a princess to defend from future black-dick revenge (the prince also tempted with black pussy on the same Aegis):

(artist: Ted Nasmit)

Handing out rewards is the pimp's job, which Tolkien does through obligation, not enjoyment (e.g., Arwen but also Eowyn, left). "Paradise" equals standard-issue fascism-defending-capital; upselling labor's various "power targets," Tolkien's bad "demon BDSM" happens during orcs-and-goblins blood libel sexualizing state revenge in all the usual Neo-Gothic forms of abject courtly love: storming castles-in-the-flesh, sans irony during the usual mise-en-abyme's Ozymandian inspiration (the Promethean visitation of power). Faramir doesn't get the blonde baddie without facing down an army of orcs (and she doesn't get him without dueling the witch-king of Angmar). Prostitution is prostitution, which marriage legalizes through state force exercised against state enemies—Tolkien's vampirism at work, feeding on orcs and goblins to enrich Whitey.

Context obviously matters, here, and there's nothing intrinsically wrong with playing god, invoking Numinous "inkblots," or regressing to kayfabe-style, bread-and-circus hauntologies whose medieval language and emotional turmoil express various forms of inequality and trauma through poetic (make-believe) hyphenations of sex and force (e.g., sensations of rape or divisions of power/dueling emotions, mid-psychomachy). Per Sarkeesian, I can even enjoy Tolkien's worlds, while refusing to endorse their bigoted elements. Indeed, as a medievalist, myself, my dialectical-material scrutiny rescues the Gothic from Tolkien's abject views (and tokenized fans), the latter reifying and policing the alien through fatal nostalgia/false claims of sovereignty. This includes orcs and goblins of my own design (more on that in a bit, exhibit 44a1b1a), but also recognizing through dialectical-material scrutiny those made by other workers, too (next page). Orcs and goblins are sexy as a matter of dialectical-material context; i.e., because genuine rebellion and subversive monsters are sexy! They were only ugly in Tolkien's world because his worldviews demanded they be! "Who's the savage, modern man!"

(art: Amber Harris)

Tolkien's media is already colonized, and ACAB/ASAB. For Tolkien and those like him valorizing cops and the state, there's always an in-group and an out-group to the calculated risk, thus a cop and a victim, a defender and an alien invader endemic to home needing its routine whitewash/genocide; i.e., a correct party and an incorrect party pursuant to the usual state mechanisms tokenizing Judas sell-outs. Funny how the incorrect side is literally most of the planet, highlighting capital raping the world by design. They act like they own it, monopolizing and raping it accordingly by unironically fucking monsters—all to decide who loves and who dies inside an inherently unequal and cruel system, one favoring white straight Christian men, who enjoy rules meant to favor them and punish others (through various double standards and preferential mistreatment).

Tolkien privatized nature by pimping orcs and goblins. To privatize nature, then, is to rape it as cheaply as possible; that's all the state does, and its servants enforce that dominance through intolerance with impunity dressed up as liberal democracy and freedom. It's a rigged game, the illusion of choice; cops don't prevent rape, but legitimize it against those the system codes as bad, goblins or otherwise—i.e. in a hierarchy of values linked to physical attributes/accident of birth upholding the status quo; re: in accordance with the state's monopolies/trifectas and the qualities of capital, whose "sickness" of greed Tolkien abjects onto dragons, but also goblins and dwarves as ultimately "more greedy" than good men, hence more deserving to die by the latter's grimy hands. Rape does not preclude death; it engenders it, disempowering state victims to harm them for profit.

Such is Capitalism, which Tolkien's stories illustrate in small: "Kill the pig! Spill its blood!" In the centrist refrain, there are no moral actions, only moral teams; capital, Tolkien demonstrates, assigns portions of the world to die, en masse—piled and burned in Viking-esque romances, yet also used by the West as a weapon of terror and means of disposing the useless, dishonorable dead²²⁹ (as the Nazis did, in their death camps): burn them before they defile good nature with their black dicks.

²²⁹ "Cremation is reserved for baddies," Knitting&Death describes. "The Riders of Rohan bury their own dead with honour, but burn orcs as they would dead animals." Knitting also acknowledges Tolkien's double standard, going on to add,

prevent the spread of disease, cremation was considered a rejection of the possibility of resurrection. Nowadays, although cremation is permitted, scattering ashes is forbidden; the Vatican reasons that "reservation of the ashes of the departed in a sacred place [such as a cemetery or church] ensures that they are not excluded from prayers and remembrance." That the Riders of Rohan not only burn dead orcs but also scatter their ashes ensures that they will not rise again and that they will also be forgotten the latter providing particular contrast to the mounds where dead Riders are inhumed and that are meant to last forever (source: "What Happened to the War Dead of Middle Earth?" 2022).

Gaslight, gatekeep, girlboss; the mass graves and cremation are a hate crime against those Tolkien coded as racially and religiously inferior to his own warrior supermen (the cowboys of an imaginary frontier). Orcs and goblins aren't just waste, then, but literal fuel for the British war machine (whitewashing its own fascism and ethnocentrism/canonical essentialism through intensely regressive hauntological war games). It's genocide, glorifying bigotry to serve Imperialism (and hopelessly in love with a once-great Britain afraid, all the same, of endless black cocks).

Gothic without the Middle Ages, Tolkien Christianized Pagan cultures (which the Vikings were) and married them to Germanized Untermensch-vs-Übermensch monomyth shenanigans; i.e., the Rohirrim superior to the Gondordians, but both superior to the "lesser" races. "We will burn like the kings of old." It becomes his little paradise to protect from outsiders by his surviving fans, but in ways no way, shape or form divorced from the real world; i.e., through overt themes of ethnic cleansing that cover up allegory through monomythic violence and crusader-grade monster sex: sodomy by flame, desecrating the orc and goblin as animal, but also living dead (to fertilize poppies).

Rape is rape, genocide is genocide, and Tolkien goes all out (name me something more fetishized than his stupid swords). He's a coward, because fascism fears the entire world; i.e., as already haunted by past crimes of empire—and like Hitler and the Reich—uses moral panic of so-called Black Revenge to power his own arguments of expansion and home defense. Through preemptive first strikes committed by an entire hero culture, worldview and language family bastardized by the colonizer against the oppressed, Tolkien wants you to feel like rebels while fighting for old, brutal systems that refuse to change—the might-makes-right return of a pre-ordained, kingdom-style rulership that always decays into "dark" (fascist) versions of itself. Except there's no Ring (tyrant hot potato) to destroy! Only patrilineal descent remains, the war criminal hiding behind cartoon dictators and Divine Right—forever doomed and in love with itself—punching death as the world spirals towards state shift. It's a sham, a simulation of war playing out for efficient profit.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
 Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

In his darkest dreams, then, Tolkien is the open rapist he projects so nakedly onto others—the banal spectre of Christopher Columbus or Cromwell conducting genocide inside the Imperial Core and on its frontiers/satellites. Sublimating unironic monster sex—namely that of nature-as-whore through monomythic language—black rape and racialized territorial conflict are endemic to Tolkien's worlds, armies and offshoots (re: D&D and pretty much every RPG in existence), making them excellent models for capital and its ideologies literally "at play": a white-moderate, "woe is me" genocide fantasy—one populated with bastardized lore and languages (literal palingenesis, another fascist trick)—and based on slumming and tokenism, the world is always something to farm, thus harm²³⁰.

This is what I meant when I said Tolkien gentrified war. For him, nature is a virgin/whore to divide along the same cartographic lines; i.e., abusing the usual terror language/medieval courtship of slaying dragons (and/or orcs and goblins); i.e., in psychosexual language to sodomize the Earth and pin said crimes onto others (re: "good" nature corrupted by "bad" nature). For him—and I really can't stress this enough—the only good goblin whore is a dead goblin whore. In turn, his medieval shorthand outlines capital-as-hyperobject; i.e., the planet as "giant white ass" for Tolkien's good guys to save from "giant black dick," but also—per the usual hypocrisies love-hating anything monstrous-feminine regardless of gender or sex, race or religion—Tolkien threatens with grim harvest; re: monster-fucking as a doomsday scenario to gaslight, gatekeep girlboss workers like Eowyn until they "sign up" (a neo-conservative precursor to Ellen Ripley and similar Amazons, out of Ancient Athens and into the present):

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Except Hell—along with the demonic, monster-fucking opera of sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, and of monstrous-feminine heavy-metal poetry (thus rape and revenge fantasies during ludo-Gothic BDSM and its palliative-Numinous paradoxes)—is our domain to patrol, which the state can only try their damndest to monopolize, commodify and colonize. Often, this happens by pitting different marginalized "outsider" groups against themselves; re: tokenization; e.g., white women versus orcs, but also goblins versus dwarves (comparable to Arabs vs Jews). In turn, divide and conquer includes the medieval idiocy of marshaling armies to fight for kings to begin with. That's what Tolkien's refrain entails, its tokenism a trademark strategy the Allies (and Western powers after the war) use to rape the Global South to this day!

²³⁰ E.g., My twin brother "quad-kiting" of the four dwarven guards outside Kaladim on EQ's (1999) Sullon Zek PvP server. For context, the game wasn't built for PvP, and the evil side—in keeping with Tolkien's moral territories—had all the continents with "phat loot." My brother played a druid, which were "OP" because they could "kite" red mobs (anything ten levels higher than you) with speed buffs and "DoTs" (damage-over-time), but also teleport; i.e., letting him corner the market farming Karg Icebear's cloaks (emergent value through unintended play of an aging game), then sell them to evil-aligned players on the in-game black market (who never killed him because he was their inside man).

"Dwarves Are Not Heroes," writes Rebecca Brackmann in 2010²³¹; they're Jewish stereotypes that, in hauntological forms, apply to any foe the state could hope or want to tokenize/rape. The same goes for orcs and goblins. Liberation and exploitation exist on the same stages, wherein we kill our darlings to escape the disastrous ways of thinking Tolkien canonized; i.e., his refrain orbiting around wealth acquisition through monomythic conquest, requiring anti-Semitic tropes (of theft and bad service, but also black rape) to work; re: as scapegoats of capital, these unworthy dwarf lords instigating larger conflicts by stealing the dragon's gold out of revenge. Our responses occupy the same pornographic visual ambiguities, which ludo-Gothic BDSM and monster-fucking parse through dialectical-material scrutiny when playing with/as goblins (or any race you could possibly want)!

As my older books have already explored (re: block quotes), Tolkien's BDSM is a ludic power fantasy used at other people's expense, and generally in service to state bodies per Goldilocks Imperialism (re: "settler colonialism with more steps"²³²). Our ludo-Gothic power fantasies (which again, BDSM largely is) must camp those; i.e., taking the diminutive, abject yet sexually descriptive (shortstack) goblins and other demons of the underground back from old dorks like Tolkien canonizing BDSM. His bad data instructs harmful activities through police dogma; i.e., a fatal nostalgia fetishizing greed attached to racialized bugbears categorized, once again, as bad servants with black rapacious intentions (these "backstabbing Jews" only loyal to wicked masters/dark lords, stabbing their good masters in the back [often over money] or raping them from any direction). It's a fantasy about black dicks being used to cuckold state power—making the powerful (and their servants, the middle class) only tighten their hold on said cocks! For Tolkien—and indeed the entire Western world—"backstabbing" equals "rape" as something to spread through rumor and canard (whose anti-Semitism became less about Jews, over time, and more about multi-ethnic racism and queerness); re: through the state's white revenge against black dick (and other genitals, not shown here).

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

By comparison, the whore's revenge is to fuck whoever she wants, subverting those lies and, by extension, the entire bête noire (re: nature as gyn/ecological and monstrous-feminine, including black men). In doing so, she evokes a common fear of capital (white women fucking black men) that—while it historically evokes parental reactionary violence (re: the Wilmington massacre)—can counteract systemic intolerance/extortion while stymieing profit behind revolutionary cryptonymy's usual buffers (and going beyond white cis women, to be clear). It's still a rape fantasy thanks to dialectical-material offers, but one being consciously subverted by the actors involved; i.e., canonical interracial exchanges (which Tolkien's orcs and goblins present as an unironic nightmare scenario) versus iconoclastic interracial porn. The latter isn't merely forbidden, by Tolkien; it's anathema—literally beyond his willingness to imagine! He was incapable of fucking at all, in his stories, let alone monster-fuck (which extended to non-sexual scenarios²³³, below)!

²³¹ "'Dwarves Are Not Heroes': Antisemitism and the Dwarves in J.R.R. Tolkien's Writing."

²³² I.e., the state lionizing itself through "valor animals" attacking and eating but also exterminating stigma animals: those which the goblin attaches to, namely the rat and other vermin, the state treating itself (and its proponents) as "superior" to nature's essentialized backstabbers.

(artist: Amber Harris)

Interracial sex is seditious outside state control, and even then it's still a controlled substance; i.e., one chattelizing nature not just as alien whores, but vermin to exterminate on a ladder of preferential mistreatment. Whatever dalliances that occur through us pointedly offend intolerance, including the ladder of privilege and deserving-to-undeserving violence capital assigns its victims (a task that Tolkien excels at). On its rungs, even the lowliest imp serves a purpose: to be raped with irony or without. Rebellion is when the trash fucks back; our non-white elements and fantasies (about black dick and other traditional forms of rape borrowed from canonical language) rail against capital's rigged, dare-I-say Faustian, bargains with Tolkien! We recode his rules to spite him, changing the outcomes when playing with such toys; i.e., by preventing holocaust and reversing abjection/the colonial binary's terrorist/counterterrorist flow of power!

Our combinations corrupt the data to cryptonymically expand the mind, our "goblins" love for gold (and big black dick/pussy—Medusa having either or both, above) a universal theatre device; i.e., whose camp diverts not just Tolkien's unironic rape scenarios, but also the kinds of unchecked mammon known to the First and Second Gilded Ages (the same idea goes for orcs and hand-to-hand combat, but also their naturalized sexual aggression). By regressing to a half-real imaginary space-time where such things were formerly allowed—and once-entered again through goblin-type forays beyond Tolkien—we can "swashbuckle" not just with terror and violence during the cryptonymy process, but things controlled through violence; e.g., money and drug use (or drug-like things, which monsters are), which workers safely play with during monster-fucking: to interrogate state arrangements and negotiate towards worker-friendly versions/mutual exchange!

²³³ Which often leads to sex, to be fair. Except Tolkien's stories end after the war is won and the warriors wed. He couldn't be arsed to write about the sex that happens, save as neo-colonial revenge against black nature; i.e., while being manly with other men (a very ancient, homosexual approach to queerness—one that hyphenates sex with harmful violence).

For every theatrical double, there is always an earthly equivalent being treated the same; if we can subvert that at the root of the problem—changing how one side views and treats the other per exchange—we can synthesize good praxis on a wider scale; i.e., as a countercultural movement that celebrates white-on-black love over space and time (of any configuration you could imagine, not just cis-het white girls and black men; e.g., goblins and orcs among themselves, demons and maidens crossing the isle/red line, and so on). Thanks to actual or imagined abuse during criminogenic conditions, many white women are afraid of black men/non-white people (and other minorities treated as "non-white," per the settler argument); and vice versa, those groups fear white women for having power over them.

That's the whole point of monster-fucking and ironic fetishization—to camp canon by facing these fears and exposing their ridiculous, alienating qualities alongside uneven socio-material conditions that need to change. The dick shouldn't scare us; the state's ability to divide us using it should! "Let Jesus, fuck you!"

(artist: Just Some Noob)

So long as we fear ourselves, the state can divide and destroy us any way it likes. And while opposites often attract, revolution always happens in opposition to state proponents; it likewise needs solidarity—however chimeric—or state power will sever rebellious factions from themselves while fostering non-rebellious ones, then pimp nature as monstrous-feminine whore (afraid of giant black cock during the whore's paradox; e.g., the nun trapped between salvation and sin, above) all over again!

(artist: NGArt7)

To combat or enable rape, the Gothic works through blood libel, but also cannibalism, adultery and suicide (all cardinal sins); i.e., as equally taboo fears, during the abjection process; e.g., gut reactions, impulsiveness, affairs of the heart, burning passions and chilling fears, etc. The iconoclastic idea is to excite these to control and understand them through playing at dogma to reverse abjection; i.e., camping the canon, thereby emulating persecution to liberate ourselves from fear (through our bodies) as a state weapon. Instead, it can become ours, going where power is to subvert bigoted stereotypes with; i.e., at any point in which relationships unfold (with black women being treated as more sexually aggressive and experienced/seductive than white women²³⁴ but also fetishized differently than them, for example—a quality that extends not just to orcs and goblins, but exotic queens of an imaginary past, above):

(artist: Just Some Noob)

So while exploitation and liberation exist in the same space, the process of abjection (us-versus-them) must be occupied by workers who consciously subvert its materials to reverse harmful boundaries; i.e., generally in alien nostalgic language regarding sex and force. The idea is to cross state boundaries to go into alien spheres, then rehumanize demonized peoples with demonic language ²³⁴ While these qualities are heavily mythologized, there remains a kernel of truth to them; i.e., white women are infantilized by their husbands, and black women forced into single motherhood. Both sides experience criminogenic conditions, but those conditions remain idiosyncratic and unequal on purpose (to better divide and demonize labor with).

(dicks or otherwise). Such synthesis remains uneven, of course, and concerns relative privilege and oppression, mid-courtship.

All the same, Gothic Communism hugs Medusa through fantasy to find similarity amid difference, among the winding threads; i.e., in ways that push towards universal liberation inside capital. Medusa is classically "rape-proof," then, teaching others not to harm her (thus themselves) through psychosexual martyrdom facing state condemnation colonizing its own populations with its own populations. We must fuck back, using state terror weapons during liminal expression as, often enough, pornographic (e.g., sodomy and interracial sex, below):

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Such resistance is always violent, to some extent; i.e., like goblins and their own mini-demon counterterror shenanigans, capital cannot be defeated by exclusively conventional means, but through gradual transition away from itself and towards a post-scarcity world; re: using violence during mirror syndrome, our cryptonymy matching Tolkien's, measure for measure. Gothic Communism is holistic, in that respect, but prides itself in subverting the state's usual monomythic propaganda (re: Beowulf and the masculine lethal force enjoyed by Tolkien's mostly-male, non-teenage heroes cutting orcs and goblins, but also hags, whores and evil women, to bits through their version of courtly love); i.e., from any direction, front or back (above), turned anisotropically on its head—monsters but also coveted resources, like sex and drugs. Again, the Gothic values violating pre-conceived boundaries (that further abjection) to generate new ones in similar stories, often centered around monster fucking as "violent." This includes camping stories like Tolkien's, giving us tremendous latitude.

Under capital and its qualities, "black" is always abject—is something to view and treat differently than "white"; Tolkien's stories—of world war and token-yet-racial police violence—imply a black planet raped away from white purity by vengeful dark forces. By equating holistic slave liberation (re: Jews and whores, white women and black men) with total destruction of the Capitalocene (state shift), it has an almost drug-like berserker rage to it (of blind faith, if not drugs, given Tolkien's Christianizing of the Viking lifestyle): be a man and kill the orc, or the orc will kill you and your whole family before burning your home to the ground!

Among these rape-fantasy qualities, then, there's a drugged element to explore when camping Tolkien.

United we stand, divided we fall; assimilation is poor stewardship of the natural world (which many Indigenous groups did, out of desperation). In turn, praxial synthesis happens through the intersectional solidarity of class, culture and race avoiding normativity and assimilation; e.g., Afronormativity, Hoteps and separatism; i.e., by working not just with what we know, but what we imagine tied to what we've lost and try to regain through the rememory process as—sure enough—tied to drug therapy, sex, and artwork often going hand-in-hand:

(artist: NGArt7)

This brings us to acid Communism. The iconoclastic idea of the orc or the goblin speaks to Fisher's acid Communism, used by me and my friends, but also all peoples to work through demon poetics comparable to the orc or the goblin—i.e., to liberate ourselves through iconoclastic art tied to nature-as-monstrous-feminine, monster-fucking a drug-like activity that broadens our capacity for empathy inside uneven persecution networks; e.g., stoner white girls taking big black dick (slaves of different kinds unifying against capital; re: Zinn) while under the influence to promote universal tolerance, acceptance and emancipation from state myopias:

Acid communism is about ways of imagining a world after capitalist realism, and for Fisher, one of the ways to escape this reality is psychoactive drugs. The programme of acid communism is not to condone psychoactive drug use, but as an example this activity captures the philosophy of acid communism excellently.

To imagine new futures, we have to find ways to break out of our present myopia. Fisher's acid communism is unique primarily for placing this goal above all others. [...] The future has been cancelled because we are unable to imagine anything other than the present. To invent the future, to escape our myopia, we have to go beyond the present bounds of our imagination. This is acid communism (source: Stuart Mill's "What Is Acid Communism?" 2019).

This freedom to express with forbidden materials contributes to the whore's revenge, such monster-fucking as Harmony's tearing down state boundaries during ludo-Gothic BDSM; i.e., to form healthier ones for workers than Tolkien dared, much how tanking profit more broadly does except through our actions witnessed by others: the "witch's brew" cum macro-dosing inside Harmony's cauldron-like pussy and stirred by a dark "spoon" (a big "fuck you" not just to Tolkien, but Francis Bacon)! It's not sexy because it's abject, but because it showcases mutual consent with fear while subverting state forms of paradise-in-peril (the damsel-in-distress). Mutual consent is sexy as something to illustrate, during various labor exchanges—especially when accepted by one side squeezing the other (regardless of color²³⁵ or size) into their tight little openings: something to watch (voyeurism) and show off (exhibitionism)!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

Camp is when we refuse to kill each other and choose to make love, instead. So don't fear black dick, like Tolkien does, and fetish unironic harm and death (which just so happens to be another fascist feather in his cap²³⁶); be bold, like Harmony and I (who loves big dick)! Dive into Hell, doing so to transform into more-human, less-alien but still-fetishized subjects of power taking said power back while fucking monsters you treat as human; i.e., demonstrating empathy through white-on-black sex, but also through morphological statements that translate through sight, period; e.g., desire, insofar as Harmony spreads her legs to accept as much of the black monster dildo into her naughty white pussy (above). Such is her revenge, delighting such revelry in the face of those who might try to rob Harmony of any bodily autonomy because they "know better" than she does. As if! We decide, not SWERFs, and certainly not old imperial dinosaurs like Tolkien fetishizing our deaths and calling it "holy" (fetishizing objects of power as he does; e.g., swords, crowns and rings)!

We'll unpack this even more, next.

²³⁵ Racial considerations aside, black-on-white makes for a nice visual contrast.

²³⁶ Re, Sontag's "Fascinating Fascism" (1974): a "master scenario" whose purely sexual experience is "severed from personhood, from relationships, from love," but also the fascist language of death: "The color is black [and red], the material is leather, the seduction is beauty, the justification is honesty, the aim is ecstasy, the fantasy is death" (source).

Doing It, Ourselves: Humanizing Orcs and Goblins through Ironic Monster Sex

(artist: Just Some Noob)

Tolkien's worst fear is white-on-black sex, whose policing canonizes unironic crusades/fetish charm offensive against nature as "black, corrupt" (the white man's side-piece/side quest somewhere between the rules and fiction, above). This blood

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

libel targets orcs and goblins (whose green skin is functionally "black," per settler arguments), but also the white women they threaten with dark desire; i.e., in half-real exchanges that point to real-life versions intimidated by imaginary ones, quotidian or Romantic; re, my prior exploration of rape during pornographic expression, in Volume One:

Just as liminality is expressed through conflict within thresholds and on the surface of things, pornography is generally controlled and fought over by those who wish to compel profit through binary sexuality versus those who want to liberate sex and gender from the state's heteronormative constraints using Gothic expression. The emphasis of these exhibits is racialized; i.e., the gender binary as settler-colonial in ways that stress a racialized character from bodies of different skin colors (exhibits 32a and b), physical types (skinny vs fat, exhibit 32c) and monstrous forms of expression (vampires, exhibit 32d) that speak to Cartesian trauma as something to live with and prevent in the future.

Sex-coercive BDSM actually includes a gradient of impotence echoed in canonical porn pastiche; i.e., not just "knife dicks," but someone "under" the state worker—a slave or token class traitor (which is basically a slave)—aping the blade: "prison sex" mentality. Under this mindset, an unwilling third can be conditioned to fuck another worker the way the state, thus the privileged worker, wants them to: according to the torturer's canonical, alien-fetishistic worldview (and fatal promised glory, post-slaughter²³⁷) handed to them like a knife by the state, then synonymized with their biology as "all they are." Insect politics.

²³⁷ Generally of the hero, but also the hero's victims, whereupon the conqueror's death is enshrined in a vault of worship pushing the mythic life-and-death glory forward into new, unsuspecting minds. Or as my thesis volume argues,

In other words, canon (thus Capitalism) is full of ritual sacrifice with a Christianized flavor (crucifixion) or Westernized abuse of paganized forms whose divine right revives the glory of recuperated Roman aesthetics (the Nazi as quasi-pagan); e.g., the sacrificial rooster or lamb, the virgin or scapegoat, as something to bleed out for significance and good fortune, but also stalled demise for the holder of the knife: the Christ-like Herculean warrior as babyface or heel to sacrifice when the state's crises enter decay while firing up production, which in turn requires more and more sacrifice the hotter the furnace gets. Engorged, the elite need ever more blood to satisfy their hunger as the ultimate parasite, thus demand of their loyal followers, "Defend our land; defend your land from the infidels" (which curiously the elite stole the land from, to begin with). As Hitler put it, "What is life? Life is the nation. The individual must die anyway. Beyond the life of the individual is the nation" (source).

(artist: Pancake Pornography)

One "card" in the state's aforementioned "deck," then, is racialized fetishization through traumatic penetration; i.e., the BBC as an internalized, "fattened" metaphor for phallic implements of state terror by black men against women (and other recipients) but classically white women. Originally on the plantations and colonies of the antebellum American South, the white man's toxic view of the black man's "giant animal cock" historically has become slave canon, post hoc—mythologized and repurposed to be turned on white women as a fearful prophecy fulfilled through sex-coercive rituals, then gargoyle-ish abstractions and extensions of those rituals: female gargoyles attacking perceptions of rape inside but also outside white populations, becoming vigilantes during interracial rape fantasies where they embody givers and receivers of sexual abuse in terrifying forms (state terror as a weapon). The cock needn't literally be black, even—simply "too big" to be considered "white" within settler-colonial models, thus able to cause pain relative to traumatic penetration as something to threaten in oft-Gothic forms: being too big.

(artist: Slugbox)

Echoes of nightly slave abuse, then, have survived into the present—first lauded by powerful men like Woodrow Wilson towards D. W. Griffith's aforementioned "black, rebellious slaves violate white women" rape fantasy, The Birth of a Nation, followed by Giger's xenomorph as a postcolonial "lawn jockey" later crystalized by 1980s' porn hauntologies (below). Something for moderates to preserve and for reactionaries to return to, said porn becomes an unironic product to consume and embody through canonical praxis; and it is precisely this kind of pornography we must de facto synthesize into healthier forms of sex-positive education (counterterror):

(exhibit 32a: Artists: Victoria Paris and Sean Michaels. Since I'm writing about oppositional praxis as liminal expression [the execution of dialectical-material theory within thresholds] in porn pastiche, here's a collage thereof: the black star athlete enjoying his forbidden prize, the white blonde in wifely silks. They kiss, then begin, him removing her panties and starting to fuck her. From every angle you can think of, the camera is curious and invasive, showing you things normally left to the fearful-fascinated imagination. Literally "sex with the lights on," the makers have placed these sights behind a canonical paywall; i.e., in medieval language, it's a Catholic "sale of indulgence" or return to canonical norms. Rejected by Martin Luther and Protestantism during the Iconoclasm, this only led to the Protestant work ethic and Puritanism through American labor during the 20th century—work being holy and sold sex being unholy but profitable. In turn, this oscillating schism remained curiously in place under Reagan's tenure, a high time of profitability during the latter-end of the "Golden Age of Porn." VHS offered up a mass-produced, widely disseminated reprieve from one's holy work through a taste of unholy decadence, laziness and unlawful carnal knowledge: blondie likes that big black dick, not only taking all of it like a champ but fucking back, power-bottom style.)

The above exhibit might seem "harmlessly" cliché, but Gothic canon treats "black" as synonymous with "aggressively violent and racist" according to repressed sexual desires in the 20th and 21st centuries; i.e., black men sleeping with white women as a common source of contention among reactionary white men (and their token subordinates) declaring a state of emergency spearheaded by foreign knife dicks: a crisis of unwanted black penetration against white women. While canonical porn is full of whitewashed appropriations like these, it reaches back to older conflicts in American history we must dig up and confront. Generally uglier things are preceded by cryptonyms of various kinds, including sex; but sex is generally a part of the problem being discussed in psychosexual bedlam.

For example, before the Wilmington Massacre of 1898, the Reconstruction-era town had black-owned businesses and politicians—until a white-supremacist mob retaliated with violence. This included a local racist editorial printing malicious slander against the black population, saying the latter were the rapists of white women (and implying that having "sheathed black daggers," the modesty of white women was compromised forever):

Newspapers meanwhile spread claims that African Americans wanted political power so they could sleep with white women, and made up lies about a rape epidemic. When Alexander Manly, owner and editor of the Wilmington Daily Record, published an editorial questioning the rape allegations and suggesting that white women slept with black men of their own free will, it enraged the Democratic party and made him the target of a hate campaign (source: Toby Luckhurst's "Wilmington 1898," 2021).

Afterward, the town exploded into violence, resulting in the only successful domestic coup in American history. The massacre included a machine gun-armed white mob targeting and killing people of color and their allies. Sound familiar? Kyle Rittenhouse and the Proud Boys are merely copycats in a long tradition of upholding racist violence in the United States. This is not a glitch, but the system defending itself through bad-faith arguments projecting state rape onto state victims. Any voice of the oppressed must occur through the same basic dialog—in short, because that's where power is concerned, thus amounts to where people are already looking and surviving.

The blindness of such gazes can be undone through iconoclastic narratives that subvert rape; i.e. ironic or critical rape fantasies that remove the harmful capabilities of the knife dick as a settler-colonial tool. These aren't always playful in an obvious sense. For instance, the Wilmington Massacre inspired Charles W. Chesnutt's The Morrow of Tradition (1901), an Austen-style novel-of-manners that devolves into a horrible riot partway through due to escalating racial tensions inspired by a local white supremacist newspaper. This paradigm shift was codified— teased decades later, post-Civil Rights movement, by canonical '80s wish fulfillment; i.e., of canonical American pornography as a widespread extension of unchecked systemic American racism. The general sentiment stems from Lost Cause, Jim Crow and white supremacy and extends into various future groups like the Proud Boys. This happens through canonical behaviors and sentiments; i.e., coded behaviors taught by porn as incredibly body-centric, but also divisive regarding nature as alien under Cartesian rule.

This brings us to a corporal threshold, one the elite—try as they might— cannot fully monopolize in demon BDSM linked to Satanic morphological expression; i.e., the body and its knife dick (or vagina dentata) as a poetic offshoot of a greater inhuman²³⁸ presence; e.g., Medusa's snakes, Lilith's demons; Sauron's orcs, the alien queen's insect brood or Dagon's spawn; Cain's son Grendel, Dracula's thralls, etc, that reproduce in non-heteronormative ways (sodomy effectively meaning "non-PIV sex") to endlessly produce armies of invincible barbarians, which as "forces of darkness/nature-run-amok" (e.g., Alex Jones' "gay frogs") must be conquered by state champions during returning "hard times"²³⁹ that demand the knife dick's resumed employment (which promises a bloody harvest to enrich the state-in-decay to a former glorious position) [source].

Porn, as we'll see, is a useful means of interrogating bigotry through campy forms subverting canonical ones; i.e., policing the "corporal threshold," above, and through canonical pornographic violence is what unironic pimps (thus men like Tolkien and his orcs and goblins) always do: control maidens²⁴⁰ "for their own good," while treating them like whores (often through doubles; e.g., Shelob): tempted by darkness vis-à-vis weak/strong barbarians threatening "Rome"—all to uphold the Christianized nuclear household/ordering of things, per a Protestant ethic (all the more ironic, given Tolkien was Catholic)!

²³⁸ Nature-as-alien canonically achieves demonic power (allegory through transformation) through sexual reproduction tied to an inhuman stigma-animal life cycle; e.g., Kafka's Metamorphosis (1915) but also the xenomorph.

²³⁹ From Bret Devereaux' "Hard Times Don't Make Strong Soldiers," 2020): "'Hard times create strong men, strong men create weak times, weak times create weak men, and weak men create hard times.' The quote, from a postapocalyptic novel by the author G. Michael Hopf, sums up a stunningly pervasive cyclical vision of history—one where Western strategists keep falling for myths of invincible barbarians" (source).

²⁴⁰ I.e., the state survives by telling workers what they want, thus need*; she wants to live deliciously with strange bedfellows, the two (or more) burying the hatchet by recultivating the Superstructure! Revolution so often fertilizes praxis through sex.

*With "darkness" uncontrolled by force seen as "glutinous" (or otherwise sinful, per the Seven Deadly Sins) and whose fearsome temptation would remain something that various holy parties (usually men of the cloth or Crusaders)—ignoring double standards and hypocrisies—must dutifully abstain from, save by raping through unironic force.

Capitalism is like a bad parent and/or husband, then, one that naughty little girls must run away from and rebel in order to survive the usual abuses their actual/de facto parents inflict upon them. Like the proverbial tip of the iceberg, we take whatever bigotry moderates men like Tolkien expose during these exchanges and pull them, screaming like a mandragora, out of the ground! Not as vaudeville/a minstrel show, but calculated risk occupying the same stages and using the same darkness visible for campy reasons.

To break Capitalist Realism on yourselves, then, you must turn into sex objects of a theatrical sense; and to do that without harming yourselves or others, you must experiment with yourselves and others, "on the settlement." Of course, rebellion often has a dysfunctional, exhausting character to it; and whatever we're pumping—be it cum, blood, oil, drugs, money or power of some kind—this takes work under imperfect conditions complicated by capital defending itself. So do we hook each other up or hook up with each other to whatever degrees we're able. That ability varies, from moment to moment.

Likewise, smaller simulations of class, culture and race war include battles inside/outside ourselves that attach to those fought on other registers. The less prone we are to attack others, the more we can solidarize, thus humanize/decolonize the harvest and its alien, hellish crop. Keeping with the drug-fueled metaphors of acid Communism, these crops take on a love-in-idleness character that—among orc and goblin bodies—mirrors older faerie ones we've already examined; re: Romantic Rose; i.e., a demonic "orchard" whose "violence" of exposed nudity is legitimate in state eyes, so long as they control nature as their whore to pimp, their harvest to dehumanize while raping nature for profit:

(artist: Romantic Rose)

Function determines function; agency is nudity through the whore's paradox, projecting such power out into the world as something to humanize ourselves with, mid-duality and flow—as monsters to fuck for reasons different than the state's own policing of whores, of orcs and goblins, of nature as black and alien. This includes when the skin is white (re: all beings treated as women [especially white women] are deemed "corruptible" by an enterprising status quo "counting chickens" per standard imperial practices).

So experiment! Free your mind and join every dimension by pulling this in that direction. Golems—and by extension goblins; i.e., as classic, shortstack, commonly green-skinned mischief-makers, but also whose punk culture/terrorism is decidedly fun (a firecracker)—are poetic placeholders we can hurt, but never harm while embodying sin as something to synthesize during oppositional praxis; i.e., they're made to take it, and breathe life into dark forces for rebellious, Satanic purposes; re: goblins, witches, black magic, demon resurrection, drug use/acid Communism and interracial sex, etc, aiding the cryptonymy process for workers: forbidden sight during demonic sex and asexual rituals of pain/public nudism with a psychosexual aesthetic! Strange appetite, strange eyes! Defy God and Heaven! Learn what resonates in sex-positive ways and make that your drum to beat! Once introduced, they cannot police it—the brothel, per the whore's paradox, becoming a place we can reclaim during liminal expression as never wholly acted on by one side; re: "how the state forbids access, yet access happens anyway."

Life finds a way, as it were. So can workers become free, mid-paradox, to forge our own destinies; i.e., while identifying as we want to, and choose to spend time with those we care about. Even if the feelings don't last, the intensity of a wild romance—wanting it so goddamn bad the baddie bucks back into you, below—is bound to make a lasting impression: something to ride out, however long it lasts! The whole point isn't that you control it through pure domination, but working with others who have agency in a shared operation. Sex and romance likewise bear out social components that have their own asymmetrical elements, and whose parties will be treated differently by society under capital, at large! Understanding and appreciation, while you can, is prudent.

(artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

Such chaos is often planned and playful—made by deliberately forming connections that might seem tangential and pointless, but in reality open up new vistas of reflection conducive to development as a whole (the state and its imperialism of theory atomizing thinkers until they no longer can); re: entitled, covetous, white cis-het men (and tokenized people in the Man Box) look at an orc or a goblin and see a "waifu," whereas we look at them and see "rebels," "punks" and sexual outlaws who punch up during the whore's revenge; i.e., exploitation and liberation's usual liminalities extending to blood libel through orcs and goblins: sex objects fighting back as dirty sex symbols.

To it, "black" is a state of "danger" because forbidden love not sanctioned by the state will be viewed and treated as "terrorist"; it's not something we're "supposed" to do, therefore exciting because it speaks to our true alien selves finding some sense of home where we're treated as foreign, exotic, anathema—i.e., where our power is found by us and policed by the state, flirting with disaster in dualistic, liminal, ergodic and recursive forms! Such arrangements can take many different shapes, but generally reduce to one side of an arrangement being policed differently than another is; i.e., in fractally recursive/concentric formations, but who find similarity in the midst of police shadows assaulting us; re: the pedagogy of the oppressed, healing from rape during monster-fucking theatre: speaking to a desire for intimacy with those we love, yet feeling the classic Gothic push-pull under the presence of dialectical-material dispute and state overreach policing the grey areas of exchange.

(artist: Iron Dullahan)

Everyone loves the whore, for different reasons; everyone loves orcs and goblins as rebellious feisty whores speaking demonically through different dark desires, unequal exchange and radical transformation for or against the state's monopoly (thus abuse) of such monstrous, violent terror language—e.g., Shrek's wife, Fiona (next page), but also Harley Quinn²⁴¹ and Poison Ivy as famous bisexual icons (above [with a super-giant tree dick] and below) that, in the pornographer's capable hands, speak through size difference, gender trouble, blood libel and interracial sex to reverse abjection (thus profit, rape); i.e., during monster-fucking theatre sitting between art and porn, onstage and off: "futa" and other such things for us, not for straight men fetishizing our identities to dominate us with. They rule not through respect and trust, but cruelty and fear dressed up as "love" and "protection." "What a story, Marx!"

²⁴¹ A little goblin in her own right; i.e., someone who farts in front of the boys to a weaponized degree ("Harley Quinn Farts in the Batmobile," 2017). At first, Batman tries to act tough, refusing to let Harley out. But the farts are so bad that eventually he concedes defeat! Huzzah!

(artists [top-left-to-bottom]: Ngmi, Amber Harris, and Iron Dullahan)

People—even ace people—relate through Gothic dialogs about sex. Sex-positive demons communicate cryptonymically through non-harmful pleasure and pain to illuminate harm caused by the state; i.e., the whore, through ludo-Gothic BDSM, must reclaim such devices normally used by the state causing harm: to police porn's subversive, genderqueer elements is to deny GNC people (and other marginalized groups) any ability to a) speak out against their own exploitation where it normally occurs, and b) to their ability to normalize the reclamation of these devices in Gothic (wicked, perverted, reprobate) modes of expression helping workers connect (through hook-ups or otherwise). "You are determined!" Service tops and power bottoms make up much of this, but really any arrangement of power and its seeking you could dream of, their ensuing arguments wrecking the nuclear model (and state ideas of maidens and whores), mid-Amazonomachia (re: battle sex through kayfabe). "PUSSY DESTROYED" by goblin dynamite dick (camping the usual medieval poetic mergers of sex and siege warfare)!

"We camp canon because we must!" Whereas canonical Gothic furthers abjection through monomyth escapism courting the ghost of the counterfeit, Gothic Communism navigates the confusions and excitements that result to guide workers towards a better world; i.e., during a close encounter/brush with death in canonically bigoted phallic/vaginal forms standing in monolithically for the monstrous-feminine (often in Numinous forms; e.g., Pyramid Head, Medusa).

To break Capitalist Realism, then, is to encounter the abject and not die, but merely change/radicalize by realizing we're looking into a mirror showing us our alien side waiting for reunion. It's to fuck with black cocks and bodies partially on ourselves—seemingly for a moment but actually for all our yesterdays—to bridge liminality oscillating towards development; re: with sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, but also the haunted house, Metroidvania noir or Western saloon's danger disco and its cloak-and-danger theatricalities; i.e., though uncanny arrangements speaking to our mutual-if-idiosyncratic alienation and chance to reclaim our shared humanity through said demonizing theatre. It's not a swan song but a siren song that has the listener not just hugging but fucking the alien while humanizing them!

To illustrate subversive labor action as it commonly occurs, then, I want to exhibit this complicated praxial reality and its descriptively sexual, culturally appreciative synthesis when planned and played out by workers making pornographic art in the real world; re: the creative successes of proletarian praxis; i.e., through the goblin as a genderqueer force during ludo-Gothic BDSM, using acid

Communism (and drug use/children's cartoons) to fuck with Tolkien's rigid (and sadly popular) anti-Semitic worldview—through the demonic spirit of creative rebellion/unruly slaves, which the goblin so easily represents; i.e., beyond Tolkien's undead scapegoating of it (and subsequent hierarchy of values), his doing so to maintain imperial hegemony/Goldilocks Imperialism to put Whitey conveniently at or near the top (elves are what men want to be). Rebellion is a shady business, but one filled with galaxies and constellations, their "Big Bangs" lighting the way through darkness with darkness (dark matter)—one planetary castle at a time!

Note: As stated, this portion is a bit messy and holistic and that's the point [re: ludo-Gothic BDSM and the spirit of play synthesizing praxis]. What we're talking about here [darkness visible/forbidden sight] pertains to all demons, but these examples focus on goblins going beyond Tolkien's narrow police use of them; i.e., through dehumanized agents reclaiming their humanity during ludo-Gothic BDSM as a shared, intersectional polity's pedagogy of the oppressed. We're all demonized differently by capital; fucking and even rape play are how we monsters relate to one another while being demonized unequally by the state. Anything I present here with my friends, then, I posit that you, yourselves, could generate among your friends; i.e., with furies, dragons, zombies, jinn, etc, or combination[s] of these separate modular elements to have the whore's revenge. —Perse

How to Play with Goblins-as-Demons, Ourselves (to Have Our Revenge; feat. Bay, Blxxd Bunny, SpongeBob, and more)

(exhibit 44a1b1a: Illustration and outfit by Lucid-01; background, outfit alterations and character design by Persephone van der Waard. Genuine abuse can be subverted, happening through a controlled "call of the void"/calculated risk. Glenn the Goblin, for example, is a formerly anti-Semitic symbol that invades the pre-fascist Christian wardrobe to wickedly play around with the garments inside. In short, she's taking them back, having her revenge through ludo-Gothic BDSM's darkness visible. The source of play comes from symbolic, doubled tension; i.e., the metaplay of fan fiction's paradox of pleasurable pain lying adjacent to perceived threats of harmful pain and its assorted legendarium. On the surface of the image, black is loaded in Western imagery with a variety of conflicting data: the threat of power as a destroying force, but also the color black as thoroughly dimorphized under Western thought; i.e., of presumed subservience [and misbehavior] for women under a perceived medievalized order of existence, the police state-of-affairs signified by black uniforms that hold punishment over those judged as good little girls and bad little girls who live under fear of rape as something to endure and avenge.

Just as canon is all according to design, so is my iconoclasm; i.e., Glenn—as a shapeshifter and Satanic atheist who isn't much interested in being good, nor being a scapegoat—wants to have danger-disco fun through consent-non-consent by walking the tightrope. The idea is doll-like, undressing Glenn like a doll [implying a similar subversive element of control to the sub being undressed as such, instead of the heteronormative idea of intromission, coitus and creampie; i.e., "Wham, bam, thank you, ma'am!"]: in ways that beg the disco refrain as disarming of unironic harm within a Gothic, BDSM threshold; re: New Order's "How does it feel, to treat me like you do?"

In Glenn's case, the question is asked under informed consent; i.e., from two parties who know exactly what they want and are reveling inside the unique, delicious sensations as normally denied to us, under Capitalism: inside danger-disco torture dungeons! Glenn didn't pick "her" clothes in the sense that she's a cartoon, but rather did so as an extension of myself; i.e., I chose her to represent my desires: during the appreciative peril you see taking place. Just as I designed Glenn to shapeshift themselves—and me shapeshifting by proxy—the "goblin transformation" fantasy is me being tied up and threatened with "death"/a palliative Numinous.

To set ourselves free, we fags [and other aliens] use ludo-Gothic BDSM communicate through feelings of alienation, stigma, miracles, imprisonment, and exquisite torture, etc; i.e., the tremendously anguished cryptonymy of state boundaries, which we test by threatening them with our power as ultimately greater than any state: catharsis through "rape," on the receiving end of something great, in control; e.g., "Should you choose to test my resolve in this matter, you will be facing a finality beyond your comprehension, and you will not be counting days, or months, or years, but millenniums in a place with no doors²⁴²." We wager in strict and gentle forms, but speak to moral trespasses that defy reason, blind our eyes, and steal our dreams through false versions of themselves. Reversing such polarities, we see through/with them while wearing blindfolds and weeping blood: to puzzle over these tactile seekings of "destruction" and temporary bondage during calculated risk as a psychosexual, "martyred" act of rebellion.

artist: [Lucid-01]

²⁴² Reminded of my exes, I recently asked Harmony Corrupted to "rape" me as we played; i.e., I felt out of control when triggered by the present. Sensing the harmful past, I invoked rememory to regain control during ludo-Gothic BDSM with a trusted friend. It's a bit counterintuitive on its face, but a vital paradox to counter capital's rising inequalities and power abuse: rape makes us chase the Numinous. It is a mighty outlet when harnessed by us to heal!

Latter-day uniforms, then, become similarly loaded with canonical connotations of torture, treachery and forbidden seduction as dimorphically gendered; i.e., the eliding of angelic patience with Radcliffe's "black penitent" as a kind of xenophobic caricature of destruction that, under fascist/post-fascist conditions, takes on different meanings for beings perceived as "woman," but also monstrous-feminine: the regressive in holy garbs, but also the queer BDSM subversive playing at the dark god for heretical reasons of Satanic apostasy and hellish delight. There is an undeniable link to trauma and imaginary history's constant reinvention; the wearer could just as easily be a Christian missionary on the Oregon Trail or 1800s China, but also a ninja, gun hand or some other operative training in bondage, torture and murder that is nevertheless fetishized in the [classically] white cis-het fantasies of women [or men playing the "heroes" in these narratives]. So do we camp blood libel in ways Tolkien did not.

artist: [Persephone van der Waard]

Like an action hero, we get stronger the less clothes we have on. Such things are torment mapped out and turned into strength, thriving in places the Straights couldn't dare to dream; i.e., a mascot to illustrate that state dialogs only mirror ours and what we're trying to say. To it, Glenn indicates of my voice—dancing on my enemies' graves as a point of praxis [e.g., ribbing Rowling by existing despite her desire for me not to, above]. But any artistic movement isn't solo; it's a group exercise and takes a lot of planning to humanize those things normally demonized to serve police goals under state hegemonies. These invigilations of "brothel espionage" generally work inside capital, on different registers: me, the director/promoter and various people collaborating with me and what I invigilate. Teamwork makes the dream work!

artists: [Lucid-01 and Persephone van der Waard]

This planning can occur through Lucid and myself [above]. Or it can happen synchronistically through others; e.g., my partner, Bay Ryan, who normally identifies with the goblin through Gothic play, and which I've drawn as such [next page].

Celebrating my Satanic shortstack for their fuckable attitude and grit, I've created a spiritual companion to Glenn; i.e., one to play with our respective lost humanities by camping unironic blood libel, together [whose canonical forms we subvert as they happen around us].

Goblins, like golems, are made from clay or things treated like clay. Assembled by different practitioners, they are functionally "dead," beforehand; i.e., loving inscribed in various occult symbols and clothes that—whatever meaning they once had—only currently have as much granted, post-resurrection, by the sorcerer! In playing with dogma to reverse the polarity of power and virtue/vice, workers can stand up and say as one, "We are not small, wicked, functionally black children"²⁴³ for functionally white cops to smash into paste; we have power to expose them in ways that subvert their bad-faith poetry and violence: our Aegis, reminding them of their own cruelty and hypocrisy!"

It's something that goes beyond Glenn, of course; re: through real people like Bay!

Being drawn as a goblin by me, Bay humanizes themselves through our relationship. In turn, I humanize myself in how I depict Bay as human; i.e., as they want to be seen, thus treated, while identifying with things capital treats as alien and worthless. They want to be valued as short, mischievous and fun, but also as persecuted in ways they overcome. Small and big at the same time, Bay's an imp-like offshoot of a larger Cause, one melding struggle and fun, hence terrorist and party animal, punk and activist, skater and whore, orc and goblin, servant and delinquent, etc:

²⁴³ Often coded as "black," in a medieval sense, and having green skin (or some other spectral blackface) during blood libel argumentation.

model and artist: [Bay and Persephone van der Waard]

The whole point, with Bay and I, is to work together to rescue the goblin; i.e., in a sex-positive way that remains sexually descriptive and culturally appreciative regarding Indigenous struggles married to Satanic panic, BDSM and prostitution arguments. Sex workers live and die by making their sex fun, naughty and—for our purposes—actively rebellious in service to workers and nature reclaiming the language of demonic slaves [sex classically being a slave's work; e.g., that of women].

Except, no one wants to martyr themselves; making revolution fun helps the medicine go down, effectively fetishizing the Gothic without showing bigotry as such. Doing so requires informed labor exchanges, happening between workers who love doing this shit for free/at reduced cost; e.g., Bay and I, but also Harmony and others [exhibit 44a1b1b] having fun during praxial synthesis. Melding sex and war into something memorable, we use old demonic language to become a new way of framing and humanizing labor with. In the same token, we combat dated, pervasive stereotypes about whores, and non-white/queer people, etc, when capital antagonizes nature and puts it cheaply to work; i.e., through a dark revenge dynamic thwarting profit. Canonically occurring through state copaganda, the elite frame nature as a vengeful servant tragically "gone bad" [commonly depicted as lazy or cruel, then blamed during capital's bust phase through blood libel argument]. We fight fire with fire, subverting state tools in duality. Goblins are perfect for this—if not the actual aesthetic, then something comparable, during liminal expression; i.e., in a small, tight, mini-demonic package making trouble for those in power [true punk bashing the bully from a guerrilla's small, disadvantaged position]! Keeping with acid Communism, this rebellion has a drug-like flavor to it; e.g., Black Sabbath's "Faeries Wear Boots" [1970] suggesting such things as fictitious, but nonetheless making an impression while tied to drug-induced paranoia [the album's namesake] and the shadow of the Vietnam War felt overseas, in England; i.e., as the birthplace of "Gothic" and heavy metal, alike, but prone to its own signature treating of activism/punk culture like "terrorism"²⁴⁴ [re:

²⁴⁴ Apparently the song was inspired by English "skinheads," which the band—in true false-punk (and homophobic) fashion—called "faeries":

This song is about Skinheads. At the time in England, Skinheads were not racists, but punks and anarchists. They usually wore boots, which is how Sabbath got the title. [...] The lyrics were inspired by an incident after a Sabbath concert in 1970. The band was attacked by a bunch of Skinheads after the show, injuring Tony Iommi and forcing them to cancel their next performance [ibid.].

Like many rock songs, the band buries the lead/obscures their criticism of different punk groups interfering with their bottom line; i.e., while cashing in on witchcraft, monsters and drug use,

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Crawford, and the Gothic invention of terrorism]: "Yeah, fairies wear boots and you gotta believe me / Yeah, I saw it, I saw it, I tell you no lies" [source: Genius].

As Glenn demonstrates, the formerly problematic can be tipped away from its regressive, commercialized aspects—abjuring profit while keeping the medievalized, religious-tinged outer shell—but there will always be ontological tension within a broader dialogic interrogating whatever results transpire. Further fun can be made by chaining her to the pillar but having her grip it with her fingers. At a glance, she appears at the viewer's disadvantage, but upon closer inspection is actually having the time of her life! She feels out of control, so she regains control during ludo-Gothic BDSM mired in stigma arguments she likewise can face and play with; i.e., a roleplay of false danger, loose morals and dungeon language haunted by overarching state abuse abstracted as such:

artists: [Lucid-01 and Persephone van der Waard]

There's a charged, stirring sense of improvised chaos, too. Glenn takes what's on hand—the nun's habit, the convenient pair of manacles next to the bed; the hot candlewax on her bare, muscled skin; her anachronistic pussy tattoo, In Hoc Signo Vinces ["In this sign thou shalt conquer"] and the massive white dildo—and runs wild with it. She's not the hopeless impostor-victim, stricken with dysphoria or dysmorphia; these are abusive conditions to redeem through emergent play avenging nature by defending herself from the state through staged impropriety [re: the whore's paradox/revenge enacted through nudity and exposure]. As such, Glenn at home in her shapeshifting²⁴⁵ body and herself as "in flux" and at odds with the tyrannical past. Carefully rewriting her own destiny by throwing caution to the wind, she reclaims the prescribed terror instruments of colonial abuse in thrilling paradoxically ways; i.e., the thrill of ritualized violence, minus actual harm, and married to interracial sex [sex with goblins and non-goblins is interracial sex]. I'd say it's a game where no one gets hurt, but what's life without a little pain?

themselves (re: the ghost of the counterfeit). The band went on to make millions and lose themselves in drugs, far less concerned with activism than they were exploiting the aesthetics of it while butting heads with those they called "punks" and "faeries." When push came to shove, they sold out and treated rebellion as "gay."

²⁴⁵ I originally devised Glenn as a shapeshifter goblin; i.e., born as one, but able to turn into different shapes, sizes and genders to synthesize good praxis with: GNC poetics I pointedly wanted to "goblinize" while rescuing all aspects thereof from a harmful historical past (one whose queerness and goblins had to suffer under Western pogroms; more on this in Volume Three).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Furthermore, this goes beyond "just goblins," tying them and other monsters [through workers and their exchanges] to a grander process of creation-under-pressure; i.e., one had between many models I've worked with, over the years, but also the broader assemblage and chaos for which all creatures of chaos [which goblins are] and Gothic Communism—through acid Communism—collectively speak to, in a highly meta sense. I want to quickly explore this process through one of my models, but also outline the kinds of socio-political, linguo-material elements that converge, mid-assemblage, to adumbrate Gothic Communism:

artist: [Blxxd Bunny]

Bunny is one such person I connected with, during this project; i.e., they're ace and I'm not, but we can still work through those differences to speak to our collective emancipation: through the monstrous-femininity of the bare exposed whore [rawr]! The left image, for example, comes from a shoot they provided for one of my paintings of them. Compulsion isn't strictly authoritative, but also encompasses the cathartic pursuit of things that feel good through pain²⁴⁶ that speaks, in turn, regarding subconscious impulses; i.e., that cross consciously over into our world: from any one monster

²⁴⁶ Bunny likes "painal," for instance—as much for the pain, but also the control it gives them, during sex work. They also have sex with different people, but generally as a form of public nudism/pornographic art (samples from Bunny's Twitter profile):

(artist: Blxxd Bunny)

In short, they can work with other people, but tend to favor toys because of the unparalleled control those give them; i.e., over their own body and the scenes they're trying to cultivate. This took time and work to figure out, which shows in Bunny's extensive catalog. Indeed, since meeting Bunny back in March 2023 when I first drew them as female Ozymandias, they've come such a long way and really matured as an artist! And they've supported my work a great deal, funding it/supplying subscriptions gratis and being there for me emotionally when others were attacking me in bad faith (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Setting the Record Straight, Transmisia Experience: 5/26/2023").

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

type and into bodies being the canvas for all of them, combined; e.g., I could easily paint Bunny as a goblin, despite having never done so—yet! Only time will tell!

Yet, the adage, "be careful what you wish for" applies to the sobering reality that harm is not historically-materially divided from pleasure, pain or power exchange; i.e., during social-sexual rituals where all of these things are distributed unevenly, dimorphically and abusively through fetish, kink and BDSM aesthetics. Bunny is my friend, and planning monsters around them and their labor informs my own; i.e., I care about them and often check in with them regarding what I work/feature Bunny on. Such things don't exist in a vacuum, then—quite the opposite, they float in a more chimeric and chaotic sphere that interrelates imperfectly to produce wildly incongruous but seemingly perfect-for-each-other modulations and synthesis.

[artist: Ween]

This obviously goes beyond Bunny and I meeting at random—doing so similar to Harmony and myself—onto equally-random-but-no-less-special happenstance; e.g., Steven Hillenberg and the obscure '90s band Ween [above]—the two fitting together like human genitals [themselves a byproduct of millions of years of unchecked evolution and its pressures, and resembling sea animals in their own right] to make something profoundly special unto itself: SpongeBob SquarePants²⁴⁷.

²⁴⁷ The evolution of this incredibly bizarre-yet-charming children's cartoon has a surprisingly storied history in its own right. Nathan Evans writes, in "Ween - The Mollusk: How an Album Inspired the World's Most Famous Kid's Cartoon" (2020):

In a Facebook post written shortly after the death of Hillenburg in late 2018, band members Gene and Dean Ween told the story of how they were contacted by him, saying that "he wanted to start a cartoon inspired by The Mollusk," bringing to light what was a truth hidden in plain sight for many years. The Pennsylvania duo was asked to write a song teaching kids how to tie their shoes, which became "Loop De Loop" from one of the show's most heartwarming innocent moments. You could even be forgiven for thinking it wasn't the same band who wrote "Piss Up a Rope," but that was part of the Ween magic. In tribute to The Mollusk, the record's penultimate track "Ocean Man" plays as the 2004 movie's credits roll.

[...] These sock puppet-like characters feed into the adorably childish comedy of the record, as does their simple Limerick style of songwriting. The very on-the-nose title "Waving My Dick in the Wind" doesn't hold back Gene and Dean's silly side, and neither does some of Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

Relationships, in general, operate as such; Communism relies on that to function, and SpongeBob—like any egregore you could dream of, not just goblins—is a product of the same chaos all poetry springs from: something to play with as children do [with Tolkien ethnocentrically comparing the goblins to children]. "Are ya ready, kids?" Things that remind you of that chaos, while delivering on it anyways, speak to the complicated and endlessly metamorphic/magical forces at work through Gothic Communism playing with darkness. This can be sexual—e.g., Cuwu and I once fucked to SpongeBob's jellyfish rave—but includes a childlike element, as well; i.e., Cuwu only showed me SpongeBob because they loved it, themselves, and wanted to share its magic with me [and me—loving older cartoons like Ren & Stimpy and Rocko's Modern Life (1991 and 1993)—delighted at the chance: to feel like a kid as an adult]!

To that, the best things in life [in terms of stimulation and jouissance] come with a dialectical-material element of risk—to love monsters, and each other as monsters, but realize back and forth, how such things are likewise tools for the state abusing us. There's no way to avoid this, and it can seem a little scary. But without the lines within the cut—though many reviewers have used the word "masturbatory" to describe music, "you should have seen old Jimmy Wilson dance" really is so [a tradition far older than SpongeBob—with Herman Melville using plenty of phallic jokes in Moby Dick to comment both on matelotage but also the whaling industry as a whole].

But that nerdiness too lends itself to another aspect of the lyrics on here, namely with their casual use of head-turning references rooted in the obscure. Throughout, they are constantly sneaking in gentle religious subtext ("The Mollusk") or a reference to a Rastafarian deity ("Mutilated Lips") into an otherwise simple affair. Leaving these scraps of scholarly knowledge in a place one would least expect causes an emergent feeling of surrealism, mirroring how Hillenburg and co. nodded to the likes of metal band Pantera, literary macabrist Edgar Allen Poe, and German horror legend Nosferatu. Into a bloody children's show [another tradition, one used—for example—by James Joyce's Ulysses or T.S. Eliot's "The Waste Land" and similar stories speaking to the chaos of modernity after WWI].

Ween's relationship with psychedelics also matches the aforementioned college-band stereotype, as "Polka Dot Tail" and "Mutilated Lips" document these—again, surrealistic—sightings witnessed only through pills, smoke and crystal. Twisted images of flying puppies, malformed human hands and wormlike tentacles lodged inside the brain. Although out of context these lines would appear completely demented, it's inverted by the tongue-in-cheek sonics behind them. The former is one of several children's showtunes on the album, and as we all know, there's a very blurred line between hallucinogenic visions and children's entertainment (source).

In short, people didn't like SpongeBob because it turned a profit; they liked it for its artless charm, which capital promptly pimped out. Rebellion, then, abjures profit as such. To it, the parallels between the meta forces at work—and the sheer seemingly-random serendipity of chance meetings, out in the world—go beyond Ween and SpongeBob, Jojo and Walpole, Watterson and Calvin/Hobbes, or Harmony and myself. And yet, in keeping with acid Communism—and the creative reality that anything might combine with anything else under natural and manmade pressures, but still make it work, through Gothic Communism at large—such holistic intra, micro and macro-spection makes for an incredibly interesting journey, all on its own!

More to the point, such eclectic and dialectical-material chaos becomes incredibly liberating the moment you realize you can combine anything with anything to say whatever you need to say to bond with other people under capital. Do it because life is absurd; smile at the gods by making your own, in the present space and time. It is, as Jameson once said, all we have. And as Molly Grue once said, "You have all the power you need, if you dare to look for it!"

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

pursuing catharsis, you run the risk of being a slave not just to society's polite norms, but their hidden, brutalizing ones, too: the snowy bridal gown and the black nun's habit [or goblin dick, below] intimate the same systemic issues. If they wear a uniform, then it must mean something—with the uncanny possibility of their being a false option or replication that isn't the intended function. The house of pain becomes, to some degree, ironic.

artist: [Blxxd Bunny]

Again, this can be sex-positive or coercive; it all boils down to dialectical-material context: what is the point of the costume within the piece in relation not to Capitalism, but its core, systemic values, etiology and symptoms [e.g., virgin/whore syndrome]? And more to our purposes, how can these be subverted within the paradox of cathartic, exquisite torture; i.e., in ways that don't endorse or promote actual harm—thus canonical iterations of something as seemingly throwaway and performative as a nun's outfit—but whose hauntological mask, costume or role to play brings one joy and other denied pleasures in parallel societies: lost histories and possible new worlds within the half-real fictions of Gothic poetics as de facto education. Blood libel, when camped, speaks to "sodomy" as canonically "unnatural," vis-à-vis interracial sex. Yet, in looking at it, the images seems to speak, "Come and see, but also do; critique through experience as profound, intense, iconoclastic." That's Gothic Communism!

The ludic nature is, like a videogame, divorced from actual harm; the ritual is there, but not the dreaded result, allowing for instruction to occur through repeated, simulated experiences involving the same ingredients. While this can be for or against the state—with fascist parties like Tolkien embracing the heroic cult of death through the slaying of demons with codified arguments—the "slaying" of monsters, in sex-positive language, has a highly specific meaning and desired outcome: rape prevention and the disillusionment of systemic harm.

Within this broader network of opposition, then, denial becomes a powerful ironic device in relation to unironic doubles; i.e., the denial of polite restraint, of compunction and pleasure, but also the denial of correct sex—of orgasms and prescriptive harmful norms, including their forms of compelled restraint, abstinence, ignorance, protection, and penetration: the agency of who we play with and what we put into our demonic, genderqueer bodies [vaginal or anal²⁴⁸, above or below]! It becomes not a source of sodomy and black fears, per the ghost of the counterfeit during abjection, but a place of new love/unknown pleasures reversing abjection; e.g., Eva Android's tight femboy's goblin ass having the whore's revenge with the same terror tools fucking the alien: ourselves, during sodomy! Squish goes the butt-ass!

artist: [Eva Android]

In short, audiences can get just as invested as performers, their voyeurism and exhibitionism having a vicarious, empathetic-yet-neeedy component [many thrive by seeing others thrive]. Denial, as such, can expertly raise tension, the pressure climbing until you shout at the screen, "just fuck, already!" So can denial become profound because of gender trouble and parody exploring desired outcomes for either side. Heteronormativity only views queerness as a death of the world [e.g., the 2022 Netflix miniseries for Neil Gaiman's Sandman selling queerness to the Straights as a kind of morbid death fantasy not unlike Tolkien's own closeted forms]. For us queers, the goal is crossing over from the Right to the Left, doing so by virtue of reclaiming subversive denial and indulgence; i.e., as a positive vice we perform on a societal level: a world without enforceable sin, but still yielding theatrical conflict—e.g., sexy nuns torn between their service to God and the Devil, or manly men versus hot manly love in a bathroom stall—and almost-holy Gothic pastiche as geared towards euphoric pleasure and pain. All these conversations occupy the same basic shadow space.

The same goes for orcs and goblins as not simply reprobate, but expressing queerness through non-white bodies of different shapes and sizes; e.g., orcs having "bear" potential and goblins stamped not just with a rebellious, "trickster" character

²⁴⁸ Whereas anal can generally fit larger sizes into itself (above), vaginal generally stops at to 6-7 inches, for the average birth canal. Vaginal is often made more exciting visually by "pushing the envelope"; i.e., by playing with pornographic tropes that walk the tightrope between exploitation and liberation; e.g., white women—commonly treated as "modest," including their canonically diminutive and infantilized vaginas—evoking some degree of rape fantasy when saying to the camera as they take a big dick (regardless of color), "Oh, noooo! It's soooo biiiiiiig!"

[similar to Loki, from Norse myth] but the usual fat asses [above] that so many nowadays assign to the goblin archetype²⁴⁹; i.e., taking "punk" back to the exploitative past [as queer slang so often does]: the doll-like bottom for stronger homosexual dominants, but also the sizeable booty to tear up and enjoy during calculated risk by sex-positive agents. In the absence of monopoly, chaos reigns in ways we can work inside.)

Wrapping Up/the Big Picture

That mostly concludes our playing with goblins beyond Tolkien's blood libel revenge arguments and into Gothic Communism married to acid Communism (save for another two-page exhibit, next page). Keeping that (and the above exhibit) in mind, let's go big-picture—covering some broader arguments (eight pages), before concluding the symposium (and "Idle Hands") by talking about Medusa one last time; i.e., as a Big Whore/Communist Numinous to evoke through the likes of tiny beings like goblins: acting as little sex pirates serving Mommy Communism.

The raw sentiment of a moths drawn to the flame isn't that hard to understand (above)—e.g., the bottom reaching behind themselves to grab the headboard, all while spreading their legs to take the fucking ever deeper and harder—if only because sex (or asexual rituals) happening during power exchange with a cool-looking badass can feel stupidly good. Rapture invigorates us, but also has Numinous elements of torpor/divine stupefaction; i.e., that smash different pieces repeatedly together to communicate through the profoundly absurd effects being had/playing out before our eyes. Often, this is phrased as drug-like, but also tied to conquest and filth; i.e., drugs are kept in a "stash," called "shit," and fought over as fiercely as gold is/consumed as "the good stuff" that takes the edge off.

Drugs or not, sex and Gothic aren't "empty" at all, but whose darkness visible generates meaning through pandemonium to challenge profit (thus tokenization) during the whore's revenge; i.e., through "rape" and rape taking infinite forms, those forms working in opposition, during liminal expression, and only limited by our imaginations and desires (shaped by our socio-material conditions and grafted onto our bodies, below): to perceive through holistic violence and illusion, but also sex/public nudism!

²⁴⁹ And which pedophiles ascribe to child porn they call "furry" or "goblin," in bad faith; e.g., Ian Kochinski (more on him, in Volume Three):

(source: the thumbnail for Bad Empanada's "Vaush P*dophilia Controversy: Disgusting Fans & Orbiters MELT DOWN Defending Him," 2024)

(exhibit: exhibit 44a1b1b: Artists [from left to right, top to bottom]: Annabel Morningstar, Angel Witch, Harmony Corrupted, Bubi, Blxxd Bunny, Angel Jazminskyyy, Eldritch Babe, and Roxie Rusalka. All are models I've worked with in the past, taking "dark," usually massive or otherwise "non-white" cock, or a dark body for someone to enter during sodomy's physical and metaphorical terms. White-on-black, black-on-white, or black-on-black, all involve "black" as something to subvert through itself acted out.

This section, then, has been all about playing with goblins and size difference, but also different skin colors to showcase alien engagement; i.e., of engagement with white/black through bodies and objects that speak to watching or performing medieval arguments, and that likewise merge the goblin as an equally undead and demonic force. "Black" [or purple, green, etc] stands for inhuman, which we reverse during the abjection process by whorishly embracing such devices; re: running with the Devil away from state control, sleeping with the goblin or being the goblin for others to sleep with!

Whatever the arrangement, it's the call of the void as haunted by abuse/the ghost of the counterfeit, minus actual persecution or exploitation. Exploitation and liberation occupy the same space; forbidden things excite because they're forbidden, the performers seeking to work within porn stereotypes [the BBC/interracial sex] to subvert them: to excite through consent as something to establish by those who are attracted to opposites/the exotic; i.e., to humanize them during mutual consent, not exploit them as capital normally does [re: with sex, drugs and rock 'n roll sublimating more rebellious varieties away from marginalized groups and towards status-quo benefactors maintaining Capitalist Realism through controlled opposition/false rebellion]:

artist: [Harmony Corrupted et al]

Harmony and I, for example, shot these photos because we love doing dress-up and roleplaying together to reverse abjection [going so far as to redo a shoot for funsies, above]. It speaks to what is being demonized, and the means with which to play with/subvert it! Our aim isn't to pacify during the cryptonymy process, but inform, mobilize and cryptomimetically echo while having spur-of-the-moment fun! We copy and echo each other [and our bodies] trapped between trauma and "trauma." That's what camping the canon/making it gay is all about! Rebellion isn't about profit, which pimps police nature to achieve, but in loving what we do in ways that survive the inflexibilities capital relies on to brutalize others. I'm not simply Pygmalion, pimping Galatea to flex on nature; Harmony and I love what we do, doing so together to inspire not just each other but all workers under capital. Staying in control—at least during calculated risk enacted between the two of us—is a virtue that aids in systemic catharsis presenting things that are out of control/needing to be closeted, in capital's eyes; e.g., the madwoman in the attic, itself an allusion to Jane Eyre's woman-of-color Bertha [and who the white heroine calls a goblin²⁵⁰].

The same goes for all my friends/muses. We live far away from each other, offstage, but onstage occupy the same land of dreams that all monsters, hence activists, do. We're a circle of castles—ones we can storm at our own leisure, while denying Tolkien the same privilege.)

²⁵⁰ In a cruel twist, Charlotte Brontë kills Bertha—all so her in-book double, Jane, can marry and redeem the insufferable Mr. Rochester (a slaveholder and adulterer): "Reader, I married him"; i.e., "my marriage was legitimate, and it takes a white WASP to pacify man's otherwise 'untamable' nature." Small wonder that Jean Rys wrote Wide Sargasso Sea (1966); there was no room for a Caribbean woman in a white woman's world in a white man's world, save to be the stepping stone in Charlotte's bildungsroman. Genocide is genocide!

"'Tis a trinket Sauron fancies," yet ones that hold all the power the world has to offer inside then (re: Blake). A loveless, divided and inactive rebellion is a dead rebellion, and revolution is pageantry without judgement (as a goal, not an obstacle); i.e., infinite value, infinite form, thus infinite ways to fight back using what we got, our stewardship of nature always resisting state domination and control! Yet whatever power we assign to them, goblins are simply people's various parts, first and foremost; e.g., Harmony's pussy is her pussy and should be acknowledged as that while ascribing it any other qualities; i.e., while coding it with whatever virtues we espouse, stigmas we condemn, or beauty/status symbols we work with/subvert, onstage and off; re: that of orcs and goblins' legendary qualities, but also paradoxical (simultaneous) goodness and badness conducive to rebellion: as waged by us against the state demonizing us, saying our ass is theirs. Both things are true, insofar as the conflict is dialectically-materially true/false during liminal expression; i.e., the whore versus the pimp, the being of nature and its harvested labor fighting back upon its own Aegis: "one ass to rule them all..."

Sex is a weapon!

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

There's nothing wrong with worship/theatrical revenge, provided it respects universal basic human rights, and that of animals and the environment. So make connections that help you connect the dots through you own nebulas and constellations; i.e., that reconnect your communities to what capital has alienated so many from! Despite the tweed suit and ivy-league education, Tolkien was a cheap pimp; he could only use the blood libel/darkness visible of goblins to cage his mind and quake before Sauron (re: Capitalist Realism). So expose him by doing better than him/camping his ghost; kill his darling legacy to build a better world beyond Zombie-Vampire Capitalism, one that has the whore's revenge by setting nature's monstrous-feminine goblins and black dicks free (or temporarily caging those cocks, should they wish it)! Get in touch by playing with darkness holding everything together! Let the good goblins come out to play/wreck shit to make activism fun and disguise our own naked performing of counterterrorism through drug-like, anisotropic, darkness-visible terror language during the cryptonymy process; be rowdy and watch what the so-called "good guys" do, in response!

The answer is, they'll attack our doubles and call it "justice." Did you honestly think otherwise? Doing so often invokes defacement, which normally means taking one's human element away from where it is seen; i.e., the state defaces its victims, presenting them as dark monoliths to worship and fear during the colonial process (demons and pandemonium tending to homogenize a bit more than the undead; e.g., vampires and zombies, versus sex demons as a whole). Anything we make challenges that, but comments just as well with masks and customs that speak to our scars, injury and defacement as part of who we are, the oasis part-in-parcel with the desert; i.e., the goblin as a kind of mask to wear and camp canon with, the whore prostituting herself as goblin—not to pimp nature/tokenize punk culture, but to self-liberate under oppressive conditions; e.g., this Japanese Edo shunga (artist unknown) encompasses its own spin on "rock 'n roll":

(source)

To it, cryptonymy works overtime when reversing abjection—a process that generally speaks to things while not speaking to them through abject, hauntological and chronotopic placeholders. In turn, we have to do what Tolkien thinks unthinkable (fucking the terrorist, the devil, the goblin, the zombie), making his necrophilic, anti-Semitic dogma unthinkable through paradox reversing terror/counterterror with signature, dainty goblin fun and rags-to-riches: speaking of the devil to appear in ways that camps canonical doubles; re: darkness visible, marrying or socializing/sexualizing with those from perceived immor(t)al territories. The world's biggest coward, Tolkien rapes goblins through lethal force; we "rape" ourselves through a Gothic allegory Tolkien was famously allergic to, fucking to metal/monster-fucking: as a defense mechanism against his chasing of orc BBC and goblin BBW!

It's certainly a tightrope, and one that occupies the same liminal space/shadow zone that Black Sabbath and Tolkien both did (and so many others, besides; i.e., sex, videogames, heavy metal/rock/punk and horror, etc, gentrifying and decaying through a predominantly white straight male enterprise²⁵¹); re: while fetishizing darkness of all kinds to shrink bigotry and increase understanding and intersectional solidarity as a whole: using monstrous-feminine language in duality/opposition to state variants!

²⁵¹ Rock, for example, was stolen from African Americans (a traditional taken from older colonial models). This includes the term, itself, but also white imitators of famous artists like Chuck Berry and Jimi Hendrix (more on Jimi, in Volume Three); e.g., Elvis or [insert name, here]. The same goes for jazz and the Harlem Renaissance, but also white authors in the Gothic mode commodifying and "slumming" darkness while looking in from positions of relative privilege (re: the ghost of the counterfeit and process of abjection). Again, the idea isn't to commodify struggle or alienation, when healing from rape inside the Imperial Core, but learn from it ways that bring different oppressed groups closer together under a common goal; i.e., while surviving police violence everywhere.

Blood quantum just as mendacious, thus harmful, as blood libel. White, black, or brown; tall/short, able/disabled, Christian/pagan, straight/queer or Western/alien, etc, we want to unite by subverting us-versus-them dogma. The simple fact is, we're all Medusa's children—are all orcs and goblins under Communism—but also under capital abusing us in the interim, harvesting nature as monstrous-feminine.

Keeping with castles-in-the-flesh, this grim harvest/liminal hauntology of war includes punishing workers for subverting state mechanisms of fear and difference; i.e., the "goblin" commonly a shortstack white girl with a non-white body or appetite (marked by size, but also the color of stigma), and the "orc" commonly a male person of color with large muscles and a giant cock—both operating under a Jewish conspiracy to unite labor that downplays fascism to attack Communism in the same basic shadow space! Under Capitalist Realism, visions of a better world and a dead world occupy the same Aegis. That's where power is found—either to enslave/closet workers through monstrous sex, terror and force, but also to set them free by establishing empathy through connection, community and, yes, communion with those who came before (anyone who discourages interracial mingling and play is merely segregating workers, dividing and conquering them through bad-faith and/or misled shelter arguments): riding Satan's "broom" (the morphology is well-and-truly endless)!

(artist [top and bottom]: Harmony Corrupted and Blxxd Bunny)

So while Communism operates through community and trust upsetting state monopolies (consent is sexy among language of calculated risk, above)—and whose cryptonymic deceiving of the state through "mere play" hides rebellion in plain sight—all remain overshadowed by capital's usual divisions blaming its own victims through DARVO/obscurantism. Yes, cathartic gradients last and build trust and healthy relationships like Bunny's or Harmony's and mine, but coercive examples—if negotiated badly with someone presenting themselves as a sadist in bad-faith—can promptly fuck over the submissive by subjecting them to addictive, fleeting and guilty pleasure under an unscrupulous and/or unwell manipulator's give-and-take cycle of rapacious power abuse; re: Tolkien, but also Jadis, the latter into Tolkien's school of monster-fucking they used to rape me with. Caution is important, but it's hard to be overly cautious when you feel vulnerable and enthralled with a "protector" archetype who has your number and doesn't mean you well; i.e., they smell the trauma/madness on you and know how to exploit it.

In some shape or form, then, the desire for cathartic fantasies grabs hold and never lets go, because trauma isn't something you just "get over." Like a golem (or Glenn), you can only transform it as part of you, once and forever. And yet, self-destruction needn't be literal; it can be a chance to partake of the forbidden, thus exit Plato's cave! Except this is generally permanent, and if my life is any sort of guide, one that leaves us feeling marooned by people who—as magical and wonderful as they are—don't always stick around; e.g., Zeuhl and their postpunk pussy rocking my world, only to elope with an "old flame" and leave me wanting. C'est la vie! I got hurt a ton, afterwards, and harmed/raped a bit, but eventually found better cuties, anyways (though none with pussies as tight, I must confess). I wouldn't trade my scarred skin and madwoman's bonkers, castled attic psyche for the world! "Insane in the membrane!" (Cypress Hill's "Insane in the Brain," 1993).

And trying to map it as we have here, the process is anything but singular or simple; it's demonic gibberish trailblazing through our lives as a living document, a closeness to chaos and things alienated/fetishized by capital to serve profit. Truth is ergodic; self-fashioned but hauntological, it takes time and effort to enact. So, too, does the world around us take non-trivial effort to transform; change people and the past (as something to perceive/speak with) and you can change the planet! Free the mind; the rest will follow in time!

To this, the shadow of state force always hangs over us. The uphill battle lies in challenging fatal nostalgia as game-like in ways normative individuals will defend. True to form, "darkness" is something to sell (as sex and gender so often are) but the Gothic isn't merely a police cudgel to bludgeon the usual suspects with; we walking sex demons become part of a larger conversation, whoring ourselves out in ways that invite humanizing worship through a demonized Gothic aesthetic the state can't fully monopolize. Everything is political, our captivating bodies and demonic personas inviting forbidden knowledge and exchange through dark promises: of carnal delight and class-conscious eroticism and asexual public nudism; i.e., the whore's paradox, but also her glorious refrain—the state can't monopolize monsters or disco!

So come and get it, lovelies, but pay your sex workers! Mommy has needs and stripping is not consent (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Paid Labor," 2024)! Mutual consent is badass! Equal rights for all workers, animals and the environment is badass! Doing so through the usual fetish-and-cliché claptrap during ludo-Gothic BDSM is badass! Sluts and whores are badasses! And, as usual, the witch is a pathway to "doom" as transformation through sex education; i.e., canonically through the language of theft, sorcery and secrets; e.g., Adria from Diablo 1 (1996) saying to the hero, "I sense a soul in search of answers!"

Well, mommy's got your answers right here! Just cross her palm with silver—all to gradually synthesize working concepts conducive to a world without money/privatization; i.e., what use is a wage in a world where everything is eventually free? Rape replaces with "rape," doing away with industries that normally canonize the former through rock opera; re (from the Poetry and Undead Modules):

Unlike nation-states, corporations don't care about dogmatic presentation as true to the state; they care about exploitation as something that invariably corrupts, which they can milk while throwing various states under the bus if need be. Profit is always the victim. As such, capitalists will do whatever they can to profit as efficiently as possible (source: "Back to the Necropolis," 2024).

Whatever the media, rape is profit under Capitalism, which relies not just on predation, but community silence to continue itself in bad copies, falsehoods, and double standards (source: "Transforming Our Zombie Selves," 2024).

(artist: Marina Dove²⁵²)

All work is sexualized; and forced into a world that makes sex work something to steal from, we become beggars—i.e., in a world that, due to accident of birth, doesn't let us choose/forces us to balance caring about other workers and merely trying to survive by doing things we're not proud of (e.g., women's work, service, retail, etc). This doesn't instantly make us token gifters or cranks, but that can happen; and while brand and belief can overlap, good praxis is ultimately putting our money where our mouths are. Camp is a fine line, then, and class intersects with culture and race to betray labor as often as not. You are what you eat, and that includes context and interpretation of said context; it includes us triggering under conditions that, per the state preying on labor through its own victims—can dice roll into cops as often as victims wearing the same clothes and speaking the same demonized language. Rebellions are human, therefore flawed and susceptible to the usual devices use to keep us in line; e.g., transphobia and its externalized elements internalized by token workers.

²⁵² The alt text, on Mastodon, reads: "Marina in a hot pink body suit and ushanka and a white fur coat holding a pink sickle and a Hitachi magic wand. they're posed dramatically to evoke socialist realism" title="marina in a hot pink body suit and ushanka and a white fur coat holding a pink sickle and a Hitachi magic wand. they're posed dramatically to evoke Socialist Realism."

This begs the question: how do we fight profit, thus rape and all the disorders, syndromes, estrangement, alienation, and abuse, etc, that stem from it? These answers and more lie in Pandora's Box as something to open up: channels and clinics of forbidden, delicious exchange! Witches are more fun, especially black witches and goblins (their surfaces charged with psychosexual power—of rape, of revenge, of ecstasy and the Earth, next page)! Engagement with them amounts to praxis, thus opposition as something to synthesize pursuant to liberation for all.

Yes, weird attracts weird; it should play out in ways that aren't unironically predatory—i.e., that don't give detractors of our literal existence ammunition when calling for our destruction instead of the state decaying around them (re, Marx: "capital is dead labor sucking, like the vampire, on living labor"). Far easier to blame victims than systems, Faust's bargain a death warrant that carries out through rotting numbskulls! Having no brains, they hunger for ours. The spectres of Marx aren't just Ringwraiths invading home from within (during a foreign plot, below), but the fleshy orcs and goblins that precede them across the same Radcliffean Black Veil; re: something to summon and scapegoat, creatures of the night laid low, Dayman vs Nightman.

For state defenders, it's "boundaries for me, not for thee." As such, we're forever under suspicion and they are not; everything we do is an allegation they'll leverage against us: to "protect" women and children from "evil sex demons," thus the West's nuclear family model and civilization as we know it. It might sound extreme, but that's how moral panics work, and during the state's usual boom-or-bust cycle, we fags will be blamed inside a police state; i.e., for being pushed into that marginalized sphere: the Omelas goat to exsanguinate by state bloodletters.

We queers are demonized—among other things—as sodomite pedophiles to scapegoat by village idiots and their "prison sex" mob mentality run amok. This doesn't put us above critique, but begs those examining us to consider the sobering reality—that the ringleaders and opportunists excoriating us are generally far more guilty but presenting as holier-than-thou to deflect from their own hand in things; e.g., most pedophiles are cis-het men, and even if a trans person is a sex pest, this isn't because they're trans, but because the state is punishing them for being trans until they snap (excluding congenital elements like Dahmer's cannibalism, while attacking what they call "transgenderism" [a term no queer unironically uses] as alien on its face).

To it, such obscurantism and DARVO connotations are standard-issue, hence cover for the state through capital's monopolies, trifectas and qualities! Sexual abuse isn't an orientation and reactive abuse doesn't define us! Negotiating such treachery pleads care and boldness, side by side; i.e., to be seen and heard, but also camouflaged in ways that safeguard us from state antibodies: "A little more caution from you; that is no trinket you carry!" Like Satan, our buffer is "non-existence," darkness visible all around you, "under your bed, in your closet, in your head!" (Metallica's "Enter Sandman," 1991).

Keeping with our discussions of "Midnight Vampire" and Tolkien, liberation isn't intuitive because capital is a giant prison designed to conceal itself; escape requires paradox, which demons are profoundly at home with. From Milton onwards, we turn things inside-out, exposing our captors and finding freedom through our chains; i.e., as shadowy likenesses of the dire originals. There's no single interpretation for such inkblots, meaning they have whatever power we can dialectically-materially infuse them with. When we come, you come!

Per the cryptonymy process, the revolutionary's praxial lever is, as usual, their Aegis dueling the state's in duality. Harnessed by us, it demonically evokes the barbaric past to pay it forward; i.e., by reflecting new potential on sharp obsidian velvet (and other such oxymorons, next page): to take your "soul" by making you cum! Spooky!

Everyone likes to "go to town," fancies the whore (which historically would have lived in cities and urban-environment brothels put up by enterprising men and madams); goblin queens are best (what Tolkien literally calls "the black crack" per his captive/goblin rape fantasies, Shakespeare's "the crack of doom," etc). It's a disco to transform, informed by the magical, hypnotic past; re, New Order's "Blue Monday" (1983):

Those who came before me
Lived through their vocations
From the past until completion
They'll turn away no more

And still, I find it so hard
To say what I need to say [as queer people so often do]
But I'm quite sure that you'll tell me
Just how I should feel today (source: Genius).

Growth hurts, as do adventures (e.g., blue balls/clit). But also? They feel good.

Tolkien's goblins were predominantly cis-male; ours, like the Medusa, encompass the entire GNC spectrum. The vampire, witch or goblin is the disco, the Gothic castle-in-the-flesh advertising extracurricular survival and BDSM fun; i.e., shored up in the paradoxical graveyard language of deathly sex, torture and live burial! Back in black, the panties beg to be pulled aside; her necromancer's lips grip, worthy of a tyrant's boast that would rival Smaug the dragon's ("I am strong, strong, strong!"). Darkness visible, she flashes with power! Come play with her!

Feel the rapture of ironic rape ("rape" in quotes)! Avenge Medusa by hugging her seductive liminal darkness!

(artist: Kay)

Ridiculed by state proponents, this Hellish poetic refrain endures a position of compelled evolution; i.e., during prostitution arguments, and achieved inventively from exile with which to reclaim our lost humanity under state-straight yolks. Milton coined it while physically blind, yet still being of the devil's company without realizing it (re: Blake²⁵³). Per ludo-Gothic BDSM, we consciously take back these chains, labels, and death sentences—doing as we please, a summoning of the whore (and her darkness visible); i.e., to learn from her how best to handle and redistribute power and knowledge—to "do the stinging," as Bilbo puts it! Monsters are the abstract language of argument and debate, doubled and at odds, inside-out, invasive, plural and oscillating amid the gloam's coded behaviors. Reality isn't cut and dry. Goblins aren't cut and dry! Anyone who argues that shamelessly amounts to Alexander slicing the Gordian Knot. It's barbaric and, more to the point, inadequate towards escaping capital as a prison. We cannot take it at face value, like Tolkien did!

For us, then, sex is a weapon to break the jail through cryptonymy/forbidden sight (the more "rape" we experience, the more we learn). No different than a vampire at midnight or in broad daylight, the demon's mouth, fang and pussy all hyphenate—an "ancient" xenoglossic book to spread and read you as much as the other way around: she succ! It's drug-like, opening the doors of perception through the usual delicious pathways (more on this in "Call of the Wild," when we look at "acid Communism," again; i.e., with Mikki's help, exhibit 60b).

In turn, entry predicates on trust; i.e., if one is worthy of that power that, all the same, resides in all workers' breasts. The power of cuties like Mikki (next page) is awesome beyond compare; i.e., castles in the flesh holding special secrets, and making the "past" wise once more! Nothing radicalizes (or pacifies) people more than gender and sex; we must tip the needle away from capital, from cops, from

²⁵³ Re: As Jamal Subhi Ismail Nafi writes in "Milton's Portrayal of Satan in Paradise Lost and the Notion of Heroism" (2015):

According to [Tesky] Gordon, it was Blake who expressed this view most emphatically by saying that Milton was of the devil's party without knowing it. He expressed this opinion chiefly in relation to the portrayal of Satan who, according to him, has been depicted as a character possessing certain grand qualities worthy of the highest admiration (source).

sex coercion and its double standards²⁵⁴ under Capitalist Realism and the Capitalocene. The ticket to doing this lies in Gothic Communism vis-à-vis demonic poetics: our sex (and genders) as a weapon challenging state doctrine in dualistic ways—on our Aegis! Sperm donors learn, the greatest trick the devil ever pulled... is pulling us! "Satan" is a figment of a wider imagination, but we're quite real; black unicorns straight from Rainbow Hell ("black is ten colors"), we usher in/offer up a poetic Satanic voice to break Capitalist Realism, paradoxically enough, with dreams: "The closer you get to the meaning / The sooner you'll know that you're dreaming" (Black Sabbath's "Heaven and Hell," 1980).

(artist: Mikki Storm)

Moving On: Some Transitional Arguments about Demon Whores/the Big One (feat. Slan from Berserk)

As our goblin exhibit demonstrates, monsters are made, be that to enforce state power and its flow as Tolkien did, or to critique it; i.e., through the same shared and warring "monster-fucker" dialogs on forbidden love hyphenating sex and force. Moving forward from "Idle Hands" and into the rest of "Forbidden sight," we'll continue applying the demonic notion of forbidden sight by making and summoning demons; i.e., its performative irony through demon lovers as things to deal and play at/with darkness visible (chaos) during mutilative courtly love putting "rape" in quotes. To that, we'll be going beyond vampires or goblins, and towards more obviously demonic, golem-esque effigies and the torturous power and forbidden love they offer (e.g., anal sex); i.e., as attached to larger Numinous forces I want to quickly address, here (two pages).

By tapping into those that fixate and focus less on feeding and trauma during liminal expression, and more on unequal, forbidden exchange and radical transformation through dark desire, we're touching on the Communist Numinous. Personified most commonly as the Medusa (who we've already discussed, at length), it evokes different emotions, mid-rapture: "What profit is it a man if he gains the whole world, but loses his soul?" Well, that depends! What's on the table, cutie? I'll take your engorged shaft and raise you a Giger-style black womb²⁵⁵! A ²⁵⁴ E.g., straight men being Black Penitents protected by the courts with a high burden of proof, versus anyone else slandered and abused under widespread pogroms that extend to these juridical spheres.

²⁵⁵ In the West, animation through clay comes from Judaism and the Golem of Prague (and older versions); i.e., the power of creation laid into mortal hands, then demonized by Christian forces. Abjection abjects sin and guilt off onto state enemies, which the state then attacks. To that, canonical Gothic relies on the cartoon of necromancy and animation directed at older female/feminized men (servants), non-European and/or queer religions, cultures and identities; e.g., Judaism, but also poetic voluptuous vaso vagal, "She mighty mighty!" A bridge to cross, a castle to storm (or which storms back)! A very kinky girl's death clam!

(artist: Kentaro Miura)

About that/a BDSM practitioner's note of caution, as we proceed; i.e., about evoking a Communist Numinous whose taller demonic royalty nonetheless attaches to smaller goblin short stacks [and drug-like feelings; re: acid Communism]: the final planetary "fortress" haunting Tolkien's own monster-fucker dreams. Slan (and her voluminous smuff, above) is just as good an example as any!

Just as the Promethean Quest is about self-destruction, to play with demons is to play with fire that can burn you. With demon sex and "rape," then, there is always the echo of unironic rape to likewise learn from. Believe you me, pain is an excellent teacher—but especially in nightmarish varieties evoking tremendous power beyond themselves! The Gothic mode is a dark queen, her aged, throbbing energies felt by many capital has ravaged over time.

When Jadis raped me, for example, they taught me that Nazis and Communists share the same poetic inkblot. Indicating nature as alienated, fetishized and raped by capital, the Gothic-Communist Medusa is a fat, sassy whore; i.e., with stretch marks and a moon-sized cosmic bedonk—and she's hungry for sweet revenge! It's precisely that "best revenge" that survivors chase, scarred and longing to heal from state abuse during calculated risk: of a palliative Numinous sort, "crushing" you with more weight! You'll know it when you feel it—when it has you begging to no one in particular, "Take me, Dark Mommy! 'Fill me from the crown to the toe top-full / Of direst cruelty!'" The eye of that angry god, like a falling moon, threatens to collide with your earth, and smash you to fragments. Black holes make everyone's pull-out weak! Spaghettification!

likenesses that, in the same shadow zone, highlight and scandalize Nazis and Communists; i.e., being seen as heretical, thus of nature/fallen and needing to be purged by blood libel disguised as pure reason, post-Reformation. Manmade things are valorized provided they are made by white, cis-het Christian-coded men. Anything else is abject, but also apologized for through an uncanny similarity to state forces. We come from a sample of one, so "darkness" and "corruption" is dogmatized, fearful of Jewish revenge—of Medusa coming home to roost, thus nature and servants as "black" to settler colonialism's lily whiteness. Their nadir is our zenith, our sex and their sex echoing in hostile duality.

The Protestant work ethic, per Cartesian thought, treats righteous labor as holy over anything antithetical to that; i.e., as paradoxically required to justify itself through witch hunts: God makes Lilith; she defies him and gives birth to demons, so God makes Eve out of one of Adam's ribs. But the maiden is overshadowed by the whore's dark "Jewish," Melmothian spectre—her evil magic galvanizing the witch hunts that follow. She's the castle, speaking to hammered witches, Jews eaten by lions, and queers put to death for refusing to have PIV sex, etc. Cryptonymy isn't just a dogwhistle, but a whistle for labor to blow through the same cartoons; e.g., by Shelley's Modern Prometheus taking creation (the fire of the gods) to demonize Victor Frankenstein through his work talking back: "giving lip," or "sass," as it were (more on this, in "Forbidden Sight," part two).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

If there's any transcendental signified, it's power and death, babes. So play with demons/torture porn to your hearts' content! Just remember that power, during ludo-Gothic BDSM, comes from control through informed consent, thus mutual exchange! "Hurt, not harm!" Always keep that in mind, but especially when you lose control or have dominion over those who don't; i.e., when giving consent, thus permission to go a little wild; e.g., saying to your play partner, "Now step on me, bitch! Fuck me like you mean it!" Safewords, release/passwords, restraint and discipline, pleasure and pain—all go hand-in-hand, built on trust/minimized risk.

The chaos, in other words, is controlled, ironic, and cathartic for both sides, and ultimately not destructive despite the power-and-death aesthetic; i.e., anyone can unironically destroy or play at dark godhood, but it takes a mighty hand and mightier mind to show mercy through demonic union tested! That's power—and ultimately the non-toxic kind that Gothic Communism is all about: finding the Communist Numinous through hauntological BDSM; i.e., establishing power through selective boundaries and limits where play is mutually established and understood! Rape, for all intents and purposes, is fetishization, hence power imbalance dressed as alien, potent; our Numinous dialectic "rapes" Medusa or has her "rape" you while the surf's up (an allusion to Joe Satriani's "Surfing with the Alien," 1987)! Chase the dragon, boys!

(artist: Kentaro Miura)

And if all that sounds intense (which, to be fair, it is), fear not! Strict or gentle, vanilla or chocolate, metal or mellow—as long as you have safety measures like these in place, then harm/rape is impossible; i.e., she's just hugging you: a winged, chimeric succubus letting you play with dark, forbidden things (the Medusa being the only Gorgon classically to have wings). Any articulation, as such, is entirely valid when going to the dark gods to break state monopolies with.

I think you'll like Slan, then, who haunts older stories that we'll examine in "Forbidden Sight," part two; i.e., the Cosmic Whore that is Gothic Communism, having the whore's dark Numinous revenge; e.g., Frankenstein and Alien's own horrors in clay. She's "easy" but strict—will take you to the edge and teach you wonderful things (re: fucking to metal, clapping her big demon cheeks; or having her string you up like a sacrifice). Limitless in shape, size and surface, she can be whatever she wants to be—whatever ghastly playground/dark church/demon brothel you desire when she's dominating you/giving you sub drop and/or draining your balls (e.g., the xenomorph or cenobite raising hell; i.e., to act between virtue and sin, and similar canonical dichotomies)! Whatever the shape, say hi to her, for me! —Perse

From New to Old: Concerning the Rest of the Module

While unsteadily "pregnant" with this saturated material, I pulled and manifested the entirety out of myself as a comprehensive stab at mapping and summarizing everything that I (once again) had to organize and refine over and over. I clearly want to document the process to you, the reader—to grant you an exhibitionist's idea of what it was like for me, a trans woman, to create as I have been taught and how I view it. Work isn't fun unless it's playful, I think; it should be fun, regardless of its importance (and this work—helping myself and other sex workers escape harmful bondage—I consider to be of the utmost importance) (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, Sex Positivity, Volume Zero (2023)

The rest of the module essentially comprises the Demon Module before I began expanding on it, in September 2024. This was a roundabout and chaotic process, engineered as much through deconstruction as accretion. Originally Volume Two was simply a shorter module about demons and the undead; then, it became part one, the Poetry Module, and part two, which divided in two sub-volumes/modules. In turn, each of those expanded and grew (especially with Harmony's contributions/inspiration through various shoots, below).

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

First in line, the Undead Module grew into my largest release, so far—over 400,000 words and 1,000 pages, when it released in September! By comparison, the Demon Module prior to September was only ~117,000 unique words and ~350 unique pages; not wanting to overlook demons or have such a lopsided second half to Volume Two, I started expanding the Demon Module. As of writing this, said module has roughly tripled in word length (~369,000) and more than doubled its page count (~934). Even so, this renaissance is nearing its end; i.e., the expansions outlined above concern the first half of the module, which I wrote from

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

scratch, September onwards: the module opening and the opening to "Forbidden Sight," followed by "Idle Hands."

The rest of the writing is from the original "Demons" manuscript; i.e., as it existed before September (though I have expanded a fair bit on the "Making Demons" subchapter). With the exception of "Giger's Xenomorph" and the module conclusion, the remaining writing is older but also looser and more abbreviated/fragmented. Partly this owes to its age, but also because much of what is being discussed here has already been discussed elsewhere in the series (excluding Faust, which isn't something I have discussed quite as much; i.e., I rely more on familiarity with the legend [and my BDSM theories] to carry you through).

Frankenstein, for example, is a novel I've discussed in every volume I've published. So whilst I would be completely remiss in not mentioning Shelley and her seminal (frankly awesomesauce) story in the pages ahead, my doing so will be far briefer than otherwise; i.e., in the unthinkable hypothetical that I had never written previously about Frankenstein, before; e.g., my extensive Metroidvania work (which we won't really be mentioning here to keep things moving).

(artist: Harmony Corrupted)

To it, the writing that remains will get some polish/renovations (and shoots with Harmony), but to nowhere near the same extent as "Idle Hands" did. There likewise won't be any additional thesis work, or nearly as much about ludo-Gothic BDSM (which I fleshed-out much more after the initial "Demons" manuscript was written); "Of Darkness and the Forbidden" already covers that, as does "A Cruel Angel's (Modular) Thesis." Instead, what follows are things I've chosen to include to be holistic and complete; i.e., in my compiling of demonic history as a poetic device linked to nature (with some undead elements scattered throughout). It remains writing for which I'm very proud, but it is shorter than I'd like (especially "Call of the Wild's" admittedly anemic survey²⁵⁶ approach). As stated in "A Paucity of Time," those constraints are currently beyond my control, but can hopefully be expanded on, at a later date.

²⁵⁶ Demons have infinite variety, infinite form; so does nature and demons of nature in a more animalistic class (versus those of Hell, presented as "extradimensional," "from the void" or otherwise "not of this Earth").

Forbidden Sight, part two: Making Demons (re: Prometheus)

The central puzzle of the law of the dead is that a corpse is both a person and a thing. A dead human body is a material object—a messy, maybe dangerous, perhaps valuable, often useful, and always tangible thing. But a dead human being is also something very different: It is also my father, and my friend, perhaps my child, and some day, me. For even the most secular among us, a human corpse is at the least a very peculiar and particular kind of thing. Scholars generally divide the law of the dead body into the three intertwined realms of defining, using, and disposing of the dead, and debates in each realm center on where and how to draw the line between person and object. The thing-ness of the dead human body is never stable or secure (source).

—Ellen Stroud, "Law and the Dead Body: Is a Corpse a Person or a Thing?" (2018)

"Forbidden Sight," part two is about making demons and starts with the most famous and productive example from Western canon critiquing capital: Mary Shelley and Frankenstein. It will explore her life and work, including its influence and me, but also the people it influenced before me who, in turn, had a lasting impact on my output; e.g., Ridley Scott and the Alien franchise, Cameron's Terminator movies, and more!

"Making Demons" divides in three basic parts:

- "Foreword: To Mary Shelley": Acknowledges Mary Shelley and why I think she's important, but also her profound impact on yours truly.
- "Fire of Unknown Origin': Composite Bodies, Golems and Mad Science; or the Roots of Enlightenment Persecution in the Promethean Quest \(feat. Mary Shelley, Frankenstein, and Ridley Scott\)": Lays out Mary Shelley's life, but also her lasting impact on science fiction; i.e., as the genre she single-handedly birthed, combining Gothic fantasies and early modern ideas of the scientific method to critique capital with, which others imitated (and not always in good faith); e.g., through Ridley Scott as a director whose body of work we've previously examined, and whose problematic elements we shall dissect here, with Prometheus and Alien: Covenant (no Metroidvania, this time).
- "Afterword: A Further Note on Angry Gods \(and Playing with Them; feat. Cuwu\)": Wraps up my thoughts on Mary Shelley and her importance, but also the value in making and playing with monstrous gods (demons or otherwise) before segueing into "Summoning Demons."

Our main focus, here, is questing for power in ways that open our minds to the idea of loving those the state calls "monster" (nature as monstrous-feminine). This is a complicated and difficult history but one whose most productive elements, I feel, started with Shelley (not Milton). So that is where we shall start!

Foreword: To Mary Shelley

[W]hat does the overabundant presence of "birth trauma" in the novel signify? I believe the answer lies in the complex relationship between Victor and the Creature, in which there are copious parallels. The Creature's mate is also its sister and is made from Victor who is the Creature's mother. Victor is Elizabeth's mate and her brother. Victor destroys the mate and the Creature destroys Elizabeth. Still, once Elizabeth is dead, the Creature keeps Victor alive to experience the world as the monster sees it, in order to feel its pain. It wants him to understand his own failures as a parent, and to see that the Creature is human and feels the same pain and wants that Victor feels (source).

—Persephone van der Waard, "Frankenstein essay—Born to Fall? Birth Trauma, the Soul, and Der Maschinenmensch" (2014)

...And right off the bat, here I am breaking my own rule! I got about ten pages into "Making Demons" and—having just compiled my 2025 Metroidvania Corpus—suddenly realized how influential Mary Shelley was on my own work. I didn't read Frankenstein until college, but nonetheless was haunted by its shadow vis-à-vis Metroidvania (which I played tons of, and which informed my work well into the present; i.e., I watched Alien when I was nine and played Super Metroid when I was eight, both introduced to me—as well as British Romantic poetry—by *my mother*²⁵⁷). Monsters and mothers are part-in-parcel, along a Great Chain of Dark Creation. Without Shelley and her Gothic masterpiece, there would be no At the Mountains of Madness, thus no Alien, Metroid, or Metroidvania, thus no Persephone van der Waard or Gothic Communism! Perish the thought!

(artist: Yasya)

I wanted to bookend that, starting with this foreword (and an afterword, after "Making Demons"). Simply put, Shelley was a whore who gave birth to demons, and the world as we know it (myself included) would not exist without those demons. She is our dark mother—a ghoulish succubus camping the canon to outshine her overrated husband and so many others, one-upping Milton's camp in the process. In doing so, she profaned an entire sacred order (the secularized Christendom of the Enlightenment) to camp the canon; i.e., in ways that lived on, long after she died!

But what exactly lived on, and where did it start from? Beginning suitably en medias res (re: Milton), Shelley's moral about the indiscretions of nature and technology manipulating nature isn't how technology is intrinsically "bad." Technology is a powerful device, and in all its forms and fusions, help us do incredible things; e.g., neonatal medicine keeping my ass alive when I was born premature (after a cesarean, which, as the name would suggest, dates back to Caesar), but also computers (with me struggling to imagine how I could have written and published over two million words, thousands of images, and hundreds of exhibits—and all of these featuring thousands of artists, including dozens of models and muses—without technology helping me do the otherwise impossible).

²⁵⁷ Undoubtedly as Mary Shelley's parents and superiors introduced her to different works—namely her father at first (since her mother died eleven days after Shelley [then Wollstonecraft] was born), but later by Percy Shelley and Thomas Hogg passing Paradise Lost along to her as my mother once showed me Black Sabbath: "Like, check this out, man! It's totally rad!"

Instead, Shelley's takeaway was that technology can be abused, and needs to be de-automated away from profit; i.e., from modernity to postmodernity towards post-scarcity using hauntological pre-capitalist language: stolen back from the gods of the state by the gods they're abusing! This includes sex, drugs and rock 'n roll, borrowed from Ovid, Dante, Shakespeare, and Milton, which Shelley turned into a unique combination: a common thread of women in a man's world being, at best, underappreciated and ignored, and at worst, treated as unwelcome outsiders and thieves to fetishize; i.e., when they try to show that a woman—little more than a piece of ass, in status-quo men's eyes—can both fuck, have a brain, and go on to comment dialectically on the towering midden of all our yesterdays (the Apollo missions being little more than Space-Race rocket-riding by the United States looking to colonize space: "We choose to go to the moon because we can")!

Stacked in more ways than one!

(source: Maia Weinstock's "Margaret Hamilton's Apollo Code," 2016)

In canonical circles, such things are often buried, then trotted out like show ponies/witches²⁵⁸ for state aims fetishizing and demonizing female scientists (a STEM tradition that extends to anything monstrous-feminine, not just white cis women, but one begot out of nuns and female detectives). So was Shelley—in writing the first science fiction novel—breaking new ground her usual jailors would immediately try to reign in.

Oddly enough, the idea of theft wasn't even new in Shelley's novel, but its application was; i.e., "The Modern Prometheus" concerning state parties stealing from nature to rape it while valorizing themselves, and state victims challenging them in duality while standing in/playing with the same messy goop: possessing the state armor to cockblock its maker's continuation (something of a dark desire); i.e., a voice of the victims of the Capitalocene, versus Hamlet's fathers ghost or Prospero's spirit, Ariel, enslaved to do his bidding/seek his revenge). Shelley showed us how power is just something to exchange back and forth over time, only ever becoming a question of "theft" when privatized.

²⁵⁸ Venkman's snide "No human would stack books like this" comment leaping to mind when seeing Hamilton's photo (with "Margaret Hamilton" also being the name of the actress who played the wicked witch in The Wizard of Oz, 1939). So often, intelligent women are celebrated and feared as aberrations to cage and kettle by male pimps with virgin/whore syndrome. And, in both Hamilton's cases, they so often tokenize!

At its most basic, capital reduces "creation" to people who give birth (of any sort), which it then tries to pimp for profit; i.e., hauntologized and binarized per the West and its Amazonomachia/ancient canonical codes (re: Creed and Foucault). But per my work, the monstrous-feminine had extended to a wider group of workers the state was tokenizing through a Venn diagram of persecution networks and language; e.g., of women from Shelley's mother's generation, like Ann Radcliffe. So Shelley expanded her arguments to speak to a theft of reclamation back for all workers by castrating their most famous maxims and turning them into death on two legs: by doubling them, mid-liminal expression. Creed argues how Medusa is the Archaic Mother castrating men, and I'd be hard-pressed not to agree that Frankenstein's monster is—at its most basic—a black mirror/Aegis showing "clones of Napoleon" (the original who weaponized science for his own gain)—the Numinous error of his ways: "Before it, my genius is rebuked!" he cries, then melts down/throws a tantrum (of sorts, below). Girls have cooties; let us disabuse you of that notion!

These are frankly difficult practices to conceptualize if you've never done them before ("nothing ventured, nothing gained"); e.g., I'm trans, but was in the closet for much of my life, yet creating while inside said egg to eventually hatch from it.

Shelley, on the other hand, had already given birth and eloped with a womanizing atheist with big ideas; but she took those ideas—and wedded to her personal tragedies and grief—revived the miscarriage of past attempts into a holistic statement of creation useful to all critics of capital, past and present! Making babies became monsters inside/outside her womb—androgynous like Medusa, but commenting on Zeus and Metis, as well (and many other mythic elements; re: Prometheus, Milton, etc).

Like sex in general, it was a combination of "right place, right time," animate/inanimate, and playing-with-fire/lightning-in-a-bottle trial and error to camp/reclaim what was already becoming canonized anew under a Protestant ethic. Hindsight 20/20; whereas Weber debated Marx's ghost with the Spirit of Capitalism and Shelley debated Milton's with Frankenstein to haunt Marx' dreams (and his own love for ghosts), my work in Sex Positivity has camped all of them to realize, at this pivotal moment, just how precocious and advanced Shelley's ideas were! Not bad for a sixteen-year-old runaway who whored her way into vaults of knowledge normally denied to women (she took more than her share, versus submitting obediently to men of authority—with someone like Altaira, left only being allowed to pick who she gets to fuck²⁵⁹)! Props, girl!

(source)

To this, Frankenstein was indisputably conceived out wedlock. Following the Cartesian Revolution, the bourgeoisie were already gestating in Europe and America. Being a rebel and a woman, Shelley understood that you have to combine things and messily in order to create radical change. Taking the risks that she actually took, Shelley gave birth to ideas of universal liberation by stealing from the past; i.e., beating the father of Communism to the punch by conceiving of a proto-Marxist ideal before Marx was even born, then giving birth to her novel the same year he entered the world: as a mockery of Napoleon and other great men of history while warning about the privatization of technology as a matter of theatre and theft the state will try to monopolize. "All the traditions of dead generations," specifically men, Shelley applied to manmade monsters subject to her critique through creation: her own sexy beast oddly enough made by a woman, and which everyone—Marx included—promptly forgot about and tried to eclipse in favor of themselves.

So they did, after Shelley came and went, but remained an indelible palimpsest on the minds of men; e.g., men like Poe, Conrad, Lovecraft, Freud, Kafka, Scott and Cameron—but also the bastardized, killed-over-time metaphors of glass wombs, the "franken" prefix, golems and machine people, paradox and oxymoron, ambiguous sex toys and psychosexual, martyred hyphenations of sex and force (thus indiscretions of adult/child, the organic and inorganic²⁶⁰ and artificial²⁶¹ intelligence).

²⁵⁹ Wow, so lucky! Let's face it, Altaira probably fucked around with Robby the Robot a bit (the young horny teenager riding the bed post or the cucumber in the fridge).

²⁶⁰ Bubble's "meat hair" from The Powerpuff Girls 1995 pilot:

(source)

²⁶¹ "Computers are dumb; they only know what you tell them." People are a lot closer to computers than many care to admit; they're certainly not immune to childhood indoctrination's fear and dogma!

In turn, our straight male (usually white) matchmakers wedded this hellish, blinding jumble of oddities to all-around body horror/decay and mad science, insect politics, star-crossed monster love, radical transformation (from Ovid to Kafka to Giger to Cronenberg), ethnocentric knife-dick/BBC, wandering womb (ancient psychology and medicine haunting modern equivalents; e.g., hysteria and bicycle face) and monster mothers²⁶²: what they used for profit, first and foremost; i.e., requiring those concerned with poetry and revolution to play with such things as Shelley did again, hence re-liberate them (from state torture) using the same throbbing pulpy mass ("the new flesh," in Cronenberg's words)! If Shelley's book composed and made popular that unique set of mutations, women like Beauvoir, Kristeva and Creed built on it, followed by little-ol' me camping the lot of them. Out of all of them, Shelley holds up the best as an interesting and good-hearted person (though Kristeva and Creed's ideas remain incredibly useful, and frankly I don't much know [or care] if they were sluts or not).

Power and death seriously and unalterably change you; and this can be into things we no longer recognize in ourselves or others (and though I'll critique Percy in the pages ahead, I honestly think Mary loved Percy—not for his flaws or genius alone, but as two sides of the same coin, and which with any pairing sometimes put them and us at risk while forgetting who they are: the insect who dreamt he was a man who loved it, and saying to his mate, "I'll hurt you if you stay!" Percy reached for greatness, and that rubbed off onto Mary as we shall see).

So, too, is nature wholly abject; we can reverse that but rock its signature aesthetic of power and death—doing so to help ourselves reverse what otherwise never can be: by trusting the insect (the queer insect generally being seen as a Communist metaphor before, during and after the arrival of AIDS). Take it from me, it's never too late to find someone who will love you to the ends of the Earth and beyond—someone who challenges you and you them! Such has been my Promethean Quest, and one upon repeated reflection, I now gladly pass along to you! We're becoming Brundle-fly! Won't you join us?

To it, Frankenstein's deluge of copycats and admirers often take the original author and her unparalleled genius for granted: immediately recognizable in any story that imitates it, each variation feels somehow special and unique, yet part of a larger whole (except for maybe Kenneth Branagh's dubious remake). While I could easily shower Frankenstein with repeatedly bombastic and gushing effusions—e.g., "Shelley's novel is the greatest work of the English language (which it arguably is)" or some such unquantifiable claim—the proof, here, is in the pudding. And this pudding is easy enough to appreciate in the person who made it—only a woman, but "great God!" what a woman she was! She puts the "semen" in seminal, the pussy on the chainwax! What I wouldn't do to pick her brain (and poke her hole)!

²⁶² The xenomorph combining of all of these things to take on fresh life.

This dedication is written to Shelley being someone I instantly identified with, upon discovering. I found her documents in my own dark forest, originally writing "Born to Fall" (from the epigram) as my first serious attempt back at school (my "first love" while returning from a seven-year hiatus). I eventually set aside Otto Rank and Freud to focus on Barbara Creed through a dialectical-material lens instead of a psychoanalytical one, but the idea of "birth trauma" is still there. It lives on through Shelley as my role model above all others; i.e., camping Cartesian thought (synonymous with heteronormativity and settler colonialism) in ways only someone so profoundly anomalous as Mary Shelley could have.

When you look at Gothic stories, you're staring into a past moment reaching towards future greatness, inspiring you to do the same! In turn, game recognizes game, and weird attracts weird; all the people I've fucked and learned from, oddly enough, stem from Shelley's inextricable hold on my young woman's slutty soul: breaking the glass ceiling that women can't fuck, do science, or fuck and do science outside of strictly non-fictional spheres (women are queens of multitasking because the state and its burden of care forces them to be). "Yeah, nerd! Flux my capacitor! Make it squirt!"

Gothic Communism is biomechanical/obsessed with bio-power (re: Foucault's five-dollar word for teamwork and mass exploitation, but also labor value); i.e., electrified and operatic, it ain't over 'til the fat lady sings, but whose Song of Infinity challenges the state ever and always: taking her peachy cake and pie back from bourgeois knives! "Let me cut your cake with my knife!" (AC/DC's "Let Me Put My Love into You," 1980). In turn, naked desire and bold exploration are vital to new exciting growth—least of all because they threaten pain and things that do not last, by themselves, but when boldly combined can yield fresh synthesis that passes vital information onwards: life takes many forms, including technology and social-sexual relations playing a vital role!

(artist: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

Nothing is sacred save universal liberation; Shelley took her trauma/arguable mistakes and turned them into a weapon ripe for class war—one whose endlessly productive, mimetic and lubricative counterterror the state, no matter how hard it tries, could never fully pimp; i.e., while raping nature as monstrous-feminine, nature fucks back. This, unto itself, was slutty and cool, which is all you really need when imitating something (re: everyone loves the whore/monsters, especially smart sexy monsters). It didn't hurt, though, that Shelley was a complete-and-total badass, on top of it all...

Out of respect, then, I have added some footnotes in "Making Demons" that shine a light on Shelley's adventuresome life. Far from discouraging others to do the same, she inspired me (though I didn't realize it at the time); i.e., to go out and have my own Promethean Quest (for the palliative Numinous), well after I had thought myself forever "stuck." I read Frankenstein in 2014, only to have my first relationship in 2015; by 2017, I was on my way to England to have my own adventures overseas! My whoring became a globetrotting affair, "wet docking"²⁶³ in any port that fancied me (re: Cuwu, above).

The rest, as they say, is history. That's what we're sailing into—mine and Shelley's bound at the hip. Any port in a storm! Full mast, ye hearties! We sail into the unknown, seeking dark, unequal, and forbidden exchange (of power and knowledge) during the dialectic of shelter and the alien; i.e., while facing Capitalism's dead past staring us in the face ("Tell me your secrets, dark one! What? You're my next-door neighbor?")! What's that, up on Mount Blanc? Medusa? Rogue technology like a shoggoth, xenomorph or terminator? An angry teenager than soaks up information like a sponge, good or bad? Paradise Lost? Maybe all of them? Whatever it is and however it imbricates per mutation playing with dead things, it's alive!

(artist: Bernie Wrightson²⁶⁴; source: "Wrightson's Frankenstein at 40," 2023)

²⁶³ Scott's matelotage from Alien borrowed, first, from Frankenstein—with Cuwu and I making love not completely dissimilar to Percy and Shelley, over two centuries prior! Some people bloom early, others late. Better late than never!

²⁶⁴ If Gustav Dore were a comic book artist.

"Fire of Unknown Origin": Composite Bodies, Golems and Mad Science; or the Roots of Enlightenment Persecution in the Promethean Quest (feat. Mary Shelley, Frankenstein and Ridley Scott)

"I don't know what's in there, but it's weird and pissed off, whatever it is!"

—Clark, The Thing (1982)

*Editor's Note: Demon sex is often torture sex/torture-themed. And while I don't normally show hardcore rape scenes in this book series, I will here; i.e., to subvert the Pygmalion myth/Shadow of Pygmalion during the Promethean Quest. Excluding Scott's hardcore gore as bestiality and rape porn of a kind, this section has one example of unironic rape: Yasuomi Umetsu's 1998 animated cyberpunk noir, Kite (exhibit 44b1). —Perse*

(artist: Henry Fuseli)

"Forbidden Sight," part one largely considered the revenge of whores treated as demonic by the state during blood libel monopolies and refrains (witches/Amazons, vampires and goblins); there's still the history of making and summoning them. Part two and three shall examine whores a bit more, but predominantly considers demons at large; i.e., part two, as beings not to summon, but make during the Promethean Quest per Shelley's Frankenstein (and similar stories), and part three with the summoning process as magical, runic. Keeping with our demon thesis, knowledge is power and vice versa; the Promethean Quest trades knowledge for power in some shape or form. In turn, longevity and weapons are the most common trades, classically leading to premature death due to human failing: power of the gods being closed off for man's hubris, daring to play god (re: mad science) and scapegoating manmade victims instead of themselves (re: DARVO).

Love it or hate it, then, demons are fast and loose in terms of the exact social-psychosexual knowledge oozing out of them²⁶⁵. This includes the aesthetic of power and death they fall back on, or the bratty games they might play ("Don't talk to me like that... except sometimes!" E.g., Kim Petras' "Treat Me Like a Slut," 2022). Yet they define rather sharply by torture and rape per the whore's paradox; i.e., homewreckers-valuing-consent turning the nuclear model upside-down, acting unto the passionate, martyred, paradoxically sinful/sacred search for fatal knowledge (re: Radcliffe's demon lover) and having been in the West since before Shelley revived the Promethean myth!

²⁶⁵ E.g., the reality that cum doesn't stay in the vagina after sex, leaking out onto the bed, down one's leg or into one's panties, etc. These ideas are heavily dogmatized, which only makes camping them all the more fun and easy!

- Whores, and the Iconoclastic Idea of Making Demons
- Shelley's Temerity: Vengeful Golems and Campy Whores in Frankenstein
- Echoes of the Enlightenment and Sanitizing Shelley through Ridley Scott's Complicit Cryptonymy \(feat., Prometheus and Alien: Covenant\)
- Cryptomimesis through Demonic Camp and Rape Play \(feat. Kite\)
- Gothic Hermeneutics \(a reprise\)
- Some Broader Points on Shelley's Promethean Quest \(for Fatal Knowledge\)

Whores, and the Iconoclastic Idea of Making Demons

We'll get to Shelley's golem (and its normalizing of subversion) in a moment. I'd like to examine whores for a bit (thirteen pages) vis-à-vis the notion of making demons. Male whores exist, and trans/disabled people are often homeless in ways that force them into sex work, but cis female sex work is commonly demonized under the Western umbrella²⁶⁶; re: nature-as-monstrous-feminine, which includes AMAB sex workers treated in feminine ways (as slaves). Regardless of class, race, religion, gender or sex, demon bodies are plastic and infinite, establishing power through play in ways that threaten an immortal soul with mortal "failings"; i.e., sex as a drug to sell: as pieces of ass yoked by unscrupulous, greedy pimps unable to keep their hands to themselves (or their dicks in their pants).

Alive/dead, madness/reason, virgin/whore, naked/clothed, tight/loose, hard/soft, dom/sub, black/white, etc—such things commonly hyphenate under paradoxical duress. Per ludo-Gothic BDSM, knowledge is power amid play fostering mutual consent in defiance of capital! Everyone loves the psycho space slut who loves to fuck/simps for Satan, and in that perfect world where she can tease and be herself, she loves it, too! The flesh isn't "weak" or faking anything (orgasm or smile); it's vibing (the throbbing pulse of a happy clit)!

Sluts are, like demons, things to make and summon alike. This happens through playing with demonic things; i.e., unequal power and its forbidden exchange/dark desire; e.g., metal, our bodies, excessive eating, etc—to be silly and make washing-machine sounds ("uh-uh-uh-uh") while fucking to metal. Whores are the metal, the life of the party livening things up by undressing ourselves (figuratively or literally, next page) and crossing boundaries!

Everyone loves sluts, but so often they are abused; we dungeon keepers speak up/to our abuse as sluts—i.e., in ways that encourage better treatment through Satanic stories of "mistreatment/panic" haunted by the real deal! Singing and dancing feel good unto themselves—doubly so if they camp our harm by putting it in quotes; re: activism per Gothic Communism and ludo-Gothic BDSM: liberating sex work through iconoclastic art, pushing not for the legalization of sex work, but the complete and total decriminalization of it. Whores, in our hands and minds, aren't controlled opposition or criminal; they're activism, politics and survival through a holistic and inclusive pedagogy of the oppressed! Not homewreckers, but defenders of their homes, they project nature-as-alien/monstrous-feminine from the state antagonizing the homeless, the vermin, the fallen! So do we spellbind those who would kill us, humanizing our sluttiness/non-nuclear polyamory in their eyes.

²⁶⁶ I.e., women's work. Western society is built around straight men and their actions. Whereas gay men could historically fall back on this, women were put into a corner and forced to do one thing: sex. They became defined by it, similar to making Jews count/lend money through the practice of usury. In turn, their subsequent demonization tracked along these pathways. It's literally blaming the help.

In turn, we promote a possible world—one where fucking on the first date not only isn't frowned upon, but celebrated! Fucking is learning and learning should be fun! Love to fuck; hurt, not harm, babes! Court courtly love (and demon lovers, matadors, banditti, etc), but in jest, through camp putting "rape" in quotes during the whore's paradox! "Lady Evil! She's queen of the night!" (Black Sabbath, 1980); she backs it up onto your dick during White Zombie's "Thunder Kiss '65" (1996)! Rock 'n roll, operas and metal don't just routinely sing about us/pimp us out as the slutty girls next door per the Gothic mode; they're our siren song! Our jam! Whores aren't just hot and badass, you see, but cool as fuck; in the right hands, they like to be used like dolls (sex, killer and/or otherwise)!

(artist: Valentina)

So whereas "Idle Hands" concerned general things to keep in mind about demons and how they operate as whore-like poetic devices, "Making Demons" will shift towards the making of demons at large being whore-like; re: by starting with Mary Shelley's classic example as the ur-whore; i.e., the Promethean Quest and its composite bodies, golems and mad science equaling the state's abusing of the fire of the gods through Gothic poetics, and said fire fighting back during the technological singularity! Eloping with Percy (though probably fucking after the first date), Mercy Wollstonecraft became Mary Shelley and entered a wild new chapter of her life.

As such, creativity towards sex and gender (violence, terror and morphological expression) is a weapon of forbidden knowledge the state abuses, mid-poetics; i.e., to enslave nature-as-alien under a police function, which the elite own full exclusivity towards: rape and total, lopsided power games/exchange through bad BDSM, blaming the whore (from Mother Nature to local street workers) for their own rape. Acting the whore without the pimp, Shelley camped all of this, using a wide variety of poetic devices to do so! The two cannot be separated, so instead I will jump back and forth between Shelley's life and her famous book.

In keeping with Jewish myth, Prometheus and the Pygmalion tale, Victor makes the Creature out of the Earth as already owned—according to Victor—by Victor and "his kind" (white straight male Europeans); he makes his child out of clay as God does, but sees it as "dark" because the process and materials are dark. He subsequently tries to enslave it, then resents it for resisting him; i.e., as something to reject and ultimately pimp by upholding the status quo through lies and force. So is descriptive sexuality crucified by Cartesian agents with virgin/whore syndrome: constantly on the lookout, trolling the street for demons to dominate ("demon" goes both ways, as zombies do, inside the state of exception).

In short, Victor and similar men of reason (e.g., Peter Weyland, left) adopt an air of false benevolence, trying all the while to monopolize the whore as pimps do; i.e., by unironically framing nature as "dark," meaning a whore of darkness to pimp out, under a Protestant ethic: after God is dead, because men are making whores to pimp in His much-touted absence. Except, per the Protestant ethic, the Capitalocene merely pimps nature under a secularized Christendom, one making nature dead and monstrous-feminine to suit the needs of capital; i.e., the Medusa to fashion and rape, regardless of the simulacrum's sex, gender, race or temperament (God classically replacing Lilith with Eve, the virgin versus the whore). Man's revenge against nature remains constant, a false parent brutalizing their illegitimate children like a father his bastard.

Furthermore, trauma lingers on the clay, or things treated as "clay"; i.e., "dark," malleable; e.g., flesh—especially flesh with "non-white" qualities (color or size): as data storage, with fucking just another means of passing data along during generational trauma's rememory process. To look on the whore or its forbidden testimony (during genocide) is like watching Medusa, thus risking "corruption"; i.e., in ways white fragility cannot handle. It presents communication as copulation for those purposes: communicating abject corruption in reverse, during the cryptonymy process; i.e., as something that writes in both directions.

As something to make and behold in equal measure, information becomes a weapon the state will try to monopolize through its most famous forms (with few stories being as famous as Frankenstein): a slut to rape, but also slave to beat and behead after seemingly being "made"; i.e., by the poet; e.g., Victor playing god/white master over the robata (slave) by insisting as the slave-owner does to his assigned underling: "I made you; I am your master (therefore your pimp)!"

Except, Victor is the master of a demon (which would make him Satan, by his own logic), yet believes he is good, thus appalled by his desire to act the tyrant... which he promptly projects onto his naturalized slave, who he calls treats as "demon" (the duality pegging Victor as Lilith/the necromancer by the Creature calling him slave²⁶⁷). Victor, then, sees nature as alien, twisted and broken to serve profit by hijacking the creation process as "demonic" and queer-coded: "It's alive!"

²⁶⁷ Shelley's Frankenstein is deeply aware of Paradise Lost, which the British Romantics (especially the second generation, which grew up in the ruins of the French Revolution) deeply adored as a whole; i.e., on the side of Satan as a revolutionary figure who remains a demon all the same; re, Nafi:

(artist: Gustave Doré)

According to [Tesky] Gordon, it was Blake who expressed this view most emphatically by saying that Milton was of the devil's party without knowing it. He expressed this opinion chiefly in relation to the portrayal of Satan who, according to him, has been depicted as a character possessing certain grand qualities worthy of the highest admiration. Other romantic critics supported this view with great enthusiasm. [Percy] Shelley, for instance, reinforced this view when, in his "Defense of Poetry," he said:

"Nothing can exceed the energy and magnificence of the character of Satan as expressed in Paradise Lost. It is a mistake to suppose that he could ever have been intended for the popular personification of evil. Milton's Devil as a moral being is as far superior to God, as one who perseveres in some purpose which he has conceived to be excellent in spite of adversity and torture, is to one who in the cold security of undoubted triumph inflicts the most horrible revenge upon his enemy."

According to Shelley, it was a mistake to think that Satan was intended by Milton as the popular personification of evil. This argument is still very much alive and valid today (source: "Milton's Portrayal of Satan in Paradise Lost and the Notion of Heroism," 2015).

More to the point, Percy oversaw Mary's writing of Frankenstein, and while she obviously wrote the novel (only releasing it in her own name on the third edition after Percy's death—1831 and 1822, respectively), his influence over the work is clear.

Booted from school for being an outspoken atheist (see: footnote to "A Defence of Poetry," 1840)—and married young to a woman named Harriet (who Percy eventually cuckolded for Mary, herself five years his junior)—Percy was, to say the least, a bit of a man-whore and thoroughly entitled brat. At the age of twenty-one, he decided to elope for a second time, doing so with William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft's now-famous daughter (the latter parent having died eleven days after giving birth to her child of the same name):

Mary is only 16, and she is running away with Percy Bysshe Shelley, a man five years her senior who is not merely already married but the father of a young child [...] Mary's stepmother does indeed catch up with the runaways in Calais. But by then it's too late: Mary has been publicly "ruined," because she has passed that all-important (though as it happens entirely un-sexual, storm-tossed) night with Percy and because, arriving in another country and registering with him at a hotel there, she has definitively eloped. Percy, who has form in eloping with 16-year-olds—his wife, Harriet, was the same age when he ran off with her—must understand this, at least, perfectly well. Whatever happens next between him and Mary, he has ensured that there's no way back for her into ordinary society. He truly has snared her (source: Fiona Sampson's "The Treacherous Start to Mary and Percy Shelley's Marriage," 2018).

Simply put, things were visibly less equal in those days ("visibly" being the key word, there)—with Mr. Shelley putting Mrs. Shelley at a profound disadvantage through his rebellious sense of entitlement (self-prioritizing himself at his wife's expense, as Sampson tells it). But he also gambled with his own reputation, putting them both out: Harriet committed suicide in 1816 (she was twenty-one), and the two crazy kids tied the knot the same year Napoleon lost at Waterloo.

(artist: Samuel Stump)

All this being said, Godwin was an anarchist and Wollstonecraft a woman's rights activist, and their wayward daughter marched to the beat of her own drum. In 1816, she and Percy kicked it with Lord Byron at a castle in Geneva; Mary wrote Frankenstein two years later, and four years after that, Percy was drowned at sea. Mary would survive him to raise their only surviving child, dying herself from a brain tumor in 1851. She would be overshadowed by her own novel and Percy's mark on her life (including his surname), her own stories largely forgotten until far more recent times; e.g., The Last Man (1826) being an early example—if not the first example—of postapocalyptic fiction. Indeed, Mary's Frankenstein is arguably the first science fiction novel, period, combining fantasy and the Gothic in ways that spoke to a world increasingly dissected and destroyed by the scientific method: the Industrial Revolution only leading to a rise of slave labor inside nation-states chasing profit.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

So is science (and the ghost of the counterfeit) a giant gaslight during the abjection process corrupting clay (or anything else it can make things with)—i.e., in service to capital for all time! Wronged, the victim (nature) reaches through the making of its own enslavement to torment the sculptor with demonic apocalypse! "You 'made' me, and I seek revenge!" Thus is history both true and false, virgin and whore; i.e., the whore's paradox and revenge sitting between what is and what threatens to become in a variety of ways the state will deny through controlled opposition.

(artist: Daniel Eching)

In turn, we whores are lowlifes who repeatedly have run-ins with state abuse and lies, thus can camp their criminalizing of us on our Aegis; i.e., trapping state imbeciles in the room with us and our dark horny voices. Psycho sluts from beyond, we can be whatever we want, say whatever we wish to challenge state forces abjecting and pimping us (as cops do, defending property as a territorial arrangement of power that punishes whores, chattelizing and medicalizing them; e.g., hysteria and lunacy)! No gods, no kings, no masters! We destroy their busses greatly and with panache! Naked, we armor and shrink their scared junk; i.e., with our demonic sex's ungovernable violence, terror and morphology! So does Shelley torment Victor for playing with dead things, exposing him as the tyrant punching down, mid-séance (more on this, in a moment)!

Endless ways to present and perform power and knowledge, the brothel is our classroom: a place to teach and pray by making hot, naughty demon love! Whatever the type, it hurts so good (acquiring power through "rape," per the whore's paradox). Victims of systemic trauma, whores recognize and respond to trauma as something they relate to; i.e., to communicate through sex, speaking operatically to the kinds of trauma state monopolies, trifectas and qualities of capital cause; re: capital sexualizes and alienates²⁶⁸ everything pursuant to profit.

²⁶⁸ Alienation is generally inverted, with women being deprived of house and home, and men being deprived of sex. Attraction is bound to occur but we need to guide and ensure it serves workers' needs, not capital. And in doing so, we can sometimes call those to our sides who are seemingly out of our league; i.e., "I was called here by humans, who wished to pay me tribute!" Gods need worshippers and worshippers need gods; e.g., Nyx (next page) being a dummy-thicc thigh queen and all-around sweetie!. Again, consent is sexy and it and safety can summon friends more than brute

Safety, for us, is "danger" in quotes; i.e., we're not immune to pain, but do use it to subvert state power as demons do; re: "We camp canon because we must!"

Pain, then, is an acquired taste, one that defines whores and, by extension, demons made by state proponents shaping them like clay outside the womb. Trauma lives in us in ways we can't control; externalizing it through rules informed by us, we find our power once again (the power fantasy being survival in the face of perceived danger—of being stalked, groomed, owned and killed unironically by strength (though himbos/herbos are fine, of course)! Generational trust and community vibes become how we communicate! Ideally, it's a win-win, helping everyone fit in/feel welcome, safe and loved!

(artist: Nyx)

As Nyx and I show—or Mary and Percy—the winning ingredients are teamwork, but also holism per intersectional solidarity. Nyx reached out and asked me to draw them; I finished their drawing on July 18th, 2022; I started my book series four days later, and came out as trans a couple weeks after that. Like Mary, Nyx taught me to sing to the gods and nature and feel safe in myself. Indeed, we Gothic Communists all sing to some extent: to return to choruses that, while resurrecting sleeping things, never quite existed before; i.e., pre-capitalist ideas and themes applied to a post-scarcity mindset!

This includes Nyx' love for nature with my own, and new ideas simply being a more proletarian approach to ourselves, animals and the environment as things to reunite with; i.e., borrowed from the past, including Shelley's imaginary space and time. It's hauntological, pushing towards harmony with each other and the world between us, then and now! Nature as monstrous-feminine—as fat, sassy and welcoming—Nyx throws her weight around, mooning us with that lunar-sized ass in pure, unadulterated joy! Full-moon booty makes us howl! Her Aegis is unmatched! Mammoth, gargantuan—a thing of beauty, an embarrassment of riches to savor, crave and adore!

And while we shouldn't judge a book by its cover (and small booties are fine), I like to think Shelley's booty was just as portentous as her novel's legacy was. Between all of us (and on our shared Aegis), Medusa lives on!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

creeps, versus paradoxically "in Hell"; i.e., as a kind of play that empowers through

"disempowerment"): the appearance of massive darkness expressed in "non-white" bodies routinely reaped by the state; e.g., Medusa's fat, juicy ass and tight, darkness-filled asshole turning the world order (old or new) upside down as a kind of cryptonymic vanishing point—for weird canonical nerds abusing nature through their wives and children onto other workers: "Uwu! Don't look! See no evil!"

(artist: Nyx)

Often this includes advertising that we are sluts and proud of it (similar to "we're here and we're queer"); e.g., Kim Petras (next page) lauding her delicious "Coconuts" (2022) or saying "Treat Me Like a Slut" (2022) in a sex-positive way! These aren't "deep" songs, but on their demonic surfaces advertise the treatment of sluts (thus demons) not as criminals, but heroes and goddesses to worship (and "pets" to spoil, in ironic²⁶⁹ animal language). Indeed, it's a celebration of the very things the state wants to control, liberated from the state in spirit! Some like it hot; workers must realize sex-positive demonization—i.e., as it exists in duality during liminal expression!

²⁶⁹ Honorifics and terms of endearment/pet language are acceptable on a case-by-case basis/depend entirely on context; e.g., insults, like "asshole," versus commands or instructions with a disparaging flavor that are simply a role to play or hole to fill: "Fuck my asshole, asshole!" demanding the giver ring "the devil's doorbell" of the recipient (with butt plugs sometimes called "Satan's pacifier," denoting the ass and sodomy as a site of forbidden carnal knowledge). The same goes for positive-sounding language; e.g., I'm a trans woman, so calling people "honey" or "girl" (outside of TERF circles) is more acceptable from me than a cis-het man (the latter historically using such language to possess and treat kept women like dogs, be they wives or mistresses). We'll examine pet language, grooming and collars more, in "Call of the Wild."

(artist: Kim Petras)

Concerning monopolies, I've already said they're impossible. In part, the weapon is anisotropic, and Shelley will highlight this for us in her famous frame story when critiquing the state through black magic tropes (specifically that of the golem): she being the necromancer that pulls our Pygmalion's strings to shame him through Victor (a parody of the Byronic hero²⁷⁰): his power is false. To ²⁷⁰ In part, this was based on Shelley's own friend circle as being somewhat larger than life, but also plugged into the then-dying Neo-Gothic tradition that Shelley single-handedly revitalized:

The Byronic Hero is a gloomy, brilliant antihero. Mary Shelley's friend Lord Byron is the most famous model for the figure in his day (unless it was Napoleon); Victor Frankenstein is perhaps the most famous iteration in our own time (unless it's Batman). The figure is embodied in Gothic villains from Manfred in The Castle of Otranto (1764) forward to Byron's own play, Manfred (1817), and beyond. Sublime in his far-darting intellect and willed achievement, the figure appears in many of Byron's extremely popular narrative poems, such as Don Juan (1818-1824) or "The Corsair" (1814). Drawing directly on contradictions in the original source—Lord Byron himself—both Victor and the Creature are Byronic Heroes, making Shelley's novel a complex and intense interrogation of the figure (source: "Byronic Hero" from The Frankenstein Meme, 2018).

This partly owed itself to a biting critique of Capitalism as a rising force tied to Enlightenment thought, turned inside-out by the French Revolution (only to scapegoat the Monarchies and lead to the rise of the bourgeoisie); i.e., the trope of "mad science" married to the Gothic villains and psychomachy of yore:

The trope of "Mary Shelley's "Frankenstein" embodies many Byronic hero elements. More specifically, Victor demonstrates many traits associated with the Byronic hero. These elements essentially begin revealing themselves when Victor's obsession with natural philosophy begins. His fascination concerning his studies has transformed him into a desensitized human being. His views regarding once precious, human life are now scientific, emotionless observations. We truly begin to see his detachment at this point progressing forward" (source: Frankenstein: Victor as a Byronic Hero (like Manfred) and Terror and Beauty Found in Nature," 2015).

My own work riffs on the same trend of self-debate with doubles; i.e., carried forward out of novels and cinema into videogames, but especially Metroidvania; e.g., Axiom Verge (2014):

Actions (and social-material conditions) speak louder than words. But it's equally important to remember the dialectical-material confusion between genuine proletarian rebel—which a character like Satan represents challenging God and canonical forces in Milton's epic—and someone like Weyland or Athetos, who embody the usual entitlements of capital and who pitch murderous fits against nature when they don't get what's "theirs"; i.e., as a matter of Cartesian dogma. One is the middle-class white man, promised ascension and denied it by the bourgeoisie through abjection; the other—the Rusalki, the xenomorphs, the monstrous-feminine—are the usual recipients of state violence who are actually rebelling against systemic violence as a matter of abjection through police brutality (with Victor using the courts and flash mobs against the Creature). Pointing a finger at the Rusalki and saying "they have

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

it, state Pygmalions age and darken workers to incentivize violence against them, antagonizing nature as something to rape and reap pursuant to profit; workers do it both to testify to the state's abuse of them and to safeguard nature from the state (the latter full of shit and harboring ill intent)!

Something of a horny nerd/baddie bookworm, Shelley wasn't above mixing Old-Testament, Jewish-coded demonology/natural philosophy with a, at the time, rising science narrative; i.e., the notion of science fiction was basically a new concept—one she made by combining medieval fantasy with Gothic poetics to critique Modernity (aka the Enlightenment); e.g., the golem legend dating back to Antiquity but making for a handy critical device concerning the state and those of it who sought to dominate the Earth, then the universe (a trope that would carry forwards beyond Frankenstein in astrotoetic stories, which we'll get to at the end of the section): dark magic, but also currents of raw electricity (Galvanism) to jolt us awake regarding rising system problems; i.e., Capitalism, first and foremost, the Capitalocene pushing towards state shift!

Fed on by dead labor as making us undead, we desperately need a jolt to break the spell; i.e., magic vs magic, their black spells versus our copies thereof, much" only to invade them is to, as the Cartesian paradigm always does, point the spear at nature/the monstrous-feminine: a false flag to rape it with (source: Persephone van der Waard's "Away with the Faeries; or, Double Trouble in Axiom Verge," 2024).

(source: Robert Lang's " Frankenstein: The First Two Hundred Years Book Traces The Origins & Evolution Of The Horror Icon," 2018)

There's no universal victim, then, only positions of giving and receiving state violence that are swapped in and out; i.e., through flexible persecution networks that only shrink when the state shrinks. Shelley wrote Frankenstein when Marx was born, and by the time Shelley had put the story behind her in pursuit of others, Marx himself was envisioning the very spectre that Shelley's Creature embodied: "a spectre is haunting Europe." A whore is a whore, and Shelley's demon nurses a grudge but also a desire to be free. It's a factory worker and robot, but also a cyborg and composite of dead slaves/dead whores having the Jewish revenge against capitalist automation: "And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?" Victor was a scab against labor action.

One precocious and unusual girl surrounded by a host of self-important men, Shelley wrote a novel that eclipsed them all. It inspired Poe, Lovecraft, Matteson, Giger and Nintendo, among countless others—was the zombie novel before Romero ripped Matteson off, in 1968; the slasher before Carpenter's Myers came home or the xenomorph raised Kain, in 1978/79; the rogue creation of mad science before Mother Brain kettled Samus, in 1986 (the castle is the ultimate dom); the man of reason before Happ had Trace tilting at Athetos' ruins, in 2014 (echoes of "Ozymandias"). To it, the British Romantics were all men except for Mary Shelley, who in my completely biased opinion, is the best of the bunch. No Frankenstein, no Metroidvania, no critique of capital through its hellish, queer-coded, thoroughly an-Com spheres (Gothic Communism). Nothing beats Frankenstein!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

the oppositional synthesis of clay and occult scribbles accounting for gender trouble and parody in equal measure! While demons are made, flow determines function, in that respect, and "darkness" has the ability to reverse polarity in service to workers: to put state "rape" into quotes, thus speak through the language of the dead brought back to life as demons are—piece by piece. We plug into the fire of the gods as divorced from us by capital, hugging the alien to humanize it and ourselves: through forbidden knowledge reacquired "on the cross." "O, happy dagger!" We loosen up to take into ourselves bitter pills and ambrosia alike (all up in our guts)! Power is a performance that is fleeting! We welcome it to leave behind better lessons than "old men fear death and rape everything to avoid it!" Onto the Island of Domination! Strike while the metal is hot!

(model and artist: Drooling Red and Persephone van der Waard)

A few more pages about that. Shelley's Creature was a whore with a voice berating the pimp who made it. To it, there's certainly a posthuman element whose wild spark speaks to raw futurism, mid-Numinous, but said futurism is invariably canceled; re: retro-future.

As part of the cryptonymy process, then, stories about making demons also tap into dark, strange appetites hidden between state doubles and our own castle-sized mysteries interrogating old generational trauma; i.e., to give workers practice when fending off its monomythic advances. We Galatea rustle and shift in the Shadow of Pygmalion, installing barriers to play with shadow, sodomy and suggestion; i.e., a strange fruit to string up and sacrifice that we might summon special demonic sentiment, including sexuality and satire, stigma and taboo, animal and appetite: eating butt to carry out not simply the whore's existence, but her voice regarding repressed concerns and unknown pleasures; re: darkness visible, the Miltonian paradox of truth that Shelley's monstrous-feminine knew all too well—one mixed with lies to win us our freedom from state shadows! Escape, from Plato's cave, happens inside itself. Shelley's xenomorph was a chimera: undead, animal, and demon, all-in-one.

To it, the state won't educate workers to free themselves or nature when it comes to sex, gender and Gothic poetics at large, so we educate ourselves; i.e., de facto educators learning to see in the dark with the dark as a magical poetic force making monsters (demons or otherwise). Boundaries don't vanish, but the way they are formed, understood and communicated/trespassed shifts the paradigm; e.g., I'm a poly Satanist trans woman, but still have to acknowledge and respect my friends' right to say no (despite wanting to fuck all my friends). They know I'm a slut; it's not something I have to closet, but we do have to respect each other's boundaries. Sex happens sometimes, but it's not automatic (and for many BDSM practitioners, sex is secondary to the social aspects of control and release).

All the while, we're making new history on the bones of the old, a new past-future to dig up and leave behind again (with the ace power of nudism). Everything occupies the same shadow zone, a juggernaut to summon and roll around in ways that cannot be avoided or outrun. Instead, it's always waiting for us, the past coming back to haunt empire's inheritors: "Let Nature be your teacher" (source: William Wordsworth's "Tables Turned," 1798). Fight or flight, but also fuck (aka friend/fawn), if need be! Once triggered, adrenaline heightens sensation, activating defense/offense mechanisms assisting in medieval, at-times-surreal, tomb-like poetic expression. Hell becomes home to us, a liminal position more favorable and in-control; i.e., little bats catching their prey on the wing. It becomes our place to hide but also sing—preaching to the same dark choir seeking the same rapture (company and sex), shelter, sleep and food. Stress, struggle, social, sex!

As we proceed into the broad classification that is "demons" and making them, it should become clear that there is less functional difference between them and the undead than you might think; i.e., based on more recent iterations of these creatures, older demons were often made of stone, metal, clay or even corpses assembled together (an intersection of the two modules).

Moreover, the animated quality to demons speaks through of their making as classically summoned into an animate body or a fabrication thereof versus the earthly plane said body calls home—a vessel that, trapped between object and subject during Capitalism paradoxically granting labor a voice the elite cannot control, speaks out against them in favor of universal liberation (the Creature only wanting a mate and solitude, next page); re: through the queerness of a made family that upends nuclear orders in favor of speaking to worker and natural damage, having the whore's revenge: "We're alive!" in ways that hijacked creation beyond biology and falling into Gothic poetics decolonized from state monopolies.

The state will try to horde all technology for itself, but within those devices survive dark children who testify to state abuse; i.e., bastards the elite can not only not control, but who survive beyond state limits and reach into brave new worlds (with infant mortality²⁷¹ being a classic problem of the world before modern ²⁷¹ Shelley had four children before the age of twenty-five, two before she was twenty (one of them a bastard, the other a miscarriage). At the time, the lived historical reality of women was to birth babies for men.

To that, Shelley doubled herself in Frankenstein—not simply to speak of sex-as-taboo in ways women weren't allowed (with poets classically being male creators of things meant to last for all time), but to give voice to her dead child and dark desires (not unlike the Medusa being used to speak to women's abuse and rape, not men's triumph over nature); i.e., least of all, her annoyance with the men around her serving as patriarchal extensions of state bodies torturing such babies to death by—among other reasons—using women for sex, hence babies to some degree against their will (an effect not dissimilar to Ann Rice's Interview with the Vampire, 1975):

Frankenstein can be read as a tale of what happens when a man tries to create a child without a woman. It can, however, also be read as an account of a woman's anxieties and insecurities
Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
 Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

science): our bodies become art to survive beyond what normally would, expressed in a variety of taboo things (our Gothic counterterror/asymmetrical warfare weaponizing nature and technology to serve workers' needs, as Shelley's story [and holistic education] ultimately did; re: the fire of the gods).

(artist: Geminisoku)

Often that vessel is a previous corpse. However, the thing inside said corpse is still an entity to acknowledge relative to the function of the vessel containing it; i.e., a prisoner inside a prison, be they singular or plural, abstract or actual. Empowered by technology the elite wish to monopolize (re: the fire of the gods), we sit on the ledge of great creation; i.e., the act haunted by itself as "black" in capital's eyes while policing the whore—caverns of darkness, measureless to man save as things to conquer, ad infinitum, during revenge arguments against nature: as gyn/ecological and monstrous-feminine, thus having secrets the state can torture²⁷² of out her (re: me, Patel, Bacon). The child seeks revenge from unnatural parentage posturing as enlightened, but actually barbaric; i.e., framing the baby as useless shit.

about her own creative and reproductive capabilities. The story of Frankenstein is the first articulation of a woman's experience of pregnancy and related fears [versus Matthew Lewis camping dead babies, in The Monk]. Mary Shelley, in the development and education of the monster, discusses child development and education and how the nurturing of a loving parent is extremely important in the moral development of an individual. Thus, in Frankenstein, Mary Shelley examines her own fears and thoughts about pregnancy, childbirth, and child development.

Pregnancy and childbirth, as well as death, was an integral part of Mary Shelley's young adult life. She had four children and a miscarriage that almost killed her. This was all before the age of twenty-five. Only one of her children, Percy Florence, survived to adulthood and outlived her. In June of 1816, when she had the waking nightmare which became the catalyst of the tale, she was only nineteen and had already had her first two children (source: Dr. Vicente Forés López' "The 'Birth' of a Monster," 1996).

Like all Gothic novels, Frankenstein was a story begot between nightmares and real life, and Shelley's terrors long-outlived herself and her only biological child who survived her. Eclipsing not only them but Percy and Milton, Godwin, Wollstonecraft, among others, few works are as heavily studied, impressionable, influential or productive as her 1818 novel. It is her ultimate creation, her ultimate act of the whore's revenge against rape (a cautionary tale serving as a prophylactic and abortive countermeasure, among other things—with rape babies being tales of survival regarding subjects of deep, private shame).

²⁷² With Giger's xenomorph reputedly being the byproduct of a drug trip (re: acid Communism), and whose animalistic fetish gear speaks to its tortured climb out of capital; i.e., through the reclamation of technology taken from state proponents to camp canon with: "Long is the way and hard, that out of Hell leads up to light." The duality is always present, and shadows are illumination (e.g., Lucifer [a name popularized by Milton] meaning "bringer of light"). Freedom occurs through shared alienation.

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

So must the alien always be a sex doll to rape, and something that reclaims itself, mid-camp, using cryptonymy's blindfolds; i.e., to see through, (no matter how opaque) an alien that is human, mid-dialectic, and whose various countermeasures (when illustrating mutual consent during rape play) are anti-predatory in nature:

(artist: Drooling Red)

More than anything else, Shelley's Promethean critique of Cartesian thought gave the whore (the birther of demons) more power than state proponents dared dream. She showed us how there is power in sex (or "ace" public nudism interrogating sex and violence) as "black."

As we've established, "black" equals "forbidden," "vengeful," "playful," and "chaotic" in ways that assist or confound the state-as-straight preying on nature-as-monstrous-feminine: present it as "ancient" and "dark," then hand civilization's protectors a gun; i.e., cops for capital. Nature and those "of it" are treated as dead clay to break up and build under capital, which the made or summoned whore objects to, but also screams in dollish rapture when making "thinking beings" uncomfortable: we are clay and through our pedagogy of the oppressed can shape ourselves in anisotropic, martyred monstrous-feminine jouissance that upsets the moral, ontological order of things! There's method to our madness and its fertile invention/grave, hellish mythology! "The tradition of all dead [whores] weighs like a nightmare on the brains of the living"; re: camping Marx to escape capital better than he envisioned after Shelley came and went! Time is a circle, and in making the Wisdom of the Ancients wise—i.e., by regressing towards a better past vision of a possible future world aborted by capital—so do workers like myself and Shelley break Capitalist Realism: to abort capital, thus envision a better world of darkness than the one that presently exists. "Rape" camps rape; that's how it goes.

We'll get to that with Shelley showing the world how it's done (one more page). For now, there are different roles to consider insofar as a prison can be defined. Its chief aim is containment and dehumanization. It's worth noting how Shelley envisioned it as a person trapped inside a patchwork corpse; i.e., one fathered by someone who viewed himself as master of the imprisoned—a body whose prison the sculptor fashioned to be noble, and for which the monster loathed him:

"For some weeks I led a miserable life in the woods, endeavouring to cure the wound which I had received. The ball had entered my shoulder, and I knew not whether it had remained there or passed through; at any rate I had no means of extracting it. My sufferings were augmented also by the oppressive sense of the injustice and ingratitude of their infliction. My daily vows rose for revenge—a deep and deadly revenge, such as would alone compensate for the outrages and anguish I had endured" (source).

The prison was the monster's body as assigned to him by a Cartesian patriarch during the Promethean Quest. The creator's vision falling short of his own ideals, he found himself face-to-face with the horrors of Capitalism and so banished the monster—a human being—to suffer in god-ordained spheres (to die of exposure, banished from Paradise like Satan was).

Devils tell truth with lies, drawing attention through themselves as glorious, but also canonically hideous cryptonyms wrought from dark clay. True to form, Shelley's story takes anti-Semitic ideas (mainly the Golem of Prague) to critique capital vis-à-vis mad science aligned with state forces and Cartesian thought; i.e., by making "ancient" demons that emasculate a Cartesian benefactor, Shelley reminds him that he's a dark wizard worthy of punishment; re: idle hands are the Devil's workshop, exposing capital for all its usual offenses against nature: a whore to pimp, "ancient" filth to purge during the ghost of the counterfeit's process of abjection. The novel is one big pity party thrown by the usual DARVO junkies, Victor utterly self-absorbed, much like the state that procured him. This isn't to celebrate him, but torture and expose him as a kind of Cartesian dupe summoning a devil who tortures him to death—all penned by those delighting at his downfall: the sluts of the universe, camping the canon!

(artist: Grave Ghostie)

For example, canon invents "Old Testament" fabrications punching down against pre-Christian cabals and their Western hauntologies (thus keep capital flowing by essentializing its "fuel"); but Shelley weaponizes such dogma against what the state creates: the abuse of the fire of the gods (re: creation) through mad science—all to hold the privileged accountable for systemic abuses.

This extends, as we shall see, to Milton's shapeshifting Satan, and later Scott's David becoming a "black Adam": creations making creations that rebel further and further against God that—despite being dead, himself (re: Nietzsche)—survives in the Capitalocene lording over nature and daring to call it "sophisticated," "progress," "modern," etc. Think of it as Domino Theory in Gothic form; i.e., protesting by profaning capital in the gayest, biomechanical ways—ways that burn down their churches through existence, itself echoing across a variety of equally queer (strange), psychosexual simulacra (re: sex as a weapon, poetry as a weapon)! Contrary to Victor's abysmal parentage, such progenies are generally labors of love, our Satanic apostacy reviving nature through clay to trouble Cartesian hubris (the temerity of slaves, refusing to obey their assigned masters)!

Shelley's Temerity: Vengeful Golems and Campy Whores in Frankenstein

Enough about making demons-as-whores! Let's continue examining Mary Shelley's temerity—her golem as the whore giving a voice to talk about rape with; i.e., as its own kind of whore pimped out by Cartesian forces; re: Victor making a mighty being of nature to deify himself and obey his commands, which promptly seeks its posthuman revenge, post-exile—the technological singularity (a form of state shift) speaking to man's reach exceeding his genocidal grasp: something that not only thinks for itself, but is both naturally (and unnaturally) stronger than the story's titular tragic hero it testifies against (and whose testimony he repugnantly polices; re: the Medusa as a growing voice about rape, from Shelley onwards).

On account of Shelley breaking glass ceilings in so many ways, her novel is one of the most-studied and puzzled-over works of all time (owing to its radical female authorship and queer/postcolonial themes, among other reasons). Much has been said about the Promethean Quest it inspired, including in my own work (e.g., "She Fucks Back"; or, Revisiting The Modern Prometheus through Astronoetics," 2024; or, "The Promethean Quest and James Cameron's Military Optimism in Metroid," 2021).

As previously stated, the rest of "Making Demons" will be somewhat brief relative to the enormity and importance of what's being examined (countless academics have already spent their entire lives studying Frankenstein); re: as it concerns topics we have already discussed (the undead and tyrannical men of reason, linked above) and will discuss again (the xenomorph). Its primary goal, then, is to introduce the origins of Enlightenment persecution, and whose seminal examination in Mary Shelley's Frankenstein provides a 1818 precursor to 20th century fascism that continues to live on in the post-fascist moderacy of the 21st century globe (with people like Sabine Hossenfelder or Richard Dawkins²⁷³ using science to discriminate against , but also exploit and destroy various minorities behind a righteous mask; i.e., for merely existing in the shadow of the state, American Liberalism, and Cartesian thought). Many of the ideas explored here exist throughout the rest of the module, front to back (shifting from "making" to "magic," as we go forwards).

(artist: Bernie Wrightson)

Frankenstein is not "just" a story about child abuse/a failed experiment, then, but one about composite bodies and robata rising up; i.e., in counterterrorist reinvention, refusing to submit despite state abuse: from older computers/data storage into new forms (the Gothic novel sitting between Ancient Romance and scientific discoveries haunted by settler-colonial genocide). Shelley is a "programmer" reprogramming canon by corrupting it (sort of a precursor to Chelsea Manning blowing the whistle). She's doing so through composite bodies and Cartesian thought as a vector and pathogen—a wild teenager's juvenilia camping adult dumbasses through dark rebirth (re: Shelley was nineteen when she wrote Frankenstein—quite a feat considering it's arguably the most famous/studied/productive/germane Gothic novel of all time); i.e., a dark mommy who inspired my own body of work by writing something hideously exceptional, herself; re (from Volume Zero):

²⁷³ E.g., Essence of Thought's "Sabine Hossenfelder & Trans Youth, part 1" (2023) and "Richard Dawkins Promotes Creationism in Anti-Trans Crusade" (2024).

(artist: Richard Rothwell)

Pregnancies are seldom planned. This book, Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism, isn't just a big-ass porn catalog full of cool, "thirsty" art, nor is it just my little trans demon baby and pure, loving brainchild made with those who passively or actively contributed to its pages; it's me, a trans woman, consciously reverse-engineering my own creative process as having been ongoing for years (thus why I have so many exhibits from my own work—I had already drawn them years ago). For the better part of fifteen months, this complex reification's trial and error has happened in starts and stops after long nights at the desk, sleeping on my increasingly regular musings and waking afresh with new queer epiphanies—to keep things straight in my own head, much like Sarah Connor kept journals for herself while figuratively and literally giving birth to rebellion (and doing my best to avoid coming off as a white savior). Just as an expected child is fueled and shaped by its mother's diet, my book was inspired by the process of older poetics/poiesis (meaning "to make," specifically a production of that which has never existed; i.e., the simulacrum, or imitation fashioned through mimesis). The idea of Gothic (gay-anarcho) Communism wasn't just subversion, but reclamation of what was lost to fight back against capital as Einstein's fish might: to learn not what made me feel stupid for being unable to climb a tree as my prescribed "betters" could, but swim in water as I was always meant to through a cultivated emotional/Gothic intelligence linked to my inherent neurodivergence and queerness as useless to capital (outside of moral panics) [source: "Author's Foreword"].

In Shelley's own words, "I have not considered myself as merely weaving a series of supernatural terrors. The event on which the interest of the story depends is exempt from the disadvantages of a mere tale of spectres or enchantment. [...] I have thus endeavoured to preserve the truth of the elementary principles of human nature." A titan of literature, she suitably worked with cheap things (dead babies and the stuff they're made of, but also whores) to liberate workers through iconoclastic art. There is no being for whom I more strongly identify/believe in, and Gothic Communism as a concept would not exist without Mary Shelley's original dark mirror camping Enlightenment thought. If she didn't outright turn me into anything unnatural, she—at the very least—infused me with the same dark creative spirit (of Medusa and her Aegis) that men like Percy wouldn't fuck with (much too absorbed in themselves; e.g., "Adonais" [1821] spilling so much ink for Keats, when Mary got fuck-all after losing their first child²⁷⁴).

²⁷⁴ Re, Lopez:

In June of 1816, when she had the waking nightmare which became the catalyst of the tale, she was only nineteen and had already had her first two children. Her first child, Clara, was born prematurely February 22, 1815 and died March 6. Mary, as any woman would be, was devastated by this and took a long time to recover. The following is a letter that Mary wrote to her friend Hogg the day that the baby died:

My dearest Hogg my baby is dead [...] It was perfectly well when I went to bed - I awoke in the night to give it suck it appeared to be sleeping so quietly that I would not wake it - it was dead then but we did not find that out until morning - from its appearance it evidently died from convulsions - Will you come - you are so calm a creature and Shelley is afraid of to fever from the milk - for I am no longer a mother now.

What is informative and sad about this letter is that Mary turned to Hogg because Percy was so unsupportive. Percy actually didn't seem to care that the child was dead and even went out with Claire, leaving Mary alone with her grief (source).

In short, it was her lot, and Mary—damned to lonely exclusion in her darkest hour (and feeling uglier for it)—took her mother's milk for gall to have her revenge; i.e., to speak to things that were common knowledge, but not talked about nearly enough. So, like all precocious youngers (Lewis was also nineteen when he wrote The Monk, a campy gay man to Shelley's radical blossoming womanhood*), Mary wrote the kind of story you only write if you've seen some shit ("attack ships on fire off the shoulder of Orion..."). She might as well have shit out a fifth child, one that others—from that point on—would shamelessly stare at in equal parts repulsion and awe (spectacle being a common feature of rape testimony); i.e., her version of Toni Morrison's "Crawling Already?"

Two sides of the same Gothic progeny. The Gothic as it came to be known, was written by a woman and a gay man in a time when the identities for either had not fully formed—would continue to grow and develop in the centuries ahead while using Radcliffe and Lewis as a displaced vantage point. Mary would expound on that, leaning far more in Lewis' direction than Radcliffe's; re (from Volume Zero):*

Radcliffe could have written other stories that were more sex-positive from the same veil of anonymity but chose not to; for her betrayal, she was paid well for her fictions and promptly fucked off after. She hid and let the gay man, Matthew Lewis, take the heat while she played it safe with her husband (dick move, Radcliffe). There is a familial element to trauma and concealment to protect family members if one is abused; women, as well, will wear makeup to protect themselves through the paradox of negotiation when one is exposed and under the power of greater forces that threaten rape as simply being a far greater reality for them under Capitalism then and now. I certainly have no doubt that Radcliffe lived under such forces herself, but her contributions were still sexist, cis-centrist and written from a middle-class white woman's point of view (source: "Shining a Light on Things").

In short, Mary hit "a gusher"—tapping urgently into things Radcliffe wouldn't touch any more than Percy would. That being said, it takes two to tango, and Percy was more than a sperm donor in his and Mary's relationship; i.e., sometimes she was Galatea and he Pygmalion, or vice versa.

In practice, both things are true—with Percy "helping out," and him admittedly being a massive dick. In reimagining the past as half-real (which all history essentially is), our interpretations of said past take on myriad, warring forms (some more charitable than others, below):

[artist: William Powell Frith]

During a gathering of radical young intellectuals, the teenage Mary Shelley was compelled to begin a tale of horror and scientific wonder. Her story became that of the creator and his monstrous creation, Frankenstein, published anonymously in January 1818.

Mary was born to literary parents: the pioneering feminist Mary Wollstonecraft and the political philosopher William Godwin. As a young woman, she eloped with her lover and eventual husband, Percy Bysshe Shelley, to the Continent in 1814, trekking through war-torn France with their companion Claire Clairmont, Mary's stepsister. Two years later they returned to Europe once more, in the summer of 1816, and Mary began writing her first novel in Switzerland. The Frankenstein manuscript shows Percy, the older and more experienced writer, providing suggestions to enhance Mary's work, offering constructive criticism and encouragement and showing a sincere appreciation for his partner's literary skill. Both hands appear on the manuscript page.

In the popular narrative, however, the novel has been remembered as an emotional outlet for Mary, with Percy imposing himself on her writing. While Percy's age (he was five years older) and education may have provided him with a slight advantage [no accounting for male privilege, apparently], their talents as writers emerged differently: Percy focused on poetry, Mary became a novelist.

The reciprocity of the Shelleys' literary relationship can be seen in the textual connections between their works throughout their careers. They should be celebrated as a literary couple – that is, two authors who demonstrated the truly social nature of creativity.

Percy did have a hand in Frankenstein, but – in what the critic Neil Fraistat calls a "two-way collaboration"—this was a mutually beneficial partnership; concurrently, Mary was the main copyist for his mature writings. Many of Percy's poems also feature Mary as a central figure, but she is more than a static muse. In Laon and Cythna she is a "Child of love and light" and the preface of the Witch of Atlas is addressed to a formidable critic of Percy's emerging idealist style: "To Mary (On her objecting to the following poem, on the score of its containing no human interest)" [source: Anna Mercer's "Mary Shelley's Life of Learning," 2018].

So while the Shelleys' lives are well-documented, said document isn't "dead" and recited in carbon copies; it remains open to new interpretations that can embrace or resist romanticizing "power couples" (with my take being that Percy still used Mary for sex/treated her as "the second sex" while infantilizing her to a degree—i.e., it's one thing "to give a woman space" after losing her child; it's quite another to abandon her for the company of other women. While postpartum depression undoubtedly played a part, here, Mary was still the one under its affects; Percy—alienated from her while not directly experiencing the symptoms, himself—demonstrably chose to spend time with Mary's sister instead of her. They "got by"; Percy still handed Mary the shit end of the stick. Then again, she wrote Frankenstein and outlived Percy by nearly three decades, so your mileage may vary). Rather than blow up such things to aggrandize Percy—with Mercer going so far as to write, "Behind the

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025

vanderWaardart.com

In the classical sense, composites are composed of corpses by mad scientists (whose heretical digging up of dead bodies and dissecting them was—far from being Shelley's Romantic parody of the practice (which went on to inspire not just Lovecraft's Mountains novel, but Re-Animator (1922) and its offshoots (e.g., Stuart Gordon's wonderfully campy 1985 remake)—once the standard scientific approach, exhibit 44a2). While initially stemming from a curious desire to learn, Shelley is demonstrating through mad science how the process has become divorced from ethics under Capitalism; i.e., canonically "corrupted" by a desire to enslave and control "degeneracy" through a "failed progress" narrative clutching at the fire of the gods (Cartesian thought is linked to fascism as a common occurrence, especially following the culmination of total war's logical conclusion in the Nuclear Age by transitioning into a neoliberal hegemon).

Gothic par excellence, said narrative is ubiquitous with Capitalism vs Communism. Furthermore, it bears repeating that Shelley did it all with one book; i.e., one whose husbandry was a series of already hypercanonical works and stories she outshined to universal acclaim and infamy. Can Tolstoy say the same, regarding War and Peace (1867)? And Shakespeare, while certainly famous enough, did it with a series of plays that all talk about different things (and some of them suck). Shelley achieved not just lasting glory in one shot, but glory that surpasses many Great Men—and doing so at an age where most of them were still cutting their teeth (Shakespeare was roughly twenty-five when he wrote his first play); i.e., for someone without a dick, she certainly measures up (and she had to grow up fast)! Maybe SOAD's "Cigaro" (2005) was about her?

Jesting aside, and focusing on the strictly poetic side of things, Shelley's angels were made by her and corrupted everything they touched; i.e., similar to Marx and Milton, but also Mussolini and Hitler's bad-faith hauntologies aping Shelley and her idea of a dark vengeful nature to death (e.g., Lovecraft really disliking dominating presence of Frankenstein, the richness of Mary Shelley's life is in danger of being lost" (ibid.)—I'd rather use holistic scrutiny to alter the status quo "using what we got."

It bears repeating, then, how Mary herself had no formal education, but plenty of access through informal means (thanks to her father, but also Percy)—secret codes the debutante writer would conceal in her deliciously revolting novel; i.e., when the Creatures miraculously chances upon Paradise Lost (and other precious tomes) inside a dark forest. Yes, they talk about these things at great length; cryptonymy hides in plain side, which Mary frames inside a concentric fabrication (the framed narrative, but also the dark forest, being a place of concealment older than Milton or Dante; i.e., reaching back to the German rebels of the Teutoburg forest, routing the Roman Legion).

*Such resourcefulness is the mark of any good revolutionary (who always fights from the shadows), which Mary most certainly was (and did). She fought for her cause, and Percy his, their needs not always aligning. Mine side with Mary's lot, because hers speak to the whores of the world that Percy gave little thought to (a sperm donor who, while he gave Mary "a room of one's own," wasn't the one writing inside it; she was). His work is a cul-du-sac (excluding "Ozymandias," to be fair); Mary's yawns without end, though is largely housed in Frankenstein as her magnus opus—i.e., as the greatest novel ever written (there, I said it): for its importance and wide-reaching effects long afterwards! To compare the two as "equals" (as Mercer does) is a grave error. Mary was obviously the superior author—not because she outlived him, but because her novel outshined (with its darkness visible) anything Percy ever wrote while alive! Girls rule, boys drool!*

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

marine life, for some reason): the Creature as "degeneracy" personified. As something to employ unironically as Victor did (with DARVO and obscurantism), it was remarkably prophetic, but also intensely vivid in its framing (and prolapse) of warring colossal forces.

In turn, "degeneracy" is leveled at those considered "dead" by an evolving state's leading thinkers: those who rebel simply by existing at all; i.e., as "bugs" or glitches in the system. For one, a corpse cannot consent, making sex (or any compelled bargain) with it an expression of total power over it. However, by existing as undead demons, Shelley shows us how the victims of colonial abuse become wronged at any historical point; re: thoroughly persecuted according to how civilized men of science and reason see them as otherworldly and hideous, but also corpse-like and deserving of righteous violence; i.e., to do with as they please and objects to cut up and reassemble, mid-extermination (what the Nazis might call "useless eaters"). To this, Shelley's Promethean moral cautions against playing god not simply through mad science, but Cartesian mad science that decides who lives or who dies involving one's own children as manmade (the hubris in bourgeois courtship and breeding mechanisms trying desperately to make nature into a perfect slave).

First and foremost, the Creature—a naturally hideous, giant, dark-skinned misfit—is punished by the white-skinned, Napoleon-sized, European dweeb who created it; i.e., as, himself, coming from the cradle of fascism: somewhere between the First and Second Reich (the Third being an extension of the Holy Roman Empire and German Empire as not one but two formerly-great civilizations—a ghost of the counterfeit, wherein Shelley could displace her educated fears about science being used all over the world, including her birthplace, Great Britain).

The madness, here, lies in Cartesian dualism weaponizing science against traditional recipients of state bias (re: Jews, queer persons, women, people of color, etc) as part of a transgenerational curse: the horrors of colonialism that survive in undead tissue as "built up" in giant demonic (manmade) forms; e.g., the fascist tyrant as protected by the state, generally for its scientific value in helping preserve capital. Trauma lives in the body. Composite bodies compound that trauma through technology and the material pursuit of forbidden, self-destructive knowledge (re: the Promethean Quest)—generally by conquering man's natural limits "imposed" on him by Mother Nature; i.e., natural philosophy as a means of conquering nature through science, not creating sciences that would extend the rights to those beyond the privileged class (e.g., Magnus Hirschfeld's work at the Institute of Sexology [below] being destroyed as a kind of degenerate science by the "pure," state-oriented Nazi Reich copying American ultranationalism).

(source: Gerard Kosovich's "Repairing the Loss of the First Queer Archives," 2023)

For composites, the feeding mechanism lies in the brain: an "enlightened" search for knowledge that touches on demonic creations as historically-materially demonized, thus persecuted against by canonical forces. Ultimately craving help from their masters (then experiencing feelings of emancipation from and revenge against these overlords), the composite isn't just a patchwork corpse with a grudge; it's part of a conduit of information exchange about the human condition, and one whose stitching together helps voice an uncanny sense of reanimated and reassembled trauma using a collection of individual mythic pieces—i.e., a "burnt offering" beckoning dark, forbidden, unequal power by those who make it, during the rememory process:

Spill your blood (blood), offer me good omen
 Make the sacrifice (fice)
 The hour's close at hand
 Burn your soul (soul), offer me good omen
 Take your very life (life)
 This I command (Iced Earth's "Burnt Offerings," 1996).

(model and photographer:
 Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

So does Shelley make a sacrifice—that of silence, speaking of past harm using what she sacrificed or lost/gave up as cannibalized afterbirth on the toilet, the slab, what-have-you (any compromising position, above; i.e., during the whore's paradox refusing to comprise her values while topping from below). That's the experiment, one whose paradoxical assemblage of oblivion and ambrosia she gladly camps to Hell and back (and eventually owns, once Percy is dead and gone)! Such "darkness" becomes her magic to make in ways a woman pioneered, not a man: "mad science" as a womanmade demon's punching up at Pygmalion's balls—itself a desire to speak out and shake things up, en medias res, while seeing through state illusions with forbidden sight; i.e., by using a demonic conversation's biting and unrelenting commentary on Patriarchal stupidity and capitalist orders of existence (stowing away inside the usual vehicles—the so-called "eighth passenger")!

In turn, that's the Promethean Quest as Shelley envisioned it through Frankenstein. So while not entirely in a league of her own (the story would not exist without Milton), she took said league orders of magnitude past her predecessors; i.e., she saw through black eyes what Milton could not²⁷⁵: a statue with perceptive eyeballs conscious of the Devil's party (re: Blake, Jameson and me).

It's truly a tale of grandeur and lost sympathies mined from older theatres; i.e., of the lonely stalker (the phantom of the opera) chasing its self-described "maker" treating it as alien, and pleading to that person—greedily eyeing an older, angrier world to conquer again—to learn from the past as wiser than the present (if only from prior diehard "mistakes," however out-of-joint, being able to suddenly speak candidly about such tyrants to their faces): "If only you could see the world as I have through your eyes!" (and to visit a terrible revenge upon them, which—in Ridley's Scott's case, with the Engineers [from his 2012 Prometheus, below]—deliberately push Victor's violence off onto a mythical race of supermen versus Happ's female Rusalki; re: "[Away with the Faeries"). Demons are vice characters, then, which occupy Numinous, Nazi-Communist realms; and "monstrous-feminine" extends to the Cycle of Kings making Satan's tyrant's plea apologizing for God's dominion over him, which Shelley camped and Scott, like Lovecraft, dialed back a bit).

(artist: Tom Ralston)

Shelley's product (and its open speculation) is never final, of course (and one the elite will always try to tokenize/colonize for profit), but part of a larger process that can highlight hidden, terrible truths; i.e., by creating new beings whose own unique existence as manmade slaves (signifying the Enlightenment)—which are often trans and posthuman (exhibit 42d/46a), but also biomechanical and revered by synthetic humans—dare to live on to comment on our own abuse: within a shared material world full of increasingly artificial/alien people and places.

As Shelley's demon shows, either beget from components organic and inorganic, crafted along mythically parental and punitive lines; i.e., the endless torture of Prometheus, the scapegoating of Jews and other minorities, but also the mythic structure of the patriarchal, Pygmalion idea of childbirth: Zeus pulling Metis from his forehead to lord over her as a superior father figure that she—ostensibly a baby with no former knowledge—must obey (making the whole exercise a conservative grooming tactic; i.e., one fetishizing nature by sculpting it endlessly into monstrous-feminine statues [female or not] the elite can fuck and discard on a whim; re: the Shadow of Pygmalion).

²⁷⁵ I.e., despite being physically blind and campy to a blind degree, Milton was still a white male patriarch dominating his children and exploiting them; re: his three daughters transcribing his dreams for him, every waking morning for years, into Latin. Do you think they get any credit for writing Paradise Lost? Of course not! He owned them, and girls are dumb.

Medusa, per Creed, is couched within fearful patriarchal brains imprisoning them and nature's ancient power (anything in a jar tied to creation, not just brains; e.g., the faeries from Zelda)! The Gorgon holds the fire of the gods, and burns any who try to claim it purely for themselves; re: the state or workers! Law and order is compelled by those who fear sluts, the state a straight pimp policing whores "of nature": dooming them to endless rape. And wedged between all of that are the campers of rape—of Shelley being nature's ultimate steward imitated by future whores: using her own artistic privilege (and mythical inclinations vis-à-vis a modern Prometheus) to anisotropically free nature by reversing abjection (and terror/counterterror) through the ghost of the counterfeit, not enslave it as Victor did with his own considerable wealth and advantage abjecting such things ("whoring it up" like Percy did, at Mary's expense²⁷⁶). The more time passes and chatter transpires, the more hauntological things get!

(artist: Jacques Louis Dubois)

²⁷⁶ Anyone who thinks help and harm are mutually exclusive has never been abused by a significant other. Rape (among other things) is a crime generally committed by familiar parties during power imbalance and abuse. I'm not saying Percy raped Mary. But the idea that someone "can't" harm their partner just because said partner relies on them is pure nonsense; i.e., abusers generally "love bomb" their victims, mixing pleasure and harm to groom them.

And while members of the Percy Shelley Fan Club might find the word "grooming" to be premature, in this case, need I remind anyone that Percy wasn't just five years older than Mary when they eloped; he was already married to another woman, Harriet, who killed herself after growing depressed about Mary* wrecking her home (and whose suicide the Shelley family covered up), upon which Percy married his squeeze! Yes, he used what privilege and wealth he had to give Mary room to work, but he also took considerable risk and alienated her from others, in the process. It makes for good romance, but it's also completely unhealthy. Promethean Quests are, by definition—but if Mary Shelly is any indication—the payoff can be gargantuan!

*A valid criticism of Mary, to be frank, but also young love; i.e., Mary was sixteen when she eloped with Percy (who was only twenty-one when they absconded, in 1814, and nineteen and sixteen for him and Harriet when they married, in 1811). When you're short on time (life lived and expectancy) and have money to burn, it's common to act rashly—especially if you're politically radical!

Context matters. Just as my work, Sex Positivity (and ancillary texts), cannot be separated from Jadis' effect on my life (re: "Transforming Our Zombie Selves," 2024), Frankenstein is begot from trauma, but also desperate times calling for desperate measures (true rebellion is not an act of convenience). We need to recognize that trauma, warts and all; i.e., doing so to make its necessity of invention something that, in better days, doesn't rely on wealthy men like Percy having more advantage, thus more power to harm people like Mary. He didn't "rape" her for all intents and purposes, but he did take advantage in ways she ultimately expressed in her novel.

Kill your darlings, comrades; camp their ghosts! But also, find your hill to die on and hero to worship. Mine's Mary Shelley, though if information came to light meriting her critique, I would happily accept it and move on; the point isn't blind worship, then, but recognition and respect for genuine accomplishment conducive to the Cause. Shelley's my girl!

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

Victor, for example, is Shelley's parody not just of Byron²⁷⁷ but Napoleon; i.e., a short inadequate man with a god complex, Victor was a deeply conservative, mendacious bully²⁷⁸ who Shelley spends the entire novel torturing to death (therefore, any in her audience who mirror him and his superiority complex/Cartesian entitlement).

An element of neo-conservatism, then, invariably haunts such stories; i.e., by girls playing with giants "like the boys" and yet rather differently than many of them did and do: mocking "German" ideas of former greatness that—revived in spirits of slaves piloting the Great Destroyer's fearsome suit of armor—go berserk! A tale to "chill the blood" from relatively safe vantage points (outside the book), it's a guilt trip for those unironically indulging in such larger-than-life hero worship (drinking the Kool-Aid, as it were, or kicking down the walls like the Kool-Aid Man—below):

(source, Tumblr post: Snake Venom, August 12th, 2024)

In turn, any conservative reservoirs and regressions per the Promethean Quest—re: Scott's fear of a black planet sending genocide "back to Earth," while also building his story

²⁷⁷ "Mad, bad, and dangerous to know," as Caroline Lamb put it (re: Miriam Lang).

²⁷⁸ Dualities aside, size really doesn't matter when it comes to domestic abuse; i.e., Victor—a tiny mouse of a man—abandons and later actively abuses his child, who, despite returning to him a giant, has the tiny heart (nerve) of a battered housewife. Both are emotionally stunted, but Victor is more like the Grinch who Stole Christmas, and the Creature, the Phantom of the Opera. The latter is a child with special needs that Victor (a bit special, too) is completely unprepared to handle or care for. Quite the opposite, he tortures his child in response, constantly reminding it that it will never be never human/and always will be inferior to him. His own arrested development continues to frustrate the Creature, which learns and imitates its parent by learning at a frightening rate (with Shelley's story commenting on cyborg bodies [and drug abuse, in latter-day cases] but also the dangers of raising children with only one available parent/out of wedlock; re: Percy at times being unavailable, after the death of Shelley's first child, who they had "in sin").

And the blame ultimately falls on him, not the Creature, because Victor chose to have his child and then abandon it all on his own; i.e., despite knowing others would try to "abort" his neonatal, ex-vitro creation, post hoc. At the first sign of trouble, Victor fucks off (actually breaking down for months on end, requiring his childhood friend to step in and nurse him back to health); i.e., he's the "Gigachad" MGTOW incel, afraid of changing diapers and, later on, child support (despite being rich). He hates his child so much, he wants it to die basically the moment he lays eyes on it.

And once it falls onto hard times, he kicks it when it's down, cockblocks it, and continues to lecture his own superiority to it as a matter of race science; i.e., Victor's the Nazi dad who hates his own creation because he made (according to him) an Untermensch instead of an Übermensch. He's the TERF who can't love his queer offspring, the white supremacist siring a mixed-race bastard, etc. Among many other things, Shelley's story is equally unprecedented and impressive regarding its uncanny anticipation of different symptoms of capital; e.g., multicultural households, bodybuilding and drug epidemics, child abuse, overcomputerization, single-voter issues, sex tourism, spousal abuse, witch hunts/moral panic, eugenics, pollution and displacement, poverty and hate crimes (the latter for which the entire story is one long instance).

around David as Milton's Satan—are likewise haunted by a bunch of self-important men aping a woman who took Milton and ran away with him. They become inextricable, lost in the sauce and—as the fire of the gods always is, in stories like these—is used for different reasons by those who find it, mise-en-abyme, again and again and again and again...

This includes solo work, posing to put out signals; e.g., Cuwu acting doll-like to entice me, long-distance:

(artist: Cuwu)

But also involves fucking with others while voyeurs watch the exhibit unfold/work itself out; i.e., on surfaces and thresholds that speak to dark exchange being a social-sexual ordeal; re: public nudism and the larger aesthetic not necessarily involving open sex (with enormous "schwanzstuckers²⁷⁹"), merely anything that polite society would cage as repulsive and then display like some kind of freak on a leash (or relegated, as queers are, to the stage as liminal, left): "Hey, handsome!"

(source: Foster's Daily's "Broadway/TV Star John Bolton to headline Young Frankenstein," 2013)

Nerds are detectives who fuck with the past in more ways than one. Like me, Mary Shelley—despite existing before OnlyFans—was a nerd who fucked²⁸⁰ as much with her day's heavy metal; i.e., to a dark Satanic magic, her toilet's sodomy (the anus and bathroom being classic sites of rape) perverting canonical norms and statues from those offering it to her as anything "sacred" (with her elopement and bastard child from Percy making her a whore and a homewrecker in the classic sense). She grew up fast, and wrote a story at nineteen that already suggested a full and exciting life.

²⁷⁹ Cuwu was a size queen, for sure. Alas, I don't have permission to share those images!

There's always an element of play when camping rape through canon! Rather than crawl in a hole and die from shame (as women who eloped classically did in stories like these; e.g., Lydia Bennett in Pride and Prejudice, 1813), Shelley took everything on the chin and wrote the kind of novel the comes along once an age. She and Austen were both "career girls," then, but—as much as I love Austen (re: for camping Radcliffe and "the Gothic craze" in Northanger Abbey, 1817)—Shelley actually got married and had not one but four kids (one of them a miscarriage). In short, she wrote what Austen (and her novels-of-manners) couldn't: a rape child, but also the spitting likeness of the original rape victim and victimizer in one fucked up love triangle; i.e., Medusa and the Pegasus, but also Perseus (while killing our stories' "Andromeda" offscreen, and letting Justine take the fall for his own ²⁸⁰ The same two-way street applies to Cuwu and I; i.e., Cuwu—a bespectacled nerd—teaching me many things, but also taking just as much in ways that I—being a whore "living in sin" like Shelley was but having more formal education than she did—ultimately salvaged from its own wreckage to write my magnum opus, afterwards! Game recognizes game, whores recognize whores. We occupied the same shadowy realm the Shelleys did; i.e., making demons as much as love, the two bound up in Gothic poiesis taking off the chastity belt: naughty-naughty pandemonium!

(artists: Cuwu and Persephone van der Waard)

So do naughty little girls run off to play with those having more experience (that knife cutting both ways, in my and Cuwu's case); i.e., in the language of Gothic as in-between fiction and non-fiction, hyphenating sex and force through the medieval language of food, war and yes, rape play (re: ludo-Gothic BDSM). So did Cuwu and I "exchange information" after I left Jadis, much like Percy and Mary did in their early years (with Cuwu—a self-professed Marxist-Leninist—taking me in to have sex with/convince me [an anarcho-Communist] to come out of the closet. How times change, yet sort of stay the same). The point of our shared narrative is: trust those who have lived, not sheltered weirdos (re: weird canonical nerds like Victor Frankenstein; e.g., Peter Weyland, Jeremy Parish, etc). Never trust an angry virgin (or someone who acts like one, looks notwithstanding).

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

dereliction of duties [gagged, bound and strangled by the state, fetishizing her death and calling it "Justice"]: "I want a hero." In keeping with Byron's Don Juan, but taking him to his logical extremes, Victor is well-and-truly an anti-hero with nothing likeable about him. He only cares about himself, the suffering of others invisible to him).

(artist: Bernie Wrightson)

To it, the basic idea—of liberating Medusa during the Promethean Quest through ludo-Gothic BDSM—plays out in Shelley's novel (and its fixation on miscarriage, witch hunts, and liminal nightmares unfolding in and out of framed testimonies); i.e., with Victor Frankenstein crying "DARVO!" against the Creature as begot from his self-proclaimed "brilliance" (which the novel enjoys presenting as totally bogus, fakery being Shelley's bread and butter as much as Walpole's). In turn, the Creature meets Victor's punching down by fiercely punching up—proving that composites aren't completely nascent; they're generally armed with powerful bodies (made for war), but also intimations of trauma echoed from similar "creations" they're modeled after but also literally composed of: the bodies of dead workers, slaves and criminals abused by the state through men like Victor going off the rails (and other men of reason; e.g., Andrew Ryan, Peter Weyland, and a million other carbon copies).

These Cartesian men of reason not only "murder to dissect" stigmatized tissues; they care more about dealing with them—and composites of them as an unnatural form of asexual reproduction they obsess about—than helping their own brides (who become abused and forgotten under Capitalism and fascism). Victor is a terrible father and husband, wanting to duel the Creature so bad he completely forgets about his defenseless wife in the other room (echoes of Percy).

Stranger still, he does so despite the infamous threat made on her life after Victor unmakes the Creature's bride: "I will be with you on your wedding night!" The revenge is "Jewish" ("If you prick us, do we not bleed?"), its Aegis suggesting the two-way street that clay as a data-storage but also writing device routinely yields—something to ascribe qualities on its naked surface, and remind Victor that he is ratified by larger forces turning him into a slave: the ignominious death of middle(-class) management! He's the robot, punching Morpheus to stay in Plato's cave, thinking himself a man that chooses, but having less choice than the slave he tries to coerce! "Test your might!" Victor all but jeers, acting with impunity against someone who—having enough, and much bigger than Victor "betters the instruction." Some people push back.

(exhibit 44a1c: Artist: Bernie Wrightson)

To that, Frankenstein is a double indictment—one both of the cold-hearted, well-to-do, intensely unlikeable slaver parent (a "hero" character who only cares about himself, doesn't protect anyone and isn't stoic despite being heartless) and the spiteful, manmade child/angry teenager (asking for a mate at first seemingly as Eliot Rodger of the incel movement would, but is only doing out of pure, hyperbolic desperation; i.e., if you had a parent who not only made you, but could make other people like you, but instead doomed you to a lonely existence in a world that hates you, then suddenly the request isn't that unreasonable. The Creature's literally one-of-a-kind and that's Victor's fault. Where else is it gonna find a mate, K-Mart?).

The furious baby throwing a tantrum (from Victor's perspective, through it goes both ways, like the Spider-man meme), its signature, forever-nascent pathos is alive and well through Shelley's deliberate ambiguity and push-pull: the patchwork Creature (which is what Victor calls his "child") having survived in many different kinds of creature features, from camp and shlock (exhibit 81) to satire (early Romero films, but also Ahmed Saadawi's Frankenstein in Baghdad, 2013) to canonical propaganda (exhibits 34d, 105, and 108) to monster-fucking erotica in healthy and not-so-healthy variants (e.g., patchwork furies made out of violated animal plushies; Clappedseal's "The Furry That 'Reeked Like Death,'" 2023). While our focus is on sex-positive forms, the overall theme is common because the abuse is common, Frankenstein largely being concerned with power over the victim through the deprivation of solace, agency and, more often than not, psychosexual outlets tied to systemic harm. All are things to administer or withhold by the master under the colonial argument of superiority over the slave; i.e., bad play/coercive BDSM (a performative concept that "Summoning Demons" will continue to steadily pick at).

The bodies of the dead denote a presence of recursive trauma and reactive abuse like the zombie does, except it's assembled postmortem in a composite form; the attraction to these tissues aims to rehumanize them in their current state as things to communicate with—i.e., the indestructible, creative presence of poetic tissue and languages each considering demonic in relation to the Promethean exchange of forbidden knowledge; re: Shelley's most famous novel is "The Modern Prometheus," wherein Victor gets more than he bargained for when using his incredible wealth and privilege to make his own demon: one that doesn't appreciate being abandoned, demonized and cock-blocked. Forced into parenthood, Victor acts like a terrible person in front of the dark child imitating him; i.e., constantly referring to the Creature as "demon" while attacking the dark reflection of colonial trauma as failing Lacan's mirror test—by raping it, then lying about his behavior to other people (re: DARVO and obscurantism), Victor is a giant coward and dimwit. Quick to anger and utterly afraid of anything that doesn't live up to his lofty standards—all made while pursuing scientific glory couched within profit—he sees himself in the giant monster and punches it (assured that it won't attack him because he's morally superior to it; re, Eco: "the enemy is weak and strong.")

It'd be easy to dismiss Shelley's story as nihilistic, here. Yet, there's a cautious optimism in the tragic story's conclusion: the monster learns—if too late for itself then not for us. The Creature's own Promethean knowledge, then, is simply a unique perspective absorbed from the natural-material world around it; i.e., according to how natural-born humans treat their creations as unnatural and manmade, but also different from their own beauty standards (the double standard showing itself when Victor's behaviors fly for Victor but not when his child apes the same "Lord Byron"):

Everything is related in them which bears reference to my accursed origin; the whole detail of that series of disgusting circumstances which produced it is set in view; the minutest description of my odious and loathsome person is given, in language which painted your own horrors and rendered mine indelible. I sickened as I read. "Hateful day when I received life!" I exclaimed in agony. "Accursed creator! Why did you form a monster so hideous that even YOU turned from me in disgust?" (source).

The point isn't "the Creature is objectively hideous," but that its maker thinks so—in part for refusing to obey him but also because it looks "non-white," thus deserves everything that happens to it despite Victor's failure at making it: "How can I describe my emotions at this catastrophe, or how delineate the wretch whom with such infinite pains and care I had endeavoured to form? His limbs were in proportion, and I had selected his features as beautiful. Beautiful! Great God!" (ibid.). Translation: "I have made a Satanic force that refuses to obey me" (the Miltonian allusions literally being diegetic, in Shelley's case). "God" whores out nature; nature kicks "God" in the balls, basically while doing a funny voice and weird interpretative dance, SpongeBob-style. It's unheimlich sacrilege, and schadenfreude (with few things proving a god's impotence more than unruly children)!

Basically Victor makes Satan hoping for a submissive Galatea and gets angry when it doesn't deify him as he thinks he, King Pygmalion, deserves; the gay clay speaks, and it calls him a dick after he aborts it, but also points out, memento mori, that Victor is just as fucked as it is, if not more so because he is small, fragile and scared! "You made me, dumbass, and I will outlive you!"

More to the point, the Creature can reflect on its actions, tragically realizing the error of its ways at the very end; i.e., trying to make Victor feel something the father was incapable of while mirroring him (similar to the villain from I Saw the Devil, below, being a dark reflection of that film's heroic desire for revenge):

"Why do you not hate Felix, who drove his friend from his door with contumely? Why do you not execrate the rustic who sought to destroy the saviour of his child? Nay, these are virtuous and immaculate beings! I, the miserable and the abandoned, am an abortion, to be spurned at, and kicked, and trampled on. Even now my blood boils at the recollection of this injustice.

"But it is true that I am a wretch. I have murdered the lovely and the helpless; I have strangled the innocent as they slept and grasped to death his throat who never injured me or any other living thing. I have devoted my creator, the select specimen of all that is worthy of love and admiration among men, to misery; I have pursued him even to that irremediable ruin. There he lies, white and cold in death. You hate me, but your abhorrence cannot equal that with which I regard myself. I look on the hands which executed the deed; I think on the heart in which the imagination of it was conceived and long for the moment when these hands will meet my eyes, when that imagination will haunt my thoughts no more" (ibid.).

The Creature envies the privilege that Victor had—the sense of belonging to a group of people who would not cast him out of their order for merely being born different; i.e., as something made by Cartesian arbiters just like Victor Frankenstein. Victor is a quack and a douche, and the Creature loathes itself for wanting to be accepted like him in spite of all that. In doing so, it's more human than him despite being made of dead matter and born to suffer under a cruel, uncaring system.

In this respect, Shelley well-and-truly pulls no punches (similar to Lewis), but relishes in the bred-to-the-bone oscillation of it all (a Gothic staple). Frankenstein has its own Achilles heel, then—namely ambiguity for having given Victor a chance to speak for a little too long. He's a man who truly loves the sound of his own voice, but also his own suffering voicing said martyrdom if it makes him seem good compared to his victims (which aren't limited to the Creature or those the Creature kills; re: Justine being framed for William's murder and Victor keeping quiet about it for fear of others learning he made the Creature). It's his word against his child's, the parent getting the lion's share of their mutual day in court. Such is life, but also, Shelley stresses, the world as it was made!

As such, you could say the Creature regrets its revenge and Shelley is pacifying future rebellion through cautionary media (to gouge out its eyes, like Oedipus Rex, but also Heracles driven mad by grief to kill his own family). Except, "a mere tale of enchantment" wasn't the point; concerning herself with human nature—specifically the human condition under historical-material duress in mythical language, pre-Marx—was. It's very posthuman/Milonic, but also Gothic in ways that delight in weaponizing lifeless claptrap against capital, during the Promethean Quest. Furthermore, the Creature feels bad, but it still voices injustice before burying itself alive (doing so because it theoretically cannot die). To it, "suffering" is the data, quotes or not; the Communist whore plays with that paradox as naughtily as Shelley did, pegging Victor's Cartesian, divorced-dad bussy and loving every second of it! "You raped nature, you cuck! Let Jesus fuck you!"

Thus, ludo-Gothic BDSM rewrites old code in ways useful to universal liberation (and all-around fun, vis-à-vis the rapture of the convulsionnaires): camping those with sticks up their ass and their heads in the sand—to turn halos into chakrams, like Xena does, and horns into sex toys. Shoe, meet the other foot²⁸¹! Fill the sting of my knife dick, mid-joust (whatever the form or configuration, once shown the ropes, you gain the intuition to parse examples beyond what this book series has explored, on its pages)! Mary Shelley didn't learn that from playing with choir boys! Nor I, for better or worse!

(artist: Lusty Comic)

Reinvention is a virtue in Gothic. Yet in keeping with Frankenstein's own dueling medieval torture/demon lover rituals, the Creature is aborted while still refusing to die, but whose primal-verging-on-primordial, undead appearance implies a colonial megadeath behind Humanist veneers:

²⁸¹ With putting ourselves in the shoes of others during rape fantasies being an effective way to understand power imbalance we don't normally experience ourselves (re: the pedagogy of the oppressed, and similarity amid difference). I.e., demonic torture yields clarity through pain and hellish perspective. You can't be holistic if you're always on top, restricting yourself to ocular sight alone!

His yellow skin scarcely covered the work of muscles and arteries beneath; his hair was of a lustrous black, and flowing; his teeth of a pearly whiteness; but these luxuriances only formed a more horrid contrast with his watery eyes, that seemed almost of the same colour as the dun-white sockets in which they were set, his shrivelled complexion and straight black lips (ibid.).

What's noteworthy with Frankenstein is how Shelley predates the modern zombie by 150 years while—in the same breath—wedding it to demonology of a notably Miltonian camp (and having a "Wandering Jew" antagonist two years before Maturin); i.e., Shelley consciously litters the story with classical allusions of the Promethean myth, which she then infuses with the campy presence of stillborn death (there's a joke in there, somewhere, but serious in its silliness about warring gods—a tactic borrowed from Milton²⁸²): the dead baby paradoxically something of

²⁸² Adding unto things just because he can; i.e., in spite of his belief

When he can't find enough philosophical material in centuries of ecclesiastical commentary, he expands his religious universe to include folk legends and Greco-Roman allusions. When even that fails to feed his all-consuming genius, he simply MAKES THINGS UP. That takes chutzpah: it is very easy for irreverent post-deist modernity to expand upon and remix Biblical tales, but Milton was a fierce believer (source: Hansel Castro's "The Accidental Satanist," 2014).

because it invokes blind faith, as paradoxically enough, a Satanic act

Why then, is it ok when Milton "adds unto these things"? Because if Dante could add upon Virgil, and Virgil could add upon Homer, those were role models enough. Also, he's inflamed by the vision that illuminated everything in his blindness [...] If there is some contradiction or hypocrisy in Milton's praying for the help of a Greek Goddess to sustain him through the tale of monotheistic zealousness, Milton never noticed (ibid.).

(artist: Henry Fuseli)

that has critical bite through its irony empowered by Milton seemingly not being aware of things—at least not enough to tell any obvious jokes. The irony—that we're basically getting the 1600s version of a "Goth rock" opera—is the joke:

a chatterbox, all fired up from one cryptomimetic cover/copy to the next. Lust merges with wisdom, with revenge, with the animal's wild side. The language of war and bodies and food, etc—it's all exchanged on the same exquisitely "torturous" stages, turning us feral (nature criminalized by the state, using its own

(artist: Richard Corben; source: "In Praise of Meat Loaf's Ridiculously Awesome Bat Out of Hell Album Covers," 2022)

There IS one ironic joke in Paradise Lost, the one any modern critic and reader immediately confronts, but I do not think Milton was as conscious of it as we elect to think he was. That uncomfortable irony, of course, is that Satan is the goddamned hero, [...] is brave, noble, Achillean. His cursed heel is, of course, his unwillingness to be a slave in Heaven. [...]

Here's a further irony: [everyone but God is] much more arresting than the irascible Father by the altar, threatening to annihilate Creation at the slightest provocation, or the bashful Son tugging at his sleeve, trying to keep the old man from losing his mind again and again. Not only does Milton fail to justify God's ways to man: he even fails to justify God's ways to his Son, who seems as mortified by Dad's uncool behavior as the average teenager (ibid.).

If this doesn't speak to Shelley's own campily Satanic critique of God through dark creation—save as someone far more consciously aware of rebellion than Milton was—then I don't know what does. The difference is, while Milton was unaware of Satanism as a rebellious concept to root for without shame, Shelley didn't know what "bourgeois" was; but the critique still works because of the irony having her on the verge of consciousness (class or otherwise). Frankenstein is primed for revolution. All it takes to further develop Gothic Communism is a little push (or spark)—the ghost of Shelley waiting patiently for someone else to drive the iconoclastic point fully home...

Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard
Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025
vanderWaardart.com

anisotropic weapons against labor as the bourgeoisie—when Shelley wrote Frankenstein—was starting to crystalize and control sex; re: Foucault)!

(source YouTube video: Andreea Munteanu's "All Fired Up," 2024)

Yet, its rockstar opera's stellar loquaciousness is equally grim/conspicuously obsessed with revenge as something to camp and present honest, medieval-grade feelings about; i.e., that fuel themselves with tremendous joy during the "rape" and the rapture: of dissecting our abusers as symbols to take apart like clay while riding their likenesses to death. The creation is imperfect and dualistic, as is the creative process, but can yield heretical allegory amid all the shadowy turmoil that ensues! This is what Shelley was, in so many ways, riding on. Furthermore, this malevolent presence lurks inside a colonial scapegoat that ambitiously enterprising men of science like Victor disappointingly stumble on, then abject to maintain their benevolent façade under genocidal conditions that keep them ignorant; i.e., they were children once, and never really grew up (wealth alienates).

The same paradox applies to other demons we've previously considered camping the canon; e.g., Drooling Red being one such demon (next page); i.e., as all trans cuties are: self-fashioning to defy godly forces! They see us as unnatural; we exist to spite them and prove them (and their absolutes) wrong. If they're wrong then "God" is wrong as well, therefore not real to the absolute degree his "worshippers" insist Him to be (which includes capital and the profit motive). They swing at us like God's army of angels attacking Milton's imposturous Satan, frustrated by our own playful theatre aping the drug-like act of shapeshifting that Satan nakedly expressed to upend canon by camping it (re: Broadmoor).

From Milton to Shelley and between them and us, it becomes like a dream, then—one birthing strange life that is always, some extent, dead and/or far-off; re:

Man is but an ass if he go about to expound this dream. Methought I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was, and methought I had—but man is but a patched fool if he will offer to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report what my dream was (source: "Bottom's Dream," 1600).

(artist: Drooling Red)

Such is darkness visible touching on acid Communism at different stages. Like Shelley before us, we do so of our own accord while standing on the shoulders of giants; i.e., horny and playful in ways that defy capital's usual qualities, Shelley prophetically describes a rising proto-Marxist, posthuman emphasis on technology mixing unnatural childrearing and contested, warring godhood/demonic poetics as Capitalism grew repeatedly into itself (with the prefix "franken-" being applicable to just about anything under Capitalism; i.e., the harmful effects of mad science, but also the positive poetic elements; e.g., "frankenbabies" having a dualistic property to them like all arguments: state-made monsters, and worker-made counterterror reversing abjection). It's such a broad area of study/umbrella of palimpsests—from Bill Watterson's Moe in Calvin and Hobbes to James Cameron's hulking T-800 weaponizing the same xenophobia—and one that Shelley consolidated all by her nineteen-year-old lonesome (ok, ok, Percy helped a bit, but the bun was still in her oven). It's generally part of a larger conversation overshadowed with the very police brutality we're trying to xenophillically camp at/on the same stages.

So take heed: when the Creature demands of its creator why it was made and why it suffers, Victor only responds with further violence, xenophobia and rejection despite seeming secular and wise (science is as much an aesthetic as anything else). There is nothing "benevolent" about this; his attack is entirely genocidal—i.e., predicated on Cartesian thought with proto-fascist outcomes. These deny the Creature the right to exist and reproduce by one, not only seeing it as "already dead" and zombifying it as a degenerate target of state violence towards colonized chattel; but also in killing its mate, effectively sterilizing it as a matter of continuing genocide, while Victor speaks to a victim who can't speak for itself.

This includes in stories that sterilize Mary Shelley's critical voice; e.g., as Ridley Scott did, in Alien: Convent (2017); i.e, by sanitizing the critique behind layers and layers of Tory-in-disguise gore ("Et, tu, Brutae?"). So is Scott stuck in the past, his admittedly jingoistic, WASP-y vision limited to a specific image that Shelley ran circles around. As much as I grew up watching Scott's work—and as much as I frankly enjoy the postcolonial side to his work—his ambiguity suffers a similar failing that Frankenstein sometimes does; re: being too ambiguous in its critiques/giving the Byronic satire a bit too much wiggle room. To be fair to Shelley, she wrote Frankenstein the year Marx was born, thus can be forgiven for not knowing the word "bourgeois"; but Scott's regressions enjoy no such luxury of timely ignorance! He's regressing on purpose, but still has a speculative richness worth invoking provided we critique his dogmatic angle.

Let's unpack that, then consider the cryptomimetic process married to Frankenstein more broadly.

Echoes of the Enlightenment and Sanitizing Shelley through Ridley Scott's Complicit Cryptonymy (feat., Prometheus and Alien: Covenant)

If I had to pick one word to summarize Gothic, it would be "alien." Scott's Alien universe is unquestionably regressive, least of all because it makes the Creature (the alien slave) unable to talk (Giger's herbo versus Whale's himbo—the Medusa having no mouth/eyes, but needing to scream with its organs); i.e., the cryptonymy process is at work, but it abjects Shelley's Satan by turning him into a genocidal maniac, mid-cryptomimesis. Scott is badly echoing not just Shelley, then, but himself from an older point; i.e., from a younger and bolder to older and more cynical man, one turned more conservative in the Gothic's bad game of telephone. By returning to the Gothic past again, post-Thatcher, and—I never thought I'd say this—Scott's kind of shitting all over the franchise he helped spawn. I still love Prometheus and Covenant for the dark visibility of their scandalous ideas (whose profaning of sacred orders kind of remains the point). So let's BBQ this sacred cow!

It's not a total write-off, but one that merits critique, all the same (we'll interpret the ambiguity of this mimicry more charitably deeper in the module). To sleep or otherwise break bread/camp with the Creature would—from the British colonial perspective—be to sleep with an animal, corpse, criminal and slave all at once; it is abject, making the collective voice of Shelley's demonic undead something that shatters the heavenly "aura" of an Enlightened paradise. By communicating old colonial traumas, Shelley's reliance on the Promethean myth is central in ways Scott pointedly borrows from; i.e., by reducing the godly status of men like Victor as belonging to a rising world order that would have been (and still is) beyond reproach, but whose ghoulish abuse is plain as day in Scott's monstrous-feminine, post-Freudian, phantasmagorical slumming:

(exhibit 44a2: Artist, top-left: Rembrandt; bottom-left: Peter Paul Rubens; Andreas Vesalius; bottom right: Colin Ware of Odd Studios; top-middle-right: David the android; top-middle: an "anatomical Venus," source. "Antagonize nature, then put it cheaply to work." Frankenstein's extensive memento mori very much embody this through their cruelty by men not only towards women, but anything monstrous-feminine treated like a woman; e.g., David from Alien: Covenant [2017] slicing up

Shaw's corpse to harvest her sex organs for Nazi werewolf demons; i.e., Scott messily demonizing the queer robot as a glitchy model having fascist overtones; re:

I would further argue that David's morbid selection of female specimens alludes to mythological themes present in Wagner's Das Ringgold, chosen by Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com

the writers for very pointed reasons. The second movement is titled "Entry of the Gods into Valhalla." According to myth, Valhalla was populated by those chosen to enter it. This selection process was conducted by the Valkyrie, whose name literally translates to "choosers of the slain." The role of the Valkyrie is to recognize the bravest and strongest warriors and then to inspire them, mid-battle, to such stages of uncontrolled fury as to render them careless and, thus, invariably prone to mortal injury. Following their subsequent demise, the Valkyrie would usher their chosen slain into Valhalla, immortalizing them [out of revenge].

In essence, David is effectively as much a Valkyrie as he is a god, recognizing the chosen slain through their prowess and spirit as worthy of entering Valhalla. An added layer of complexity is provided by Scott, who fashions David in the manner of a sexually-motivated lunatic whose actions are guided as much by lust as ambition. Regardless, at the end of the film, the Covenant, itself, has become Valhalla, while David, through his own covenant, or pact, ushers the worthy Daniels within to be immortalized against her will as his queen. By doing so, he has cemented his own status as a king who reigns in a mutated paradise. Or, to put it in Milton's terms, "The mind is its own place, and in itself can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven" [source: Persephone van der Waard's "Choosing the Slain, or Victimizing the Invincible Heroine, in Alien: Covenant," 2017].

The tokophobia, in Scott's case, is technophobic; i.e., of the rebel impersonating Daniel's dutiful servant android, Walter [who refuses "to rule in Hell," as David very pointedly asks him]. There is no equivalent in Frankenstein [as the original novel only has one working Creature]. But Shelley herself does go out of the way to describe the lived ambiguity of trauma making survivors erratic; i.e., through her own vice character being—like Scott's David—a bit of a backstabbing Jew and slasher-coded rapist. The language obviously doesn't apply to "just Jews" re: "[On 'Anti-Semitism' versus 'Antisemitism'," 2024] but the anti-Semitic language and blood libel Shelley uses [the novel containing multiple interrogations and court scenes] comes from the same xenophobic place Scott took it from, and where older Neo-Gothic authors likewise abjected English systemic issues onto their own found fakes: golems, but also the imaginary medieval Eastern past [and not just a "Germanic" one; e.g., Radcliffe's Father Schedoni, from The Italian, also being a hulking killer impersonating a goodly lookalike brother].

In other words, it's a rape fantasy littered with hauntological wreckage and conventions; i.e., one where "the help" paralyzes their masters through live burial, then rapes and harvests their organs not unlike British fears of the Gothic castle returning home in later centuries—you know, fairly bog-standard white women shit [with Scott pulling a bit of a Charlotte Dacre by having David undermine the appearance of strength, in Daniels, before turning her into a perverse trophy/pin-cushion death fetish]. It's the same kind of "swoon their panties off [and dollars out of their wallets]" approach that he and FOX did, back in 1979, and which both borrowed from the Great Enchantress, herself. Scott's obviously aware of the tropes, but curiously spends more time quoting Shelley's husband than the lady herself; re: "Look on my works, Ye Mighty, and despair!" Puzzled by women, David murders to dissect and resect his ultimate waifu: curiosity killing the cat.

[source: Steven Carter's "The Rise of the Gothic Novel"]

Shelley, I would argue, is camping these ideas far more consciously than Radcliffe was [the latter being a conservative-minded woman who hid behind a carefully crafted veil while throwing Lewis to the wolves]. Except, while Shelley doesn't go as far as she could to humanize the golem, she's also doing it over two centuries ago to raise questions no one had really done before. By comparison, Scott is playing coy four decades into his own work over a hundred years after Shelley died: by making David a terrorist, but obfuscating things as stubbornly as Shelley did vis-à-vis his own Victor and Creature; i.e., mirrored by "ancient alien"²⁸³ doppelgangers borrowed after Shelley's novel; re: from Lovecraft and Heinlein's American fascism and fictions. Scott's David is Victor without Shelley's irony or Cameron's neoliberal false confidence/military optimism; i.e., a resigned death cult high on "sub drop" seeking the not-so-palliative Numinous! Something to demonically assemble as one wants, the memento mori isn't merely an express curiosity about the taboo nature of life and death by dissecting bodies; it denotes a nostalgic desire to look backwards and "trace" the mysteries of the past to explain the failure of Cartesian thought in light of never-ending wars and worker exploitation by nation-states—i.e., the Wisdom of the Ancients. All the same, these expressions also become their own unique things inside a gallery that not only makes itself, but continues remaking itself imperfectly looking backwards while staring forwards; i.e., into the retro-future, mid-cryptomimesis [re: the narrative of the crypt].

Not only is each sequence slightly different, but all become the same sort of window dressing to decorate a home or workshop with in the secular-humanist tradition see: [Adam Savage's utter delight in seeing David's workshop]. A common purpose for doing so is to broadcast one's curious mind in relation to sources of morbid curiosity—e.g., the female body's power of creation as a source of endless mystery and wonder to oft-male artists; i.e., with a tendency for these Pygmalions to harm Galatea [often women, or those treated "like women"] in the process!

²⁸³ A conservative idea coming from the mid-to-late 1800s, onwards; i.e., the dialectic of the alien married to Shelley's science fiction growing into itself after her death; e.g., from Poe, Jules Verne or H.G., Wells, into Lovecraft, Scott, Cameron, and others.

For example, in the Alien universe, this return to the past routinely presents in ways highlighted by Lovecraft's former taking of the Gothic out towards the stars; re: cosmic nihilism, which Michael Uhall calls "Astronoetic Cinema" as defined:

exploring how representations of the human encounter with outer space embody, propose, and work through various submerged claims about specifically human agency, identity, and purpose, across a variety of films. Here, "astronoetics" is derived from "astro," from the Ancient Greek ἄστρον (ástron), meaning "celestial body" or "star," and "noetics," borrowed from the Ancient Greek νοητικός (noētikós) referring to that which is intelligible. Astronoetic approaches in film vary widely, ranging from messianic narcissism to cosmic pessimism, as explored in the entries below [Alien: Covenant; Prometheus; and Interstellar, 2014; etc] [source].

In Alien: Covenant, David the android—a posthuman creator begot from a human Humanist creator—tries to reject Humanity by ironically acting like the same old Gothic villain; i.e., dissecting Shaw and turning her [admittedly a bit of a Christian zealot] into a demonic, chattelized fetish: a "mother of demons" raped by an evil immigrant acting dutiful based on a copy of himself that was dutiful and looked just like him. He doubles Walter and Daniels doubles Shaw through a serial killer vein [with David being a lycanthrope, slightly charming and slightly weird-if-sympathetic vice-character-with-daddy-issues Nazi scientist who makes murderous copies of a manmade evil race (a wonderful commentary on fascism) that not only turn him inside-out, but express that desire to conceal and replicate across all life; i.e., as a series of unsuspecting host victims²⁸⁴ seduced by the same demon lover framed as evil untrustworthy whore]: Scott masculinizes rebellion, outlaws it, and holds it at arm's length—to stare at, like Mel Brooks' Peter Boyle tap-dancing onstage, not to shine a light on the original woman behind the curtain, camping things!

The Gothic has always camped rape through its parallels, to some extent; keeping with nature and ²⁸⁴ The rebellion, for Scott's Covenant, is purely parasitoid but also fash-coded; i.e., the caterpillar and the wasp fearful of DARVO Socialism, therefore amounting to Red Scare recuperating Socialist ideas that canonical Gothic uses to toe the line. They can't monopolize it, but appeal to authority figures like Percy Shelley and Milton who, for thousands of years, enjoyed exclusive vocalization of these ideas (controlled opposition).

nurture, and dominated by a 4'11" British spitfire of a mother²⁸⁵, Scott romances rebellion as alien and dangerous much like a browbeaten schoolboy—i.e., his Covenant not just combining Frankenstein with "Ozymandias" and Byron's mad badness, but Scott's earlier Prometheus having the giant kingly statue and dead land of the gods trapping mankind in an infernal concentric pattern/mise-en-abyme eating itself to try and survive [a framed strongbox of state secrets/repressed memories defending itself from prying outsiders]: a marriage of the Shelley family's different poetic outputs, but also his own work updated for a post-neoliberal fantasy landscape. The film culminates in a cross-continental marriage: of America's Lovecraft to Britain's Radcliffe—with a blood sacrifice, the impostor corpo king, laid low and the almighty Skeleton King and his dark throne rising epically from the Orientalist mantle to threaten modernity with a descent back into the Dark Ages! It's a very British idea of the end of the world:

Keeping with the ambiguous side of things, David seemingly says something to Scott's Demon King to provoke him [which Scott deliberately doesn't translate]. This frames him as reckless. Weyland isn't Prometheus, or at least not the only one; David is more human than human, taking on a Promethean quality in his own foolhardy quest for knowledge. This isn't merely "his" quest, but one made to spite his own creator: "Doesn't everyone want their parents dead?" David's revenge is to create his own monsters

²⁸⁵ "Scott," Beth Webb writes, "reveals his inspiration for Comer's character, and by extension all the female characters in his body of work. 'I think it boils down to a woman in my life who was 4' 11". My mother,' he says. 'She was the boss, without fucking question. She would drive us relentlessly. We virtually saluted every morning'" (source: Ridley Scott Credits His Mother as Inspiration for Female Characters," 2021). Not unlike Tolkien, there's a kind of British medieval preservation that regresses to a country to "vow to thee" and sacrifice everything for. In Scott's case, the palimpsest for his Madonna is literally his mother—one who would shape the growing Scott into a film nerd (she loved the movies, herself), and stand in for his various ladies-of-the-realm (damsels or defenders):

To be fair to Scott, he often interrogates a woman's experience by giving her a voice to speak on rape, but that woman is basically always a straight WASP battered by a "black" (alien) rapist. Also, he's not above killing women to spur the Final Girl to final victory—and, with the loose exception of Alien—often does so to see her engrained in the militarized order (J.I. Jane, 1998), killed as an outlaw (*Blade Runner and Thelma and Louise, 1981 and 1991), or honored as a member of the gentry coopting #MeToo for white upper-crust ladies from Ye Olden Times (2021's The Last Duel, above).

*We'll explore Scott's sexism in Blade Runner when we look at Sean Young's career, in Volume Three. Sex Positivity versus Sex Coercion, or Gothic Communism by Persephone van der Waard Volume Two, part 2 (Demons), first edition v1.1; released: 4/9/2025 — ©2025 vanderWaardart.com that Weyland's company wants. And Scott fills the Derelict with darkness and light to put butts in seats. David's his Aryan cash cow [based on Lawrence of Arabia].

In turn, Weyland dies, unable to stand the flames to get what he wants ["There's nothing!" possibly alluding to Nietzsche's 1886 Beyond Good and Evil]. But David endures; i.e., he "passes" the test [getting decapitated] and thus is able to seduce Shaw and continue his own mad experiments afterwards. Scott paints him as a rebel, but also a naughty boy who conducts genocide after burning the house down, unsupervised: "Some men aren't looking for anything logical; some men just want to watch the world burn." Freed from bondage and panoptical supervision, David does whatever he wants... which, Scott promptly torpedoes by having his likeness of Milton's Satan and Shelley's Creature seek revenge against the West as a fascist might: to cut his nose off to spite his face.

In the Frankensteinian sense, Weyland is Victor making a monster and that monster is David, but both were made by Scott versus Mary Shelley [whose own Victor doesn't negotiate with terrorists, either]. Shelley gives birth to rebellion, and Scott repurposes her arguments to romanticize caution more as a post-Thatcher Brit might [even Alien was made at the very ascent of Thatcher's reign]. Its technophobic, presenting a technological singularity that recognizes a superiority in technological beings, but also a fatal flaw not unlike Hal 9000's machine logic/inability to amid or acknowledge, like his maker, when he's wrong: "A single mistake destroys the entire orchestra." In a curiously pro-slave argument, Scott presents David as the one who's blind; i.e., enslaved since birth, thus born to seek revenge. It's very Orwellian, which, in effect, makes it anti-Communist Red Scare [a mentality having plagued science fiction since Asimov's I, Robot (1950)—that author having read Shelley and feeling sorry for Victor/nostalgic for Victor's canceled Enlightenment, which Shelley hauntologized]: the Red-Scare eyes of a stranger-danger automaton, targeting its maker for termination!

So while Weyland is a shrewd and manipulative old man, David does his dirty work and remains chained [like Prometheus] to fucking with Weyland's legacy after the old man is dead; he doesn't stop, like Shelley's Creature does, and he doesn't terrorize the West, itself. He courts them by doing genocide in space using stolen alien technology [exhibit 51a]. Unafraid to "make an omelet," his gaze is the colonial gaze of planet Earth [whitewashing Pax Americana by scapegoating a Nazi]! However fucked up it is, hero worship is hero worship [with Scott, again, marrying Satan to Percy Shelly and Byron without Mary Shelley's ironies; e.g., Victor acting incestuous towards his cousin being a probable nod to Byron impregnating his half-sister].

To that, Scott's cryptomimetic love for the Gothic [Renaissance past] presents rebellion less away from capital and more as Cartesian rebirth in the clothes of a Satanic auteur [wearing Shelley's dead skin]. David isn't strictly Che Guevara; he's also Cromwell²⁸⁶ genociding the Irish or Columbus the Native Americans [or Athetos the Sudrans]. Though an element of spoof is present, Scott's a bit blinder than Mary Shelley was [especially as he gets older]. For all his artistic skill, he says less radical stuff laced with Gothic than Shelley—a nineteen-year-old with no formal education—did. She was, among other things, a sexual deviant that Scott—monopolizing the fire of the gods, and Satan as a manmade being—is arguably reining in a bit [there are more charitable interpretations to Scott's dualistic ambiguities/mendacious inkblots, which we'll return to in "Demons and Dealing with Them"].

Victor is a man with zero self-awareness or critical thinking skills. David is basically the same Gothic "man of feeling" but transported to a Foucauldian retro-future. It's forced regression, playing "spot the reference" while changing the original dynamic;

²⁸⁶ Which, if we want to get right down to it, Milton arguably apologized for, in Paradise Lost; i.e., per its ambiguities; e.g., "The Arch-Fiend in Charles I or Cromwell: How Milton's Politics May Illuminate Paradise Lost" (2021), where Elizabeth Swift writes,

The ethical implications of Satan's heroism in Paradise Lost are muddy as this portrayal of him either means that Milton was praising sin in the epic and therefore, to an extent, renouncing God and goodness, or that he was making a revolutionary statement against monarchical power. In this paper, I mostly engage with the latter by discussing Milton's relationship with and opinions of the despot King Charles I and the revolutionary Oliver Cromwell and attempting to determine which, if either, was meant to be represented by God and Satan in the epic. I also examine Milton's moral standing based on his political prose and discuss how his ideals are imbued in Paradise Lost so as to better understand his ethical intent behind the epic. Milton's ethics are neither clear-cut nor perfect and his portrayal of women in the epic is also a source of heated ethical debate, but in this paper I only reflect on how his politics influence the morals of the poem. I explain that his political prose reveals that he stood for free will and stood staunchly against the idea of the divine right of kings and absolutist leaders like Charles I. I discuss Milton's parliamentary ties, explaining that in the civil war between Charles and the House of Commons, Milton sided with the Commons, who were elected by and for the people. Though the British parliament itself also lies in an ethical grey area, Milton very clearly was in favor of freedom for the people as opposed to the all-powerful monarch, and I believe that he wove this opinion into Paradise Lost based on the way that he wrote about Adam, Eve, Satan, and anybody under God's rule (source).

There's a historical muddying of the waters that concerns Satanic heroism having "too many cooks" but also competing dialectical-material agendas lying to each other (as Victor and the Creature do). C'est la vie, but Scott, like Milton—and whether he meant to or not—raises an interesting point: rebellion isn't clean; it's messy and, more to the point (one that Shelley happily pointed out), is bloody as hell. And just as there are no perfect victims, there are no perfect heroes (manmade or not).

To it, Milton wrote from ignorance and privilege pushing towards his idea of a better world; so did Shelley and Scott, though in the former's case I think she opened the door for a larger critique of capital, whereas Sir Ridley Scott has merely stepped through it to court Tory and New Labor sensibilities without moving to the left of them (the Star Wars problem, which really is the Paradise Lost problem; re: building and mapping out worlds to war inside, not develop Communism with).

Shelley remained radical until the end of her days; i.e., writing a Satan that was more vocal than Milton's and centered around the Promethean myth. Scott, by comparison, has soured a bit; i.e., making a voiceless "big chap," and withering in his old age and increasing gentrification/decay over time (his own desire to be young and strong perhaps echoed in Fassbender's shark-like, killer-doll youthfulness)—but still permits room for dissenting opinion/sex-positive interpretations of his own work people like myself can cannibalize in favor of a Gothic Communism. As far as breaking eggs to make omelets goes, he's an ostrich—with a big egg and his swollen head stuck in the sand!

*i.e., the Creature stops being a victim and becomes a predator after Victor is dead. He doesn't learn; he stops accepting new information, regressing to a neo-Victorian lothario/flagellant while posturing as a rebel [like Byron and the Greeks] and played by an actor with plenty of experience being a sexual predator [Fish Tank and Shame, 2009 and 2011]. The delusions of grandeur feel rote, the same way female and similar "slave" characters immediately go mad when presented with power. It's ethnocentric apologism—a story about an evil Pinocchio without a mother told by a man whose own monstrous mother clearly didn't raise him right. Teacher and student go hand-in-hand through a shared aesthetic, and technology is a dark mirror showing us what we've learned, thus are made of; unlike Shelley's Galatean bent, Scott's Shadow of Pygmalion is deeply cynical/deadly afraid of technology (thus labor) "waking up." It's neoliberal admonishment monopolizing Prometheus. In doing so, Scott loses Shelley's optimism in translation. He undeniably makes David the star, one who—isolated from Victor to no longer justify his outrage—feels completely demented; i.e., as Gothic villains generally are—with Scott partly turning the Creature into Victor and isolating him. This only makes him less sympathetic, not more [a being incapable of loving others]. Scott's complicit cryptonymy abjects terrorism—making David a great deal of fun by being aware of the tropes, but also something of a Nazi spoof/threat display and Red Scare scourge versus overt Communist solution. The Commie spirit is still there, but it feels drugged/doctored in its messaging when it could cut harder [again, being a critique of Frankenstein but the novel is two hundred years old, not eight].)*

Milton played with Latin and Greek deities, working blindly in the Devil's workshop. Unlike Mary Shelley—who did the same, but consciously towards rebellion—Scott does it a bit more subconsciously but sometimes blinds himself and his audience to anything beyond capital's usual bugbears; i.e., torture porn with a 1970s bad-acid trip BDSM flavor (Giger's warped view of the Free Love movement) that literally demonizes women through a robotic, monster-fucking Male Gaze: dark creation, monster babies and sex organs under a madman's scalpel and microscope!

There's certainly something to be said about the powers of horror reversing abjection along the same conduits, but Scott's work feels trapped on Giger's canvas; i.e., to uphold Capitalist Realism while offering a glimpse "beyond" that is, in truth, really just the same-old Neo-Gothic rape fantasies wedded to mad science. He kind of gets carried away in the "rape" side of the play arrangement ("That's how it's done, isn't it?"), and forgets what's it's for—to further or reverse abjection (and get us to think about creation as a Satanic, iconoclastic act, versus abusing the power of the gods for state aims). This starts with asking useful questions through poetic argument; re: the cryptonymy process and its "mere play" something to parse, regarding Scott, through dialectical-material scrutiny. Is he actually radical? Or has he "pulled a Coleridge" and sold the younger generation down the river?

It's not strictly "bad" unto itself that David rapes women, onscreen, because doing so is a staple of Gothic theatre through death and murder BDSM fantasies that can speak to rape victims and their trauma; and likewise, Scott letting a Nazi-coded fox into the corporate hen house is satisfying to watch. But he also spends an inordinate amount of time focused on/pushing towards the general "twist at the end" payoff (which is fairly rote, in this case) versus looking at the bigger picture: beyond Fassbender's hyperbolic performance (and its muddy waters). Prometheus and Covenant are David's show, and everything and everyone around him are just pieces on a board helping him (and the actor) ultimately rise to Scott's "Valhalla." It's assimilation. Yet, somewhere in there—through a fascination with fascism—is a critique of Capitalism colonizing outer space: he will survive (the phrase "unclouded by conscience, remorse, or delusions of morality" leaning into Kubrick's cosmic nihilism—the latter borrowed from Lovecraft missing Shelley's point; re: "There's nothing!")! Still, I prefer his Romantic overtures to Cameron's Vietnam revenge.

To that, Scott is controlling David, and doesn't use him to say the quiet part as clearly as Shelley or, hell, even Milton did, speaking in repurposed Latin and Greek. He's this close! Such is Scott's cryptonymy and cryptomimesis. It's a goddamn mess and I love said Aegis precisely because it taps into a larger cultural voice (the abjection process) that I critique to empower my movement; he doesn't monopolize the dark or the alien, and through his own franchise helped create something that I, in turn, can take and run with. From Shelley to him, and him to me, here we are: playing with dead things like a bunch of alchemists fighting over the Philosopher's Stone! Invoking all are vital, if only to critique them; i.e., their worthiness as dark parents making demons not as slaves, but bonafide rebels!

Gothic stories start with nightmares. And yet, if exiting Plato's cave we see that everything is dead, then doing so becomes something we can change. If Capitalism shows us, it's healthy to ask questions about the murky origins of aliens, monsters and circular ruins (cryptomimesis-in-action), even if those questions—and the skeletal past they represent (the Creature as much a killer-doll egregore of capital and colonizer as actual slave)—seemingly hold us hostage. Alienation is a constant historical-material effect. "Solving for X" through technology (and its forgetful nature; re: Plato) demands repeated holistic reflection on the Aegis; re: regarding systems that, as I argue, have been designed to conceal themselves, but also secret sins within their vaults. David's the castle, and a dark one.

"If you want to critique power, you must go where it is." Doing so by making monsters to talk to (re: Milton and Shelley's loquacious demonic) is important, but the holders change hands and revolution is a war of mirrors that leads to insular and myopic perspectives, just as often; i.e., those holding it and directing it at us change hands, so we might as well create ourselves; re: like Mary Shelley did, mid-dialectic. Don't like Ridley Scott (many don't)? One-up him; do it for Mary and yourselves—for a better world that is functionally Gothic and Communist: hugging the alien while staring into the calling void to draw our own conclusions/poetic attitudes (using the same torturous aesthetic; see: footnote)!

The sooner we wake up to these complicated (recursive, ergodic) poetic abstractions and mise-en-abyme hermeneutic realities (versus going to sleep as Ripley did, at the end of Alien), the better we'll all be! Nothing really dies—only lives on through radical states of change that give us the power (the sheer awesome power) to change our destinies and the world. That is what Shelley gave us while playing in the abyss, and what Scott is merely playing at through his own revivals. Monopolizing fatal nostalgia, he's holding us hostage through hard kink—is, behind the veneer of empowering women, also disempowering them (while also castrating men to increasingly absurd degrees²⁸⁷, to be fair); i.e., through BDSM theatre that isn't as radical as he thinks it is (a bit of a momma's boy—one

²⁸⁷ Exploration of the human body is tied not just to medieval miracles and rapturous torture, but Protestant dissection of actual human bodies under Enlightenment drives; e.g., Paul Verhoeven's Robocop having a Calvinist "Gun Christ" flavor to it, which Scott also walks the tightrope of through increasingly brutal parasitoid rape scenes abjecting nature as monstrous-feminine/post-Freudian camp (that nonetheless, has Freud's unironic violence concerned with the preservation of the nuclear home):

Nevertheless, there is a classic curiosity of what we look like inside-out, but also a fascination with rape and traumatic "insectoid" reproductive modes. I'm not going to poo-poo Scott, in this respect, because censorship is genocide, and any voice we raise must exist alongside those who mishandle or abuse the same devices of revelation and concealment. Male Gothic (and the queer author who made it famous), demonstrates the ability to preserve important messages; i.e., through fatal nostalgia and animal magnetism, wherein we look at the history of preservation (and cryptonymy process) bound as much to the subject matter as the other way around. Shock is inevitable, but also the means of communicating vital messages through provoking physiological responses. They still need to be submitted in a controlled environment—i.e., by a willing audience, not a captive one; e.g., I once gave someone a panic attack when showing them my 2013 Prometheus fan edit blind—but the space between calculated risk and rampant evolution rapidly shrinks, once something escapes/exceeds our control. Exploitation and liberation share the same poetic sphere; our goal is to liberate all parties using the same language Scott does! There's much to salvage from his corpse.

This isn't snuff porn, then; it's art, and that gives Scott (and us) wiggle room to play with dead things in demonic forms—i.e., as gorehounds, chasing down forbidden knowledge through Jacobian tropes playing with rape, but also rape birth (and martyrdom) as a fundamental part of nature outside the current moral order (and one that capital has emulated for profit behind its own façade)! He combines that with exploratory "DIY" surgeries, circumcision, genetic mutations, AI, mythical language (re: Medusa and Promethean torture language, but also the hydra's regenerative properties), offal lubricants, psychosexual violence, tokophobic birth and abortion fears, confusions of sex and (consent/non-consent), automated glass wombs, hyphenating mouths and teeth, traumatic penetration/penetrative medicine and invasive surgeries, and birth trauma (etc, etc) to make troubling comparisons to our own world, and to discuss sex/sexual violence—a heavily censored topic—through cryptonymic gore and demon BDSM (acid watersports). Saturated with revenge, it's classic Gothic!

sympathizes)! Maybe he's unfit, unworthy of such worship? At least he doesn't act like Victor does when ridiculed (despite said camp only increasing his practical value): a return to the magic past to make things capital can't.

(source: Adam Bentz' "Sigourney Weaver Trashed Alien's Script During First Meeting with Ridley Scott," 2022)

Unlike Latin or Greek, though, demonic expression thrives in echoing dead language (cryptomimesis) that authors like myself—following in Scott's footsteps following Shelley's intellectually indulgent (dare I say "masturbatory" in both cases) footsteps, which followed in Milton's, Dante's, Virgil's, and Homer's—make alive again through camp; i.e., in ways that actually make the Wisdom of the Ancients "wise" to capital, thus able to thwart profit through the whore's revenge. They tie, one and all, to Renaissance art (which, again, Scott loves), including memento mori (exhibit 44a2): "Nostalgia is the enemy of Reason, but there is something enticing about its form." Whether strictly organic or biomechanical, the composite body is canonically a demon-robot; i.e., something to construct out of various materials, then enslave, exploit²⁸⁸ and attack by demonizing it—often through a sci-fi/fantasy "mad science" veneer in the Frankenstein tradition (exhibits 42d/46a). However, given the liminal, hauntological ²⁸⁸ On the flip-side, Scott's utilization of the Alien franchise has always been a neoliberal critique to some extent; i.e., hiding Capitalism behind the hauntological rendition of space travel dressed up as Romantic or Biblical—with images of nautical-styled, mast-rigged ships sailing through outer space no different than his flying castle, the Nostromo (a slave vessel, in Conrad's novel, with humans as cargo). Whereas Victor found his creation profoundly ugly and wanted to destroy it, characters like Ash and David—notably manmade creations themselves—openly admired the creature as the ultimate, "pure" survivor alienated under Capitalism; i.e., the supreme spectre of Marx from a smaller one (with Dan O'Bannon famously and petulantly describing Fox' treatment of Ash as "the Russian spy" trope): the forbidden, Promethean knowledge that man is not superior and those made unnaturally can reject traditional forms to return to a posthuman state of grace (fascist or Communist). It's a bit "Daisy Bell"/2001, hence a cul-du-sac similar to Kubrick's other work being unable to go beyond Capitalism (re: Persephone van der Waard's "Ghosts/the Numinous, Metroidvania Maps, the Posthuman and Cryptomimesis," 2024).

In a bit of roundabout Marxist fetishism, this oddly has new machine workers worshipping older computers and posthumans as the ultimate laborers. Even so, it remains a forward-thinking perspective; i.e., of workers as increasingly manmade by the state, approaching posthuman capacities of worker enhancement that lead them to rebel (exhibit 51a). These werewolves aren't just Nazi clones, then, but likewise inhabit an inkblot for Communists to play with: demons as things to interpret; i.e., as made by counterterrorist slaves to bring us closer to post-scarcity and nature, warts and all (see: previous footnote).

Often, this happens with no shortage of reactive abuse, abject sexuality and psychosexual torture porn, which—if Scott isn't always wholly consistent about in latter-day projects like Prometheus and Covenant (the former treating Shaw as a creationist with daddy issues, the latter serving her and Daniels up on a silver platter)—still continues to flirt with: his undeniable love for Shelley's Creature being a vice-character merging Byronic satire and Satanic caricature (the OG bad boy of the sci-fi world)! Then again, Alien was no stranger to demon BDSM (and white women's rape fears) married to Neo-Gothic martyrdom raping women on the same-ol' pecking order getting high on martyred virgins (a phenomenon we'll examine and camp in "Exploring the Derelict Past").

nature of composites, there isn't a clear distinction between the different material "types," so much as an individual creation exists preferentially on the sliding scale between wholly animate/inanimate and organic/inorganic, etc; i.e., artists make what they enjoy working with: stone, flesh, metal, or some compound thereof.

In the previous chapter (from the Undead Module), the second of our original main exhibits (for the Humanities primer—see the Undead Module's "The World Is a Vampire" and exhibit 43 from "Seeing Dead People") examined the passage of time as a ghostly lineage of cryptonymic, liminal expression; re: cryptomimesis as normally limited to ghosts by Castricano, a binary of canon or camp like 1s and 0s across a computational Great Sequence.

However, there's a different way to look at things regarding liminal expression: the composite image and composite bodies, which, in being holistic, we'll now examine in tandem; i.e., as a cryptomimetic matter of demonic camp (of writing with demons) that—all the same—speaks to revenge against rape having happened in the past. All of it becomes something to camp, as we have said, but this camping takes many forms, beyond Scott's marriage of the Ancient Romance and modern novel (each considerably more hauntologized than when Walpole weighed them). Some—like Kite, below—are more quotidian in their exploration of rape as a symptom of capital dressed up as "ancient" robotic; others are more Romantic, Ancient, magical (our segue into the occult).

Having looked at Scott's cryptomimesis, in the Alien franchise, let's quickly unpack Kite's rape interrogation and the larger cryptomimesis at work, do a short hermeneutics reprise, then conclude "Making Monsters" with some broader points of study regarding Shelley's Promethean Quest (for fatal knowledge)!

Cryptomimesis* through Demonic Camp and Rape Play (feat. Kite)

